THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

"Scrutator," Pack to Rome.....(Sands) 3/

POETRY, CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

Ommond (T. S.), A Study of Metre.....(Richards) net 5/0
 Ingham (John Hall), Pompeii of the West and Other Poems.....(Lippincott) net 6/0
 Adeock (A. St. John), From a London Garden.....(Nutt) 2/6
 Keith (W. J.), In Freedom's Name and other Poems.....(Simpkin Marshall) net 3/6
 Sims (George R.), The Dagonet and other Poems.....(Routledge) 1/0 & 2/0
 Gaskell (Lady Catherine Milnes), The New Cinderella and other Plays.....(Drañé) 6/0
 Noyes (Alfred), The Flower of Old Japan.....(Richards) net 5/0
 Waldstein (Charles), Art in the Nineteenth Century.....(Cambridge University Press) net 2/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Layard (Sir Henry), Autobiography and Letters. 2 Vols.....(Murray) net 25/0
 Ramsay (Sir James H.), The Angevin Empire, A.D. 1134—A.D. 1216.....(Sonnenschein) 12/0
 The Camden Miscellany. Volume the Tenth.....(Royal Historical Society)
 The Transactions of the Honourable Society of Cymmrodorion.....(The Society)
 Firth (John R.), Augustus Caesar.....(Putnam's) 4/0
 Cambridge (Ada), Thirty Years in Australia.....(Methuen) 7/6
 Higgins (Mrs. Napier), The Bernards of Abington and Nether Winchendon: A Family History.....(Longmans) net 21/0
 Coleridge (Christabel), Charlotte Mary Yonge. Her Life and Letters.....(Macmillan) net 12/6
 Patterson (Annie W.), The Master Musicians: Schumann.....(Dent) net 3/6
 Strange (Edward F.), The Roof-Screen of Ranworth Church.....(Jarrold)
 Knight (Prof.) chosen and edited by, Andreapolis: Being Writings in Praise of St. Andrews.....(Douglas) net 3/0
 Molloy (Fitzgerald), The Sailor King. William the Fourth. His Court and His Subjects. 2 Vols.....(Hutchinson) net 21/0
 Raleigh (Walter), Wordsworth.....(Arnold) 6/0
 Dicks (William Frederick), Holbein's "Ambassadors" Unriddled (Cassell) net 10/6
 Ward (John), The Roman Fort of Gellygaer.....(Bemrose)

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Adamson (Robert), The Development of Modern Philosophy. 2 Vols.....(Blackwood) net 18/0
 Berens (Lewis H.), Toward the Light.....(Sonnenschein) 2/6
 Ames (Huxor), Thirteen Thoughts or Studies in Small Philosophy.....(Drañé) net 1/6
 Reynolds (Osborne), Papers on Mechanical and Physical Subjects. Vol. III.....(Clay) net 10/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Burrows (Captain Guy), The Curse of Central Africa.....(Everett) net 21/0
 Savory (Isabel), In the Tail of the Peacock.....(Hutchinson) 16/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Turnbull (Alexander), The Victualling of the Royal Navy.....(Stock) 1/0
 Batson (H. M.), A Book of the Country and the Garden.....(Methuen) 10/6
 Henson (H. Hensley), The Education Act and After.....(") 1/0
 Marks (Montague) edited and compiled by, Home Arts and Crafts.....(Pearson) net 3/6
 Weir (Harrison), Our Poultry. Part 10.....(Hutchinson) net 9/7
 Alderson (F. Herbert), Indigestion: Its Prevention and Cure.....(Scott) 1/0

EDUCATIONAL.

McMurry (C.), Special Method in the Reading of English Classics.....(Macmillan) net 3/6
 McMurry (Charles A. and Frank M.), The Method of the Recitation.....(Macmillan) net 4/0
 Willmore (J. Selden), Handbook of Spoken Egyptian Arabic.....(Nutt) 2/0

S.P.C.K. PUBLICATIONS.

Elements of Luganda Grammar.....5/0
 Nyanja—English Vocabulary.....1/0
 Common Prayer in the Luyoro Language.....3/0
 A Summary of Old Testament History in the Sechuana Language.....0/8
 Luganda Proverbs.....0/6
 Chopi Version of Lumen and Revelationem Gentium.....0/2
 Devotions in the Sechuana Language.....2/6
 Arabic Teaching of the Church of England.....2/6

NEW EDITIONS.

King (Clarence), Mountaineering in Sierra Nevada.....(Unwin) net 6/0
 Holyoake (George Jacob), Public Speaking and Debate.....(") net 1/0
 Kennedy (Bart), A Sailor Tramp.....(Newnes) 0/6
 Whyte-Melville (G. J.), Songs and Verses and The True Cross.....(Ward Lock) 2/0
 Lynch (Lawrence L.), Against Odds.....(") 0/6
 Fowler (Ellen Thornycroft), Cupid's Garden.....(Cassell) 0/6
 Doyle (A. Conan), The Great Shadow.....(Arrowsmith) 0/6
 Lovell (Arthur), Concentration.....(Simpkin Marshall) net 2/0
 Lockhart (John Gibson), The Life of Sir Walter Scott. Vol. IX.....(Jack)
 Scott (Sir Walter), The Edinburgh Waverley: Anne of Gelestein. 2 Vols.....(Jack)
 Scott (Sir Walter), The Edinburgh Waverley: The Fair Maid of Perth. Vol. II.....(Jack)
 Chambers (Robert W.), The Red Republic.....(Putnam's) 3/6
 Shakespeare's Othello, edited by Dowden (Edward).....(Methuen) 3/6
 McMurry (Charles A.), The Elements of General Method.....(Macmillan) net 4/0

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall and Mr. Henry Frowde, the joint publishers of the "Oxford India Paper Dickens," are co-operating in the production of a new, complete, and fully illustrated edition, to be known as "The Fireside Dickens." There will be twenty-two volumes in all. The first three will be issued towards the end of this month.

The new volume of the "Literatures of the World," edited by Mr. Edmund Gosse, will appear next week. It is a history of Arabic literature, specially written for Mr. Heinemann by Prof. Clément Huart, of the "Ecole des Langues orientales," and translator from oriental languages to the French Government.

Miss Menie Muriel Dowie, author of "A Girl in the Karpethians," "Love and His Mask," &c., will shortly publish, through Mr. Grant Richards, a new book entitled "Things about our Neighbourhood." In the preface, the author, after referring to the wealth of garden and flower literature, says: "Amongst all these books I know of none which deals with the whole round of country duties, pleasures, industries—what word must I use?—in a manner which is both practical and light in tone. This has been the centre of my present intention. At the same time, in sketching some of the people who live in the country, far from the areas discovered and invaded by Londoners of artistic taste, I have sought to inform this account of the girls at the Manor with that air of actuality which I deem proper to the picture . . . I offer to all lovers of plants, trees, and beasts, my country book."

Messrs. Treherne & Co. announce the publication early next week of the first volume of their "Poets of the Renaissance" series.

Mr. Bertram Dobell announces two books. One is "The Poetical Works of Thomas Traherne, B.D.," a seventeenth century writer, whose poems are now first published from the original manuscripts. The other book is entitled "Sidelights on Charles Lamb." Mr. Dobell claims to have found in the "London Magazine" a number of essays which he attributes (chiefly upon internal evidence) to the pen of Charles Lamb. One of the pieces tells, under the guise of a humorous fiction, the story of a real event, not known to his previous biographers, in the life of Lamb.

ISBISTER.

A NEW AMERICAN HUMORIST.

3/6 WOLFVILLE DAYS. 3/6

By ALFRED HENRY LEWIS.

The Daily Telegraph says:—"Bret Harte seems to have bequeathed his mantle to the author of this remarkable little book of sketches of life in Arizona."

The Daily News says:—"Mr. Lewis is certainly a great discovery."
The Daily Mail says:—"That Mr. Lewis reveals in this book a fresh talent, that he expresses in original terms a new view of life is certain, and we recommend 'Wolfville Days' to all those who do not prefer their fiction cut and dried."

Also "WOLFVILLE" by the same Author, illustrated by FREDERIC REMINGTON. Price 6/-

"A POET'S DREAMS."—Daily News.

THE HILL OF TROUBLE.

6/- By ARTHUR C. BENSON. 6/-

Stories Mystical, Mediæval, and Supernatural.

"There are some wonderfully clever examples of pure imaginative writing, as refreshing in these days to a jaded novel reader as a cool draught of pure morning air admitted into a fevered room."

"The book is one of sweet and tranquil beauty, of pure chivalrous devotion."—Times.

THE LIGHT INVISIBLE.

3/6 Tales of a Visionary. By ROBERT BENSON. 3/6

A LAD OF THE O'FRIEL'S.

6/- By SEUMAS MACMANUS. 6/-

MY NATURE NOTEBOOK.

2/6 By E. KAY ROBINSON. 2/6

1/- Net. GULLIVER JOE. 1/- Net.

By JONATHAN QUICK.

Dean of St. Rattrick's.

"An uncommonly joyous little volume."—Tc. lay.

"One of the best skits published in the present generation."—Spectator.

1/- Net. 23RD THOUSAND. 1/- Net.

WISDOM WHILE YOU WAIT.

"The authors of this brilliantly witty parody are to be congratulated on having produced by perfectly fair means a work of humour likely to become classical."—Daily Mail.

ON THE VELDT IN THE SEVENTIES.

By Lieut.-General Sir CHARLES WARREN, K.C.B., G.C.M.G.

16/- With Maps and Illustrations. 16/-
 "The student of South African politics will find it well worth perusal."—St. James's Gazette.

THE MARQUIS OF SALISBURY.

A New Biography.

6/- By FREDERICK DOUGLAS HOW. 6/-

Illustrated with Reproductions of Famous Cartoons by Tenniel, Linley Sambourne, R. T. Reed, Harry Furniss, Ape, Spy, &c.

ISBISTER & Co., Ltd.,

15 & 16, TAVISTOCK STREET, LONDON, W.C.

J. M. DENT & Co.'s LIST.

Dent's Complete Illustrated Lamb.

THE WORKS OF CHARLES LAMB.

Edited by WILLIAM MACDONALD, with Biographical and Critical Essay, Bibliographical Introductions, and Notes.

Special Features of this Edition:

(1.) PROFUSE ILLUSTRATION AND DAINTY SETTING.
 (The Illustrations will include many Portraits, Reproductions from the Original Engravings, and Drawings by C. E. BROCK, HERBERT RAILTON, WINIFRED GREEN, and others.)

(2.) COMPLETENESS AND METHODOLOGICAL GROUPING.

In 12 Vols., long fcap. 8vo (4½ by 7½), 3s. 6d. net per Vol.

Also 200 Large-paper Copies.

First Volumes ready shortly. A Prospectus post free.

BOOKS NEW AND FORTHCOMING.

RABBITS, CATS, AND CAVIES. By C. H. LANE, F.Z.S. With 117 Illustrations drawn from Life, by ROSA BEBB. Square demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

THE WIZARD'S AUNT; a Novel. By JANET LAING. Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

SCHUMANN. By ANNIE PATTERSON, Mus.Doc., B.A. Illustrated. (Master Musicians.) Square Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

SORDELLO AND CUNIZZA: a Study of Life in the Thirteenth Century. By EUGENE BENSON. Square fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

STUDIES IN THEOLOGY. By Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED, M.A., and Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, M.A. Demy 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

M. GASTON PARIS' LAST WORK.

MEDIAEVAL FRENCH LITERATURE. By GASTON PARIS. ("The Temple Primers.") 1s. net.
 "The ease of exposition which comes from thorough knowledge."—Spectator.

Companion Volumes to "THE TEMPLE BIBLE."

THE TEMPLE The Apocrypha. EDITION OF

Uniform with the "Temple Bible." 6 Vols. square crown 16mo, with Photogravure Frontispieces. Cloth, 1/- net; paste grain roan, 1/6 net per Vol.

First Volumes:

Ecclesiasticus. Edited by N. SCHMIDT, D.D., LL.D.

Maccabees. Edited by W. FAIRWEATHER, M.A.

NEW "TEMPLE CLASSICS."

With Photogravure Frontispieces. Cloth, 1/6 net; Lambskin, 2/- net.

RECENT ADDITIONS:—GOLDSMITH'S ESSAYS. Edited by AUSTIN DOBSON.—Crabbe's BOROUGH. Edited by H. WILLIAMS, M.A.—Lady Guest's Version of the MABINOGION. Edited by Professor R. WILLIAMS, M.A.—Macaulay's LAYS OF ANCIENT ROME. Edited by O. SMEATON, M.A.—A New Translation of GOETHE'S FAUST. By A. G. LATHAM, M.A.—The First English Rendering of the LEGEND OF ST. FRANCIS. By E. GURNEY SALTER.—Francis Burney's EVELINA, in 2 Vols. Many others in preparation.

The Mediæval Town Series.

Fcap. 8vo (pocketable), with Maps and numerous Illustrations. Price 3/6 net. and 4/6 net, per vol. Leather bindings, 1/- extra.

* For further particulars see List, sent post free.

ASSISI	CHARTRES	PRAGUE
BRUGES	FLORENCE	ROME
CAIRO	MOSCOW	ROUEN
CONSTANTI-	NUREMBERG	TOLEDO
NOPLE	PERUGIA	VERONA

* Many other Volumes in Preparation.

J. M. DENT & Co., Bedford Street, London.

SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co.'s NEWEST BOOKS.

DESCRIPTIVE GUIDE TO THE BEST FICTION, BRITISH AND AMERICAN including Translations from Foreign Languages. By ERNEST A. BAKER, M.A. (Lond.). 618 pp., 8vo, cloth extra, 8s. 6d. net.

This important Annotated Bibliography, which has been in preparation a long while, covers the whole range of British Fiction from the Fifteenth Century to the Present Day. About 4,500 Novels are Classified and Characterized, the annotations ranging from two or three lines up to ten or twelve. To each book is added—

1. The best available editions.
2. The publisher's name.
3. The American publisher's name, where American editions exist.
4. The English and (where American editions exist) the American prices.
5. The date of first publication.

An American Edition of the Book is published simultaneously by The MACMILLAN COMPANY of New York.

CONTINUATION OF SIR J. RAMSAY'S IMPORTANT HISTORY.

THE ANGEVIN EMPIRE: The Three Reigns of Henry II., Richard I., and John. By Sir JAMES H. RAMSAY, Bart., of Bamf., M.A. With Maps and Illustrations. 12s.

THREE NEW NOVELS.

1. THE CANON'S DAUGHTER.

By W. B. COOKE. With a Frontispiece.
"Mr. W. B. Cooke is a follower of the good old school of Dickens. 'The Canon's Daughter' is quite amusing."—St. James's Gazette. "An excellent story, well told, full of light and shade, humour and pathos, and exhibiting some careful character-drawing."—Warwickshire Standard. "A bright and well-written tale of true love and journalism. The struggles of poor David, who, relinquishing the wholesome stage of commercialism, flounders off after the literary chimera, are exceedingly well told, while some remarkably good little flashes of genuine humour distinguish Mr. Cooke's minor characters."—Pull Mall Gazette.

2. WHERE LIES HER CHARM?

By JAMES McGRIGOR ALLAN, Author of "The Wild Carate," &c. 6s.
"Attracts by its amusing naïveté. The straightforward handling of the topics which are usually treated with reserve is quite refreshing, and the contrasted clerics, Dr. Grant and Mr. Philip Phinehas, are admirably drawn. The women are good; the daughter of Mr. Grant, who instructs in elementary theology the rascally scoundrel whom the plutonous and dishonest bi-hop has imposed upon her father out of spite, is very clever and quite new."—World.

A NEW SPORTING NOVELIST.

3. HUNTING IN COUPLES.

By GODFREY BOSVILLE. 2s. 6d., cloth; 2s. boards.
(The latter edition will be found on all the principal Railway Bookstalls.)
"Will interest many. One is rather glad to come across a book with a ring of sport about it, in which the characters do not talk slang."—The Field. "A genial and natural picture of hunting and country society of the better sort."—Times. "Mr. Bosville's sketches of hurdle-racing and cross-country runs are written with the zest of one who knows and loves the joys of the chase."—Notes Guardian. "No novelist—not even excepting Mrs. Kennard—has ever handled the theme more successfully."—Scotsman.

Two New Volumes of the SOCIAL SCIENCE SERIES.

1. THE VILLAGE PROBLEM.

By G. F. MILLIN, Author of "Life in our Villages," "Evil and Evolution," &c. 2s. 6d.
"A thoughtful study of the depopulation of the villages and of the causes that have led to the failure of past attempts to revive old village life, while it suggests economic and other remedies for the solution of the difficulties thus created. Well informed, carefully reasoned, and suggestive."—Scotsman.

2. TOWARDS THE LIGHT: Elementary Studies in Ethics and Economics.

2s. 6d.

THE QUESTION OF RE-UNION

WITH ROME. By B. WILLARD-ARCHER. 6s.
"A fine, whole-hearted polemical volume."—St. James's Gazette.

FIAT LUX: Outspoken Essays in Theology and Criticism. By INQUISITOR. 6s.

HUMAN EVOLUTION: An Inductive Study of Man. By G. ROME HALL, M.D. 8vo, 7s. 6d.

"It is the first attempt at an exposition of the evolution of Socialism on anything like scientific lines—and it is due to the author to say that he has succeeded very well indeed in his task."—New Age.

SWAN SONNENSCHNEIN & Co., LTD., London.

DIGBY, LONG & Co.'s LIST of NEW POPULAR NOVELS, &c.

SIX SHILLINGS EACH.

His Eligible Grace the Duke. By ARABELLA KEENE, Author of "Dr. Janet of Harley Street," &c.

An Underground Mystery. By ROBERT H. SHERARD, Author of "Jacob Niemand" & "The Ghost's Revenge," &c.

A Coin of Edward VII. By FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," "The Pagan's Cup," &c.

Friendly Foes. By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Citoyenne Jacqueline," "Rival Claimants," "Atonement by Proxy," &c.

A Man in Love. By Mrs. A. M. DIEH, Author of "A Woman's Cross," "Love's Crossways," &c.

Not in Fellowship. By "ALIEN," Author of "The Untold Half," "Another Woman's Territory," &c.

Free Soil, Free Soul. By LUCAS CLERVE, Author of "Lazarus," "As the Twig is Bent," "The Magic of Rome," &c.

Dahlia. By HELEN MATHERS, Author of "Comin' thro' the Rye," "Venus Victrix," "Honey," &c.

The Forest Prince. By BRYAN W. WARD, Author of "Sir Geoffrey de Skelington," &c.

Silent Places. By JAMES T. FINDLAY, Author of "A Deal with the King," &c.

Marina De la Rey. By CHARLOTTE MOOR ("Colonia").

By Fortune's Whim. By T. W. SPIGHT, Author of "The Mysteries of Heron Dyke," "Second Love," &c.

The Kingdom that Never Came. By G. BERESFORD FITZGERALD, Author of "The Minor Canon," "Dear Paul," "The Stigma," &c.

The Secret Way. By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "When Charles the First was King," "Bonds of Steel," "The Three Days Terror," &c.

Coy. By C. HOWELL, Author of "Many Days After," &c.

A Strange Honeymoon. By ELLIS DEAN.

A Double Revenge. By L. T. MEAD, Author of "Stories from the Diary of a Doctor," [Second Edition].

The Coachman with Yellow Lace. By CHARLES HANNA, Author of "The Captive of Pekin," "Castle Oriol," &c.

Between the Dark and the Daylight. By RICHARD MARSH, Author of "The Beetle," "An Astrological Detective," &c.

Jose: A Study of Temperament. By FLORENCE SEVERNE, Author of "The Dowager's Determination," &c.

In Life's Afternoon. By CURTIS YORK, Author of "Hush," "A Memory Incarnate," &c.

A Woman's Calvary. By JEAN MIDDLEMASS, Author of "A Girl in a Thousand," "The Mystery of Clement Dunraven," "Hush Money," &c.

THREE SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE EACH.

The New Lady Teazle. By HELEN MATHERS, Author of "Comin' thro' the Rye."

The Whims of Erasmus. By W. CARTER PLATTS, Author of "The Tuttlebury Tales," &c., with specially-designed pictorial cover.

Leila's Lovers; a Tale of the Varsity. By Surgeon Major H. M. GREENHOW, Author of "The Emperor's Design," "Brenda's Experiment," &c.

With Sword and Banner. By C. A. WENTWORTH ERCK, Author of "A Gentleman of the Nineteenth Century," &c.

My Double, and other Stories. By MARCUS WHITETHORN.

A Dutch Household. By JOHANNA VAN WOUDE, translated by A. A. B. (This novel has run into seven editions in Holland.)

The Golden Tooth. By J. McLAREN COBBAN, Author of "The Angel of the Covenant."

A Torn Out Page. By DORA RUSSELL, Author of "Footprints in the Snow," &c.

McGillero's Millions. By IZA DUFFUS HARDY, Author of "In the Springtime of Love," &c.

The Black and White House. By LILLIE CRANE, Author of "The Diamond Bangle," &c. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

Memoirs of Gerald O'Connor. By Judge O'CONNOR MORRIS, Author of "Present Irish Question," "The Campaign of 1815," &c. Cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

18, Boulevard Street, Fleet Street, London, E.C.

OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS.

THE MEDIAEVAL STAGE. By E. K. CHAMBERS, B.A. 2 vols. 8vo. [Immediately.]

THE COMPLETE WORKS OF JOHN LYLY. Now for the first time Collected, and edited from the Earliest Quartos; with Life, Bibliography, Essays, Notes, and Index. By R. WARWICK BOND, M.A. 3 vols. demy 8vo, cloth, 42s. net.

THE WORKS OF THOMAS KYD. Edited from the Original Texts, with Introduction, Notes, and Facsimiles. By FREDERICK S. BOAS, M.A. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, 15s. net.

THE TROUBADOURS OF DANTE. Being Selections from the Works of the Provençal Poets quoted by Dante. With Introduction, Notes, Concise Grammar and Glossary, by H. J. CHAYTOR, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s. 6d. net.

LA LIGNÉE DES POÈTES FRANÇAIS AU XIX^È SIÈCLE. Par CHARLES BONNIER. Demy 12mo, cloth, 3s. net, and in leather bindings.

THE OXFORD BOOK OF ENGLISH VERSE. 1250-1900. Chosen and edited by A. T. QUILLER-COUCH. Crown 8vo, cloth; gilt top, 7s. 6d., and in straight grain roan, rutland morocco, and tree calf. Fcap. 8vo, on Oxford India Paper, cloth extra, gilt top, 10s. 6d., and in bindings as above, also in half-calf and vellum boards.

THE ARAB CONQUEST OF EGYPT, and the Last Thirty Years of the Roman Dominion. By ALFRED J. BUTLER, D.Litt., F.S.A. 8vo, cloth, 16s. net.

A HISTORY OF THE PENINSULAR WAR. By CHARLES OMAN, M.A. Vol. I. 1807-1809. From the Treaty Fontainebleau to the Battle of Corunna. With Maps, Plans, and Portraits. 8vo, cloth, 14s. net. [Vol. II. Immediately.]

THE OXFORD ENGLISH DICTIONARY. A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Founded mainly on the Materials collected by the Philological Society. Edited by Dr. JAMES A. H. MURRAY. Imperial 4to. Double section, ONOMASTICAL to OUTING, 5s. [Ready April 1st.]

Also Published by HENRY FROWDE.

THE MOUNT OF OLIVES and Primitive Holiness set forth in the Life of Paulinus Bishop of Nola. By HENRY VAUGHAN, Silurist. Edited, with preface, by L. I. GUINEY. Large type, 18mo, cloth, 1s. net, and in various leather bindings.

London:

HENRY FROWDE,
OXFORD UNIVERSITY PRESS WAREHOUSE,
AMEN CORNER

From Mr. MURRAY'S LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

THE WORKS OF LORD BYRON. A New Text, collated with the original MSS. and Revised Proofs, which are still in existence, with many hitherto unpublished additions. This will be the most complete Edition of Lord Byron's Works, as no other Editors have had access to the original MSS. With Portraits and Illustrations. To be completed in 13 vols. Crown 8vo, 6s. each.

POETRY. Edited by ERNEST HARTLEY COLERIDGE. Vol. VI.—Don Juan. [Ready next week.]

* * Owing to the extent of the Notes to Byron's Works, which contain a large amount of new information, it has been found impossible to include the whole in 6 volumes.

A Seventh Volume containing occasional pieces, a Bibliography, and a very full index of all Byron's Works is in the press.

LETTERS. Edited by ROWLAND E. PROTHERO. Now complete in 6 volumes, from 1788 to 1824, containing many hitherto unpublished letters.

"The sixth volume of Byron's prose writings concludes one of the most attractive collections of letters and journals in the language, and one of the best edited works our literature possesses."—Dr. R. GARRETT in The Bookman.

"If, as we are disposed to believe, nobody ever wrote better than Byron, surely no one ever made better notes than Mr. Prothero."—The New York Nation.

PRINCE CHRISTIAN VICTOR. The Story of a Young Soldier. By T. HERBERT WARREN, President of Magdalen College, Oxford. With Portraits and Illustrations. Square 8vo, 12s. net. [Just out.]

IS IT SHAKESPEARE? The great question of Elizabethan Literature, answered in the light of New Revelations and important contemporary evidence hitherto unnoticed. By a CAMBRIDGE GRADUATE. With Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, 12s. net. [Just out.]

OUT OF THE PAST. Some Biographical Essays. By the Right Hon. Sir MOUNTSTUART E. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I., Author of "Notes from a Diary." 2 vols. crown 8vo, 18s. [Ready next week.]

SIR A. HENRY LAYARD, G.C.B., D.C.L. Autobiography and Letters, from his Childhood until his Appointment as H.M. Ambassador at Madrid. With a Chapter on his Parliamentary Career by the Right Hon. Sir ARTHUR OTWAY. Edited by the Hon. WILLIAM N. BRUCE. With Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 25s. net. [Just out.]

THE LIFE AND TIMES OF GEORG JOACHIM GOSCHEN, Publisher and Printer of Leipzig, 1752–1828. With Extracts from his Correspondence with Goethe, Schiller, Klopstock, Wieland, Körner, and many other leading Authors and Men of Letters of the Time. By his Grandson, VISCOUNT GOSCHEN. With Portraits and Illustrations. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 36s. net. [Just out.]

"An altogether admirable biography of a most interesting figure is the Life of Georg Joachim Goschen by his grandson and namesake."

—Pall Mall Gazette.

"A work of considerable value. It is a vividly drawn picture of a really interesting man."—The Times.

MORE LETTERS OF CHARLES DARWIN. A Record of his Work in a Series of hitherto Unpublished Letters. Edited by FRANCIS DARWIN, Fellow of Christ's College; and A. C. SEWARD, Fellow of Emmanuel College, Cambridge. With Portraits. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 32s. net. [Just out.]

"Abundant letters, written through the years and telling of his thoughts, his plans of work, his hopes and his doubts, written some to the dearest and most intimate friend and others to comparative strangers valued for their sympathy and help in work, are nothing more or less than a revelation of the man."

These letters have a definite and immeasurable value for the scientific naturalist. . . . The present collection is arranged in subjects, and contains a great deal of very great importance.—The Times.

FIELD-MARSHAL SIR DONALD STEWART, G.C.B., G.C.I.E. An account of his Life, mainly in his own words. Edited by G. R. ELAMIE, C.S.I., joint Author of "Lumsden of the Guides." With Portraits, Maps, and Illustrations. Demy 8vo, 15s. net. [Just out.]

"A plain story, plainly told, which is clear as truth itself. . . . a fascinating history of the times and a true portrait of the man, with many luminous touches."

—The Times.

"The book teems with breathless incident and adventure . . . the inspiring record of the life of a brave man."—Daily News.

CORRESPONDENCE OF LADY BURGHES (afterwards Countess of Westmorland) with the Duke of Wellington. Edited by her Daughter, Lady ROSA WIGGALL. With Portraits. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Just out.]

IN THE ANDAMANS AND NICOBARS: The Narrative of a Cruise in the schooner "Terrapin," with Notices of the Islands, their Fauna, Ethnology, &c. By C. BONEN KLOSS. With Maps and numerous Illustrations from Photographs taken on the spot. Medium 8vo, 21s. net. [Just out.]

"We have previously referred to the series of photographs with which the book is furnished. They are deserving of special praise, not only because they are good, but also on account of their value to the anthropologist. They are well chosen to illustrate the different types of natives, and form not the least valuable part of this interesting book."—The Field.

THE IDEALS OF THE EAST. With Special Reference to the Art of Japan. By KAKASU OKAKURA. Crown 8vo, 5s. net. [Just out.]

" . . . A work of extraordinary interest."—The Times.

"This is a remarkable little volume."—Daily Chronicle.

DANNY. A New Novel by ALFRED OLLIVANT, Author of "Owd Bob." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Just out.]

" . . . The work is notable for the fineness of its sympathy and the delicacy of its natural art, as well as new in its kind. . . . A very real story, of real humour, real pathos, and real character."—The Times.

JOHN MURRAY, Albemarle Street, W.

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.

NEWNES' ART LIBRARY.

Large Fcap. 4to, each Volume containing 64 Full-page Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. The first two volumes illustrative of The Work of Botticelli and The Work of Sir Joshua Reynolds. 3s. 6d. net. each.

THIN PAPER CLASSICS.

Evelyn's Diary, Lamb's Works, and Peacock's Novels. Cloth, 3s. net; Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net. each.

THIN PAPER NOVELS.

AINSWORTH'S Old St. Paul's, and WHITEHEAD'S Richard Savage. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Lambskin, 3s. net. each.

OUR NEIGHBOUR SERIES.

Danish Life in Town and Country, and Austrian Life in Town and Country. 3s. 6d. net. each.

THE LIBRARY OF USEFUL STORIES.

The Story of Rapid Transit and The Story of the Atlantic Cable. 1s. each.

ILLUSTRATED SIXPENNY NOVELS.

Micah Clarke. By A. CONAN DOYLE.

Secrets of Monte Carlo. By WM. LE QUEUX.

In the Heart of the Storm. By MAXWELL GRAY.

HOW TO BUY SERIES.

How to Buy a Gun. By H. A. BRYDEN and BASIL TOZER. 1s. 6d. net.

A PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED VOLUME ON

Lawn Tennis at Home and Abroad. Edited by A. WALLIS MYERS, with Chapters on the Old School and the New, by H. S. MAHONY. Memories of Men and Meetings, by H. S. SCRIVENOR. Courts and Conditions, by G. W. HILL-YARD. Lawn Tennis for Ladies, by Mrs. STERRY. Players of the Present, by A. WALLIS MYERS. American Methods, by DWIGHT F. DAVIS. The Game in Northern Europe, by J. W. FLAVELLE. Lawn Tennis in Switzerland and France, by R. B. HOUGH. Lawn Tennis in Australia, by L. O. S. POIDEVIN, and Lawn Tennis in India, by F. S. PEARSON. 10s. 6d. net.

PLAYERS OF THE DAY.

Consisting of 48 Heliochrome Portraits of Theatrical Celebrities. 10s. 6d.

New York Sketches. By JESSE LYNCH WILLIAMS. Illustrated by Henry McCarter, Jules Guérin, Everitt Shinner, W. R. Leigh, and others. 7s. 6d. net.

The Tickencote Treasure: a Novel. By WM. LE QUEUX. 6s.

Stories from the Old, Old Bible. By Mrs. L. T. MEADE. 7s. 6d. net.

The Meaning of Pictures. By Prof. JOHN G. VAN DYKE. 5s. net.

The Handy Shilling Atlas. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW.

The International Geography. New edition, third revised and enlarged, edited by H. R. MILL. 15s.

New Illustrated Catalogue free on application.

SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS' NEW BOOKS.

EMERSON'S COMPLETE WORKS, IN PROSE AND VERSE. The "SOVEREIGN EMERSON" (Copyright), printed by Messrs. W. CLOWES AND SONS on INDIA PAPER, 4,078 pp., in clear bold type, with an invaluable Collective Index and Index of Quotations (81 closely-printed pages) by PROFESSORS J. A. WOODS and J. E. CAROT. Crown 8vo, cloth extra, gilt tops, £1 net; or olive lambskin gilt, with silk register, £1 5s. net.

EARLY REVIEWS:—"A singularly beautiful edition. The only edition of Emerson now in the market to which one may give unstinted praise."—The Sphere. "This edition of all the prose and poetry of Emerson will fill a yawning gap on the shelves of many a lover of good books."—Morning Post. "A serviceable and complete reprint . . . the first important venture of the new management of the old publishing firm of George Routledge & Sons. A very creditable production."—Westminster Gazette. "The handsome complete edition of Emerson."—The Academy.

TENNYSON'S POETICAL WORKS, excluding the Dramas and Later Poems. 614 pp. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, gilt top, with Decorative Title-page, 3s. 6d. [Popular Poets. Also in large crown 8vo, with a Cover Design by Miss JESSIE M. KING, 3s. 6d., forming a volume of Routledge's well-known Prize Series.

THE BRIDGE BOOK: Practical Talks about Bridge. By ARCHIBALD DUNN. 240 pp., with figures in red-and-black. Pott 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"It is clear and unpedantic, and will help the beginner over a number of stiles, and those who are habitual players will find new light in many of its pages. The chapter on the Declaration of Trump is particularly worth notice."—Fall Mail Gazette.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

BRIDGE AND HOW TO PLAY IT. Cloth, 1s. 6d.; boards, 1s.

CARD AND TABLE GAMES. By PROF. HOFFMANN. 3rd edition (1903). 606 pp., with a Chapter on BRIDGE, and many illustrations, printed in red-and-black. 8vo, cloth extra, 7s. 6d.

G. P. R. JAMES'S NOVELS.

TWENTY-FIVE HISTORICAL NOVELS by G. P. R. JAMES. Reprinted from stereotype plates. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. a vol.; or 50s. net the Set. Each with an Introduction by LAURIE MAGNUS, M.A., and a Title-page designed by IVOR SYMES. Prospectuses may be had free. [Ready.

Agincourt
Arabella Stuart
Arrah Neil Attila
Castle of Ehrenstein
Darnley
De L'Orme
Forest Days
Gowrie
Heidelberg
Henry Masterton
Henry of Guise

Huguenot
John Marston Hall
King's Highway
Leonora D'Orco
Man-at-Arms
Mary of Burgundy
Old Dominion
One in a Thousand
Philip Augustus
Richelieu
Robber
Rose D'Albret
Woodman

THE HEROES. By CHARLES KINGSLEY. With charming Plates by JESSIE M. KING. Cloth gilt, extra. Forming a new vol. of the PLAYMATE SERIES. 1s. 6d.

NEW VOL. OF THE OLIVE SERIES.

Olive cloth, 1s.; lambskin, 2s. net.

THE DAGONET AND OTHER POEMS (Dagonet Ballads, Ballads of Babylon, The Lifeboat, &c.). By G. R. SIMS. 384 pp., 32mo.

TWO NEW NOVELS by NAT GOULD, at 6d.

- (1) NOT SO BAD AFTER ALL.
- (2) THE DARK HORSE.

TWO NEW BOOKS OF HUMOUR, 6d.

- (1) A CHANGE OF CLOTHES: or, The Sorrows of Balaam Noseworthy. By F. LANGRISH. A Novelette, full of rollicking Irish Humour. 6d.
- (2) THE CLERICAL CRACKSMAN: A Tale of the Burgling Season. By A. FITZMAURICE KING. With 13 Plates. 6d.

LONDON:

GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, Ltd.

From GREENING & Co.'s List.

BUTLER'S HUDIBRAS. With an Introductory Note by T. W. H. CROSLAND. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. net.

The BALLAD of the SOUL'S DESIRE. A Poem by VERNON NOTT. Crown 8vo, cloth 2s. 6d. net.

DRAMATIC CRITICISM. Vol. IV. By J. T. GREIN. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

GEORGE MEREDITH. By WALTER JERROLD. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

PINERO. By HAMILTON FYFE. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NOVELS.

THE STEEPLE. By REGINALD TURNER. 6s.

HIS GRACE'S GRACE. By C. RANGER GULL. 6s.

THE DANGER of INNOCENCE. By COSMO HAMILTON. 6s.

THE ICE MAIDEN. By "LADY FRIVOL." 3s. 6d.

A HEROINE of REALITY. By PERCY V. DONOVAN. 6s.

OUT of the PAST. By H. G. F. SPURRELL. 6s.

THE OVEN. By GUY THORNE. 3s. 6d.

COMPROMISED. By GERTRUDE WARDEN. 6s.

MR. INCOUL'S MISADVENTURE. By EDGAR SALTUS. 3s. 6d.

THE DAY of PROSPERITY. By PAUL DEVINNE. 6s.

New Sixpenny Editions.

DRINK (L'Assommoir). By ZOLA. 6s.

DAUGHTERS of PLEASURE. By The COUNTESS DE BREMONT. 6s.

A CRY in the NIGHT. By ARNOLD GORSWORTHY. 6s.

SEVEN NIGHTS with SATAN. By J. L. OWEN. 6s.

GREENING & CO., LTD., Cecil Court, St. Martin's Lane.

CHAFFERS' HALL MARKS ON GOLD AND SILVER.

The Editor (C. A. MARKHAM, Esq.) has in active preparation a NEW, ILLUSTRATED, and ENLARGED NINTH EDITION. Correspondence, Suggestions, and Additions welcomed from those interested in the subject.—Address REEVES & TURNER, Publishers, 83, Charing Cross Road, London.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY (LIMITED).

SUBSCRIPTIONS for 3 months, 6 months, and 12 months

CAN BE ENTERED AT ANY DATE.

THE BEST and MOST POPULAR BOOKS of the SEASON ARE NOW in CIRCULATION.

Prospectuses of terms free on application.

BOOK SALE DEPARTMENT.

Many Thousand Surplus Copies of Books always ON SALE (Second Hand). Also a large Selection of

BOOKS IN LEATHER BINDINGS

SUITABLE FOR

BIRTHDAY AND WEDDING PRESENTS.

30 to 34, NEW OXFORD STREET:

21, Brompton Road, S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., LONDON;

And at 10-12, Barton Arcade, MANCHESTER.

Messrs. LONGMANS & Co.'s LIST.

LEADERS of PUBLIC OPINION in IRELAND.

FLOOD—GRATTAN—O'CONNELL.

BY

WILLIAM EDWARD HARTPOLE LECKY.

NEW EDITION, 2 vols. 8vo, 25s. net.

* This New Edition is greatly enlarged and rewritten, and contains a new Introduction.

CABINET EDITION OF S. R. GARDINER'S "COMMONWEALTH and PROTECTORATE"

HISTORY of the COMMONWEALTH and PROTECTORATE, 1649-1656. By SAMUEL RAWSON GARDINER, Hon. D.C.L. Oxford; Litt.D. Cambridge; LL.D. Edinburgh; Ph.D. Göttingen, &c. New and Cheaper Edition. With Maps. In 4 vols. crown 8vo, 5s. net each. [Vols. I. and II. now ready.

PRINCE CHARLES

EDWARD STUART, the Young Chevalier. By ANDREW LANG. New Edition. With Photogravure Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

* The Text of this Work has been revised by the Author, but otherwise is the same in a cheaper form as that which was published by Messrs. Gould with illustrations in their Illustrated Series of Historical Volumes.

THE BERNARDS of

ABINGTON and NETHER WINCHENDON: a Family History. By Mrs. NAPIER HIGGINS. 2 vols. 8vo, 21s. net.

* This family was settled at Abington (Northamptonshire) for two or three centuries.

The greater portion of these two volumes is devoted to an account of Sir Francis Bernard's government of Massachusetts, and of the series of events which led to the American War of Independence.

UNIVERSITY and OTHER

SERMONS. By MANDELL ORKINGTON, D.D., D.C.L., LL.D., &c., sometime Bishop of London. Edited by LOUISE CREIGHTON. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

RELIGION for ALL MAN-

KIND: based on Facts which are never in Dispute. By the Rev. CHARLES VOYSEY, B.A., formerly Vicar of Healding, Yorkshire, Minister of the Theistic Church. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

SHEFFIELD DAILY INDEPENDENT.—"Mr. Voysey has long been known as one of the most thoughtful defenders of religion against the attacks of Atheist and Agnostic, and in this volume he appears at his best. . . . No one has put the argument for a Divine and conscious governance of the world more convincingly than he."

CECILIA GONZAGA: a

Drama. By R. C. TREVELYAN. Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

HITHER and THITHER:

Songs and Verses. By the Author of "Times and Days," &c. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. net.

NEW ROMANCE BY MR. RIDER HAGGARD.

PEARL-MAIDEN: a Tale of the Fall of Jerusalem. By H. RIDER HAGGARD. With 16 Illustrations by Byam Shaw. Crown 8vo, 6s.

DAILY EXPRESS.—"Full of fresh and stirring incident, and will firmly hold its readers' interest. . . . The attractiveness of this ancient story for modern readers lies in the vividness and variety of its success."

SCOTSMAN.—"Altogether, the story is a most entertaining one, and convincing testimony, if such were needed, that the hand of the author has not lost its cunning. Mr. Byam Shaw supplies some capital illustrations."

VANITY FAIR.—"Mr. Byam Shaw's illustrations are a striking embellishment to the book."

LONGMANS, GREEN & Co.,
London, New York, and Bombay.

THE TIMES LIST OF PUBLICATIONS.

The Times.

LITERARY SUPPLEMENTS to The Times appear Weekly on Fridays.

			Per Quarter.
Post Free U.K.	...	3d. per day	...
Abroad	...	4d. per day	...
			£1 0 0
			£1 6 3

The Mail.

A Reproduction of the substance of The Times, with the Latest Intelligence.

EVERY MONDAY, WEDNESDAY, and FRIDAY. 2d.

			Per Quarter.
Post Free U.K.
Abroad
			8s. 2d.
			9s. 9d.

The Times WEEKLY EDITION

Gives a complete epitome of the week's news, carefully condensed from the telegrams and other reports in THE TIMES, and designed especially for readers in the Colonies, India, the United States, and foreign countries; and for those in the United Kingdom who do not take time to read a daily paper. Also a Serial Story.

EVERY FRIDAY, 2d.

			Per Quarter.
Post Free U.K.
Abroad
			2s. 9d.
			3s. 3d.

The Times Law Reports.

A Weekly Reproduction, in convenient form, of all cases appearing in The Times of permanent interest to the Legal Profession, Bankers, Merchants, and the Public generally.

WEEKLY DURING TERM, 9d. 25s. Yearly.

XI. YEARS' DIGEST OF THE TIMES LAW REPORTS, 1884 to 1895. Specially compiled and edited, with Index of Cases. 50s.

V. YEARS' DIGEST OF THE TIMES LAW REPORTS. From October 1895 to August 1900. In continuation of the XI. YEARS' DIGEST. Price 25s.

Commercial Cases Reports.

Reported by J. E. ALDOUS, Barrister-at-Law. Six Numbers yearly, 2s. 6d. each; 15s. per year.

Issues A Reprint of Prospectuses of Public Companies advertised in The Times.
Half-yearly, 10s. 6d. per vol. net.

The Times Gazetteer.

1,787 pp.; Cloth, 17s. 6d.; Half-Morocco, 21s.

The Times History of the War in South Africa.

Edited by Mr. L. S. AMERY, Fellow of All Souls, Oxford.
Six Volumes, £5 5s. net, or 21s. per volume net.

Two Volumes already published; the third will be published in the course of the year.

The Problem of the Army.

The series of 11 articles under this heading which appeared in The Times on various dates during January and February, and to which so many references have been made in the course of the recent debates in Parliament on the Army, has now been reprinted, and is published in pamphlet form, price 6d.

Municipal Socialism.

The Articles in The Times under this heading have been reprinted in pamphlet form, and may be had of any news-agent, or the Publisher, The Times, Printing House Square, at 6d. per copy, or per post 7d., or 10s. for 25. Larger numbers at reduced prices.

The Times Atlas.

132 pp. with 196 Maps and Alphabetical Index to 150,000 names; Cloth, 27s. 6d.; Half-Morocco, 35s. net.

Encyclopædia Britannica.

The Ninth Edition, with Supplement forming the Tenth Edition, 35 Volumes.

Cloth, £28; Half-Morocco, £34; Three Quarter Levant, £37; Full Morocco, £48.

The Century Dictionary.

Eight Volumes.

Half-Morocco, £14; Three Quarter Levant, £16; Full Morocco, £21.

The First Fifty Years of Punch.

Twenty-five quadruple volumes, containing 100 of the half-yearly volumes.

Cloth Binding, £17; Half-Morocco, £22; Full Morocco, £29.

The Life of Queen Victoria.

Reprinted from The Times on best hand-made paper, bound in red morocco, adapted from an old Stuart binding in the British Museum.

Price TWO GUINEAS net.

Only 1,000 numbered copies published.

Biographies of Eminent Persons.

Reprinted from The Times of 1870 to 1894.
Six Volumes, ONE GUINEA.

Address to: "THE PUBLISHER," The Times Office, Printing House Square, London, E.C.

Mr. Fisher Unwin's List.

AUGUSTUS. Life and Times of the Founder of the Roman Empire (B.C. 63-A.D. 14). By E. S. SHUCKBURGH, Litt.D. With 47 Illustrations and Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s.

SHAKESPEARE'S CHURCH. By J. HARVEY BLOOM, M.A. Beautifully illustrated with many Photographs by L. C. KEIGHTLEY-PEACH. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

STORY OF THE NATIONS. NEW VOL. MEDIEVAL INDIA UNDER MOHAMMEDAN RULE (A.D. 712-1764). By STANLEY LANE-POOLE. With 59 Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

A SHORT HISTORY OF THE ANCIENT GREEK SCULPTORS. By H. EDITH LEGGIE. With a Preface by Prof. PERCY GARDNER, and illustrated by about 40 Plates. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

THE LIFE OF RICHARD COBDEN. By the Right Hon. JOHN MORLEY, M.P. With Photogravure Portrait. In two volumes, Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each. (8th Edition.)

A WOMAN'S WANDERINGS DURING THE ANGLO-BOER WAR. By Mrs. General DE LA REY. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

"PLEASE M'M THE BUTCHER!" A Complete Guide to Catering for the Housewife of Moderate Means, with Menus of all Meals for a Year. Numerous Recipes, and 52 additional Menus of Dinners without Meat. By BEATRICE GUARRACINO. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

THE SECOND VOLUME OF THE MODERN CHRONICLES OF FROISSART.

FROISSART IN 1902. Told and Pictured by F. C. GOULD. With special Cover Design and Decorated Title. Foolscap 4to, 3s. 6d.

TRUE TALES OF MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE FOR NON-CLIMBERS, YOUNG AND OLD. By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND (Mrs. Maine). With numerous Illustrations and Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

LITTLE ENTERTAINMENTS. By BARRY PAIN, Author of "De Omnibus." Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s.; paper, 1s.

HOW TO BECOME A PRIVATE SECRETARY. By ARTHUR SHEPARD. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 1s. Uniform with "Stops; and How to Punctuate."

GLANCES: HISTORICAL AND POLITICAL. IS LIBERTY ASLEEP? By ALLEN H. BRIGHT. Crown 8vo, paper covers, 1s.

THE STANDARD HISTORY. THE STORY OF THE NATIONS. Subscription Edition. 56 vols. A Comprehensive and Graphic Account of the World's History from the Earliest Times to the Close of the 19th century. NOW OFFERED AT LITTLE MORE THAN HALF-PRICE.

For a first payment of 8s. only, and 16 subsequent monthly payments of 10s. each, the whole library, 56 vols., delivered to the subscriber. Cash price, £4 cloth; £15 half-morocco. Subscription price, £8 8s. cloth; £15 15s. half-morocco.

A beautifully-illustrated Prospectus, containing full particulars of this remarkable offer and specimen pages, will be sent free on receipt of post card.

SIXPENNY EDITION. THE STICKIT MINISTER. By S. H. CROCKETT.

T. FISHER UNWIN,
Paternoster Square, London.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

CHARLOTTE MARY YONGE: Her Life and Letters. By CHRISTABEL COLERIDGE. With Nine Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations, 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

FOREIGN STATESMEN SERIES.—New Vol.

MAZARIN. By ARTHUR HASSALL, M.A., Student, Tutor, and sometime Censor of Christ Church, Oxford. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

FIVE OF THE LATEST UTTERANCES OF FREDERICK TEMPLE, Archbishop of Canterbury. Crown 8vo, 1s. net.

ANCIENT ATHENS. By ERNEST ARTHUR GARDNER. With Illustrations, Maps, and Plans, 8vo, 21s. net.

Westminster Gazette.—"Eminently readable, not too solid, and quite sound. . . . We know of no better work for those who desire a more consecutive and scholarly account than the ordinary guide-book can furnish."

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

GUIDE TO ITALY. With 51 Maps and Plans based upon the latest information and prepared expressly for this Guide. Globe 8vo, 10s. net.

EDITED BY GERTRUDE ATHERTON.

A FEW OF HAMILTON'S LETTERS, including His DESCRIPTION OF THE GREAT WEST INDIAN HURRICANE OF 1772. Edited by GERTRUDE ATHERTON, Author of "The Conqueror," "The Splendid Ill Forties," &c., &c. With Portraits. Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. net.

A WOMAN'S HARDY GARDEN. By HELENA RUTHERFORD ELY. With Illustrations, Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

WHAT IS MEANING? Studies in the Development of Significance. By V. WELBY. Crown 8vo, 6s.
Observer.—"A notable book on a great subject and one that is sure to claim the attention of serious readers."

THE SOUL: A Study and an Argument. By DAVID SYME, Author of "Outlines of an Industrial Science." Crown 8vo, 4s. 6d. net.

HAPPINESS: Essays on the Meaning of Life. By CARL HILTY, Professor of Constitutional Law, University of Bern. Translated by FRANCIS GREENWOOD PEABODY, Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University, Cambridge. Crown 8vo, 4s. net.

THE INDEBTEDNESS OF CHAUCER'S "TROILUS AND CRISEYDE" TO GUIDO DELLE COLONNE'S "HISTORIA TROJANA." By GEORGE L. HAMILTON, A.M., sometime Fellow in Columbia University, Professor of Romance Languages in Trinity College, North Carolina. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

CLARE COLLEGE LETTERS AND DOCUMENTS. Edited, with Notes, by J. R. WARDALE, M.A., Fellow of Clare College. With Portrait of the Foundress in Photogravure, 6 other Portraits, and Facsimiles of Signatures. Crown 8vo, 5s. net.

CARMINA EPHEMERA: or, Trivial Numbers. By E. E. KELLETT, Author of "Jetsam," "The Passing of Scyld," &c. Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN'S ILLUSTRATED POCKET CLASSICS.—NEW VOL.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net. Or in leather limp, 3s. net.

COACHING DAYS AND COACHING WAYS. By W. OUTRAM TRISTRAM. With Illustrations by HUGH THOMSON and HERBERT RAILTON.

POPULAR UNIFORM EDITION OF

THOMAS HARDY'S WORKS. In Fortnightly Volumes. With a Map of Wessex in each. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

LATEST ADDITIONS:

THE TRUMPET-MAJOR.

JUDE THE OBSCURE.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1611. Established 1869. London: 21 March 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK	267
REVIEWS.
Wordsworth	271
The Tale of a Tour in Macedonia	272
The Flower of Old Japan	273
Charlotte Brontë—George Eliot—Jane Austen: Studies in their Works	274
Shakespeare's Garden	274
What is Meaning? Studies in the Development of Significance	275
SHORT NOTICES:
The Diverted Village—A Third Pot Pourri—In the Tail of the Peacock—Facts and Phantasies of a Folio Grub	276
FICTION:
The Banner of Blue—The Fetish of the Family—Wyemarle's Mother	277
Notes on the Week's Novels	278

ARTICLES.
THE PRAISE OF FAMOUS MEN	279
Emerson	280
Mr. Swinburne as Critic	281
Impressions—XXIV. "It is Well"	282
DRAMA:
A Romance and a Comedy. H. K. Chambers	282
ART:
Spring Novelties. C. L. H.	283
SCIENCE:
Healing by Ether-Waves. O. W. Saleeby	284
CORRESPONDENCE:
Shakespeare's Birthplace	286
"Later Lyrics"	286
"Mediæval French Literature"	286
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
Description of "My Luncheon Hour"	288
SPRING ANNOUNCEMENT SUPPLEMENT	289-304

The Literary Week.

IN this issue is included a Supplement containing twenty-three columns giving the titles of new books and new editions that are being published during the present season. The harvest of the past week includes seventeen novels. Among other books published during the past seven days we note the following:—

THE POETICAL WORKS OF THOMAS TRAHERNE, B.D. Edited by Bertram Dobell.

Now first published from the original manuscripts. "The author of the poems contained in the present volume" says Mr. Dobell, "belongs to that small group of religious poets which includes Herbert, Vaughan, and Crashaw, though he is much more nearly allied to the authors of 'The Temple' and 'Silex Scintillans' than to the lyrical of Roman Catholicism." The story of the discovery of Traherne's manuscripts is curious. In 1888 they were sold by the family in whose hands they had probably been for some generations, and in 1896 or 1897 some of them had descended to the street bookstall. Two were discovered and bought for a few pence by Mr. W. T. Brooke, who showed them to Dr. Grosart. Dr. Grosart took them to be Henry Vaughan's work, and at the time of his death he had in hand an edition of Vaughan in which Traherne's work was to be included. Finally the manuscripts came into Mr. Dobell's possession, to which good fortune we are indebted for the present volume.

POLAND: A STUDY OF THE LAND, PEOPLE AND LITERATURE. By George Brandes.

The first part of the volume, called "Observations and Appreciations," is divided into four "Impressions," dated 1885, 1886, 1894, and 1899; the second part deals with the "Romantic Literature of Poland in the Nineteenth Century." Dr. Brandes does not, in the ordinary traveller's way, devote much space to the itineraries of travel; he discusses social, national, and economic questions on a basis of historical and first-hand evidence. In the concluding chapter we read: "Again and again we return to the thought: How symbolic this Poland is! For in this period, what other lot than that of the Pole has every one had, who has loved freedom and wished it well? What else has he experienced but defeat? When has he seen a gleam of sunshine? When has he heard a signal of advance?"

CORRESPONDENCE OF LADY BURGHERSH WITH THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON. Edited by her Daughter Lady Rose Weigall.

A correspondence extending over five and forty years. Lady Rose Weigall says in her preface: "The reason for the publication of this correspondence is that some of the few survivors of those who lived in intimacy with the Duke of Wellington during the latter years of his life have felt that some recent publications . . . have unintentionally done injustice to his character as a man, representing him as hard, stern and unsympathetic—one to be greatly admired and feared, but not loved." The letters here printed are simple, direct, and sincere. The last letter concludes, "I will be at Dover at the moment when you should reach that place," and it is endorsed by Lady Burghersh, "He died on the morning of September 14, the Tuesday on which he proposed to meet me."

FRANCE certainly has the art of honouring adequately at the last moment her intellectual workers. The obsequies of Gaston Paris were a most impressive and fine spectacle. There was less a suggestion of mourning about them than an immense national act of homage. To rest while all that is most distinguished in Paris defiles before one's remains, is a reward that honourably justifies ambition. The cortège, composed of all the learned bodies of France, and foreign delegates, wended slowly from the church to the Collège de France, which was magnificently decorated in trappings of woe. The immense gate was draped within and without, the centre lamp, lighted, was covered with crape, the chapel, all black and silver, was lit with many tapers, and as the coffin entered military honours were rendered, and the band played Chopin's Funeral March.

THE "Burlington Magazine," the first number of which lies before us, touches the high-water mark of art journal production in this country. We have been getting used to sumptuousity in this regard, and now it has, in the "Burlington," reached a point beyond which wisdom will hardly go. The appeal of the magazine is to connoisseurs, and to collectors who are real collectors, that is to say, to those who buy to enjoy and not to wait for rises in market values. The opening editorial article takes rather too high a tone; there was no need, in touching on the value of the study of old art, to depreciate the new in quite such strong terms. "There are artists," the writer admits, "who have not bowed the knee to the Baal of false sentiment and fatuous cheerfulness," for which admission we may be thankful when we read a little further on that "scarcely any one notes that modern painting, whatever merits it may possess, is not oil painting at all, but a margarine substitute." However, the enthusiasm born of a first number and a new venture may be forgiven certain lapses if it really produces something good, and the "Burlington" is unquestionably good. The ambition of the magazine is expressed thus:—

Finally . . . we may hope—or at least endeavour—to remove a curious and shameful anomaly, this namely, that Britain, alone of all cultured European countries, is without any periodical which makes the serious and disinterested study of ancient art its chief occupation. The anomaly is the more surprising in that the great English aristocratic collectors of the last two centuries showed an independence of judgment, a subtlety of taste such, that even now, in spite of recent depredations, England remains a place of pilgrimage for lovers of the finest creations of past times.

Amongst the contributors to this issue are Mr. Bernard Berenson, Mr. Herbert P. Horne, and Mr. James Weale. The illustrations are numerous, and the page and type clear and well arranged.

THE "Connoisseur" is an art journal of a less exclusive description than the "Burlington"; its aims, indeed, are frankly in the direction of popularity. The second of the portfolios issued by this periodical contains a summary of the life and work of Velasquez, together with reproductions of ten of the Master's pictures, of which three are in colour. These reproductions, in so handy a form, are really something to be thankful for. Each picture is lightly attached to a grey mount; in one or two instances the grey hardly supplies a suitable background. A little care in the selection of proper backgrounds would add to the value of such publications.

THE latest volume in Mr. Heinemann's "Century of French Romance" is Daudet's "The Nabob." Concerning it Prof. Trent says in his introduction: "It is probably the most broadly effective of all Daudet's novels; it is fuller of striking scenes; and as a picture of life in the picturesque Second Empire it is of unique importance." The book was written with infinite labour; its composition occupied eight months, and sometimes Daudet worked on it for eighteen consecutive hours, "often waking from restless sleep with a sentence on his lips." Of the author of "Sapho"—which, by the way, Prof. Trent seems rather to underrate—he says: "Alphonse Daudet is one of those rare writers who combine greatness with a charm so intimate and appealing that some of us would not, if we could, have their greatness increased."

THE Library of Trinity College, Cambridge, now possesses a complete set, amounting to sixty-seven volumes, of the books printed by William Morris at the Kelmscott Press.

Each volume has an inscription to Mr. Philip Webb in Morris's autograph, and the college is indebted to Mr. Webb for this fine gift. Whatever we may think about the unsuitability of means to ends in certain of the Kelmscott productions, it cannot be doubted that in the main their influence was true to the cause of beauty and reverence.

In America there seems to be a revival of interest in the novels of Anthony Trollope, a revival which the Chicago "Dial" discusses with point. In England Trollope has never quite fallen out, though few modern readers know much more than his name. He wrote far too much, and in a way helped to kill his own reputation; success to him implied the illusive necessity of enormous production, so that he piled book upon book and overwhelmed the good with the indifferent; he was never wholly bad. Says the writer in the "Dial":—

The quality which has invariably been recognised, by even the least favourable of his critics, and which makes him quite unapproachable on his own ground, is his absolute naturalness. In all his books there is no single touch of exaggeration. Not one of his characters talks in a fashion too fine or too melodramatic for real life; not the divine Jane herself was freer from any taint of the "big bow-wow style." To quote Hawthorne's formerly familiar praise, his books are "as real as if some giant had hewn a great lump out of the earth and put it under a glass case, with all its inhabitants going about their business, and not suspecting that they were being watched."

Nowadays perhaps that very naturalness tells against Trollope, and his delicate simplicity is taken for weakness when, in fact, it is quite genuine art. The "Dial's" contributor concludes:—

After the various dilutions of Scott and Dumas have quite lived out their hour, the field will again belong to the novel in its less boisterous aspects. Said George Moore, in one of his characteristic criticisms, "Henry James went abroad and read Turgenieff; Mr. Howells staid at home and read Henry James." The practice seems to have been productive of sufficiently good results, and is worth recommending. The novelists of to-morrow have much to gain by reading Anthony Trollope.

We trust that the novelists of to-morrow will read Trollope; perhaps it would be too much to expect the novelists of to-day to find sufficient time for so healthy an exercise.

THE next portion of the Oxford English Dictionary to be published will be a double section, containing the words from "Onomastical" to "Outing," 3,885 in all, with 13,253 illustrative quotations. Dr. Murray points out that out-verbs as a class were apparently eschewed by Shakespeare's contemporary, Bacon, and he says: "It is noteworthy that while Shakespeare uses 54 of these verbs, for 38 of which he is our first, and for nine of them our only authority, we cite Bacon only for two, one of which, indeed, outshoot, had, in those days of archery, been in common use for more than seventy years. The contrast between the language of Bacon and that of Shakespeare in this respect is the more striking, seeing that other contemporary authors, e.g., Ben Jonson, used these out-verbs almost as freely as Shakespeare himself, without however yielding anything like the same number of first instances." The number of words in the Dictionary, including the forthcoming double section, totals up to 165,654.

THE troubles of ordinary dictionary-making are considerable enough, but a dialect dictionary presents, in certain directions, even greater difficulties. The "Periodical" gives some interesting particulars concerning Prof. Wright's great "English Dialect Dictionary," a work, as we stated some time ago, undertaken at Prof. Wright's personal expense. For the purpose of the dictionary some six thousand books have been consulted, and as many queries are sent out yearly by the professor and his staff. Upwards of four hundred glossaries in MS. have also been consulted in addition to the printed works. The staff consists entirely of women, all of whom, with one exception, have attained first-class honours in the School of English Language and Literature.

DR. GARNETT a few days ago delivered, at the annual meeting of the Home Reading Union, an address on the subject of reading and free libraries, and the possibilities of a more active co-operation between such institutions as the Union and the Libraries. Dr. Garnett said:—

We have in the free library a most powerful instrument of culture, entirely in harmony with the views and aims of the National Home-Reading Union, but one whose actual employment for true culture depends upon the feeling of a highly democratic constituency. We have much reason to fear that the ends of true culture are as yet but imperfectly subserved by this powerful instrument, resting this opinion chiefly upon the undue amount of merely amusing literature in circulation, judging by the very high percentage of novels to the total issues. We know that this is extremely natural, and no subject of reproach to the institutions, which must to a considerable degree take their colour from their public.

But, on the other hand, we feel that, if the librarian's constituency is as yet too little cultured to appreciate the best literature, this is no reason why it should always remain so, and we feel sure that the higher the class of literature in common use at the free library the more nearly the library corresponds to the intention of those who set it on foot.

That is a clear statement of the case. How, then, is the undeveloped but "powerful instrument" of public taste to be improved? By such an association as the Home Reading Union, Dr. Garnett thinks, acting upon public taste directly in co-operation with a guiding influence on the part of librarians. Certainly such co-operation should do a good deal. There are scores of people ready to take a librarian's advice if he be only willing to give it. Those who insist on reading rubbish must, we suppose, for the present be supplied with it. The free library is too democratic an institution to assume critical powers and exclude the foolish and the banal from its shelves.

SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS, with the assistance of the representatives and friends of the late General, is writing a biography of the late General Wauchope. He will gratefully receive any letters of General Wauchope's in the hands of correspondents. All letters will be carefully copied, and the originals returned. They may be addressed to Sir George Douglas, Bart., at 39, Thurloe Square, London, S.W.

ON Monday last there were sold at Messrs. Sotheby's a number of books and manuscripts from which we select the following items:—

CHARLOTTE AND ANNE BRONTË.

Anne Brontë (Acton Bell), The Tenant of Wildfell Hall, her own copy with autograph notes, £32.

Autograph MS. of Miscellaneous Poems by Charlotte Brontë, entirely in her handwriting, £25.

Another Autograph MS. of Charlotte Brontë, descriptive of an evening service at Ebenezer Chapel, £12 15s.

At the same time there were sold two holograph poems by Burns, which fetched £125, and a collection of the writings of Bunyan, containing 277 volumes, many of which were original editions. This collection was sold for £205. The Brontë and the Bunyan prices strike us as distinctly low. If the Bunyan collection had been divided into a dozen lots we imagine the total amount realised would have been well over £205.

MR. HAMLIN GARLAND has an article in the "North American Review" on "Sanity in Fiction." The great American representative of sanity in fiction to Mr. Garland is Mr. W. D. Howells. The writer sets out with the very proper idea that fiction should not deal exclusively with murder and sudden death. "The democrat of our day," he says, "is on the look out for sensations"; he desires to get away from the familiarity and boredom of his own existence by reading of "the far-off, the grandiose, something outside his own life, something to thrill, to excite." That desire of modern democracy both American and English novelists have more than satisfied, yet there are many books of quite another order which have achieved success. We begin to think that perhaps after all the fault lies quite as much with the sensational novelist as with the public; it is infinitely easier to write of murders and unusual phases of morbidity than to describe sympathetically what is part of everyday experience. When the novelists whom Mr. Garland deprecates touch simple things they usually flounder hopelessly. Mr. Howells has always, or nearly always, avoided any approach to crude melodrama, and accordingly Mr. Garland hails him as "the most American, the most sympathetic, the truest writer in American fiction." We may respect Mr. Garland's opinion without agreeing with it. With the last sentence of his article, however, we cannot at all agree: "We can safely challenge the world to produce his equal in sanity, sympathy and humorous insight." Such an assertion make us wonder what knowledge of fiction Mr. Garland really has.

MR. BERTRAM DOBELL's forthcoming "Sidelights on Charles Lamb" has a dedicatory sonnet to one of Charles and Mary Lamb's latest editors, which concludes thus:—

Unlovely traits that cannot daylight bear,
Too oft deep search in seeming goodness shows:
But thou mayst fearless seek, since only fair
Actions and thoughts thy delvings can disclose:
From every shadow of dishonour free,
Clear is their fame, and clear shall ever be.

A GOOD many minor inaccuracies in Thackeray have already been ferretted out by careful readers, and an additional one has been discovered by a correspondent of the "Saturday Review." Amongst the presents received by Amelia when she married George Osborne was a gold watch, presented by Captain Dobbin. Later Thackeray tells us that "Mrs. Osborne had no watch, though to do George justice, she might have had one for the asking." If novelists only knew that they were writing for an assiduous posterity they might avoid these blunders.

MR. JOHN BICKERDYKE has been telling readers of the "Author" how the phonograph may be used for literary purposes. You should, it appears, buy a £15 machine for yourself and a £5 one for your amanuensis—every literary man nowadays, of course, keeps at least one amanuensis. The cylinder of the phonograph will take 800 words, and it costs a shilling. It can be shaved twenty times, so that for your shilling you can record 16,000 words. We have not ourselves yet taken to the phonograph; the mere contemplation of the possibility shakes our nerves.

THE success of the "Hibbert Journal" has been remarkable, and shows that there is a large public ready to support a serious review of religion, theology, and philosophy. Three reprints of the first number were called for within two months of publication, and after the type had been broken up the publishers found it necessary to have it reset. Of the second number three impressions have already been sold.

SIR HENRY FOWLER, we note, has resigned his position as Chairman and a Director of Messrs. Cassell & Company. In moving the adoption of the report at the annual meeting, Sir Henry Fowler stated that the profit in 1900 amounted to £17,071, in 1901 to £25,361, and in 1902 to £26,764.

THE "Periodical" has received the following quaint request from an Indian reader: "Will you be good enough to us to increase my knowledge through 'The Period,' placing time to time upon my table it for ever in future for the sake of Savior."

Bibliographical.

MORE than once, of late, I have congratulated bibliographers upon the signs of a growing interest in their pursuit, as seen in the increase in the number of bibliographies which form part and parcel of contemporary memoirs. The name of "bibliography" is, however, sometimes taken in vain. There is one in the new Life of Miss Yonge and another in the new Life of Bret Harte, but neither is strictly what it calls itself. Miss Coleridge supplies a chronological list of Miss Yonge's successive publications, and very useful it will no doubt be to many, but a bibliography, in the right sense, it is not. (I note that Miss Coleridge does not omit to record one of Miss Yonge's rare efforts in literary criticism—her article on Lady Georgina Fullerton, Mrs. Stretton, and Miss Anne Manning in "Women Novelists of Queen Victoria's Reign," 1897.) Mr. Pemberton does for Bret Harte less than Miss Coleridge does for Miss Yonge. He supplies a list of his hero's writings, but only in groups of his own making, and only in some instances with the date of composition or publication. All this is better than nothing, no doubt, but it is not precisely "bibliography."

I see that Mr. J. A. R. Marriott, in his monograph on "Canning and his Times," gives the following reading of Canning's famous rhythmical despatch to Sir Charles Bagot, then English Ambassador at The Hague:—

Dear Bagot, in commerce the fault of the Dutch
Is giving too little and asking too much;
So since on this policy Mynheer is bent,
We'll clap on his vessels just 20 per cent.

It would be interesting if Mr. Marriott would kindly give his authority for so printing the familiar jeu d'esprit. The version hitherto accepted is that which Mr. Locker-Lampson included in his "Lyra Elegantiarum" (page 148, ed. 1891), and on which Mrs. Bagot set the seal of her approval in her recent volume of memoirs. "As I have seen it wrongly quoted on several occasions, I venture to append it," says Mrs. Bagot; and what she appends is identical (save for the misprint of a letter) with the lines as Locker-Lampson gives them. One is forced to the conclusion that Mr. Marriott's reading is inaccurate.

Miss Harriett Jay's appearance as the biographer of Robert Buchanan has drawn attention to her previous literary performances, and I have been asked to give a list of them. She seems to have begun her career as a storyteller in 1875 with "The Queen of Connaught," which was followed by "The Dark Colleen" in 1876, "Madge Dunraven" in 1879, "Two Men and a Maid" and "The Priest's Blessing" in 1881, "Through the Stage Door" and "My Connaught Cousins" in 1883, "A Marriage of Convenience" in 1885, and "The Strange Adventures of Miss Brown" in 1897. The last-named appears to have been founded on the comedy of that name in which Buchanan and Miss Jay collaborated, and which had a good deal of success for a time. Miss Jay, indeed, worked with her brother-in-law on more than one stage piece, and has had, moreover, a fair measure of experience as an actress. Her nom-de-guerre as a dramatist was "Charles Marlowe."

The inclusion of Crabbe's "Borough" in "The Temple Classics" is the latest testimony to the renewed vogue of "Nature's sternest painter"—a vogue which seems to date from 1886, when Messrs. Cassell reprinted some of his verse in their "National Library." Then in 1888 came Mr. T. E. Kebbel's biography of Crabbe in the "Great Writers" series and E. Lamplough's selection from his Poems. This led up to the selection by Henry Morley, published in 1891 and reprinted in 1898, to Mr. Bernard Holland's selection in 1899, and to Mr. Murray's reproduction of the Complete Works in 1901. Edward FitzGerald's enthusiastic references to Crabbe have also had much to do with the revival of the latter's popularity.

The literary interests of Edith Wharton are evidently by no means confined to fiction. She first became generally known by "A Gift from the Grave" (1900), but two years previously she had been concerned with another in the production of a book on "The Decoration of Houses." The "Gift from the Grave" was also preceded (in 1899) by "The Greater Inclination and Other Stories." Now she is to give us an English translation of "Es Lebe das Leben," the play by Sudermann in which we are all hoping to see Mrs. Patrick Campbell before long.

The announcements of additions to the "English Men of Letters" series come fast upon each others' heels. In the case both of Maria Edgeworth and of Dante Gabriel Rossetti, the new biographers will find themselves with plenty of material. It is scarcely a decade since the late Mr. Augustus Hare gave us, in two volumes, the "Life and Letters of Miss Edgeworth," which, again, had been preceded, also by nearly a decade, by the monograph on Miss Edgeworth contributed by Miss Helen Zimmern to the "Eminent Women" series. Much larger of course, is the D. G. Rossetti literature—from the memoir written for the "Great Writers" series (1887), down (through the three volumes of correspondence) to the letters and memoranda published of late by Mr. W. M. Rossetti, and the little monograph by Mr. F. M. Hueffer which came out last year.

The promised new edition of Hakluyt will be very acceptable. The famous Voyages have been rather neglected of late years. In 1881 Messrs. De la Rue published the "Voyages of English Seamen to America," and between 1886 and 1889 Messrs. Cassell issued three selections from the great work, under the titles of "Voyagers' Tales," "The Search for the North-West Passage," and "The Discovery of Muscovy." Otherwise, Hakluyt has slumbered.

The death of M. Ernest Légouvé reminds me that, just ten years ago, his "Sixty Years of Recollections" were translated and annotated by Mr. Albert D. Vandam, and published in two volumes by Messrs. Eden and Remington. The work is one of the most readable and interesting of its kind.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Professor and the Poet.

WORDSWORTH. By Walter Raleigh. (Arnold. 6s.)

So much has been written about Wordsworth, so much, too, which in no way tended to enlightenment, that the critic approaches a new study of his work and personality with some uneasiness. Perhaps in the case of Prof. Raleigh there was no cause for such uneasiness; certainly, when we close this volume, the uneasiness has given place to gratefulness and satisfaction. The author has clearly established his right to stand with the few who have really done something as interpreters and appreciators of Wordsworth. We can give Prof. Raleigh's work no higher praise than to say that it may be read side by side with Mr. F. W. H. Myers's beautiful monograph without too great a sense of weakness or disproportion. To some readers the fact that it lacks something of Mr. Myers's exquisite spiritual insight may be counted as gain, for Mr. Myers was so pre-occupied with matters of the spirit that perhaps his tendency was to force parallels and to interpret one of the most spiritual of poets in terms of his own belief. Prof. Raleigh appears to have no aim other than that of illustrating and illuminating his author by means of careful, sincere and profound study of his work. He refuses to separate Wordsworth, the supreme poet, from Wordsworth the uninspired and indifferent versifier; he declines to accept the attitude practically adopted by some critics that there were two Wordsworths, the "less loquacious of the two" being inspired, which leads to the assumption that "the poet is no longer a man speaking to men, but a reed through which a god fitfully blows." This position, with many poets, could hardly be defended, but with Wordsworth, who was essentially a single-minded and philosophical poet, it only needs postulating for the instant perception of its truth. It may be said, of course, with justice that when Wordsworth was least philosophical, when he was overwhelmed with a sense of beauty or caught up by a divine memory, he was greatest as a poet. But, after all, those supreme visitings were not too common; Wordsworth was a poet rather of passionate contemplation than of direct lyrical impulse: he glorified memory by experience, and touched the past, his own past, with the almost unimaginable glow of accumulated perceptions. And out of this method there came forth a sublimated truth founded actually upon experience and life itself—a narrow life and narrow experience it may be, but nevertheless capable of infinite adjustments to human needs because of its most profound sincerity.

Prof. Raleigh writes:—

Of Wordsworth . . . it is hardly true to say that his strength and his weakness are closely knit up together; rather they are the same; his strength at its best is weakness made perfect, his weakness is the wasteful ebullition of his strength. It may be just and necessary to pronounce some of his poems childish, and others dull or silly; it cannot be right to neglect them on that account, if we remember that the teachers whom he most revered, and from whom he learned the best part of his lore, were children, rustics, men of simple habits and slow wits.

In that statement the author, we think, goes too far, though he corrects it somewhat in his later chapter on "Poetic Diction." There is really no reason in the world why poems inspired by "children, rustics, men of simple habits and slow wits" should be either "childish, dull, or silly." Often these results were brought about by Wordsworth's persistent use of a vernacular which was not a vernacular at all; in aiming at a simplicity based upon an impracticable theory he often landed himself in the deeps of bathos. The fault, indeed, lay not with his teachers but with himself, and mainly in a lack of humour and the absence of a sense of the incongruous. And it has always appeared to us that Wordsworth's knowledge of individuals stopped short of real knowledge; we are always haunted by the feeling that his rustics are not studies from within; we see the philosopher by the roadside or on the mountain asking questions and giving us the answers which he received after passing them through the crucible of his own personality. Children, we are told, were rather afraid of him, and the instinct of the rustic and the child are often one. We do not conceive of Wordsworth as an actor in fire-side revels, an explorer of actual motive in others, a searcher after emotions in the very heat of action. He had no spirit of adventure. When, in the Fourth Book of the "Prelude," he meets with the soldier who "tells in few plain words a soldier's tale," he merely finds shelter for the man in a wayside cottage, and leaves him with the entreaty that he will not linger in the public highway, but ask for help when he needs it. There, we must consider, was an opportunity wasted; at once the poet's eye is turned in again upon himself. Wordsworth treatment of the Cumberland dalesmen, says Prof. Raleigh, "would have been suitable enough for royalty itself." That is to say that Wordsworth hardly approached them in the best spirit, and though we must respect him for his aloof tenderness and consideration, we feel assured that it was not intimate enough for the knowledge which touches to the life. We have said so much concerning this phase of Wordsworth's personality because both Prof. Raleigh and Mr. Myers lay great stress upon the poet's truthful delineation of country character. Mr. Myers went so far as to say: "We may almost venture . . . to assert that no writer since Skakespeare has left so true a picture of the British nation"—an assertion with which we cannot at all agree.

As a self-interpreter and as an interpreter of nature through the medium of a personality which had trained the inner vision to the utmost of sane capacity, if we may use the phrase, Wordsworth stands supreme. No other such honest poetical autobiography exists as the "Prelude"; it is the story of a development glorified indeed by memory, but never swerving from the plain road of truth. It was Wordsworth's way to treasure memories and experiences until some later flash of insight set them in their true relation or shed upon them the glory which was their proper consummation; he waited, in a kind of rapt humility, "for the light from heaven to fall." Prof. Raleigh well says:—

True vision, he held, is not to be attained by any sort of intellectual elaboration, but by a purging of the eye, an intense and rare simplicity of outlook. He was haunted by a sense that truth was there, directly before him, filling the whole compass of the universe—the greatest and most obvious and clearest of all things, if only the eye could learn to see it. But the tricky and ill-trained sense of man moves vacantly over its surface and finds nothing to arrest attention; sees nothing, indeed, until it is caught by the antics of some of its old accomplices. . . . For himself, he sought admittance to the mystery by two principal means. It is something to rid the mind of petty cares and to be still and attentive, but it is not enough. There are guides to the heights of contemplation; and there are fortunate moments of excitement that roll away the clouds against which the traveller has long been straining his baffled eyesight.

It was for "the illumination which comes from the transfiguring power of high-wrought emotions" that Wordsworth waited. He sometimes mistook the illumination; in a mind so self-centred the light evolved from within was now and then accepted as an authentic visitation from without. Yet sometimes the two lights seemed to meet and mingle in a beauty which was both of earth and spirit; so they mingled in "Lines written above Tintern Abbey" and in the "Intimations of Immortality from Recollections of Early Childhood." In those two poems we have Wordsworth at a best unapproached and it may well be unapproachable.

Prof. Raleigh's summary of Wordsworth's outlook and teaching in the chapters entitled "Nature" and "Humanity" is admirable in the main, though he relies perhaps too much upon the poet's ideal as opposed to his actual achievement. What we have is, after all, the only thing upon which to found criticism; the best possible intention will not save any form of art from criticism or rebuke, nor should it save it. The lump of silver may be brooded over by an imagination greater than that of Cellini, but if the imagination cannot express itself in exquisite form its effective result must remain amongst the minor or forgotten things. Many lovers of Wordsworth have carried their devotion into a kind of petulant anger against critics who have refused to accept intention for accomplishment. Prof. Raleigh is never petulant, but he occasionally is inclined to claim too much for mere intention. In the case of such a poet as Wordsworth this is rather to confuse issues; his accomplishment is so great and so supreme that we need no explanation of failures inevitably incident to every human endeavour. We are sometimes inclined to regret that Wordsworth was so lavish of commentary on his own work; he exhibited at times an annoying incapacity to let well alone.

Towards the end of his brief concluding chapter, Prof. Raleigh says:—

He failed, it must be admitted, in many of the things that he attempted; failed more signally and obviously than other great poets who have made a more prudent estimate of human powers and have chosen a task to match their strength. He pressed onward to a point where speech fails and drops into silence, where thought is baffled, and turns back upon its own footsteps. But it is a good discipline to follow that intense and fervid spirit, as far as may be, to the heights that denied him access.

There is no danger nowadays that Wordsworth will be given a lower place than he deserves, and it is true that those who know him best grow into an increasing love and reverence for him. Even in his most pedestrian moments, even when the very technicalities of his art seem to have slipped beyond his reach, we feel the breathings of an august spirit and the glimmerings of some not wholly forgotten "clouds of glory." No poet ever devoted himself more singly to his life-work than Wordsworth, and no poet ever had a fuller reward. He outlived his impulse, and his old age was practically songless; the ashes of his youth could not be fanned into more than the most fitful flame. But that youth was splendid and immortal.

Not so Black as They are Painted.

THE TALE OF A TOUR IN MACEDONIA. By G. F. Abbott. With illustrations. (Edward Arnold. 14s. net.)

IN 1900, under the auspices of Cambridge University, Mr. Abbott, in order to study the folk-lore of Macedonia, made a tour through that troublous land. A work embodying his scientific observations is about to be published by the University Press. Meanwhile here we have a casual, chatty, entertaining record of what he calls his adventures. These were never very perilous; but they were always amusing, and sometimes instructive. They began soon after he had crossed the frontier between Servia and the Turkish Empire. At the railway station of Zebevtche, all the possessions in the traveller's innocent packing cases would have been impounded had he been unwilling to bribe the Youmbrouk Mudir by a gift of Dante's "Divina Commedia." The precautions taken against dangerous intrusions into the Sultan's realms are stringent in the extreme. On the day when Mr. Abbott was well-nigh suffering confiscation of his gear, the scrutinizing officer thought there must be dynamite in the baggage of a man who turned out to be a commercial traveller from Austria;

the kodak of a middle-aged Swiss governess was regarded as manifestly an infernal machine; and a grammar of the German language was believed to be a lampoon on the Shadow. If one may judge from Mr. Abbott's sprightly chronicle, Mount Athos is the only region under the Sultan's sway where residents and pilgrims are immune from annoying and even tyrannical suspicion. Everywhere else, all save the Mahommedans are suspect and oppressed. It is taxation, mainly, that grinds them down. The system is ancient and drastic. On hearing that the taxildars are coming, the headman of a village calls a council of the elders; these draw up a list of the taxpayers, and assign to each his share in the total burden. This plan is not so objectionable as it may seem to people, like ourselves, who are accustomed to more elaborate methods of assessment. Far from being an Ottoman invention, it is a survival of the Roman curia, the board of landowners, imported into the Eastern Empire by Constantine the Great; and, as Mr. Abbott admits, it "gives scope to the exercise of some fine human qualities." If a villager is down in the world, his less unfortunate brother pays for him. The council thinks that George, who has two sons, both able-bodied, should assist the poor decrepit neighbour John, whose children are so young that they are only a burden to their parents. In this manner the sum which the village has to pay, an amount arrived at by a rough computation of the populace, is made up by neighbourly compromises; and the taxildars go upon their way.

The real difficulty springs from the fact that, however considerably the burden of taxation may be distributed, it is a burden too heavy to be borne with reasonable happiness. The cost of maintaining the Turkish Empire is great out of all humane proportion to the revenues of the people, and the Government resort to expedients which would not be tolerated in Western Europe. Taxes which it has formally abolished are still collected "by mistake." Besides the land-tax and the tithe, the peasant, even though he be a Christian, and therefore not allowed to enter the Army, is taxed for exemption from military service; he is taxed for education which is not given, for roads and bridges which are not built; in short, Mr. Abbott says, he pays a tax on everything he buys, on everything he sells, on everything he imports, on everything he exports, on everything he weighs, on everything he possesses, and on many things which he does not possess. His burdens are heavier than those of any other peasant in the world. Why? The immediate explanation seems to lie in the ways and customs of the official classes. The pay of a foot-gendarme is what in this country would be £1 7s. a month, and that of the mounted gendarme £2 5s. Out of these small wages the officers have to keep themselves and their families; but the pittances are almost always in arrear. Is it surprising that they are not superior to bakshish? The higher officers are in similar plight. Posts in the service of the Government are treated as objects of commercial speculation. The favourites at Yildiz Kiosk sell them to favourites of their own. They are naturally anxious to make their fortunes when they can; they will not always have a chance of securing even a competence for life. So it is with the subordinates: they must make hay while the sun shines if in their old age they are to have the means of life. This, Mr. Abbott says, "accounts for the cupidity, and also for the plethora, of officials in the country." It is well, however, that we should be discriminating in our judgment. Sad as are the conditions of life in certain provinces of Turkey, we have no cause whatever to denounce the Turks as a race. The official classes are corrupt; but that is only because they share the general lack of pence. They would be indifferent honest but for this compulsion. Even Mr. Abbott, whose prejudices, if he have any, are against the Mahommedans, is obliged to admit, here and there, that they have a natural nobility. What was his experience in Salonica, a town of Jews and Greeks and Turks?

In point of versatility the followers of Moses undoubtedly carry away the palm, leaving both the others far behind. The Jew is trilingual. He is equally at home in Spanish, Greek, and Turkish, and speaks each of these idioms indifferently badly. The Greek can express his ideas in two languages, Greek and Turkish. The Turk shares with the gods and the English the privilege of having only one tongue. The order of classification would have to be reversed if the three elements were subjected to an examination of a different kind. Measured by a moral, or rather manly, standard, the first would be last and the last first. The adage which associates physical purity with moral uprightness finds a curious illustration in Salonica. The Mahomedans, whatever may be thought of them as rulers, are generally acknowledged to be extremely honest in their private transactions—always excepting the Government officials, who have an immoral code of their own—scrupulously careful in the handling of truth. The Turk is too strong to do a mean thing, too unimaginative to invent the thing that is not. His vices, great as they are, are the vices of a race conscious of its might, and proud of it.

Indeed, the truth seems to be that the Turks have a reputation much worse than they deserve. It has not been sufficiently noticed that they "do not advertise." Periodically all the nations of Europe rail at them; but they never answer. Thus, as they seem by silence to assent to all the charges laid against them, perhaps they are not so black as they are painted. Most of the general understandings to their discredit are matters of hearsay. Only a very few strangers ever think of sojourning in the Balkan States, and it is noticeable that those of the few who publish their impressions give surprisingly little sanction to the popular anathemas against the Turks. The testimony of Sir Vincent Caillard, in a series of striking letters published by "The Realm," was almost wholly in their favour. Mr. Abbott's, though he may not deliberately intend it to do so, will leave a similar impression on unbiassed minds. We in the West forget, or do not learn, that the instincts and the conduct of the subject races are such as render the governance of them a task compared with which our own worst difficulties are trifles. A few excerpts from Mr. Abbott's pages will make this plain. In the villages inhabited by people of the subject races, fires are very frequent. Each village has eight or nine a week.

The flimsy material of which the houses are built . . . would be sufficient to account for the conflagrations, were it not for one little thing: the house or the shop in which the fire originates in ninety-nine cases out of hundred happens to be insured, and to belong either to a Jew or to a Christian. This circumstance, coupled with the fact that the property of Mohammedans—who do not approve of insurances, as implying a want of faith in Allah—seldom falls a prey to the flames, induces the thoughtful observer to shake his head. In fact, these "accidents" may be said to throw a lurid light upon Hebrew and local Christian morality; and so seem to think the London insurance companies, which since the great fire of 1891 have abolished their Salonica agencies.

Amid general approval of the nations, the Concert of Europe has within recent weeks coerced the Porte into adopting certain measures of reform in Macedonia; but by whom were the troubles necessitating those measures raised? Those who habitually read the Foreign Page of "The Times" have a shrewd idea; but tidings conveyed through that channel do not seem to reach the susceptible millions generally known as "the masses." Here is the grim truth as revealed in Mr. Abbott's narrative. It amply justifies the appeal for fair play to the Government of Turkey made by Lord Newton during a debate in the House of Peers last week:—

Servian activity in Macedonia has become more conspicuous since 1896, when, following on the murder of Stambuloff, the Bulgarians attempted to push their interests too energetically.

The Macedonian Committee then tried, as it has often done since, to call the attention of Europe to that province by inciting the Turkish authorities to atrocities.

It may be said that actions such as those of fire-raising and incitement to outrage are incidental to classes among the subject races, and that they are not to be taken as a standard of conduct by which to judge these peoples at large. Unfortunately, it is impossible to rest in that assumption. If the oppressed races had highly civilised aspirations, their moral tendencies would surely be adequately expressed by their Churches; but what do we find among the clergy?

Serres is the see of a Greek bishop. The prelate reigning at the time of my visit was spoken of as an individual of exceptional ability and great force of character. . . . The bishop in question, to his diplomatic ability, joined a cupidity only equalled by that of a Turkish Government official. The poor man had caught the maladie du pays—which is not home-sickness—in a very bad form. As a proof of the lengths to which he would go, heedless of public opinion, in order to secure a pecuniary advantage, was the following fact. A short time back the lease of a farm belonging to the diocese had fallen in, and bids had been made by various would-be tenants. After having been in the market for some months, to everybody's surprise the farm was let for a rent considerably lower than the offers already made. The surprise developed into a different kind of emotion when it was found that his holiness was a sleeping partner in the concern.

"His holiness" was not a black sheep in a flock which as a rule is white. In Mr. Abbott's book all the tales of duplicity, or of hypocrisy, or of intrigue, as well as the few tales of brutal inhumanity, stand against Christians, or Jews, or Greeks; and, for all that Mr. Abbott feels justified by his comprehensive wanderings in saying against them, the Turks seem to be the only gentlemen in the Balkan States. In mentioning this we are not taking a side. We are merely stating a sardonic fact.

A Dim Strange Tale.

THE FLOWER OF OLD JAPAN. By Alfred Noyes. (Grant Richards.)

It is very easy to criticise a volume of minor poetry which for the critic, personally, has no appeal. He points out with a rather blatant magnanimity the excellence of its technique, or, with the old weary phrases, obtrudes the hesitancy of its rhythm. Or again, if he plod honestly through the dulness of his calling, he will insist upon the existence of an original artistic purpose in the mind of the minor poet, and will explain just how and why that artistic purpose has not found expression. He will show that the illusion has not been arrived at, in short that the minor poet has been talking more or less uselessly, like himself, and not singing at all. Of course all this was admirably expressed in the "Ars Poetica" of Horace and with a more intense didacticism by Boileau. We are, however, still faithfully at it for the probable reason that there is nobody to stop us. The minor poets themselves, it is supposed, rather like it, and after all it does no human being particular injury. That is, crudely and frankly, the state of mind in which the present writer "attacks" the average little volume of English "poetry."

But when we imagine that a poet is really speaking to us across one knows not what chasm of eternal separation—ah! then it becomes all quite different, then we listen, as men always will listen, to the voice of the human magician in the very teeth of abstract science. Such a poet, with the spell of far-off fantasies upon his lips, haunted by the infinite vistas of remote memory into which he has surely peered, has written a volume entitled "The Flower of Old Japan." The author, Mr. Alfred Noyes, has described his poem as "a dim, strange tale for all ages," and, perhaps, that phrase, better than any other, suggests its persuasive charm. It is a dream, and it has preserved the fleeting magic of dreams. Above all it has atmosphere; the illusion lives. Merrily, with a mocking sweetness, the poet lures us after him in his strange dream quest as though we too had regained the forgotten wisdom of childhood:—

Something haunted us that night
Like a half-remembered name;
Worn old pages in that light
Seemed the same, yet not the same;
Curling in the pleasant heat
Smoothly as a shell-shaped fan,
O! they breathed and smelt so sweet
When we turned to Old Japan!
Suddenly we thought we heard
Someone tapping on the wall,
Tapping, tapping like a bird,
Till a panel seemed to fall
Quietly; and a tall, thin man
Stepped into the glimmering room,
And he held a little fan,
And he waved it in the gloom.

The children follow the "tall thin man" and sail out into the mysterious night, passing—

Huts that gloomed and glanced among Fruitage dipping in the blue;
Songs the sirens never sung,
Shores Ulysses never knew.

And everywhere "Creeping Sin" dogs their footsteps seeking to lure them from their quest. But at last they arrive at "Old Japan," and then at "The City of the Secret Wound," and finally approach the mirror which encircles "The Mystic Ruby," the goal of their desire; and here the children fashion a world after their own hearts:—

And each wish spoiled another wish,
Till we threw the glass down in despair;
For, getting whatever you want to get
Is like drinking tea from a fishing net.

The dream fades, but the wonder of it survives:—

For we found at last we knew
More than all our fancy planned,
All the fairy tales were true,
And home the heart of fairy land.

We have quoted much from this exquisite little book, because in this case quotation is the most significant form of praise. These simple verses have caught the aroma of a lost fragrance which only poets can restore to a generation arid even in its dreams.

Literary Studies.

CHARLOTTE BRONTË—GEORGE ELIOT—JANE AUSTEN: STUDIES IN THEIR WORKS. By Henry H. Bonnell. (Longmans.)

THE author of this carefully written treatise on the works of these three great novelists does not adhere to the "alphabetical" preference of Mr. Birrell which places Miss Austen first in point of merit as well as in point of time. The reason for his placing this artist, whom he compares to Meissonier, last is because "she was content with picturing the life she saw," while "we search for the philosophy which will explain it." From this point of view the author is, of course, unquestionably right, and yet, in spite of his protest in favour of the larger and more philosophic conception of life, he deliberately places Charlotte Brontë before George Eliot. That is to say he places the mind of a young girl, singularly narrow in its outlook, singularly solitary and remote in its inner as well as in its outward loneliness, before the most philosophical mind which has ever produced an English novel of the first order. Mr. Bonnell has not in any sense obtruded his partialities, but the objective fact of the order in which he has placed these novelists—so conspicuously opposed to the common verdict—is neither an accident nor a matter of personal prejudice, but is significant of a close and intimate study of his subject.

In speaking of Charlotte Brontë, there is always another figure present before us, the enigmatic author of "Wuthering Heights." "Younger in years and in grace," says Mr. Bonnell, "she was yet the elder sister in her attitude towards nature, as paganism is older than Christianity." That is the criticism of genuine insight. Charlotte Brontë, revelling in the rage of night and storm, was never of its very essence in the sense that Emily was. "Unlike Emily," he continues, "she looks through nature, up to nature's God." But because both, after their fashion, were very near to what we may almost call a telepathy with nature, these lonely women translated the cravings of the human heart into Nature's own untrammelled passion, and because of this Mr. Bonnell is right in speaking of the elder sister "as the greatest writer of pure passion in the English tongue," just as he is right in saying that "we shall never have anything like the Brontës again until like genius mates with like innocence and like loneliness."

A Parisian critic comments on the curious simplicity of George Eliot's novels, in which he detects something akin to Slavonic simplicity. He reads the pages one after another, he tells us, without mental effort of any kind, and then, almost before he is conscious of its charm, the story has reached his heart. Mr. Bonnell, naturally, deals at some length with the philosophy and the art of George Eliot, but we are pleased to see that it is to her human sympathy and not her power of abstract thought that he attributes her final permanence. This is a thoughtful summary:—

She did not reduce romance to a science; nor was it her mission to illustrate the romance of science. The mystery of life is not explained in her works. There is no Be-All and End-All system dreamt of in her philosophy. But her greatness is that she subordinates the final parts to the infinite whole; and her music, though cradled in pain, is a true music of the spheres.

Of Jane Austen Mr. Bonnell accepts and ratifies the common verdict. He does justice to her "exquisite touch" and her "wonderful charm." He sees in her the incarnation of good taste and good feeling, and quotes with approval the aphorism of Mr. Saintsbury: "We shall have another Homer before we see another Jane." "Her skill," he says, "was all-complete, the bright elegance of her charm all-perfect." And yet, it is clear to him, and he makes it clear to us, that there was something in the stormy restlessness of the Brontës at once more human, more powerful and more permanent—in its vital appeal to a higher tribunal than the petty censorship of their contemporaries—than anything which the Meissonier-like art of Miss Austen could fashion. And it is because he can appreciate the delicate charm of this great artist so well that we may trust his instinct in regard to those daughters of storm who, more than any other writers, "did what was right without knowing it."

In the course of this interesting series of studies the author has discountenanced the petty gossip which is so often admitted as a substitute for psychology, and which, in the case of Charlotte Brontë, is obviously offensive and obviously stupid.

"Pleasant as a Country Walk."

SHAKESPEARE'S GARDEN. By J. Harvey Bloom, Rector of Whitchurch. (Methuen. 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a very pleasant little addition to the many books dealing with the flowers mentioned by Shakespeare; and one is pleased to see that it has the advantage of being written by the rector of a parish in Shakespeare's own Warwickshire, who can speak from first-hand knowledge therefore, of the county flora. He has had the excellent idea, after his detailed discussion of the Shakespearean flowers, to add an appendix giving from each play all the allusions it contains to plants or trees. We know not, however, but we would have preferred a tabulation of the passages under the heading of the plant or tree mentioned, rather than a miscellaneous tabulation under the heading of the plays. This might have been made to serve, also, as an index to the body of the book—a lack which we feel somewhat, as it is. In the introductory chapter Mr. Bloom reproduces from the “Maison Rustique” of Charles Stevens and John Leebault (1600) a description of a garden “such as Shakespeare’s father may have had,” which we must needs quote for the fragrant sound of its names and its old English:—

The garden of pleasure shall be set about and compassed in with arbours made of jesamin, rosemarie, boxe, juniper, cypress-trees, savin, cedars, rose-trees, and other dainties first planted and pruned according as the nature of every one doth require, but after brought into some forme and order with willow or juniper poles. . . . The waies and alleys must be covered and sowed with fine sand well bet, or with the powder of the sawing of marble, or else paved handsomely with good pit stone. The garden by means of a large path of six feet shall be divided into two equal parts; the one shall containe the herbes and flowers used to make nosegaies and garlands of, as March violets, Provence gilliflowers, purple gilliflowers, Indian gilliflowers, small paunces, daisies, yellow and white gilliflowers, marigolds, lily conually, daffodils, canterburie bells, purple velvet flowers, anemones, corne flag, mugwoort lilies, and other such like, and it may be called the nosegaie garden. The other part shall have all other sweet-smelling herbes, whether they be suche as beare no flowers, or if they beare any, yet they are not put in nosegaies alone, but the whole herbe be with them, as Southern wood, wormewood, pellitorie, rosemarie, jesamin, marierom, balme mints, peniroyall, costmarie, hyssop, lavender, basil, sage, savorie, rue, tansy, thyme, cammomill, mugwoort, bastard marierim, nept, sweet balme, all-good, anis, horehound, and others such like, and this may be called the garden for herbes of good smell.

There is an old-world sound about the very names of the catalogue. The body of Mr. Bloom’s book is pleasant as a country-walk for any man of good will towards flowers; and one can but dip at random into its discussions. The stanza in “Love’s Labour’s Lost” has always raised a vexed question:—

When daisies pied and violets blue,
And lady-smocks all silver-white,
And cuckoo-buds of yellow hue,
Do paint the meadows with delight

The “lady-smock” is the delicate Cardamine pratensis, still called by Warwickshire peasants “smell-smocks.” But what are the “cuckoo-buds”? Mr. Bloom elects for the king-cup, a flower which grows in damp meadows. The lady-smock, he says, would also grow near the water; and the association thus suggests the king-cup. The only alternative is the ranunculus in its various kinds, which are not in flower with the lady-smock. We would gladly think Shakespeare meant the marsh-marigold (as the king-cup is also called), for it is a splendid wild-flower. We trust, therefore, that Mr. Bloom is right. The “cuckoo-flower,” which Shakespeare also mentions, in “King Lear,” among the flowers with which the mad king crowns himself, Mr. Bloom identifies with “the two commonest of the wild geraniums,” Geranium dissectum and molle. They are still called “cuckoo-flowers” in the Stratford neighbourhood, which seems better evidence than can be offered for any of the several other suggestions. Mr. Bloom, by the way, does not mention the colour of either wild-geranium in question—though it is rarely he takes such a matter for granted. But enough; to follow him further would take us too far a-field, and we must close with a cordial recommendation of an interesting little book, written with evident love, and studded with folk-lore and legend.

Sense, Meaning, and Significance.

WHAT IS MEANING? STUDIES IN THE DEVELOPMENT OF SIGNIFICANCE. By V. Welby. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THIS volume is an introduction to a new science which shall be called Significs, and which shall enable “the world of signs to be fuller of sense and signify more than it has ever done yet.” The author has taken an endless amount of trouble, and includes numerous and valuable quotations. The main body of his argument is somewhat obscured by the numerous irrelevances—dealing with all manner of religion and philosophy—with which the author refreshes himself; but his indictment against our carelessness in the use of language and his insistence upon the value of a greater appreciation and exploiting of its possibilities must command our assent. The author’s cardinal doctrine is the distinction between the sense, the meaning, and the significance of all language. The meaning he takes to signify the intention of the speaker, and the significance the value of the contained fact or idea. His discussion of metaphor and analogy is amusing and interesting. “Mere figures of speech,” as Jowett says, “have unconsciously influenced the minds of great thinkers.” Says Mr. Welby, “As part of our scientific crusade we must provide a critique of metaphors. . . . It would need a volume to enumerate the new facts of science waiting to be used figuratively, and thus to enlarge and enrich our conceptual treasure-house.” As an instance of the value the author attaches to his new study we may quote:—

Most of us . . . from lack of the habit which Significs forms, hold “fact” and “idea” in an absolute instead of a merely expedient opposition. If fact gives us the idea of its own domination, the testimony of that idea is all the evidence we have of the existence of fact.

His protest against the degradation of language coincides with that of Oliver Wendell Holmes, though Mr. Welby elsewhere objects to the familiar metaphor used by Holmes, of words as the intellectual currency. And, indeed, Mr. Welby is rather a purist as regards metaphor, and those which he suggests, such as “thinking in cube,” and “binocular mental vision,” may well be scorned of the poet. A better metaphorical adjective occurs in the quotation from Prof. Sidgwick: “In the general ignorance of logic which prevails, and which is fostered by the traditional teaching system, it is not difficult to make people accept a circular truism as a deep philosophical truth.” Perhaps the author’s own definition of “meaning” is forgotten when, in a parallel to George Eliot’s remark upon the varied applicability of the words of genius, he says, “We may be quite sure that unless we mean more than we now think we mean, our words are not of much account in the long run.” And, after his remarks upon accuracy it is a surprise to meet the familiar error of “seeming paradox”—as if a paradox were not just a seeming absurdity.

Mr. Welby is strongly adverse to the “myth” that it is easy to make one’s meaning plain. Meaning is not plain in the sense of being the same at all times, in all places, and to all. “We may even arrive at ‘curves’ of thought revealed by change of meaning; . . . probably far less simple than the missionary of religion . . . has imagined.”

In his last forty pages, Mr. Welby outlines, after all his destructive criticism, the directions in which Significs, or the Study of Expression, must travel. He imagines and hopes for two generations taught from their earliest years that it is “morally wrong, socially impossible, and practically idiotic to make anything but the very most of all existing means of expression.” The child naturally tends to this full use of what is possible; the parent inherits a primal tendency to revert to the fixed and rooted form, while the child is free-swimming—not a bad metaphor from, we suppose, the barnacle.

The difficulty of reading a somewhat ill-arranged volume, with long notes and longer appendices, cannot prevent us from admitting that the author has serious support for his claim that Signifies will provide the "method at present unforeseen," to quote Mr. Balfour, "which will prevent students being wholly lost in the details of some highly specialist study." Certainly it is a sorry come-down from the philosopher of old to the "submerged tenth of science, the ultra-specialists," and we need something to save us from the man who excused himself from joining in conversation since his attention was entirely concentrated on his life's work—the study of the hairs on the thirty-eighth left leg of a particular kind of centipede!

Other New Books.

THE DIVERTED VILLAGE. By Grace Rhys. (Methuen. 6s.)

THIS amusing little book is one more contribution to that unpretentious, yet cheerful and delicate branch of literature which began perhaps with Charles Dudley Warner's "My Summer in a Garden," and gained its true popularity with Frank R. Stockton's "Rudder Grange." Mrs. Rhys, abandoning the severer methods of her "Wooing of Sheila," tells easily and amusingly the story of the adventures of a London family who inherited a house and garden in Norfolk. The practical wife, the humorous husband, the mischievous children, the perplexed governess, the self-willed cynical gardener, the resourceful maid of all work—all are here according to pattern. But the ingredients are very skilfully mixed, and the reader may spend a very pleasant afternoon over the book and become as diverted as the village. Thomas Matt, the gardener, is something of a creation.

A THIRD POT POURRI. By Mrs. C. W. Earle. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.)

It is very unlikely to be the case, but Mrs. Earle in this volume might have set out to reduce the gardening-book formula to absurdity—to be parodying her own excellent works. All the digressions into the kitchen, the dispensary, and literary criticism, which are permitted by a tolerant public to the author of a manual of gardening, are here practised with a frankness that is almost bewildering. "I have already done my best," Mrs. Earle seems to have said, "but if you must have more of me, you shall," and forthwith her scrap-books have been emptied. Desultory readers who like scrap-book reading may like "A Third Pot Pourri," but it seems to us a very dull mixture. Why we should be expected to be interested by the author's diary for 1902, unprepared in any way for the honour of print, we cannot understand. Under June, for example, we read—

The week of the King's illness was the only really hot one we have had this summer, and during it the whole air was full of the most gloomy prognostications, the gloomiest emanating from the medical profession and from certain headquarters of spiritualistic prophecy, all of which, as we know, happily came to nothing.

One looks to seven-and-sixpenny books with pleasant titles for better sustenance than this. We balance it with the following important hint addressed to any one with a bilious headache who is obliged to make a speech or any great effort: "Put a whole tin of Colman's mustard [why not Keen's? and what sized tin?] into a large hot bath, stay in it ten or fifteen minutes, lie down after it for half an hour. The brain will then be far clearer and better than in ordinary health."

IN THE TAIL OF THE PEACOCK. By Isabel Savory. (Hutchinson. 16s.)

MISS SAVORY gets her title from an Arabic proverb, "The earth is a peacock: Morocco is the tail of it." The book is pleasant, even, and fairly interesting; it cannot be said to add anything to our knowledge, nor does it in any degree approach the impressions of Morocco given us by Mr. Cunningham Graham and Mr. A. J. Dawson. It is, indeed, no more than the record of the experiences of two ladies who found Morocco, on the whole, a fairly safe country in which to travel. But all personal experience is interesting, and Miss Savory has enough sympathy to carry us through her lengthy volume without any feeling of fatigue. In her preface the author says concerning her book:—

Such as care to wander through its pages must have learnt to enjoy idleness, nor find weeks spent beneath the sun and stars too long—that is to say, the fascination of a wandering, irresponsible life should be known to them: waste and solitary places must not appal, nor trifling incident weary, while human natures remotely removed from their own, alternately delight and repel.

But after all, these human natures are not so remotely removed from our own as Miss Savory suggests; the basic oneness of human nature finds little place in these pages. Indeed, in the nature of things, this was perhaps inevitable. Of all women travel-writers perhaps the late Miss Mary Kingsley alone had the faculty of profound observation—without any trace of mere femininity—truly feminine she always was. But as Miss Savory makes no claim to be more than a recorder of personal impressions, we are glad to have those impressions, and to say of them that they are suggestive and interesting. Miss Savory's appreciation of the picturesque, and also her limitations, may be judged by the following passage concerning the Aid-el-Sereer (Little Feast) which follows the Rámadhan:—

Everybody was in shining white, if not new, apparel, and all Tetuan was abroad. That among a people clad so largely in white means a good deal, and the streets of Tetuan might have competed with the Park on the Sunday before Ascot.

May we say, without offence, that to compare such a scene with "the Park on the Sunday before Ascot" is to show a distinct lack of true imagination? Yet Miss Savory has imagination, as readers of her book will discover. It is, after all, just a matter of temperament and point of view.

FACTS AND PHANTASIES OF A FOLIO GRUB. By Herbert Compton. (Treherne. 7s. 6d. net.)

THIS is a bundle of genuine reminiscences from a practised, slovenly hand. If Mr. Compton would be at the pains to conform his writing to the laws of grammar and to strike out all the jokes that happen to be bad ones, the reading of his book would be real refreshment. As it is, one wonders that so kindly a nature, so merciful and loving to all his beasts, should be so inconsiderate of his brother man. For the book is crowded with character sketches of horses and dogs that are full of sympathetic insight; but the humour that riots over the pages is altogether too spontaneous for the majesty of print. There is obviously no appeal from Mr. Compton over his whisky and soda to Mr. Compton coffee-wise in the morning, and that (as any one who has written late at night will tell you) is a mistake. Was there ever before seen in print anything so deplorable as this:—

The early settlers—Land-of-Cakers to a unit—I have sometimes wondered whether that name has anything to do with the enterprise of the Scotchman, which always "takes the commercial cake" wherever he settles?—the early settlers . . .

Unless perhaps this, which you may see without turning the leaf:—

When I got Forester home to the coffee tote (we had Madras coolies in the colony, hence that term is not doing the devil in this galley) . . .

We submit that this kind of thing is quite inexcusable in a man who, like Mr. Compton, in his opening sketch convinces us that he is a real lover of books, or of one who could do anything so good in its different way as "The Affair of Gholamghurry," and such pleasing animal studies as the accounts of Blondino and Kabooter and Brunette in "Stocking a Stable." Here is the last—not the best, but the shortest:—

Her head was as shapely as an Elgin marble; her ears exquisitely and ever on the alert; her nose retroussée [sic], which in a mare, as in some women, is a charm; her lips delicate and nervous; and the expression of her mouth irresistible! She is never saying anything except "prunes" and "prism." She has a divine lock of hair between her soft, brown, wondering eyes. . . . When I get on her back I feel I never knew what real luxury in riding was before. She is none of your equine armchairs, or confidential chargers, but just a buoyant wave of light and lovely motion that deceives a heavy-weight, bald-headed, rather rotund old fool into imagining himself a horseman.

The volume includes also some rhymed pieces into which the author declares that he has at least put some sincere work. They are School Songs, and may possibly be of interest to Old Malvernians.

"Home Arts and Crafts," by Montague Marks (Pearson), is a volume dealing with elementary modelling in clay, wood carving, bent-iron work, taxidermy, and so forth. The directions are clear and concise, and the illustrations numerous and practical.

NEW EDITIONS.—Mr. J. E. Scrutton's "Law of Copyright" (Clowes) is now in its fourth edition, which has been delayed, the author tells in his preface, "in the hope that Parliament might undertake a systematic revision of the Copyright Laws." But as Parliament has not thought well generally to revise the Copyright Laws, this edition appears with the inclusion of such doubtful minor emendations as the recent Musical Copyright changes.—The latest addition to Messrs. Methuen's "Arden Shakespeare" is "Cymbeline," edited by Edward Dowden. Prof. Dowden's introduction runs to over forty pages, and covers the history and sources of the play.

Fiction.

THE BANNER OF BLUE. By S. R. Crockett. (Hodder. 6s.)

MR. CROCKETT appears almost with the punctuality of a periodical, but he is far from settling into the chronic tiredness of things that must come out even when they feel inclined to hibernate. "The Banner of Blue" is a rousing romance, which is certainly none the less exciting for the fact that it has far less to do with the disruption of the Scotch Kirk in 1843 than we would suppose from its title. It is true that the hero is turned out of his manse, and that he preaches in a gravel pit during a snowstorm, but he is a lover as well as a minister, for Mr. Crockett is not the man to "fob" his readers off with a mere drama of the soul.

The tale might, in fact, be aptly and Gorkily entitled "Two Fathers, Two Daughters, Two Sons and a Comic Child." One of the fathers is a wicked laird, the other a Knoxian joiner, and it is almost superfluous to add that the laird's son loves the joiner's daughter.

Fiction insists that such attachments shall develop mysteries as well as rebuffs, but Mr. Crockett is not happy in his allegiance to the rule. Moreover his flute-playing profligate of a laird's son, has an air of having stepped out of the pages of Mr. Neil Munro, while his virtuous brother loses much of our sympathy by the tactless device which makes him contribute some passages which record his father's shame.

Remains, however, the fact that the story has at the close a moment of romantic splendour; it is the moment when a supposed paralytic is revealed as a duellist wounded to the death. The "whigmaleeries" of Lowland dialect supply a spice which, though reminiscent of algebra, is poignant and amusing. An admirable study of collie dogs in Chapter XXXI. is as good as anything in the book. How often in popular fiction it is the merely casual which counts!

THE FETICH OF THE FAMILY. By E. A. Barnett. (Heinemann. 6s.)

WHEN we read a book which is at once so clever and so unpleasant as "The Fetich of the Family," the inevitable question arises as to whether it was worth while to waste the cleverness upon the unpleasantness. It is only fair to say that unpleasant details have been suppressed with admirable ingenuity, so that we are never shocked, though the book is a depressing one from beginning to end. The story, told briefly, is that two cousins, who have waited for each other until they are both middle aged, marry and have a daughter, who is unmistakably an idiot. Three years later, they have another daughter, who is born perfectly sound and healthy, but who is sacrificed, mind and body, to the insane resolve of the mother that no difference shall be made between the two. The result is that the younger girl is brought up to consider her idiot sister as her cross; and her childhood is one long drawn-out torture, for, when the screaming fits of Blanche are not attracting crowds round the two children in Kensington Gardens, the whole nervous system of Rhoda, the younger sister, is being played upon disastrously by her contact with the creature who is half-infant and half-animal.

But although unpleasantness lies in the theme of the story, much cleverness lies in the character drawing. The mother is relentlessly presented, yet so truthfully that we do not know whether to pity or to condemn her. There is a grim humour, too, in the analysis of her character, which makes it by far the most interesting thing in the book; indeed, in spite of its depressing atmosphere, the story is worth reading for the sake of that one lifelike study of a mistaken woman. The same impartial attitude towards her puppets is shown by the author in her delineation of her other characters, notably those of Rhoda and her self-educated husband. She never cheats us into liking them by tampering with their reality; and only those who are interested in real men and women of not too pleasant a type would do well to read "The Fetich of the Family."

WYEMARKE'S MOTHER. [By Edward H. Cooper. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

A CHILDREN'S book that is not published at Christmas is apt to convey the assumption that it is meant to be about children and not for them. This cannot be said truthfully, however, of Mr. Cooper's latest Wyemarke book. It is both for and about children; and although there is much in it that will be simply passed over by the ordinary child, as there must necessarily be in any carefully observed story about children, the nursery as well as the schoolroom will love to read this last chronicle of the interesting little person with the curious name. Wyemarke is not an ordinary child—that must be grasped at once if one is to enjoy reading about her—so all the more praise is due to her creator for having made her so interesting. She is fastidious, critical, a little precocious, very intolerant of people who do not happen to fit her particular standard; in fact, she has all the characteristics of the well-born child who spends most of her time in the drawing-room with a mother who is "on the rush" from morning till night. This sort of child is generally dealt hardly with in fiction; but Mr. Cooper has had the discernment to endow her with all the human qualities of the ordinary child as well, which, of course, she really would possess, and the result is that she is a straight, honest, brave-hearted little woman underneath all the smart dresses and the company manners. In the same way, he has carefully avoided making Lady Darcy the mere woman of fashion, who neglects her children for her social duties. This is a specimen of the way she "lectures" her little girl, as Wyemarle calls it:—

When you are invited to make a choice, make it. When a person is carving a pheasant and says to you: "Do you like a leg or a wing?" say which you want straight out, and don't say, "Whichever you like; I don't mind." You see, if the man asks you, he probably really wants to know, and would prefer to give you the piece of pheasant which you like best. . . . It's especially and above all in the big things of life that you must know your own mind. You do know yours really. You want to be educated and can see that there is no chance of doing lessons here. My dear old lady . . . do you suppose I am vexed because you have found that out? . . . Lessons in this house! You might as well sit down in the middle of Bond Street at midday in the middle of June . . .

The nursery would sooner read about a mother who talks like that than about the usual mother of fiction who keeps her failings, if she has any, for the chapter of the book that is never written.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE ETERNAL WOMAN. BY DOROTHEA GERARD.
A study of the woman question. Clara Woods began life by jumping through paper hoops in a circus. On being left an orphan she was adopted by Baroness Seifort, who, however, died without a will, and consequently without making provision for her ward. Clara consulted the editress of the "Coming Sex," but ultimately decided that "in order to wield a woman's power fully, it would be necessary to remain a real woman." The story originally appeared in the weekly edition of "The Times." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE STUMBLING-BLOCK. BY EDWIN PUGH.
"Old Owen Owen christened her Cambria, and this was the way of it." So opens a story in a vein rather different from that of most of Mr. Pugh's work. In the first chapter Cambria is born, in the penultimate chapter she dies after bearing a son. The book has character and a sense of pathos. Also, it is short, and free from padding. (Heinemann. 6s.)

RICHARD ROSNY. BY MAXWELL GRAY.
A social story of middle class life by the author of "The Silence of Dean Maitland." Richard grew up in the house of a stepfather whose view of money matters led the family into difficulties. He entered the Navy, and his subsequent life and love affairs are related with much deliberation. Most of the action passes in the country. (Heinemann. 6s.)

HE FOR GOD ONLY.

BY "IOTA."

"He for God only; She for God and him." These words from the title page explain the motif of the book. When we meet Joan Westcar, she is engaged to the Curate. Miss Rebecca, who describes him as "an apostolic diathesis with the digestion of an ostrich," foresaw the difficulty of the situation. "Play what pranks you please with the others, but never make a god of the parson you mean to marry. It ends in speedy disillusion, or means hanging a millstone around your neck." The story is skilfully developed. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

LOVEY MARY.

BY ALICE HEGAN RICE.

An American story by the author of "Mrs. Wiggs of the Cabbage Patch." In an Orphans' Home Lovey Mary fell upon bitterness by reason of the harshness of Miss Bell, the matron. "'I wisht I was dead,' she cried passionately. 'The harder I try to be good the meaner I get.' Ever'body blames me, and ever'body makes fun of me.'" But with the advent of Tommy she found the solace of love. Her subsequent adventures are humourously told. There are sixteen illustrations. (Hodder and Stoughton. 5s.)

IN THE GARDEN OF CHARITY.

BY BASIL KING.

By the author of "Let Not Man Put Asunder." A story of simple fisher-folk and the like, that goes down strongly and frankly to the primitive emotions. "In the Kingdom of Heaven," Charity murmured, and she and Hagar clung together, 'there's no more marriage, nor giving in marriage; but we'll all be—you and me and William and the baby, and all of us—we'll all be as the angels of God.'" The tragedy of the story is sincere. (Harper. 6s.)

ROSSLYN'S RAID.

BY B. H. BARNBY.

A new volume in the Greenback Library, containing three stories; one of the Scotch Border in the time of Elizabeth, one of farm life in Iceland, and an Eastern tale entitled "The Slave of Lagash." A note tells us that "in consequence of the Author's early death this book has not received from her its final revision." (Duckworth. 1s. 6d.)

THE TAINT OF THE CITY.

BY CHARLES EDDY.

A story of the Stock Exchange, by the author of "Winifred and the Stockbroker." Mr. Eddy writes crisp dialogue, and the book consists of little else. The hero is the typical young man with a small patrimony and no particular career. He became a "half-commission man" and made ten thousand pounds out of the Great Kangaroo. There is a journalist who is "given to the utterance of sour epigram," and most of the other people provide "smart" conversation. (Arnold. 6s.)

MALLENDER'S MISTAKE.

BY LIONEL L. PILKINGTON.

A tale of social and commercial life in the provinces, turning on bigamy and financial swindles. The brothers Mallender are revealed to one another as scoundrels in the second chapter, and the one suggests that the other should solve their common difficulties by absconding to a South American republic with twenty-nine thousand pounds, the property of his clients. (Chatto. 6s.)

We have also received "For His People," retold by Viscount Hayashi (Harper); "The Machinations of the Myo-ok," by Cecil Lewis (Methuen); "The Caprices of a Royal Incognita" (Harper); "The French Master," by A. Wilson-Barrett (Ward Lock); "Silent Dominion," by Winefride Taunton (Methuen); "Chasma," by H. W. G. Hyrst (Hutchinson); "King of the Dead," by F. Aubrey (Macqueen); "The Cross of Pearls" by C. Bearne (Slack); "A Strange Honeymoon," by E. Dean (Digby Long); "The Forest Prince," by B. W. Ward (Digby Long).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
Quarterly	5/0
Price for one issue	/5

The Praise of Famous Men.

"LET us now praise famous men and our fathers that begat us."

There is a good custom that obtains in Trinity College, Dublin, to deliver once a year a discourse on some bygone member of the University. It is the glory of Trinity that she has an abundance of famous men from whom to choose. And now "the silent sister" has broken her silence; and under the quaint title "Peplographia Dublinensis" she has given to the world a volume of these discourses, with the following out of Suidas for a motto: "They made a robe (or peplus) for Athena, and on it they engraved the names of their greatest men."

In this Dublin robe, as the editor points out, the task is not yet complete. Neither Swift nor Goldsmith finds a place in this volume. Of the eight who are commemorated, two at least, Berkeley and Burke, are giants of literature, and one, Archbishop Ussher, a giant of learning. And of most of the others it was their fate to be connected, in their life or after it, with famous men of letters. Here is written the life-story of that very remarkable man, Thomas Wilson, Bishop of Sodor and Man, whose meditations on conduct found so much favour with Matthew Arnold, as readers of "Culture and Anarchy" will remember. For fifty-eight years Wilson ruled his diocese with a patriarchal sway, suited to the backward condition of his people, and with an exercise of real power due in part to the period, but more to the peculiar circumstances of the island. The Acts of Parliament which restrained the Church in England did not apply to the Isle of Man, and moreover the Bishop was, as his successor still is, an official member of the legislature of the island. Wilson worthily exercised his trust. His people loved him, as was shown by the triumphant procession which conducted him back to his palace after an imprisonment of two months, the result of a disagreement with a contentious Archdeacon. When he went to Court, George II. knelt and begged his blessing; and Queen Caroline said to a bystander, "Here comes a Bishop who has not come to ask for translation." It is interesting to recall, with Dr. Gwynn, Matthew Arnold's estimate of Wilson: "His unction is so perfect and in such happy alliance with his goodness that it becomes tenderness and fervent charity. His goodness is so perfect and in such happy alliance with his unction that it becomes moderation and insight. While, therefore, the type of religion exhibited in his writings is English, it is of a far higher kind than is in general reached by his countrymen, and yet, being English, it is possible and attainable by them."

And now occurs another name, still dearer to Arnold, the name of Lucius Cary, Viscount Falkland, on whom he pronounced so unforgettable an eulogy. Falkland's father was sent as Lord Deputy to Ireland, and the boy himself was entered at Trinity College at the age of twelve, taking his degree four years later. It was there, no doubt, that his innate love of learning grew and flourished, till it became the passion of his manhood. It cannot be said that literature is the richer for the works he left behind him, but Falkland, who was wont to say that he pitied unlearned gentlemen upon a rainy day, was infinitely the richer for his love of literature. "When we went from Oxford to Great Tew," says one of his friends, "as we found ourselves out of the University, so we never thought ourselves absent from home." The circle of Falkland's intimates included such men as Chillingworth, Hales, Cowley, Waller, and Edward Hyde, afterwards Earl of Clarendon. What a glimpse is that of Falkland later on, beguiling the weary nights with disputations with Chillingworth in his hut before beleaguered Gloucester, with the shadow of the fatal field of Newbury already drawing near! It is good to read once more of the life and death of Falkland, if only because it sends our thoughts back to the immortal page of Clarendon and Arnold.

Here, too, the career of Grattan, the purest of patriots, may be studied, whose statue "faces with uplifted arm this ancient college, as if appealing to the generous youth who issue from its portals, charging them to consecrate their learning, their talents, and all their natural forces to the service of their native land, and of their fellow-countrymen of every creed." And that is no bad description of the aims of Henry Grattan. Of Berkeley, too, we may read, most Christian of philosophers and most philosophic of Christians. But in this place we would devote our remaining words to the greatest Irishman that was a man of letters, Edmund Burke, partly from the conspicuous interest of the subject, partly because the discourse upon him in this book exceeds the others, interesting as they all are, in penetration and in eloquence. The writer is Dr. Chadwick, Bishop of Derry, who seems to have inherited no small share of the gifts of his immediate predecessor in that office.

It is hard to forgive Boswell, whatever his reason may have been, for his practical exclusion of Burke from the "Life of Johnson." Of the great figures of the eighteenth century none is more famous than Burke, and none more difficult to envisage. It may be that the greatness of his thoughts eclipses his personality. If you walk amid mountains on a day of mist, the mist may lift for a moment and you are almost appalled by the splendour and propinquity of some great eminence; but it is only for a moment; the mist descends again and the peak is withdrawn. So it is with Burke: you get a glimpse of him now and again, but in the main you are left guessing. There is Johnson's gibe: "Is he like Burke, sir, who winds into a subject like a serpent?" There is his serious declaration that you could not take shelter from the rain under the same archway with Mr. Burke without discovering in ten minutes that he was a very extraordinary man. There are Goldsmith's jesting lines, into which, by the way, Dr. Chadwick infuses an altered meaning. But these things do not throw much light upon the inner life of the great orator. Dr. Chadwick's study brings us at least a little nearer to him.

A little—for it is by his utterances in private life that a man admits us to intimacy; and on this head Dr. Chadwick has nothing new to record. But he has estimated the character and depth of Burke's intellect in an illuminating fashion. The very loftiness of Burke's thought, his habit of constantly seeking for the underlying principles of political actions, made ordinary men impatient of him. "It is not so much," writes Dr. Chadwick, "that he 'went on,' but that he 'went on refining': nor that he was 'too long' for his hearers but 'too deep'." He brought philosophy into the House of Commons: but the House of Commons seldom desired it. The complaint that he—narrowed his mind,

And to party gave up what was meant for mankind, is truer than at first appears; Goldsmith meant, Dr. Chadwick thinks, that the deep utterances of Burke were out of place in an environment where party-spirit reigns; and the poet's criticism is justified, he holds, in an unexpected manner, because the orator "spoke to us, and to all time, when he inflicted himself upon the House of Commons. . . . He could not overcome the obstinacy of George III. and save the American colonies; but he taught, and he was the first who persuaded, a great party to espouse those noble principles by which all our colonies are now governed. . . . He did not convict Hastings, but he secured for the teeming millions of the East a righteous government." His fame, therefore, should be greater with posterity than it was with his contemporaries, even as the fame of Shakespeare. In his life his great intellect often interposed a barrier between himself and his fellows; his imagination made him see what others heard, and heard sometimes with indifference. Therefore he appeared a dreamer to many. And to posterity his personality is mainly to be inferred from the flame and power of his public utterances. Yet it is well to be reminded of acts which testify to the elevation of his moral nature. "The poet Crabbe owed him everything," writes Dr. Chadwick, "and the painter Barry lived in Rome at his expense while he himself was struggling; and neither the gratitude of the poet satiated, nor the ill-temper of the painter wearied out, his charity." For a moment, at any rate, the mist has lifted.

Emerson.

THERE was a child for whom the capital good and end of life, was to see wheels go round. Before a carriage in the street he would stop, plunged in ecstatic contemplation, and—like a Buddhist devotee with his mystic formula—ejaculate at intervals in adoring rapture, "Wheel-go-round! wheel-go-round!" In the works of watches, in tops, in the spinning froth of his tea-cup, in everything whirlable, this unconscious vortical philosopher discerned and worshipped "wheel-go-rounds." With that tyrannous mandate, "Want to see wheel-go-round," he insisted on paying his devotions to every such manifestation of orbital motion. Which things are a parable. That child, it strikes us, should find his ripened ideal in the four-volume edition of Emerson's Works, which Messrs. Routledge have issued at twenty shillings. One critic has already remarked that Emerson's writing revolves round itself, rather than progresses. The remark was made depreciatingly: but we prefer to regard this trait in Emerson as a characteristic, rather than a limitation. This vortical movement of his understanding impresses itself strongly on one's mind after reading a succession of these essays—or lectures, as many of them originally were. Perhaps, indeed, the necessities of a lecturer, and the mental habit induced by much lecturing, may partly be responsible for it. An audience with difficulty follows an ascending sequence of thought, especially on abstruse subjects; where the snapping of a single link, a momentary lapse of attention, may render all which follows unintelligible; and at the best, it is uneasy to pick up again the dropped clue. But if the lecture circle round a single idea, such slips of fatigued attention are not fatal: what you have failed to grasp from one aspect, is presently offered and seized from another. The advantages of such a method for such a purpose are obvious. It is, at any rate, Emerson's method to a very large extent. Some one idea is suggested at the outset, and the rest of the essay is mainly a marvellous amplification of it. In some of these essays he is like a great eagle, sailing in noble and ample gyres, with deliberate beat of the strong wing, round the eyrie where his thought is nested. The essay on Plato is a notable example. He starts with the declaration of Plato's universality:—

These sentences contain the culture of nations; these are the corner-stone of schools; these are the fountain-head of literatures. A discipline it is in logic, arithmetic, taste, symmetry, poetry, language, rhetoric, ontology, morals or practical wisdom. There was never such range of speculation. Out of Plato come all things that are still written or debated among men of thought. . . . Plato is philosophy, and philosophy, Plato.

His genius allies the universal with the particular, so that it becomes all-continent. So Emerson begins, and round this declaration the whole essay revolves. This Allness of Plato, this combination of universality with particularity,—he takes this idea in his two hands, and turns it about on every side, surveys it from every aspect. Having trampled it out with his feet (one would say) he tosses it on his horns, till the air is alive with the winnowing of it. He conjures with it, till the Protean modifications and transmigrations and reappearances of it dazzle the attention and amaze the mind. He touches on Socrates, and Socrates forthwith becomes a reincarnation of the same idea, in his homely practicality and dæmonic wisdom—again the universal and the particular. We will not say but that we sometimes tire of these brilliant metamorphoses, these transmigrations of a single conception through innumerable forms. Sometimes we could cry "Enough!" and wish the repose of a more vertebrate method. But one thing he has effectually secured—we shall remember with emphasis that Plato was universal, and the synthesis at once of limit and immensity.

The "wheel-go-round" quality of his mind appears even in the detail of his style; as (in Swedenborg's image) each fragment of a crystal repeats the structure of the whole:—

A man who could see two sides of a thing was born. The wonderful synthesis so familiar in nature; the upper and the under side of the medal of Jove; the union of impossibilities, which reappears in every object; its real and its ideal power, was now also transferred entire to the consciousness of a man.

That is a simple and casual, but characteristic example. Statements are not left single, but are iterated and reiterated in form on form. You have thus within the great volutions of the essay at large innumerable little revolutions,—wheels within wheels like the motions of the starry heavens; nay, the individual sentence revolves on its own axis, one might say. The mere opulence of his imagery is a temptation to this. No prose-writer of his time has such resources of imagery essentially poetic in nature as Emerson—not even Ruskin. His prose is more fecund in imagery, and happier in imagery, than his poetry,—one of the proofs (we think) that he was not primarily a poet, undeniable though some of his poetry is. He had freer and ampler scope and use of all his powers in prose, even of those powers in their nature specifically poetic. It is a thing curious, but far from unexampled. With such figurative range, such easy and inexhaustible plasticity of expression, so nimble a perception, this iterative style was all but inevitable. That opulent mouth could not pause at a single utterance. His understanding played about a thought like lightning about a vane. It suggested numberless analogies, an endless sequence of associated ideas, countless aspects, shifting facets of expression; and it were much if he should not set down a poor three or four of them. We, hard-pushed for our one pauper phrase, may call it excess in him: to Emerson, doubtless, it was austerity.

He must be the most ungrateful and hard-headed of "beef-witted" Anglo-Saxons who is so enamoured of organic evolution and severe progression that he cannot savour the compensations of these splendid redundancies. Moreover, when we examine closely those larger revolutions of thought on which we first dwelt, it becomes visible—even in such an essay as that "Plato" which we took as the very type and extreme example of his peculiar tendency—that Emerson has his own mode of progression. The gyres are widening gyres, each sweep of the unflagging wing is in an ampler circuit. Each return of the idea reveals it in a deeper and fuller aspect; with each mental cycle we look down upon the first conception in an expanded prospect. It is the progression of a circle in stricken water. So, from the first casting of the idea into the mind, its agitations broaden repercussively outward; repeated, but ever spreading in repetition. And thus the thought of this lofty and solitary mind is cyclic, not like a wheel, but like the thought of mankind at large; where ideas are always returning on themselves, yet their round is steadily "widened with the process of the suns."

It was an almost inevitable condition of his unique power that Emerson's mind should have a certain isolation and narrowness, a revolving round its own fixed and personal axis, corresponding with the tendency already analysed. Yet in another view it often surprises by a breadth of interest no one could have predicted in this withdrawn philosopher, this brooder over Plato and the Brahmins. He has a shrewd, clear outlook upon practical life, all the sounder for his serene detachment from it. The English nation was never passed through so understanding and complete an analysis (for example) as by this casual visitor of our shores. It took nothing less than this American Platonist to note at once with such sympathy and such aloof dispassionateness all the strength and weakness of the Saxon-Norman-Celtic-Danish breed. He perceives, let us say, the intense, victorious, admirable, exasperating common-sense of the Englishman, with its backing of impenetrable self-belief; neither hating nor overpowered by it, hear the enjoying verve of his brilliant summary:—

The young men have a rude health which runs into peccant humors. They drink brandy like water, cannot expend their quantities of waste strength in riding, hunting, swimming, and fencing, and run into absurd frolics with the gravity of the Eumenides. They stoutly carry into every nook and corner of the earth their turbulent sense; leaving no lie uncontradicted; no pretension unexamined. They chew haschisch; cut themselves with poisoned creases; swing their hammock in the boughs of the Bohon Upas; taste every poison; buy every secret; at Naples they put St. Januarius's blood in an alembic; they saw a hole into the head of the "winking Virgin," to know why she winks; measure with an English footrule every cell of the Inquisition, every Turkish caaba, every Holy of holies; translate and send to Bentley the arcanum bribed and bullied from shuddering Brahmins; and measure their strength by the terror they cause.

It could only have been written by a man who united with the profound common-sense of eminent genius the profound uncommon sense of eminent genius. The one gave him sympathy; the other enabled him to possess his soul before a spectacle which compels most foreigners either to worship or execration. So also he can write on wealth with a sanity of perception at once homely and philosophic which is worth the reading either of a man of ledgers or a man of libraries, a poet or a pedlar. Uncle Sam had "hitched his wagon to a star"; but he kept a vigorous sap of the Uncle Sam who hitches his wagon to a prairie-hoss—and knows how to swap it.

Mr. Swinburne as Critic.

MR. SWINBURNE continues in "Harper's" the "critical comment" on Shakespeare's plays which accompany the drawings of Mr. Edwin Abbey, and also the (happily) unparalleled and (we hope) inimitable style which distinguished the contribution commented on by us three months ago. The leopard has not changed his spots. But the flamboyant style is much less in evidence. The new article is on "Richard II.," a play which supplies less opportunities and provocations for Mr. Swinburne's eloquence, yet much matter for discussion: the faults of manner are therefore greatly fewer and less aggressive, while the poet's critical sagacity is saliently developed. It is, in truth, a very delicate, discriminating, and sure-footed piece of criticism, and gives promise that the series will be a valuable addition to Shakespearean commentary. Mr. Swinburne's intimate knowledge of Shakespeare's predecessors and contemporaries joins with his fine and exceptionally catholic taste to constitute him an authoritative Shakespearean critic; and the matter here is of his best—no small thing to say.

The article opens, indeed, with a paragraph of fair length which is almost entirely one sentence—a sentence appallingly Swinburnian:—

When the one unequalled and unapproachable master of the one supreme art which implies and includes the mastery of the one supreme science perceptible and accessible by man stood hesitating between the impulsive instinct for dramatic poetry, &c.

That is but a taste, a scoop out of the middle, so to speak: it is not the beginning, and too surely it is not the end of this daunting sentence. But immediately afterwards we sail into the navigable waters of criticism. Mr. Swinburne leads off, somewhat superfluously, by mooted the authorship of "Titus Andronicus," which he assigns to Greene. Greene or Peele—we would not lightly question his view on such a point. But we are not confident that the lines he quotes from it can only be Shakespeare's; they seem within the scope of lesser and earlier men. His contention is that Greene and Marlowe strive visibly for rule of Shakespeare throughout "Richard II.," and that Greene bears it away. Well, Greene, like enough, but we see little of Marlowe in it. Very acutely, Mr. Swinburne adjudges this the earliest of Shakespeare's chronicle-plays: there is no faith in evidence of style and structure unless it be so. Characterisation, as he says, is unsure; the execution is crude. The opening turns on Gloucester's murder, which is not explained. The quarrel between Bolingbroke and Mowbray is like "the work of a pre-Marlowite": indeed, Mr. Swinburne might have added that much of the play is not only rhetorical beyond the wont of the historical plays, but weakly rhetorical. Save John of Gaunt, and the just-glimpsed Bishop of Carlisle, there is not a fine male character in the play (Hotspur barely speaks). York, as the critic says, is impossible; though Shakespeare had a recognisable conception in his mind. Truth is (though Mr. Swinburne does not point this out) that York is drawn rhetorically, not dramatically. He is a character from a satire of Dryden, an antithetic sketch of Tacitus, with its pointed contrasts of flaring resolve and impotent collapse, theoretic sagacity and practical fatuity, its weak and choleric fits of senile violence, staged without the transitions which alone could make them credible on the stage. It would be a striking rhetorical portrait: it is a dramatic monstrosity. Richard himself, one must agree with Mr. Swinburne, is too effeminately callous and treacherous for real sympathy with his misfortunes. The scenes with the Queen Mr. Swinburne discerns to be chiefly idyllic eclogues, leaning in their charm towards the model of Greene. Richard has some splendid lyric poetry: the soliloquy before his death recollects Marlowe, as the critic again says; and in the groom and John of Gaunt's pathetic death-bed speech we have the most dramatic things in the play. But, as a whole, it is "diffuse and exuberant," "elegiac and Ovidian," to use his excellent phrase.

We have touched but the main features of a fine criticism, marred by some rhetoric and the lust of comparison. Cannot Mr. Swinburne forget his King Charles's head—the Book of Job? Job and “Richard II.”—what an encounter!

Impressions.

XXIV.—“It is Well.”

As I walked towards the Cathedral a troop of girls, short-skirted, carrying hockey-sticks, passed me on their way to the meadows. On each head was a scarlet cap.

It was the hour for service, but from my seat I could not see those who officiated: a voice rolling through the aisles, and the responses of the choir was all I heard. What I saw was the soft colour that gleamed through the high rose window, the six lighted candles that flickered above the pulpit, and beyond, against the north door, the huddle of white monuments to the memory of the successful dead. Those pretentious memorials, with their life-size figures and complimentary angels, are not attractive at close quarters; but from where I sat they composed into a great indistinguishable mass of white, not without dignity. Details were gone. The lifted hands, the upraised heads still cried aloud of success, but over all had passed the reconciling hand of death. Still and very white they looked in the dim light.

These men died with Finis! written at the foot of the page: “we have deserved this” is stamped on every gesture of their carven figures. On the other side of the Cathedral, in the shadow, so close to me that I could almost touch it, was a monument that is nameless. Looking up I could just see the slender hands of the recumbent figure, palm touching palm in prayer, and beneath, on either side, two kneeling men in bronze. Their heads are bowed, their eyes are on the ground, and some chance has given to the face of one a likeness to a certain writer, and to the other a likeness to a certain musician.

To each, on a day, failure came. One accepted defeat saying “It is well,” the other laughed at his failure, began again, and passed on to greater triumphs. Episodes in their lives came back to me that afternoon so vividly that when the preacher stepped into the pulpit I heard no more than the text: “Come, now, and let us reason together, saith the Lord: though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow.” One, the writer, had set his heart upon a certain subject—“to revise that prodigious range of literature, patristic and classical, of which Erasmus was the editor.” He abstained for twenty-five years, and then a strange longing for those books returned. But it was not to be, owing to a dispute in his congregation “about the hymn-book” that robbed him of rest and peace. “So I restored the eleven tall folios to the shelf and tied up the memoranda. . . . It is well.”

The other kneeling figure suggests the brooding forehead and deep eyes of Beethoven, and recalls a slight, but significant episode in his musical life. He was composing his Symphony No. 8 in F., and—I quote from an analytical examination of this symphony: “He is commencing the Coda as usual with a passage similar to the beginning of the working-out, when all at once the absurdity of so doing seems to strike him. He gives two hearty laughs (in the Basses), makes a pause, and goes off with an entirely fresh idea.”

The congregation moved, and I with them, past the huddle of white monuments towards the door. The hockey team was returning from the meadow. The flushed faces of the girls matched their scarlet caps.

Drama.

A Romance and a Comedy.

I AM not, of course, surprised that humanity should err, because that is, as the Latin grammar taught us, part of the definition. But I own that I am occasionally surprised at the precise methods of error which it selects for itself. In particular I do not understand why Mr. Ganthony, in writing “The Prophecy,” which is now being played at the Avenue Theatre, should have fallen into traps which one would have imagined that any man of intelligence, who had reflected for half an hour on the conditions of dramatic presentation, would have had the sense to avoid. The idea on which “The Prophecy” is built up is flagrantly, and from the beginning, not a dramatic one. I do not, as a matter of fact, think that it has any vitality in it at all; but in any case it has none that can for a moment endure contact with the inevitable literalism of the stage. It is a kind of translation into the spiritual world of Siamese twinning. The souls of Daniel and David Lundier are supposed to be so closely knit together, that when Winelfin falls in love with one of them she must needs fall in love with both, and a tragic tale is started that only ends with her death. Such a theme is, to begin with, hopelessly unreal. There is nothing which answers to it in the actual psychology of twinning; and though a woman may very well be in love with two men at once, and the analysis of the situation might furnish forth the stuff of many plays, it is obviously a dissimilarity rather than a similarity of soul which is likely to be the point of departure. Mr. Ganthony, in fact, is not starting from psychology at all, but from a strange kind of folk-lore guess at the structure of the spiritual world, such as could only find its proper literary treatment in a plain fairy tale or in some morbid and artificial romance of the La Motte Fouqué school. On the stage only the shadowy method of a Maeterlinck could make it plausible, and Maeterlinck would not condescend to anything so puerile and untrue. Certainly, in Mr. Ganthony's straightforward and somewhat crudely constructed romantic drama, it is not plausible in the very least. The spiritual identity of the twins fails to maintain itself, and all you get is a buxom lady of a most coming-on disposition, who flings herself rather shamelessly at the heads of both brothers, carries on a sort of Box and Cox intrigue with them in a shady corner of her ancestral woods, and finally kills herself in order to avoid the difficulty of choosing between them. I must confess to having found the piece extremely tedious and quite lacking in the glamour of romance.

The third production of the Stage Society for the present season was “The Two Mr. Wetherbys,” by Mr. St. John Hankin, whose pen is, I believe, not unknown in the agreeable pages of “Punch.” I am sorry, by the way, to learn that the promised performances of “Aglavaine and Selysette” are not, after all, to come off. But I do not wonder, for to find an adequate representative of the subtle Aglavaine would tax even the considerable supply of talent which appears to be always at the disposal of the Stage Society. Heijerman's “The Good Hope” is to be substituted. “The Two Mr. Wetherbys” did not exactly give one a new thrill, but it is a competent play, and comes fairly up to the tolerably high standard set by its predecessors. Mr. Hankin calls it a “middle-class comedy,” and prints on the playbill the undeniably true statement that “Life is a comedy to those who think, a tragedy to those who feel.” I believe that I have said something of the same sort myself in these columns. And what is the precise thought about life which Mr. Hankin, through the medium of a humour that, if not absolutely compelling, is at least not uninviting, desires to insinuate into our understandings? I am not quite sure that Mr. Walkley would not, if he dared, call the piece une comédie rosse. The moral of it appears to be the rather cynical one, that married life is likely to go all the smoother if you do not pitch the ideals too high. I daresay this may be so, but I am rather disposed to think that so strictly didactic a form of literature as comedy ought to suppress the fact. James and Richard Wetherby have married two sisters, Margaret and Constantia. These ladies belong to a strait-laced family, and they are scandalised at the idea that a husband may occasionally desire to indulge in an evening of modest dissipation at a card-party or a music-hall in London. Is not this particular ideal of domestic virtue, by the way, a little obsolescent, even in Norwood? Both brothers have a fancy for such delights. Richard indulges them openly, and a separation from Constantia is the result. James spends hypocritical days in the tedious society of prim Aunt Clara and pietistic cousin Robert, and escapes at night under the pretence of going to his club or of attending missionary meetings. An accident leads to the discovery of his guilt. His virtuous reputation crumbles into nothing. Margaret resolves to follow the noble example of her sister Constantia, and to leave him. Meanwhile Constantia has found her life apart from her husband, in a small house and on a small income, by no means a bed of roses. She is led to the conclusion that it is the part of a wife to forgive, proposes to Richard to forgive him, and is met with an ignominious refusal. Richard is very comfortable as he is, and has no wish to be forgiven. Ultimately, however, he becomes the deus ex machina. He points out to Margaret the moral of her sister's mistake, reduces her to tears and to wifely submission, and reconciles her to her husband. She, in her turn, persuades him to take Constantia back again. Aunt Clara and cousin Robert are sent to the right-about, and a new prospect of wedded happiness opens for the two Mr. Wetherbys, in which their harmless little dissipations are to be very properly winked at. Mr. Hankin's play is well put together, and the local colour of Norwood puritanism is neatly enough touched. I did not find it quite so verbally felicitous as some of my neighbours appeared to do. But what I am most amazed at is that it should have been thought necessary to have it produced by the Stage Society. There is no obvious reason why it should not hold its own well enough in the rough-and-tumble of the commercial stage. There are no unpleasant socialistic or pro-Boer tendencies about it. Nor does it present those literary subtleties of thought or style which require an education of the public before they can be appreciated. It is neither symbolist nor pessimist. It is just an ordinary entertaining comedy, like many which have their little measure of success and cease to be. From the Stage Society one is surely justified in expecting something a little more eccentric.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Spring Novelties.

THERE is a story of a girl, an impressionist painter, to whom a friendly oculist, having shaken his head over the condition of her eyes, presented a pair of glasses. She wore them, and for the first time saw detail and outline. When the oculist met her again her eyes were glassless. He asked the reason. Whereupon she answered that the look of nature to her naked vision—blurred, indistinct, mysterious—was much more beautiful than the normal vision given her by the corrective glasses.

Certain painters, either from a natural aberration of vision, or from intention, see nature as through a darkened glass. Sometimes, like Le Sidaner, they see her only from one aspect. To the spring exhibition at the Goupil Gallery this French painter sends eight pictures. They are very distinctive, quite unlike anybody else's work, and as different from the scenes of our present life as a play by Maeterlinck. Le Sidaner, judging by these eight pictures, lives in a place where it is always twilight, where the ground is snow-covered, where water lies, and lighted windows gleam eternally through the pale air. Where there is no snow in his picture he still sees nature in terms of whiteness. His presentment of "Le Table" is such as a man strolling by moonlight through a French village might see in a villa garden. But if he were not Le Sidaner he could only see it in this way if he were suffering from cataract. In the garden is a table on which are displayed white crockery and white chrysanthemums on a white cloth, and against the table are white chairs—dream chairs, beautifully drawn, looming out from the mist that envelopes the scene. It is a decorative subject, not a transcript from life. Indeed, life as represented by Le Sidaner is inanimate. Human beings do not worry his pictures. One of the most attractive is "Chartres Cathedral," snow-covered, standing above her white winding roads, her lighted windows the only signs of life in a scene of beautiful desolation. Le Sidaner is the painter of silence.

The collection of pictures where he hangs ghost-like may be called an exhibition of Spring Novelties. A page of the catalogue is allocated to the names and habitations of the new exhibitors at the Goupil Gallery, where art has always been cosmopolitan—Cossaar of Amsterdam, Downie of Glasgow, Lebourg of Paris, Le Sidaner of Paris, Petrie of Glasgow, Webster of Lincoln. A star against the pictures indicate that they have been painted in Raffaelli's new colours, and I can only repeat my opinion that the new colours will have an inappreciable effect on the old method of painting. Turn from these vivid, pastel suggestive productions to Harpignies' reposeful, reasoned landscapes called "Morning" and "Evening," and you will appreciate the difference between the methods of to-day and yesterday. Mr. Bertram Priestman is one of the most successful practitioners with the Raffaelli colours. His "Cocklers, Solway Sands," is moist and fresh, and from a discreet distance has all the charm of oil painting.

There may be differences of opinion as to the period of his career at which a young painter should begin to exhibit, but everyone will agree that the pictures and designs he shows to the public should be a rigorous selection from his best work. Of the forty-five paintings, pastels, drawings and etchings shown by Mr. Augustus E. John at the Carfax Gallery, I submit that two-thirds should never have left his portfolio. He is still in the imitative period. Looking at the curious mixture of attempts that bewilders the eye on the walls of this gallery, you say: Ah! that was inspired by Goya, that by Etty, that by "Simplicissimus" or "Gil Blas," that by one of the Greek portraits in the vestibule of the National Gallery. Apparently the last thing that Mr. John and the members of his school desire is to produce a beautiful design. He will give you passages that the eye lingers on with pleasure, but almost every painting or pastel is disfigured by some exaggeration or youthful prank. His "Mumpers" is masterly in colour, and has a welcome boldness of execution, but it is spoilt by the figure of a boy who, if he was not intended to represent an idiot, certainly looks like one. His "In the Fields," two peasants, a man and a woman, tearing at each other, looks like a gross caricature of Millet's "Angelus." His "In Memoriam," a drawing of a group of mourners round a tomb, has such a flippancy about it that I can only suppose the high spirits of youth tempted him to make a burlesque of a solemn subject. Still, Mr. John has plenty of talent and imagination, and the man who could produce "Certain Bohemians," the etching of an "Old Man," and the graceful drawing of the child and the woman's shoulders in "Hark, Hark, the Lark!" is versatile as well as capable. But he is in too great a hurry. His stage is that of the experimentalist, and experiments should not be flashed before the public eye, even if they are novelties.

Mr. John is clever and daring. Mr. Byam Shaw is also clever and daring, and never did he dare more daringly than when he consented to illustrate Shakespeare for Messrs. Bell and Son's Chiswick edition. When artists of a remoter day—Maclise, Gilbert, Orchardson, and Gérôme—illustrated Shakespeare for Messrs. Virtue they undertook a task within human power. To each was apportioned but three or four drawings, and each could anticipate a spacious page for the setting forth of his design. Mr. Byam Shaw set out to illustrate the whole of Shakespeare with the consciousness that each drawing would be reproduced on a page under four-and-a-half inches by three. The originals of the one hundred and twelve designs which he made for the Chiswick Shakespeare may now be seen on the walls of Mr. McQueen's galleries in the Haymarket. Granting the impossibility of the task of illustrating the whole of Shakespeare, a task in which M. Gérôme and Mr. Abbey have approached nearest to success, it is astonishing that Mr. Byam Shaw should have done so well. He has followed the decorative ideal, which was wise, and perhaps unconsciously he has been influenced by the modern method of representing Shakespeare on the stage, with its appeal to the eye rather than to the intellect. Figures Mr. Shaw gives us in abundance, but they are not the living characters of Shakespeare. His "I am dying, Egypt, dying" is the stage scene, no more; his Hamlet crying "Still am I call'd. Unhand me, gentlemen," is grotesque; with some of the minor characters he is more successful, with the gaoler in "Measure for Measure," and with his "Petrucio is Coming" from "The Taming of the Shrew."

Size is the novelty at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours, where over six hundred drawings are offered for the edification of the public. There are half-a-dozen drawings in this collection which would not look amiss among the oils at the Royal Academy. In Mr. Dudley Hardy's forcible fishing smack picture there are no fewer than thirty figures; in Mr. Lee Hankey's sober Maeterlinckian landscape there is a whole country side outstretched with a full length figure of a dead mother, and a living child in the foreground; in Mr. Charles Dixon's brilliant sea-piece we are presented with nothing less than the Battle of Trafalgar, with the "Victory" crashing under the stern of "Bucentaure"; in Mr. John Hassall's "The Morning of Agincourt," the figures are countless. There is capable work in each of these pictures, but I cannot say that either of them is attractive. Mr. Hassall's "Agincourt" is commendably reticent in colour, and his hard, watchful warriors have character. For the rest the exhibition is much as other years. How many times have I seen the return of a fishing fleet, a monastery terrace, a way across the common, and an Alma-Tadema woman on an Alma-Tadema marble bench. The allegorical picture is still in the hands of the few. To them comes a clever recruit—Mr. Frank Reynolds, with his "Truth the Straggler." Against a gold background, hasten, in pursuit of an attractive illusion, some twentieth century types—priest, soldier, woman of fashion, musician, jockey (his face, oddly, has the noblest look of them all), and behind lags the boy Truth, led by a jester.

This exhibition also contains three hundred and eighty-seven miniatures.

C. L. H.

Science.

Healing by Ether-Waves.

THE possibility of the need of healing arises, of course, from the ether-wave. By the most familiar form of it, which we call sunlight, we live. It supplies us with our main form of fuel—"buried sunshine"—and it affords us our own fuel or food, which under its influence is synthesized for us by the chlorophyll of plants, and is thereafter analysed and utilised by us in the form either of the bodies of dead plants or the bodies of animals which have, in the long run, derived their food from plants. The reafforestation of the Black Country, recently initiated by Sir Oliver Lodge, is therefore a service rendered to posterity. To this form of the ether-wave we owe not only the immediate origin of our existence, but our continuance therein. Sunlight is a necessary for health. It is a most powerful factor in the prevention and the cure of our principal disease, tuberculosis. We therefore build our houses for the reception of the ether-waves that reach us from the south. And of late we have taken the matter into our own hands.

The London Hospital has been the pioneer in this country of the treatment by light of the exceedingly common form of tuberculosis that attacks the skin and is known as lupus. That treatment we owe to a young Dane called Finsen; and its successful employment in London largely to Her Majesty the Queen, who is naturally interested in her young countryman's fame. Finsen selects from the radiation of an electric arc of sixty-five thousand candle power those ether-waves near and beyond the violet end of the spectrum. The red and infra-red rays, which would otherwise inflict a frightful burn, he absorbs by a layer of cold water running between the two layers of a lens of rock-crystal whereby the light is focussed upon the lupoid area. The treatment is protracted and expensive; but it is painless and certain, and its results are unequalled for appearance. Lupus is due to local skin infection and therefore attacks exposed parts, especially the face. Hence the value of a method which leaves a skin surface that is all but perfect. In this respect the X-rays, which also cure lupus, are much inferior. The other day Lord Rayleigh gave the scientific imprimatur to a new form of lamp of which one thought it worth while to suggest the trial at the "London"; which is being made. It is known as the Mercury Vapour Lamp, since the light is emitted from the vapour of mercury in a vacuum through which an electric current is passed. This is the most economical of all forms of electric light, its efficiency being double that of even the arc light. Its peculiarity, which makes one's face a blue no less than ghastly, is the entire absence of red rays. Since the famous experiment of Herschell we have known that the red are the hot rays. This light, the spectrum of which contains only a violet, a blue and a green, is therefore a cool light. It is also rich in ultra-violet rays. We have therefore a light which consists entirely of the chemical or actinic rays—the very rays which kill the tubercle bacillus and thereby cure lupus. Its cheapness and precise adaptation to the Finsen treatment may, I hope, enable the London Hospital, out of its honourable poverty, to afford to cure more patients than ever.

Still more striking is the therapeutic power of another form of ethereal vibration, the Röntgen ray—light of short wave-length. Everyone knows that it reveals bullets and needles. Some have heard that it is a very fair depilatory. But it is better news that one form of true cancer cannot survive the Röntgen rays. I must weigh my words. Anything like rash statement on this matter is sheer cruelty. At this moment no more can be said than that "rodent cancer" or "rodent ulcer" is now being consistently, surely, and painlessly cured every day

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

READY SHORTLY.—PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

AMERICA AT WORK.By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

Price 6s.

A Fourth Impression of Mr. J. FOSTER FRASER'S THE REAL SIBERIA is now on Sale. Price 6s.

VOL. IV. Ready Shortly, with upwards of 500 Illustrations and 10 Coloured Plates, of the

ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF SOCIAL ENGLAND.By EMINENT WRITERS.Edited by H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L., & J. S. MANN, M.A.

Vol. 4, price 14s. net, covers the Period from 1603 to 1714.

IMPORTANT NEW NOVELS.

READY SHORTLY.

JOHN GAYTHER'S GARDEN.By FRANK STOCKTON.

With Eight Full-page Illustrations. Price 6s.

AN APRIL PRINCESS.By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.

Price 6s.

THE DUKE DECIDES.By HEADON HILL.

With Eight Full-page Illustrations. Price 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY REVEL.By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH (Q.).

Price 6s.

N.B.—A Popular Edition of

THE LITTLE MINISTER,By J. M. BARRIE;

reset in new type, with Eight Full-page Illustrations, will be published on MARCH 27.

Price 3s. 6d.

NOW READY.

THE THIRD AND CONCLUDING VOLUME OF LIVING LONDON.Edited by GEORGE R. SIMS.

Containing upwards of 450 Illustrations from specially executed Photographs and Original Drawings by leading Artists.

Cloth, price 12s., or in half-leather, 16s.

NOW READY.

VOLUME III. OF THE NATION'S PICTURES.

A Selection from the most modern Paintings in the Public Picture Galleries of Great Britain. Containing 48 Pictures, REPRODUCED IN COLOUR by the latest and most perfect process of Chromo-photography.

Cloth, price 12s., or in half-leather, 15s.

A SIXPENNY EDITION OF

CUPID'S GARDEN,By ELLEN THORNEYCROFT FOWLER,

IS NOW ON SALE.

PART I. READY MARCH 25,

Price 6d. net, of

FAMILIAR WILD BIRDS.By W. SWAYSLAND.

With Notes on Birds' Eggs by R. KEARTON, F.Z.S., and Beautiful Coloured Plates by ARCHIBALD THORBURN and Others.

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LONDON;

And all Booksellers.

DUCKWORTH & Co.THE ORRERY PAPERS. By the COUNTESS OF OORK and ORRERY. 2 vols. demy 8vo. With numerous Portraits in Photogravure. 42s. net. [Ready shortly.]TOM WEDGWOOD, THE FIRST PHOTOGRAPHER: an Account of his Life, his Discovery, and his Friendship with SAMUEL TAYLOR COLERIDGE, including the letters of Coleridge to the Wedgwoods, and an Examination of the Accounts of Alleged Earlier Photographic Discoveries. By R. B. LICHFIELD. Demy 8vo. With Ten Illustrations. 8s. net. [Ready now.]MICHAEL ANGELO BUONARROTI. By CHARLES HOLROYD, Curator of the National Gallery of British Art. With Fifty-Two Illustrations. Pott 4to. 7s. 6d. net. The First Volume in a New Series. [Ready now.]CHELSEA OLD CHURCH. By RANDALL DAVIES, F.S.A. With Preface by HERBERT P. HORNE. Twelve Illustrations in Collotype, and a Photogravure Frontispiece. Edition limited to Three Hundred and Twenty Copies for sale. 52s. 6d. net. [Ready shortly.]CHURCH DISCIPLINE: An Ethical Study of the Church of Rome. By JOSEPH MCCABE, Author of "St. Augustine and his Age," "Peter Abélard," &c. Crown 8vo. 3s. net. [Shortly.]A GIRL AMONG THE ANARCHISTS. By ISOBEL MEREDITH. Crown 8vo. With Frontispiece. 6s. [Shortly.]

"EVERY ONE IS READING"

REFLECTIONS OF AMBROSINE. By ELINOR GLYN. Coloured Frontispiece. 6s. "She is at this moment our leading novelist of modern manners."—Sphere.THE JOY OF LIVING. By HERMANN SUDERMANN. Translated by EDITH WHARTON, Author of "A Gift from the Grave." Crown 8vo. 4s. 6d. net. [Just out.]IN DUCKWORTH'S "GREENBACK LIBRARY."*BUSH STUDIES. By BARBARA BAYNTON. Paper, 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net. [Now ready.]ROSSLYN'S RAID. By BEATRICE HELEN BARMBY. Paper, 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net. [Just out.]A NEW BOOK. By HILAIRE BELLOC, Author of "The Path to Rome," &c. Paper, 1s. 6d. net; cloth, 2s. net. [Shortly.]CROPPIES LIE DOWN: A Tale of Ireland in '98. By WILLIAM BUCKLEY. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Just out.]"To speak frankly, this is a book which can only be commended with a grave caution. It treats of a period in which the worst human passions raged unchecked; and it deals with them in a spirit of relentless candour. . . . The story is instinct with a passionate love of Ireland."—Spectator. "A book which compels, moves, and leaves with us an impression of sinister actuality."—Academy.THE PRINCESS OF HANOVER. By MARGARET L. WOODS, Author of "A Village Tragedy." Crown 8vo, 6s. net."The most notable addition to the literary drama in the past year."—Spectator. "The book I have read with most interest and pleasure in the year," says THOMAS HARDY in the Academy, "is Mrs. Margaret Wood's 'The Princess of Hanover'."THE FRENCH IMPRESSIONISTS.By CAMILLE MAUCLAIR.

FIFTY Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. net; leather, 2s. 6d. net.

"ART BOOKS TO BUY. WELL-WRITTEN, POCKET-SIZED BOOKS, LAVISHLY ILLUSTRATED," says the OUTLOOK of "DUCKWORTH'S POPULAR LIBRARY OF ART."ROSSETTI. By F. M. HUEFFER. 50 Illustrations.DÜRER. By L. ECKENSTEIN. 37 Illustrations.REMBRANDT. By AUGUSTE BRÉAL. 60 Illustns.FRED WALKER. By C. BLACK. 33 Illustrations.MILLET. By ROMAIN ROLLAND. 32 Illustrations.

3, HENRIETTA STREET, COVENT GARDEN, W.C.

all the world over by the application of the Röntgen rays. More may well follow.

Yet another form of ether-wave is of value to the therapist. Upon no subject of which I am aware has been and is such arrant nonsense talked. "Electricity is life," says one fatuous phrase. It is possible to sell "electric rings" and "electric belts" and "electric herbs" in London in 1903. Not so long ago there was a system which dealt out blue and yellow electricity. Many people still place an implicit belief—none the less real though incapable of verbal formulation—in the theory suggested by Galvani, the discoverer of animal electricity, and exploded by his contemporary, Volta, that electricity is the "vital fluid." A reference to this supposed occult form of energy, about which Sir Oliver Lodge has said that we know more than we do about matter, is the favourite resource of the magician, the occultist and the quack. The black cat's fur is supposed to hold, in its electrical discharges, secrets almost equal to those which Tennyson perceived the "flower in the crannied wall" to hide. As a matter of fact, electricity, compared with the simplest of the phenomena of life, is simplicity itself. But the reaction of living matter to electricity is a very complex affair, and, despite the "rings" and "belts," this form of ether-vibration is of much therapeutic value. Galvanism is valuable in preserving or restoring the nutrition of paralysed muscles. It aids absorption of any desired drug by the skin. It may be used to modify the blood supply to any part. Faradism stimulates the sensory nerves of the skin throughout; galvanism only at the moments of making and breaking the current. Faradism may therefore be used as a stimulant, and, under certain circumstances, as a disciplinary agent. High-frequency apparatus is much in vogue in France; but, as a matter of fact, the therapeutic value of electricity—by which I do not, of course, include the Röntgen radiation—is much smaller than is commonly supposed.

We are in deep water in attempting to explain the action of these different forms of ether-vibration upon protoplasm. We recognise that sunlight may be converted into heat by impact upon ordinary forms of matter. We know that on the faded day when men need "fear no more the heat o' the sun," the race is near its end; but it is also certain that ether-vibration has upon the living cell an effect which is quite distinct from its heating power. The facts may thus be summed in their lowest terms; but the "why" is not even approached therein. When certain forms of vibration are communicated to the ether which is omnipresent throughout a cancerous cell, or the tubercle bacillus (a plant without chlorophyll), these die. When, on the other hand, the ether of a chlorophyll-containing cell in the green leaf of a plant, has communicated to it the vibrations, 750 billions to the second, of a wave which left the sun eight minutes before, that cell can snatch carbon from its firm embrace with oxygen, and in so doing, can make man possible. And so one must leave off with a nescient shrug of the shoulders.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

Shakespeare's Birthplace.

SIR,—It may interest your readers to know that if the proposed spoliation of Henley Street and the demolition of ancient houses should be carried out to make room for a brand-new "Carnegie," a veritable landmark of Shakespeare's time will be ruthlessly destroyed in at least one of the old buildings referred to. Its record, as proved by existing leases, is as follows: In 1563, a year before Shakespeare's birth, the dwelling was occupied by one Gilbert Bradley, glover; in 1577, it passed to one William Wilson, and a small part of it being damaged by fire, this individual got a "removal of lease," on easier terms, to enable him to put the place right again, on December 16, 1595. On 17 August, 1610, it passed to a Thomas Greene of Bishopton, yeoman, and it is suggested that this personage may have been Shakespeare's own cousin, who was also a Thomas Greene. In 1615 and 1618, the same Thomas Greene, with Elizabeth his wife, renewed the lease of the house, and on 6 July, 1662, we find it in the possession of "Thomas Greene, the elder, gent." The place has, therefore, the merit of having stood where it is now, through the whole of Shakespeare's life-time, and deserves to be spared. But that vandalism is the rule rather than the exception in Stratford (or has been, up to the present) will be realised by the fact that though an Act of Parliament exists (54 Vict. Ch. III.) whereby the "Trustees and Guardians" are told that they "shall purchase" the "house at Wilmcote, known as the house of Mary Arden, Shakespeare's mother," as well as "all other property" known or believed "to have belonged to Shakespeare, or his wife, parents and relations," such purchase has never been attempted in the case of Mary Arden's home, for the quaint old cottage has been turned into three cheap "tenement dwellings," and its former rustic and picturesque beauty utterly destroyed. If the lovers and students of Shakespeare do not step forward to protect and save the few remaining relics of their great Master, who is to guard them for future generations?—Yours, &c.,

MARIE CORELLI.

Stratford-on-Avon.

"Later Lyrics."

SIR,—I would ask of your kindness to let me say that the content of "Later Lyrics" was determined by Mr. Lane and his literary advisers. It is they that were over-indulgent, not I. It is strange that the critics find best in my work what I tamper with least.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN B. TABB.

Charles College, Ellicott City, Maryland, U.S.A.

"Mediæval French Literature."

SIR,—With regard to your French correspondent's remarks about "Mediæval French Literature," written for us and at our suggestion by the late lamented Gaston Paris, we have simply to state:—

Firstly, that the book was written by M. Gaston Paris for this particular series of 1s. Primers.

Secondly, that he fully understood for what purpose he was writing it.

Thirdly, that he had seen, by his own desire, many months before he had finished writing the book, copies of the volumes of the series.

We have had frequent correspondence with Miss Lynch about this book, and this is the first occasion that she has for a moment insinuated that there was the least breach in our agreement either with herself or with M. Gaston Paris.—Yours, &c.,

J. M. DENT.

Aldine House, 29 and 30 Bedford Street,
Covent Garden, W.C.

Mr. JOHN LONG'S NEW BOOKS

New Six Shilling Novels

FUGITIVE ANNE. By Mrs. CAMPBELL PRAED, Author of "The Scourge Stick," &c. [Ready.]

AN OUTSIDER'S YEAR. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "The House on the Marsh," &c. [Ready.]

CRIMSON LILIES. By MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "A Daughter of England," &c. [Ready.]

MISTLETOE MANOR. By HUME NISBET, Author of "Bail Up," &c. Illustrated. [Ready.]

BY THAMES AND TIBER. By Mrs. AYLMER GOWING, Author of "As Caesar's Wife," &c. [Ready.]

THE SHUTTERS OF SILENCE. By G. B. BURGIN, Author of "A Wilful Woman," &c. [Ready.]

THE WORLD MASTERS. By GEORGE GRIFFITH, Author of "The Angel of the Revolution," &c. [Ready.]

AN UNWISE VIRGIN. By Mrs. COULSON KERNAHAN, Author of "Trewinnot of Guy's," &c. [Ready.]

THE CAR OF PHOEBUS. By ROBERT JAMES LEES, Author of "The Heretic," &c. [Ready.]

THE PARISH DOCTOR. By ALEC COOK, a new Author. [Ready.]

THE LAST FORAY. By R. H. FORSTER, a new Author. [Ready.]

THE MAGNETIC GIRL. By RICHARD MARSH, Author of "The Beetle," &c. (The Author's Longest Novel.) [Ready.]

THE JADE EYE. By FERGUS HUME, Author of "The Mystery of a Hansom Cab," &c. [Ready.]

THE ARCADIAN. By J. S. FLETCHER, Author of "When Charles I. was King," &c. Illustrated by G. P. RHODES. [Ready.]

THE INDISCRETION OF GLADYS. By LUCAS CLEEVE, Author of "His Italian Wife," &c. [Ready.]

A WOMAN IN THE CITY. By HELEN BAYLISS. A New and Powerful Novel by a New Writer. [Shortly.]

THE MACHINATIONS OF JANET. By SARAH TYTLER, Author of "Citoyenne Jacqueline," &c. [Shortly.]

BENEATH THE VEIL. By AUKLINE SERGEANT, Author of "The Story of a Penitent Soul," &c. [Shortly.]

IN THE DAYS OF GOLDSMITH. By M. McD. BODKIN, K.C., Author of "Lord Edward Fitzgerald," &c. [Shortly.]

SWEET "DOLL" OF MADDON HALL. By J. E. MUDDOCK, Author of "A Woman's Checkmate," &c. [At Press.]

HIS MASTER PURPOSE. By HAROLD BINDLOSS, Author of "Ainslie's Ju-ju," &c. [At Press.]

THRALDOM. By HELEN PROTHERO-LEWIS, Author of "Hooks of Steel," &c. [At Press.]

THE BATON SINISTER. By GEORGE GILBERT, Author of that fine Historical Novel, "In the Shadow of the Purple." [At Press.]

THE BURDEN OF HER YOUTH. By Mrs. L. T. MEADE, Author of "Confessions of a Court Milliner," &c. [At Press.]

New Six Shilling Novels—continued.

REMEMBRANCE. By Mrs. LOVETT CAMERON, Author of "Midsummer Madness," &c. [At Press.]

THE TRUST TRAPPERS. By HUME NISBET, Author of "Mistletoe Manor," &c. Illustrated. [At Press.]

No. 3, THE SQUARE. By FLORENCE WARDEN, Author of "An Outsider's Year," &c. [In preparation.]

PARTNERS THREE. By MAY CROMMELIN, Author of "Crimson Lilies," &c. [In preparation.]

THE STOLEN EMPEROR. By Mrs. HUGH FRASER, Author of "A Diplomatist's Wife in Japan," &c. [In preparation.]

New Three and Sixpenny Novels

DEAD CERTAINTIES. By NATHANIEL GUBBINS, Author of "Pick-Me-Ups," &c. [Ready.]

UP TO-MORROW. By W. CARTER PLATTS, Author of "Papa, Limited," &c. Seventy Illustrations by the Author. [Shortly.]

ALL THE WINNERS. By NATHANIEL GUBBINS, Author of "Dead Certainties," &c. [Shortly.]

GENERAL LITERATURE

SIDELIGHTS ON CONVICT LIFE. By GEORGE GRIFFITH, Author of "In an Unknown Prison Land," &c. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 6s. [Nearly Ready.]

THE UNCONQUERABLE COLONY: Some Episodes of Ulster in the Seventeenth Century. By JAMES HENRY COCHRANE, M.A. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

ETIQUETTE AND ENTERTAINING. By Mrs. L. HEATON ARMSTRONG, Author of "Etiquette for Girls," "Good Form," "Letters to a Bride," &c. Long 12mo, rounded edges, cloth, 1s. [Ready.]

JOHN LONG'S SIXPENNY LIBRARY OF COPYRIGHT NOVELS

The following will appear during 1903:—

THE SIN OF HAGAR	(Mar.)	HELEN MATHERS.
THE LOVELY MRS. PEMBERTON	(April)	FLORENCE WARDEN.
AN ILL WIND	(April)	Mrs. LOVETT CAMERON.
WOMAN—THE SPHINX	(May)	FERGUS HUME.
A BEAUTIFUL REBEL	(June)	ERNEST GLANVILLE.
THE FUTURE OF PHYLLIS	(July)	ADELINE SERGEANT.
IN SUMMER SHADE	(Aug.)	MARY E. MANN.
SOMETHING IN THE CITY	(Sept.)	FLORENCE WARDEN.
THE JUGGLER AND THE SOUL	(Oct.)	HELEN MATHERS.
THE GOLDEN WANG-HO	(Nov.)	FERGUS HUME.

* * * Kindly write to-day for Mr. John Long's Complete Catalogue and the Complete List of his famous Sixpenny Novels.

London: JOHN LONG, 13 & 14, Norris St., Haymarket (late of 6, Chandos St., Strand).

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 182 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best description of "My Luncheon Hour." Thirty-eight replies have been sent in. We award the prize to Mr. A. E. Coppard, 27, Gladstone Place, Brighton, for the following:—

My diary, containing little more than records of those periods and notes of books, might be called "A Journal of Luncheon Hours." Set at the extreme north corner of the town our building ends where the fields and roads begin, with ploughed lands further north, east and west, and it is my happiness for one daily hour to note the changing temper of the down land, trees burgeoning, and cattle in fenced meadows; amongst the broad backs of short hills, weather stained and scattered over with sheep, in valleys deep and beneficently green. My land, as I love to call it, has grown to have the sweet quality of companions, and as it were caresses one's mood, or gay or sorry, with naive inexplicable touches. An entry last July runs: "Summer has come to its own again, the noon sun burns strongly, and the larks have a gamut of God. Your sweating body greets gladly the boon of the white topping cloud; very trim in the faint grass smile the last new flowers—the hillside is many-coloured as a Paisley shawl." Later in the year, October: "to Hodshrove; the day is full of hesitating rain and the landscape wants distinction—it seems so unchanging, so disconsolate and bare a verity, lit sometimes, but not to-day, by a heart-gleam of sun and colour, or ploughed at intervals, as it is to-day, to new tones of raw brown. I meet the same jolly-faced old cattleman driving townwards at the same hour and place each day, and I envy him; I lack something I know not what; the grass grows longer and the umbrage discolours—like my own life I think." In less fortunate days I passed my hour generally in the public library or art gallery, but these places know me no more.

Other replies follow:—

My luncheon hour is not really an hour at all, it is only twenty minutes, but what's in a name? I work in a Government office with a few hundred other women, and we lunch, or dine, or do the bun-and-tea trick in shifts of thirty minutes minus ten fully occupied with a wash and a gossip. A victim of indigestion? Why, I never even feel sleepy; that is one advantage of sitting so close to the Principal Clerk in the Section. I do know a girl who always feels the need of forty winks, but she has a desk far away from the watchful eye of her superior-in-charge, so she is entitled to some compensation, poor thing! Cheap lunches form one of the great attractions of the service; for the small sum of 8½d. one can get an excellent dinner, meat (foreign? certainly not, aliens excluded by law) and vegetables and pudding, with coffee to follow, but smoking is not yet allowed. Of course it is a disadvantage to have to "dine in," but in the summer the good, kind Government, alias "They" with a capital T, let us walk on the roof and provides an attendant to see that we do not wander beyond bounds, for real live men sun themselves on the tiles on the off-side—sometimes; not often though, for they are allowed a few minutes to take a turn in the park after lunch. Does a bell ring when it is time for us to go back to work? Oh, no! With watch in hand we keep an eye on the fleeting moments of freedom, and as the second-hand starts on its 30th round we wend our way back to our seats and resume duty like—women! [E. A. B., London.]

Three years ago I anxiously paced the Midland Station platform, Sheffield, awaiting an express train from St. Pancras. I was expecting to meet a man whom I had never seen in my life; that man was my father. For twenty years he had shirked the duties of fatherhood, and now he wanted to see his boy; that wish was gratified for the sake of another. With a hiss of escaping steam the clanging express drew up alongside of the platform; doors swung open, passengers alighted, and for a few minutes all was commotion, then as the crowd rapidly diminished I threaded my way along the platform disordered with luggage seeking this man I knew not. We met, and to this hour I cannot quite understand how we guessed each other. After the formality of shaking hands and enquiries regarding health, he led the way to the station dining room, I following, and there we had luncheon. For more than a hour I conversed with a man respectfully, whom I inwardly despised. Both of us ill at ease, both seeking words only to hide the self-communing; yet gaps yawned refusing to be crossed, and during those gaps we stared stupidly. Before we had met I had worked myself into a fever of exaltation, fully intending to speak my mind, and here I was nervous, unable to find a word, regarding stealthily an utter stranger and despicable. The feeling of stiffness relaxed, and growing calmer, master of myself, I sought inwards for those missing links which should have connected us, and I curiously wondered what a fatherly father would be like. When we parted, he slipped five pounds in my hand with a look as if stealing it. That was my luncheon hour. [P. A., Hexthorpe.]

Competition No. 183 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the titles of the twelve most interesting books announced in our Supplement this week. A plébiscite will be taken of all the lists sent in, and the competitor whose selections most nearly answer to the general opinion will receive the prize.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 25 March, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Waddell (Rev. P. Hatley), Essays on Faith (Blackwood) 3/6
Kittel (Prof.), The Babylonian Excavations and Early Bible History (S.P.O.K.) 0/6

POETRY, CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

Holmes (D. T.), An Outline of French Literature (Holden)
Dobell (Bertram), edited by, The Poetical Works of Thomas Traherne, B.D., 1636-1674 (Dobell) net 7/6
Dobell (Bertram), Sidelights on Charles Lamb (") net 5/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Furnley (James), Millionaires and Kings of Enterprise (Roy) net 21/0
Rushe (Rev. James P.), Carmel in Ireland (Sealy)
Lynch (George), The Impressions of a War Correspondent (Newnes) 3/6
Omond (G. W. T.), The Boers in Europe (Black) 2/6
Dixon (W. Willmott), Dainty Dames of Society. Vol. II. (Back) ret 2/0
Sims (George R.), Living London. Vol. III. (Cassell) 12/0
Fischer (Joseph), The Discoveries of the Norsemen in America (Stevens) net 8/0
Hassall (Arthur), Mazarin (Macmillan) 2/6
Horne (C. Silvester), A Popular History of the Free Churches (J. Clarke) 6/0
Weizall (Lady Rose), edited by, Correspondence of Lady Burghersh with the Duke of Wellington (Murray) net 7/6
Brandes (George), Poland: a Study of the Land, People, and Literature (Heinemann) net 12/0
Corbin (John), A New Portrait of Shakespeare (Lane) net 5/0
"The Connoisseur," Portfolio No. 2. Velasquez: His Life and Work (Otto) net 2/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Hilly (Carl), Happiness: Essays on the Meaning of Life (Macmillan) net 4/0
Davis (J. R. Ainsworth), The Natural History of Animals. 2 vols. (Gresham Publishing Company)
Legislator, The Coming Reaction (Milne) 7/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Wyon (Reginald) and France (Gerald), The Land of the Black Mountain (Methuen) 6/0
Gerrard (Wirt), Greater Russia (Heinemann) net 18/0

ART.

Deane (Ethel), edited by, The Collector (Oox)

MISCELLANEOUS.

Vynne (Nora) and Blackburn (Helen), Women under the Factory Act (Williams and Norgate) net 1/0

NOW READY, the FIRST NUMBER of THE BURLINGTON MAGAZINE FOR CONNOISSEURS. Illustrated.

CONTENTS:

Editorial Article.—The Burlington Magazine.
Alunno Di Domenico. BERNHARD BERENSON.
French Furniture of the Louis XIV. Period. EMILE MOLINIER.
The Early Painters of the Netherlands.—Article I. W. H. JAMES WALK.
Concerning Tinder-Boxes.—Article I. MILLER CHRISTY.
A Lost Adoration of the Magi. By SANDRO BOTTICELLI, HERBERT P. HORNE.
On Oriental Carpets.—Article I.
The Hotel de Lauzun. ROSE KINGSLEY and CAMILLE GRONKOWSKI.
The Date of Vincenzo Foppa's Death. C. JOCELYN FROULKES.
A Note on Five Portraits by John Downman, A.R.A. JULIA FRANKAU.
New Acquisitions at the National Museums.

Three Photographures, three Colour Plates, and thirty-two other plates, besides Illustrations in the text.

PRICE HALF-A-CROWN NET.

Annual Subscription (including Supplement), Thirty-five Shillings post free.

London:

THE SAVILE PUBLISHING Co., Ltd., 14, New Burlington Street, W.

Spring Supplement.

Mr. WM. HEINEMANN'S NEW BOOKS.

GREATER RUSSIA.

The Continental Empire of The Old World. By WIRT GERRARE. With a Map and nearly 100 Illustrations. 1 vol. 18s. net. Postage 6d.

POLAND.

A Study of the Land, People, and Literature. By GEORGE BRANDES. 1 vol. 12s. net. Postage 4d.

SHAKESPEARE AND HIS FORE-RUNNERS.

Studies in Elizabethan Poetry and its Development from Early English. By SIDNEY LANIER. Profusely Illustrated. 2 vols. 30s. net.

THE PLEASURES OF THE TABLE.

An Account of Gastronomy from Ancient Days to Present Times. By E. H. ELLWANGER. Profusely Illustrated. 1 vol. 12s. net. The Daily Telegraph.—"From beginning to end the book is vivacious and entertaining, and full of culinary lore."

THE ROMANCE OF MY CHILDHOOD AND YOUTH.

By MME. EDMOND ADAM. 1 vol. 7s. 6d.

The Times.—"The fact that Madame Adam is a very remarkable woman, and has in her time helped to make French history, lends added interest to this volume. Even were it written by an entirely unknown writer, it would be of value as giving an extra-darling vivid picture of upper middle-class life in the provincial France of the thirties and forties."

PENAL SERVITUDE. By LORD WILLIAM NEVILL (W.B.N.). 1 vol. 6s. [Third Impression.]

Truth.—"He narrates many interesting experiences, and throws a valuable light upon prison life. His testimony deserves the serious consideration of all concerned in prison administration."

THE DAINTY NATURE SERIES. Vol. I. 5s. net. CAMERA AND COUNTRYSIDE.

By A. RADCLYFFE DUGMORE. Illustrated from the Author's Photographs.

UNDINE. A Fairy Play. By W. L. COURTNEY. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

The Saturday Review.—"From first to last, pleasant to read, scholarly, imaginative sympathetic."

OBSERVATIONS BY MR. DOOLEY.

By F. P. DUNNE. 3s. 6d. [Second Impression.]

The Spectator.—"Mr. Dooley is now as established an institution on both sides of the Atlantic as Signor Marconi. He is a great humorist; his books are packed with true words spoken in jest. Americans and ourselves should be indeed grateful for this genial laughter-maker."

FICTION.

A CENTURY OF FRENCH ROMANCE.

Edited by EDMUND GOSSE. A Library Edition in 12 Volumes with colour plates, photogravures, and thumb-nail portraits. Demy 8vo, cloth extra, £4 4s. for the set, or separate volumes, 7s. 6d. each.

XII.—THE NABOB. By ALPHONSE DAUDET.

THE GREY WIG. Stories and Novelettes.

By ISRAEL ZANGWILL. 6s.

The Pall Mall Gazette.—"These eight stories contain much better reading than almost any eight novels."

RANSON'S FOLLY, and other Stories.

By HARDING DAVIS. 6s.

IN PICCADILLY. By BENJAMIN SWIFT. 6s.

The Times.—"The episode that does justice to Mr. Swift's great cleverness is the closing scene of a side issue which the author has treated consistently throughout; a brief moment in Piccadilly at night that is not easily to be forgotten."

THE STUMBLING-BLOCK. By EDWIN PUGH. 6s.

RICHARD ROSNY. By MAXWELL GRAY. 6s.

THE FETICH OF THE FAMILY. By EDITH BARNETT. 6s.

The Athenaeum.—"A thorough conscientious, painstaking piece of work, and a credit to its writer."

THEWS OF ENGLAND. By PATRICK VAUX. 3s. 6d.

The Morning Post.—"We need some good naval stories just now, and Mr. Vaux has made an excellent beginning. He has that intimate knowledge of life aboard ship without which the most imaginative writer would be helplessly at sea."

GODFREY MARTEN: Schoolboy. By CHARLES TURLEY. 3s. 6d. [Second Impression.]

Punch.—"Far and away the best and truest story of life at a Public School since the immortal 'Tom Brown.'"

London: WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford St., W.C.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

SECOND IMPRESSION OF

MRS. HUMPHRY WARD'S NEW NOVEL.

NOTICE. — A SECOND IMPRESSION of

LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER,

by MRS. HUMPHRY WARD, is now ready. With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

ACADEMY.—"Mrs. Ward writes of the things that matter in the inner individual life, and in no former book, we think, has her touch been surer, or her insight into motive and character more searching and sympathetic."

GLOBE.—"We are inclined to think that on the whole this is the best work that Mrs. Humphry Ward has yet given us. It is a story of strong human interest, it goes down into the depths of mental and spiritual experience; it seizes the attention and holds it firmly to the end."

NEW EDITION OF MR. SIDNEY LEE'S LIFE OF QUEEN VICTORIA.

NOW READY.

THIRD IMPRESSION (SECOND EDITION), with omissions and corrections. With Portraits, Map, and a Facsimile Letter, large crown 8vo, 10s. 6d.

QUEEN VICTORIA: a Biography. By SIDNEY LEE. Editor of the "Dictionary of National Biography."

ACADEMY.—"Perhaps no book of its kind, dealing with a great personality and a great period, and published, as it were, in the heart of that period, has ever been so simple, so frank, so free from excessive admiration or petty gossip. On the whole, Mr. Lee has accomplished a difficult task with remarkable discretion."

A THIRD POT-POURRI. By Mrs. C. W. EARLE, Author of "Pot Pourri from a Surrey Garden," "More Pot-Pourri from a Surrey Garden," &c. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

DUNDEE ADVERTISER.—"This authoress has the rare faculty of putting the charm of conversation into writing. . . . On every page there are fruits of experience, culture, and intelligence, and everywhere there is refined taste and perfect womanliness."

THE NEW NATION: A Sketch of the Present

Conditions of Life, and of the Economic and Political Outlook in the Australian Commonwealth. By PERCY F. ROWLAND, Late Scholar of Hertford College, &c. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Shortly.]

* An attempt to do for federated Australia something of what Mr. Bryce did for the American Commonwealth; an account of Australia based on seven years of Colonial urban life; with Chapters on Australian history, politics, society, literature, and education. It discusses the economic outlook, and considers Separation and Imperial Union as rival possibilities of national development.

NEW NOVEL BY GRAHAM HOPE.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE TRIUMPH OF COUNT OSTERMANN.

By GRAHAM HOPE, Author of "A Cardinal and his Conscience" and "My Lord Winchenden."

* A Russian story of the last days of Peter the Great, and of the succeeding reigns, closely founded on fact.

NEW NOVEL BY MRS. DE LA PASTURE.

PUBLISHED TO-DAY. Crown 8vo, 6s.

CORNELIUS. By Mrs. DE LA PASTURE, Author of "Deborah of Tod's," "Adam Grigson," &c.

* The story relates the love affairs of a young scholar living in Wales, and unravels the mystery surrounding his birth.

THE BONNET CONSPIRATORS. By VIOLET A. SIMPSON. Crown 8vo, 6s. [Ready March 26th.]

* The action of the story takes place during the few days in July, 1815, when Bonaparte was still in partial hiding near the French coast, and before he had made up his mind to throw himself on the mercy of England.

NEW VOLUME BY K. & HESKETH PRICHARD.

On MARCH 31. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ROVING HEARTS. By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD, Authors of "A Modern Mercenary," "Karulac, Count of Gersay," "Tanmer's Duel," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY E. W. HORNUNG.

EARLY IN APRIL, with a Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NO HERO. By E. W. HORNUNG, Author of "A Bride from the Bush," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

Hakluyt's Voyages.

Messrs. JAMES MACLEHOSE AND SONS, Publishers to the University of Glasgow, have pleasure in announcing that they have in the Press a COMPLETE EDITION of the celebrated Collection of

THE PRINCIPAL NAVIGATIONS, VOIAGES, TRAFFIQUES AND DISCOVERIES OF THE ENGLISH NATION,

Made by Sea or over-land, to the remote and farthest distant quarters of the Earth, at any time within the compass of these 1600 yeeres

BY

RICHARD HAKLUYT,

Master of Artes, and sometime Student of Christ-Church in Oxford.

This great work, described by Froude as the prose epic of the modern English nation, was first published in 1589, and a second edition, revised and enlarged by Hakluyt, was printed in 1598-1600. The collection was reprinted in limited editions in London in 1809 and in Edinburgh in 1885, but these reprints, like the originals, have now become very scarce and costly, so that it is practically impossible for lovers of History, Geographers, Librarians, and all interested in the early voyages and adventure of our countrymen, and in the beginnings of our overseas Empire, to procure the text of this book.

The aim of the Publishers in issuing this edition is to provide an accurate, complete, and beautifully printed text from the edition of 1598-1600, as revised by Hakluyt. The rare "Voyage to Cadiz," which was suppressed by Queen Elizabeth after the disgrace of the Earl of Essex, will be included in the text.

They are glad to say that Mr. WALTER RALEIGH, M.A. Cantab., Professor of English Literature in the University of Glasgow, has agreed to write an Essay on the Life and Work of Hakluyt which will be included in this edition. The edition of 1598-1600 did not contain an Index, but this will now be supplied.

The work, which will be illustrated from contemporary portraits and maps, will be printed at the University Press, Glasgow, from old style Caslon type, on antique paper specially made by Messrs. Dickinson & Co. It will be contained in Twelve Volumes, of about 450 pages each. The size will be octavo, and the binding will be cloth, with gilt top.

Volume I. is in the press and will be published shortly, and it is hoped that the whole work will be completed within two years.

The edition for sale in this country will be strictly limited to 1,000 copies, of which 100 copies, numbered and signed, will be printed throughout on the finest English hand-made paper, with proofs of the engravings. The price to Subscribers to the ordinary edition will be 12s. 6d. net per volume, and to the edition on hand-made paper, with proofs, 25s. net per volume.

The work will be sold in complete Sets only, and it would be obliging if intending Subscribers would send in their names without delay to their Bookseller, through whom full Prospectuses and Specimen Pages can be obtained.

GLASGOW :

JAMES MACLEHOSE & SONS, Publishers to the University.

London : MACMILLAN & Co., Limited.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS' LIST.

William Wetmore Story and his Friends. FROM LETTERS, DIARIES, AND RECOLLECTIONS. By HENRY JAMES. With Portraits. In one vol. demy 8vo. [In the press.]

Recollections of Forty Years' Service. By MAJOR-GENERAL SIR ALEXANDER BRUCE TULLOCH, K.C.B., C.M.G. Demy 8vo, 15s. net.

Modern Strategy. By LIEUT.-COL. WALTER H. JAMES, late R.E., P.S.C. With 6 Maps. Royal 8vo, 16s. net.

Wild Sport with Gun, Rifle, and Salmon-Rod. By GILFRID W. HARTLEY. With numerous illustrations in photogravure and half-tone by G. E. LODGE, and other Sketches. Demy 8vo. [In the press.]

Agnosticism. By ROBERT FLINT, D.D., LL.D., F.R.S.E., Author of "Historical Philosophy in France and French Belgium," "Anti-Theistic Theories," &c., &c. Demy 8vo, 18s. net.

The Development of Modern Philosophy. WITH OTHER LECTURES AND ESSAYS. By ROBERT ADAMSON, LL.D., late Professor of Logic in the University of Glasgow. Edited by Professor W. R. SORLEY, University of Cambridge. With a Photogravure Portrait. 2 vols. demy 8vo, 18s. net.

Points of a Racehorse. By MAJOR-GENERAL SIR JOHN HILLS, R.E., K.C.B. With over 100 half-tone Portraits of 92 famous Racehorses, and other Illustrations. Royal folio. [In the press.]

MODERN ENGLISH WRITERS.

William Makepeace Thackeray. By CHARLES WHIBLEY. [Shortly.]

Memories: Grave and Gay. FORTY YEARS OF SCHOOL INSPECTION. By JOHN KERR, LL.D. Cheaper Edition, enlarged. With Portraits and other Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

Silas Marner; Brother Jacob; Lifted Veil. By GEORGE ELIOT. Pocket Edition. Pott 8vo, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; limp leather, 2s. 3d. net.

NEW NOVELS.

A Burgher Quixote. By DOUGLAS BLACKBURN, Author of "Prinsloo of Prinsloosloep." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Shortly.]

Ottavia. By GARRETT MILL, Author of "The Colonel Sahib." Crown 8 o. [In the press.]

The Circle. By KATHERINE CECIL THURSTON. Third Impression. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Advanced-Guard. By SYDNEY C. GRIER, Author of "The Warden of the Marches," "The Prince of the Captivity," "His Excellency's English Governess," &c., &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

Youth: A Narrative; AND TWO OTHER STORIES. By JOSEPH CONRAD, Author of "Lord Jim," "The Nigger of the Narcissus," &c., &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS,
Edinburgh and London.

Spring Announcements Supplement.

SATURDAY: 21 MARCH, 1903.

Spring Publishing.

THE Spring publishing lists this year are fairly full, but in the main they show no marked tendency in any particular direction. We seem, indeed, to have reached just one of those periods which lack incentive in literature. The great material of literature is always, of course, in any age, practically the same. Wars, social upheavals, individual achievements in action, may supply to a particular generation material which is expressed in work of more or less topical importance; but true literature is not necessarily concerned with these temporary excitements; they must, however, have their turn, and often their turn takes up the foreground. But at present these things are not much in evidence, so the more permanent concerns of life should now reassert their old and unassailable strength. There is not, however, so strong a reassertion as we could have wished. Of new and old philosophical work there is much that we shall be glad to have, but in the way of biography there is very little. In work of pure literature we notice hardly anything beyond Prof. Raleigh's "Wordsworth" (which we review this week), and Mr. Chesterton's "Browning" in the "English Men of Letters." Two considerable ventures in re-issues promise to be of great interest; the "Charles Lamb" edited by Mr. E. V. Lucas, and the "Charles Lamb" edited by Mr. W. Macdonald. The fiction list is conspicuous by the absence of certain distinguished names. Our living greatest in fiction are silent: neither Mr. Meredith nor Mr. Hardy has spoken for some time. Many new names, however, appear, and there is always hope that some of these may make a claim to our regard. In the way of poetry the Spring lists are rather barren. We are to have a new volume of verse from Mr. Swinburne: beyond that again there are other possibilities in names new to us.

Many of the books in the lists which we print have already been published. From those still to be issued we select the following as likely to appeal to general readers:—

- Sir James Crichton Browne's "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle."
- M. Gabriel Hanatoux's "Contemporary France."
- Mrs. Wharton's translation of Sudermann's "Es Lebe das Leben."
- Sir Alfred Lyall's "Life of the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava."
- Mrs. Paget Toynbee's "The Letters of Horace Walpole."
- Mr. E. K. Chambers's "The Mediæval Stage."
- Mr. C. L. Graves's "Sir George Grove."
- Lady Butler's "Letters from the Holy Land."
- Mr. Henry James's "William Wetmore Story and his Friends."
- Dr. William Barry's "The Dayspring."
- Mr. George Moore's "The Untilled Field."
- John Oliver Hobbes's "The Vineyard."
- Mr. Neil Munro's "Children of Tempest."
- Mr. Quiller-Couch's "The Adventures of Harry Revel."
- E. Somerville's and Martin Ross's "All on the Irish Shore."
- "Zack's" "The Roman Road."

Amongst new editions the "Library" edition of Ruskin is particularly to be noted. In cheaper reissues we are to have a complete Charlotte Brontë, edited by Dr. Robertson Nicoll, and Messrs. Routledge's "Half Forgotten Books" include many volumes of interest.

Announcements.

George Allen.

- Ruskin (John), Complete Works including all published, and some hitherto unpublished matter, and illustrations. Library Edition. Limited to 2,000 copies for sale in England and America. Edited by E. T. Cook and Alexander Wedderburn. 30 to 32 vols.each net 21/0
- Ruskin (John), Of King's Treasures. Of Queen's Gardens. 2 vols.net 60/0
- Ruskin (John), Unto this Lastnet 42/0
- Hawtrey (Florence M.), The History of the Hawtrey Family, with sixteen portraits, pedigrees, &c. 2 vols.net 21/0
- Baddeley (St. Clair), Walks in Rome. By the late Augustus N. Hare. A new edition revised throughout. 2 vols. ... 10/0
- Paget (J. Otho), Dewar (George A. B.) and Shand (A. Innes), Horses, Guns and Dogs (The Young England Library, Vol. V.)..... 6/0
- Sutro (A.), Thoughts from Maeterlincknet 3/6

Edward Arnold.

- Journals of Field-Marshal Count von Blumenthal for 1866 and 1870-71. Edited by Count Albrecht von Blumenthal. Translated by Major A. D. Gillespie Addison...net 12/6
- Austin (Major Herbert H.), With Macdonald in Ugandanet 15/0
- Bevan (Edwyn Robert), The House of Seleucus. 2 vols....net 30/0
- Abbott (G. F.), The Tale of a Tour in Macedonia.....net 14/0
- Osborne (Rev. C. E.), The Life of Father Dolling.....net 6/0
- Raleigh (Walter), Wordsworthnet 4/6
- Bell (Mrs. Hugh), The Minor Moralists.....net 15/0
- Wyllie (W. L.), Principles of Perspectivenet 15/0
- Portfolio of the National Gallery of Scotland. With a Preface by His Grace the Duke of Argyll. Containing Forty Photogravure Reproductions on Japanese Vellumnet 210/0
- Brookfield (Charles H. E.), Random Reminiscencesnet 14/0
- Henderson (M. Sturge), Three Centuries in North Oxfordshirenet 5/0
- Clutterbuck (E. H.), A Day Dream and Other Poemsnet 3/6
- Gurdon (J.), Erinna: A Tragedy.....net 3/6
- ESSEX HOUSE PRESS PUBLICATIONS:
- Cicero's "De Amicitia" in Latin and Englishnet 73/6
- The "Parentalia" of Sir Christopher Wrennet 73/6
- The Guild of Handicraft Song-Book.....

FICTION.

- Oliphant (Philip Laurence), The Little Red Fish 6/0
- Watson (E. H. Lacon), The Templars 6/0
- Weber (Antoinette), Changes and Chances 6/0
- Eddy (Charles), The Taint of the City..... 6/0

J. W. Arrowsmith.

- Crawford (Emily), Victoria, Queen and Ruler..... 6/0
- Taylor (Alfred D.), Annals of Lord's and History of the M.C.C. 1/0
- Standing (Percy), Ranjitsinhji, Prince of Cricket 1/0
- Jessop (Gilbert L.), The Game of Cricket..... 1/0
- Chevalier (Albert), Limelight Lays 1/0
- O'Connor (T. P.), The Phantom Millions 1/0
- Nicholas (J. W.), The Household of Hertz..... 2/0 & 2/6
- Phillipotts (Eden), The Transit of the Red Dragon and other Tales 3/6

Deighton Bell & Co.

- Taylor (C.), The Elementary Geometry of Conics. Eighth Edition revised with a chapter on Inventio Orbium 5/0

Bemrose and Sons.

- Solon (Mr. M. L.), A History of Old English Porcelain
 Ditchfield (Rev. P. H.—Edited by), Memorials of Old Oxfordshire
 Dryden (Alice—Edited by), Memorials of Old Northamptonshire
 Ward (John), The Roman Fort of Gellygaer
 Bryan (Benjamin), Matlock Manor and Parish
 Grey (Frank D.—Edited by), The Dogs of St. Bernard
 Awdry (Frances), In the Isles of the Sea. The Story of Fifty Years in Melanesia
 Moore (Florence), Thorns that Choke. A Story of To-Day ...

NEW EDITIONS.

- Worsfold (T. Cato), The French Stonehenge
 Scott (Rev. Melville), The Harmony of the Collects, Epistles, and Gospels

A. & C. Black.

- Encyclopædia Biblica. A Dictionary of the Bible. Vol. I., A. to D.; Vol. II., E. to K.; Vol. III., L. to P.; Vol. IV., Q. to Z.; Edited by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne, D.Litt., D.D., and J. Sutherland Black, M.A., LL.D., per vol. net 20 0; 25 0; 30 0
 Cheyne (Rev. T. K.), Critica Biblica.
 Part I.—Isaiah and Jeremiah 2 6
 Part II.—Ezekiel and the Minor Prophets 3 0
 GUILD TEXT-BOOK:
 Paterson (Rev. Prof.), The Apostles' Teaching, a companion volume to Our Lord's Teaching net 0 6
 GUILD LIBRARY:
 Stevenson (Rev. Robert), The Pilgrim's Progress, as illustrating the Christian Life net 1 6
 Lankester (E. Ray), A Treatise on Zoology. Profusely illustrated. To be completed in 10 Parts. net each 12 6; 15 0
 Menpes (Mortimer), The World's Children. Text by Dorothy Menpes net 20 0; 42 0; 105 0
 Del Mar (Walter), Around the World through Japan 18 0
 Butler (Lady), Letters from the Holy Land, 7 6 net; and Edition De Luxe net 21 0
 THE FASCINATION OF LONDON: By Sir Walter Besant and G. E. Mitton:
 Kensington net each 1 6 & 2 0
 Holborn and Bloomsbury net each 1 6 & 2 0
 Hammersmith and Fulham net each 1 6 & 2 0
 Mayfair and Bayswater net each 1 6 & 2 0
 Home (Gordon), What to See in England... probable price net 5 0
 Clerke (Agnes M.), Problems in Astrophysics net 20 0
 Gardner (Percy), Oxford at the Cross Roads net 2 6
 Omond (G. W. T.), The Boers in Europe: A Sidelight on History 3 6
 Halid (Halil), The Diary of a Turk 5 0
 DAINY DAMES OF SOCIETY:
 A Portrait Gallery of Charming Women. The Peacock Blue Series. by H. Wilmott Dixon. Vols. I. to IV.
 net 2 0 & 2 6

JUVENILE.

- Woodhouse (P. G.), A Prefect's Uncle 3 6

NEW EDITIONS.

- Strong (Very Rev. T. B.), A Manual of Theology. Second Edition price net 7 6
 Kocher (Dr. T.), Text-Book of Operative Surgery. Translated by Harold J. Stiles, M.B., F.R.C.S.
 BLACK'S GUIDE BOOKS. New Editions for 1903.
 Edinburgh 1 0
 Scotland 8 6
 " (Cheap Edition) 1 0
 Trossachs 1 0
 Around London 2 6
 " (North) 0 6
 Also many New Volumes in Educational Text-Books.

Blackwood and Sons.

- James (Henry), William Wetmore Story and his Friends. ...
 Tulloch (Maj.-General Sir Alexander Bruce), Recollections of Forty Years' Service net 15 0
 James (Lieut.-Colonel Walter H.), Modern Strategy net 10 0

- Adamson (Robert), The Development of Modern Philosophy. 2 vols. net 18 0
 Carlyle (A. J.), A History of Political Theory from the Roman Lawyers of the Second Century to the Political Writers of the Ninth Merz (John Theodore), A History of European Thought in the Nineteenth Century. Vol. II. Scientific Thought—(concluded)
 Saintsbury (Prof.—Edited by), Periods of European Literature. 12 volumes. each, net 5 0
 Ker (Prof. W. P.), The Dark Ages
 THE COUNTY HISTORIES OF SCOTLAND:
 Chisholm (John), Perth and Clackmannan net 7 6
 Dickson (William Kirk), Edinburgh and Linlithgow net 7 6
 Saintsbury (George), A History of Criticism and Literary Taste in Europe. Vol. II. From the Renaissance to the Decline of Eighteenth Century Orthodoxy net 20 0
 Lang (Andrew), A History of Scotland from the Roman Occupation. Vol. II. net 15 0
 Eliot (Robert), Agnosticism net 18 0
 Conder (Col. C. R.), The First Bible 5 0
 Macleod (Very Rev. Donald), The Doctrine and Validity of the Ministry and Sacraments of the National Church of Scotland; being the Baird Lecture for 1903
 Hills Maj.-General Sir John), Points of a Racehorse
 Lawson (W. R.), American Industrial Problems net 6 0
 The Arms of the Baronial and Police Burghs of Scotland, by John, Marquess of Bute, K.T., J. H. Stevenson, and H. W. Lonsdale net 42 0
 Leyden (John), Journal of a Tour in the Highlands and Western Islands of Scotland in 1800 net 6 0
 Irons (David), A Study in the Psychology of Ethics net 5 0
 Waddell (Rev. P. Hatley), Essays on Faith 3 6

THE COUNTY HISTORIES OF SCOTLAND:

- MODERN ENGLISH WRITERS:
 Whitley (Charles), William Makepeace Thackeray 2 6

FICTION.

- Blackburn (Douglas), A Burgher Quixote
 Mill Garrett, The Cardinal's Surprise
 Thurston (Katherine Cecil), The Circle 6 0
 Grier (Sidney C.), The Advanced-Guard
 Munro (Neil), Children of Tempest

NEW EDITIONS.

- Maitland (Rear-Admiral Sir Frederick Lewis), The Surrender of Napoleon
 Kerr (John), Memories: Grave and Gay
 Hutton (Edward), Italy and the Italians 6 0
 The Roman Breviary: Reformed by Order of the Holy Ecumenical Council of Trent; Published by Order of Pope St. Pius V.; and Revised by Clement VIII. and Urban VIII.; together with the Offices since granted. Translated out of Latin into English by John, Marquess of Bute, K.T. Revised and Enlarged. In 4 vols. and in 1 vol.

Cambridge University Press.

- Burkitt (F. C.—Re-edited by), Evangelion da Mepharreshe, the Curetonian Syriac Gospels
 Horæ Semiticæ, No. 1, The Didascalia Apostolorum in Syriac, edited from a Mesopotamian MS. by Margaret Dunlop Gibson net 15 0
 Horæ Semiticæ, No. 2, The Didascalia Apostolorum in English, translated from the Syriac by Margaret Dunlop Gibson net 4 0
 Cornish (F. Warre), Catullus, with translation
 Duff (J. D.—Edited by), Lucretius, Book III. 2 0
 Edwards (G. H.—Edited by), Xenophon, Memorabilia, Book I. 2 6
 Wright (W. Aldis), Milton: The Poems with brief Critical Notes
 Reynolds (Osborne), The Sub-Mechanics of the Universe: Being Vol. III. of Papers on Mechanical and Physical Subjects net 10 6
 Russell (Bertrand), The Principles of Mathematics, Vol. I. ...
 Gardiner (J. Stanley—Edited by), The Fauna and Geography of the Maldive and Laccadive Archipelagoes—Part IV. completing Vol. I. net 15 0
 The Cambridge Modern History. Planned by the late Lord Acton. Vol. VII. The United States net 16 0

- Moorsom (Rev. Robert Maude—Edited by), A Historical Companion to Hymns Ancient and Modern. (Second Edition).....net 5/0
- Bury (J. B.), An Inaugural Lecture delivered in the Divinity School, Cambridge, on January 26th, 1903...net 1/0 & net 1/6
- CAMBRIDGE NATURAL SCIENCE MANUALS:
- Whetham (W. C. D.), A Treatise on the Theory of Solution, including the Phenomena of Electrolysis...net 10/0
- Dr. William Turner's Treatise "De Avibus," Cologne, 1544—Edited by A. H. Evans.....
- A Naturalist's Calendar, kept at Swaffham Bulbeck, Cambridgeshire, by Leonard Blomefield.—Edited by Francis Darwin.....
- Canterbury Libraries: the Catalogues of the Ancient Libraries of Christ Church Priory and St. Augustine's Abbey at Canterbury, and also those of Canterbury College, Oxford, and Dover Priory, edited, with Introduction and Notes, and an attempt to identify the extant volumes, by M. R. James, Litt.D.....
- Abbott (G. F.), Macedonian Folklore.....
- Porritt (Edward), The Unreformed House of Commons. 2 vols.....
- Waldstein (Charles), Art in the Nineteenth Century.....net 1/0 & net 2/0

Cassell & Co.

- The Nation's Pictures. A selection from the most Modern Paintings in the Public Picture Galleries of Great Britain, reproduced in Colour. Vols. I, II, and III. each 12/0 & 15/0
- The National Portrait Gallery. Edited by Lionel Cust, Director of the Gallery. Illustrates every picture in the Gallery.....2 vols. net 126/0
- Royal Academy Pictures, 1903.....7/6
- Aflalo (F. G.—Edited by), The Sports of the World.....12/0
- Sims (George R.—Edited by), Living London: Its Work and its Play, its Humour and its Pathos, its Sights and its Scenes. Complete in 3 vols.....each 12/0 & 16/0
- Fraser (John Foster), America at Work.....6/0
- Kirby (W. F.), The Butterflies and Moths of Europe.....net 21/0
- Dickes (William Frederick), Holbein's "Ambassadors" Unriddled.....net 10/6
- Williams (Leonard), Toledo and Madrid: Their Records and Romances.....net 12/6
- Cassell's Dictionary of Practical Gardening. Edited by Walter P. Wright. 2 vols.....net 30/0
- Britain at Work. A Pictorial Description of our National Industries.....12/0

FICTION.

- Quiller-Couch (A. T.), The Adventures of Harry Revel.....6/0
- Hill (Headon), The Duke Decides.....6/0
- Smedley (Constance), An April Princess.....6/0
- Stockton (Frank R.), John Gayther's Garden.....6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

- Social England. Illustrated Edition. A Record of the Progress of the People in Religion, Laws, Learning, Arts, Industry, Commerce, Literature, and Manners, from the Earliest Times to the Present Day. By Eminent Writers. Edited by H. D. Traill and J. S. Mann. Vol. IV.....net 14/0
- White's Natural History of Selborne. With Notes by R. Kearton.....6/0
- Hunter (Rev. Robert), Cassell's Concise Bible Dictionary.....36/
- Manson (Patrick), Tropical Diseases: A Manual of the Diseases of Warm Climates.....net 10/6
- Barrie (J. M.), The Little Minister. Illustrated.....3/6

W. & R. Chambers, Ltd.

NINETEENTH CENTURY SERIES:

- Barnaby (Sir Nathaniel), Naval Development of the Century.....5/0
- MacKnight (Thomas), Political Progress of the Century.....5/0
- Doolittle (William H.), Inventions of the Century.....5/0
- Cyclopædia of English Literature. Edited by David Patrick, LL.D. In weekly parts.....each 0/6

Chatto and Windus.

- McCarthy (Justin), The Reign of Queen Anne. 2 vols. each, net 12/0
- Davies (E. W. L.), Memoir of the Rev. John Russell and his Out-of-Door Life.....net 16/0
- Besant (Sir Walter), As We Are and As We May Be.....6/0
- Walford's County Families of the United Kingdom (1903) ... 50/0
- Herbert Fry's Royal Guide to the London Charities, 1903 ... 1/6
- A New Stevenson Book:
- Strong (Isabel), and Osbourne (Lloyd), Memories of Vailima.....6/0
- Swinburne (Algernon Charles), A New Volume of Poems.....
- Phipson (T. L.), The Confessions of a Violinist.....5/0
- Palmer (William T.), Lake Country Rambles.....6/0
- Vizetelly (Ernest A.), Bluebeard.....net 9/0

FICTION.

- Russell (W. Clark), Overdue.....6/0
- Warden (Florence), The Heart of a Girl.....6/0
- Pilkington (Lionel L.), Mallender's Mistake.....6/0
- Whishaw (Fred.), Near the Tsar, near Death.....6/0
- Treeton (Ernest A.), The Instigator.....6/0
- Mitford (Bertram), Haviland's Chum.....6/0
- Compton (Herbert), The Wilful Way.....6/0
- Meade (L. T.), Rosebury.....6/0
- Seymour (Cyril), The Magic of To-morrow.....6/0
- Tytler (Sarah), In Clarissa's Day.....6/0
- Ohnet (Georges), The Woman of Mystery.....6/0
- Clare (Austin), The Tideway.....6/0
- Guttenberg (Violet), The Power of the Palmist.....6/0
- Guttenberg (Violet), Neither Jew nor Greek: a Story of Jewish Social Life.....6/0
- Gissing (Algernon), Knitters in the Sun: a Pastoral.....6/0
- Besant (Sir Walter), No Other Way.....6/0
- Antrobus (C. L.), The Wine of Finvarra, &c.....6/0
- Bindloss (Harold), The Concession-hunters.....6/0
- Lindsay (Harry), The Story of Leah.....6/0
- Fenn (George Manville), Black Shadows.....6/0
- Richardson (Frank), Semi-Society: a Story of the Day.....6/0
- Bright (Florence), A Girl Capitalist.....6/0
- Westall (William), The Sacred Crescents.....6/0
- Alden (W. L.), Drewitt's Dream.....6/0
- Mitchell (Edmund), The Belforts of Culben.....6/0
- Hinkson (H. A.), Silk and Steel.....6/0

The Clarendon Press.

- The Coptic Version of the New Testament, in the Northern Dialect. Vols. III and IV. (completing the Work).....
- Burney (C. F.), Notes on the Hebrew Text of the Books of Kings.....net 14/0
- Rogers (Clement F.), The Early History of Baptism.....
- Cooke (G. A.), A Handbook to Semitic Inscriptions.....
- Toynbee (Mrs. Paget—Edited by), The Letters of Horace Walpole. In 16 vols.....
- Chambers (E. K.), The Mediaeval Stage. 2 vols.....
- Macaulay (G. C.—Edited by), Selections from Gower's Confessio Amantis.....
- Moore (Edward), Studies in Dante (Third Series).....
- Murray (Dr. J. A. H.—Edited by), A New English Dictionary. Further Portions by Dr. Murray, Mr. Henry Bradley, and Mr. W. A. Craigie.....
- Greenidge (A. H. J.) and Clay (A. M.), Sources of Roman History.....
- Webb (C. C. J.—Edited by), The Polieraticus of John of Salisbury.....
- Fisher (H. A. L.), Napoleonic Statesmanship. Germany.....
- Oman (C.), A History of the Peninsular War. Vol. II.....
- Dannreuther (E.), The Oxford History of Music, Vol. V.: The Romantic Period.....
- Collins (J. Churton—Edited by), Sir Thomas More's "Utopia".....
- Smith (G. Gregory—Edited by), Elizabethan Critical Essays.....

T. and T. Clark.

- Hilprecht (Prof. Herman V.—Edited by), Explorations in Bible Lands during the 19th Century.....net 12/6
- Shaw (Rev. R. D.), The Pauline Epistles. Introductory and Expository Studies.....net 8/0

- Bruce (Rev. R.), Apostolic Order and Unitynet 2/6
 Adams (John), A Primer on Teaching with special reference to Sunday School Worknet 0/6
 Kennedy (Rev. James), The Note-Line in the Hebrew
 Scriptures, commonly called "Pāseq" or "Pesiq"
 THE WORLD'S EPOCH-MAKERS SERIES:
 Mackintosh (Prof. R.), Hegel and Hegelianism 3/0
 Orr (Prof. James), Hume and his Philosophy and Theology 3/0
 The Sacraments in the New Testament (the Kerr Lectures for 1803). By Rev. J. C. Lambert, B.D.
 THE INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY:
 Gray (Prof. Buchanan), The Book of Numbers. A Critical and Exegetical Commentary
 Dr. Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible. Extra Volume.....

A. Constable & Co.

- Forrest (G. W.), Cities of India. Fully Illustratednet 10/6
 James (Prof. William), Human Immortality. New Edition... 2/6
 Steward (Rev. Canon) and Mitchell (Alice E.), The Nature
 Student's Note-Booknet 2/0
 The Nations Need. Chapters on Education by various Authorities. Edited by Spenser Wilkinson 6/0
 Barmby (Beatrice Helen), Poemsnet 3/6
 Hill (G. F.), Coins of Ancient Sicilynet 21/0
 Ingpen (R.—Edited by), The Autobiography of Leigh Hunt.
 2 vols.net 21/0
 Selections from La Bruyère and Vauvenargues.....net 3/6
 Hanatoux (Gabriel), Contemporary Francenet 15/0
 Leef (H. M.), The Internal Wiring of Buildings. New Edition 3/6
 Meredith (George), Selected Poems. New Edition.....net 3/6
 An English Garner. Ingatherings from our History and Literature, the original impression of which is now out of print. To be issued in 12 vols.....each net 4/0
 FICTION.
 White (Percy), Park Lane
 Castle (Agnes and Egerton), The Star Dreamer.....
 Moore (F. Frankfort), Castle Omeragh.....
 Gissing (George), The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft..... 6/0
 Chambers (R. W.), Maids of Paradise
 Gwynne (Paul), The Pagan at the Shrine
 Rait (J. E.), "Alison"
 "Zack," The Roman Road
 Kinross (Albert), The Way Back

J. M. Dent & Co.

- The Works of Charles Lamb. Edited by William Macdonald, with Biographical and Critical Essay, Bibliographical Introductions, and Notes. Profusely Illustrated with Reproductions from the Original Engravings, Portraits, and Drawings by C. E. Brock, H. Raiton, Winifred
 Green, and others. 12 vols.each net 3/6
 The Temple Edition of the Apocrypha (uniform with the "Temple Bible"). 6 vols., each Edited by a Leading Scholar, and with Photogravure Frontispiece each net 1/0 & net 1/6
 Lane (C. H.), Rabbits, Cats, and Caves. 117 Illustrations
 net 10/6
 HADDON HALL LIBRARY:
 Tod (W. M.), Farmingnet 7/6
 Carpenter (J. Estlin) and Wicksteed (P. H.), Studies in Theologynet 4/6
 MEDIEVAL TOWNS:each net 3/6 or net 4/6
 Wheatley (H. B.), London.
 Gardner (E. G.), Siena.
 Headlam (Cecil), Oxford.
 Smeaton (O.), Edinburgh.

MASTER MUSICIANS:

- Patterson, (Annie W.), Schumannnet 3/6
 Benson (Eugene), Sordello and Cunizza: A Study of Life in the Thirteenth Century.....net 2/6
 Laing (Janet), The Wizard's Auntnet 4/6
 The Temple Primers. 4 new vols.....each net 1/0

MODERN LANGUAGE SERIES:

- Dunville (R.), French Pronunciation.....

NEW EDITIONS.

THE TEMPLE AUTOBIOGRAPHIES:

- Macdonell (Anne—Translated and Edited by), Memoirs of Benvenuto Cellininet 3/6
 Macdonald (W.—Edited by), Benjamin Franklin's
 Autobiographynet 3/6
 The Temple Classics. 9 new vols.each net 1/6 & net 2/0
 Hazlitt's Collected Works. Edited by A. R. Waller and
 A. Glover, with Introduction by W. E. Henley. 12 vols.
 Vols. VII.—X.....each net 7/6
 Thackeray's Prose Works. Illustrated by C. E. Brock.
 Edited by W. Jerrold. 30 vols.....each net 3/0

Digby, Long & Co.

- Morris (Judge O'Connor), Memoirs of Gerald O'Connor...net 7/6

FICTION.

- Kenealy (Arabella), His Eligible Grace the Duke
 Fletcher (J. P.), The Secret Way
 Howell (C.), Coy
 Swanne (Florence), Josi: A Study in Temperament.....
 Sherard (Robert H.), An Underground Mystery 6/0
 Hume (Fergus), A Coin of Edward VII. 6/0
 Tytler (Sarah), Friendly Foes 6/0
 Diehl (Mrs. A. M.), A Man in Love 6/0
 Cleeve (Lucas), Free Soil, Free Soul 6/0
 Ward (Bryan W.), The Forest Prince 6/0
 Findlay (James T.), Silent Places 6/0
 Moor (Charlotte), Marina De La Rey 6/0
 Speight (T. W.), By Fortune's Whim 6/0
 Yorke (Curtis), In Life's Afternoon 6/0
 Dean (Ellis), A Strange Honeymoon 6/0
 Mathers (Helen), The New Lady Teazle 3/6
 Cobban (J. McClaren), The Golden Tooth 3/6
 Russell (Dora), A Torn Out Page 3/6
 Hardy (Iza Duffus), McGilleroy's Millions 3/6

Duckworth & Co.

- Countess of Cork and Orrery, The Orrery Papers. 2 vols.
 net 42/0
 Litchfield (R. B.), Tom Wedgwood, the First Photographer: an account of his Life, his Discovery, and his Friendship with Samuel Taylor Coleridge.....net 8/0
 Holroyd (Charles), Michael Angelo Buonarroti.....net 7/6
 Davies (Randall), Chelsea Old Churchnet 52/6
 McCabe (Joseph), Church Discipline; an Ethical Study of the Church of Rome.....net 3/0
 Sudermann (Hermann), The Joy of Living (Es Lebe Das Leben), translated by Edith Wharton.....net 4/6
 THE SAINTS SERIES:
 Joly (Henri), S. Teresa 3/0
 Hatzfeld (Prof. A. D.), S. Augustine. (Second edition)... 3/0
 POPULAR LIBRARY OF ART:
 Mauclair (Camille), The French Impressionists
 net 2/0 & net 2/6
 Gronau (Dr. Georg), Leonardo Da Vinci.....net 2/0 & net 2/6
 Chamberlain (Arthur B.), Gainsborough.....net 2/0 & net 2/6
 FICTION.
 Buckley (William), Croppies Lie Down 6/0
 Meredith (Isobel), A Girl among the Anarchists..... 6/0

DUCKWORTH'S GREENBACK LIBRARY:

Baynton (Barbara), Bush Studies.....	net 1/6 & net 2/0
Barnby (Beatrice Helen), Rosslyn's Raid	net 1/6 & net 2/0
Belloc (Hilaire), A New Book	net 1/6 & net 2/0

Greening & Co.

Grein (J. T.), Dramatic Criticism. Vol. IV. A Record of the London Stage for 1902	3/6
Butler (Dr.), Hudibras. With an Introductory note by T. W. H. Crosland. With Twelve Illustrations after Hogarth	3/0
Nott (Vernon), The Ballad of the Soul's Desire	2/6
"The Lyons Mail." Translated from the French by Robert H. Sherard	6/0

FICTION.

Turner (Reginald), The Steeple	6/0
Ranger-Gull (C.), His Grace's Grace	6/0
Hamilton (Cosmo), The Danger of Innocence.....	6/0
Devine (Paul), The Day of Prosperity	6/0
Fitz-Gerald (S. Adair), The Love Thirst of Elaine	6/0
"Lady Frivol," The Ice Maiden	3/6
Salts (Edgar), Mr. Incon's Misadventure	6/0
Spurrell (H. G. F.), Out of the Past	6/0
Donovan (Percy Vincent), A Heroine of Reality.....	6/0
Anonymous, A Tragic Contract	6/0
Anonymous, The Staff in Flower	6/0
Zola (Emile), Drink (L'Assommoir)	0/6
Golsworthy (Arnold), A Cry in the Night	0/6
Bremont (Countess de), Daughters of Pleasure	0/6

Harper & Bros.

Wilson (Woodrow), A History of the American People. The first complete History of the American People from the Earliest Times to the Accession of President Roosevelt. 5 vols.	80/0
Williams (H. Noel), Madame de Pompadour, with 16 Photogravure Portraits	25/0
Howells (William Dean), Literature and Life.....	10/6
A Doffed Coronet. By the author of "The Martyrdom of An Empress." Illustrated	7/6
Hayashi (Viscount—Retold by), For his People. Being the True Story of Sogora's Sacrifice, Entitled in the Original Japanese Version The Cherry Blossoms of a Spring Morn	5/0

FICTION.

King (Basil), In the Garden of Charity	6/0
Le Notre (G.), The House of the Conways	6/0
Watanira (Onoto), The Wooing of Wistaria	6/0
Wilkins (Mary E.), Six Trees	6/0
Harben (W. N.), The Substitute	6/0
Howells (William Dean), The Flight of Pony Baker.....	5/0
Caprices of a Royal Incognita (The), told by Herself	3/6
Jacobs (W. W.), The Lady of the Barge	3/6
Lady Beatrice and The Forbidden Man	3/6
Henry (Van Dyke), The Story of the Other Wise Man	2/0

Hodder and Stoughton.

Orr (Rev. Prof. James), Essays on Ritschlianism, Expository and Critical	6/0
Morgan (G. Campbell), The Crises of the Christ	7/6
Paton (Frank H. L.), Lomai of Lenakel. A Hero of the New Hebrides	6/0
Macdonald (Greville), The Religious Sense in its Scientific Aspect	3/6
Waddell (Rev. R.), Behold the Lamb of God: A Series of Discourses tracing through Scripture the Evolution and Coronation of the Lamb of God	5/0
Watson (Rev. John), The Homely Virtues	3/6
Lennox (Cuthbert), George Douglas Brown: A Biographical Memoir.....	3/6
Browning (Oscar), Letters from India.....	3/6
Schofield (Alfred T.), Nerves in Disorder: A Plea for Rational Treatment	3/6

FICTION.

Crockett (S. R.), The Banner of Blue	6/0
Rice (Alice Hegan), Lovey Mary	5/0
Steuart (John Alexander), The Hebrew	6/0
Macquoid (Katharine S.), His Heart's Desire	6/0
Douglas (Sir George), The Man of Letters	5/0
Treeton (E. A.), The Saving of Christian Sergison	6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

The Complete Edition of Charlotte Brontë's Works. Edited with Introduction by W. Robertson Nicoll.....	each volume 6/0
--	-----------------

Hurst and Blackett.

Conway (Sir W. Martin), Early Tuscan Art.....	net 7/6
Escott (T. H.), Gentlemen of the House of Commons. 2 vols.	net 15/0
Moore (J. E. S.), The Tanganyika Problem. An Account of the Researches undertaken concerning the existence of Marine Animals in Central Africa.....	net 25/0
Birch (John Grant), Travels in North and Central China	net 10/6
Betham-Edwards (M.), East of Paris: Sketches in the Gatinais, the Bourbonnais and Champagne	net 7/6
Benson (Claude), Crag and Hound in Lakeland	net 7/6
Valentine (E. Seton) and Tomlinson (F. L.), Travels in Space: A History of Aerial Navigation	net 10/6
Miller (E. D.), Modern Polo.....	net 16/0
Imperial Athletic Library. Edited by E. F. Benson and Eustace H. Miles. Daily Training—Cricket—Golf	each 4/0

FICTION.

Mitford (Bertram), Dorrien of Cranston	6/0
Winter (John Strange), Uncle Charles.....	6/0
Sergeant (Adeline), A Soul Apart	6/0
Tynan (Katherine), A King's Woman	6/0
Williamson (Mrs. C. N.), The Silent Battle.....	6/0
Betham-Edwards (Miss), A Humble Lover	6/0
Iota (Mrs. Mannington Caffyn), He for God Only	6/0
Oxenham (John), Bondman Free	6/0
Cleeve (Lucas), From Crown to Cross.....	6/0
Elliot (Anne), Mansell's Millions	6/0
Keith (Leslie), A New Novel	6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Grogan (Ewart S.) and Sharp (Arthur H.), From the Cape to Cairo	net 7/6
Gray (Thomas), An Elegy in a Country Churchyard	6/0
Lodge's Peerage, Baronetage and Knightage for 1903	net 31/6
EDNA LYALL'S NOVELS:
Donovan; A Modern Englishman; We Two; Knight Errant; In the Golden Days; Won by Waiting; A Hardy Norseman; To Right the Wrong.....	each 3/6
Watts-Dunton (Theodore), Aylwin—Illustrated Edition	6/0

Isbister & Co.

The Memories of Sir Llewelyn Turner. Illustrated.....	16/0
Whigham (H. J.), The Persian Problem.....	12/6
Wallace (William—Edited by), Poems of James Hogg	5/0
Benson (Robert), The Light Invisible.....	3/6
Kay-Robinson (E.), My Nature Notebook	net 2/6
Macmanus (Seumas), A Lad of the O'Friel's	6/0

R. Brimley Johnson.

Sage (M.), Mrs. Piper and the Psychical Society	net 3/6
Bennett (Edward T.), The Society for Psychical Research. Its Rise and Progress with a Sketch of its Work	1/0
Waddington (Horace), Fifty Sonnets	net 2/6
Fleming (W. K.), By a Northern Sea: Poems	net 2/6
Anonymous, The Food of the Gods. A Popular Account of Cocoa	net 2/6
Sutter (Julie), Britain's Next Campaign.....	net 1/0
Jones (C. Sheridan), What I Saw at Bethesda. The Penryhn Dispute	net 1/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Fitzgerald (Edward), Omar Khayyam "Roses of Parnassus"	net 0/6
Cervantes, Galatea (Complete Library).....net 1/0 and net 2/0

John Lane.

Browne (Sir James Crichton—Edited by), New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. 2 vols.net 25/0
The Rubāiyāt of Umar Khayyām. Done into English from the French of J. B. Nicolas by Frederick Baron Corvo. Printed in Two Colours	net 10/6
Carpenter (E. J.), The American Advance: A Study in Territorial Expansion	net 10/6
Milman (Helen), My Kalendar of Country Delights	net 5/0
Chesterton (Gilbert K.), A New Volume of Essays	net 5/0
Hawker (Robert Stephen), Footprints of Former Men in Far Cornwall	net 5/0
Corbin (John), a New Portrait of Shakespeare	net 5/0
Acheson (Arthur), Shakespeare and the Rival Poet	net 5/0
Olcott (Mary), Poems.....net 5/0
Whiting (Charles Goodrich), Walks in New England	net 5/0
Herbert (Alice), Between the Lights: Poems.....net 3/6
Clifford (Ethel), Songs of Dreams: Poems.....net 3/6
Handbooks of Practical Gardening. 8 new vols.....each net 2/6
Fitzgerald (Edward), Euphrator: A Dialogue on Youth	net 2/0
Roberts (Harry), The Tramp's Handbook.....net 3/0 & net 4/0
Meccredy (R. J.), The Motor Book	net 3/0 & net 4/0
Prothero (Charles), Life in the Mercantile Marine.....net 3/6

The J. B. Lippincott Co.

Heilprin (Prof. Angelo), Mont Pelée and the Tragedy of Martinique. 70 Illustrations	net 15/0
Curtis (W. E.), The True Abraham Lincoln	net 10/6
Ingham (John Hall), Pompeii of the West and Other Poems	net 6/0
Weed (C. M.) and Dearborn (N.), Birds in their Relation to Man. A Manual of Economic Ornithology for the United States and Canada	net 15/0
Cooke (Dr. J. B.), Nurse's Handbook of Obstetrics	net 15/0
Mills (W. Jay), Through the Gates of Old Romance	net 6/0
Pelton (Mabell S. C.), A Tar-heel Baron. (A Novel)	net 6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Furness (H. H.—Edited by), The New Variorum Edition of Shakespeare. Vol. II.—Macbeth	net 18/0
Jacobi (Dr. A.), Therapeutics of Infancy and Childhood	net 18/0
Blair (A. A.), The Chemical Analysis of Iron. Revised and Enlarged, with 105 Illustrations	net 18/0

John Long.

Griffith (George), Sidelights on Convict Life. Illustrated ...	6/0
Williams (Mrs. M. Forrest), How to take Care of a Consumptive	net 1/0

FICTION.

Præd (Mrs. Campbell), Fugitive Anne	6/0
Warden (Florence), An Outsider's Year	6/0
Crommelin (May), Crimson Lilies.....net 6/0
Nisbet (Hume), Mistletoe Manor. Illustrated	6/0
Gowing (Mrs. Aylmer), By Thames and Tiber	6/0
Burgin (G. B.), The Shutters of Silence	6/0
Griffith (George), The World Masters	6/0
Kernahan (Mrs. Coulson), An Unwise Virgin	6/0
Lees (Robt. Jas.), The Car of Phœbus	6/0
Cook (Alec), The Parish Doctor	6/0
Forster (R. H.), The Last Foray	6/0
Fletcher (J. S.), The Arcadians. Illustrated	6/0
Tytler (Sarah), The Machinations of Janet	6/0
Warden (Florence), No. 3, The Square	6/0
Prothero-Lewis (Helen), Thralldom	6/0
Sergeant (Adeline), Beneath the Veil	6/0
Hume (Fergus), The Jade Eye	6/0
Muddock (J. E.), Sweet "Doll" of Haddon Hall	6/0
Marsh (Richard), The Magnetic Girl	6/0
Cameron (Mrs. Lovett), Remembrance.....net 6/0

Bindloss (Harold), His Master Purpose	6/0
Bayliss (Helen), A Woman in the City	6/0
Bodkin (M. McD.), In the Days of Goldsmith	6/0
Cleeve (Lucas), The Indiscretion of Gladys	6/0
Nisbet (Hume), The Trust Trappers. Illustrated	6/0
Gilbert (George), The Bâton Sinister	6/0
Meade (Mrs. L. T.), The Burden of Her Youth	6/0
Crommelin (May), Partners Three	6/0
Præd (Mrs. Campbell), The Other Mrs. Jacobs	6/0
Fraser (Mrs. Hugh), The Stolen Emperor	6/0
Gubbins (Nathaniel), All the Winners	3/6
Platts (W. Carter), Up To-Morrow. 70 illustrations by Author	3/6

SIXPENNY NOVELS.

Mathers (Helen), The Sin of Hagar.
Warden (Florence), The Lovely Mrs. Pemberton.
Cameron (Mrs. Lovett), An Ill Wind.
Hume (Fergus), Woman—The Sphinx.
Glanville (Ernest), A Beautiful Rebel.
Sergeant (Adeline), The Future of Phyllis.

Longmans, Green & Co.

Myers (Frederic W. H.), Human Personality and Its Survival of Bodily Death. 2 vols.net 42/0
Pearse (H. H. S.—Edited by), A History of Lumsden's Horse: A Complete Record of the Corps from its Formation to its Disbandment.....net 21/0
Higgins (Mrs. Napier), The Bernards of Abington and Nether Winchendon: A Family History. 2 vols.net 21/0
Pears (Edwin), The Destruction of the Greek Empire and the Story of the Capture of Constantinople by the Turks	net 18/0
Brough (J.), The Study of Mental Science: Five Lectures on the Uses and Characteristics of Logic and Psychology ...
Cassidy (Captain James Henry Gordon), In the Land of the Boxers
Plimmer (R. H. Aders), The Chemical Changes and Products Resulting from Fermentation	net 6/0
Randolph (Rev. B. W.), Meditations on the New Testament for Every Day in the Year	net 5/0
Creighton (Mandell), University and Other Sermons	net 5/0
Bates (David), The Law of Likeness	net 9/0
Klöcker (Alb.), Fermentation Organisms: A Laboratory Handbook	net 6/0
Poor (George Vivian), Colonial and Camp Sanitation	net 2/0
Ritchie (Rev. Arthur), Spiritual Studies in St. Matthew's Gospel	net 12/0
Whitham (Rev. A. R.), Holy Orders	net 5/0
Dallas (H. A.), Gospel Records Interpreted by Human Experience	net 5/0
A Survey of English Ethics: Being the First Chapter of Mr. Lecky's History of European Morals. Edited, with Introduction and Notes, by W. A. Hirst, Principal of Gujarat College, Ahmedabad, sometime Scholar of Worcester College, Oxford. Crown 8vo.	3/6
Bonnell (Henry H.), Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot, Jane Austen: Studies in their Works	net 7/6
Brown (Elmer Ellsworth), The Making of our Middle Schools: An Account of the Development of Secondary Education in the United States	net 10/6
Woods (Alice—Edited by), Co-Education: A Series of Essays by Various Authors	net 3/0
Graves (Arnold F.), Clytemnestra: A Tragedy	net 5/0
Dilettante, A, Seria Ludo: Sketches and Verses	net 5/0
Cochrane (Alfred), Collected Verses.....net 2/6
Trevelyan (R. C.), Cecilia Gouzaga: A Drama.....net 2/6
Hither and Thither: Songs and Verses. By the Author of Times and Days.....net 5/0
Zimmerman (Alice), Greek History for Young Readers	4/6
Reeve (Amy J.), Practical Home Millinery	2/6

FICTION.

Haggard (H. Rider), Pearl-Maiden: A Tale of the Fall of Jerusalem.....net 6/0
Bailey (H. C.), Karl of Erbach	6/0
Somerville (E. A.) and Ross (Martin), All on the Irish Shore: Irish Sketches	6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Willard (Ashton Rollins), History of Modern Italian Art. Part I. Sculpture. Part II. Painting. Part III. Architecture. With Photogravure Frontispiece and numerous full-page Illustrations	net 21/0
--	----------

- Lecky (William Edward Hartpole), Leaders of Public Opinion in Ireland. Flood—Grattan—O'Connell. 2 vols. . . . net 25/0
Slingo (W.) and Brooker (A.), Electrical Engineering for Electric Light Artisans and Students 12/0
Wilkins (W. H.), The Love of an Uncrowned Queen: Sophie Dorothea, Consort of George I., and her Correspondence with Philip Christopher, Count Konigsmarek. (Now first published from the Originals) 12/6
Gardiner (Samuel Rawson), History of the Commonwealth and Protectorate, 1649–1656. In 4 vols. With maps. each net 5/0

Sampson Low, Marston & Co.

- The Royal Navy. Volume VII. (Completing the Work.)*
Edited by Sir William Laird Clowes net 25/0
Supplement to the Twentieth Century Practice: An International Encyclopaedia of Modern Medical Science.
Edited by Thomas L. Stedman, M.D. 21/0
Black (The late William), With the Eyes of Youth net 5/0
East (W. Quartermaine), The Last Days of Great Men: Cromwell—Napoleon—Mahomet 6/0
Taylor (Major Neville), Ibex Shooting on the Himalayas . . net 6/0
Palgrave (Sir Reginald F. D.), Oliver Cromwell—III. the Lord Protector 14/0
Woodworth (Joseph V.), Dies: Their Construction and Use for the Modern Working of Sheet Metals 14/0
Posselt (E. A.), Cotton Manufacturing. Part I. 14/0
Bowles (Thomas Gibson), Gibraltar and the Ministry . . . 1/0

NEW EDITIONS.

- Goldsmith's The Deserted Village; Wordsworth's Pastoral Poems; Coleridge's Rime of the Ancient Mariner . . . net 3/0
Tennyson's The May Queen; Milton's L'Allegro 3/0
Pleasures of Hope; Pleasures of Memory 2/6
Low's Sixpenny Copyright Books:
Blackmore (R. D.), Mary Anerley.
Blackmore (R. D.), Cripps the Carrier.
Russell (W. Clark), Two Captains.

Macmillan & Co.

- Coleridge (Miss Christabel), Miss Charlotte M. Yonge . . . net 12/6
Westcott (Rev. Arthur), Bishop Westcott. 2 vols. . . . net 17/0
Graves (C. L.), Sir George Grove
Bryce (Mr.), Biographical Studies.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS SERIES:

- Chesterton (Gilbert), The Life of Browning net 2/0
The Last Utterances of Archbishop Temple net 1/0
Wilson (Archdeacon), Lectures on Pastoral Theology Acton (Lord), Lectures on the French Revolution.
Fortescue (John), History of the British Army. Vol. III. net 18/0
Eggleston (G. C.), A History of the Confederate War Brown (W. G.), A History of the United States since the Civil War. Vol. I.

HIGHWAYS AND BYWAYS SERIES:

- Bradley (A. G.), South Wales 6/0
Cook (E. J.), A Popular Handbook to the Department of Greek and Roman Antiquities in the British Museum. . . net 10/0

FICTION.

- Cook (G. C.), Roderick Taliaferro. 6/0
Lawson (Elsworth), From the Unvarying Star 6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

- ILLUSTRATED POCKET CLASSICS:* cloth, net 2/0 P net 3/0
Tom Brown's Schooldays.
The Water Babies.
Hood's Humorous Poems.
Edgeworth (Miss), Castle Rackrent and the Absentee.
Edgeworth (Miss), Ormond.
Edgeworth (Miss), Popular Tales.
Edgeworth (Miss), Helen.
Edgeworth (Miss), Belinda.
Edgeworth (Miss), The Parents' Assistant.

- Geikie (Sir Archibald), Text-Book of Geology, 2 vols.
Strasburger's Text-Book of Botany
Bastable (Prof.), Public Finance net 12/6

Simpkin, Marshall & Co.

FICTION.

- Braddon (M. E.), The Conflict 6/0

Elkin Mathews.

- Rogers (John), With Elia and his Friends in Books and Dreams net 2/6
De Quincey (F. H.), Song-Tide Murmurs net 2/6
Watson (E. H. Lacon), Verses Occasionally Humorous (Vigo Cabinet Series) net 1/0
Lewis (Arthur), Ginevra: A Drama in Three Acts net 1/0
Wallis (A. F.), Stars of the Morning: A Drama net 3/6
Childe-Pemberton (H.), Carmela: A Poetic Drama. net 3/6

NEW EDITIONS.

- Hand in Hand: Verses by a Mother and Daughter.* With Frontispiece, by J. Lockwood Kipling 3/6
Yeats (W. B.), The Wind Among the Reeds. Fourth Edition net 3/6
Newbolt (Henry), Admirals All. Twentieth Edition net 1/0

Methuen & Co.

- Bodley (J. E. C.), The Coronation of Edward VII.
Batson (H. M.), A Book of the Country and the Garden . . . 10/6
Batson (H. M.), A Concise Handbook of Herbaceous Plants. . . 3/6
Hyett (F. A.), A Short History of Florence 7/6
Cross (Mrs. Ada Cambridge), Thirty Years in Australia . . . 7/6
Lorima (George Horace), Letters from a Self-made Merchant to his Son 6/0
When I was a Child. By an Old Potter Boy. 6/0
Bloom (J. H.), Shakespeare's Garden. 3/6 & net 4/0
Wyon (R.) and Prance (G.), The Land of the Black Mountain Being a Description of Montenegro 6/0
Snell (F. J.), A Book of Exmoor 6/0
Brightman (F. E.), The Devotions of Bishop Andrewes . . . 6/0
Hannay (James O.), The Spirit and Origin of Christian Monasticism 6/0

LITTLE BIOGRAPHIES:

- Terry (C. S.), The Young Pretender 3/6 & net 4/0
Henderson (T. F.), Robert Burns. 3/6 & net 4/0
M'Dowall (A. S.), Chatham 3/6 & net 4/0
Benson (A. C.), Tennyson. 3/6 & net 4/0

THE LITTLE GUIDES:

- Salmon (A. L.), Cornwall 3/0 & net 3/6
Clinch (G.), Kent 3/0 & net 3/6
Tompkins (H. W.), Hertfordshire. 3/0 & net 3/6
Ellaby (C. G.), Rome. 3/0 & net 3/6

- The Library of Devotion.* 4 new vols. each 2/0 & net 2/6

FICTION.

- Norris (W. E.), Lord Leonard the Luckless 6/0
James (Henry), The Better Sort 6/0
Sergeant (Adeline), Anthea's Way 6/0
Makgill (G.), Outside and Overseas 6/0
Bullock (Shan F.), The Squireen 6/0
Randal (J.), Aunt Bethia's Button 6/0
Monkhouse (Allan), Love in a Life 6/0
Penny (Mrs. Frank), A Mixed Marriage 6/0
Forrest (R. E.), The Sword of Azrael, a Chronicle of the Great Mutiny 6/0
Clifford (Hugh), A Free Lance of To-day. 6/0
Bowles (H. Stewart), A Stretch Off the Land 6/0
Moore (Arthur), The Knight Punctilious. 6/0
Brooke (Emma), The Poet's Child 6/0
Rhys (Grace), The Diverted Village 6/0
Bland (Mrs. E.) (E. Nesbit), The Red House 6/0
Gordon (Julien), World's People 6/0
Mayall (J. W.), The Cynic and the Syren 6/0
Burton (J. Bloundelle), A Branded Name 6/0
Trafford-Taunton (Winefride), Silent Dominion. 6/0
Lowis (Cecil), The Machinations of the Myo-Ok 6/0
Janson (Gustaf), Abraham's Sacrifice 6/0
Abbot (J. H. M.), Plain and Veldt. 6/0
Waineman (Paul), By a Finnish Lake. 6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Lucas (E. V.) edited by, The Complete Works of Charles Lamb. 7 vols.	each	7/6
Carlyle (Thomas), The Life and Letters of Oliver Cromwell 3 vols.	each	6/0
Macaulay (Lord), Critical and Historical Essays. 3 vols.	each	6/0

THE LITTLE LIBRARY:

Borrow (George), Romany Rye	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Thackeray (W. M.), Esmond	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Thackeray (W. M.), Christmas Books	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Dickens (Charles), Christmas Books. 2 vols.	each net 1/6 & net 2/6
Nichols (J. B. B.) edited by, A Little Book of English Sonnets	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Hawthorne (Nathaniel), The Scarlet Letter... ..	net 1/6 & net 2/6

John Murray.

Goschen (Viscount), The Life and Times of Georg Joachim Goschen, Publisher and Printer of Leipzig 1752-1829. 2 vols.	net 36/0
Cartwright (Julia), Isabella D'Este, Marchioness of Mantua, 1474-1539: A Study of the Renaissance	net 25/0
Lyall (Right Hon. Sir Alfred), The Life of the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava	net 12/0
Warren (T. Herbert), Prince Christian Victor	net 12/0
Sykes (Captain C. A.), The Re-occupation of the Nile	net 15/0
Elsmie (G. R.—Edited by), Field-Marshal Sir Donald Stewart: The Story of His Life—Mainly in His Own Words	net 8/0
Bonde (Baroness), Paris in '48	net 18/0
Duff (Right Hon. Sir Mountstuart E. Grant), Some Biographical Essays. 2 vols.	net 18/0
Jackson (Lieut.-Col. Basil), Notes and Reminiscences of a Staff Officer at Waterloo and St. Helena	net 9/0
Cust (Lionel), Notes on the Authentic Portraits of Mary Queen of Scots	net 9/0
Weigall (Lady Rose—Edited by), Correspondence of Lady Burghersh, afterwards Countess of Westmorland, with the Duke of Wellington	net 31/6
Smith (G. C. Moore—Edited by), Life of John Colborne, Field-Marshal Lord Seaton	net 25/0
Guest (Montague) and Poulton (William B.), The Royal Yacht Squadron	net 32/0
Sir A. Henry Layard, Autobiography and Letters. Edited by The Hon. William Napier Bruce. 2 vols.	net 21/0
More Letters of Charles Darwin: A Record of His Work, in a Hitherto Unpublished Series. Edited by Francis Darwin and A. C. Seward. With Portraits. 2 vols.	net 315/0
Murray (A. S.), The Sculptures of the Parthenon	net 21/0
Brown (G. Baldwin), The Arts in Early England. 2 vols.	net 21/0
Benson (Bernhard), The Drawings of the Florentine Painters. 2 vols.	net 21/0
Giglioli (Signora), Naples in 1799: A History of the Revolution of 1799 and of the Rise and Fall of the Parthenopean Republic, including the parts played by Lord Nelson and Lady Hamilton. Derived mainly from Italian sources. With numerous Illustrations	net 21/0
Kloss (C. Boden), In the Andamans and Nicobars: The Narrative of a Cruise in the Schooner "Terrapin," with notices of the Islands, their Fauna, Ethnology, &c.	net 21/0
Anderson (Tempest), Volcanic Studies in Many Lands: Being Reproductions of Photographs by the Author of above One Hundred Actual Objects, with Explanatory Notices	net 21/0
Haldane (Right Hon. R. B.), The Pathway to Reality: The Gifford Lectures delivered in the University of St. Andrews in the Session 1902-1903	net 10/6
Is it Shakespeare? The Great Question of Elizabethan Literature, Studied in the Light of New Revelations and New Contemporary Evidence. By a Cambridge Graduate. With Facsimiles	net 12/0
Alexander (Rev. S. A.), The Mind of Christ	net 6/0
Furse (Venble. C. W.), The Beauty of Holiness	net 7/6
Sturge (Miss M. Carter), The Truth and Error of Christian Science	net 6/0
Tylor (Prof. Edward Burnett), Animism: A Treatise on the Natural History of Religion. Based on the Gifford Lectures delivered in Aberdeen in 1889-90 and 1890-91	net 12/0

Essays in Illustration of Shakespeare's Life and Plays. Collected from the Papers of the late Charles Isaac Elton, Q.C., M.P. Edited by A. Hamilton Thompson. With a Memoir by Andrew Lang	net 6/0
Okakura (Kakazu), The Ideals of the East, with special reference to the Art of Japan	net 6/0

THE PROGRESSIVE SCIENCE SERIES:

Stephen (Paget), Experiments on Animals	net 6/0
Thomson (J. Arthur), Heredity	net 6/0
Wright (John), The Home Mechanic	net 7/8
Fahie (J. J.), The Starry Galileo	net 9/0
Plunkett (Rt. Hon. Horace), Ireland and Irish Problems	net 9/0
Cook (Theodore Andrea), Spirals in Nature and Art	net 5/0
Plunket (Hon. Emmeline M.), Ancient Calendars and Constellations	net 5/0
Golden String. A Day Book for Busy Men and Women. Arranged by Susan, Countess of Malmesbury, and Violet Brooke Hunt	net 5/0

FICTION.

Ollivant (Alfred), Danny	net 6/0
Hutchinson (Horace), Bert Edwards, Golf Caddie	net 2/6
Wilkins (Mary E.), The Wind in the Rose Bush	net 6/0

Eveleigh Nash.

Hume (Major Martin A. S.), The Love Affairs of Mary Queen of Scots	net 12/0
--	----------

FICTION.

Cobb (Thomas), The Intriguers	net 6/0
Morrison (Arthur), The Red Triangle	net 6/0
Tynan (Katharine), A Red Red Rose	net 6/0
Harte (Bret), Trent's Trust	net 6/0
Brookfield (Mrs. Charles H. E.—Edited by), The Diary of a Year: Passages in the Life of a Woman of the World	net 3/6
Roberts (Morley), The Promotion of the Admiral	net 3/6

Newnes, Ltd.

A NEW ART LIBRARY. Each volume containing 64 full page Illustrations and a photogravure Frontispiece:
The Works of Botticelli	net 3/6
The Works of Sir Joshua Reynolds	net 3/6
OUR NEIGHBOURS SERIES:
Danish Life in Town and Country	net 3/6
Austrian Life in Town and Country	net 3/6
LIBRARY OF USEFUL STORIES:
The Story of Rapid Transit	net 1/0
The Story of the Atlantic Cable	net 1/0
Bryden (H. A.) and Tozer (Basil), How to Buy a Gun	net 1/6
Myers (A. Wallis—Edited by), Lawn Tennis at Home and Abroad. Profusely Illustrated	net 10/6
Meade (Mrs. L. T.), Stories from the Old Old Bible	net 7/6
"Players of the Day" consisting of 48 Heliochrome Portraits of Theatrical Celebrities	net 10/6
Williams (Jesse Lynch), New York Sketches	net 7/6
Van Dyke (Prof. John C.), The Meaning of Pictures	net 5/0
Bartholomew (J. G.), The Handy Shilling Atlas	net 1/0
Le Queux (William), The Tickencote Treasure (a Novel)	net 6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Mill (H. R.—Edited by), The International Geography, Revised and Enlarged	net 15/0
THIS PAPER CLASSICS:
Evelyn's Diary	net 3/0 & net 3/6
Lamb's Works	net 3/0 & net 3/6
Peacock's Novels	net 3/0 & net 3/6

THIS PAPER NOVELS:

Ainsworth's Old St. Paul's	net 2/6 & net 3/0
Whitehead's Richard Savage	net 2/6 & net 3/0

ILLUSTRATED SIXPENNY NOVELS.

Doyle (A. Conan), Micah Clarke	net 2/6
Le Queux (William), Secrets of Monte Carlo	net 2/6
Gray (Maxwell), In the Heart of the Storm	net 2/6

Nisbet & Co.

Thomas (Col. E. H.), The Remnant of Israel.....net	2/6
Thoughts for Young Christians, by F. B.net	1/0 & net 1/6
Baskerville (Rev. C. G.), Sidelights on the Epistles to the Ephesians.....net	1/0 & net 1/6
Marshall (Mrs.), An Old-fashioned Garden. A Book of Poems
Torrey (R. A.), Revival Addresses	3/6
Churchill (Lieut.-Col.), General Gordon	5/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Belloc (Hilaire), Robespierre: a Study and Biography ... net	5/0
Hume (Martin A. S.), Treason and Plot	5/0
Fry (Rt. Hon. Sir Edward), Studies by the Way	5/0
Brodrick (Hon. G. C.), Memories and Impressions	5/0
Atherton (Gertrude), A Daughter of the Vine.....	3/6
Atherton (Gertrude), American Wives.....	3/6
Findlater (Jane H.), The Story of a Mother	3/6
White (Percy), The Journal of a Jealous Woman	3/6
Tynan (Katharine), A Union of Hearts	3/6
Balfour (Andrew), Cashiered. Stories of the South African Veldt.....	3/6
Jameson (Eva), When the Dream is Past.....	3/6
Wood (Mrs. Henry), Danesbury House.....	5/0

David Nutt.

The Tudor Translations.

The English Bible. Translated out of the original tongues by the Commandment of King James the First, Anno. 1611. With a Terminal Essay by William Ernest Henley present subscription price for the 6 vols.	90/0
Notes and Emendations to Aeschylus, Sophocles and Euripides. In connection with the Text of the 5th edition of Dindorf's "Scenici Graeci," by an M.A. of Cambridge	10/6
Januaris (A. N.), St. John's Gospel and Epistles as read by the Early Christians	10/7
Brandin (L.), edited by, The Chatelaine of Vergi	2/0
Adcock (J. St. John), From a London Garden: Poems ... net	2/6
The Marriage of Cupid and Psyche, translated from the Latin of Apuleius, by Charles Stuttaford
Gollancz (H.), Clavicula Solomonis. A Hebrew MS. newly discovered	1/6
The Ancient East:
Messerschmidt (Dr. L.), The Hittites.....	1/0 & 1/6
Willmore (J. Selden), Handbook of Spoken Egyptian Arabic	2/0
Boosdorf (A. T. W.), On the Literary Theories of Taine and Herbert Spencer.....net	1/0
Macleod (Fiona), A reissue of Miss Fiona Macleod's shorter stories rearranged, and with additional tales. In three vols. 3/0 net, or each vol. separately	1/6

C. A. Pearson, Limited.

Pemberton (T. Edgar), The Life of Bret Harte (The Authorised Biography)	16/0
Marks (Montague), Home Arts and Crafts	3/6
Leney (Lydia), The Mother's Guide to Management of Children in Health and Sickness	3/6
The Lover's Dictionary ...	2/6
Leverson (Mrs. Waldemar), Small Homes and How to Furnish Them	1/0
Biddle (Violet Purton), Roses and How to Grow Them	1/0
Holbein (Montague A.), Swimming	1/0
Cricket. With Contributions by K. S. Ranjitsinhji, C. B. Fry, G. L. Jessop, C. L. Townsend, G. Brann, &c.—
Edited by G. L. Jessop	1/0
Andrews (Harry), Training for Athletics and General Health	1/0
Leverson (Mrs. Waldemar), Little Economies and How to Practise Them	1/0
Devereux (G. R. M.), Etiquette of Engagement and Marriage	1/0

PEARSON'S GOSSIPY GUIDES:

The Isle of Wight	1/0
Channel Islands, Normandy, and Brittany	1/0
Brighton and District	1/0
Worthing and Littlehampton	0/6

FICTION.

Hyne (C. J. Cutcliffe), Captain Kettle, K.C.B.: The Last Adventures of Captain Kettle	6/0
Macgrath (Harold), Arms and the Woman	6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

PEARSON'S SIXPENNY SERIES OF FAMOUS NOVELS:

Westcott (E. N.), David Harum.
Cameron (Mrs. Lovett), A Royal Lover.
Marsh (Richard), Strange Wooing of Mary Bowler.
Hume (Fergus), Lady Jezebel.
Pemberton (Max), Queen of the Jesters.
Doyle (Conan), The Parasite.
Bodkin (M. McDonnell), Paul Beck.
Hill (Headon), Guilty Gold.
Hyne (C. J. Cutcliffe), The Little Red Captain: An Early Adventure of Captain Kettle.

G. P. Putnam's Sons.

Wiener (Prof. Leo), Anthology of Russian Literature. Part II.net	12/6
Firth (J. B.), Augustus Caesar and the Organisation of the Empire of Rome	5/0 & 6/0
Smith (William Henry), A Political History of Slavery. 2 vols.net	20/0
Thacher (John Boyd), Christopher Columbus. 3 vols.each, net	37/6
Dahlinger (Charles W.), The German Revolution of 1849.....	7/6
Woodburn (James Albert), The American Republic and its Government	9/0
Woodburn (James Albert), Political Parties and Party Problems in the United States	9/0
Shoemaker (Michael Meyers), The Great Siberian Railway from Petersburg to Peking.....net	9/0
Robinson (Charles Mulford), Modern Civic Art
Swift (Frederick R.), Florida Fancies	6/0
Sweven (Godfrey), Limanora: The Island of Progress	6/0
Thayer (Stephen H.), Songs from Edgewood	5/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Peak and Prairie and Pratt Portraits. 2 vols.	10/0
ARIEL BOOKLETS:
Shakespeare's Sonnets	1/6
Cranford	1/6
Adventures of Baron Munchausen	1/6

Religious Tract Society.

Wellson (Rt. Rev. J. E. C.), Youth and Duty. Sermons to Harrow Schoolboys	3/6
Pigott (C. A.), Steadfast unto Death; or, Martyred for China: Memorials of Thomas Wellesley and Jessie Pigott.....	2/6
Bell (John), A Miracle of Modern Missions, The Story of Matula, a Congo Convert	2/0
Moore (Henry Charles), Noble Deeds of the World's Heroines	2/0
Vaisey (Mrs. George de Horne), Pixie O'Shaughnessy	2/6
Bullen (Frank T.), A Sailor Apostle.....	0/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Lovett (Richard), James Chalmers; his Autobiography and Letters.....	3/6 & net 6/6
Roads from Rome. A Series of Personal Narratives compiled by Rev. C. S. Isaacson	2/6
Whately (E. Jane), Roman Claims and Bible Warrants, or Which Way?	1/6

Grant Richards.

Burgoyne (Alan), Submarine Navigation. 2 vols	31/6
Steward (Herbert Thomas—Compiled by), The Records of the Henley Royal Regatta. From its Institution in 1839 to 1902.....net	21/0
Bramwell (J. Milne), Hypnotism: Its History, Practice and Theory.....net	18/0
Godfrey (Elizabeth), Home Life under the Stuarts, 1603-1649.....net	12/6
Utley (W.—Edited by), The Motor Car Year Book (1903-4), with a specially prepared Map of Great Britain giving all main roads	12/0

Strachey (Lionel—Translated by), Memoirs of a Contemporary: Being Reminiscences by Ida Saint-Elme, Adventuress, of her Acquaintance with Certain Makers of French History, and of her Opinions Concerning them. From 1790 to 1815	12/0
Caffin (Charles H.), American Masters of Painting	12/0
Halstead (Murat), The Life of Theodore Roosevelt	10/6
Schierbrand (Wolf von), Germany: The Welding of a World Power	10/6
Alderson (Bernard), Arthur James Balfour: a Biographical Sketch	10/6
Washington (Booker T.), Character Building	6/0
Mee (Arthur—Edited by), England's Mission by England's Statesmen: Chatham to Chamberlain	6/0
Omond (T. S.), A Study of Metre	5/0
Moeller (Lieut. B.—The Diary of), Two Years at the Front with the Mounted Infantry	6/0
Booth (Annie M.), Simple Cookery: Including Vegetarian and Invalid Dishes, Confectionery, Ices, &c.	4/6
Boynton (H. W.), The Golfer's Rubāiyāt	2/6
Dowie (Menie Muriel), Things about our Neighbourhood	6/0
The Plays of Molière: A new translation by A. R. Waller, together with the French text on opposite pages. Vol. III. containing "The School for Wives," "The School for Wives Criticized," "The Impromptu of Versailles," "The Compulsory Marriage," and "The Princess of Elis"	3/6
Crosland (T. W. H.), Lovely Woman	5/0
Davidson (John), The Knight of the Maypole	5/0
Byng (L. Cranmer), The Never Ending Wrong: Verse Renderings of the Chinese from the Prose Translations of Prof. Herbert A. Giles	5/0
Noyes (Alfred), The Flower of Old Japan	5/0
Alma-Tadema (Lawrence), Songs of Womanhood	2/0 & net 3/0

Routledge & Sons.

Prescott (W. H.), Historical Works. Edited by J. Foster Kirk. 12 vols.	5/0
Walsh (Walter), The Jesuits in Great Britain: A Historical Inquiry into their Political Influence	7/6
Beaven (A. H.), Electric Locomotion. Fully illustrated	5/0
Saint-Hilaire (J. B.), The Buddha and his Religion	5/0
Dunn (Archibald), The Bridge Book	3/6
Farrow (G. E.), A New Book of Nonsense Verses. Illustrated by J. Hassall	5/0
Whishaw (Fred), The Yellow Sachel	3/6
Williams (Philip H.), The Modern Chess Problem	5/0
Gibbon (F. P.), A Prisoner of the Gorkhas	3/6
Froude (J. A.), The Nemesis of Faith	3/6
Bosville (Godfrey), Pounding the Field: A Sporting Novel ...
Parr (Olive Katharine), The Voice of the River: A Dartmoor Book for Children	5/0
Rarey (J. S.), Horse Taming. Illustrated	2/0

NEW EDITIONS.

THE AUTOGRAPH CLASSICS: A New Series of Standard Works:
Longfellow's Translation of Dante, The Spectator and Bailey's "Festus"	5/0
Byron (Lord), Poetical Works in 3 vols.	10/6
Crowe (Mrs.), The Night-side of Nature	2/0
Dumas's Novels. Illustrated "Porthos" Edition.....	3/6
Hugo (Victor), Novels. "Avenue Edition." 7 vols.	3/6
Lesage's Complete Works. Translated.....	3/6
Lever (Charles), Novels	3/6
Motley (J. L.), Rise of the Dutch Republic. 3 vols.	15/0
Mulhall (M.), Dictionary of Statistics	21/0
"Nimrod." The Life of John Mytton. With 16 Coloured Plates	12/6
Poe (E. A.), Works of. 6 vols.	21/0
Ramage (Dr. C. T.), Beautiful Thoughts from French and Italian Authors; from German and Spanish Authors; from Greek Authors; and from Latin Authors. A Series of Quotation Books	3/6

ROUTLEDGE'S INDIA-PAPER EDITIONS:

Fielding's Tom Jones
Smollett's Peregrine Pickle
Shakespeare's Works. "The Ariel Edition." In 40 vols. with outline illustrations to each by Howard. Each volume to contain one Play.....	0/6
Shelley (George R.), The Dagonet Poems	1/0 & net 2/0

Fielding (Henry), An Illustrated Edition of his Novels. 5 vols.	5/0
Grocott (J. C.), An Index to Familiar Quotations	3/6
Herodotus. Histories. Translated by Henry Carey	3/6
Hawthorne (N.), The Scarlet Letter	1/0
Howitt (W.), The Homes and Haunts of the British Poets. Illustrated	3/6
Surtees (R. S.), Jorrocks's Jaunts and Jollities	12/6
Wood (Rev. J. G.), The Illustrated Natural History	12/6

HALF-FORGOTTEN BOOKS:

A collection of Works, mainly Fiction, which from one reason or another have been suffered to go out of Print. Edited by E. A. Baker.

Robinson (Emma), Whitefriars; or, the Court of Charles I.	2/0
Mounteney-Jephson (R.), Tom Bulkeley	2/0
Dickens (Charles), Memoirs of Grimaldi, the Clown	2/0
Radcliffe (Ann), The Mysteries of Udolpho	2/0
Haliburton (Judge), Sam Slick, the Clockmaker	2/0

Sands & Co.

Kerr (Lady Amabel), The Gift of Pentecost	5/0
Merry del Val (Raphael), The Truth of Papal Claims	3/6
"Scrutator," Back to Rome—Edited by William Wallace and Sheriff Campbell Smith: being a series of Private Letters addressed to an Anglican Clergyman	3/6
Butler (Francis H.), Que Scripsi. A Book of Verse	5/0
Sladen (Douglas), Edward the Black Prince	5/0
Carey (Winifred Rose), The Lady of Swanhill the Fair, and other Poems	2/6
Jeyes (S. H.), Mr. Secretary Chamberlain	16/0
"Robert Wallace, M.P.: Life and Last Leaves".....	16/0
Rossetti Papers: 1862-1870.....	10/6
Dixon (William Searth), The Evolution of the Fox Hound	21/0
St. Edmund, Archbishop of Canterbury. His Life as told by old English Writers. Arranged by Bernard Ward	6/0
Bagshawe (Bishop), The Psalms and Canticles: A Metrical version	4/6
Geddie (John), Romantic Edinburgh	3/6
Bryden (H. A.), A History of South Africa	6/0
Colman (C. S.), Types of British Plants (fully illustrated) ...	3/6
Pratz (C. de), French Dishes for English Tables	2/6
The Army Medical System from Within, by "One who Knows"	1/0
Price (Richard Lloyd), Dogs' Tales	1/0
Campbell's (Francis), Map Guides:
I. Normandy.
II. Provence.
III. The Environs of Paris.
IV. Brittany.
Each contains a large Map in Three Colours showing the different Roads, Railways, &c.	0/10

FICTION.

Binstead (A. M.), Pitcher in Paradise	6/0
Gordon (Samuel), The Queen's Quandary	6/0
Wright (Seppings H.), The Clang of the Bell	2/6
Rock (Austin), In the Shadow of the Manse	3/6

SIXPENNY NOVELS.

"Swears," Chestnuts .
"Rita," Prince Charming .
Roberts (Morley), Taken by Assault .

Walter Scott, Ltd.

Dant (Chas. H.), The People's Life of Archbishop Temple ...	3/6
MAKERS OF BRITISH ART:
Baynes (Prof.), The Life and Works of Sir David Wilkie	3/6
Williams (C. F. Abdy), The Story of Notation	3/6
Lee-Hamilton (Eugene), The Lord of the Dark Red Star	6/0
Lee-Hamilton (Eugene), Dramatic Sonnets, Poems, and Lyrics	1/0

CONTEMPORARY SCIENCE SERIES:

Greenstreet (W. J.), Morals: Their Psycho-Sociological Bases. Being a translation of Duprat's La Morale	6/0
Rydberg (Viktor), Singoalla	3/6
Ward (H. W.), The Book of the Peach	2/6
Alderson (Dr. F. H.), Indigestion, its Prevention and Cure ...	1/0

Seeley & Co.

NEW EDITIONS.

Church (Prof. A. H.), Josiah Wedgwood, Master Potter	net 5/0 & net 7/0
Church (Rev. A. J.), Stories from English History. Cheaper Edition Revised	3/6
Brock (Mrs. Carey), Dame Wynton's Home: A story illustrative of the Lord's Prayer	1/6
Stevenson (Robert Louis), Edinburgh. Picturesque Notes	net 0/6
Moule (Right Rev. H. C. G.), At the Holy Communion	0/6
Kerr (R.), Wireless Telegraphy	1/0 & 1/6

Skeffington & Son.

Buxton (Rev. H. J. Wilmot), Common Life Religion	5/0
Skrine (Canon John Huntley), The Mountain Mother	3/6
Askew (Rev. Edmund A.), The Service of Perfect Freedom	5/0
Revington-Jones (Rev. J. E.), Via Sacra	2/0
Lilienthal (Rev. Hermann), Some Actors in Our Lord's Passion	net 2/6
Whelpton (Rev. Urling), Help from Holy Communion	2/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Corbett (Rev. F. St. John), A Thousand Things to say in Sermons	net 5/0
Wilson (Rev. Harry), Catholic Teaching, or, Our Life and His Love	1/6
Forde (G. M.), A Goodly Heritage	2/6
Vaux (Rev. J. Edward), Church Folk Lore	6/0
Buxton (Rev. H. J. Wilmot), The Battle of Life	5/0

Smith, Elder & Co.

Dictionary of National Biography Index and Epitome. Edited by Sidney Lee	net 25/0 & net 32/0
Atlay (J. B.), Sir Henry Acland, Bart., K.C.B.: A Memoir	14/0
Earle (Mrs. C. W.), A Third Pot-Pourri	7/6
Rowland (Percy F.), The New Nation: A Sketch of the Present Conditions of Life, and of the Economic and Political Outlook in the Australian Commonwealth	7/6
Goodspeed (George S.), History of the Babylonians and Assyrians	6/0
Birt (T. B. Bradley), A Glimpse of Chota Nagpore	net 12/6
King (W. J. Harding), In Search of the Masked Tawareks	12/6

FICTION.

Ward (Mrs. Humphry), Lady Rose's Daughter	6/0
Capes (Bernard E. J.), A Castle in Spain	6/0
Hope (Graham), The Triumph of Count Ostermann	6/0
De La Pasture (Mrs.), Cornelius	6/0
Prichard (K. and Hesketh), Roving Hearts	6/0
Childers (Erskine), The Riddle of the Sands	6/0
Simpson (Miss Violet A.), The Bonnet Conspirators	6/0
Carr (M. E.), George Goring's Daughters	6/0
Hutchinson (Horace E.), Crowborough Beacon	6/0
McChesney (Dora Greenwell) London Roses	6/0
Hornung (E. W.), No Hero	3/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Lee (Sidney), Queen Victoria: A Biography. Third Impression. With omissions and corrections	10/6
Collected Edition of A. Conan Doyle's Novels in Twelve Volumes	each net 6/0

S.P.C.K.

Codrington (T.), Roman Roads in Britain
Conybeare (Edward), Roman Britain
Taylor (Rev. C.), The Shepherd of Hermas

Browne (Right Rev. G. F.), St. Aldhelm: His Life and Times
Lefroy (Very Rev. Dean), Christian Science
Webster (Rev. Wentworth), Gleanings in Church History. Chiefly in Spain and France
Ovenden (Rev. C. T.), The Church Navy. Thoughts for Church Workers
Wace (Rev. Henry), The Bible and Modern Investigation
Bodington (Rev. C.), Life in Christ
Norwich (The Bishop of), My Life in Mongolia and Siberia
Handley (Rev. Hubert), A Christian Knight
Chadwick (Rev. W. E.), Pauperism or Self-Help
Beeching (Rev. Canon H. C.), A Plea for the Parson

Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

Wundt (Prof. W.), Physiological Psychology. A Translation of the 5th, wholly re-written (1902-3) German Edition, by Prof. E. B. Titchener, M.A. (In 3 vols.) Vol. I. with 156 illustrations	net 21/0
Ramsay (Sir James), The Angevin Empire: The Three Reigns of Henry II., Richard I., and John (A.D. 1154-1216)	12/0
Bax (E. Belfort), The Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists	6/0
Harbottle (T. B.), Dictionary of Historical References and Allusions	7/6
Hayward (F. H.), The Critics of Herbartianism and other Contributions to the Herbartian Question	4/6
Latham (Edward), Famous Sayings and their Authors	7/6
Levy-Bruhl (Prof.), The Philosophy of Auguste Comte	10/6
Ward (Prof. H.), and Cronise (F. M.), Cunnie Rabbit, Mr. Spider, and Over Beef: West African Folk Tales
Schurmann and Voigt, History of Education	7/6
Carpenter (Edward), From Adam's Peak to Elephanta: A Record of Travel and of Observation	4/6
Clapton (Dr. Edward), The Life of St. George
Adamson (J. G.), The Theory of Education in Plato's "Republic"	4/6
May (Lt.-Col.), Imperial Defence: Its Problems and Policy
Mew (J.), Traditional Aspects of Hell
Ramakrishna (T.), Padmini: An Indian Romance
Stubbs (C. W.), The Land and the Labourers	2/6

FICTION.

Aitken (J. R.), The Sins of a Saint	6/0
Annals of Hollyfont	6/0
Stirling (Hew), The Southern Cross	6/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Prescott (W. H.), History of the Conquest of Peru
Schopenhauer (A.), The Basis of Morality
Sonnenschein (W. S.), The Best Books. A Reader's Guide to the Choice of the Best available Books in all Departments of Literature. New Impression	net 31/6
Religious Systems of the World	10/6
Dalbiac (Col. P. H.), Dictionary of Quotations (English)	7/6
Dobree (L. E.), Manual of Home Nursing	1/6

W. Thacker & Co.

Collett (Col. Sir Henry), Flora Simlensis	net 15/0
---	----------

NEW EDITIONS.

Thacker's Indian Directory, 1903	36/0
Thacker's Directory of the Chief Industries of India 1903	7/6
Pillai (J. P.), Representative Indians. Second Edition with Additional Lives	net 7/6
Shadwell (Major L. J.), North-West Frontier Warfare	6/0
Sherston (Col. J.), Tactics as Applied to Schemes	net 10/6
Birch (Edward A.), Hints for the Management and Medical Treatment of Children in India	10/6
Lyon (J. B.), Medical Jurisprudence for India
Aberigh-Mackay (George), Twenty-one Days in India. Being the Tour of Sir Ali Baba, K.C.B.	6/0
Laughton (L. G. Carr—Edited by), Naval Pocket Book 1903

Treherne & Co.

Coleman (John), Reminiscences of Charles Reade	net 15/0
Compton (Herbert), Facts and Phantasies	net 7/6
Cowie (A. G.), How to Go to Sea	net 10/6
"Diplomaticus" (Lucien Wolf), History of the Triple Alliance	net 21/0

THE POETS OF THE RENAISSANCE.

A series of dainty booklets, which will give a bird's-eye view of the poetry of the era from Surrey to Herrick, and will consist of twelve volumes arranged and edited by Sidney Dark and Harry Roberts.

Surrey, Wyatt, and Sackville	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Spenser	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Ben Jonson	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Marlowe and Greene	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Herbert, Vaughan, and Crawshaw	net 1/6 & net 2/6
Drummond of Hawthornden	net 1/6 & net 2/6

FICTION.

Compton (Herbert), The Palace of Spies	6/0
Marsh (Richard), The Death Whistle	6/0
Hume (Fergus), The Miser's Will	6/0
Le Queux (William), Three Glass Eyes	6/0

T. Fisher Unwin.

The Memoirs of Paul Kruger. Told by Himself. 2 vols.	32/0
The Anglo-Boer War. Edited by Commandant Bresler. With Introductory Chapters by Generals Kritzinger, Fouché, Joubert, and the Rev. J. D. Kestell. With 30 Maps.	21/0
Stein (M. Aurel), Sand-Buried Ruins of Khotan	net 21/0
Eyre-Todd (George), Crimean Simpson's Autobiography	net 21/0
Millar (J. H.), A Literary History of Scotland	16/0
Boutmy (Emile), The English People: A Study of Its Political Psychology	16/0
Shuckburgh (E. S.), Augustus. Life and Times of the Founder of the Roman Empire (B.C. 63—A.D. 14)	16/0
McCarthy (Justin), Portraits of the Sixties	16/0
Jay (Harriett), Robert Buchanan: Some Account of His Life; His Life's Work and His Literary Friendships	net 10/6
Le Blond (Mrs. Aubrey), True Tales of Mountain Adventure for Non-Climbers, Young and Old	net 10/6
The Story of the Nations Series: Subscription Edition. 56 vols. for a preliminary payment of 8/0, and 16 subsequent payments of 10/0 each or cash.	160/0
McCarthy (Justin), Leaders of Parliament	net 7/6
Gardner (Alice), The Conflict of Duties and Other Essays ...	7/6
Escott (T. H. S.), King Edward and His Court	6/0
Lewis (G. Pitt), The Life of Commissioner Kerr	net 10/6
Pike (G. Holden), Wesley and His Preachers	7/6
De La Rey (Mrs. General), A Woman's Wanderings during the Anglo-Boer War	2/6
Wallis (C. E.), The Life and Death of King Henry the Second. An Historical Drama. Vol. II.	4/6
Dethridge (G. Olivia), compiled by, The "Lucas Malet" Birthday Book	net 4/0
Gould (F. C.), Froissart in 1902	3/6
Mario (Jessie White), James Stansfeld	21/0
Plowden (A. C.), Memories Grave and Gay. The Reminiscences of a Metropolitan Magistrate	net 10/6
King (Clarence), Mountaineering in the Sierra Nevada	6/0
Street (Eugene E.), A Philosopher in Portugal	net 5/0
Adams (W. A.), The Lonely Way and Other Poems	3/6
Honeyman (G. Van Doren), Bright Days in Merrie England	6/0
Richardson (Frederick A.—Edited by), The International Quarterly. March—June, 1903	net 5/0

STORY OF THE NATIONS SERIES:

Lane-Poole (Stanley), Mediæval India under Mohammedan Rule	5/0
Rhys-Davids (Prof.), Buddhist India	5/0
Jenks (Edward), Parliamentary England	5/0
Bateson (Mary), Mediæval England	5/0
Davies (Prof. T. Witton), Heinrich Ewald: Orientalist and Theologian	net 3/6

Evans (S. Hope), Sea Children	2/6
Truscott (L. Parry), As a Tree Falls	1/6 & 2/0
Caryl (Valentine), A Ne'er do Weel	1/6 & 2/0

THE WELSH LIBRARY (Edited by Owen M. Edwards):

The Mabinogion. Vols. 1-3	each 1/0 & 2/0
Edwards (Owen M.), edited by, A Short History of Wales	1/0 & 2/0
Edwards (Owen M.), edited by, A Short History of Welsh Literature	1/0 & 2/0
Thomas (Edward), edited by, The Works of John Dyer	1/0 & 2/0
Guiney (Miss Louise I.) edited by, The Works of George Herbert	1/0 & 2/0

FICTION.

Barry (William), The Dayspring	6/0
Moore (George), The Untilled Field	6/0
Hobbes (John Oliver), The Vineyard	6/0
Hobbes (John Oliver), The Flute of Pans	6/0
Becke (Louis), Helen Adair	6/0
Cleeve (Lucas), The Man in the Street	6/0

FIRST NOVEL LIBRARY:

Richardson (Mrs. Aubrey), A Drama of Sunshine, Played in Homburg	6/0
Langbridge (Rosamond), The Flame and the Flood ...	6/0

Wells Gardner & Co.

Kidd (Rev. B. J.—Edited by), The late Canon Bright's Letters: Letters of the Rev. William Bright	12/6
Hutton (Rev. W. H.), The Bampton Lectures for 1903: The English Saints	net 2/0
Robinson (Rev. F. Douglas), Prepare to Meet Thy God	3/6
Aitken (Rev. W. Hay M. H.), The Divine Ordinance of Prayer	3/6
Davidson (Rev. J. P. F.), Retreat Addresses to Clergy	net 3/6
Davidson (Rev. J. P. F.), Retreat Addresses to Women	net 3/6
Matthew (Mrs.), Addresses to the Mothers' Union	1/0
Barker (Mrs.), The Religious Instruction of Children at Home	net 1/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Overton (Rev. J. H.), The Church in England. 2 vols.	each 3/6
The Church and New Century Problems. A volume of Essays contributed by the Bishops of Durham (Dr. Westcott), Worcester, and Bloemfontein, Canons Scott Holland and S. A. Barnett; Revs. A. L. Lilley, T. C. Fry, and Percy Dearmer.	2/6
Clayton (Joseph), Father Dolling. A Memoir	net 1/0 & 2/0

Williams and Norgate.

Wernle (Prof. Paul), The Beginnings of Christianity. New volume to be added to the Theological Translation Library. Vol. I.	1/0
Delitzsch (Prof. Friedrich), Babel und Bibel. A translation of the Lectures recently delivered before the German Emperor	2/0
Severus, The Sixth Book of the Letters of, Translated from the Syriac Version, by E. W. Brooks, M.A.	1/0
Vynne and Blackburn, Women under the Factory Act ...	net 1/0
Davis (J. R. Ainsworth) and Fleure (H. J.), Patella, The Common Limpet. Being the Forthcoming (Number 10) Memoir of the Liverpool Marine Biology Committee.	net 2/0
Hibbert Journal. A New Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy. No. III.	net 2/6

DAVID NUTT'S LIST.

THE TUDOR TRANSLATIONS. Edited by W. E. HENLEY.
Vols. xxxiii-xxxviii.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

Translated out of the original tongues by the commandment of King James the First. Anno 1611. With a Terminal Essay by WILLIAM ERNEST HENLEY. Price £4 10s. Vol. I. ready.

ST. JOHN'S GOSPEL AND EPISTLES AS READ BY THE EARLY CHRISTIANS.

A parallel edition, in Greek and English, based upon the traditional text, i.e., upon the textus receptus critically sifted and freed from numerous editorial, scribal, and exegetic errors, with a fresh, independent, and faithful translation into English, a double critical apparatus, a short Commentary and Glossary by A. N. JANNARIS, M.A., Ph.D., Author of "An Historical Greek Grammar," &c. Demy 8vo. Upwards of 200 pages. Cloth. Probable price, net 10s. 6d. [Ready April.]

* * A further application to the New Testament of the method so successfully applied by Blass to the writings of St. Luke. The results will be found of equal importance and interest alike by theologians and historians.

THE ANCIENT EAST.

Each number, crown 8vo, paper, 1s., cloth, 1s. 6d.

No. 6. THE HITTITES. By Dr. L. MESSERSCHMIDT. With 19 Illustrations. [Ready.]

Dr. Messerschmidt's study sums up accurately and precisely what is actually known about the Hittite peoples and their mysterious civilisation.

HANDBOOK OF SPOKEN EGYPTIAN ARABIC.

Comprising a short Grammar and an English Arabic Vocabulary of Current Words and Phrases. By J. SELDEN WILLMORE, M.A., one of the two Judges of the Native Court of Appeal, Cairo, Author of "The Spoken Arabic of Egypt." 16mo, cloth, 2s. [Ready.]

THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI.

A French metrical romance of the 13th century. Edited by Prof. L. BRANDIN, and translated into English prose by ALICE KEMP-WELCH. With collotype reproductions of a 14th century carved ivory casket, giving scenes from the romance. 16mo, 112 pages. Printed at the Constable Press on hand-made paper. 2s. net. [Ready end of March.]

* * The French original, one of the most interesting examples of French mediæval story-telling, a tale of passion in high life by a 13th century Bourget, has hitherto only been accessible in M. Raynaud's edition in Romania.

GERALD THE WELSHMAN.

By HENRY OWEN, D.C.L., F.S.A., Editor of George Owen's Pembrokeshire. A revised and enlarged edition. Crown 8vo, about 250 pages. [Ready May.]

FROM A LONDON GARDEN.

Poems by J. Sr. JOHN ADCOCK, Author of "Songs of the War," "The Luck of Private Foster," &c. 16mo, 84 pp. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

THE MARRIAGE OF CUPID AND PSYCHE.

Translated from the Latin of Apuleius by CHARLES STUTTFORD. With four designs by JESSIE MOTHERSOLE. Royal 8vo. Printed at the Ballantyne Press in Red and Black, in a limited issue of 500 copies on the finest Arnold hand-made paper, and copies on Japanese vellum, with double states of the plates. Sumptuously bound in undressed leather with embossed design.

* * To be issued about April 20. Subscription form on application.

ON THE LITERARY THEORIES OF TAINE AND HERBERT SPENCER.

Two Lectures by A. T. W. BORSDOFF, Ph.D., Professor at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth. Crown 8vo, 69 pp. 1s. net. [Ready May.]

* * As preliminary to an attempt at constructing a Science of Literature, the author criticises the two most influential theories of literary aesthetics of the last fifty years.

CLAVICULA SALOMONIS.

A Hebrew MS. newly discovered and now described by H. GOLLANCZ, M.A., D.Litt., Gollancz Professor of Hebrew at University College, London. 1s. 6d. net. [Ready March.]

* * Describes the only known Hebrew text of this famous Manual of Mediæval Magic, the original of Faust's Hellenzwang.

THE TEACHING OF LANGUAGES.

By W. H. WIDGERY. A reprint of the pamphlet originally issued in 1888, with an introduction by H. W. EVE, M.A., sometime Dean of the College of Preceptors, and late Head Master of University College School. 16mo, upwards of 80 pp. Sewn 1s. net. [Ready April.]

DAVID NUTT, 57-59, Long Acre, W.C.

T. & T. CLARK'S LIST.

In the Press. Nearly Ready. 12s. 6d. net.
EXPLORATIONS IN BIBLE LANDS during the 19th Century. Edited by Prof. HERMAN V. HILPRECHT. A work of special importance. The section on "Palestine" is by Prof. BENZINGER; "Egypt," by Dr. STEINDORFF; "Arabia," by Dr. F. HOMMEL; "The Hittites," by Dr. JENSEN, and "Assyria and Babylonia," by the EDITOR. The volume contains nearly 900 pages, and is enriched by over 200 Plates, and 4 Maps specially drawn for this work.

Now Ready. Crown 8vo, 1s. 6d. net.
THE OLDEST CODE OF LAWS IN THE WORLD. The Code of Laws promulgated by HAMMURABI, King of Babylon, B.C. 2285-2242. Translated by C. H. W. JOHNS, M.A., Lecturer on Assyriology, Queen's College Cambridge.

Now Ready. Demy 8vo, 8s. net.
THE PAULINE EPISTLES. Introductory and Expository Studies. By Rev. R. D. SHAW, M.A., B.D., Edinburgh.

Now Ready. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.
THE CREATION OF MATTER: or, Material Elements, Evolution and Creation. By Rev. W. PROFFIT, M.A.

Now Ready. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.
APOSTOLIC ORDER AND UNITY. By the Rev. R. BRUCE, D.D., Hon. Canon, Durham.

Now Ready. Crown 8vo, 3s.
HEGEL AND HEGELIANISM. By Professor R. MACKINTOSH, D.D., Author of "From Comte to Benjamin Kidd." (New Vol. of "The World's Epoch-Makers" Series.)

DR. HASTINGS'
DICTIONARY OF THE BIBLE. Now Complete. In Four Large Volumes. Imp. 8vo. Price per Vol., in Cloth Binding, 78s. Also in Elegant Half-Morocco Bindings, prices on application. Full Prospectus, with Specimen Page, free on application.

THE CALLED OF GOD. By the late Prof. A. B. DAVIDSON, D.D., LL.D. This Volume contains a selection of the late Professor Davidson's Sermons, a Biographical Introduction by A. TAYLOR INNES, M.A., Advocate, and two Portraits. Post 8vo, 6s.

NEW WORK BY PROF. SAYCE.
THE RELIGIONS OF ANCIENT EGYPT AND BABYLONIA. The Ancient Egyptian and Babylonian Conception of the Divine. By Prof. A. H. SAYCE, D.D., LL.D., Oxford. Post 8vo, 8s. net.

THE FATHERHOOD OF GOD IN CHRISTIAN TRUTH AND LIFE. By J. SCOTT LIDGETT, M.A., Warden of Bermondsey Settlement. 8vo, 8s. net.

THE CROSS AND THE KINGDOM. As Viewed by Christ Himself, and in the Light of Evolution. By the Rev. W. L. WALKER, Author of "The Spirit and the Incarnation." 8vo, 8s.

THE MIRACLES OF UNBELIEF. By FRANK BALLARD, M.A., B.Sc. Fourth Edition, now ready. Post 8vo, 6s.

* * By special request, Messrs. Clark are issuing the Eighth Chapter, entitled "JESUS CHRIST: His Origin and Character," in separate form, with cover, price 6d. net.

THE WORDS OF JESUS. Considered in the light of Post-Biblical Jewish Writings and the Aramaic Language. By Prof. G. DALMAN, Leipzig. Authorised English Translation by Prof. D. M. KAY. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE ANCIENT CATHOLIC CHURCH. From the Accession of Trajan to the Fourth General Council (A.D. 98-451). By Principal R. RAINY, D.D., Edinburgh. Post 8vo, 1/6.

THE PENTATEUCH IN THE LIGHT OF TO-DAY. Being a Simple Introduction to the Pentateuch, on the Lines of the Higher Criticism. By ALFRED HOLBORN, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. net.

NEW MAP OF PALESTINE: Topographical, Physical, and Biblical. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW, F.R.G.S., and Prof. G. ADAM SMITH, LL.D. With complete Index. Prices: on cloth, and in cloth case, with Index, 10s. 6d.; mounted on rollers and varnished, with Index, 15s.

THE INTERNATIONAL THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

Edited by Principal S. D. F. SALMOND, D.D., and Prof. C. A. BRIGGS, D.D.

Volumes Now Ready, in Post 8vo.

THE ANCIENT CATHOLIC CHURCH. By Principal R. RAINY, D.D. 12s.

THE CHRISTIAN PASTOR. By W. R. GLADDEN, D.D., LL.D. 10s. 6d.

CHRISTIAN INSTITUTIONS. By Prof. A. V. G. ALLEN. 12s.

HISTORY OF CHRISTIANITY IN THE APOSTOLIC AGE. By Prof. A. C. MCCLIFFERT, D.D. 12s.

THE LITERATURE OF THE OLD TESTAMENT. By Prof. S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Seventh Edition. 12s.

HISTORY OF CHRISTIAN DOCTRINE. By Prof. G. P. FISHER, D.D. Second Edition. 12s.

CHRISTIAN ETHICS. By NEWMAN SMYTH, D.D. Third Edition. 10s. 6d.

APOLOGETICS. By Prof. A. B. BRUCE, D.D. Third Edition. 10s. 6d. [12s.]

THE THEOLOGY OF THE NEW TESTAMENT. By Prof. G. B. STEVENS, D.D.

THE INTERNATIONAL CRITICAL COMMENTARY.

Edited by Prof. S. R. DRIVER, D.D., A. PLUMMER, D.D., and Prof. C. A. BRIGGS, D.D.

Volumes Now Ready, in Post 8vo.

NUMBERS. By Prof. G. BUCHANAN GRAY, D.D., Oxford. [In the Press.]

DEUTERONOMY. By Prof. S. R. DRIVER, D.D. Second Edition. 12s.

JUDGES. By Prof. G. F. MOORE, D.D. Second Edition. 12s.

I. AND II. SAMUEL. By Prof. H. P. SMITH, D.D. 12s.

PROVERBS. By Prof. C. H. TOY, D.D. 12s.

ST. MARK. By Prof. E. P. GOULD. 10s. 6d.

ST. LUKE. By A. PLUMMER, D.D. Fourth Edition. 12s.

ROMANS. By Prof. SANDAY, D.D., and A. O. HEADLAM. Fourth Edition. 12s.

EPHESIANS AND COLOSSIANS. By Prof. T. K. ABBOTT. 10s. 6d.

PHILIPPIANS AND PHILEMON. By Prof. M. R. VINCENT, D.D. 8s. 6d.

ST. PETER AND ST. JUDE. By Prof. CHARLES BIGG, D.D. 10s. 6d.

Prospectuses of above Series free on application.

Full Catalogue of Publications post free on application.

Edinburgh: T. & T. CLARK, 38, George Street.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co.

VOL. I. ready March 27.

The Works of John Ruskin.

"LIBRARY EDITION."

EDITED, WITH ADDITIONS, FROM THE ORIGINAL MANUSCRIPTS

By E. T. COOK and ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN.

In about 32 Volumes, arranged in Chronological Order.

Not sold separately. 21s. each net.

The Edition for sale in the United Kingdom and America is limited to 2,000 copies.

CONTENTS.—All Mr. RUSKIN'S published works will be reprinted.

THE TEXT throughout is that which was last revised by the Author; but in Footnotes or Appendices passages from the MSS. are occasionally supplied or variations noted. The principal object in the Notes is to explain Ruskin by himself. Most of the volumes contain some new matter.

Each Volume is Prefaced by an INTRODUCTION which is at once Bibliographical and Biographical. In the compilation of these Prefaces, Ruskin's DIARIES, LETTERS, and CONVERSATIONS have been largely used.

THE PLATES. Every Illustration hitherto published will be included. In addition, a large number of unpublished Drawings will be given, as well as numerous unpublished Plates already engraved under the Author's personal supervision.

Some of the best Portraits of Mr. Ruskin are inserted as Frontispieces, and Facsimiles of the MSS. are also given.

THE PAPER is a special make of unbleached Arnold, and bears the watermark of Mr. Ruskin's Seal and Monogram.

VOLUME I.

Early Prose Writings, 1834 to 1843.

Consisting of 612 pages, Large Medium 8vo (9½ by 6½), with Frontispiece in Colour, 20 Plates, 78 Woodcuts, and a Facsimile of MSS., Bound in a special Holliston cloth, with uncut edges.

CONTENTS:

Preface giving a Biographical and Bibliographical Account of the Several Works in this Volume, together with Selections from the Author's Correspondence relating to them.

The Poetry of Architecture.

Causes of the Colour of the Water of the Rhine.

The Strata of Mont Blanc.

The Effect of the Atmosphere on Stones in Buildings.

Causes of the Variation of Temperature between Spring and River Water.

The State of Meteorological Science.

A Landslip near Giagnano.

Notes on the Theory and Practice of Perspective.

The Proper Shapes of Pictures.

Works of Art and the Sublimity of Nature.

Essay on Music and Painting. (Mostly Unpublished.)

Leon.

The King of the Golden River. (With Facsimiles of original Woodcuts from First Edition.)

Essay on Literature, and Letters to Mr. Dale.

Letters to a College Friend.

The Ascent of the St. Bernard.

(A Dramatic Sketch.)

Chronicles of the St. Bernard:—

A Night at the Hospice.

Velasquez, the Novice.

(Hitherto Unpublished.)

Followed by other volumes at intervals of a month, as near as possible.

London: GEORGE ALLEN, 156, Charing Cross Road.

G. P. PUTNAM'S SONS'

CHRISTOPHER COLUMBUS. By JOHN BOYD THACHER, Author of "The Continent of America," "The Cabotian Discovery," &c. Three volumes, royal octavo (about 2000 pages). Containing some 300 plates, which comprise portrait, reproductions in facsimile of manuscripts, views, and maps. Edition de Luxe, Vellum backs.

A limited edition, sold only in sets, price £1 17s. 6d. net per volume.

No single work of greater or even of equal importance has been published on this subject, save the unconnected papers in the Raccolta issued by the Italian Government. This work is a whole library of Columbian literature in itself.

ANTHOLOGY OF RUSSIAN LITERATURE. By LEO WIENER. Part II. From the Close of the Eighteenth Century to the Present Day. With Index, 12s. 6d. net.

A POLITICAL HISTORY OF SLAVERY. Being an Account of the Slavery Controversy from the Earliest Agitations in the Eighteenth Century to the Close of the Reconstruction Period in America. By WILLIAM HENRY SMITH. Introduction by Whitelaw Reid. Two volumes. 8vo. Cloth. 20s. net.

POLITICAL PARTIES AND PARTY PROBLEMS IN THE UNITED STATES. With a Consideration of Political Morality. By JAMES ALBERT WOODBURN. 8vo. Cloth. 9s. net.

The AMERICAN REPUBLIC and its GOVERNMENT. An Analysis, with a Consideration of its Fundamental Principles and of its Relations to the States and Territories. By JAMES ALBERT WOODBURN. 8vo. Cloth. 9s. net.

THE GREAT SIBERIAN RAILWAY FROM ST. PETERSBURG TO PEKIN. By MICHAEL MYERS SHOEMAKER. Thirty Illustrations and a Map. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 9s. net.

OLD PATHS AND LEGENDS OF NEW ENGLAND. By KATHARINE M. ABBOTT. Fully illustrated. 8vo. Cloth. 15s. net.

By ROBERT W. CHAMBERS.

LORRAINE. A Romance. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 3s. 6d. Third Edition.

THE RED REPUBLIC. A Romance of the Commune. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 3s. 6d. Eighth Edition.

FLORIDA FANCIES. By FREDERICK R. SWIFT. With Drawings by ALBERT E. SMITH. Crown 8vo. Cloth. 6s. net.

LA GRANDE MADEMOISELLE. By ARVEDE BARINE. Translated by HELEN E. MEYER. Demy 8vo. 28 plates. Cloth extra, gilt tops. 12s. 6d. Second English Edition.

24, Bedford St., Strand, London, W.C.; And New York.

Messrs. WILLIAMS and NORGATE beg to announce that on account of the unprecedented demand for the

HIBBERT JOURNAL, The New Quarterly Review of Religion, Theology and Philosophy,

They will be unable to meet the demand for a few days, as it has been necessary to reset Number One and print off a FOURTH EDITION; they also advise the reprinting of a further quantity of Number Two, being the THIRD IMPRESSION printed off of this number.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., W.C.

Just Published. Fourth Edition, thoroughly revised, demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT. Including the Musical Copyright Act, 1902, the American Copyright Act, the Berne Convention, the Consequent Order in Council and Cases to Date. By THOMAS EDWARD SCRUTTON, M.A., LL.B., K.C., Author of "Charter Parties and Bills of Lading," &c., and Lecturer in Common Law to the Incorporated Law Society.

"Mr. Scrutton's book is well written and has been carefully revised, and will be found a safe and acceptable guide through the mazes of the existing law."—Law Journal.

"We think it is not only the easiest, but the most useful and practical work on copyright."—Law Quarterly Review.

LONDON: WM. CLOWES & SONS, LTD., Law Publishers, 7, Fleet Street (adjoining Middle Temple Lane).

Will be Ready April 1st, royal 8vo, 215 pages, Number Three of

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL. A QUARTERLY REVIEW OF RELIGION, THEOLOGY, AND PHILOSOPHY.

Price 2s. 6d. net. Ten Shillings per annum, post free.

PRINCIPAL CONTENTS OF NUMBER THREE.

OPTIMISM AND IMMORTALITY. By G. LOWES DICKINSON, M.A., Fellow of King's College, Cambridge.
MARTINEAU'S PHILOSOPHY. By Professor A. SETH PRINGLE PATTERSON, Professor of Logic and Metaphysics in the University of Edinburgh.
BUDDHISM AS A LIVING FORCE. By Professor T. W. RHYS DAVIDS, Ph.D., I.L.D.
THE DRIFTING OF DOCTRINE. By Rev. Professor J. P. MAHAFFY, D.D.
THE FAILURE OF CHRISTIAN MISSIONS IN INDIA. By JOSEPH OLDFIELD, D.C.L. (Oxon.), M.R.C.S. (England).
RECENT ASPECTS OF THE JOHANNINE PROBLEM. I. THE EXTERNAL EVIDENCE. By B. W. BACON, D.D., of Yale University, New Haven.
DID PAUL WRITE ROMANS? A Reply. By Professor PAUL W. SCHMIDEL, of Zurich.
AUGUSTE SABATIER AND THE PARIS SCHOOL OF THEOLOGY. By Professor G. B. STEVENS, Ph.D., D.D., I.L.D., of Yale.
DISCUSSIONS. By Rev. J. R. WILKINSON, Professor PERCY GARDNER, Dr. F. C. SCHILLER, and the Rev. R. A. ARMSTRONG.
And a Number of SIGNED REVIEWS.
By Dr. JAMES MOFFATT, Dr. A. E. TAYLOR, Professor VERNON BARTLET, Professor PERCY GARDNER, F. C. CONYBEARE, M.A., Dr. B. W. BACON, etc.
Also a BIBLIOGRAPHY of Recent Books and Articles in Theological and Philosophical Periodicals.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE, 14, Henrietta St., Covent Garden, London, W.C.; and 7, Broad St., Oxford.

Just Published. Fourth Edition, thoroughly revised, demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT. Including the Musical Copyright

Act, 1902, the American Copyright Act, the Berne Convention, the Consequent Order in Council and Cases to Date. By THOMAS EDWARD SCRUTTON, M.A., LL.B., E.C., Author of "Charter Parties and Bills of Lading," &c., and Lecturer in Common Law to the Incorporated Law Society.

"Mr. Scrutton's book is well written and has been carefully revised, and will be found a safe and acceptable guide through the mazes of the existing law."—Law Journal.

"We think it is not only the easiest, but the most useful and practical work on copyright."—Law Quarterly Review.

LONDON: WM. CLOWES & SONS, LTD., Law Publishers, 7, Fleet Street (adjoining Middle Temple Lane).

TO COLLECTORS AND CONNOISSEURS.

Messrs. BEMROSE & SONS

Begin to announce that they have made arrangements to publish shortly a beautifully illustrated

HISTORY OF OLD

ENGLISH PORCELAIN,

By L. M. SOLON,

the well-known Potter Artist and Collector.

The Prospectus, with Specimens of the Plates, is now in preparation, and will be forwarded, as soon as ready, to all those desiring particulars.

LONDON: BEMROSE & SONS, LIMITED, 4, Snow Hill, E.C.; and Derby.

The Academy and Literature

Is now

POSTED FREE to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-.

FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17/6

will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy.

Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or News vendor,

OR DIRECT TO THE PUBLISHER OF

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE,
Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

THE WRITER'S YEAR BOOK. 500 Places to Sell Manuscripts, Photographs and Drawings.

A Commercial Directory for Professional Writers, Artists, and Photographers, giving the Address, Rates, Time of Payment, and Conditions of Contributorship of all Magazines, Papers, &c., Purchasing MSS., Photos or Drawings. Articles by AARON WATSON, ELIZABETH BANKS, and GALLOWAY KYLE.

Price 1/6, post free 1/9.

THE WRITER'S YEAR BOOK Co.,
Granville House, Arundel Street, Strand, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY (LIMITED).

SUBSCRIBERS may be entered at any time—
FOR LONDON: from ONE GUINEA per annum.
FOR THE COUNTRY: from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

FOR THE WEEKLY DELIVERY OF BOOKS IN LONDON AND SUBURBS: from TWO GUINEAS per annum.

All the Newest and Best Books are placed in circulation on publication. Lists and Terms post free on application.

BOOKSELLING DEPARTMENT.

EARLY SECOND-HAND COPIES of the FIRST EDITIONS of the BEST BOOKS from the Library are offered for SALE at REDUCED PRICES within a few months of Publication. Catalogue free on application. A LARGE STOCK is kept of WORKS by STANDARD and FAVOURITE AUTHORS, in HANDSOME LEATHER BINDINGS. Classified Catalogues free on application.

SCARCE AND OUT OF PRINT Books sought for and reported upon free of charge.

BOOKBINDING DEPARTMENT.

Messrs. MUDIE undertake BOOKBINDING of all kinds, Plain or Decorative. Special attention is given to OLD AND VALUABLE BOOKS, and to the REPAIR OF OLD BINDINGS. Estimates given.

30-31, NEW OXFORD STREET, LONDON, W.C.

BRANCHES:

48, Queen Victoria St., E.C.; 941, Brompton Road, S.W.; also at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

THE FIRESIDE DICKENS.

A New and Complete Edition of the Works of

CHARLES DICKENS

With nearly 700 Illustrations by Cruikshank, "Phiz," &c.

In twenty-two Volumes, Crown 8vo.

The volumes, which are set in large type are being printed at the Oxford University Press on good opaque paper. The longer works have been priced at 2s. net each in cloth; and the ten shorter volumes at 1s. 6d. net each in cloth. Bound in paste grain leather, gilt top, the books will cost 3s. 6d. net and 3s. net respectively.

NOW READY.

SKETCHES BY BOZ, &c. 43 Illustrations; cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

THE PICKWICK PAPERS. 43 Illustrations; cloth, 2s. net; leather, 3s. 6d. net.

OLIVER TWIST. 24 Illustrations; cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 3s. net.

Three books will be published monthly until September when four will be issued, completing the edition.

Each volume can be obtained separately:

OF ALL BOOKSELLERS.

LONDON:

Chapman & Hall, Ltd., Henry Frowde,
11, Henrietta Street, Amen Corner,
W.C. E.C.

THE WORLD'S WORK.

Edited by HENRY NORMAN, M.P.

Principal Contents for April.

Special New Portraits of Mr. G. Wyndham, M.P. Mr. W. E. Henley, Mr. E. R. Henry, C.S.I., and Miss Helen Keller.

A SONG OF SPEED. By W. E. HENLEY.
"CAN I AFFORD A MOTOR CAR?" By HENRY NORMAN, M.P.

WEST POINT—A Great Military Academy. By A. H. LEE, M.P., and Major BOILEAU, R.A. (Illustrated.)

KING VICTOR EMANUEL AND HIS WORK. By SALVATORE CORTESI. (Illustrated.)

THE RAILWAY STRUGGLE FOR IRELAND. By H. G. ARCHER. (Illustrated.)

DARK SIDES OF AMERICAN LIFE. TEMPERANCE REFORMERS AND PUBLIC HOUSE TRUSTS. By CHALMERS ROBERTS and T. P. WHITTAKER, M.P.

HUNTING: Its Value and Its Future. (Illustrated.)

FISH FARMING IN SCOTLAND. By HARRY SPRECKLEY. (Illustrated.)

FINGER PRINTS IN CRIMINAL DETECTION. (Illustrated.)

THE HUGE CHARITIES OF LONDON JEWS. By Rev. IDONEE HARRIS, M.A.

OUR INEFFICIENT MILITARY EDUCATION. By T. MILES MAGUIRE, LL.D.

OUR DEFECTIVE METHOD OF SCIENTIFIC EDUCATION. By P. CHALMERS MITCHELL, F.R.S., D.Sc.

THE PROBLEM OF DISTANCE MEASUREMENT. By W. CRAIG HENDERSON. (Illustrated.)

THE WORK OF THE BOOK WORLD, with Portraits of Mr. Henry James, Mr. Barry Pain, Mr. George Gissing, and Benjamin Swift.

Etc., etc. 37 Articles. 91 Illustrations.

THE WORLD'S WORK.

Monthly 1s. net. Yearly 10s., post free.

LONDON: WILLIAM HEINEMANN, 21, Bedford Street, W.C.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 8d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher 43, Chancery Lane.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s LIST.

1903 ISSUE READY NEXT WEEK.
THE STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK.
Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the Year 1903. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF BROOKE FOSS WESTCOTT, D.D., D.C.L.,
sometime Bishop of Durham. By his Son, ARTHUR WESTCOTT. With photogravure Portraits. 2 vols. Extra crown 8vo, 17s. net. (Ready April 3.)

CHARLOTTE M. YONGE.
HER LIFE AND LETTERS.
By CHRISTABEL COLERIDGE. With 9 Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

FOREIGN STATESMEN SERIES.
New Volume.
MAZARIN.
By ARTHUR HASSALL, M.A. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

A NEW NOVEL.
FROM THE UNVARYING STAR.
A STORY OF A COUNTRY PARISH.
By ELSWORTH LAWSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

POPULAR UNIFORM EDITION OF
THOMAS HARDY'S WORKS.
In Fortnightly Volumes, with a Map of Wessex in each. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.
LATEST EDITION.
THE HAND OF ETHELBERTA.

HISTORY OF GREECE FOR BEGINNERS. By J. B. BURY, M.A., Hon. D.Litt. Oxon., Hon. LL.D., Regius Professor of Modern History in the University of Cambridge. With Illustrations and Maps. Globe 8vo, 3s. 6d.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.
Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.
CONTENTS FOR APRIL:—
JOHN MAXWELL'S MARRIAGE. By STEPHEN GWYNN. Chapters V. to VIII.
THE PASSING OF THE MAISON DORÉE. By Stoddard Devey.
AN EDUCATIONAL INSTANCE.
THE NEWSPAPER.
WHITE WITCH.
THE LAND OF THE LÆSTRYGONS. By Frank Mathew.
PARSIFELD.
THE CULT OF EMOTIONS. By G. Woodhams.
A VICTIM OF ROMANCE. By Margaret Armour.
THE REINCARNATION OF JOHN LAW. By A. Maurice Low.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.
ILLUSTRATED.
Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.
The APRIL Number contains:—
THE WIZARD'S DAUGHTER. By Margaret Graham.
LIFE AND DEATH. By Charlotte Fiske Bates.
MODERN MUSICAL CELEBRITIES. I. Personal Recollections of Verdi, Wagner, Gounod, Liszt, and Tchaikowsky. By Hermann Klein. Portraits from photographs.
BUTTE-CITY: Greatest of Copper Camps. By Ray Stanard Baker. Pictures by Ernest L. Blumenschein.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.
ST. NICHOLAS.
Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.
The APRIL Number contains:—
THE LITTLE BROWN PITCHER. Story. By Elsie C. Cranz.
TRAINING FOR INTERSCHOLASTIC ATHLETICS. Sketch by G. W. Orton.
THE STORY OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS KNIGHTS. A Serial Story. Illustrated by the Author. By Howard Pyle.
A RACE AND A RESCUE. Story. By Eleanor Gates.
And numerous other Stories for the Young.
MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

FROM Mr. MELROSE'S LIST.

At 2s. 6d. Net.
By CUTHBERT LENNOX.
THIRD EDITION.
JAMES CHALMERS OF NEW GUINEA. Missionary, Pioneer, and Martyr. By CUTHBERT LENNOX, Author of "Henry Drummond." Large Crown 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. net. Two Maps and Eight Illustrations, including a Fine Portrait.

At 2s. 6d. Net.
FOURTH (ENLARGED) EDITION.
HENRY DRUMMOND, A Biographical Sketch (with Bibliography). By CUTHBERT LENNOX. With Photographs and a special Wash Drawing by SCOTT RANKIN. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards. Price 2s. 6d. net.

At 2s. 6d.
"BOOKS FOR THE HEART" SERIES.
Edited by ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A. Foolscap 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 2s. 6d. NEW VOLUMES.
THE DIARY AND JOURNAL OF DAVID BRAINERD. With an Introduction by the EDITOR. Two Volumes, 5s.

At 3s. 6d. Net.
By Dr. R. A. TORREY.
FOURTH EDITION.
HOW TO PROMOTE AND CONDUCT A SUCCESSFUL REVIVAL.
By R. A. TORREY, D.D. Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, gilt top, price 3s. 6d. net.
The Christian says:—"A book which many workers may find of service. . . . Mr. Torrey aims to direct us in these activities, and we trust his very practical papers will find many sympathetic readers."

By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A.
NEW WORK.
By the Author of "THE CROWN OF SCIENCE."
At 6s.
THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.
By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A. Large Imp. 16mo, cloth boards.

THIRD EDITION.
THE CROWN OF SCIENCE: The Incarnation of God in Mankind.
By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A. 224 pages. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d. net.
The Examiner says:—" . . . Fresh and wonderfully convincing. . . . The subject is a fascinating one, and is treated here by one who has bestowed much thought upon it."

At 3s. 6d.
By Dr. J. R. MILLER.
SECOND EDITION.
SHINING AND SERVING: Six Addresses on the Christian Life.
By J. R. MILLER, D.D. White fancy back, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

The King's Own Library, 3s. 6d.
NEW VOLUME.
TORN FROM ITS FOUNDATIONS. From Brazilian Forests to Inquisition Cells. By DAVID KER, Author of "Ossage and Czar." Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.
The Bookman says:—"Another established favourite. Mr. David Ker has used his own experience of wild lands to first-rate effect in 'Torn from its Foundations,' a thrilling story of Brazil."

At 5s.
By Rev. ALEX. SMELLIE, M.A.
SECOND EDITION.
IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.
Brief Daily Meditations for a Year. By ALEX. SMELLIE, M.A. Imp., cloth boards, gilt edges.
The Expository Times says:—"All is original and all of choicest quality. . . . The thought is never abstruse, but in touch with the simple realities of our spiritual life; yet it is always fresh. . . . We have not had a book of daily meditations so near to what it ought to be as this is, though many have tried to furnish one."

At 5s.
THE MAKING OF THE EMPIRE: The Story of our Colonies. By ARTHUR TEMPLE, author of "Our Living Generals," &c. With New Portraits and Illustrations. Fifth Edition, re-written, extended, and brought up to June, 1902. Cloth boards, 5s.

16, PILGRIM STREET, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

New Volume by K. & Hesketh Prichard.
On MARCH 31st. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ROVING HEARTS.

By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD,
Authors of "A Modern Mercenary,"
"Karadac; Count of Gersay,"
"Tammer's Duel," &c.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS, LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.
SECOND IMPRESSION.

With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.
ACADEMY.—"Mrs. Ward writes of the things that matter in the inner individual life, and in no former book we think, has her touch been surer, or her insight into motive and character more searching and sympathetic."
SKETCH.—"It is not too high praise to say that Mrs. Humphry Ward's last book contains all her qualities and none of her defects. . . . She has preserved a most perfect balance, and one would not have a word left out or a word added."

CORNELIUS.

By Mrs. DE LA PASTURE,
Author of "Deborah of Tod's," "Adam Grigson," &c.

NOTICE.—The FIRST IMPRESSION of CORNELIUS was nearly sold out before publication. A SECOND IMPRESSION is being actively prepared.

DAILY MAIL.—"Charmingly told. . . . Miss Phillpotts Morrice is quite the most entertaining figure we have met in recent fiction."

THE TRIUMPH OF COUNT OSTERMANN.

By GRAHAM HOPE,
Author of "A Cardinal and his Conscience" and "My Lord Winchenden."

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"Quite as good a novel as 'A Cardinal and his Conscience,' and that is to say that it is very good indeed. . . . Primarily a love story, though historical characters live in its pages. And they do live, which is the main point. They are no mere lay figures."

THE BONNET CONSPIRATORS.

By VIOLET A. SIMPSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.
"The action of the story takes place during the few days in July, 1815, when Buonaparte was still in partial hiding near the French coast, and before he had made up his mind to throw himself on the mercy of England."

THE CORNHILL MAGAZINE FOR APRIL. PRICE ONE SHILLING.

CONTENTS.
BARLASCH OF THE GUARD. Chaps. 10-12. By HENRY SETON MERRIMAN.
ALMS FOR OBLIVION.—IV. By R. GARNETT, O.B., LL.D.
SONGS OF THE WANDERING ISLE. By WILFRID WILSON GIBSON.
PROSPECTS IN THE PROFESSIONS.—VIII. The Schoolmaster.
THE RED CAT. By HAROLD BEGGIE.
THE FLAMBOYANT PERIOD IN COOKERY. By Mrs. PENNELL.
THE OUTWITTER OF NAPOLEON. By H. W. WILSON.
THE MENACE OF THE SUBMARINE. By Lieutenant G. E. ARMSTRONG, R.N.
THE MAKING OF A UNIVERSITY. By SIDNEY WEBB, LL.D.
THE CUCKOO. By OSWALD H. LATTER.
AN OLD ACCOUNT BOOK. By Miss LILLIAN C. SMYTHE.
GREATER LOVE. By HUGH CHIFFORD, C.M.G.

LONDON:
SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1612. Established 1869. London: 28 March 1903. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK	307
REVIEWS.
Shakspeare and his Forerunners	311
The Ideals of the East	312
The Life of Bret Harte	313
The Sailor King, William the Fourth; His Court and His Subjects	314
Memoirs of a Contemporary	315
Schumann	315
The Impressions of a War Correspondent	316
SHORT NOTICES:
A Book of the Country and the Garden—Kensington—The Art of Living— John, Jonathan and Mr. Oppen—Shafts of Satire and Symbolism	316
FICTION:
Pearl Maiden—The Stumbling-Block	317
Notes on the Week's Novels	318

ARTICLES.
TAKEN AS READ	319
A Pioneer of Appreciation	320
Another Humourist	321
Impressions—XXV. Aldwych	322
DRAMA:
Prosit. E. K. Chambers	322
ART:
"John, my boy—lignify it." C. L. H.	323
SCIENCE:
The Enemy. C. W. Saleeby	324
CORRESPONDENCE:
Shakespeare's Street	325
Wanted—Two Words	325
"Medieval French Literature"	325
Tota's Title	325
Johnson or Goldsmith?	325
Dublin Publishers	325
"Hakluyt's Voyages"	325
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
The twelve most interesting Books announced in recent Supplement	325

The Literary Week.

No book of outstanding importance has been published during the past week. Readers of fiction can take their choice among 19 new novels. Mrs. Atherton, following the line of research that resulted in her novel "The Conqueror," has published "A Few of Hamilton's Letters." An attractive volume is Lady Butler's "Letters from the Holy Land" with sixteen illustrations by the author in colour. Among other books of the week we note the following:—

THE SCULPTURES OF THE PARTHENON. By A. S. Murray.

Dr. Murray has taken as a starting point certain lectures on the sculptures of the Parthenon delivered by him some years ago to the students of the Royal Academy. "It was the experience of these lectures," says the author, "that has since led me to enter upon a much closer examination of the sculptures on artistic more than on archaeological lines." The scheme of illustration embraces the whole of the sculptures, so far as they are known from extant originals or from Carrey's drawings. We are given the frieze almost in its entirety in a single long folding sheet, which slips into a pocket inside the back cover. There are also many illustrations in the text. The volume is dedicated to the Royal Academy of Arts "in token of many friendships past and present."

THE AGE OF SHAKESPEARE. By Thomas Seacombe and J. W. Allen. 2 vols.

An addition to the "Handbooks of English Literature" series. The period covered is from 1579 to 1631, a period concerning which the authors write " . . . the more the Elizabethan period is explored, the more separate and individual it will be discovered to be: the more clearly will it appear that the atmosphere in which it rose, so to speak, was such as had never existed before, and is not likely ever to exist again—cannot possibly exist again." The first volume deals with Poetry and Prose, the second with the Drama. About half of the second volume is devoted to Shakespeare.

THE sixth volume of Mr. John Murray's new issue of Byron, edited by Mr. Ernest Hartley Coleridge, is wholly given up to "Don Juan." The volume has more than the ordinary interest of an excellent reprint, for it contains a seventeenth and hitherto unpublished canto. Seventeenth cantos have appeared before, some of which claimed to be genuine, whilst others were crude imitations. But there is no doubt about the authenticity of the present addition. Trelawny found the stanzas in Byron's house at Missolonghi. The MS. was handed over to John Cam Hobhouse, and is now in the possession of his daughter, the Lady Dorchester. These new stanzas are not good Byron, though the touch is unmistakeable: we quote the eighth, ninth, and eleventh:—

Great Galileo was debarred the Sun,
Because he fixed it; and, to stop his talking,
How Earth could round the solar orbit run,
Found his own legs embargoed from mere walking:
The man was well-nigh dead, ere men begun
To think his skull had not some need of caulking;
But now, it seems, he's right—his notion just:
No doubt a consolation to his dust.

Pythagoras, Locke, Socrates—but pages
Might be filled up, as vainly as before,
With the sad usage of all sorts of sages,
Who in his life-time, each, was deemed a Bore!
The loftiest minds outrun their tardy ages:
This they must bear with and, perhaps, much more;
The wise man's sure when he no more can share it, he Will have a firm Post Obit on posterity.

Temperate I am—yet never had a temper;
Modest I am—yet with some slight assurance;
Changeable too—yet somehow "Idem semper:"
Patient—but not enamoured of endurance;
Cheerful—but, sometimes, rather apt to whimper:
Mild—but at times a sort of "Hercules furens:"
So that I almost think that the same skin
For one without—has two or three within.

The three concluding stanzas revert to Don Juan and the Duchess, but nothing is added to the story. The volume is dedicated to Mr. Swinburne.

MR. W. E. HENLEY contributes to the new number of "The World's Work" a poem in praise of the motor-car, called a "Song of Speed." The poem is prefaced by an appreciation of Mr. Henley by Mr. William Archer. In spite of Mr. Henley's joy in athletic activity, for many years he has been denied it. His "life-long struggle with ill-health" has left him crippled. Mr. Archer says:—

The whirligig of time has brought in a tardy revenge for his years of enforced inertia. It has brought in the high-power motor-car; and by the kindness of the friend to whom he dedicates this "Song of Speed," Mr. Henley has been enabled to taste in ample pleasure that keenest of sensations to which he has here given (I think it no rashness to aver) imperishable utterance. It was exquisitely opportune—or shall we say providential?—that, when the motor came Mr. Henley was here to sing it. Never was English poet better fitted for the task.

In these three or four hundred lines, we have not only a daring and vivid celebration of the new factor in human affairs, but a compendium of all the poet's art and philosophy. I know not whether it is more pathetic or exhilarating to see this wounded foot-soldier suddenly snatched up from the battlefield, mounted on a magic steed, and finding, in the rush of its onset, inspiration for a new and spirit-stirring and exultant song.

The sense of rush and speed in the poem is certainly remarkable; it has a gusto, an exhilaration, which carry us along in a whirl. Yet the poem has thought as well, and expresses once again that philosophy which Mr. Henley has often given utterance to before. We quote some passages:—

*In the Eye of the Lord,
By the Will of the Lord,
Out of the infinite
Bounty dissembled,
Since Time began,
In the Hand of the Lord,
Speed!*

Speed—
Speed, and a world of new havings:
Red-rushing splendours
Of Dawn; the disturbing,
Long-drawn, tumultuous
Passions of Sunset;
And, these twain between,
The desperate, great anarchies,
The matchless serenitudes,
The magical, ravishing,
Changing, transforming Trances of Daylight.

Mr. Henley sees in the adaptation of power which gives him this keen enjoyment an expression of the restless and prevailing energy of the race:—

For the Heart of Man
Tears at Man's destiny
Ever; and ever
Makes what it may
Of his wretched occasions,
His infinitesimal
Portion in Time,
His merely incomputable
Shred of Eternity,
His ninety-ninth part,
If you count by God's clock,
Of a second on Earth
In the lust and the pride
Of God's garment, the Flesh.

*So in the Eye of the Lord,
Under the Feet of the Lord,
Out of the measureless
Goodness and grace
In the Hand of the Lord,
Speed!
Speed on the Knees,
Speed in the Laugh,
Speed in the Gift,
Speed in the Trust of the Lord—
Speed!*

No one save Mr. Henley, we believe with Mr. Archer, could so have sung the praise of the motor-car. And the whole poem has a personal meaning and application which add to the force of its swinging rhythm.

THE first volume in Mr. John Allen's "Library Edition" of Ruskin is published this week. It contains the "Early Prose Writings, 1834-1843," some of which were published in his lifetime; others are now printed for the first time. From the diary of a tour undertaken with his parents in 1841 (Ruskin at that time was twenty-two) we quote the following characteristic passage, written at Lausanne:—

The sun is setting on Lake Lemman, and I am sitting at my own room window, watching the opposite outline. [The outline is drawn on the facing page of the MS.] The snow on the high point, fresh, is dazzlingly bright, but only there; it shades softly down on the red crags. I dim my eye—it glows like a moonrise in the grey sky. I cannot write for looking at it. Brighter yet! now it is running to the left, glowing on the pastures and pines. Oh, beautiful! The hills are all becoming misty fire, and all is grey beneath them and above. Yet redder! the middle bit is all snow; it is bursting into conflagration, over purple shades. Now the light has left the bases, but it is far along to the left on the broad field of snow—less and less—but redder and redder. Oh, glorious! It is going fast; only the middle peak has it still,—fading fast, fading—gone. All is cold but the sky, whose spray clouds are red above, and a soft clear twilight still far down the lake with the Voiron and the Salève against it. When shall I — Nay, now there is a faint red glow again on the snow fields to the left. It must have been a cloud which took it off before. When shall I see the sun set again on the Lake Lemman, and who will be with me—or who not? All is cold now.

AN experimental number of "John Bull" was published many months ago. Now the journal is seriously to be inaugurated, with the aid of a salon. But this salon is to be much less exclusive than the "Punch" Table, at which only one celebrated outsider has been privileged to sit. At the "John Bull Club" contributors, directors, and shareholders are to meet together and endeavour to revive the lost art of conversation. Ladies will be admitted, and at present over a hundred members have joined the club, the first meeting of which is to be held on "All Fools' Eve." At midnight precisely the first number is to be published. We hope some of the sparkle of the revived art of conversation will get into "John Bull's" pages.

THE bye-laws of the British Academy, now allowed by the Privy Council, regulate the number of the Fellows, sectional committees, the Council, and so forth. The number of ordinary Fellows is fixed at one hundred as a maximum, though the Academy may elect as few, apparently, as it pleases. The International Association of Academies has agreed to the admission of the association as a constituent academy in the philosophico-historic section, and Lord Reay has been nominated by the Academy as a member of the International Council. The Fellows are distributed under four main sectional committees, each having its own chairman—History and Archaeology, Philology, Philosophy, and Jurisprudence and Economics. Out of all this classification and machinery what is to come? We confess that we have no great hope.

In a letter to the "Morning Post" apropos of two new theatres now being built in London, Mr. Gordon Craig says:—

There is but one good plan on which the auditorium of a modern theatre should be designed—it is the design from Bayreuth repeated by the Germans at last in their Prinz Regenten Theatre at Munich. The Bayreuth plan makes it possible for nearly everyone in the house to view the stage from the same point.

It is not the Germans whom we have to thank for this, but a German artist. I read he had considerable difficulty in persuading the Germans that the design was at all practical.

Here in England we build more theatres than any other nation except America, and build them outrageously into the bargain. Our new theatres are the oldest things in the market. Perhaps the two houses which are to be flung up in the Strand will prove an exception.

Mr. Craig asserts that what he calls the "old pattern" theatre is responsible for half the bad work on the stage. He refers, of course, to the setting. The bad work which we are continually invited to see in the way of drama has nothing to do with architectural construction. Perhaps if it had we should feel more hopeful.

THE doubt cast upon the authenticity of certain objects in the Louvre, and in particular upon the genuineness of the Tiara of Saitapharnes, has resulted in the withdrawal of the Tiara from public view. This action, we learn from "The Times," was largely inspired by the reasons given by Dr. Murray, of the British Museum, as reported by the London correspondent of the "Matin." Dr. Murray, who has recently been nominated correspondent of the Institut de France, received a letter from a certain Mr. Hochmann, of Olbia, in the south of Russia, offering the Tiara to him. Dr. Murray mistrusted his correspondent, and replied that he had no desire to see the Tiara. The same person came to London later, and offered to Dr. Murray several objects in gold, which were at once recognised as false. They found a purchaser, however, in Mr. Pierpont Morgan. Dr. Murray is certain that the Tiara is false, though he acknowledges that he has against him three competent British authorities. The band which encircles the top of the Tiara is, Dr. Murray maintains, the only genuine part of it; the rest he declares to be of recent Russian manufacture; and that band never formed part of a Tiara, but of some form of cup. Dr. Murray was careful to add that he made no charge against the directors of the Louvre, which "is the first museum in the world, owing to the authenticity and the value of its contents."

BEFORE the recent meeting of the Royal Geographical Society devoted to the commemoration of the tercentenary of Queen Elizabeth, Mr. Edmund Gosse delivered an appreciation of Sir Walter Raleigh and his time. Side by side with the narrow and insular spirit, though valuable, in its way, of Robert Cecil—there moved a class of mind which clothed the unknown in a robe of purple vapour, exalting, transfiguring, exaggerating all remote and unexperienced facts in a magnificent sunset light of glory. And the very prototype of this class of Elizabethan temperament was that paladin of geographical romance, Sir Walter Raleigh. It was a remarkable tribute to the force and genius of Raleigh that he was recognised in his own age, and had been vaunted ever since as the patron as well as the prototype of geography as a form of imaginative literature.

To-day, in the popular mind, Raleigh gets credit for what he planned to do as well as for what he never accomplished. He is associated with Virginia, yet he never set foot in what we call North America:—

His nostrils never snuffed the fragrant air which blew out into the Atlantic from North Carolina to meet the colonists; in his bodily presence he never touched those aromatic cedars of Wokoken, never tasted the wild grapes of Roanoke. But in spirit he was there through good and evil estate. His was the brain that planned, the persistence that carried out, the courage that would never relinquish the design. And the promised land of Virginia was his in history, although he only gazed at it from the fringes of the cloud.

Lady Raleigh wrote to Cecil: "I hope, for my sake, you will rather draw Sir Walter East than help him forward toward the sunset." Yet he forever strained towards the West. Mr. Gosse well said:—

He represented to us, he would always represent to successive generations, the man who travelled, not to lay the foundations of experience, but to set a pinnacle on the finished edifice of his culture. Into the sunset Raleigh took an intellect which was one of the most powerful and most highly trained of the rich Elizabethan age. He was poet, historian, chemist, soldier, philosopher, courtier: he carried with him on his geographical expedition the prestige, the skill, the basis of ripe thought which all this commerce with the world of men and books had given him.

Raleigh represented, indeed, applied imagination at its best.

THE Boston "Literary World" is now under the editorial control of Mr. Bliss Carman, a poet who has done some invigorating work. The form of the journal is unaltered, but correspondence is included both from London and leading American cities.

THE memorial to the Venerable Bede is to take the form of an Anglian Cross, to be placed on a commanding site at Roker Point, Monkwearmouth, close to that St. Peter's Monastery which is so intimately associated with his name. The cost of the memorial is estimated at about £500, and the committee invite subscriptions.

THE news of the death of Mr. Charles Godfrey Leland probably brought to the minds of most readers only the "Hans Brietmann Ballads." But those ballads were nothing in the sum of an astonishingly industrious life. Their issue was not regarded with much hope either by author or publisher, yet within a few weeks four thousand copies had passed into circulation. They are classics in their way; the fun is irresistible, and here and there touches of real poetry emerge with unexpected effect. Mr. Leland's life was as full and varied as his work. He fought in the barricades of Paris in 1848, and went through real fighting in the American Civil War; he translated Heine and studied law; he prospected for petroleum and coal, and was a keen politician. Twenty years of his life were spent in studying the English gypsies, and he discovered a lost Celtic tongue. Languages presented no difficulties to Mr. Leland; he picked them up with the utmost ease. As a folk-lorist he contributed much to our knowledge of a most valuable and fascinating science, and there comes fresh from the press another contribution to such knowledge in "Kulóskap the Master, and other Algonquin Poems," literally translated from Indian dialects by Mr. Leland and Prof. Oyneley Prince. In addition to the forty to fifty volumes which he published, Mr. Leland contributed over two hundred articles to "Appleton's Cyclopædia." He was a man of delightful personality, and leaves behind him in some respects an almost unprecedented record.

WE have also to record the death of Dean Farrar. Dean Farrar wrote much, and achieved remarkable popularity; his appeal, indeed, was always a popular one; he was what may best be described perhaps as an eloquent writer. His best known work is probably the "Life of Christ," if we except "Eric" and perhaps "St. Winifred's" and "Julian House." We cannot think that Dean Farrar's stories were healthy, excellent though they were in intention. "Eric" is a book whose sentiment is far removed from real boyishness, and we doubt whether boys of this generation would willingly take it up. Dean Farrar was essentially a preacher, and there are certain forms of literature, of which boys' stories are a part, in which preaching is unsuitable. Perhaps it is as a preacher that Dean Farrar best deserves to be remembered. His sermons had a certain flow and literary grace, though at all times he was too diffuse. In general he was too inclined to go with the tide and to supply what the public liked.

It is not often that we have such a book as Stevenson's "Edinburgh: Picturesque Notes," in a sixpenny edition, but we are all the more glad to see it on that account. Merely as a guide-book the little volume is admirable, though nothing could be further from the guide-book manner than its opening sentence: "The ancient and famous metropolis of the North sits overlooking a windy estuary from the slope and summit of three hills." It would have interested Stevenson to know that these notes were to appear in a "People's Edition."

At the sale of the Carmichael Library at Sotheby's the other day the first edition of "Dante," with Landino's commentary and all the nineteen designs for the "Inferno" by Botticelli and Baldino, was bought by Mr. Quaritch for £1,000. Mr. Quaritch also purchased "La Divina Commedia," 1472, editio princeps, for £252, and a copy of the same date, but the second edition, for £7 less.

Bibliographical.

THE announcement that Mr. Clement Shorter is to contribute a volume on Mrs. Gaskell to the "English Men of Letters" series, recalls to mind a couple of passages in the essay on Mrs. Gaskell written by Miss Edna Lyall in 1897. Miss Lyall then mentioned the fact that "owing to the violent attacks to which her 'Life of Charlotte Brontë' gave rise, to a threatened action for libel on the part of some of those mentioned in the book, and to the manifold annoyances to which the publication of the biography subjected her, Mrs. Gaskell determined that no record of her own life should be written." Miss Lyall went on to say: "Mrs. Gaskell's wish regarding her own biography has, of course, been respected by her family; but the world is the poorer, and it is impossible not to regret that the life of so dearly loved a writer must never be attempted." We may take for granted, I think, that the difficulty here presented has been got over, and that Mr. Shorter will have, in the preparation of his volume, the co-operation of Mrs. Gaskell's relatives. Miss Lyall herself gave some biographical details about her sister novelist, some of the particulars having been supplied by Mrs. Holland, Mrs. Gaskell's daughter. Of these, Mr. Shorter, a careful and shrewd gleaner in the literary field, will no doubt avail himself. In external incident the life of Mrs. Gaskell was, of course, not rich.

Messrs. Routledge announce some interesting reproductions of time-honoured books. One of them is Froude's "Nemesis of Faith," which came out in 1849, and has not, so far as I know, been re-issued since. Mrs. Crowe's "Night-side of Nature" and Howitt's "Homes and Haunts of the Most Eminent British Poets" have long been on Messrs. Routledge's list. The firm published an edition of the latter in 1894, and editions of the former in 1882 and 1892. "The Night-Side of Nature, or Ghosts and Ghost-seers," dates from 1848; it was re-issued in two volumes in 1852. "The Homes and Haunts" dates from 1847; ten years later there was an illustrated edition of it. With many of us it was a favourite in our youthful days. The outline drawings by Frank Howard which are to illustrate the firm's "Ariel" Shakespeare (in forty volumes) last did duty, if I remember rightly, in an edition of the Bard brought out a good many years ago by Messrs. Nelson of Edinburgh. They have considerable merit of a kind. I am a little surprised to find that Messrs. Routledge propose to include among their "Half-Forgotten Books" the "Tom Bullekeley of Lissington" of Mr. Mounteney Jephson. This book, which is just thirty years old, is, I should say, wholly forgotten.

Leigh Hunt's spiritual eye should dwell well pleased upon the advertisement of the two-volume edition of his "Autobiography" which Messrs. Constable promise. For many years past the "Autobiography" has been obtainable, I believe, only in the little one-volume edition, with limp green cover, published by Messrs. Smith and Elder. I need not say that the work is well deserving of the handsome format and the ample annotation which Messrs. Constable no doubt have in store for it. It first appeared, in three volumes, in 1850. When it re-appeared in 1859 it had been revised by its author and re-revised by his son, Thornton Hunt.

Among the "Temple Autobiographies" will be that of Benjamin Franklin, which is, however, no stranger to the present generation of readers. Messrs. Blackie included it in one of their "Libraries" in 1894, and it figured in the "Minerva Library" in 1891. There had been other editions in 1889 and 1887, preceded by one in 1886 in Messrs. Cassell's "National Library." I presume the most desirable edition is that of 1818, published by Colburn in three volumes. It is certainly in every sense one of the historical autobiographies, and has itself been made the subject of a volume—"The Story of a Famous Book," published in 1871.

Another book of which we cannot well have too many editions is "Evelyn's Diary," which Messrs. Newnes are to add to their "Thin-paper Classics." This work has formed part of the "Chandos Classics" series since 1879, in which year also Mr. H. B. Wheatley gave us his four-volume edition of it. The second edition (1819) was reproduced in 1870. The diary had then been in one of Bohn's Libraries since 1859. It was first published by Colburn in 1818.

Forthcoming additions to Mr. Grant Richards's "World Library" will include, I see, Hume's "Essays" and Buckle's "History of Civilisation." The first of these was reproduced in the Lubbock series in 1894 and at three-and-six. The other made its most recent appearance last year, in the form of three volumes of the "Silver Library" at ten-and-six. Mr. Richards's editions of the two works will be, I should say, the cheapest ever put forward, and the works themselves have the advantage of being by no means hackneyed.

"Roses of Parnassus" is the general title of a series of paper-covered booklets, of which Messrs. R. Grant & Son, of Edinburgh, and Mr. Brimley Johnson, of London, have sent out the first item. Is not the title a little too suggestive of that of the "Flowers of Parnassus" series of Mr. John Lane? I should think that the two would be readily confused. The first booklet, it is stated, went into four editions between February 25 and March 12 of this year; but what were the numbers in each case? "Edition," in itself, means nothing.

I see that Messrs. Cassell have brought out the third and last volume of their "Living London." No one seems to have noticed, or at least mentioned, that "Living London" was the title of a book by George Augustus Sala published just twenty years ago.

In my note on the more recent editions of, and selections from, "Hakluyt's Voyages," I ought to have recorded that Mr. E. J. Payne's two series of selections therefrom, published by Mr. Frowde, reached a second edition, respectively, in 1900 and the present year.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Poet on Shakespeare.

SHAKSPERE AND HIS FORERUNNERS. Studies in Elizabethan Poetry and its Development from Early English. By Sidney Lanier. 2 vols. (Heinemann. 30s. net.)

THESE volumes, we are told, consist of two lectures delivered, respectively, before the John Hopkins University and before a ladies' class, in Baltimore, during the winter of 1879-80. They were not revised, but "the material fell together with merely a little pruning of repetitions." One cannot, therefore, justly regard them and criticise them as a definite or scientific study of Shakespeare and his precursors. Yet since they are republished in the form of a collective treatise, they necessarily claim such criticism. The only course, therefore, is to consider them as a coherent study, with a recommendation to mercy (so to speak) on the ground of their origin. They bear evidence of the most zealous and loving study; they are full of interest and eloquence, shot with charming lights of fancy—in a word, most pleasant reading. Yet they have more of the poet than of the systematic literary student. Where so much zealous labour has been employed, it would be both harsh and misleading to call them superficial: yet there is a sense in which the adjective might be used. With an elaborate ostentation of method, they are yet essentially capricious, flighty, without true vertebration in a considerable portion. The connections are often fanciful rather than inherent and sound. They savour more of the poet, bringing together far-fetched ideas and resemblances, than the calm student of cause and effect. A study of Shakespeare's forerunners would naturally suggest to us, above all, the dramatic poets who preceded him. But precisely these it is that Lanier does not study. He goes back to early English, where Shakespeare's predecessors are found to be Cynewulf, with the anonymous authors of the "Soul to the Dead Body," "Beowulf," and the "Legend of St. Juliana." He gets his connection by what we can but call and consider fanciful comparisons between "The Soul to the Dead Body" and the Ghost in "Hamlet," the view of Nature in "Beowulf" and in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," the "Phoenix" of Cynewulf and the "Phoenix and Dove" very dubiously assigned to Shakespeare, woman in the "Legend of St. Juliana" and in "Love's Labour's Lost" (of all Shakespearean dramas in the world!). After this fashion we would undertake with confidence—and some leisure—to connect anybody with anything. It needs a mere ingenious exercise of fancy. Not imagination—that is a quite deeper matter. In truth, Lanier's redundant fancy continually runs away with him. Then, coming to the sixteenth century, he selects as Shakespearean forerunners the sonnet-writers, from Surrey onward. Very good. But why these more than any other species of poet? If there be any reason save that Lanier loved the sonnetteers, and thought them neglected, and liked to talk about them—we have failed to discover it. A very pretty reason, doubtless, for a poet turned lecturer; but it does not pan out quite so satisfyingly in a two volume treatise.

Yet, if you trouble yourself no more than Lanier about this delightful inconsequence, you will find abundant charm in the manner. The poet in Lanier ever and again reveals itself, as in this exquisite passage on Shakespeare's forty-third sonnet:—

Note particularly how the thought skips daintily from one idea to another, just touching each with a sort of salutation. You will see that ever and anon, by using a term in a double sense, he causes two significations to meet in the same word, like two lips at the same point, and there to kiss out a new hint of meaning. Nothing can be more agile and dainty than this movement, where one hint turns the thought off at a pretty angle towards another, like a tiny stream in a meadow, whose current flowing against a blade of grass is deflected by the mere kiss of it towards the daisy at the other side, and thence again deflected to the water-lily at the other side, and so on in a hundred gracious zigzags, all between flowers.

For a style thus full of delicate allusions (says Lanier) the Chinese have a name which means a dragon-fly sipping water; and if you have—watched a burnished-blue dragon fly come sailing down upon wings so filmy that they seem like mere summer dreams of wings, until he just delicately touches the still surface of the water, makes believe to take a mere dream of a drink, and airily flutters away,—you will realise how vividly the oriental expression hits off this charming old process of sixteenth century thought, in which Shakespeare was so adroit.

A style so dainty and seductive as this would cover many faults of plan. In the second volume Lanier leads up to his subject by an elaborate attempt to reconstruct the life of Shakespeare's time; which has a like charm, but also somewhat of like defect. "The Music of Shakespeare's Time" is the best and completest section—a theme after Lanier's own heart; but too technical for us to dwell upon it here. "The Domestic Life of Shakespeare's Time" is very ambitious in scheme. But that flightiness of Lanier intervenes. He conceives the idea of representing his subject something after the fashion of the historical novelist, congenial to his poetic mind; abandons the conception, yet strives to work in part of it along with a more prosaic manner of presentation; and after all, we find that we have but a fragmentary notion of his theme, less complete and representative than a systematic writer would have given us by an accumulation of careful prosaic detail. Yet here again there is plenty of interest by the way. Better than his full pictures of the revels at Kenilworth, his disquisitions on the stage, the pulpit, or medicine, is a quite personal passage which he quotes from a letter of Master Robert Laneham, Queen Elizabeth's usher, describing his daily life at Court. It is a right Shakespearean, though unconscious, revelation of the man's own character: one thinks of Biron's sketch of Boyet, the usher in "Love's Labour's Lost." It is also an admirable side-light on what one may call the back stairs of Court life. At eight in the morning he goes to "My Lord's chamber, or my Lord's president's":—

There at the cupboard, after I have eaten the manchets served over-night for livery . . . I drink me up a good bowl of ale; when in a sweet pot it is defecated by all night's standing, the drink is the better, take that of me; and a morsel in a morning, with a sound draught, is very wholesome and good for the eyesight; then I am as fresh all the afternoon after, as I had eaten a whole piece of beef. Now, sir, if the council sit, I am at hand; wait at one inch, I warrant you: if any make babbling, "Peace," say I, "wot ye where ye are?" If I take a listener, or a pryer in at the chinks or the lockhole, I am by and by in the bones of him; but now they keep good order, they know me well enough: If he be a friend, or such a one as I like, I make him sit down by me on a form or a chest; let the rest walk, in God's name.

Of his languages, and how he exhibits them to this or that Ambassador and his men ("and I warrant you I answer him roundly, that they marvel to see such a fellow there: then laugh I, and say nothing"); of these things we must baulk the reader.

Shakespeare himself (apart from Shakespeare relatively) occupies only the last third of the second volume; and even here Lanier is busy with the working-out of a pet theory of his own, which seems to us not without its fancifulness. But though we only partially follow it, none the less it is interesting, and is handled so as to bring out much which is true and important in regard to the poet's development. Briefly, it is that Shakespeare's work, during the middle portion of his career, was embittered by some tragic sorrow or calamity, from which he only emerged into a perfectly sane and sweet view of life in his very latest works. We admit there is evidence of a certain souredness at one time, which recurs (after an interval) with supreme and final bitterness in "Timon." Such things are common to middle life. But continuous morbidity we cannot see. Nevertheless on this view Lanier bases his whole theory of the poet's development. In the final period, of which the "Tempest" and "A Winter's Tale" are examples, we willingly agree that Shakespeare reached a supreme sweetness and loftiness of widely tolerant outlook. It was the culminating sanity of a wise old age; and that he attained it after a passing period of stress, of bitterness, in mid-life may be admitted, without conceding all Lanier's overstrained conclusions.

The gradual evolution of this sane control and balance in all things is Lanier's theme. He traces it in metre, in character, in the poet's attitude towards the supernatural, towards man, and towards nature. He specially enlarges on his favourite theme of metre, where he is mostly sound. To be sure, he says the ear loves alliteration (repetition of consonants), but dislikes repetition of vowels, or assonance (to use a convenient term now strangely dropped for uncouth substitutes). Which we could prove nonsense. Consonants represent law, vowels chaos or accident, he says; but it would have been truer to say that vowels represent emotion. But he is right in tracing Shakespeare's progress from formal metrical law to the combination of law with liberty. A freer use of double endings (redundant syllables) and weak endings (in particles, conjunctions, and the like) in his lines is one element of this. But the great difference is the passage from a linear structure, with regular pause at the end of line or couplet, to an interlocked structure, where the sense is carried over from line to line, and the chief grammatical pause occurs freely at any place within the line itself. The intricate harmonies of the latest plays are very different from the simple melodic flow of the early plays, and from the verse of his fellow-dramatists. By such mechanic tests, the Shakespearean portions of "Henry VIII." and "The Two Noble Kinsmen" have been distinguished from the Fletcher portions. But indeed anyone with an ear can tell at once the Shakespeare passages of either play without recourse to such tests. The outcome of this metrical section and those which follow it is that the poet's power of harmonising the conflicting forces of life and art grew together, his control of both being serenely complete in his final works. That is a true and thoughtful conclusion, which outweighs occasional whimsicalness in its working-out. Lanier's tendency to fanciful ingenuity, by the way, is seen in his curious fondness for "Love's Labour's Lost," the most immature and "conceited" (in the Elizabethan sense) of all Shakespeare's plays, which he quotes oftener than any other. There lies the weakness of these volumes, so full of varied, if too inconsecutive suggestion.

High Thought in the Orient.

THE IDEALS OF THE EAST. By Kakasu Okakura. (Murray. 5s. net.)

THE first thing to note anent this book is that the idealists of the East are throwing us over. The fact that their regard rests sympathetically on the Pre-Raphaelite school merely enhances the effect of their shrugs at what is essentially We. Mr. Okakura travelled in 1886 on behalf of the Japanese Government "to study the art-history and movements of Europe and the United States." He returned with an invigorated love of the art of Asia, to which he sacrificed in 1897 an official art-directorship. He is now the presiding genius of a sort of Japanese Merton Abbey—the Nippon Bijitsuin, and grouped about him are thirty-nine of the "strongest young artists in Japan," most of whose names have, it is to be supposed, become famous since the publication in 1886 of Anderson's monumental "Pictorial Arts of Japan." So the field lies open for a large illustrated work in which Mr. Okakura will incidentally make known the talents of Gaho, Taikan, Sessei, and the other artists whom Anderson ignored.

In the meanwhile we have this instructive essay written in English, so unimpeachable that it smacks (alas!) of the model exercise by the accomplished Jap himself. Mr. Okakura observes that "Asia is one"; she desires a peace which the world cannot give; unlike Europe, she is not for the means but the end. To look to the end is to have gods in view, and an artist true to the Asiatic spirit—an artist who is loftily Japanese, for instance—is not intent on prettinesses, or that objective veracity called realism. A dragon fighting a tiger in a drawing of the Laoist period is not simply a creature such as Topsell described in good faith, in conflict with a more familiar animal; in a word, the picture is not an anecdote. It is matter fighting spirit; it is everything finite disputing the sovereignty of Change.

Realism and symbolism cannot agree for long, and if we take realism—the thing as it seems to the material eye—to be the dominant aim of European art, we perceive how Asiatic art is characteristically misread. Another point is that the Oriental artist regarded the universe as a whole in the smallest detail of it as did Paracelsus (we remember). Says a modern poet too little appreciated:—

To the informing eye not hindered by bungling outlines, Battle, advance, and retreat are even in splashes of rain.

This quotation should serve to illuminate Mr. Okakura's remark that Sesshu and Sesson, masters of the Ashikaga period in Japan (1400–1600 A.D.), aimed not at a depiction of nature, but at an essay on her. It would be absurd to say that the essay on nature, in other words the interpretative picture, as distinct from the transcript, is not plentifully met with in European galleries; but no instructed European of fame has so seen that composition is like "the creation of the world" as to defy laws of perspective which the common weakness of the human eye imposes upon him. A single flower might be as important in his mind's eye as Kwannon, the Universal Mother, and yet he would draw it according to the physical eye's view of it in relation to the other objects in his picture.

So much by way of broadly stating the issues between the European artist and the Asiatic. It is difference rather than antagonism which is marked by the influence of Buddha. In Jesus Christ, European art has idealised suffering without magnifying form. The Saviour is not Promethean. It is determined that the manger shall not be forgotten in the Cross. But there could be no reason for limiting the majesty that size can confer in the case of Buddha. His self-conquest offers a tale that sobers the hearer without paining him; his death, by indigestion, has just the banality which a great philosopher might choose as a means of scaring away mere theatre-goers from his cult; his bliss is imagined by the inspiration of blue skies that falter not over the loudest battle-fields. And so he rises enormous and placid with a gaze that might exact the homage of a wink from the carnivorous Sphinx herself. The Nara Period (700 to 800 A.D.) evolved a Buddha—to be seen on the Yangtse below Tobaro, near Kakoken . . . cut out of a single rock, a mountain in itself, and its size may be imagined from the fact that a large pine tree has grown in such a way as to take the place, without any apparent incongruity, of one of the spiral lines of the head-dress.

It is easier, however, to make such a Buddha than to specify what the original taught. Northern and Southern Buddhism are in contradiction, the former giving apparently the doctrine most characteristic of the genius of the philosopher. In India it is not unnatural that an accepted faith should fail to preserve a memory of such of its tenets as are most divergent from the faith which it replaces.

There the most startling negations will be accepted from a seer as the natural evidence of his own emancipation, and fall on society with their full impetus of life, without for a moment disturbing that calm graduation of experience by which they were reached. Any Indian man or woman will worship at the feet of some inspired wayfarer who tells them that there can be no image of God . . . and go straightway . . . to pour water on the head of the Siva-lingam.

Hence, despite Buddha, India retains the "spiritual feudalism" of caste; and patriotism, the emotion which springs from a sense of diffused brotherliness only limited by the national boundaries, had no power to save that splendid peninsula from the thralldom of the West.

Japan, alone among the great nations of the Orient, has kept the animating fire of patriotism. A dialogue of the Kamakura period (1200-1400 A.D.) gives the following question and answer, the latter emanating from a noted scholar: "What would you do . . . if an army were to invade Japan, with Buddha as its generalissimo, and Confucius as his lieutenant?" "Strike off the head of Sakya-Muni, and steep the flesh of Confucius in brine."

There, incidentally, we see the oriental torture-instinct playfully rampant, but not without also seeing that to torture in such a case would be to sacrifice the operator's own tenderest nerves. Patriotism is then the most valuable of Japan's ideals, so long as it follow the maxim, "Not to use the sword but to be the sword." It has enabled her to become the "museum of Asiatic civilisation," and with all its boisterous emphasis it has not weakened her artistic instincts. "Not to display but to suggest" is still one of her mottoes, as in the days when the daimyo kept his treasures in his treasure house and would rest satisfied with such ornament as one vase or picture could give to his tea-room rather than injure an effect of unity and concentration.

Bret Harte.

THE LIFE OF BRET HARTE. By T. Edgar Pemberton. (Pearson. 16s.)

HARDLY more than ten months ago Bret Harte died; we could well have waited ten years for a "Life" of him. It is always a matter of regret to us that a distinguished man's death nowadays should be the signal for the publication of an often undistinguished "Life." It is as though our generation could not be trusted to keep in memory work which has stimulated and delighted it; as though we must needs be reminded that the place of the dead can never be filled up. In reading Mr. Pemberton's book we have been conscious all along of a sense of something like intrusion—a feeling that we have been told things which we had no right and no desire to know. Not that Mr. Pemberton has been indiscreet; we have noticed nothing which could offend any reasonable person. At the same time, with the recollection of last May quite fresh in our minds, this weighty volume strikes us as born out of due time. When Bret Harte died, the country which he loved was blue with the wild hyacinths; before they have blossomed again we are let into certain intimacies of his private life. This, we feel most strongly, is not as it should be. We could have been content to wait not only for ten years, indeed, but for a score.

Yet having said so much, we must admit that Mr. Pemberton's biography has considerable interest; it is uncritical of Bret Harte's work, diffuse, and rather formless, yet its obvious sympathy and sincerity make it pleasant reading. Bret Harte's earlier years are treated much more fully than his later; in those earlier years he received his most lasting impressions, and accumulated the material to which he returned again and again for his best work. Like a good many other writers, he was happy in a boyhood of some physical weakness—a weakness not serious enough to imply active discomfort, but sufficient to prevent reasonable parents from forcing his mental development. He was allowed to read what and where he chose. "I had access," he said, "to any number of books, and, owing to my supposed frail health, my ears were never boxed with the Latin Grammar. Besides, in addition to Smollett, Fielding, Goldsmith, Cervantes, and the rest of them, the irresistible Dickens was beginning to make a good show on my father's bookshelves." Bret Harte's allegiance to Dickens never failed; he was a true disciple, but never an imitator. In certain minor points there was so strong a resemblance between the outlook and temperament of the two writers that this seems rather remarkable. More remarkable still is the fact that Bret Harte, essentially and always an artist, was never hurt or revolted by Dickens's sentiment and pathos. He himself was absolutely incapable of many of Dickens's sins against art and nature, just as he was incapable of Dickens's extraordinary breadth and greatness, yet he accepted both with loyalty. Dickens, too, appreciated the younger man, and at the time of his death there was a letter on the way to Bret Harte in which Dickens had asked him to contribute to "All the Year Round."

At seventeen he was alone in San Francisco—a San Francisco emerging into comparative respectability. Bret Harte wrote of it later, "an unmistakable seriousness and respectability was the ruling sign of its governing class. . . . Even that peculiar quality of Californian humour which was apt to mitigate the extravagances of the revolver and the uncertainties of poker had no place in the decorous and responsible utterance of San Francisco." Here the writer's practical training began; he had before him the sharpest racial and social contrasts; old Spain met modern Europe, and the impassive Chinaman went benignly about mysterious businesses with that curious and melancholy humour of which Bret Harte caught the secret. It is interesting to note that he was not in any way a gambler; one experience, which he put on record himself, was enough, and that was almost accidental. The result at first was brilliant—then disastrous. It was certainly better for the world that Bret Harte decided rather to study Jack Hamlin than to emulate him.

Nothing turned up in San Francisco, so the youngster set out in the wake of the goldseekers whom he later called "The Argonauts of '49." With them, though he found little gold, he discovered his true vocation. The freedom of the life, the ups and downs of it, the sudden and blind justice of self-defending and shifting communities, the love of comrades—these things appealed irresistibly to a romantic sense which was just ripe to receive impressions. Bret Harte stored up these memories and kept them bright right to the end; he was always able to evolve from them some new situation, some humorous comment. Their freshness, perhaps, faded somewhat; we had become accustomed to the types, and were not as thankful to their creator as we should have been; but looking back now upon that series of brilliant studies our feeling is one of wonder that they continued to be so definite and irresistible.

Gold being scarce, Bret Harte became a messenger in the employment of the Adams Express Company—a dangerous and exhilarating post; then he drifted into a drug store, and after that became a compositor. This was followed by a spell of school-teaching, which was brought abruptly to a close by the removal to another settlement of the few families which had borne the bulk of the expense. He went a-soldiering, too. Mr. Pemberton tells us that "in the warfare with the Indians he fought through two campaigns to a staff appointment," and that when the Civil War broke out he joined the Volunteer City Guard of San Francisco as a reservist. But soon this "Colonel in the Army of the Potomac" had had enough of adventures, and, in Mr. Henley's phrase, he "addicted himself to journalism," first in San Francisco and later elsewhere, until Europe claimed him. The story of those days is pretty familiar, and need not be repeated here; with the founding of the "Overland Monthly" Bret Harte began to come into his literary own, though it was long before he could count success in terms of the universal dollar. The universal dollar, indeed, was so scarce that he felt it necessary to secure some work outside literature; and America bestowed upon him one of those consulships which she seems to reserve for her deserving writers. In 1878 Bret Harte was appointed to Crefeld in Prussia, and later was transferred to the more congenial Glasgow.

He found England ready to receive and fête him, and he seems to have enjoyed his social success. Glasgow, we gather, saw little of her American Consul; letters accumulated for him at various addresses, and he snatched them up in passing about England. For a time social engagements left little leisure for writing, but gradually the need for expression returned to him and he settled down to work. Of his later years and his success, Mr. Pemberton has not much to tell; there descended upon him the commissions and the security which are sure indications of the man who has "arrived." But no incentive to turn out work mechanically ever moved Bret Harte. He was never a facile writer, and he always took infinite pains. Of modern story-writers Bret Harte and Stevenson were probably the most consistently artistic; each loved the deliberate and rounded phrase, each strove after that perfection which comes of labour as much as of intuition. To read Bret Harte is to be assured of the real artist's touch and temperament.

Mr. Pemberton devotes some space to defending Bret Harte from a charge which certain foolish people seem to have made, namely, that he evolved his characters, and gave to them virtues incompatible with the vices which he as frankly assigned to them. This kind of criticism, if it may be called criticism, calls for no reply; it is merely silly and futile. Mr. Pemberton is also inclined to be angry with those who thought they detected in Bret Harte's later work a certain failure of spontaneity and freshness. Excellent as Bret Harte's work was right up to the end, we think that it did begin to lack its old verve, its old joyful glamour. This was inevitable; no man can draw so continually upon the past, as did Bret Harte, without our being aware of an atmosphere reminiscent and slightly remote. Though Bret Harte wrote a few admirable stories not concerned with the people and places of his youth, it was to those people and places that he returned for his truest inspiration.

Mr. Pemberton prints a number of letters of Bret Harte's which help us to an appreciation of his kindly and generous personality. They seem, however, to be under our eyes too soon; personally we read certain of them with some reluctance. Mr. Pemberton's estimate of Bret Harte's work leans, not unnaturally, to the side of excessive eulogy. For ourselves, we should not yet attempt to place it, and predictions of immortality never yet served to do much for a writer's memory. But, as we have said, Mr. Pemberton is not critical, and sometimes he seems to write in the dark. Twice he refers to Bret Harte as the pioneer of the short story, which, of course, he was not.

Tid-bits Eclecticism.

THE SAILOR KING, WILLIAM THE FOURTH; HIS COURT AND HIS SUBJECTS. By Fitzgerald Molloy. 2 vols. (Hutchinson. 24s. net.)

THE seven years of the sovereignty of William IV., Mr. Molloy says in his preface, "are wells of interest, arising from sources intellectual rather than political; for the Sailor King reigned over subjects whose works remain our proud heritage, whose names are dear to us as those of kin, whose intimate histories, touched with the glamour of romance or with direful tragedy, exercise a spell impossible to fiction and felt only in watching the action of mortals unconsciously obeying the dictates of fate." That is a very good example of Mr. Molloy's style. The words are fluent, and at first they are impressive; but there is neither deep feeling nor active thought behind them. To speak of "mortals unconsciously obeying the dictates of fate" is mechanical eloquence. It assumes predestination, and, as that is a subject on which from all time the greatest minds have perplexed themselves in vain, it cannot be regarded as solved by a facile phrase in the introduction to a popular history. Facility, indeed, is in one respect Mr. Molloy's besetting frailty. Sentences trip so easily from his pen that he does not pause to think whether it is sense or nonsense that they contain. In saying that the intimate histories of real people "exercise a spell impossible to fiction" he is merely polysyllabic without discrimination. There are historical novels that have a spell much greater than any to be found in formal history. In many cases we derive from the novelist a clearer understanding of a period than that which the historian conveys. For example, Mr. Disraeli as novelist dealt with the times that are now treated by Mr. Molloy as historian. Whilst the novelist's pages throb with the spirits of the age and interpret them, the historian's give neither a record of these spirits nor an interpretation.

On the other hand, Mr. Molloy's facility is not to be altogether deplored. It has enabled him to compile a presentable chronicle of an entertaining epoch. The literature he has produced is of the tid-bits order; but the disdain for work of that kind which is general in "literary circles" is largely an affectation. Work of the tid-bits kind is capable of being good, and when it is good it is far from being useless. Those who affect to despise it are in many cases persons who lack the painstaking faculty which produces it. It does not require originality; but originality is not the only gift that is needful to the world. In literature, as in other walks of life, there is work for hewers of wood and drawers of water as well as for artists, and it is as absurd to find the craftsman flouting the lowly labourers for useless rogues as it would be to hear an architect making fun of quarrymen and masons. The value of tid-bits literature, like that of any other commodity, depends upon its quality. That of Mr. Molloy's work is not bad. From the "wells of interest arising from sources intellectual" he has drawn water diligently and in abundance, and he pours it forth in streams which are usually limpid. Without giving anyone cause for complaint, he might have been a little less indefinite as to what the intellectual sources are. We have not gone far into his pages before we realise that the work is largely an echo of "The Greville Memoirs." To be fair, we must admit that Mr. Molloy frequently cites Greville as his authority; but at least as often, as in the passage in which the King kindly asks the Duke of Devonshire where he means to be buried, he does not "quote his author." Of course, we could not always expect him to. If he mentioned the source of his information in every case, his volumes would appear as scrap books undisguised and unashamed. Almost the only bit of fresh matter we have found in the work consists of excerpts from the letters of Miss Georgiana Sheridan, published by permission of her son, the Duke of Somerset; and these are not of the slightest importance.

Practically all the rest, as we have indicated, is compilation; but, of its kind, it is good. It lacks something of the verisimilitude which makes Greville's pages so absorbing; but that was inevitable. Greville's work is composed of narratives written, often night after night regularly, and but rarely after more than a week's lapse, in the excitement of the stirring times themselves; but Mr. Molloy's, necessarily, is merely a selection of the echoes, passionless. Still, it is a careful selection, and it is something more. Greville's chronicles are almost wholly restricted to what came before him as Clerk of the Council, and are mainly concerned with the politics of the time. Therefore, as befits what may be called a comprehensive historian, Mr. Molloy, instead of dipping only into the wells of interest dug by Greville, makes complementary calls upon those which perpetuate the memories of such well-equipped gossips as Sir William Fraser. The result is that "The Sailor King" is rather an ampler narrative than any of the original works to which we have referred or alluded. It is cunningly eclectic. The great heart of the people is not much concerned with a scholarly thinker like Carlyle; but it is always susceptible to a religious enthusiast like Carlyle's companion Edward Irving. Therefore, while giving no account whatever of Carlyle's work, which will probably live for ever, Mr. Molloy devotes many pages to the hysterical work of Irving, which was evanescent. Similarly, whilst scarce a word is said of the hopes and forebodings about great public affairs which determined the conduct of Wellington, Peel, Disraeli, and all the greatest minds of the time, Mr. Molloy gives an elaborately detailed report, extending over three chapters, of the empty scandal in which Lord Melbourne and Mrs. Norton were involved. Mr. Molloy knows his public, and is eclectic in accord with its unanimous and sensational interests. That is to his credit in the matter of the making of books; but the credit is not of a high order.

Ney and a Contemporary.

MEMOIRS OF A CONTEMPORARY. Translated by Lionel Strachey. (Grant Richards. 12s.)

THE "Contemporary" who is the extraordinary and non-chalant heroine of these memoirs wishes to be known to the world as Ida Saint-Elme. She was the daughter of Count Leopold Ferdinand Tolstoy, and was born at Krustova, in Hungary, in 1749. At the age of twelve she tells us that she was married to a certain Van M., but even during these early years marital discipline sat easily upon her shoulders, for she was present, in male attire, at the battle of Valmy. Her energies, in more than one direction, were rather too much for Van M., who, however, committed the stupidity of granting her a too easily earned pardon. Irritated by this facile forgiveness, this curious woman abandoned her husband, and from that moment her career belongs to history.

Once more we see her in male attire and with no less a personage than General Moreau as her ami intime. The latter, indeed, offered to abandon his career for her sake, but Ida Saint-Elme refused the sacrifice. Destiny, which was playing such curious freaks with the French army, played no less strangely with the side issue of Ida's fortune. She meets Talleyrand, and becomes an inconsequent but exceptionally shrewd student of contemporary French history, which, at that period at all events, was European. She was not at all dazzled by the Abbé Maurice de Périgord; on the contrary, it was on the smaller side of this great man's character that which she dwells persistently.

The year 1798 witnessed her dignified friendship for the old Beaumarchais, and she gossips amiably about the author of the "Marriage of Figaro," who seems to have aroused her impulses towards the stage, of which Moreau strongly disapproved. Then follows the rupture with the French general, and Madame is once more upon the waves of chance. During this period she made her first appearance at the Théâtre-Français, which was a failure.

But now two ideals are mastering the wayward heart of Ida Saint-Elme, the one broad and impersonal, the other intense and intimate: they are the spirit of the French

Army and her consuming passion for its hero, Marshal Ney. The one ideal nerved her to share a man's glory, the other preserved her from a woman's infamy; she was faithful to both. She followed Ney "like a schoolboy" and was wounded in a cavalry charge at Eylau. She had already met Napoleon, and in 1807 she meets the man who called him his "Parisian brother-in-law," Murat, King of Naples, whom Ida welcomes as being, with Ney, "the bravest among the brave."

She dogs Ney's footsteps during the terrible campaign of 1812, and is present at the doom of Moscow. She meets Ney some little time after the catastrophe of the Beresina, and he turns upon her with fury. "What are you doing here? What do you want? Go away at once!" he exclaimed.

She does not see him again until the following year, in the Champs Elysées, when "a ray of pleasure flitted across his face," and he ordered his carriage to stop.

"Ney did not love me," comments Madame simply. "On the other hand," she continues, "he entertained a deep passion for his noble wife." And in that little sentence is laid bare a tragedy which, for Ida Saint-Elme, was deeper and more terrible than that of Moscow.

But Ida's dog-like fidelity never falters; she follows him to Waterloo, and sees him on his way to death by French bullets:—

He caught sight of me. Then, as though fearing to compromise his faithful friends by the least sign of recognition, he bent his brow downward a trifle. He walked on with firm step. At that instant I discerned through the mist, in the centre of the square of troops, and standing out from the dark background of the wall, the firing squad. I tried to rush forward. Beltoc pulled me back, and forced me into the cab. Then I dropped weakly upon the seat. A few minutes elapsed, each a whole century long. Then I heard a sharp report. I went into a dead faint.

That report killed the ideal of the French Army in the heart of Ida Saint-Elme no less certainly than it had killed the other ideal. Henceforth she lived faithful "to the symbol of our faith," which permitted her to pray for the soul of Marshal Ney.

Apart altogether from the personality of this intrepid woman, these memoirs are an exceedingly interesting comment upon one of the most important periods of the world's history.

A Master Musician.

SCHUMANN. By Annie W. Patterson. The Master Musicians. (Dent. 3s. 6d.)

THE authoress's first sentence will hardly stand criticism. "Music," she says, "is not hereditary, else we should scarcely speak of it as a 'gift.'" Later on she explains that she is speaking of musical genius. Of course genius is not hereditary. And, generally speaking, the biographer's comments add little to the value of her undoubted skill in collecting and arranging her facts.

Robert Schumann was born at Zwickau on June 8, 1810. He died, after at least two years of insanity, near Bonn, on July 29, 1856. But even his forty-six years were many for a composer. His life, too, was happy in large degree. The marriage with Miss Clara Wieck, though long delayed by the bride's father, was one of rare success. Madame Schumann's unrivalled powers as an executant of her husband's compositions for the pianoforte was but one of the slightest of the many chains that bound them. Many of the composer's letters are here printed for the first time; and the biographer considers at some length the musician's claims to distinction as an essayist and critic. As in the case of Richard Wagner, however, whose music appealed so slightly to Schumann, the intellectual aspect of the composer is of less value in itself than for the light it may throw upon the composer's work; and, as music has less relation with the intellect than has any other of the arts, this light is only too dim and deceptive. Hence a large portion of this volume is of interest merely to those who would measure the value of a man's work by the appeal of his personality to theirs, and though it is accepted that the artist reveals his personality through his work, and that the history of his life should therefore be an aid to the appreciation of his work, the connection in the case of music is hard to trace. For it is necessary to reaffirm the forgotten platitude that music is the language of emotion; not more, not less.

But it is of the very greatest interest to discover the attitude of composers to one another's music. As a rule the musician's secret thoughts on this matter are scarcely recognisable even to himself. The personal question supervenes. This was not so with Schumann, who wrote: "The artist who refuses to recognise the efforts of his contemporaries may be looked upon as lost." Nor was this mere epigram. To Schumann we owe the recognition, if not indeed the preservation, of much of the work of Schubert, which his successor, himself unappreciated and far from affluent, unearthed and lauded and realised. Hence the interest of Schumann's opinion of Wagner, whose "lack of melody" (how familiar the phrase!) he deplored. This, be it remembered, was in Wagner's early days when, as in "Lohengrin," "Tannhäuser" and the "Flying Dutchman," he could and did write melody. What Schumann would have said of Tristan and the "Ring" we can only imagine. We must, however, take it as certain that this was an honest opinion.

Schumann's one opera, "Genoveva," is practically an unknown work. Miss Patterson believes that it has not had a fair hearing. The comparatively small space allotted to the music of the composer has been exceedingly well filled; and the thematic extracts and excellent portraits add considerably to the value of the volume.

War Echoes.

THE IMPRESSIONS OF A WAR CORRESPONDENT. By George Lynch. (Newnes. 3s. 6d.)

MR. LYNCH's war impressions leave one curiously dulled, curiously apathetic. Time was, and that but a year or two ago, these random jottings would have rung clear and sent a livelier leap to the heart's blood. The times are altered now; something has changed. We have had our glut of battle. We have exchanged our bugles for a shepherd's pipe; we look for something pastoral; something of the nature of green fields. Something babbled; something milky if you will. But of drums and trappings we have had enough.

This part of the book is belated, born too late into an environment already satiated with such impressions. When the war was young, readers of newspapers had a very handsome glut of such things, and found them a sufficient excuse for not enlisting. At that time they supplied a want, but a want that was of the moment only. It cannot be urged that they possess any great historical value. One or two are of interest psychologically; the others are a gleaning of old fields, a spinning of old yarns, a pouring out of wine no longer heady. It is when he leaves South Africa for the newer, less chronicled Pekin, that Mr. Lynch justifies himself. Of the Legation Relief Force he has much to tell, much that comes freshly, out of date though the telling seems. He brings forward several scathing indictments of the Russian, French, and German contingents. He relates a few horrors, some so pitiable, full of such shame, such poignant wretchedness, they are best left unquoted. And he draws certain comparisons between the various contingents employed.

It is in the drawing of a comparison that a man's critical capacity is most surely tested, and it is here (as later on in the chapters dealing with New York) that we notice Mr. Lynch's shortcomings. He has no depth of insight; the aspect he sees is ever the superficial aspect. The thing he tells us is not the thing we wished to hear, but the thing we have heard, the thing we looked to hear. The author's wanderings have taught him just such things as he could have read comfortably at home. The author's book tells us just those things that we have been told long ago.

His style is pleasant and very readable. It is overwrought here and there, in phrases, for instance, such as "the detaining lingerage of a caress." Mr. Lynch's chief fault is a tendency towards the obvious.

Other New Books.

A BOOK OF THE COUNTRY AND THE GARDEN. By H. M. Batson. (Methuen. 10s. 6d.)

WE have often had occasion to say unkind but wholesome things about garden-books; the delicacy of the subject-matter has so frequently been made an excuse for sentimental maunderings about blossoms and sunsets and the inevitable fire "silhouetted against the light." But such criticism does not apply to Mr. Batson's volume; sentimental he is at times, but the sentiment is seldom overdone, and he is clearly a garden lover with knowledge and quite intelligent appreciation. He also writes pleasantly about other books of the same sort, notably of "Elizabeth" and the "Garden that I Love." Also Mr. Batson introduces people who seem real, and he has a sense of humour for which we are grateful.

The book is divided into chapters dealing with the months, beginning with March and ending with February. Mr. Batson follows the circuit of the year without over-elaboration, and with sufficient scientific allusion to give his work a touch of practical interest in addition to its national picturesqueness. As an instance of the author's sound taste we may quote the following:—

Nothing is more pleasing than good beds of stocks; their sweetness makes them the most valuable of the tender annuals. Marigolds of various kinds are useful, but these differ in value, such a one, for instance, as the newer French variety, Legion of Honour, being positively harmful to the eye in its outrageous unveiling of crimson and orange. Brown is the only possible combination with the natural deep yellow of marigolds, and the more brown there is the greater will be the success of the bed.

The illustrations to the volume by Mr. F. C. Gould and Mr. A. C. Gould are not satisfactory. The drawings of birds by Mr. A. C. Gould in particular make us turn to our Bewick with renewed delight.

KENSINGTON. By G. E. Mitton. (Black. 1s. 6d. net.)

THE fifth volume in the "Fascination of London Series" projected by Sir Walter Besant. Kensington is a rather misleading designation, as many people whose acquaintance with London is slight know to their cost. The borough whose shape Mr. Mitton describes as "strikingly like a man's leg and foot in a top boot" wanders about in a confusing and remarkable manner. It does not include all West Kensington, nor does it include the whole of Kensington Gardens, but on the north it somewhat unreasonably stretches up to and includes Kensal Green and its cemetery.

"The heart and core of Kensington," says Mr. Mitton, "is the district gathered around Kensington Square." There still hangs about it, for those who cherish such memories, the fragrance of long-past and forgotten maids of honour; close by, in Young Street, Thackeray lived; further north lie the Palace and the delightful Gardens. The southern part of the borough is modern, uninteresting to the eye, comfortable, and perfectly respectable. So late as 1867 John Timbs wrote: "Kensington, a mile and a half west of Hyde Park Corner, contains the hamlets of Brompton, Earl's Court, the Gravel Pits, and part of Little Chelsea, now West Brompton . . ." At that time Brompton attracted invalids "on account of its genial air." So London changes, and in its growth forgets itself. There are no snipe now in the Brompton marshes; for them you have to go to Brompton shopkeepers. These little volumes are of great value in the keeping of fact and tradition pleasantly alive.

THE ART OF LIVING. By J. E. Buckrose. (The Gentlewoman Library. 5s.)

A Dainty volume of feminine lore set forth by one who, here at least, has no eye for the gutters of life, nor ear for the sorrows. Happy world, where there are only thirteen social problems; a cheery place after all in which to spend a life's span. All so simple, so delicate, so feminine, so sensuous; indeed the author confesses that it is a new idea, this art of living, just a matter of reading a few dialogues framed in the lightest of light stories; with the merest suggestion of overloaded colour and strained effect. And man? man is not a social problem; he comes in for mention, it is true, but he is not a problem; in these dialogues he sits rather in judgment, he is called the Master, and there is a finality about his opinions which are so obvious as to brook no contradiction. But woman has to face life, and life's problems; she must receive callers, keep house, manage servants, train children, bring out young girls, make friends, care for the sick, dress her position and grow old gracefully. There is perhaps no novelty about the selection of these problems, but the author deals with them in no stereotyped manner, and the dialogues run smoothly with a happy mingling of epigram, and pathos, and flippancy.

JOHN, JONATHAN, AND MR. OPPER. By F. Oppen. (Grant Richards. 3s. net.)

SHAFTS OF SATIRE AND SYMBOLISM. By H. Pembroke Innes. (Broom. 1s. 2d.)

The art of caricature is largely, of necessity, a satiric art: the art of satire, on the other hand, need not be caricature, though in unskilled hands it is likely to be so unconsciously. Many of Mr. Oppen's cartoons are clever and to the point. They appeared originally in the "New York American and Journal," but Mr. Oppen is kind enough to tell us that he believes in the English gentleman as much as his American brother: "in my opinion he is second to none in all the qualities that go to make an all round man." Mr. Oppen has a quite real and frank humour: the best work in this collection relates to the South African war.

Mr. Innes' "Satire and Symbolism" is largely of the unconscious caricature order. Mr. Innes appears to labour under a weight of earnestness hardly to be endured. He draws a bishop's monument, sticks it over with quotations such as "Proud man drest in little brief authority," and sets against it this: "An Epitaph (dedicated to wealthy clerics). 'Sell all thou hast, and distribute unto the poor.' 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the Kingdom of God.'" We are not impressed. Neither are we impressed by the "Fancy Portrait of a Cheap Magazine Publisher," nor, indeed, by anything in this rather futile publication. Satire is a word which should be used with caution and a proper sense of its meaning.

The third and concluding volume of Messrs. Cassell's "Living London," edited by Mr. G. R. Sims, has just been issued. Mr. Sims writes of "London's Free Sights," "In London's Shadow Land," and so on, and altogether nearly sixty aspects of London are described. The publication is interesting, and, in its way, valuable, though the whole treatment is rather too superficial to appeal to the serious student of London. The appeal of the publication, however, was frankly popular, and as a popular work it deserves success. The illustrations are very numerous and well produced.

NEW EDITIONS: We are glad to have a new and cheaper edition of Mr. Andrew Lang's "Prince Charles Edward Stuart" (Longmans). The book was originally published, with many illustrations, in 1900, by Messrs. Goupil. In the present issue the only illustration is a reproduction of a miniature portrait of the Young Pretender.—The second volume in the "Library of Liturgiology and Ecclesiology" is the "First Prayer Book of King Edward VI." (De La More Press). The book consists of a reprint, verbatim et literalim, of a Prayer Book issued in 1549. The text adopted is that of "an impression of the book printed by Edward Whitchurche, Mense Martii, as being in all probability the earliest edition."—The latest additions to the "World's Classics" (Grant Richards) are George Eliot's "The Mill on the Floss" and Emerson's "English Traits." There is only one objection to these excellent reprints. The list of previous volumes facing the title page is an eyesore.

Fiction.

PEARL-MAIDEN. By H. Rider Haggard. (Longmans, Green. 6s.)

THIS is described in a sub-title as a Tale of the Fall of Jerusalem. The story opens with the Christians marching round the arena before being cast to the lions, while Herod Agrippa sits upon his throne and is stricken down before the sport can begin. Nehushta, the Arab woman, rescues Rachel the Jewess, and brings up the little daughter Miriam, the "Pearl-Maiden," among the Essenes. We have copious pages in which the Roman, the Jew, and the Christian of this and that sect are mingled and complicated. The Pearl-Maiden walks as captive in Roman Triumph, and in the end is married—by a Bishop—to Marcus, who has become a Christian. Such a story invites comparison with three standards; it may rank with "Salamambo" as an attempt to picture ancient life from the inside; it may be a "Hypatia" with modern problems translated into terms of the early centuries of our era; or it may be a Christmas book for the young, with a purpose of wrapping up a little history in a lot of fiction. Mr. Haggard's story falls mainly into the last category. He knows well enough how to tell a story. But he is always on the outside of his epoch, and is sometimes maddeningly didactic:—

Intellect Rome had in plenty; the noblest efforts of her genius are scarcely to be surpassed; her law is the foundation of the best of our codes of jurisprudence; art she borrowed but appreciated; her military system is still the wonder of the world.

And so on. But that sort of thing drags us back to the twentieth-century standpoint, when we should be lured to that of the first century. And the book is full of such. Moreover, even such obvious pieces of realism as the modes of address Mr. Haggard misses. The "Lord Caius" corresponds to nothing which Rome knew, for not even a slave used anything like the words "my Lord" when speaking to his master.

THE STUMBLING-BLOCK. By Edwin Pugh. (Heinemann. 6s.)
MR. PUGH has selected a difficult theme, and treated it, at any rate in certain aspects, with distinction. But we doubt whether he has treated it quite in the right way. To our thinking the character of Cambria called for a more analytical rendering; she is good as a sketch, hardly conclusive or convincing as a picture. Cambria is a girl whose love necessitates the elements of tragedy; the situation is well postulated, and there are moments in the story in which Mr. Pugh carries us completely with him. The concluding scene is admirable; it has just those incongruities, those pathetic irresponsible human touches, which make for actuality. The steps that lead up to that scene, however, are hardly on the same plane. We have an initial doubt as to the probability of Cambria's love for the gentlemanly, decent, but entirely commonplace Basterfield; but, accepting that, we have still further doubt as to her behaviour when he begins philandering with the attractive, womanly, and conscienceless Jill. Cambria was neurotic, and her kind of temperament seldom possesses the nerve and self-control by which Mr. Pugh makes her deliberately allow herself to be supplanted. On the other hand, when she allows Jill to drown without putting out a hand to save her, Mr. Pugh touches a terrible but perfectly reasonable possibility, and Cambria's subsequent action is well, if rather sketchily, developed.

Our general feeling is that Mr. Pugh has elected to treat a trying subject too lightly; it had opportunities which he has missed; now and then he deserts his theme for light digressions well enough in themselves, but quite unnecessary to the story. The opening chapters strike us in this light. So far as we can see, Cambria's early misfortunes and squalid life had no appreciable effect on her character; she would have been what she was in any circumstances. In the main the story is well written, though in certain natural descriptions Mr. Pugh forces the note and becomes staccato; he also, which is unusual with him, falls into stereotyped phrasing. We feel that the author of "Tony Drum" and that remarkable story "The Martyrdom of the Mouse" should do finer work than "The Stumbling-Block."

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE ADVANCED GUARD. BY SYDNEY C. GRIER.

The story opens in India at that period of the last century when a man could settle down to enjoy his "monthly instalment of Dickens." But Sir Dugald Haigh had a perverse and original wife, and she would not leave him to Dickens and comfort. The conclusion escapes the conventional, but leaves a satisfactory sense of future possibilities: "Reduced in numbers, the Advanced-Guard held the frontier still." (Blackwood. 6s.)

CONTRASTS. BY FLORENCE HENNIKER.

Sixteen stories by the author of "In Scarlet and Grey." They display much sympathetic observation of modern life, and Mrs. Henniker's finished style is well adapted to the presentment of the finer shades of civilized emotion. Four of the stories have already appeared in "Cassell's Magazine" and "The Lady's Realm." (Lane. 6s.)

THE QUEEN'S QUANDARY. BY SAMUEL GORDON.

Mr. Gordon's new romance deals with the Court of Transmontany, a small state which has achieved independence, and of which, in the first chapter, Amanda is consecrated Queen. The plot is ingeniously woven of Court intrigues and of the diplomatic relations of Transmontany, which are involved with the marriage of Amanda. (Sand. 6s.)

THE STAR DREAMER.

BY AGNES AND EGERTON CASTLE.

The argument of the book is taken from Keats's "Endymion," and it is dedicated to Lady Stanley as a "story of a woman's influence." The story has a kind of double background—a herb-garden and a laboratory. Across these backgrounds move the figures of the heroine, her father, and her lover. The atmosphere combines open air with the closeness of sealed rooms. The influence of the stars finally makes for happiness and a pretty ending: "The dream life is over, David. We stand upon the threshold of the golden chamber. Shall we not enter?" (Constable. 6s.)

CORNELIUS.

BY MRS. HENRY DE LA PASTURE.

A story with a rather conventional basic plot on inheritance lines, but showing skill in the working out of details. Much of the action takes place in Wales, where one of the characters inherited a small and ruined castle and a poorly-tended estate. To him Cornelius comes as gardener, and soon the narrative develops into a study of moods and temperaments. The charm of the book consists in the relations between two sisters, though all the characters are carefully studied. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

TOLD BY THE DEATH'S HEAD.

BY MAURUS JOKAI.

A series of romantic adventures related by Hugo, a gunner, who was in charge of one of the batteries of Coblenz in the siege of 1688. On being tried for treason, Hugo made confession of twenty-one distinct crimes, and was ordered by the Prince to give the court a detailed account of each. He had been a ducal grand steward, a mendicant friar, a knight, a pirate, quack doctor, conjuror --to mention only a few of his many rôles—and his narrative is full of stirring incident. (Richards. 6s.)

THE PAGAN AT THE SHRINE.

BY PAUL GWYNNE.

Another novel of Spanish life by the author of "Marta." This time Mr. Gwynne is largely concerned with the religious situation in Spain in the first half of the nineteenth century. At the age of sixteen Manuel entered the Company of Jesus as a novice, but, as he grew into manhood, the seductions of this world triumphed over his devotion to the next. His struggles are the subject of careful analysis. (Constable. 6s.)

A BRANDED NAME.

BY JOHN BLOUNDELLE-BURTON.

A romance of mystery, the scene of which varies between London and the Continent. The name was branded on a woman's shoulder—"a mark that would remain upon that shoulder so long as her life might continue." The story is full of machinations and adventures which have no concern with actual life. (Methuen. 6s.)

THE DANGER OF INNOCENCE.

BY COSMO HAMILTON.

Satire. The growing practice of portraying in fiction thinly veiled public characters is here pushed to the farthest point. This is how two of the leaders of Mr. Hamilton's "Smart set" converse. The Duchess of Surrey, from her card table, greets an approaching statesman, "'Wot-O, Eppy!' she cried in her Covent-garden, good-natured way. 'Pip-pip, Duck,' replied Epsom, in the vernacular. 'Fifteen? Oh, blastation!' she continued . . ." (Greening. 6s.)

We have also received: "The Wizard's Aunt," by Janet Laing (Dent); "A Prince of Sinners," by E. Phillips Oppenheim (Ward, Lock); "The Jaded Eye," by Fergus Hume (John Long); "The Goldminer," by G. R. A. (Drane); "Two Women," by Harold Tremayne (Drane); "A Heroine of Reality," by Percy V. Donovan (Greening); "The Ice Maiden," by "Lady Frivol" (Greening); "Out of the Past," by H. C. F. Spurrell (Greening).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
" Quarterly	5/0
" Price for one issue	/5

Taken as Read.

PEOPLE are growing a little doubtful of free libraries as centres of literary light, and suspicions have been uttered—and printed—that the institutions which were to bring the noblest and best that has been thought and written within the reach of the humblest have succeeded only in disseminating a new taste in intoxicants. If Mr. Carnegie had begun his philanthropic activity forty years ago, he would have met with universal applause. For there was a time within the memory of the middle-aged when it was thought that the general populace was hungering for the world's classics, that if only the two could be brought into free and easy contact nothing more would remain to be done. The world would be educated, literary, cultured. Then came a dim perception that people, when they read at all, read for pleasure, and that the majority find their pleasure in reading something that is written on their own level, and are as uneasy in the best literary society as a plasterer would be at a Mayfair dinner-party. Wherefore there was founded the Home Reading Union, the object of which was to induce its members to read for a certain time every day something "improving." A certain number of people stuck doggedly to their vows, and we believe the world's classics secured some patronage from young ladies at the interval between high school and matrimony. But the statistics afforded by the sad custodians of free libraries prove that those institutions exist mainly for the free distribution of current fiction which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven, and that the customers of free libraries seldom or never put down an order for an immortal. That is placed to the discredit of the free library. What else could be expected? Does anyone read the world's classics? Speaking roughly, and setting ten against a million, we should say that no one does.

The statement that no one reads the best-known authors is a paradox; but it is true. Its seeming absurdity comes from the fact that everyone knows their names. Homer, Virgil, Dante, Milton, Shakespeare. Every man who has read anything would feel aggrieved at the suspicion that he did not know something of each. But who—beyond the small proportion of men who have read for classical honours at the universities—knows anything of Homer? Pope's Homer is not Homer at all, and Butcher and Lang's Translation is only a glorified crib. Even our English Milton—well—have you ever seen a man or a woman reading Milton in a railway train? Macaulay once was engaged in a dinner-table dispute as to the merits of "Paradise Lost." He was the one detractor against many admirers. And it presently appeared that Macaulay was the only one at the table who had read "Paradise Lost." There are some classics that the children of well-regulated households are made to read, the "Pilgrim's Progress" and Scott's novels, for example; but the child who is not so fortunate in compulsion has probably missed his last chance of acquaintance with books he will henceforth know by name. The list might be extended to Bacon's Essays, Butler's "Hudibras," Keats' "Endymion," Byron's "Childe Harold": they are not "asked for." But let us keep to the original list, and add only Chaucer and Spenser. All men speak with respect of Edmund Spenser (though some confuse him with his namesake Herbert). But a small table-cloth would cover the men of London who have read the "Faerie Queene." On the other hand, there are probably few men of education in London, living in well furnished houses, who do not possess a copy of the "Faerie Queene." The constant flow of new editions of Great Authors is deceptive. They are regarded as part of the necessary furniture of the house—not of the mind; and having been duly and dutifully bought they are taught to know their place on their appointed shelf. They are taken as read. A man who was caught reading "Paradise Lost" for pleasure would find himself half-way between shamo at the need for introduction to so old a friend and confusion at being discovered in an eccentricity. There are few men now who, when a new book is published, read an old one. More familiar is the spectacle of a man sitting down—with the world's classics around him and within an arm's reach—to read the latest novel from Mudie's. Those other works that stand silent and solemn upon the shelves are of infinitely greater import. He would never dream of denying that. But they are behind him; theoretically he has read them; or, if in a moment of honesty with himself he admits that he has not yet read them, he is determined to do so when business, the newspaper, and the novel will grant him that "little time we snatch from time." But the time never was and never will be; and his son will sell off the copies of the world's classics with the rest of the furniture and buy himself the latest fashion in chairs, tables and editions. He will buy the classics, as his father before him, paying the ransom for freedom to read what he pleases.

One may, however, view the situation with perfect equanimity. This ignoring of the greatest writers is no new thing, and it is only the allusiveness of current literature, with the assumption that everybody has read everything, that forces the ordinary man of ordinary education into a life of self-deception. For it is not only true that—roughly speaking—no one reads the world's classics to-day; it is also true that no one ever did read them. Without a certain effort to get at the right point of view, one is apt to miss the focus in looking at literary fame. The praise of Virgil, for example, has rung through nearly twenty centuries. But who were the bell-ringers? One forgets that this universal clangour was made by a comparatively small knot of enthusiastic readers and scholars. There was no "reading public" in the modern sense when the Æneid was written and copied and handed about among the few and fit. We talk of Athens as the home of culture; but the Athenian read nothing. The conditions were much the same when Milton received for "Paradise Lost" a mere fraction of what a popular writer of to-day would get for a short story. It was the market-price; for most Englishmen could not read it, and most of the rest did not want to read it. But there were just a few who were ready to receive it. And the growth of the "reading public" of to-day has made very little difference. For these people who flock to the circulating library are not the people whose analogues were rushing after Sophocles' MSS. or waiting for Virgil's final emendations that he never made, or welcoming Chaucer, or hailing Milton. They are the people who in former times would have found their amusement in the circus, the arena, the cock-fight, or the bear-pit. They have lately discovered the fascination of print. That is all.

But the influence of the great writers is not diminished. There are still, as always, the few and fit, and through them the classics are distilled and filter through to the masses beneath. The influence is indirect, but real and potent enough. You may see it most especially in that of the Bible. There is no book, one may say, published in the English tongue which does not show some runlets from that source, even though the writer has not looked inside the covers of the Bible since his infancy. How much of Shakespeare has filtered through into the literature of the moment! The great writer does not perish because he is read no more to-day than he ever was. He is read, as he always was, by the few, and these pass on his influence by innumerable channels and levels. These, to vary the metaphor, are as Darwin's earth-worms, fertilising the literary soil. And if people do not read Homer, has he not reached the people by way of "Ulysses" and the stage? And are we not promised two plays with Dante as the hero?

A Pioneer of Appreciation.

If we may judge from the re-issue of his writings during recent years, there would seem to be a growing interest in Hazlitt. One can only be glad of it, and welcome the republication now (by Messrs. Macmillan) of his "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays" and "Lectures on the English Poets"—the two being comprised in one volume. Hazlitt should be a stimulus to the modern critic—less, we think, by way of contrast than of affinity. In the mere mechanics of his style, Hazlitt is modern: it is essentially the style coupée, the abrupt, discontinuous style of modern journalism. The exigencies of rapid writing force it on the journalist; his native impetuosity made it proper to Hazlitt. In general, Hazlitt is what the modern critic aims to be. The difference lies in the vitality and energy of his work. He is really among the earliest of impressionists, the begetters of appreciation—that method which a French writer has styled "the adventures of a soul among masterpieces." Between him and Leigh Hunt, we think, its parentage mainly lies. To downright appreciation there remained one step, which he did not take and Leigh Hunt did; nor have all modern critics taken it, unfortunately. But to this we shall return later. His energy and fulness of matter, his directness, are personal rather than of his time. Modern subtlety was represented then by De Quincey and Coleridge. In their different ways, Mr. Henley and Mr. G. K. Chesterton have the energy and directness of Hazlitt. But the bulk of modern critics show thin indeed beside him.

The limitations (it were unfair to call them faults) of his style have been seized once for all by De Quincey—whose own faults and virtues were exactly opposite. It has no organic unfolding and evolution, no development of sustained thought or eloquence; it does not progress but revolves round itself. It is brilliant by a series of discontinuous scintillations—a splintered and vitreous brilliancy, as De Quincey says. But it is brilliant. The characteristic excellencies of the curt and the continuous styles can hardly be conjoined. These lectures (for the "Characters of Shakespeare's Plays" was originally delivered as lectures) are stimulant at every turn. To adapt what was said of Kean's acting, it is like reading Shakespeare by flashes of lightning. Between Kean's acting and Hazlitt's writing, indeed, there is much parity. The same incessant energy, the same abrupt, un-sequacious dazzle of point. It happens that one of the finest passages in this book is a description of Kean's "Richard III." "Actors we have only for a few seasons," says Hazlitt; "and therefore some account of them may be acceptable, if not to our contemporaries, to those who come after us." Posterity is abundantly grateful for his and Lamb's descriptions of Kean; since only through their eyes can we now see "the second name of men" in the annals of the English stage. Were it only as a specimen of Hazlitt, we need not apologize for quoting this brilliant account:—

It is possible to form a higher conception of the character of Richard than that given by Mr. Kean; but we cannot imagine any character represented with greater distinctness and precision, more perfectly articulated in every part. Perhaps indeed there is too much of what is technically called execution. When we first saw this celebrated actor in the part, we thought he sometimes failed from an exuberance of manner, and dissipated the impression of the general character by the variety of his resources. To be complete, his delineation of it should have more solidity, depth, sustained and impassioned feeling, with somewhat less brilliancy, with fewer glancing lights, pointed transitions, and pantomimic evolutions.

If Mr. Kean does not entirely succeed in concentrating all the lines of the character . . . he gives an animation, vigour, and relief to the part which we have not seen equalled. In some parts he is deficient in dignity, and particularly in the scenes of state business, he has by no means an air of artificial authority. There is at times an aspiring elevation, an enthusiastic rapture in his expectations of attaining the crown, and at others a gloating expression of sullen delight, as if he already clenched the bauble, and held it in his grasp. The courtship scene with Lady Anne is an admirable exhibition of smooth and smiling villainy. The progress of wily adulation, of encroaching humility, is finely marked by his action, voice and eye. He seems, like the first Tempter, to approach his prey, secure of the event, and as if success had smoothed his way before him. The late Mr. Cooke's manner of representing this scene was more vehement, hurried, and full of anxious uncertainty. This, though more natural in general, was less in character in this particular instance. Richard should woo less as a lover than an actor—to show his mental superiority, and power of making others the playthings of his purposes. Mr. Kean's attitude in leaning against the side of the stage before he comes forward to address Lady Anne, is one of the most graceful and striking ever witnessed on the stage. It would do for Titian to paint. The frequent and rapid transition of his voice from the expression of the fiercest passion to the most familiar tones of conversation was that which gave a peculiar grace of novelty to his acting on his first appearance. This has been since imitated and caricatured by others, and he himself uses the artifice more sparingly than he did. His bye-play is excellent. His manner of bidding his friends "Good night," after pausing with the point of his sword drawn slowly backward and forward on the ground, as if considering the plan of the battle next day, is a particularly happy and natural thought. He gives to the two last acts of the play the greatest animation and effect. He fills every part of the stage; and makes up for the deficiency of his person by what has been sometimes objected to as an excess of action. The concluding scene in which he is killed by Richmond is the most brilliant of the whole. He fights at last like one drunk with wounds; and the attitude in which he stands with his hands stretched out, after his sword is wrested from him, has a preternatural and terrific grandeur, as if his will could not be disarmed, and the very phantoms of his despair had power to kill.

The intrinsic interest of this passage is so great as to excuse its length. Hazlitt describes Shakespeare as he describes Kean. He is not a great critic: he has not catholicity, he fails to enjoy many and various things of price. But where he does enjoy, he can communicate his perception and relish to the reader vividly. This is one function, at least, of appreciation. "Relish" is the word for Hazlitt's critical writing: when his blood is up, he "crowds and hurries and precipitates" his sentences; his writing is rich and "three inches on the ribs" (as he says of Falstaff's humour). It comes with gusto; he seems to roll the phrases on his tongue. Here is an average example from his lecture on "Twelfth Night":—

Shakespeare's comedy is of a pastoral and poetical cast. Folly is indigenous to the soil, and shoots out with native, happy, unchecked luxuriance. Absurdity has every encouragement afforded it; and nonsense has room to flourish in. Nothing is stunted by the churlish, icy hand of indifference or severity. The poet runs riot in a conceit, and idolises a quibble. His whole object is to turn the meanest or rudest objects to a pleasurable account. The relish which he has of a pun, or of the quaint humour of a low character, does not interfere with the delight with which he describes a beautiful image, or the most refined love. The clown's forced jests do not spoil the sweetness of the character of Viola; the same house is big enough to hold Malvolio, the Countess, Maria, Sir Toby, and Sir Andrew Aguecheek.

This repetition of one idea in many forms is characteristic of his profuse vitality. He does not shine in analysis, in the exposition of general or particular principles of art; though he has a measure of critical discernment as well as sheer relish. He remarks, truly, that the "Patience on a monument" image is not the best thing in that famous passage. He might have added that there is a much finer variant of the same idea in "Pericles":—

Thou dost look
Like Patience gazing on kings' graves, and smiling
Extremity out of act.

He is, in fine, a Leigh Hunt with brains. The "Lectures on the English Poets" are inferior; they bring out all his limitations, with less of his power. Those limitations are profound, and disastrous. He has no perception of intellectual poetry: which is to say that he misses the soul in his zeal for the body. What defect it was which caused his crass incomprehension of Coleridge, who shall say? His pronouncements on the "Ancient Mariner" and "Christabel" are woeful. Of Wordsworth he sees but half, and the least half. "He is the poet of mere sentiment," says Hazlitt. Wordsworth, the most philosophical (save one) of English poets! Of the "Excursion" he declares: "The line labours, the sentiment moves slow, but the poem stands stock-still. The reader makes no way from the first line to the last." That is, one reader made no way, and the name of him Hazlitt. If critics would drop the assumption to speak for the universe, and frankly say: "I cannot do this; I cannot feel that." It is the completing grace of appreciation, the last to be acquired; and that final step which (we before hinted) Hazlitt never took. The larger number of modern critics, who have adopted all other methods proper to appreciation, still fail to take it. Yet, in that some have taken it, we can lay to our souls a certain measure of advance on Hazlitt. His splendid verve, alas! few of us may hope to capture.

Another Humourist.

YET another reputation is wafted across the Atlantic; and one feels almost ashamed that until this year Mr. Alfred Henry Lewis has remained outside the sphere of the English critic. In America he has had a vogue, and we have recently read that "not only is Mr. Lewis accepted as a great humourist, but there are some among the best critics who place him in a class entirely by himself, as superior to Bret Harte, Mark Twain, or any other of the humourist national writers." Now this challenges a comparison between Mr. Lewis and the national humourists of the United States, and suggests an inquiry whether Mr. Lewis has really opened a new school—as Mr. Dooley has done—or is merely a successful pupil of the old school. The inquiry is timely at this moment, for now we, of England, have the opportunity of ordering Mr. Lewis from the libraries. "Wolfville," the volume of stories which has achieved an extraordinary popularity in America, has been only technically published in England. Now, from Messrs. Isbister comes this and the "Wolfville Days," which is a continuation of the former. The two volumes contain thirty or forty short stories, and they are all centred about Wolfville, which is a camp in Arizona, not far from Red Dog. Mr. Lewis has taken a small community with elemental passions tempered by six-shooters, and having interviewed an old cattleman, gets from him reminiscences of Texas and Cherokee, and old man Enright, and Doc Peets, and the rest of the miners and ranchmen who left their real names with their wives and relatives in the Eastern States. The Old Cattleman intersperses his stories of Wolfville with reflections on life, death, and that great For Ever, from the point of view of a man who is not "stuck on reading," reckons time by "second drink time in the morning," or "fourth drink time in the afternoon," as a ship marks the hours by bells, and distinguishes accurately between a murder and a "killin'." It is a "killin'" when both parties start level and are unanimous as to the purpose in view. We will take a passage from the story of "The Man from Red Dog." Red Dog was a rival camp, and "ornery." The meaning of "ornery," according to the cattleman's elaborate explanation, lies in the application of it. It may be applied to old Cape Willingham, who wears a false eye and carries another in his pocket which he substitutes when the real eye becomes bloodshot from potatoes, and unsymmetrical. So sometimes "ornery" means "extraordinary." However, for the quotation:—

Thar a'int no time much throwed away with a dool in the South-west. The people's mighty extemporaneous, an' don't go browsin' 'round none sendin' challenges in writin', an' that sort of flapdoodle. When a gent notices the signs a-gettin' about right for him to go on the war-path, he picks out his meat, surges up, and declar's himse'f. The victim, who is most likely a mighty serious an' experienced p-erson, dont copper the play by makin' vain remarks, but brings his gatlin' into play surprisin'. Next it's bang! bang! bang! mixed up with flashes an' white smoke, an' the dool is over complete. The gent who still adorns our midst takes a drink on the house, while St. Peter onbars things a lot an' arranges gate an' seat checks with the other in the realms of light. That's all thar is to it. The tide of life ag'in flows onward to the eternal sea, an' nary ripple.

There is a point of view in that comment, and an interesting one. But it is not a new one. The "humorous national writers" of America have long ago come upon the combination of simplicity, savagery and sentimentality that marks the men who live on the outskirts of civilisation, and it was this that gave Bret Harte the first fine fury of inspiration. To this must be added the undercurrent of irreverence which makes the froth of American humour. It appears even in the strenuous evangelists, such as Mr. Moody, who have raised us out of our boots (the poker slang of Mr. Lewis is infectious); it appears in Max Adeler's—

He has gone we hope to heaven
(Funeral starts off at eleven)
Where he'll never more have pain, and it appears in Mark Twain's "Yankee at the Court of King Arthur." We take a specimen from "Wolfville" in which Boggs relates his religious experiences:—

"You sees," says Boggs, "thar's no good tryin' to hold out kyards on your Redeemer. If your heart ain't right, it's no use to set into the game. No cold deck goes. He sees plumb through every kyard you holds, an' nothin' but a straight deal does with Him. Nacherally, then, I thinks—bein' as how you can't bluff your way into heaven, an' recallin' the bad language I uses workin' them cattle—I won't even try. An' that's why, when resolvin' one winter to get religion mebbly next June, I persists in my sinful life."

There is little that is new in the new humourist, outside of the happy combination of ranching and poker slang, and that is so complicated that the English edition contains a glossary to enable you to distinguish between a longhorn and a shorthorn among men and to recognise nose-paint and mavericks on sight. But slang and irreverence are not new. Neither is sentiment such as Bret Harte ladled out from Poker Flat. Mr. Lewis follows as a junior classmate in his story of Whiskey Billy who died just before his mother arrived under the impression that he was the "prop an' stay of Arizona." Says Texas:—

I never does track up with an old lady, white ha' red an' motherly, mind you, but I takes off my sombrero an' says: "You'll excuse me, marn, but I wants to trespass on your time long enough to ask your pardon for livin'."

Poker, cattle-ranching, drinking, irreverence, and a final touch of sentiment: that is the note of Mr. Lewis, who stands manifestly in the following of the national humourists of America. But his "Old Cattleman" is a character apart, and his incidental comments are delightful. Thus he says:—

I'm a mighty sight like that old longhorn who allows he's allers noticed if he lives through the month of March he lives through the rest of the year; so I figgers I'll hold together thot a-way ontill shorely March comin'.

And of courage—a quality always necessary at Wolfville:—

As I observes prior, courage is frequent the froot of what a gent dont know.

Mr. Lewis's poker players, ranchemen, and greasers are of the traditional type; but the cattleman is new, and it is his solemn recounting of Wolfville times that gives the touch of novelty to a series of stories which should appeal to England even without the vocabulary.

Impressions.

XXV.—Aldwych.

It was the last night of winter, and I stood alone in Aldwych, reading the name on a rough board nailed to a post.

The hour was one of the few in the twenty-four when London is strange and new. Between two and four in the morning she suffers her night change from restlessness to peace. Then the contour of her earth becomes visible; hills and valleys show themselves; beneath the multitude of her lights the curves of her streets, the character of her buildings, are revealed. At this hour the sense of personal identity waxes in the solitude of her familiar, yet most unfamiliar, vastness. The few wayfarers are remote, as fugitive under the eternal arch of the sky, as the changes upon the face of the streets that are forever altering and remodelling London.

"Aldwych!" A street lamp gleamed upon the black letters. It is a beginning—that is all. Rough planks make the roadway, which runs for a few yards between boardings, skirting long-hidden buildings, and then loses itself in slums. All will go. Like an army this plank-laid lane will force its way, piercing, spreading, till, a few years hence, some home-returning Englishman will find the old landmarks gone, and in their place this sign-mark of material progress, superb and spacious—Aldwych.

Uncomplaining London! Not a day passes but something of yourself vanishes. In that great clearing by the Strand what memories lurk in the tumble of bricks and stones. Even the rats have gone now, and in the silence of this hour before dawn there is, besides myself, but one living person to say good-bye to the winter that has seen the breaking up of the Old and the beginning of this phase of the New London. He is the old man, grey, time-stained and bent who nods near his pail of burning coals. Behind him, far over his head, on the top of a new theatre, one white pillar points to the sky. That, too, in time must go, for London is ever being born again. One thing only will remain—the river. The Thames watched the birth of London; she will be flowing by broken bridges when London is no more. Just across the road at the foot of a little, dark hill she passes on without rest, while London sleeps. What sights this river has seen: how much she knows. To-day she has trickled and spurted through meadows which are bright with the signs of spring. Beneath the shelter of her banks, where the sun falls, primroses have scattered themselves: she has seen the yellow celandine starting from the fields, and the early blossoms of the fruit trees. Where she has been the earth is trembling with the reluctant raptures of spring, which makes no sign in Aldwych. Out beyond, no longer controlled by bridges and embankments, the ancient river spreads herself, stretches out wider and wider till, her task done, she mingles with the ocean—her home, where, in the vastness, the sky is flecked by flights of birds following the spring.

The dawn is moving up over Aldwych. The old man stirs, and kicks his bit of fire into a flame. I see the huge crane, the blocks of stone ready to be hoisted, the board on which the name of the new street is painted, and the huge white building that has sprung up above the debris of the broken houses. New tenants are waiting to go in. Already their names are blazoned across the front. The old man rummages among the ancient bricks. He is like them. Neither hope, nor fear, nor hate can touch him now. This flaming New London is nothing to the night guardian of the tools that have broken up these dingy dwellings of Old London.

The old man huddles back into his shelter, and as he sleeps the first day of spring breaks over Aldwych.

Drama.

Prosit.

THE German invasion is upon us. From its base of operations in Great Queen Street, the drama of the Teuton is boldly proceeding to invest the strongholds of the British stage. The first to fall is the St. James's, where they are now playing an adaptation by Herr Rudolph Bleichmann of Herr Wilhelm Meyer-Förster's "Alt Heidelberg." I, for one, see nothing to regret in this. Even in these days of nationalism, art—thank heaven!—may dare to be cosmopolitan still; and certainly the British play is far from being in so healthy a state that it can afford to shut itself up from whatever wind of inspiration may come to it from beyond the seas. "Old Heidelberg" may at least teach us that to bring romance over the footlights it is not necessary to depart from modern life or to conjure up by careful archaeology the semblance of what we fondly believe to be a less prosaic age. Herr Meyer-Förster builds his play upon the poetry of the Alma Mater, and catches a note of vernal passion which must appeal to the sentiment of all who have ever "fleted their lives carelessly, as they did in the golden world," whether upon the banks of Neckar, or upon those of Isis. The critics point to the impossibility of transferring the scenes which take place at Heidelberg into the surroundings of an English University. That is quite true. The Kellnerin with the nearest arm always round her waist would be an odd feature in an undergraduate revel at Oxford or at Cambridge. I have a shrewd doubt whether she is quite typical even of Heidelberg. But the essence of the thing—the irresponsibility and the joy of life, the loyalty to tradition and the pride of manhood—that you will find wherever ardent and ambitious youth is gathered together. And even in small matters the similarity is quite as striking as the difference. There is an amusing bit of by-play in "Old Heidelberg," in which Graf von Asterberg of the Corps "Saxonia" instructs Prince Karl Heinrich how the lid of a Bock should be kept shut when there is beer in it, and open when it is empty. Well, the precise rule prevails, and a breach of it is visited with a "sconce," in at least one Oxford hall.

"Old Heidelberg" is rather ill-named on the play-bill a "comedy." Actually it is a tragi-comedy. It has plenty of comic relief, lightly enough touched, but the main appeal is a serious one to the emotions. Herr Meyer-Förster finds his tragic principle in the contrast between the frank joyous humanity of the Heidelberg life and the starched and buckramed futilities of a stifling little German court. Prince Karl Heinrich has been brought up from childhood amongst the Kammerherren and flunkies of Sachsen-Karlsburg. Here, the only human soul is that of Dr. Jüttner, the boy's tutor. Dr. Jüttner is a Heidelberg man, and obtains permission to take Karl Heinrich there for a year's residence. The two set out in the highest spirits. Dr. Jüttner is an admirable figure, admirably played by Mr. J. D. Beveridge, and the passages which show his disillusion at the discovery that he has grown too old to be a boy again are amongst the best in the play. But the central interest lies with Karl Heinrich. At Heidelberg the joy of life comes to him. He finds himself a human being, plunges into the traditions of the place and becomes a leader in the Comus rout of students. Also he falls into love with the pretty Kellnerin, Käthie Rüder. One joyous night, just as he has arranged with Käthie to drive in the spring woods together next day, the Staatsminister von Haugk is announced. The Prince of Sachsen-Karlsburg has had a stroke of paralysis, and Karl Heinrich must return home and take up the regency. There is a fine scene in which the renunciation is made. Käthie is left broken-hearted. Two years elapse before the fourth act. Karl Heinrich is now a stiff young reigning prince, and the ideals of court life at Sachsen-Karlsburg are unchanged. But a day comes when a visit from the drunken old steward of his Corps at Heidelberg brings a flood of nostalgia upon him. He will see the Neckar and Käthie once again. He pays a hasty visit incognito. The students of his old Corps receive him, in frock-coats and top-hats. He invites them to a beer-drinking. It is a chilly business, and he does not keep them long. On him, too, as on poor old Jüttner, dead now some months ago, the disillusion has come. You cannot—recapture

That first fine careless rapture.

And here comes Käthie. They know, both of them, that the past can never arise again from its ashes. Käthie is going to be married to an excellent young Kellnar in Vienna. Karl Heinrich, too, remembers that he is to marry a very beautiful princess. They part again, for the last time; and on the touching scene the curtain falls, leaving one with the sense of a very genuine play and of a performance which is quite adequate, and if only Miss Eva Moore had a little more temperament and a little less conscious art, and if Mr. Alexander would lay aside his nods and becks and wreathed smiles for a simpler and more sincere romantic method, would deserve to be called first-rate.

At Great Queen Street itself, the real German plays to a translation. "The Man and His Picture" is a version of "Sodom's Ende," by Herr Hermann Sudermann. Of this production I find it a little difficult to speak. The English seemed inadequate, and the histrionic ideals represented by Mrs. Bandmann-Palmer and Mr. Farmer Stein are not precisely those which appeal most forcibly to my private and personal taste. But I do not think that it would be wholly fair to judge the play by this rendering. Herr Sudermann is a dramatist of considerable reputation in Germany. In England he is best known as the author of "Magda," which many actresses of distinction have thought a desirable part. His "Es Lebe das Leben," which the German company gave the other day, is just being published in an English version by Mrs. Edith Wharton. He strikes me, upon an extremely imperfect acquaintance, as a writer of little literary quality, and of considerable crude melodramatic force. "Sodom's Ende" is a rather dismal and sordid tragedy. It is named from a picture, the painter of which, Willy Janikow, makes, as artists sometimes do, the claim to live outside the moral law. His degeneracy and the tragic retribution which comes upon him are powerfully and unpleasantly portrayed. One is harrowed. Possibly, if the thing were better done, one might be moved. As it stands, the best feature of the performance is a very finished and rather pathetic study of an old man by Mr. O. B. Clarence. Miss Lilian Moubrey and Miss Gertrude Burnett also do well in minor parts. But ———.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

"John, my Boy—Dignify It."

"THE native land need not grudge old Rome her pictures of the world; she has pictures of her own, pictures of England; and is it a new thing to toss up caps and shout—England against the world?" It is George Borrow who speaks, and the painter who inspired the passage, which follows this patriotic excerpt from "Lavengro," was a fellow East Anglian—Old Crome. Many to whom "The Norwich School" is empty of meaning, to whom Cotman, Stark, and Vincent are mere names, have a slumbering reverence for Crome through that sturdy panegyric in "Lavengro." It was inspired by the brother's determination to become an artist, and to herald the beginning of his career by journeying to Rome to see "the grand miracle" of art—Raphael's "Transfiguration." Then the eyes in the mighty figure of Borrow glowed with indignation, and the fine East Anglican accent rolled out the mind of him, ending thus: "Better stay at home, brother, at least for a season, and toil and strive 'midst groanings and despondency till thou hast attained excellence even as he has done—the little dark man with the brown coat and the top-boots, whose name will one day be considered the chief ornament of the old town, and whose works will at no distant period rank among the proudest pictures of England—and England against the world!—thy master, my brother, thy, at present, all too little considered master—Crome."

Art has suffered many phases since Crome, house-painter, drawing-master, and artist, died in 1821, whispering to his son these last words: "John, my boy, paint, but paint for fame; and if your subject is only a pig-stye—dignify it." That old Crome did: he dignified humble subjects. Indeed, a tree, set in the familiar scenery of his native country, often sufficed for subject; or a heath, or a river scene with a low sun, or a woodland piece with river and road. Such were the simple subjects that Crome painted again and again—mellow, rich, and restful transcripts of English rural life. There is no hurry about Crome, or the men he influenced. He never chose a subject because it was effective, or because it could outstare a neighbour at an exhibition. As a youth he had made a long and leisurely study of a collection of Dutch pictures, and the Dutchman's fondness for a low key of colour (and bitumen) had become part of him. Nothing wars in his pictures. They are pleasant to look upon, as comforting and unexciting as a flat English landscape on an equable day—warm, wooded, and unworried by motor-cars, the screech of locomotives, or a telegraph boy sauntering over the crest of a hill. His "beautiful rural pieces, with trees which might well tempt the wild birds to perch upon them," just suited Borrow, and among the many picture exhibitions that have been opened in London this week (I received invitation cards to nine) there is one that George Borrow would have hugely enjoyed. The very title would have captivated him: "Cabinet Pictures by Painters of the Norwich School and Others." To walk into the room at the Fine Art Society, where it is held, is to go back a hundred years, to open a closed window and look out again on "rural pieces." But in Art we are children of the world as well as children of England, and even a patriotic East Anglian must smile when he recalls Borrow's: "Thou needest not run to Rome, brother, where lives the old Mariolater, after pictures of the world, whilst at home there are pictures of England."

Old Crome holds his own bravely in Room XX. of the National Gallery. There is his great "Mousehold Heath," solemn as a heath should be, yet not gloomy, with the staircase clouds rising across the great sky. The picture is not dark; but let your eyes wander round the walls till they fall on Crome's "Windmill," and you start with delight at the luminous glow that the sky holds. It shimmers with that golden glamour through which Crome, at his best, saw Nature. There is light on the green hill, light on the brown path that climbs over it, and light in the sky. Sitting before it, without loss of fealty to any of the Italians, one can understand the hypnotic power that this painter of rural England exercised over Borrow: indeed, under the spell of his "Windmill," it is not difficult to conjure up the figure of the little stout man in the brown coat and the top-boots, "whose face is very dark, and whose eye is vivacious"—old Crome. Pleasant it would have been to take his arm, and conduct him round two or three of the exhibitions that have been opened in London this week; pleasant to show him some half-a-dozen modern landscapes. More would bewilder him.

First I should have taken him to Messrs. Tooth's spring exhibition and shown him the Thaulows. Very different from anything Crome ever painted is Thaulow's "Winter in Norway." This brilliant presentment of sunshine on snow, with the river, every ripple vibrating and alive, dancing through its frozen borders, would have astonished Crome. I doubt if Thaulow has dignified the scene, and therein he would have fallen short of Crome's ideal, but he has contrived a very lively and beautiful picture. I know not what wild and strange wastes of snow country, sparkling under the winter sun, this river has run through before it reached the piled snow banks of this picture, where red wooden shanties set the white winter aflame. When I see the flash of a swallow's wing in the sunlight, or the silver gleam of a jumping fish, I think of Thaulow; of Crome at the close of day in full summer, when the task is done, and the country ripe.

What Crome would have said of Mr. Wynford Dewhurst's studies in the vestibule of the exhibition of the Royal Society of British Artists I cannot imagine. Nature was still brown and golden when he died. The eyes that were to see her purple, blue, and violet had not opened to disturb the mellow vision of the Norwich men. I fancy Crome would have liked the clouds that hang so lightly over the flat land in Mr. Paul Paul's "Going Home," and the solemn light that broods on the walls of Mr. Sydney Lee's "The Two Brewers"; but the decorative impulse that set those red banners whirling in Mr. Hans Trier's finely imagined view of St. Mark's, Venice, would have brought a look of distrust into his vivacious eyes. As a faithful student of the Dutchman, decorative impressionism was alien to old Crome. Alien to him, I am afraid, would have been Mr. Foottet's personal vision of Hyde Park Corner. It is a blue picture seen on one of those magical moonlit evenings when a shower of rain has cleared the sky, and the reflections of the lamps glimmer in the little pools of water left on the pavement, and in the wide roadway. This enwrapping of one of London's most paintable parts in a mystery of violet light may seem extravagant to others besides old Crome, but when once a man trains himself to see colour, and to catch a momentary crepuscular effect on, say, one of these March days, he is a bold critic who will cry "that is not true, because I have not seen it so." In Kent the other evening the wild beauty of the colour in sky and on hills—purple, yellow and green—against a foreground of dark firs was quite as "impossible" as the colouring in Mr. Foottet's Hyde Park piece, or in his experiment in decorative impressionism from Wordsworth's country, called "Ere Twilight Crowns the Night."

The feet of landscape art now race and caper: in old Crome's they walked sedately. If we fail oftener, it is because we attempt more. We pursue light and colour, and strive to reproduce effects that are gone before we can say "Look, quick, look!" We are always in a hurry, with the date of the sending-in-days of half-a-dozen exhibitions pinned against the wall. The results are interesting, amusing, and suggestive; but the modern landscape painter is not, as a rule, training himself to say these parting words to his son: "John, my boy, if your subject is only a pig-stye—dignify it."

C. L. H.

Science.

The Enemy.

As the most important subject, scientific or otherwise, known to me, the tubercle bacillus should have headed my series. Indeed it is a pity to treat of anything else until this enemy be extinct. Whilst alluding to it on every possible occasion, I have delayed so that this week I might celebrate the coming of age of the discovery of the tubercle bacillus by Robert Koch of Berlin. His historic paper is dated March 24, 1882. Let us estimate the result, using human life as our criterion. In Germany, where the facts are known, the death-rate from this, the most widespread and deadly and preventable of all known diseases, has decreased from 31 to 21 per 10,000 since 1886. Call the population of Germany last year 60,000,000 for the sake of argument. This discovery saved 60,000 lives in Germany last year; just the number of deaths registered as due to tuberculosis in Great Britain in 1902. And anyone who knows the source of the statistics knows how far under the mark this figure is.

It may be taken as a fair statement, allowing only moderately for the known methods of filling in death certificates, that, if you take twenty minutes to read this article, three persons in this country will have died from tuberculosis before you finish it. Our own death-rate has declined at less than half the German rate. The thousands of lives lost represent the power of ignorance.

In 1500 Frascatorius guessed that tuberculosis was infectious. In 1865 Villemin, of Paris, proved it. In 1882 Koch found the cause. The life history of the bacillus is now well known. The means of infection are familiar, yet I believe there are people who still think this an hereditary disease. "What knowledge is of most worth?" asked Spencer in 1861.

Let us drop the old names for ever. Struma, scrofula, the "king's evil" cured by the "sovereign touch," phthisis, consumption, wasting (three synonyms), "decline"—all these darken counsel and cost lives. The disease is one and indivisible. Even "the white death" and "the great white plague" are better avoided until the public knows the name tuberculosis, and recognizes that this curse of civilisation is a preventable disease,—an evil that can be annihilated.

In Germany they have sanatoria and state insurance. In New York it costs 500 dollars or a year's imprisonment to spit in a tramcar; and in Paris they are framing a bye-law to prevent anyone from putting even a morsel of rag or paper into the streets. The "Westminster Gazette" says this is "for hygienic purposes." It is. The "Pall Mall Gazette," commenting on spitting bye-laws, says this is a "dirty habit." It is. The "Illustrated London News" has a column called "Science Jottings" on the dangers of dust, and never even mentions tuberculosis. Our leading papers have no idea that the matter is one of life and death. Kensington, all honour to it, has just passed a bye-law which exacts forty shillings for spitting on the pavement. Dr. Cooper, Chairman of the Public Health Committee of the London County Council, tells me that the Home Secretary will not sanction a general bye-law against spitting. He is already tried and condemned, in 1903, before the bar of Preventive Medicine. I should like him to sit for a morning in the out-patient department of any general hospital in England, turning away—sentencing to death—one tuberculous patient after another, because others are filling the hospital beds,—and infecting their comparatively few non-tuberculous neighbours. There is no more sickening task on earth. I should like him to see the tubercle bacillus—I will swear he has never seen that which is, of all the created universe, man's greatest foe—I should like him to see it under the microscope in one specimen in five of sputum gathered at random from the streets of Liverpool. I should like to know whether he can faintly guess the answer to the question, "What preventable disease kills one in four to one in seven of all mankind?"

Already two of your fellow-subjects have died.

The law prevents the selling of tuberculous meat. Tuberculous milk is consumed all over the country. All our children are fed with the bacilli on occasion. It does not matter that uncooked milk is an unsafe food, even though the bacteriologist finds milk the most convenient material on which to make his cultures. They tell me that the short walking-skirt is coming into fashion. It is the first sign of sanity since European fashion began with Minos' female toreadors, who practised tight-lacing in Crete four thousand years ago. The dust of London consists, for practical purposes, of the daily contribution of five thousand tons from the horse—not that this much matters—and of tuberculous sputum. The inexpressibly filthy and indecent habit which permits a woman to trail her skirt on the pavement ensures that the bacilli shall be rescued from the air and sunlight which would soon kill them. They are brought into the house, where they can nestle in some dark corner, and infect the boy who cleans the infected boots, or the maid who brushes the infected skirt. I came across a king in Herodotus, the other day, who beheaded anyone that spat before him.

We have lost a possible sixth ode from Keats, the last movement of Schubert's noble symphony, the mature work of Chopin and Mendelssohn and Mozart and Stevenson, and the rare genius of Emily Brontë—and these are but a few at random. They had in superabundance Spencer's fourth class of knowledge: they could create beauty. But his first class, the knowledge how to keep oneself alive, they had not. They probably kept their bedroom windows shut, and they did not know that what the casual spitter spits is sometimes spittle, sometimes spittle and death.

This preventable disease exacts its toll of lives mainly from the young adult, from the class which the State has cared for, which is its capital, and from which it is about to reap interest. Sir James Crichton Browne has shown how tuberculosis is sapping the vitality of the nation. This argument may appeal to those few who are not familiar with tuberculosis in their own family.

Meanwhile a third victim has died of tuberculosis within our shores. He had probably been ill for four years.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

Shakespeare's Street.

SIR,—Surely the letters of protest from Miss Ellen Terry and Miss Marie Corelli addressed to the "Morning Post" and ACADEMY will not be disregarded by the Stratford-on-Avon authorities who are responsible for the astounding decision with regard to the proposed Carnegie library to be established in their town?

To destroy any sixteenth and seventeenth century buildings in the world-revered Stratford-on-Avon is an unparalleled act of vandalism—of all towns it should be, and hitherto has been, held sacred, and protected from the hand of the restorer and votary of so-called "modern improvements." No words are strong enough to ring in protest against the destruction of Henley Street—we would not sacrifice it for a wilderness of free libraries.—Yours, &c.,

S. O. A.

Wanted—Two Words.

SIR,—I have received two communications on the subject of my letter in the ACADEMY of 14th instant, which may perhaps interest your readers. One was from Mr. A. Hamonet, and the other from a gentleman at Toulouse. As the latter does not give his full address and only signs his initials, I am unable to thank him otherwise than in your columns.

Mr. Hamonet informs me that in Touraine the expression "mon pas fils" is familiarly applied to a step-son. (Then, why not "pas fille" to a step-daughter and "pas père" and "pas mère" to a step-father and step-mother respectively, or are all these, too, used?)

My Toulouse correspondent mentions the word "parâtre" as existing for step-father, but this is nearly obsolete, and, like "marâtre," is only used in an opprobrious sense. He adds: "In the South of France it is usual to call a step-father 'oncle,' and a step-mother 'tante.'" It seems to me that the two words are still "wanted," and, so far, "pas père" and "pas-mère" appear to fulfil the requirements, if generally adopted.—Yours, &c.,

61, Friends Road,
East Croydon.

EDWARD LATHAM.

"Mediæval French Literature."

SIR,—There could be no insinuation of a breach of contract between Mr. Dent and Gaston Paris in my statement of my late friend's disappointment in the appearance of his book "Mediæval French Literature," since I am not aware of the nature of the contract. I only know that Gaston Paris expressed to me and to a mutual intimate friend his disappointment, added to his great regret to see the book issued without my name associated with his on the title-page. It was relative to this omission (which Mr. Dent afterwards rectified on receiving a protest from my friend and from me) that Gaston Paris wrote to me on the subject.—Yours, &c.,

HANNAH LYNCH.

Iota's Title.

SIR,—In last week's ACADEMY, on p. 278, appears Iota's title, part of which is "She for God and Him." Milton, "Paradise Lost," iv., line 299, has "He for God only, She for God in Him"—a very different thing. Would you tell the authoress the mis-quotation?—Yours, &c.,

G. T. SADLER.

Wrexham.

Johnson or Goldsmith?

SIR,—In last week's admirable article, "The Praise of Famous Men," appears an allusion to Boswell. The words are: "There is Johnson's gibe: 'Is he like Burke, sir, who winds into a subject like a serpent?'" But surely the true gibe is Goldsmith's. I cannot for the moment find the passage in Boswell, but the gibe is quoted in Masson's "De Quincey." I give his words: "Admiring Johnson's extraordinary powers in that way [sic the conversational] as much as any man, but irritated by Boswell's perpetual harping on the theme, 'Is he like Burke, sir, who winds into a subject like a serpent?' Goldsmith was once moved to ask." Pardon the pedantry.—Yours, &c.,

Balsall Heath Vicarage,
Birmingham.

G. K. A. BELL.

Dublin Publishers.

SIR,—In a recent number of your journal you say that Ireland, following the example of Scotland, has now a publisher of her own in reference to one Dublin house. This, we think, is misleading, and might make some of your readers think that there is only one publisher in this country of any note, whereas there are many—some of course of less importance than the one mentioned by you. We think that we are at least as important a house, being in business here for more than forty years (formerly under the name of McGlashan & Gill), and our present catalogue, which we enclose, fairly indicates the class of books issued by us. Of course it includes only those now in print at present—and small in proportion, of course, to the total since we started business. Yet it is sixty pages in extent, and contains, amongst others, the names of the following, either as authors or editors: The late Thomas Arnold, M.A., Sarah Atkinson, M. McC. Bodkin, K.C., "Ethna Carbery" (Mrs. S. MacManus), David Comyn, Rev. Joseph Farrell, W. J. Fitzpatrick, Judge O'Hagan, the Most Rev. Dr. Healy, the Rev. E. Hogan, D.Litt., Douglas Hyde, LL.D., P. W. Joyce, LL.D., Patrick Kennedy, Rev. G. Tyrell, S.J., D. F. MacCarthy, Cardinal Moran, Rev. Denis Murphy, S.J., Rev. E. O'Growney, Rev. M. Russell, S.J., A. M. Sullivan, Katherine Tynan (Mrs. Hinkson), Rev. P. A. Sheehan, D.D., Most Rev. Dr. Walsh. It includes also numerous works in connection with the revival of the Irish language and Anglo-Irish movements in their more popular aspects.—Yours, &c.,

M. H. GILL & SON.

50, O'Connell Street, Upper, Dublin.

"Hakluyt's Voyages."

SIR,—I am directed by Sir Clements Markham to state that the Hakluyt Society decided three years ago to publish in ten volumes the full text of Richard Hakluyt's "Principal Navigations," 1598-1600, with an index to each volume, and a general index, and they announced this intention certainly two years ago. Volume I. is now in type. Messrs. James Maclehose and Sons, of Glasgow, announce this week a similar edition. They admit the existence of the Hakluyt Society, but they state that "it is practically impossible for lovers of history, geographers, librarians . . . to procure the text of this book."

As nearly all readers who are interested in the subject, and the principal libraries in Great Britain and Ireland, America, and on the Continent, are members of the Hakluyt Society, Messrs. Maclehose's edition seems very unnecessary.—I am, &c.,

BASIL H. SOULSBY,
Hon. Secretary, Hakluyt Society.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 183 (New Series).

Last week we set a competition in the following terms:—

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the titles of the twelve most interesting books announced in our Supplement this week. A plébiscite will be taken of all the lists sent in, and the competitor whose selections most nearly answer to the general opinion will receive the prize.

An examination of the 90 lists received produces the following list as the collective choice of our readers. We call it

THE PLÉBISCITE LIST.

	Votes.
Lady Rose's Daughter. By Mrs. Humphry Ward (Smith, Elder)	62
New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. By Sir J. Crichton Browne (Lane)	47
Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death. By F. W. H. Myers (Longmans)	47
The Vineyard. By John Oliver Hobbes (Unwin)	39
Swinburne's New Volume of Poems (Chatto and Windus)	36
The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft. By George Gissing (Constable)	35
More Letters of Charles Darwin (Murray)	29
The Untilled Field. By George Moore (Unwin)	26
Wordsworth. By Walter Raleigh (Arnold)	26
Life of the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava. By Sir A. Lyall (Murray)	26
The Life of Browning. By G. K. Chesterton (Macmillan)	23
Contemporary France. By M. Gabriel Hanotaux (Constable)	23

The largest number of books selected by one competitor in agreement with those in the above list is nine; and three competitors have been to that extent successful in anticipating the general judgment. We accordingly divide the prize equally between Mr. D. Rees, Belmont, Cardigan; Dr. Laing, 9, Tay Square, Dundee; and Mrs. Alfred Rogers, Knock, Co. Down, Ireland.

Mr. Rees's list is as follows:—

Lady Rose's Daughter. (Mrs. Humphry Ward.)
Wordsworth. (Raleigh.)
Browning. (Chesterton.)
More Letters of Charles Darwin.
Swinburne's Poems.
Sudermann's "Es Lebe das Leben." (Wharton.)
Contemporary France. (Hanotaux.)
Sir George Grove. (Graves.)
New Letters, &c., of Jane W. Carlyle. (Browne.)
Untilled Field. (George Moore.)
The Vineyard. (John Oliver Hobbes.)
Letters from the Holy Land. (Lady Butler.)

Dr. Laing's list:—

New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. (Sir J. Crichton Browne.)
Life of Lord Dufferin. (Sir Alfred Lyall.)
The Vineyard. (John Oliver Hobbes.)
Lady Rose's Daughter. (Mrs. Humphry Ward.)
Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft. (George Gissing.)
Human Personality and its Survival of Bodily Death. (F. W. H. Myers.)
Children of Tempest. (Neil Munro.)
Browning. (Chesterton.)
Adventures of Harry Revel. (Quiller-Couch.)
Memories of Vailima. (Isabel Strong and Lloyd Osbourne.)
Mr. Swinburne's Volume of Poetry.
More Letters of Charles Darwin.

Mrs. Rogers's list:—

Lady Rose's Daughter. (Mrs. Humphry Ward.)
The Untilled Field. (George Moore.)
The Vineyard. (John Oliver Hobbes.)
Sudermann's "Es Lebe das Leben." (Mrs. Wharton.)
Swinburne's New Volume of Poems.
Human Personality and its Survival after Bodily Death. (F. W. H. Myers.)
New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. (Sir J. Crichton Browne.)
Contemporary France. (M. Gabriel Hanotaux.)
Life of the Marquess of Dufferin and Ava. (Sir A. Lyall.)
Memories of Vailima. (Isabel Strong and Lloyd Osbourne.)
Browning. (G. K. Chesterton.)
The Roman Road. (Zack.)

Three competitors were successful in naming eight out of the twelve books in the plébiscite list: Mr. J. Byers, Mr. E. Knox Linton, and Mr. Herbert Jamieson.

Fifteen competitors named seven: Miss L. G. Caddy, Mr. E. A. K. Bell, Mr. Isaac Edwards, Miss C. Bridges, Mr. H. R. Cross, Miss M. A. Clay, Miss M. C. Fogg, Mr. W. H. Brothers, Mr. L. W. Kempson, Mr. M. S. Clayton, Mr. Wm. Crawley, Mr. H. W. Atkins, Mr. W. M. Mackay, Mr. T. N. Foulis, and Miss E. M. Fraser.

The following twenty books stood next in order of favour in the collective opinion of the competitors:—

	Votes.
The Adventures of Harry Revel. By A. T. Quiller-Couch
(Cassell)	22
The Roman Road. By "Zack,"	(Constable) 19
Es Lebe das Leben. Translated by Edith Wharton
(Duckworth)	18
Memories of Vailima. By Isabel Strong and Lloyd Osbourne
(Chatto and Windus)	18
The Mediæval Stage. By E. K. Chambers	(Clarendon Press) 18
William Wetmore Story and His Friends. By Henry James
(Blackwood)	17
The Letters of Horace Walpole. Edited by Mrs. Paget Toynbee
(Clarendon Press)	16
The Pearl-Maiden. By H. Rider Haggard	(Longmans) 14
The Life and Times of Georg Joachim Goschen. By Viscount Goschen
(Murray)	14
Queen Victoria. By Sidney Lee	(Smith, Elder) 13
The Memoirs of Paul Kruger. Told by Himself	(Unwin) 12
The Better Sort. By Henry James	(Methuen) 12
Letters from the Holy Land. By Lady Butler	(Black) 12
The Circle. By Katherine Cecil Thurston	(Blackwood) 10
A New Volume of Essays. By G. K. Chesterton	(Lane) 9
Robert Buchanan. By Harriet Jay	(Unwin) 9
Miss Charlotte M. Yonge. By Christabel Coleridge	(Macmillan) 8
The Dayspring. By William Barry	(Unwin) 8
Froissart in 1902. By F. C. Gould	(Unwin) 8
The Life of Bret Harte. By T. Edgar Pemberton	(Pearson) 8

Competition No. 184 (New Series).

This week we offer a Prize of One Guinea for the best set of humorous verses, on any subject, not to exceed sixteen lines.

RULES.

Answers, addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 1 April, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Creighton (Mandell), University and Other Sermons.	(Longmans) net 5/0
Pallis (Alex.), A Few Notes on the Gospels according to St. Mark and St. Matthew	(Liverpool Booksellers Co.)
Roberts (Harry), Collected and arranged by, The Sayings of Jesus	(Gay & Bird) net 1/0

POETRY, CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

Is It Shakespeare? By a Cambridge Graduate.	(Murray) net 12/0
Stringer (Arthur), Hephaestus and Other Poems	(Richards) net 3/6
Hither and Thither. Songs and Verses. By the Author of "Times and Days," &c.	(Longmans) 5/0
O. J. R. and P. S. W. Horace on the Links	(Sonnenschein) 2/6
Noguchi (Yone), From the Eastern Sea	(Unicorn Press) net 5/0
Not (Vernon), The Ballad of the Soul's Desire	(Greening) net 2/6
Travelyan (R. C.), Cecilia Gonzaga	(Longmans) net 2/6
Gausson (Herbert), Thoughts from the First Three Gospels	(Sonnenschein) 2/6
Sedgwick (Jane Minot), Love Songs from the Greek	(Lane) net 1/6
Secombe (Thomas) and Allen (J. W.), The Age of Shakespeare (1579-1631). 2 vols.	(Bell)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Moore (Henry Charles), Noble Deeds of the World's Heroines
(Religious Tract Society)	3/6
Halid (Halil), The Diary of a Turk	(Black) 5/0
Boger (Alfred J.), The Story of General Bacon	(Methuen) 6/0
Tristram (W. Outram), Coaching Days and Coaching Ways	(Macmillan) net 2/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Ward (Lester F.), Pure Sociology	(Macmillan) net 17/0
Syme (David), The Soul. A Study and an Argument.	(") net 4/6
Patten (Simon N.), Heredity and Social Progress	(") net 5/0
Gardner (Percy), Oxford at the Cross Roads	(Black) net 2/6

ART.

Murray (A. S.), The Sculptures of the Parthenon	(Murray) net 21/0
---	-------------------

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Mitton (G. E.) and edited by Besant (Sir Walter), The Fascination of London: Kensington	(Black) net 1/6
Sidney (F. E.), Anglican Innocents in Spain	(Simpkin, Marshall) net 7/6
Ward (Osbert), The Vale of Orotava	(Russell) 2/6
Butler (Elizabeth), Letters from the Holy Land	(Black) net 7/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Duff (J. D.), Edited by, T. Lucreti Carl De Rerum Natura Liber III.	(Cambridge University Press) 2/0
Edwards (G. M.), Edited by, The Memorabilia of Xenophon. Book I.	(Cambridge University Press) 2/6
Alcock (Rev. George Augustus), Key to the Hebrew Psalter	(Stock) net 7/6

JUVENILE.

Bangs (John Kendrick), Mr. Munchausen	(Richards) 5/0
Oppen (F.), John, Jonathan, and Mr. Oppen	(Richards) net 2/0
Hodgson (Geraldine), Rama and the Monkeys	(Dent) net 1/6
Bell (R. S. Warren), J. O. Jones and How he Earned his Living	(Black) 3/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

Robinson (E. Kay), My Nature Notebook	(Isbister) 2/6
Innes (H. Pembroke), Shafts of Satire and Symbolism	(Broome) 1/0
Sadler (S. H.), The Bothers of Married Life	(Sonnenschein) 2/6
Roberts (Harry), The Tramp's Handbook	(Lane) net 3/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Dasent (Sir George Webb), Popular Tales from the Norse	(Douglas) 10/6
Atherton (Gertrude), Edited by, A Few of Hamilton's Letters	(Macmillan) net 6/0
Grosier (W. H.), A Hundred Years' Work for the Children	(Sunday School Union) 2/6
Eliot (George), The Mill on the Floss, World's Classics	(Richards) net 1/0
Emerson (Ralph Waldo), English Traits and Representative Men	(") net 1/0
Craik (Mrs.), Agatha's Husband	(Ward, Lock) 1/6
Herman (Henry), Lady Turpin	(") 0/6
Thackeray (William Makepeace), The Yellowplush Papers, &c.	(Dent) net 3/6
Crockett (S. R.), The Stickit Minister	(Unwin) 0/6
Stockwell (Arthur H.), Should I go to the Theatre?	(Stockwell) net 0/9
Mac Manus (Anna), The Four Winds of Eirinn	(Gill) 2/0
Mathers (Heleen), The Sin of Agar	(Long) 0/6
Byron (Lord), Works: Poetry, Vol. VI.	(Murray) 6/0
Stevenson (Robert Louis), Edinburgh. Picturesque Notes	(Seeley) net 0/6

PERIODICALS.

Photo-Miniature, Leisure Hour, Girl's Own, Sunday at Home, Ainslee's World's Work, Chambers's Magazine of Art, Royal, Woman at Home, Longman's Critical Review.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

Messrs. Methuen have in preparation an edition of each of the four folios of Shakespeare, reproduced by photography from perfect copies. The first folio has been reproduced more than once, but no reprints of the second, third and fourth folios have hitherto been issued. A really fine set of the four folios cannot now be bought for less than £3,000. A thousand copies of each folio will be printed, and 750 copies of the four folios will be sold in sets at 12 guineas net each set; 250 copies of the first folio will be sold separately at 4 guineas net, and 250 sets of the second, third, and fourth folios will be sold at 10 guineas net.

Messrs. Methuen will publish next week a book entitled "When I was a Child," by "An Old Potter Boy." The author is now a minister, but he was the child of working folk and was brought up as a potter's boy in the potteries. The story of his young life incidentally illustrates the position and condition of labour generally 60 years ago.

"The Scientific Memoirs of Thomas Henry Huxley," edited by Sir Michael Foster and Prof. E. Ray Lankester, will be completed by the publication of a supplementary volume of under one hundred pages, which Messrs. Macmillan & Co. have nearly ready. It contains the completion of Huxley's "Survey Memoir" on fossil fishes, and also three essays of interest to zoologists that are not contained in the published edition of the more general works.

Mr. Israel Zangwill has completed a volume of verse, which will be published by Mr. Heinemann next month. This is the first time the author has issued any volume of poetry, though the book under the title of "Blind Children" is the result of some years of work.

DAVID NUTT'S LIST OF SPRING ANNOUNCEMENTS.

THE TUDOR TRANSLATIONS. Edited by W. E. HENLEY.
Vols. xxxiii-xxxviii.

THE ENGLISH BIBLE.

Translated out of the original tongues by the commandment of King James the First. Anno 1611. With a Terminal Essay by WILLIAM ERNEST HENLEY. Price £4 10s. Vol. I. ready.

ST. JOHN'S GOSPEL AND EPISTLES AS READ BY THE EARLY CHRISTIANS.

A parallel edition, in Greek and English, based upon the traditional text, i.e., upon the textus receptus critically sifted and freed from numerous editorial, scribal, and exegetic errors, with a fresh, independent, and faithful translation into English, a double critical apparatus, a short Commentary and Glossary by A. N. JANNARIS, M.A., Ph.D., Author of "An Historical Greek Grammar," &c. Demy 8vo. Upwards of 200 pages. Cloth. Probable price. net 10s. 6d. [Ready April.]

 A further application to the New Testament of the method so successfully applied by Blass to the writings of St. Luke. The results will be found of equal importance and interest alike by theologians and historians.

THE ANCIENT EAST.

Each number, crown 8vo, paper, 1s., cloth, 1s. 6d.

No. 6. THE HITTITES. By Dr. L. MESSERSCHMIDT. With 19 Illustrations. [Ready.]

Dr. Messerschmidt's study sums up accurately and precisely what is actually known about the Hittite peoples and their mysterious civilisation.

HANDBOOK OF SPOKEN EGYPTIAN ARABIC.

Comprising a short Grammar and an English Arabic Vocabulary of Current Words and Phrases. By J. SELDEN WILLMORE, M.A., one of the two Judges of the Native Court of Appeal, Cairo. Author of "The Spoken Arabic of Egypt." 16mo, cloth, 2s. [Ready.]

THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI.

A French metrical romance of the 13th century. Edited by Prof. L. BRANDIN, and translated into English prose by ALICE KEMP-WELCH. With collotype reproductions of a 14th century carved ivory casket, giving scenes from the romance. 16mo, 112 pages. Printed at the Constable Press on hand-made paper. 2s. net. [Ready end of March.]

 The French original, one of the most interesting examples of French mediæval story-telling, a tale of passion in high life by a 13th century Bourget, has hitherto only been accessible in M. Raynaud's edition in Romania.

GERALD THE WELSHMAN.

By HENRY OWEN, D.C.L., F.S.A., Editor of George Owen's Pembrokehire. A revised and enlarged edition. Crown 8vo, about 250 pages. [Ready May.]

FROM A LONDON GARDEN.

Poems by J. ST. JOHN ADCOCK, Author of "Songs of the War," "The Luck of Private Foster," &c. 16mo, 84 pp. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

THE MARRIAGE OF CUPID AND PSYCHE.

Translated from the Latin of Apuleius by CHARLES STUTTFORD. With four designs by JESSIE MOTHERSOLE. Royal 8vo. Printed at the Ballantyne Press in Red and Black, in a limited issue of 500 copies on the finest Arnold hand-made paper, and copies on Japanese vellum, with double states of the plates. Vellum.

 To be issued about April 20. Subscription form on application.

ON THE LITERARY THEORIES OF TAINE AND HERBERT SPENCER.

Two Lectures by A. T. W. BORSDOFF, Ph.D., Professor at the University College of Wales, Aberystwyth. Crown 8vo, 69 pp. 1s. net. [Ready April.]

 As preliminary to an attempt at constructing a Science of Literature, the author criticises the two most influential theories of literary aesthetics of the last fifty years.

CLAVICULA SALOMONIS.

A Hebrew MS. newly discovered and now described by H. GOLLANCZ, M.A., D.Litt., Goldsmid Professor of Hebrew at University College, London. 1s. 6d. net. [Ready.]

 Describes the only known Hebrew text of this famous Manual of Mediæval Magic, the original of Faust's Hellenzwang.

THE TEACHING OF LANGUAGES.

By W. H. WIDGERY. A reprint of the pamphlet originally issued in 1888, with an introduction by H. W. EVE, M.A., sometime Dean of the College of Preceptors, and late Head Master of University College School. 16mo, upwards of 80 pp. Sewn 1s. net. [Ready April.]

DAVID NUTT, 57-59, Long Acre, W.C.

MESSRS. GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd.

NEWNES' ART LIBRARY.

Large Fcap. 4to, each Volume containing 64 Full-page Illustrations and a Photogravure Frontispiece. The first two volumes illustrative of The Work of Botticelli and The Work of Sir Joshua Reynolds. 3s. 6d. net, each.

THIN PAPER CLASSICS.

Evelyn's Diary, Lamb's Works, and Peacock's Novels. Cloth, 3s. net; Lambskin, 3s. 6d. net, each.

THIN PAPER NOVELS.

AINSWORTH'S Old St. Paul's and WHITEHEAD'S Richard Savage. Cloth, 2s. 6d. net; Lambskin, 3s. net, each.

OUR NEIGHBOUR SERIES.

Danish Life in Town and Country, and Austrian Life in Town and Country. 3s. 6d. net, each.

THE LIBRARY OF USEFUL STORIES.

The Story of Rapid Transit and The Story of the Atlantic Cable. 1s. each.

ILLUSTRATED SIXPENNY NOVELS.

Micah Clarke. By A. CONAN DOYLE.

Secrets of Monte Carlo. By WM. LE QUEUX.

In the Heart of the Storm. By MAXWELL GRAY.

HOW TO BUY SERIES.

How to Buy a Gun. By H. A. BRYDEN and BASIL TOZER. 1s. 6d. net.

A PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED VOLUME ON

Lawn Tennis at Home and Abroad. Edited by A. WALLIS MYERS, with Chapters on the Old School and the New, by H. S. MAHONY. Memories of Men and Meetings, by H. S. SCRIVENOR. Courts and Conditions, by G. W. HILL-YARD. Lawn Tennis for Ladies, by Mrs. STERRY. Players of the Present, by A. WALLIS MYERS. American Methods, by DWIGHT F. DAVIS. The Game in Northern Europe, by J. W. FLAVELLE. Lawn Tennis in Switzerland and France, by R. B. HOUGH. Lawn Tennis in Australia, by L. O. S. POIDEVIN, and Lawn Tennis in India, by F. S. PEARSON. 10s. 6d. net.

PLAYERS OF THE DAY.

Consisting of 48 Heliochrome Portraits of Theatrical Celebrities. 10s. 6d.

New York Sketches. By JESSE LYNCH WILLIAMS. Illustrated by Henry McCarter, Jules Guérin, Everitt Shinner, W. R. Leigh, and others. 7s. 6d. net.

The Tickencote Treasure: a Novel. By WM. LE QUEUX. 6s.

Stories from the Old, Old Bible. By Mrs. L. T. MEADE. 7s. 6d. net.

The Meaning of Pictures. By Prof. JOHN G. VAN DYKE. 5s. net.

The Handy Shilling Atlas. By J. G. BARTHOLOMEW.

The International Geography. New edition, third, revised and enlarged. Edited by H. R. MILL. 15s.

New Illustrated Catalogue free on application.

SOUTHAMPTON STREET, STRAND, W.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, Ltd.

ENLARGED AND CLASSIFIED CATALOGUE.

(Over 500 pages, 8vo, bound in green cloth.)

All the Principal Works in Circulation at the Library

ARRANGED UNDER SUBJECTS,

Forming a Comprehensive Guide to Notable Publications in most Branches of Literature.

Books of Permanent Interest on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ARTS, SCIENCE, THEOLOGY, PHILOSOPHY, SPORT, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, and FICTION.

Price 1s. 6d.

ALSO A

FOREIGN CATALOGUE,

containing Books in French, German, Italian, Russian, and Spanish. Price 1s. 6d.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, 30-34, New Oxford Street;
241, Brompton Rd., S.W.; 48, Queen Victoria St., E.C., LONDON.

THE WRITER'S YEAR BOOK.

500 Places to Sell Manuscripts, Photographs and Drawings.

A Commercial Directory for Professional Writers, Artists, and Photographers, giving the Address, Rates, Time of Payment, and Conditions of Contributors of all Magazines, Papers, etc., Purchasing MSS., Photos or Drawings. Articles by AARON WATSON, ELIZABETH BANKS, and GALLOWAY KYLE.

Price 1s. 6d., post free 1s. 9d.

THE WRITER'S YEAR BOOK Co., Granville House, Arundel St., Strand, W.C.

FROM Mr. MURRAY'S LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

PRINCE CHRISTIAN VICTOR.

The Story of a Young Soldier. By T. HERBERT WARREN, President of Magdalen College, Oxford. With Portraits and Illustrations. Square 8vo, 12s. net. [Just out.]

"... It is a cordial and affectionate biography."—Times.
"... The letters of Prince Christian Victor are, from beginning to end, brimful of interest. ... Mr. Warren has performed his work as editor with discrimination and skill ... a worthy memorial of a noble life."—Daily Telegraph.

CORRESPONDENCE OF LADY BURGHES

(afterwards Countess of Westmorland) with the DUKE OF WELLINGTON. Edited by her Daughter, Lady ROSE WEIGALL. With Portraits. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net. [Just out.]

OUT OF THE PAST.

Some Biographical Essays. By the Right Hon. Sir MOUNTSTUART E. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I., Author of "Notes from a Diary." 2 vols., crown 8vo, 18s. [Just out.]

SIR A. HENRY LAYARD, G.C.B., D.C.L.

Autobiography and Letters from his Childhood until his Appointment as H.M. Ambassador at Madrid. With an additional chapter on his Parliamentary career. By the Right Hon. Sir ARTHUR OTWAY. Edited by the Hon. WILLIAM NAPIER BRUCE. With Portraits and Illustrations. Two vols., demy 8vo, 25s. net. [Just out.]

"... One of the most interesting volumes of memoirs published in recent years."—Vanity Fair.
"... The volumes are fascinating reading."—Daily News.

POETS AND DREAMERS.

Studies and Translations from the Irish. By Lady GREGORY, Translator and Editor of "Cuchulain of Muirthemne." Crown 8vo, 6s. [Just out.]

IS IT SHAKESPEARE?

The Great Question of Elizabethan Literature. Answered in the Light of New Revelations and important Contemporary Evidence hitherto unnoticed. By a Cambridge Graduate. With Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, 12s. net. [Just out.]

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE STREET, W.

CONTENTS OF

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER For April.

The Crisis in the Church. By the Right Hon. Viscount HALIFAX.
The Church's Last Chance. By Lady WIMBORNE.
Loyalty to the Prayer Book. By Sir GEORGE ARTHUR, Bart.
An Appeal to the Dean and Canons of Westminster. By the Rev. HUBERT HANDLEY.
Europe and South America. By SOMERS SOMERSET.
South American Republics and the Monroe Doctrine. By JOHN MACDONELL, C.B., LL.D.
The "Horrible Jumble" of the Irish Land Laws. By Sir ALEXANDER MILLER, C.S.I., K.C.
Literary Criticisms and the Drama. By HENRY ARTHUR JONES.
The Gospel of Mr. P. W. H. Myers. By W. H. MALLOCK.
From this World to the Next. By FREDERIC HARRISON.
The Novels of Peacock. By HERBERT PAUL.
A Social Experiment. By the Countess of WARWICK.
Corn-growing in British Countries. By E. JEROME DYER.
The Duel in Germany and Austria. By R. CL. BACHOFEN VON ECHT.
The Independent Labour Party. By J. KEIR HARDIE, M.P.
The Present Position of the Licensing Question. By Sir ROBERT HUNTER.
Last Month. By Sir WEMYSS REID.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co., LTD.

The Academy and Literature

Is now

POSTED FREE to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-

FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT OF 17/6

will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy.

Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor, or direct to the Publisher of THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE, 43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

Just Published. Fourth Edition, thoroughly revised, demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT.

Including the Musical Copyright Act, 1902, the American Copyright Act, the Berne Convention, the Consequent Order in Council and Cases to Date. By THOMAS EDWARD SCRUTTON, M.A., LL.B., K.C., Author of "Charter Parties and Bills of Lading," &c., and Lecturer in Common Law to the Incorporated Law Society.

"Mr. Scrutton's book is well written and has been carefully revised, and will be found a safe and acceptable guide through the mazes of the existing law."—Law Journal.

"We think it is not only the easiest, but the most useful and practical work on copyright."—Law Quarterly Review.

LONDON:

WM. CLOWES & SONS, LTD., Law Publishers,
7, Fleet Street (adjoining Middle Temple Lane).

ELLIOT STOCK'S NEW BOOKS.

NOW READY.—New Volume of the Cheap Edition of THE BOOK LOVER'S LIBRARY.

In fols. cap 8vo, printed on antique paper, and tastefully bound, 1s. 6d. net.

BOOKS FATAL TO THEIR AUTHORS

By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A., Author of "Our English Villages," "The Church in the Netherlands," &c.

VOLUMES ALREADY PUBLISHED UNIFORM WITH THE ABOVE. 1s. 6d. net each.

WHEATLEY'S HOW TO FORM A LIBRARY, HAZLITT'S OLD COOKERY BOOKS AND ANCIENT CUISINE, AND BLADES'S ENEMIES OF BOOKS.

* Complete Lists of the Series for Distribution can be had on application.

In crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

FALLACIES in PRESENT DAY THOUGHT.

By J. P. SANDLANDS, M.A., T.C.D., Author of "Natural Food," "Sanitation, Public and Personal," &c.

"A gay-hearted and entertaining book."—Sussex Daily News.

"A bright little book of discursive essays."—Rock.

NEW HISTORICAL STORY.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered and illustrated, 5s.

THE CROSS OF PEARLS; or, The Story of a French Family in the Fourteenth Century. By Mrs. BEARNE.

"This story of a French family in the fourteenth century is enriched with reliable detail. A beautiful and convincing fiction."—Dundee Advertiser.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, Paternoster Row, London, E.C.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOW READY.

PROFUSELY ILLUSTRATED.

Price 6s.

AMERICA AT WORK.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER,

Author of THE REAL SIBERIA, of which a Fifth Impression is now in the Press.

"Mr. Foster Fraser's new book 'America at Work' is a brilliant piece of journalism. It aims at producing one impression only, and it succeeds in its aim more than G. W. Stevens, or Mr. Kipling, or Mr. Archer, or Mr. Bockles Willson. Mr. Foster Fraser focusses in a single blazing light the vision of the New America."—Daily News.

AN APRIL PRINCESS.

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.

Price 6s.

A CHEAP EDITION OF

THE LITTLE MINISTER.

By J. M. BARRIE.

With 8 Full-page Illustrations by W. HOLE, R.S.A. Price 3s. 6d.

"Of all the works that have come from the facile pen of J. M. Barrie, none can ever equal the delightful saga of Gavin Dishart and the Egyptian lassie Babbie."—Dundee Courier, April 1, 1903.

JOHN GAYTHER'S GARDEN.

By FRANK STOCKTON.

With 8 Illustrations. Price 6s.

"Written in the characteristically quaint style which has endeared this gentle humorist to thousands of people on both sides of the Atlantic."—Daily Express.

Vol. IV., with upwards of 500 Illustrations and 10 Coloured Plates, of

THE ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF SOCIAL ENGLAND.

By EMINENT WRITERS.

Edited by H. D. TRAILL, D.C.L., and J. S. MANN, M.A.

Vol. IV., price 14s. net, covers the Period from 1603 to 1714.

READY SHORTLY.

THE DUKE DECIDES.

By HEADON HILL.

With 8 Full-page Illustrations. Price 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY REVEL.

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH (Q).

Price 6s.

CASSELL & COMPANY, Ltd., London,
and all Booksellers.

Mr. JOHN LANE'S NEW BOOKS.

A Novel to Read.

THE LIGHT BEHIND. THE LIGHT BEHIND.

By Mrs. WILFRID WARD,

By Mrs. WILFRID WARD,

Author of the successful novel, "One Poor Scruple."

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s.

"Mrs. Ward's novel, carefully written, intelligently thought out, is an oasis in modern fictional literature."—Mr. W. L. Courtney, in The Daily Telegraph.
"The characterisation of Lady Cheriton is a well-nigh perfect achievement of art."—Daily Chronicle.

A STIRRING HISTORICAL NOVEL.

CORNET STRONG, OF IRETON'S HORSE.

By DORA GREENWELL MCCHEENEY,

Author of "Rupert by the Grace of God," "Beatrice Infelix," &c. With Eight full-page Illustrations by MAURICE GREIFFENHAGEN. Crown 8vo, 6s.

The Times.—"Miss McCheeneey has written a fresh, clear, historical sketch which is readable not only because the characters have a life of meaning of their own, but also from the charm that goes with crisp and cultivated descriptions of persons, events and things."

BY THE AUTHOR OF "IN SCARLET AND GREY."

CONTRASTS.

By the Hon. Mrs. HENRIK. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s.

"The stories display much sympathetic observation of modern life."—Literature.

A GIRL'S LIFE IN A HUNTING COUNTRY.

By HANDASYDE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "THE CARDINAL'S SNUFF-BOX."

MADMOISELLE MISS.

By HENRY HARLAND. New Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

BELLE'S LETTRES.

A NEW VERSION OF OMAR KHAYYAM.

THE RUBAIYAT OF UMAR KHAI- YAM.

Done into English from the French of J. B. Nicolas by FREDERICK BARON CORVO, Author of "In His Own Image," &c. With an Introduction by NATHAN HASKELL DOLE. Together with a Reprint of the French Text. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

A NEW PORTRAIT OF SHAKE- SPEARE.

With Special Reference to the so-called Droeshout Original and the Ely Palace Portrait. By JOHN CORBIN, Author of "The Elizabethan Hamlet," &c. With Five Illustrations. Small 4to, 5s. net.

The Standard says:—"Mr. Corbin's book is written with excellent temper, and with a serious appreciation of what constitutes evidence."

A NEW VOLUME OF POEMS.

BETWEEN THE LIGHTS.

By ALICE HERBERT. Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d. net.

SONGS FROM THE GREEK.

Being Vol. XII. of "The Lover's Library" Series (5½ by 3 inches). Price, cloth, 1s. 6d. net; leather, 2s. net; parchment, 3s. net.

VOL. I. OF "THE COUNTRY HANDBOOKS."

THE TRAMP'S HANDBOOK.

For the use of Travellers, Soldiers, Cyclists, and Lovers of the Country. Fcap. 8vo, limp cloth, 3s. net; limp leather, 4s. net.

A prospectus sent free on application.

The Daily News.—"An attractive little book written from the point of view of a practical man and a philosopher. The illustrations will fascinate anyone who has ever camped or tramped."

JOHN LANE, LONDON & NEW YORK

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

New Volume by K. & Hesketh Prichard.

JUST PUBLISHED. Crown 8vo, 6s.

ROVING HEARTS.

By K. and HESKETH PRICHARD,

Authors of "A Modern Mercenary,"

"Karadac; Count of Gersay,"

"Tammer's Duel," &c.

LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

SECOND IMPRESSION.

With Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

YORKSHIRE POST.—"By a lofty and penetrating genius it is raised to a level of absorbing interest and distinction, and while it cannot add to it will sustain Mrs. Humphry Ward's reputation as a writer in the very front rank of English novelists."

SKETCH.—"It is not too high praise to say that Mrs. Humphry Ward's last book contains all her qualities and none of her defects. . . . She has preserved a most perfect balance, and one would not have a word left out or a word added."

CORNELIUS.

By Mrs. DE LA PASTURE,

Author of "Deborah of Tod's," "Adam Grigson," &c.

NOTICE.—The FIRST IMPRESSION of CORNELIUS promptly sold out. A SECOND IMPRESSION is NOW READY.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.—"In this novel Mrs. Henry de la Pasture has given us the best work she has yet produced. . . . 'Cornelius' is a capital novel, which will not only increase Mrs. de la Pasture's reputation, but give unalloyed pleasure to many new readers."

THE TRIUMPH OF COUNT OSTERMANN.

By GRAHAM HOPE,

Author of "A Cardinal and His Conscience" and "My Lord Winchenden."

SPECTATOR.—"A pleasant and graceful romance. . . . The terse simplicity of the author's style materially enhances the pleasure to be gained from the perusal of this interesting romance."

A CASTLE IN SPAIN.

By BERNARD E. J. CAPES,

Author of "The Land of Wine," &c.

THIRD IMPRESSION. Crown 8vo, 6s.

TIMES.—"It is some time since we have read a novel so full of good matter."

TRUTH.—"As stirring a tale as one could wish to read."

THE BONNET CONSPIRATORS.

By VIOLET A. SIMPSON.

Crown 8vo, 6s. [Just published.]

"The action of the story takes place during the few days in July, 1815, when Buonaparte was still in partial hiding near the French coast, and before he had made up his mind to throw himself on the mercy of England."

LONDON:

SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1613. Established 1869. London: 4 April 1903. Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK	331
REVIEWS.
Is it Shakespeare?	335
The Bhaguvanga	336
Charlotte Mary Yonge: Her Life and Letters	337
Memoirs of Count Grammont	338
Journals of Field-Marshal Count Von Blumenthal, for 1866 and 1870-71	349
Letters from the Holy Land	339
The Creation of Matter; or, Material Elements, Evolution and Creation	340
SHORT NOTICES:
My Nature Note-Book—Hertfordshire—Thirty Years in Australia	340
FICTION:
A Stretch off the Land—The Advanced-Guard—In the Garden of Charity	311
Notes on the Week's Novels	342

ARTICLES.
"THE WORSHIP OF SORROW"	343
Hans Breitmann	344
Books Too Little Known—"Amaryllis at the Fair" and "After London"	345
Impressions—XXV. Companionship	347
DRAMA:
A Player's Play. E. K. Chambers	347
ART:
Whitechapel and Elsewhere. C. L. H.	348
SCIENCE:
From the Melting Pot. C. W. Saleeby	349
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Modern Stage	350
Johnson or Goldsmith?	350
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
Set of humorous verses	350

The Literary Week.

THIS has been a week of new editions. They make quite a long list, and include a translation of the letters of Mlle. de Lespinasse, a book that has received a new lease of life by the publication of Mrs. Humphry Ward's novel. Two more parts in the Edinburgh Folio edition of Shakespeare have been issued, and another instalment of Dr. Murray's Oxford Dictionary—Onomastical—Outing. Among the more important books of the week we note the following:—

LIFE AND LETTERS OF BROOKE FOSS WESTCOTT, sometime Bishop of Durham. Two vols. By his son Arthur Westcott.

The motto of this biography is suitably taken from Dr. Westcott: "To make life one harmonious whole, to realize the invisible, to anticipate the transfiguring majesty of the Divine Presence, is all that is worth living for." Mr. Westcott has done his work with simplicity and directness. We read in Canon Westcott's preface to his brother's book: " . . . those who met the teacher in after years would never have guessed he had passed through a struggle of grievous doubt—his faith was so serene, so obviously unshaken. We know now it was not always so, as these pages will disclose to those who care to read."

ON THE "POLAR STAR" IN THE ARCTIC SEA. By the Duke of the Abruzzi.

Translated by William Le Queux. The object of the "Polar Star's" expedition was to push as far north as possible along some coast-line, and then, after the winter had passed, to travel on sledges towards the Pole. The sledge expedition, led by Commander Cagni, reached a latitude which had not been previously attained. The statement of Commander Cagni is included in these volumes, which contain over two hundred illustrations and sixteen photogravure plates.

CRITICAL ESSAYS AND LITERARY FRAGMENTS. With an Introduction by J. Churton Collins.

A publishers' note informs us that the "texts contained in the present volume are reprinted with very slight alterations from the 'English Garner' issued in eight volumes (1877-1890) by Professor Arber." The contents of the original "Garner" have been re-arranged and classified, and a certain amount of fresh matter has been introduced. At the conclusion of his Introduction Mr. Churton Collins says: "For the modernization of the spelling, which some readers may be inclined to regret, and for the punctuation, as for the elucidatory notes within brackets, Mr. Arber is entirely responsible." The volume begins with an extract from Thomas Wilson's "Art of Rhetoric," 1554, and concludes with Franklin's "Poor Richard Improved," 1757.

OUR article in last week's issue, "Taken as Read," has moved a correspondent to a reproving protest. He is, he tells us, a professional man in a provincial city, "yet I possess, and have read, and do read, Milton and Shakespeare, even Bunyan and the Bible. . . . Of Greek and Latin I know as much as the average sixth form school-boy." Our correspondent finds Chaucer and Spenser difficult without a crib, but he protests against being relegated to the ranks of the readers of an author who shall be nameless. "Is there nothing," cries our admonisher, "between Plato and the latest novel? May I not, in my modest way, love Dickens, Lamb, or Addison, Green, Motley, or Merivale, Tennyson, Browning, or Wordsworth?" Why, certainly. But we never suggested that the writers named were not read. A few read them, as we said, and it is through the few "that the classics are distilled and filter through to the masses beneath." We are glad to recognise in our correspondent one of the "fit and few" through whom the filtration tradition is carried on.

INSEN, who was seventy-five the other day, now hardly sees anyone. Even on his birthday the only person outside his own family who was permitted to congratulate him personally was Bjoernson. He can still move about with the aid of two sticks, but he never leaves the house, and spends the greater part of his time at his window, gazing into the street. If passers-by greet him he may or may not notice them. He no longer reads or writes: his life seems to be set upon the past and the window through which he gazes.

THE study of modern Greek is confined to so few outside the Greeks themselves, that the fact of the existence of a Greek comic publication does not seem of much general interest. But the "Romios" is a rather remarkable paper; it has been issued every Saturday for seventeen years, it is all written in verse, and its sole editor, contributor and staff consists of one individual, Mr. Souris. Mr. Souris indulges in pointed satire, but he appears to offend nobody. A few years ago he translated Aristophanes' "The Clouds" into modern Greek verse, and he has recently published a volume of poems. Mr. Souris is catholic in his selection of words; he mingles classical Greek with the modern vernacular, and thus appears to reproduce the actual language of the people.

APPROPRIATENESS in the binding of books is a thing for which we usually look in vain. An instance of inappropriateness lies before us in Mr. Charles Booth's "Life and Labour of the People in London." Mr. Booth has explored the depths of poverty, its causes and its environment, and yet the printed records are bound in imitation vellum, with elaborately gilded backs. Surely the simplest possible binding could hardly have been too simple for such a series of practical revelations.

THE second volume of the "King's Classics" is "The Love Letters of Dorothy Osborne to Sir William Temple." The series is pleasant both to hand and eye, but the white backs and the blue-grey covers are hardly calculated to stand use and dust. The first volume has been on our shelves for a couple of months, and is already soiled and prematurely aged in appearance. Books for use should not have white backs.

THE dramatists who find modern theatrical criticism offensive are not confined to England. Sudermann wrote a series of articles not long ago in the "Berliner Tageblatt," which have since been reprinted as a pamphlet, complaining that the attitude of critics has never been more unsympathetic than it is to-day. He asserts that only in our time have literary manners declined to absolute degeneracy, and he names certain papers as typical of this degeneracy. It is the old story all over again. We have only to turn up the files of any newspaper for the last hundred years to be assured of this. It was not kind to refer to Sudermann as "a literary fraud with humorous peculiarities," but no doubt the critic could justify his view. The one point that emerges is the folly of authors in replying to their critics.

WE find in "Temple Bar" an article by Mr. J. K. Hudson on Hartley Coleridge which contains some hitherto unpublished letters and verses. Hartley Coleridge's work is little known nowadays; he was, in fact, a failure, though a failure with a most engaging and amiable personality. He was a curious and fantastic child, and no doubt inherited from his father that faculty for preaching which prompted him to make long extempore prayers aloud to his nurse. When he was seven he used to be plunged in agonies of thought, "puzzling himself about the realities of existence." At school he never played, but spent his time in inventing stories which he told in the dormitory at night. At Oxford he talked and talked, and also succeeded in getting an Oriel Fellowship. Then came collapse; he failed to win the Newdigate, and, as he said, "sought relief from wine." At the end of his twelve months Fellowship probation he was deprived of it, mainly on the ground of intemperance. From that set-back he never wholly recovered; he projected work which was never accomplished, and took to school-mastering, with failure as the inevitable result. His life at Grasmere was simple, lazy, and, like his talk, discursive, and he died a year before Wordsworth, who was his friend always, and near whom he rests. Neither the letters nor verses which Mr. Hudson has unearthed are of any great interest, but this characteristic letter is worth quoting. It should be remembered that Hartley Coleridge had a passion for writing memorial verses:—

DEAR SIR,—That excellent English yeoman, James Fleming (it would be abominable to Mister him), wishes to have four dozen copies of the enclosed verses printed at your earliest convenience, of course for private circulation only. It is some satisfaction that my little knack of verse enables me to give some consolation to a good man, who has lost his youngest, perhaps his favourite, child. I have too much value for the time of a man of business to trouble you with a long letter, so with kind respects to Mrs. Hudson, whose health I hope improves, I remain, your much obliged,

HARTLEY COLERIDGE.

N.B.—As my writing is not the most intelligible in the world. I would thank you for a proof. J. F. will be answerable for any expense incurred. Remember me kindly to Mr. Gough when you see him.

"J. F. will be answerable for any expense incurred" is delightful.

WE reviewed a fortnight ago Mrs. Earle's "A Third Pot Pourri." This week "Punch" prints a parody of the book called "Pooh-Poohri from a Surrey Back Garden." We quote some amusing passages:—

Many people who are addicted to gardening suffer from black and discoloured nails. Several remedies have been suggested to me for this, but perhaps on the whole the best is to wash them.

A good way to cure a headache is to stand on your head in a corner for ten minutes. If you can go to sleep in that posture, so much the better. This treatment has also been found advantageous in cases of rheumatism and affections of the bronchial tubes.

I have just finished Mr. Jones's book on "Mary, Queen of Scots." Poor woman, what a troubled life she had! Fotheringhay, I notice, should be spelt with two h's. Froud-spelt it with only one. How like him!

The sunflowers are now (January) in full bloom in my garden, which only shows what a perfectly wonderful garden it is! And all done by kindness! I cannot think why other people don't grow sunflowers. Their seeds are greatly appreciated in Russia. Pigs may be fed on their leaves. And I see no reason why paper might not be manufactured out of their stalks if somebody would find out how. But English gardeners are so blind to their real interests!

To make nettle-tea pick all the nettles you can find or, better, get someone else to do so, add a pinch of Plasmon and simmer for a fortnight.

A WRITER in the New York "Critic" has an article which touches rather a nice literary point: Is an author justified in piecing together and amplyfying certain already published detached episodes, and weaving them into a book which purports to be new? Mr. Wister's very successful "The Virginian," we are told, was such a book, manufactured from various episodes published in "Harper's" over a course of years. But the writer finds her most interesting case in Mr. Barrie's "Little White Bird." It appears that many pirated editions of Mr. Barrie are in circulation in America. Concerning these, Mr. Barrie says in his preface to the "Thistle Edition" of his works:—

I have seen several of these, bearing such titles as "Two of Them," "An Auld Licht Manse," and "A Tillyloss Scandal," and some of them announce themselves as author's editions, or published by arrangement with the author. They consist of scraps collected and published without my knowledge, and I entirely disown them. I have written no books save those that appear in this edition.

Upon which the "Critic's" contributor writes:—

This is all very well; but as one reads "The Little White Bird" one has a growing consciousness of having previously met David's father, with his roars of devotion, in the person of Lizzie's sailor. The first interview between the old bachelor and David vividly suggests the crude mortal agony of seven minutes spent with "It," while "The Inconsiderate Waiter" greets us like an old friend. So we turn to the pirated collection of stories called "Two of Them" and find there many a suggestion that stands revealed in the later work—whereat we marvel at Barrie's Preface. What are we to believe in the face of such contradictory evidence? That such compilations as "Two of Them," "An Auld Licht Manse," and "A Tillyloss Scandal" are without the author's sanction is quite credible, but that in his fight with pirates he should go to such lengths as to entirely disown the creation of such tales is hardly justifiable.

We think that Mr. Barrie is justified. If he considers that old work, which he has not republished, contains good material more or less wasted, he has every right to recast and remodel that old material. He does not, in that case, sell old goods as new; he merely exercises the discretion open to every artist.

SOME new Longfellow letters are published in the current "Harper's." Some are dated from London, which Longfellow visited in 1835. The following extract is of some interest:—

I believe I mentioned in my letter to Mrs. L. our visit to Mrs. Carlyle.

We were all invited to breakfast there on Wednesday last. Henry went and had a delightful time. Last evening at seven we went to dine at Mr. George Bentham's—a nephew of Jeremy's. How little I thought when reading Neal's "Life of Bentham" last winter that I should ever visit that house! He resides in the same house, on the same spot, near Westminster Abbey. It has of course undergone many alterations. We were shown into a handsomely furnished drawing-room, the windows of which overlooked the garden where Jeremy used to perambulate. Mr. Bentham, on pointing this garden out to us, remarked that, although his uncle was a very singular man, he hoped we should not believe all Neal had written about him. . . .

We should like to have heard more about the "delightful time" spent with Mrs. Carlyle.

THE same magazine, which had hoped to publish the first instalment of Miss Mary Johnston's "Sir Mortimer" in May, informs its readers that, in consequence of physical weakness, Miss Johnston has been unable to complete the story. We read:—

The temporary loss of the story will be made good to our readers by the substitution for it, as soon as possible, of a serial novel of such distinction as to be worthy of its place in the line of noble succession which includes the names of Thackeray, Dickens, George Eliot, Thomas Hardy—indeed of nearly every master of English fiction, since the establishment of the Magazine.

We wonder by what name the happy author of this masterpiece is known.

"NOTES AND QUERIES" gives some suggestive particulars concerning a seventeenth century book sale. In 1682, "at the Auction-House known by the Name of the Swan in Great St. Bartholomew's-Close," began the dispersal of a remarkable library formed by Richard Smith, of London. The catalogue extended to four hundred and four quarto pages, and was prefaced by an address to the reader from which we extract the following:—

The Gentleman that Collected it, was a Person infinitely Curious and Inquisitive after Books, and who suffered nothing considerable to escape him, that fell within the compass of his Learning; for he had not the vanity of desiring to be Master of more than he knew how to use. He lived to a very great Age, and spent a good part of it, almost intirely in the search of Books: Being as constantly known every day to walk his Round through the Shops, as he sat down to Meals: where his great skill and experience enabled him to make choice of what was not obvious to every Vulgar Eye. He lived in times, which ministred peculiar opportunities of meeting with Books, that are not every day brought into publick light; and few eminent Libraries were Bought, where he had not the Liberty to pick and choose. And while others were forming Arms, and New-modelling Kingdoms, his great Ambition was to become Master of a good Book. Hence arose as that vast number of his Books, so the choiceness and rarity of the greatest part of them, and that of all kinds, and in all sorts of Learning . . . Nor was the Owner of them a meer idle Possessor of so great a Treasure: For as he generally Collated his Books upon the Buying of them (upon which account the Buyer may rest pretty secure of their being perfect) so he did not barely turn over the Leaves, but observed the Defects of Impressions, and the ill arts used by many, compared the differences of Editions, concerning which and the like Cases, he has entred memorable and very useful remarks upon very many of the Books under his own hand, Observations wherein certainly never man was more Diligent and Industrious.

In the main the prices ruled low; the seventh edition of Bunyan's "Sighs from Hell" went for sevenpence, and the fourth edition of "Grace Abounding" for sixpence. The first edition of Bacon's "Essaies" realised only sevenpence, and George Herbert's "Temple, Sacred Poems, and Ejaculations" the meagre sum of threepence. The buyer who secured Lydgate's "Translation of Boccace's fall of Princes," 1554, and Gower's "De Confessioe Amantis," 1554, bracketed together as one lot, for six and eightpence, did astonishingly well. Richard Smith's library appears to have been varied and eminently solid.

FROM an appreciation of "John Inglesant" in the Chicago "Dial," we extract the following:—

It is such books as these that redeem fiction from the reproach of catering to the mere entertainment of the reader, and that justify it as the typical form of modern literary art. Fiction has much to answer for, no doubt, in the way of sensationalism, and pettiness, and morbid imagination, and false idealism. But a book like "John Inglesant" shows that the writing of novels may be also one of the noblest forms of artistic and ethical endeavour. And the high mission of the serious novelist has not often found as fine an exemplification as in this very book. . . .

Yet "John Inglesant's" popularity even now, when it is accepted and acclaimed, cannot compare with the popularity of scores of books without either art or endeavour.

THE success of the "Hibbert Journal" has, in its way, been the most remarkable success of recent years. The current issue has the following amongst its principal articles: "Optimism and Immortality," "Martineau's Philosophy," "Buddhism as a Living Force," and "Drifting and Doctrine." Mr. G. Lowes Dickinson's "Optimism and Immortality" opens on this cheerful note: "Walking in the spring along the coast of Cornwall, and meditating on the subject of this paper, on a green cliff overhanging the sea, I came upon a flock of young lambs. Nothing could be imagined more beautiful; nothing, as I thought, more touching."

THE arrangements being made by Mr. Collier for the production in London of an edition of "Collier's Weekly" are now nearing completion. We understand that a principal feature of the publication is to be a series of coloured illustrations. Coloured illustrations have been tried again and again in London weekly journalism, but so far without success. It is difficult to account for this. The aim, of course, should be towards absolute simplicity; to attempt too much is fatal. Paris knows the secret, and we should be glad to see London come into line.

A NEW monthly review of distinguished appearance is "Flora and Sylva." The aim of the review is to provide coloured illustrations and also good engravings of new, rare, or precious plants, trees, shrubs, and fruits, fitted for our climate; and also to cultivate a taste for the good and picturesque planting of trees. The illustrations to the first number are excellent, and the letterpress clear and practical.

Bibliographical.

It is pleasant to note that the Hakluyt Society and Mr. Macle hose have come to an arrangement by which rival editions of the "Voyages" will be avoided. Both would have appealed only to a limited public, and neither, perhaps, would have been financially successful. Meanwhile, a correspondent writes to me from Dundee to inquire as to the prospects of an edition of Hakluyt which could be purchased by persons of merely moderate means. The cost of the complete "Voyages" is at present prohibitive in the case of the great majority of book-lovers. A well-known firm, approached on the subject of a reasonably-priced edition, has been significantly silent on the subject. The question is simply whether a reasonably-priced edition could be made to pay. There is a limit to the sphere of the cheap reprint, and it seems to have been touched of late. Book-lovers take too little account of the cost of production—of type-setting, of paper, of binding, of allowances to the trade, and so forth. The cheap-reprint business has its risk; whereas for the high-priced book, especially when the edition is small, its publisher can usually secure a public. We must not expect our publishers to be too speculative; life is for most of them a lottery, even now.

The other day I had occasion to mention the rumour that Mr. Cyril Maude and his brother were writing a History of the Haymarket Theatre. Now comes the announcement that Mr. Austin Brereton, one of Sir Henry Irving's biographers, and an industrious student of stage annals, is at work on a History of the Lyceum. It is to be hoped that before very long all the older playhouses in London will have found their historian. Covent Garden, Drury Lane, the Adelphi, the Strand, the Royalty, the Princess's, the St. James's, and even the Vaudeville and the Criterion, would be good subjects for the careful annalist. The story of the departed Olympic ought also to be told, if only for the sake of the Vestris and Robson days. Some years of the life of the Adelphi will be covered by Mr. Byron Webber in the Memoirs of Mr. and Mrs. Billington which he is editing. By-the-way, we are still without a biography of Benjamin Webster or of J. B. Buckstone, and that of Dion Boucicault is only now upon the stocks.

Mr. F. B. Doveton sends me a copy of some stanzas called "The Fire Fiend" which have been attributed, he tells me, to Edgar Allan Poe, among whose papers they are said to have been found. Here are the first and second stanzas:—

In the deepest depth of midnight, while the sad and solemn swell
Still was floating, faintly echoed, from the dread alarm bell—
Faintly, faintly, fluttering, floating o'er the sable waves of air
That were through the midnight rolling, chafed and billowy with tolling,
In my chamber I lay dreaming, by the firelight's fitful gleaming,
And my dreams were dreams foreshadowed on a heart
foredoomed to care.
As the last, long, lingering echo of the midnight's mystic chime
Lifting through the sable billows of the thither shore of Time—
Leaving on the starless silence not a token nor a trace—
In a quivering sigh departed, from my couch in fear I started,
Started to my feet in terror, for my dream's phantasmal error
Painted in the fitful fire a frightful, fiendish, flaming face!

Is this a fairly successful imitation of familiar rhythms or a specimen of Poe's more hectic performances at their very worst?

Mr. John Lane, I see, promises us a reprint of FitzGerald's "Euphranor: a Dialogue on Youth," which first came out in 1851, and was, indeed, FitzGerald's first publication. An account of it will be found in Colonel Prideaux' "Notes for a Bibliography." At the present moment it is specially interesting to recall that what Tennyson specially admired in "Euphranor" was, according to F. T. Palgrave, "the brilliant closing picture of a boat-race, with its glimpse of Whewell, 'the high crest and blowing forelock of Phidippus's mare, and he himself shouting encouragement to his crew, conspicuous over all.'" As Colonel Prideaux remarks, the first "Euphranor" was "a mere skeleton as compared with the later editions."

Commenting last week upon Miss Lyall's statement that Mrs. Gaskell had deprecated the issue of any biography of her, I said: "We may take for granted, I think, that the difficulty here presented has been got over, and that Mr. Shorter will have, in the preparation of his volume [for the 'Men of Letters' series], the co-operation of Mrs. Gaskell's relatives." I have now Mr. Shorter's own authority for saying that my assumption was correct, and that in the preparation of his Memoir of Mrs. Gaskell he will have the assistance of the novelist's daughters.

We are promised, among forthcoming books of reference, a "Dictionary of Historical References and Allusions," which will no doubt be welcome as supplementing the "Historic Note-Book" of Dr. E. C. Brewer. There is also to be a volume on "Famous Sayings and their Authors," a title which makes one think of Mr. S. A. Bent's "Short Sayings of Great Men," to which it may prove a useful companion.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

More Mares' Nests.

IS IT SHAKESPEARE? By a Cambridge Graduate. (Murray. 12s. net.)

ONE may now be pretty well sure that Milton did not write "Nova Solyma." The ingenuity of a contemporary, aided by the suggestions of an anagram, has revealed beneath the cowl of "a Cambridge Graduate" the lineaments of Mr. Walter Begley. The book before us is yet another stone upon that cairn of Baconian puerility of which we would fain think that the world had by this time grown weary. It is improbable that its author would come to a sane and well-balanced conclusion upon any problem requiring the exercise of a nice critical faculty. A very few samples of Mr. Begley's reasoning will be all for which space shall be found. Like many other Baconians—like Judge Webb, for example, whose interpretation of the phrase "to keep invention in a noted weed," still holds a unique place in the annals of the heresy—Mr. Begley plays the Pharisee to Mrs. Gallup's Publican. The cryptograms and biliteral ciphers, he declares, "have done more to discredit the discussion of an unusually interesting literary problem than anything else I can call to mind." Here we demur. As for Mrs. Gallup, it is pretty obvious, we suppose, by this time, that "there ain't no sich person." We do not accuse Mr. Begley, on his part, of deliberate mala fides. But we fail to see that the cryptograms and biliteral ciphers are of any very different evidential value from other proofs which Mr. Begley does not hesitate to bring forward. Here is an example, in which Mr. Begley is improving on the suggestion of an egregious German heretic, well named Bormann. It is a little complicated. There is a sonnet, says Mr. Begley, which "reveals the very name of the hidden author." It is Sonnet xxvi., which ends—

Then may I dare to boast how I do love thee,
Till then not show my head where thou may'st prove me.

"And now we shall see how the author lets out the great secret in those words show my head." The sonnet is thought to have some resemblance to the dedication of "Lucrece," and has actually about the amount of resemblance to it which one Elizabethan dedicatory compliment generally does have to another. The "Lucrece" dedication declares that of the love "without end" which the poet bears to the patron "this Pamphlet without beginning is but a superfluous Moity." A characteristic bit of Elizabethan euphuism enough! But now listen to Mr. Begley:—

Such a curious statement naturally leads one to examine the "beginning" of the Pamphlet in its first edition as presented and dedicated to Southampton, and lo! Bacon "shows his head" at once, for the first two lines are headed by this monogram F_B^R , i.e., Fr. B., which may well be called also a superfluous moiety of Fr. B/acon, Fr. representing one half of his name with the superfluous B flowing over from the other half [Prodigious!] This seems promising, but the first few words of the dedication seem to harp on the antitheses "without end" and "without beginning." Let us, therefore, since we have taken away the author's head from the first two lines where he showed it, and so have rendered the Pamphlet without beginning, let us take away the endings of the last two lines, and see if we can find whose is the love that is "without end." We do this, and out comes BACON, neither more nor less.

The first two lines of "Lucrece" are:—

"From the besieged Ardea all in post Borne by the trustless wings of false desire."

The last two are:—

"The Romans plausibly did give consent
To Tarquin's everlasting banishment."

If we include the word FINIS, which is placed underneath the last two lines, and take the first letter F, and draw a line at an angle upwards through the last two lines in the direction of ba and con, we get F. Bacon, thus:—

"The Romaines plausibly did give con sent

To Tarquin's everlasting ba nishment."

F INIS.

And this is the austere scholar who casts a stone at Mrs. Gallup!

Obviously one is not going to follow Mr. Begley through the rest of his book in detail. You see the sort of mind you have to deal with. He pays a great amount of attention to the Sonnets, and tries to show that the known moral character and social position of Bacon make him a far more likely man than the player Shakespeare to have had an intrigue with Mistress Mary Fitton. As there is no real evidence whatever to connect Mary Fitton either with Shakespeare or with Bacon or with the Sonnets themselves, this argument would not appear to take one very far. Incidentally, however, one comes on another quite delightful example of how literary history is written. So far as we can follow Mr. Begley, he holds that the "Dark Lady" of the Sonnets was not only Mary Fitton. She was also a woman of lower rank, perhaps "a citizen's wife of doubtful virtue, whose shop was the resort of the fashionable gallants." And he is more than a little tempted to accept Mrs. Stopes' identification of her with "Jacquinetta Vautrollier, the dark French connection (by marriage) of Richard Field the publisher." [She was, in fact, his wife.]

Since Field published Bacon's "Venus and Adonis" in 1593, this seems to be a shrewd suggestion, by no means improbable. But Mrs. Stopes has no evidence to back it up, except that Field was a Stratford man and knew Shakespeare the Player.

We should have thought that this was quite good enough, Mr. Begley. But it seems rather hard upon Jacquinetta Vautrollier, about whom literally nothing whatever is known, except that she was a Frenchwoman, and therefore, according to Mrs. Charlotte Carmichael Stopes, "probably dark and fascinating." This seems an imperfect basis on which to challenge any woman's reputation.

Let us now leave Mr. Begley, and be serious for a moment. One does not, of course, argue with Baconians. Mr. Begley and others of his sect make a grievance of this, and claim that the orthodox Shakespearean should cease from ridicule and denunciation, and should offer a serious reply to the serious case put before them. But why? It has been our fortune, in the course of a reviewer's business and not without some expert knowledge of the facts of literary history drawn upon, to read through a considerable number of Baconian treatises. On the evidence of these alone and without any similar consideration of the various refutations which have been published, we do not hesitate to say that there is no prima facie case whatever to answer. The whole of the pullulating mess of mushroom literature which has sprung up around the question in recent years is the production of writers who, even where they are not actually dishonest, are at least incapable of dealing with any literary problem in accordance with the canons of sound reasoning. And of course the prima facie case which would lead one to question the constantly repeated attribution of Shakespeare's plays to Shakespeare on contemporary title-pages would have to be very strong indeed. There is no better evidence available from the authorship of anybody's works, after the period within which personal witnesses can be produced has elapsed. The real difficulty in handling the Baconians lies in the fact that their literary methods are only the reductio ad absurdum of those practised by many writers who would very much resent being classed with them. Take, for instance, the identifications by Mr. Thomas Tyler and Mrs. Charlotte Carmichael Stopes of the "Dark Lady" with Mary Fitton and Jacquinetta Vautrollier respectively, which have been already referred to. Neither writer, so far as we know, is a Baconian. But both theories are founded, not upon evidence at all, but at the most upon stray links preserved out of a chain of evidence of which the rest has rusted away for ever. You cannot really reconstruct literary history out of single facts and obscure allusions, at whose context it is impossible to do more than guess. Yet, in literary history as in theology, nobody is content not to know. And it cannot be too emphatically repeated, that this way Baconianism lies.

A Hindu Poem.

THE RHAGUVANCA. By Kalidasa. Translated by P. de Lacy Johnstone. (Dent. 6s.)

FOR his enterprise in giving us an English version of this extremely important and celebrated Hindu poem Mr. de Lacy Johnstone deserves warm thanks. The form in which he has chosen to do so we much regret. One knows not how to deplore sufficiently the singular and persistent ill-counsel which leads men skilled in Oriental languages, but not skilled in poetry, to give us not the scholarly prose version they might give us, but something which is neither faithful translation nor good poetry. The inevitable departures from accurate fidelity which a metrical version compels are only compensated if we get the inner and higher fidelity of poetry replaced by poetry. But few scholars can give us this. A man who cannot produce even accomplished and feeling verse in his own tongue does not become capable of poetry by having the matter to his hand in another language. It seems a favourite but fatal fallacy that what is poetry in one language, if translated into due lengths and garnished with a sufficiency of diction from standard poetic sources, must needs make poetry in another. It only makes poor verse. And a good prose translation of a poem is more poetical than even moderate verse. This might have been a valuable prose translation: it is not a valuable metrical translation. Being an epic Mr. Johnstone has conscientiously gone to Milton for his model, and Miltonises as best he may. The metre is a faint Miltonic echo; shreds of Miltonic diction are strewn through the version, like plums in an Anglo-Saxon dough—for the general language is homely enough. At times trailing into prosaic conventionality, it would in general be adequate enough, if he were not weighted with the felt necessity of being "poetic" and Miltonic. That leads him into the stilted and threadbare device of dropping the article. "By carven stair he mounted to the throne"; "Then sat he down on diamond-sparkling seat"; "Traced lines on golden footstool"; such phrases are continual. One ushers in a curious example of the prosaic conventionality into which Mr. Johnstone sometimes trails, with bathetic effect:—

Auspicious music floated from the conchs
In ambient air, and through the city groves
Glad peacocks madly danced.

Elsewhere, "The princess slightly bowed"—with the effect of a drawing-room novel. The heavy Miltonic movement goes uneasily with the curt Anglo-Saxon syllables which prevail in the translation. Nor does it accord well with Kalidasa's own style of narrative, graceful and flowery, having more likeness to Spenser than to Milton. The translation, in fine, must needs have value as being the sole English version of the poem. But it might have had more value with a wiser choice of medium.

That we ought to have a translation is unquestionable. Kalidasa's epic stands at the head of India's classical age. The heroic—what we might call the Homeric—age produced two great epics; the behemoth bulk of the Mahabharata, and the Ramayana of Valmiki—India's most popular epic. Then came what might be called the literary epic, in which the writers modelled themselves on their predecessors with a distinctly literary aim, as did Virgil on Homer, Milton on Virgil and Homer: it was no longer the spontaneous impulse of national legend. Of these lesser but still beautiful epics Kalidasa's is the greatest. It belongs to the time when India became conscious of herself as a literary nation, when she began to create for herself not only a great poetry, but a great drama. Of all her dramatists Kalidasa was the greatest: his Sakuntala has been played even on the stage of remote Paris, and stirred the admiration of Goethe. Considering, indeed, his eminence alike in drama, epic, and lyric, he may fairly be called the greatest of Hindu poets. He has a luxuriant and delicate fancy, a tender sentiment, and (what never fails these Hindu bards) a fertile invention. Therewith he has a more chastened taste than most of his fellows, in whom limit or curb is not. The unrestraint, the lack of measure, the overseeded fancy of the nation seem imaged in their enormous pantheon of many-headed, innumerable-armed, and monstrous deities; and are (one thinks) a product of that fierce sun which breeds their jungles to "strange overgrowth."

Even the Rhaguvanca (despite our praise of Kalidasa's comparative restraint) seems an overlawless epic to the Western mind. It has been said of "Paradise Lost" that it does not end, but leaves off. Much more absolutely might it be said of the Rhaguvanca. True, we have it in a fragmentary state. But were it complete, one feels the effect would be intrinsically the same. There is no plan with an ordered beginning, culmination, and finale. It bears, in fact, to our Western epic somewhat the same relation which the chronicle-drama bears to the structurally-perfect drama. It comes nearer, perhaps, to the Norse or Icelandic saga than to our epic; but the saga is symmetrical beside it. In effect, it tells not the story of some given hero, but of a line of kings: "Rhagu's Line" (as is the meaning of the title). They are a divine race, as are all these legendary kings, and the exploits of any one would make fair epic material. But having duly consigned him to deification (like Roman emperors, they all become gods on dying), Kalidasa placidly pursues the history of his son. Thus the interest perpetually culminates, drops, and is resumed to culminate afresh: whence you have a linked succession of little epics more truly than one great one.

But at least Kalidasa avoids that crying sin of Hindu epic, the episode, and episode within episode, which makes them a kind of gigantic Arabian Nights. And he develops artistically the career of each king while he is about it. The true climax of the poem (with characteristic perverseness, to our Western notion) comes in the middle: when the god Vishnu announces his intent to honour the family by becoming incarnate in it, and is born as the hero Rama. The giant Ravana, having by austerities become a god and usurped the place of Indra the Thunderer, is "playing it low down" on the other gods. He is only vulnerable by a mortal; and Vishnu incarnates himself as Rama to overthrow the tyranny of this Ravana. With his final success, his tragic separation from his queen Sita, and ultimate re-ascent to heaven, the poem might have had a full close. But Valmiki had treated the same theme in the Ramayana; and therefore, perhaps, Kalidasa felt it necessary to continue the history of his successors, and fall upon antilimax.

Even through the disguise of what we must regretfully consider this unsuccessful English metrical version, the beauties of the original poetry intermittently glance out: one feels the narrative skill, one perceives charming images, and others which need but more perfect expression to be lovely, as one surmises they are in the original. One is aware of tenderness which can readily be conceived exquisite in its native dress. So the reader may partly guess the beauty of the song which rouses the sleeping Prince Aja :—

The waning moon now sinks, and leaves the prize
Of beauty to thy face—Whom Lakshmi wooed,
Forsaken and despised by thee for sleep.
Unclose thine eyes, that so by mutual gift
Thy beauty and the lily's may increase,
Where roll or pupils dark or black wild bees.
The morning breeze, that vainly seeks to win
From other source the scent of thy sweet breath,
Tears from their stalks the flowers that loosely hang
On blossoming trees, or wooes the lotus bright
New opening to the sun.

Thy elephants have burst the bands of sleep,
They drag their clanking chains, and quit their couch;
Their tusks like fresh buds gleam when bathed in light
Shed by the morning sun.
These steeds Vanayu-bred, O mild-eyed prince,
Bound with long tent-ropes, shaking slumber off,
Stain with hot breath the rock-salt left to lick.
Thy flower-wreaths languish now, and now the lamps
Burn dim, and lose the halo of their rays.

Lakshmi, of course, is the Hindu Venus. Despite the infelicitous wording of the English line in which it occurs, the freshness and boldness of the image by which the eyes are compared to "wild black bees" must strike any reader. The scene which follows, of the Princess Indumati's swayamvara, or maiden-choice, is one of the most interesting in the poem. Her father has given notice to all kings that his daughter will choose a husband on a certain day, and the flower of Indian princes are assembled to await her choice among them. It is a custom constantly mentioned in Sanskrit legend, showing a feminine freedom very different from what now prevails in India. The scene strikingly recalls the scene of a Western tournament for some princess's hand, as painted by our own poets; and has equally striking contrasts. The behaviour of the princes, endeavouring to hide their anxiety and display themselves gracefully in the lady's eyes, is drawn with minute, almost luxuriant precision, and strong dramatic instinct. Here, too, is a striking image. As the princess passes on, leaving disappointed suitors behind her, they are compared to "wayside trees, lit up for a moment by the traveller's torch." So it is in the translator's prose summary; but in the version itself it runs :—

Lit for a moment by her dazzling eyes,
Like wayside tower by passing lamp.

Surely a strange discrepancy! Single images, indeed, might be quoted profusely from the poem; and despite the poetic inadequacy of the translation, we have no doubt that many will make acquaintance with it, drawn on by the narrative skill, and the revelation of a strange Eastern life.

Charlotte Yonge.

CHARLOTTE MARY YONGE: HER LIFE AND LETTERS. By Chistabel Coleridge. (Macmillan. 12s. 6d. net.)

ALREADY some of the interest of a past period clings to the books and the life of Miss Charlotte Yonge. The general outlook upon existence is already markedly different. One has only to take up a copy of "The Heir of Redcliffe," or "The Daisy Chain," to feel conscious of a domestic atmosphere almost as completely passed away, as that of the times when children and servants alike were periodically beaten as a matter of course; without it their worthlessness was regarded as unassailable. Whether the alteration is desirable or not may be regarded as a debatable question. Sentiment certainly, in the earlier part of the last century, was inclined to be both strained and artificial. The religious pomposity of family life was liable to produce revulsion or affectation. Character lost breadth, and the generosity of a more genial standpoint. Individuality had an almost impossible struggle to assert itself, and its survival was rare, ashamed, and regarded at the best as a dangerous and undesirable quality. At the same time, it was a period when the conscience of the middle classes in England was peculiarly alive, and the sense of duty, of the domestic duties especially, produced a majority of thoughtful, grave, and very solidly good men and women.

Miss Yonge was born at the very zenith of this severely moral period, coming into the world at Otterborne, where her people lived, in August, 1823. For years an only child, there was, in accordance with the spirit of the time, no thought even of spoiling her. The idea of a delicious, joyous young spirit to be enjoyed as well as educated was never for a moment entertained. Childhood stretched ahead as a purely disciplinary and correctional preface to a life of later usefulness and wisdom.

Charlotte, distinguished as a child for high spirits, was constantly repressed, and the deplorable Edgeworth system—though modified, we are told, "by religion and good sense"—was in full force as a method of upbringing. Dry bread and milk were Charlotte's daily breakfast and supper—"eggs, ham, jam, and the rest, no one dreamt of giving them to children." There were no holidays, and, as was inevitable under the Edgeworth system, the future authoress appears to have been somewhat of a prig. The following episode is typical. A good-natured housemaid, who thought the child somewhat cruelly treated, once brought her up some bread and butter, the buttered side turned downwards. "With conscious pride and honour I denounced the deceit." The story would have been prettier without the self-satisfied denouncement.

In spite of stormy lessons with her father, Miss Yonge appears to have been fairly happy, and the chief interest of this autobiography of her girlhood lies in the immense contrast it presents to the modern methods of education. So little, for instance, was out-of-door life considered necessary for children, that to the end of her days Miss Yonge looked upon much open-air exercise as a waste of time; while so strenuous was education that we hear of her brother Julius joining her Latin lessons at the early age of five.

The publications of her novels, however, are the supreme points of Miss Yonge's existence. She had always, she says, her head full of stories, but we hear practically nothing of this until the time when, in combination with the ideas of a friend—Miss Dyson—she commenced seriously to write a long novel. The beginning of her literary career occasioned an amusing incident. Before she published her first book "Abbey Church," a family council was held as to whether she should be allowed to do so. Permission was finally given on the condition that she took no money for it—that whatever she made should be given to some good work—as it was considered unladylike to earn money by writing. A further glimpse of the binding influence of parental authority in those days is conveyed apropos of the first sketch written of her novel "Kenneth." Every evening her father had what was written in the day read out to him. He then freely criticised, altering as he chose. So little at last had the unfortunate authoress a free hand, that dutiful as she was, she found it impossible to go on, and the novel was laid aside, to be re-written later.

"The Heir of Redcliffe" proved an immediate and unexpected success. More than that, it was an influence. The hero Guy created, in fact, almost a new era in fiction, the "good hero" type previously being very little popular in fiction, which had never wholly slipped the leash of the Byronic conceptions. Curiously enough, men were immensely taken with "The Heir of Redcliffe." Her brother, then in the army, noticed that almost every man in his regiment possessed a copy, and the Pre-Raphaelite school, with William Morris and Dante Gabriel Rossetti, made Guy their model as the ideal male character. Miss Yonge certainly helped to invest the idea of goodness with a romantic charm, and her books exercised a genuine influence upon the younger generation of her period.

Except for literary excitements, however, Miss Yonge's was an uneventful and rather placid life. Deeply religious, her greatest enthusiasm was for missionary propaganda. Indeed, her half exultant regret at the murder, or in her own words at the "martyrdom," of a missionary bishop has an undertone of a slightly grim liking for martyred additions to the cause of the Lord. Her letters were lengthy, but not interesting from a public or literary point of view. Miss Yonge travelled very little, and her interests were narrow, personal, confined to a small circle of friends, and a great simplicity of pleasures. Her life reveals a wholesome-minded, cheerful, and religious woman, but the mental capacity, outside her novels, shows no signs of being either exceptional, or marked by any great critical or perceptive faculties. She writes of things and people forming part of her personal existence, but with a very limited breadth of outlook, and without the least suggestion of any sense of an underlying pathos and complexity below the plain and visible surface of existence.

The absence of all spiritual or mental difficulties, in fact, is a notable trait in her temperament. Her father dies, her mother dies, and in each case, with a brief reverent comment, Miss Yonge passes on to the subject of her writings, and to other interests of daily life. At heart she was essentially simple, and her books in consequence suffered to a certain extent from any real understanding of human nature. Her comprehension of character was neither profound nor subtle. She evolved her personalities out of her head, and placed them in the situations she required in order to work out the ideas upon which the book was originally founded. The writing was able, the capacity for building up a narrative good, but a living page of humanity remained beyond her powers. The imagination, the construction, the moral clarity, almost everything in fact was there, except just the quivering insight that would have galvanised her characters into a lasting vitality.

A Human Document.

MEMOIRS OF COUNT GRAMMONT. By Count Anthony Hamilton. Edited by Gordon Goodwin. (Bullen. 12s. net.)

THE "Mémoires du Comte de Grammont" are at once a human document and a haunting menace to the sentimentalists of historical fiction to whom the exploitation of the House of Stuart is an unchallenged preserve. Hamilton tells the story of the Chevalier with a naïveté more subtle than any other phase of irony, and nobody can say for certain how far he condemns or how far he expects us to condemn the exploits of his hero. These exploits, constantly bragged about, include the carelessly mentioned episode of cheating at cards. Hamilton makes no comment upon this or any other incident, and, what is more, he forces us by the very charm of his own detachment to waive further analysis on our own account. This Irishman found in the French language a new and incomparable vivacity which was extolled by Voltaire, who said that he "was the first to discover the genius of the French language."

His whole attitude of mind in reviewing the Court life of Charles II. is antagonistic to the English habit of thought. If an Englishman sees clearly beneath the surface of things, his lucidity is utilitarian, and he uses it to scourge vice and imposture. That is why M. Taine regarded Thackeray as having been a moralist even before he was an artist. That is why there is such an immeasurable gulf between Manon Lescaut and Becky Sharp, between a Tartarin and a Joseph Sedley. Now, Hamilton sees the Chevalier and his surroundings with a merciless lucidity, and the result is a wonderful picture without the intrusion of so much as a gesture of scorn. He lives before us, the witty, indolent King with his foreign grace and his imperturbable endurance of the complaints of women. Poor sentimentalists of historical fiction, how the Chevalier draws the last veil of illusion from these companions of royalty, from the symmetrical Miss Stewart to that joyous mad-cap, Nell Gwynne. Was not the levity of the first only excelled by her banality, and did not the second claim the King of England as her Charles III.? And those exquisite followers of the Stuart fortunes, the Maids of Honour, how the Chevalier seems to grimace into their very souls. What a picture it is with Dick Talbot (Lying Dick) and little Jermyn and Arran and Killegrew all framing an imposing background for the Comte de Grammont! And Hamilton sees them all, knows them all, and never lifts an eye-brow!

The Chevalier's familiar friend and brother exile was St. Evremond, who once addressed him in these lines:—

Insolent en prospérité,
Fort courtois en nécessité,
L'âme en fortune libérale,
Aux créanciers pas trop loyale.

Well, St. Evremond is the only person in the book, excepting two or three distracted husbands, who is allowed to moralize, and he lectures the Chevalier in the following terms:—

Avoid love, by pursuing other pleasures: love has never been favourable to you, you are sensible how much gallantry has cost you; and every person here is not so well acquainted with that matter as yourself. Play boldly: entertain the court with your wit: divert the king by your ingenious and entertaining stories; but avoid all engagements which can deprive you of this merit, and make you forget you are a stranger and an exile in this delightful country.

Play boldly and please the king—is not this like some modern parody of an ancient faith? For people who did not play the infinitely tricky game of pleasing the king boldly or intelligently enough there was one great punishment—the country. That drove the strongest hearts to despair, and turned Rochester himself into a bourgeois in the city declaiming against the profligacy of the court before he became "a famous German doctor." That was the punishment inflicted by her husband upon poor Lady Chesterfield against the tyranny of which the Chevalier inveighed with real feeling.

We live in a censorious age, and it is only quite recently that Rochester himself was pilloried on the score of dulness. Whatever else the Chevalier may be accused of it is certainly not that. But some of us may wish that his sinister smile were not quite so cruelly vivid, that his tongue had touched with less mordant emphasis some great names, that in short one or two illusions concerning what he calls a "natural" government had been spared to us. As a matter of fact he experienced, according to Hamilton, an almost romantic attachment for Miss Hamilton, who eventually became his wife. But even here the element of apish comedy was not lacking, for we are told in the Introduction that he was on the point of leaving for France without her when he was overtaken by her brothers, who inquired if he had forgotten nothing. "Ah," he replied, "true; I have forgotten to marry your sister." He turned back on the spot and married her. His brother-in-law omits this episode from his narrative, but it casts a singular side-light upon a courtship which, if adroit rather than impassioned, seems in these pages at all events genuine. Whatever else he was, however, the Chevalier was singularly well equipped to be a commentator upon the age in which he lived. It was an age in which strength and brutality were very thinly masked by affectation and grace, an age which threw into license the same energies that it had thrown into war, an age, moreover, which in a confused and distorted fashion saw in this very license a phase of revenge for past injury. That at least was the spirit of the court and the town; even the society of Rochester and Lady Chesterfield could not lure the Comte de Grammont to study life in the country. Perhaps it is just as well, for there he would have been a man with a grievance, and a moralist, instead of the most urbane of exiles and a raconteur.

Disappointing.

JOURNALS OF FIELD-MARSHAL COUNT VON BLUMENTHAL, FOR 1866 AND 1870-71. Edited by Count Albrecht Von Blumenthal. Translated by Major A. D. Gillespie-Addison. (Arnold. 12s. 6d. net.)

THESE journals, says the editor, were written to serve as notes for further memoirs, and are, therefore, only fragments. Nevertheless, as the jottings, made at the time, of a celebrated Prussian Field-Marshal and Chief of the Staff, they must needs possess great value for future military historians. They cover the two great wars of modern times, between Prussia and Austria in 1866, and between Germany and France in 1870-71. From the general reader's point of view, however, it must be said, they are singularly disappointing. With a tithe of the opportunities which Von Blumenthal had, any tolerably competent journalist would have made thrice as interesting and informing a journal of these great events. From the general literary or even historical point of view, the trouble with most soldiers is that they take too much—far too much—for granted. Not only the pictorial side of war (which one does not expect them to see), but plans and the details of plans, general movements and the details of general movements, are passed over as matters of course, the routine of the day's work not calling for notice because there is nothing in it out of the way. Only when plans and so forth go wrong, when hitches arise, do we begin to hear of them. Then the soldier's personal interest is aroused. So it comes that we turn with interest to the famous day of Königgratz (or Sadowa) where Blumenthal took a decisive part, coming up when the "Red Prince" was desperately engaged with the Austrian front, and taking the enemy between hammer and tongs. There is absolutely scarce any account of the battle. "I made my dispositions; we marched according to orders; when I came up Prince Frederick Charles was hotly engaged; we had some tough fighting. When the Austrians retreated I had leisure to look over the field of this dreadful battle:" that is about the sum of what Blumenthal tells you regarding the "crowning mercy" of the Seven Weeks' War. It reads almost like the account of a close but casual skirmish. He is much more interested about the cavalry which failed to come up, than about the battle itself. They failed to come up, there is the thing—there was a hitch. The battle was all as it should be. Therefore the hitch alone "catches on" to his methodical military mind, though it was a quite minor thing—a mere detail in the great affair of the battle. So it is with the Franco-German War, so it is with the struggle round Paris. The journal is filled with complaints, with little hitches, little difficulties, with his colds, with the stupidities of the General Staff, with everything which went wrong, and worried his sense of order and of what should be. The victory of Orleans (in which, to be sure, he had no part) when it comes, is dismissed in brief general terms; but the delays and contretemps before it came are grumbled about in harassed detail. It is not stimulant to the general or historical reader.

Von Blumenthal has a constant grudge against princely officials, and all the entourage of courtly commanders. It appears in 1866:—

Headquarters are not to me an impressive experience. A crowd of long-faced loafers is always an odious sight, especially when they greet one in a sort of condescending manner, fancying themselves omniscient, and apportioning blame freely, in some cases not knowing or understanding the circumstances.

In the French war he is yet bitterer. "If only the King with all the Princes and his Staff would go away, we could make short work of the business, and soon bring peace within measurable distance," he cries before Paris; and his complaints of the stupidity of the royal Staff are continual. It is curious to find that even Moltke himself was not omnipotent, but was sometimes overridden by the King in regard to movements which he thought advisable. "Looking so long through the telescope made my eyes quite sore, and rendered me at last half blind," is the one little vivid touch at Sedan; which, for the rest, is described in the usual general fashion—nothing one has not heard a hundred times, and heard much better. No, war related by a Prussian Chief of Staff is a fearfully prosaic business.

Pen and Brush.

LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND. By Elizabeth Butler. (Black. 7s. 6s. net.)

LADY BUTLER'S volume is interesting for two reasons: it contains the impressions of an artist in a medium with which she is unfamiliar, as well as her impressions in a medium with which she is familiar. We are not disappointed in either aspect of this most pleasant and sincere book. Apart from the charm of the drawings, there is a distinct literary charm. These letters have simplicity, observation, and an unusual sense of form—unusual, that is, as coming from one whose accepted means of artistic expression are in the brush and not in words. The book contains some quite admirable descriptions; they are, of necessity, a painter's descriptions, appealing primarily to the visual sense; but those of us who know the ordinary run of painter's descriptions will recognise in Lady Butler's a faculty of verbal expression distinctly beyond the average. Take this, for instance:—

As I returned, towards sunset, and climbed the steep sides of the Valley of Jehoshaphat up to St. Stephen's Gate—the shortest way to the City—I looked back towards the scene of my happy labours, and a sight lay there below me which impressed me, I am sure, for life. The western sides of the abyss which I was climbing were already in the shades of night, for twilight hardly exists here, but the opposite slopes received the red sunset light in its fullest force, and in that scarlet gleam shone out in intense relief thousands upon thousands of flat tombstones that cover the bones of countless Jews who have, at their devout request, been buried there to await, on the spot, the Last Judgment which they, and we, and the Mahometans all believe will take place in that valley.

In that passage also is indicated the note of Christian faith which is, perhaps, the strongest element in Lady Butler's book. She is sceptical of nothing; she accepts the influence of the environment in which she finds herself, and is too full of instinctive faith and memorial beauty to cavil over mere questions of topographical evidence. Concerning the Church of the Holy Sepulchre she writes:—

It was an overwhelming sensation to find the spaces that separate the sites so much vaster than I had expected, and to have, at every step, the conviction driven home that after all the modern wrangling and disputing the old tradition stands immovable.

This, after all, is the only spirit in which to visit "the land of little fruit trees" and the home and place of pilgrimage of the Christian faith.

In the main Lady Butler has not described the vivid human colouring of Palestine, and in her drawings she has carefully confined herself to sketching only scenes connected with "Our Lord's revealed life." But here and there we have excellent touches of almost realistic description, as in that of the lepers, which concludes: "And then we go to our table d'hôte and comfortable beds, and they—where do they sleep? Do they lie down on those bare bones?" Here again is a passage which is worth quoting:—

To-day we first visited the Wailing Place of the Jews. Strange and pathetic sight, these weird men and women and children weeping and moaning, with their faces against the gigantic stones of the wall that forms the only remaining portion of the foundation of their vanished Temple, praying Jehovah for its restoration to Israel; and over their heads rises in its strong beauty the Moslem Mosque of Omar, standing in the place of the "Holy of Holies," the varnished tiles of its dome ablaze with green and blue in the resplendent sun! Jews below, Moslems above, yet to the Christian, Christ everywhere!

To say that Lady Butler's text is on the same level as the drawings here reproduced in colour would be, perhaps, to say too much. Many of the drawings are delightful in tint and suggestion; those of the "Plain of Jordan" and "The Cenaculum" strike us as particularly happy.

Signs of Mind.

THE CREATION OF MATTER; OR, MATERIAL ELEMENTS, EVOLUTION AND CREATION. (Thomson Lectureship Trust.) By Rev. W. Profeit. (T. and T. Clark. 2s. net.)

In this eloquent little volume, the author, equipped with scholarship, breadth of knowledge, and a style which, perhaps naturally enough, is suggestive of an Old Testament model, states the evidence for his thesis that Nature is the work of an all-intelligent mind, "that in its primal elements, however far back we may have to go to find them, there are so many signs of mind as to render it evident that they are the product of an understanding that is infinite, of a hand that is omnipotent." The author's treatment, brief and simple though it be, is worthy of the theme. When the Dervish was asked, "How do you know that there is a God?" he answered, "How do I know that it was a camel, not a man, who passed my tent last night?" "By the footprints," was the reply. Pointing to the sun, he said, "That is a footprint, and not of a man, but a God." This is Mr. Profeit's argument. Ranging over the whole of nature, drawing his illustrations from as wide a range as Haeckel, he argues that the "signs of mind on matter are as clear and distinct as if we had seen the Eternal Mind marching in majesty through space, leaving suns and planets behind him as his footprints." The root of his difference from Haeckel is to be found in the assertion that "the particles of matter have not in them conscious intelligence," and from this he makes the great induction of an intelligent First Cause; for "matter is crammed with ideas."

Of the atoms of any one substance the author well phrases it that "they are minute, but the exactness of their correspondence in minuteness is still more minute." Happy also is his remark upon the invisibility of light: "light is not that which is manifest, but that which makes manifest." It would be well to correct the statement that light does not make the atmosphere to glow with colour, as the blue of the sky is, of course, a selective absorption of sunlight. The statement that there are only seven colours is also unscientific. There are billions of colours. Incorrect also is the analogy drawn between the seven easily audible octaves of sound and the seven colours. As a matter of fact, we only see just about one octave of light, to the notes of which octave the well-marked colours might be likened. Nor is it correct to say that light and sound motions begin and end where we can see and hear, and to use this as a proof of the adaptation of elasticity to our ends. And—our last quarrel with the author—we do not think it well to speak of life as an "element."

His argument against the "carbon-theory" of Haeckel would gain in strength if, as they should be, sulphur and phosphorus were added to nitrogen, hydrogen, and oxygen as equally necessary with carbon for the production of protoplasm. But it is only just to say that we have quoted all the errors we could discover, and that the author's manner must add to his matter a charm and a newness even for those familiar with, and perhaps therefore too contemptuous of, its interest.

Other New Books.

MY NATURE NOTE-BOOK. By E. Kay Robinson. (Isbister. 2s. 6d.)

A BRIGHT, pleasant, and well-informed little book—a book, indeed, infinitely more engaging than scores of more elaborate garden books. As a rule, in nature books, we look either for facts or good writing: we seldom get the two combined. In this volume we have both. The writing is quite unpretentious, but it is easy and always equal to any demands made upon it. Mr. Robinson takes the round of the year and gives us bird, plant, and insect notes; but the birds are his favourites, and he brings to their study a kindly and human observation. "So soon as you begin," he says, "to calculate profit and loss in natural history you are lost in a wilderness of doubts." Even the wasp may do more good than harm; he eats our fruit and often resents our interference with his sting, but he also makes war on the flies which we detest. As an example of Mr. Robinson's pleasant manner we may quote the following concerning peewits and gulls on their feeding ground:—

... the plovers manage well enough with their ears alone; for wherever you see—as you may see every day in autumn on the East coast when the ploughs are idle—a number of plovers and gulls on the ground together, you may be sure that the plovers are finding dinners for themselves, and the gulls too. There is no charity in the matter, however. The stress of the struggle for existence forbids wild-creatures to exhibit this virtue towards each other; and on the gull's part it is sheer blackmail and piracy which leads him to seek the plover's company.

When the plover secures his worm the gull pounces upon him; the plover rises, and in the excitement of the chase drops the worm. The gull drops after it, eats it, and "resumes his statuesque attitude of observation of the peewits around him."

The volume is thoughtfully provided with blank pages at the end on which readers may make their own notes.

HERTFORDSHIRE. By Herbert W. Tompkins. "The Little Guides" Series. (Methuen. 3s.)

UPON the title-page of this book Mr. Tompkins has set the inevitable quotation from Charles Lamb, "Hearty, homely, loving Hertfordshire." In Lamb's day Hertfordshire was a county practically unexplored; indeed, it remained so until the great invasion of the cyclist, and still it has quiet places, ideal and leafy fastnesses, which harbour the old life and the old names and the old ways of simple existence. Not so long ago Elstree was practically as remote from London as York—now it is by way of being a respectable and flourishing suburb: in the churchyard is buried that thief and murderer, William Weare, who was himself murdered in 1823 by an equally notorious rascal. Was there not a broad-sheet song beginning "His Name was Mr. William Weare," or something of that sort? Hertfordshire, like most English counties, is rich in happy place nomenclature: Heavensgate, Hexton, Patient End, Pepperstock, Stevenage, Wheathampstead are names full of suggestion. And of great men who have lived there there is an almost endless list, though few, comparatively, were born within its borders. Chaucer was clerk of the works at Berkhamstead Castle; Sir John Maundeville reported that he was born at St. Albans; and there lived and died Dr. Cotton. Bacon lived at Gorhambury, Bulwer Lytton at Knebworth, and Macaulay went to school at Aspenden.

The Gazetteer is full and clear, and the general information succinct and well set forth. Mr. New's illustrations are always interesting, and those in this little volume are as good as usual. Chapters are also included dealing with the county's physical features, climate, flora and fauna, and so forth.

THIRTY YEARS IN AUSTRALIA. By Ada Cambridge. (Methuen. 7s. 6d.)

This is one of those interesting autobiographies dealing certainly with the small things of life and matters of local consequence, but described with such character and with a point of view so entirely charming, that one comes to the belief that this tittle-tattle of the Bush thirty years ago and these struggles and tea parties of poor curates are not merely topical, but are common to the lives of all men. Miss Cambridge is, perhaps, at her keenest when sitting in judgment on those who are immediately responsible in the Federated Government. This chapter of politico-industrial matters is quite by the way, and the reader is warned not to read it, if his sole object is amusement for an idle hour. But nevertheless this chapter belongs to the sketch, and completes one's idea of the Bush surroundings. It will be noted that the author's work is not confined to her immediate sphere: she has a keen scent for smug theology, and has none of the limitations of the parochial mind. On the contrary, she is rather pleased with the idea of herself as a "writing person," and is proud of her association with the Australian press. An agreeable, and sometimes a stimulating book, by one who knows her subject well.

The fourth volume of the Illustrated Edition of "Social England" (Cassell) covers the period from the accession of James I. to the death of Anne. Over twenty writers have contributed to this volume, including Prof. Saintsbury, Prof. C. Oman, and Sir W. Laird Clowes. The illustrations are numerous and well reproduced.

In "Open-Air Studies in Bird Life" (Griffin), by Charles Dixon, we have a series of sketches of British Birds in their proper environment. Nearly all indigenous birds have been included. The volume is designed as a popular introduction to the study of Ornithology, and therefore is by no means exhaustive. But Mr. Dixon has packed much useful information into his pages. The volume is fully illustrated.

NEW EDITIONS: New issues of Dickens continue to appear with astonishing regularity. In addition to their "Biographical Edition," Messrs. Chapman and Hall are now publishing a "Fireside Edition," the first three volumes of which consist of "Sketches by Boz," "The Pickwick Papers," and "Oliver Twist." The original illustrations by Cruikshank, Phiz, &c., are included, and the prices vary, according to the bulk of the volumes, from one and sixpence to two shillings.

Fiction.

A STRETCH OFF THE LAND. By G. Stewart Bowles. (Methuen. 6s.)

In these sketches and stories the author of "A Gun-Room Ditty Box" celebrates the Gun-Room Mess in prose. He writes with considerable buoyancy of the junior officers of a man-of-war, youths upon whom no public school has laid its hand, and whose manhood is awaited by no "begging Foundation, rotten with age, and doting in the ivy of its swamps." Mr. Bowles describes the life of the ship with minute knowledge, and there are matters upon which his views do not accord with those of the Admiralty. "Sidgwick-Administrator" confides his opinion on the impending executive rank for engineers, of which the "tiffies" and the newspapers are talking. "If they get it . . . they'll break the service with it. It's God's own truth. Write it, sir. Tell 'em that." The picture of the stoker who, in becoming a railway signalman, had missed his true vocation is admirably drawn:—

"Fires is my business, fires and iron, iron and fires, like my father's before me; natural as drinkin' milk. In the boxes 'twas the same. I was always fretting that I wasn't in the shops. You remember; I see it now. Couldn't stand it, never could. Couldn't never stand and hear an express strikin' her pace to the westward or layin' up the night again into Waterloo without feelin' that something was wrong. . . . Then they shifted me into that box by the new line; you remember that; at the top of the drop into Salisbury. Did we used to know that box a bit? Did we talk a bit? Ho! you and me!" He chuckled to himself, and drew pictures with one finger in the thin clinging dust.

Mr. Bowles has felt the romance of the ship and of the sea, and writes with unmistakable descriptive power.

THE ADVANCED-GUARD. By Sydney C. Grier. (Blackwood. 6s.)

"Not the cushion and the slipper . . . Pioneers," exclaimed Whitman, and the manly austerity of Sydney C. Grier's heroes is not to be excelled by any "tan-faced child" of Nebraska or Colorado. But there is much more here than an exhibition of moral fibre; there is swift-footed and coherent romance in which a remarkable personality is presented to us against a background of Asiatic wilderness and tribal unrest. The time of the story is the fifties, and the chief character is employed in the pacification and development of a district within call of Ethiopia. Colonel Keeling is his name, and the huge and indomitable soldier has seldom, if ever, been better drawn. A nagger of the powers that be, an inveterate quoter of the poems of Scott, a hustler and martinet, and at the same time great-hearted and patriotic, he is alive and lovable, and the library that holds his story offers a worthy substitute for an absent friend. The passage which records how the news of his wife's death was imparted to Colonel Keeling shall be quoted for a certain delicacy foreign to "full-bodied" fiction and indicative of an original mind:—

The servants . . . fell away from [Colonel Keeling] as he sprang up the steps, but the old khansaman ventured to speak as he saw his master pause to unbuckle the sword which clanked behind him. "It is not necessary, sahib," he murmured humbly; but Colonel Keeling looked straight through him, laid the sword noiselessly on a chair, and went on.

The portrait of Ferrers, an unstable young officer who embraces Islam to save himself from the horrors of an Asiatic gaol, is addressed to the gallery inasmuch as he ultimately becomes a martyr. Yet it must be pronounced praiseworthy for an author to deal so sympathetically with a bumptious renegade that he stands almost excused, while by every convention of rhetoric he is contemptible. Sydney C. Grier is like most English novelists, careful not to let her atmosphere absorb her people or tone them down to it. In Lady Haigh, one of two European ladies, she introduces us to a good-natured, intriguing mistress of commonplace in whose society it is possible to forget that Tooting is not in Asia.

IN THE GARDEN OF CHARITY. By Basil King. (Harpers. 6s.)

THERE is much that is good in this new novel of Mr. King's, so much that we could wish the whole were better. The idea is excellent, and by no means wanting in originality. Charity is the deserted wife of a gay young soldier, who left her three months after marriage, and for whom she has been waiting in her garden by the sea for eleven years. When news at last comes of him, it is to the effect that he is living with another woman; and so her dream of eleven years is shattered in an instant. Up to this point our sympathies are naturally with Charity; but the story shifts to the other woman's house, and our sympathies are suddenly with the passionate and beautiful Hagar, who believes herself to be William's wife, and is only undeceived when he tells her the truth, and declares his intention of going home to spend his last days—the man is dying—with his lawful wife. Nor do we feel entirely antipathetic towards William, who is by no means the callous villain this sort of character is generally represented to be in fiction; and the scenes between him and Hagar, when he tries to get away from her and she tries to keep him, are among the best in the book. After his death, the story becomes an account of how Charity, having discovered that Hagar is not what she has always imagined a bad woman to be, effaces herself even to the extent of letting the poor creature pose as his widow while she herself wears coloured frocks and feigns cheerfulness with a breaking heart, for the sake of hiding Hagar's real story from the neighbours. In the end, Hagar rewards her with the love she has earned from her; but the interest of the story lies rather in the clever way the characters of the two women are contrasted, and the very natural manner in which, at the beginning, they alternately hate and pity each other. What does, in a measure, mar the book is the author's tendency to spoil the dignity of a situation by enforcing the prettiness or the sentimentality of it.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

JOHN GAYTHER'S GARDEN.

By FRANK R. STOCKTON.

"John Gayther's Garden, and the stories told therein." John Gayther was the gardener, but in former days he had led a life of adventure. He had been "a sailor, a soldier, a miner, a ranchman, and a good many other things besides." Three of the stories are told by himself. Others are related by the Daughter of the House, the Master of the House, the Next Neighbour, the Old Professor, and so on. There are eleven in all, and the fare is various. The book is illustrated. (Cassell. 6s.)

By E. C. SOMERVILLE AND MARTIN ROSS.

ALL ON THE IRISH SHORE.

Another volume of Irish sketches by the authors of "Some Experiences of an Irish R.M." Of the thirteen stories, many have the hunting-field as a background, and all are distinguished by the rollicking humour and strong grasp of Irish character which the authors have displayed in their former books. The volume has been cleverly illustrated by Miss Somerville. (Longmans. 6s.)

AS A TREE FALLS.

By L. PARRY TRUSCOTT.

A new volume in the Pseudonym Library. It is a cleverly written tale of a village flirtation, the chief characters being a baker, a youthful grocer, and "the new girl at Smyth's," who made the acquaintance of these swains as they called for orders, and conferred upon them, in turn, the privilege of her company on her "evenings out." This situation is developed with considerable humour and with much sympathetic characterisation. Mr. Truscott is the author of "The Poet and Penelope." (Unwin. 1s. 6d.)

SEMI SOCIETY.

By FRANK RICHARDSON.

A light-hearted story: period, King's Coronation. All the characters are well realized. There is a rich money-lender living in Berkeley Square; his wife, in love with a polished swindler who has just served a term of imprisonment; a young baronet who is ostracised by reason of his marriage with a Music Hall artiste; and many other personages who, however disagreeable they may be in the flesh, are sufficiently engaging when presented to us by the author of "The Man who Lost his Past." (Chatto.)

FROM THE UNVARYING STAR.

By ELSWORTH LAWSON.

A novel of religious controversy by the author of "Euphrosyne and her Golden Book." The hero is a young clergyman who obtains the charge of Zion Chapel in a small English village, but whose recent experience of the free intellectual life of a German University leads to differences between himself and his congregation. A quotation from Maeterlinck explains the title: "... yet shall the woman we elect always have come to us straight from the unvarying star." (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE BONNET CONSPIRATORS.

By VIOLET A. SIMPSON.

"A story of 1815." The action passes in an English sea coast village in the year of Waterloo. The plot turns on certain smuggling adventures by which the ladies of the village were supplied with their luxuriant trimmings for the bonnet of the period. Marie and her brother became deeply involved in the conspiracy, but "Lady Hepzibah, leaning on the Commandant's arm, wore the Bonnet at Marie's Wedding!" (Smith Elder. 6s.)

THE LADY OF THE CAMEO.

By TOM GALLON.

A story of mystery and intrigue which opens on "a rainy gusty night at the Nore." The young man who leaned upon the taff-rail of the big vessel felt that London drew him "like a magnet." On the evening of his arrival he saved a man from drowning, only to find that the latter wore on one of his fingers the ring which he had given, years ago, to the girl whom he had now come to London to seek. The plot depends upon grotesque coincidences, but the mystery is well maintained. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

ROVING HEARTS.

By K. AND HESKETH PRICHARD.

Sixteen stories, some of which have already appeared in "The Cornhill Magazine." "The Flying Squadron" is "a story of the Black Republic." The history of Haytian politics, the authors tell us, would make incredible reading. "It is not generally known . . . that once upon a time the Haytian Republic saw fit to initiate a war against Russia, Germany, France . . . and every other Power with the exception of England and the United States." The preface maintains that this story is by no means a caricature. The scenes of the others are laid in many lands. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

We have also received: "A Girl's Life in a Hunting Country," by "Handasyde" (Lane); "The House of the Combrays," by G. Le Notre (Harper); "The Palace of Spies," by Herbert Compton (Treherne); "Near the Tsar near Death," by Fred Whishaw (Chatto); "The Law Breakers," by E. Spender (White).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue	/5

“The Worship of Sorrow.”

THROUGH a hurried accumulation of outward circumstances, due mainly to the application of a still dim knowledge of electricity, the people of to-day are apt to consider themselves as divorced, even in their inner selves, from the generations which preceded them. This point of view is so conspicuous as to need little comment, but it is curious to study the different phases of its expression in much of our contemporary verse. For the versifiers of to-day appear to be always conscious of an attitude of criticism, of a demand for something quite other than the emotional expression of ordinary joy and grief. In France this tendency has been submitted, as usual, to the tests of logic, and we have, for example, the formulæ of Verlaine's symbolism. In England, the home of commercial individualism and literary caprice, we have all sorts of distortions of rhymed prose writhing beneath the mask of poetry. To be exotic, to be “modern,” to be detached from the common inheritance of doubt and fear—that is the aim of such a poet. He will express in sentences of a laboured preciousness the great simple thoughts that once leaped unbidden to a poet's lips. This he will do, and moreover, because of the savour of the lost virility, he will preserve sedulously as an anthologist the archaic simplicity of the older poets. But this, far from being a habit of thought peculiar to a few nations of modern Europe, was, as Mr. Mahaffy has observed, precisely the attitude of the dilettante of Alexandria during the post-Alexandrian period of Greek culture.

Again, it is one of our mental platitudes to consider the ancients as beings cast in the same mould, but otherwise differing entirely from ourselves. “The ancients,”—the very phrase has in it the impress of unimaginative arrogance, as though the youths and maidens who loitered together “in the time of peace before the sons of the Achæans came” were not in very truth as youths and maidens have always been, as youth must ever be until our race runs its course in the slow cooling of our planet. There is no dividing line of infinite separation, and the common bond between us and the far-off centuries is to be found over and over again in literature. It has found various phases of expression, but one supreme manifestation in the recognition, Pagan as well as Christian, ancient as well as modern, of the doubtfulness of the human destiny and of the individual's powerlessness in the face of the great unknown forces of which the human race is, as it were, the flattered plaything. This recognition of man's actual position in the universe was the keynote to the melancholy which underlay the blithe courage of the Greek as well as the slower steadfastness of the Roman. We find Homer brooding over the leaves swept hither and thither even as the destinies of mortals. We find Virgil ever conscious of “the doubtful doom of human kind.” We find it in the sad challenge of the gods upon the questioning lips of Euripides. We find even the mocking Horace penetrated by the merciless message of the gliding years.

And even in the elemental religion of the Greeks, that extraordinary example of man's courage in the face of the unknown, there was a place for what Goethe has called “the worship of sorrow.” It came, as Mr. Pater has pointed out with such rare sympathy for the ancient myth, from the very earth itself, from the yearly tragedy of summer's death. And then the poets took to themselves the legend, and Demeter became for all time the Greek symbol of the sanctity of sorrow. From that, indeed, no race and no generation has ever wholly escaped.

In an anthology of singular charm, “Lyra Sacra” (Methuen), of which a second edition has just been published, Canon Beeching has called attention to this common need of the human heart. From the fourteenth century to the twentieth we find in this little volume repetitions of a craving which external realities can never satisfy. We find, too, the expression of that strange protest against the triumph of life which offers the supreme crown to sorrow. We find it here from the lips of an anonymous fifteenth century poet:—

Long and love thou never so high,
My love is more than thine may be;
Thou gladdest, thou weepest, I sit thee by;
Yet wouldst thou once, love, look at me!
Should I always feed thee
With children's meat? Nay, love, not so!
I will prove thy love with adversity,
Quia amore languo.

We find it in the “In Memoriam” of Tennyson:—

Behold, we know not anything;
I can but trust that good shall fall
At last—far off—at last, to all,
And every winter change to spring.
So runs my dream: but what am I?
An infant crying in the night;
An infant crying for the light;
And with no language but a cry.

We find it alike in the “Virginibus Puerisque” of Geoffrey Chaucer and in “The Celestial Surgeon” of Robert Louis Stevenson. We find it in the lines “Written in his Bible the night before his execution” by Sir Walter Raleigh, and in the “Morality” of Matthew Arnold. It is in the “Eternity” of Herrick and in “The Quip” by Herbert; in “A New and Old Year Song” by Rossetti, and in the “Magna est Veritas” of Coventry Patmore.

It is true that, just as in the myth of Demeter there came afterwards the sweet promise of the restored Persephone, symbolic of an earthly solace, so, too, in this Christian expression of the universal worship of sorrow there is ever the note of hope for and faith in a divine and mystical consolation. But what seems to us to be universal and typical of human beings of all faiths, of all countries, and of all periods, is the deliberate turning away from the immediate and the transitory in search of the ultimate and the imperishable, and this attitude of thought we find everywhere in the “Lyra Sacra.”

But there is one poem in this anthology which will appeal, probably, most inevitably to the readers of to-day: it is this:—

Where lies the land to which the ship would go?
Far, far ahead, is all her seamen know.
And where the land she travels from? Away,
Far, far behind, is all that they can say.
On sunny noons upon the deck's smooth face,
Linked arm-in-arm, how pleasant here to pace;
Or, o'er the stern reclining, watch below
The foaming wake far-widening as we go.
On stormy nights, when wild north-westerns rave,
How proud a thing to fight with wind and wave!
The dripping sailor on the reeling mast
Exults to bear, and scorns to wish it past.
Where lies the land to which the ship would go?
Far, far ahead, is all her seamen know.
And where the land she travels from? Away,
Far, far behind, is all that they can say,

In these beautiful lines Clough seems to utter the inmost secret of the human soul, the secret which has haunted poets from Euripides to Tennyson, the secret which links the earth-born sorrow of Demeter to the "Divine Grief" of Christianity.

And we laugh a little and love a little and hate a little as we sail idly between the "two eternities." But in a grim moment there comes to each one of us the certitude of unreality, and we turn away from what appears to be with a craving in our hearts to lift for one instant the impenetrable veil of being. In that moment differences of time and space cease to exist; the universe becomes a unit of which we are a part. The faint, inarticulate expression of this thought formulates a protest against the mockeries that had deceived our senses. That protest of which the potentiality is common to the human race, has found utterance in "the worship of sorrow."

Hans Breitmann.

IN reading American books, in studying that eager American life so unlike anything to be found in sober Europe, one learns why it is that, even with all Europe's culture ready to its hand like an axe to the pioneer, the Republic has not yet produced its poet, or its cunning artist, to give voice, or form, to the emotions, and the beauty, pulsing so hotly among its citizens. The land is too cosmopolitan. It says, as its one great mind said:—

I am large. I contain multitudes.

and it is perhaps not unfair to liken its literati, as they are at this day, to four and twenty blackbirds baking in a pie. So many ingredients will have to combine, and resolve, and crystallize; so many "grounds" will have to settle, so many bubbles to arise and burst, before the dish can be dainty and fit for the President's table, that it is likely to be a great while before the artists have a medium with which to work, let alone a skill in the shaping and moulding of the material.

They are a great people, these Americans, and a new people, and a people struggling to make something new from an old speech and a set of old traditions. Their impetuous hearts are even now changing that old speech into something quaint and strange (I cannot say "rich" and strange) which is quicker, as it seems, and snappier, and which reminds one of an electric lamp set within an old horn lantern. Everywhere one sees the ingredients in the cauldron, bubbling, and seething, and imparting, each one of them, some flavour or smack to the great pie they help to make. Here is Mr. Dooley with his Irishman's ways of speech that stick in the popular mind, and that thousands use daily. There is Uncle Remus—a tenth of the population speaks the "English" of Uncle Remus. There is John Chinaman and Jhonna Dago, but they are not vocal, I believe, as yet; and there is the most potent of all the alien influences, that of the late Mr. Leland's Hans Breitmann and the fine class he represents.

Breitmann is not, as so many think, and will think him, a mere caricature with a fine thirst and the heroic manner. He is a type. He represents a class—a wise, kindly, laughter-moving class—which is not common now, and which we seldom see in England, but which exists, and is delightful, in many parts of Germany and in the States. The laughter is always with and not at this old hero. He loves the pleasures of the table, and he will drink, it seems, as long as he has passage in his throat, yet he has an eye for beauty, the wisdom of a man, and a ripe talent for events. He is that old Germany, as I feel, that died, or became changed, with the rise of the shop-class after the French war. He is of the blunt Luther type, with, perhaps, the "Wein, Weib und Gesang" elements set up in caps.

Hans' prototype, Mr. Trübner tells us, was "a German serving during the war (of Secession) in the 15th Pennsylvanian Cavalry, and who—we have it on good authority—was a man of desperate courage whenever a cent could be made, and one who never fought unless something could be made." Many of the ballads tell of his merry battles, and of the great spoils, chiefly liquid, that his battles brought him, but it is hardly as a fighter that Hans makes his appeal to us. We like him when he is at peace, well primed with the schnapps, or the lager, or the sauer-kraut so dear to him. And then, by the fireside, puffing the meerschaum of content, the warm reminiscences come gently to the soothed brain, and the story comes, between tobacco puffs, ripely and well considered from a seasoned and mellowed personality.

Before discussing the literary merits of the ballads, and there are very few that have not sterling worth either as verse or as a genuine "philosophy of life," it would be well to say just a few words of the wonderful speech in which they are written. Fully to appreciate the cleverness of it one must have lived in Germany and in, say, Hoboken. Old Hans uses the American idioms with such aptness, and sandwiches them between such deft and apposite quotations from the literature of his Fatherland, that an outsider misses half of the abundant points he makes. How happy the blend is may be seen from the two quotations I have culled at haphazard:—

Du bist ein Musikant
Top-sawyer on der counter-point
Und buster in discant.

and

Und knock dem out de shpots
Come pack to eart', O Schnitzerlein
Und pring id down to dots.

It is not dialect. It has not the fixity of a dialect. We feel that in a year's time old Hans would be using a very different speech with quite different effects upon his hearers. In the ballads he is at "the top of happy hours." He is precise in his use of the snappy, effective idiom of the States. And his German—the German, always, of a cultured and deep-thinking man—saves him, and his rhymes, from any taint or accusation of commonness. The only accusation one might bring forward is one of over-insistence upon certain traits in Hans' character. I feel that the details of his swillings, though I love to read them, separate him, just a little, from me. I feel that such an Homeric skinker would never have been allowed to leave the Fatherland: would never have ridden all those thirsty miles with Sherman: and could never have loved such dusty things as politics.

There is an old German tale, which occurs to me, of a wine-merchant's bin-man, who was asked by his employer if he could, and would, drink at a draught a bucket of white wine for the pleasuring of certain company. He replied that he must meditate the proposal in private for a little while. After a short absence he returned, filled the bucket, and drained it to the great joy and envy of all present. When asked why he had needed to consider the matter, he replied:—

I haf try mit oder bucket.

I feel that Mr. Leland's jolly creation is a shade too like that bin-man. Hear him:—

Und troonker more, und troonker yet, und troonker shill cot ve
In rosy light shill drivin on agross a fairy sea,
Denn madder, vilder, frantie-er I proked a salat tish
Und shoost like roariu elefants ve tanzed aroundt de dish.

I'fe shvimmed in heavenly droonks pefore—boot nefer von like dis
 De morgen-het-ache only seemed a bortion of the pliss.
 De while in trilling peauty roundt like heavenly vindharps rang
 A goosh of golden melodie - de Rheinweinbecher's Klang.

The stanza that follows after is "troonker yet," but what I have quoted shows the old fellow at his maddest. One can pardon him for taking so jolly a delight in the good things of the world, for we know that (after the morgen-het-ache) he will be up and about, playing the man like a master. I must own, however, that he touches me more nearly when he is in his serious vein. When he is dreaming over the beautiful things that have touched him in the past, or at music, or giving advice to the young. In these moods he says things which place him with the poets. "Breitmann in Leyden," though perhaps the quaint Breitmann lingo rather mars its gentleness, is a thing that none but a true poet could have made:—

'Tis shveet to valk in Holland towns
 Apout de twilight tide,
 When all ish shdill on proud canals,
 Safe where a poat may clide.
 Shdrange light on darkenin' vater falls
 In long soft lines afar,
 Der Abenddroth on Dunkelheit
 Vitch shows—or hides—a star.

The end comes to one with a grace and a softness that is like "rare 'Gene Field" at his rarest:—

O if you live in Leyden town
 You'll meet, if troot be told,
 De forms of all de fremnds who tied
 When du werst six years old.

Lovers of Hans will wish him a peaceful old age in Leyden, with lager of the best, and Rhein wein, and a seat in the Bier Garten looking over the old town; and twilight and death coming to him very gently at the last, almost obsequiously, like a grave waiter announcing closing time.

JOHN MASEFIELD.

Books Too Little Known.

"Amaryllis at the Fair" and "After London."

"AFTER London!" my readers may exclaim; "why, everybody knows—at least, we mean that we have heard of that book. Surely it is by — yes, of course, it is by Richard Jefferies. We have always meant to look it up some day and see what is in it." And "Amaryllis at the Fair" must be one of those "later indifferent novels" of which the critics speak. "What a pity Jefferies tried to write novels! Why didn't he stick to essays in natural history?" Some such opinion as the foregoing is likely to be delivered by those who seek the safety of acquiescence in the mysterious movements of public taste. Certainly the critics are touchingly unanimous. "He wrote some later novels of indifferent merit," says a critic in "Chambers' Encyclopædia." "Has anyone ever been able to write with free and genuine appreciation of even the later novels?" asks or echoes a lady, Miss Grace Toplis, writing on Jefferies. "In brief, he was an essayist and not a novelist at all," says Mr. Henry Salt. "It is therefore certain that his importance for posterity will dwindle, if it has not already dwindled, to that given by a bundle of descriptive selections. But these will occupy a foremost place on their particular shelf, the shelf at the head of which stands Gilbert White and Gray," says Mr. George Saintsbury.

"He was a reporter of genius, and he never got beyond reporting. Mr. Besant has the vitalising imagination which Jefferies lacked," says Mr. Henley in his review of Walter Besant's "Eulogy of Richard Jefferies"; and again, "They are not novels as he [Walter Besant] admits, they are a series of pictures. . . . That is the way he takes Jefferies at Jefferies' worst." Yes, it is very touching this unanimity, and it is therefore a pleasure for this critic to say that in his judgment "Amaryllis at the Fair" is one of the very few later-day novels of English country life that are worth putting on one's shelf, and that to make room for it he would turn out certain highly-praised novels by Hardy which do not ring quite true, novels which the critics and the public, again with touching unanimity, have voted to be of high rank. But what is a novel? the reader may ask. A novel, says the learned Charles Annandale, is "a fictitious prose narrative, involving some plot of greater or less intricacy, and professing to give a picture of real life, generally exhibiting the passions and sentiments, in a state of great activity, and especially the passion of love." Well, "Amaryllis at the Fair" is a fictitious prose narrative professing to give a picture of real life, and involving a plot of little intricacy. Certainly it exhibits the passions and sentiments in a state of great activity. But Mr. Henry Salt, whose little book on Jefferies is the best yet published, further remarks: "Jefferies was quite unable to give any vivid dramatic life to his stories . . . his instinct was that of the naturalist who observes and moralises rather than that of the novelist who penetrates and interprets; and consequently his rustic characters, though strongly and clearly drawn, do not live, as, for example, those of Thomas Hardy live. . . . Men and animals are alike mere figures in his landscapes."

So far the critics. Jefferies being justly held to be "no novelist," it is inferred by most that something is wrong with "Amaryllis at the Fair," and the book is passed over in silence. But we do not judge every novel by the same test. We do not judge "Tristram Shandy," for example, by its intricate plot, or by its "vivid drama," we judge it simply as an artistic revelation of human life and human character. And judged by the same simple test "Amaryllis at the Fair," I contend, is a living picture of life, a creative work of imagination of a high order. Iden, the unsuccessful farmer who "built for all time, and not for the circumstances of the hour," is a masterly piece of character drawing. But Iden is a personal portrait, the reader may object. Well, what about Uncle Toby? From what void did he spring? Iden, to my mind, is as masterly a conception, as broadly human a figure as is Uncle Toby. And Mrs. Iden, where will you find this type of nervous, irritable wife, full of spiteful disillusioned love for her dilatory husband better painted than by Jefferies? But Mrs. Iden is a type, not an individual, the reader may say. Oh, clever reader! and what about the Widow Wadman? She is no less and no more of an individual than Mrs. Iden. It was a great feat of Sterne to create so cunningly the atmosphere of the Shandy household, but Jefferies has accomplished as artistic a feat in drawing the relations of the Idens, father, mother, and daughter. How true, how unerringly true to human nature is this picture of the Iden household; how delicately felt and rendered to a hair is this picture of the father's sluggish, masculine will, pricked ineffectually by the waspish tongue of feminine criticism. Further, we not only have the family's idiosyncrasies, their habits, mental atmosphere, and domestic story brought before us in a hundred pages, easily and instinctively by the hand of the artist, but we have the whole book steeped in the breath of English spring, the restless ache of spring that thrills through the nerves, and stirs the sluggish winter blood; we have the spring feeling breaking from the March heavens, and the March earth in copse, meadow, and ploughland as it has scarcely been rendered before by English novelist. The description of Amaryllis running out into the March wind to call her father from his potato planting to see the daffodil; the picture of Iden pretending to sleep in his chair that he may watch the mice; the description of the girl Amaryllis watching the crowd of plain, ugly men of the countryside flocking along the road to the fair; the description of Amadis the invalid, in the old farm kitchen among the stalwart country folk—all these pictures and a dozen others in the book are painted with a masterly hand. Pictures! the critical reader may sneer. Yes, pictures of living men and women. What does it matter whether a revelation of human life is conveyed to us by pictures or by action so long as it is conveyed? Mr. Saintsbury classes Jefferies with Gray, presumably because both writers have written of the English landscape. With Gray! Jefferies in his work as a naturalist and observer of wild life may be conveniently classed with Gilbert White. But this classification only applies to one half of Jefferies' books. By his "Wild Life in a Southern County" he stands beside Gilbert White; by his "Story of My Heart" he stands by himself, a little apart from the poets and approaching the best English prose writers; and by "Amaryllis at the Fair" he stands among the half-dozen country writers of the century whose work is racy of the English soil and of rural English human nature. I will name three of these writers, Barnes, Cobbett, Waugh, and my attentive readers can name the other three.

To come back to "Amaryllis at the Fair," why is it so masterly, or, further, wherein is it so masterly, the curious reader may enquire? "Is it not full of digressions? Granted that the first half of the 'novel' is very beautiful in style, does not Jefferies suddenly break his method, introduce his own personality, intersperse abrupt disquisitions on food, illness, and Fleet Street? Is not that description of Iden's dinner a little—well, a little unusual? In short, is not the book a disquisition on life from the standpoint of Jefferies' personal experiences? And if this is so, how can the book be so fine an achievement?" Oh, candid reader, with the voice of authority sounding in your ears (and have we not Mr. Henley and Mr. Saintsbury bound in critical amity against us, not to speak of Miss Grace Toplis), a book may break all the formal rules, and yet it may yield to us just that salt of life which we may seek for vainly in the works of more faultless writers. The strength of "Amaryllis at the Fair" is that its beauty springs naturally from the prosaic earthly facts of life it narrates, and that, in the natural atmosphere breathed by its people, the prose and the poetry of their life are one. In the respect of the artistic naturalness of its homely picture, and of its convincing atmosphere, the book is very superior to, say "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," where we are conscious that the author is arranging scenery for our benefit, working in the careful studies and observations of village life he has taken for the purpose of his dramatic story, and making a realistic atmosphere which is not the true air the people he has "studied" breathe. The native air of "The Woodlanders" I hold to be a natural atmosphere in which the author is at home, but that of "Tess of the D'Urbervilles," no. Jefferies has failed in "The Dewy Morn," and in "Greene-Fern Farm," because in trying to be realistic he is not moving in the atmosphere he instinctively loves. But in "Amaryllis at the Fair," the scenes, the descriptions, the conversations are spontaneous as life, and his commentary on them is like Fielding's commentary, a medium by which he lives with them. His imagination, memory, and instinctive perception are all working together. And so his picture of human life in "Amaryllis" brings with it as convincing and as fresh a breath of life as we find in Cobbett's, Waugh's and Barnes' country writings. When a writer arrives at being perfectly natural in his atmosphere, his style and his subject seem to become one. He moves easily and surely. Out of the splintered mass of ideas and emotions, out of his youthful sensations, his accidental happenings, chance revelations, and the atmosphere he knows through long feeling, he builds up a subtle and cunning picture for us, a complete illusion of life more true than the reality. For what prosaic people call the reality is merely the co-ordination in their own minds of perhaps a thousandth part of the aspects of life around them; and only this thousandth part they have noticed. But the creative mind builds up a living picture out of thousands of aspects ordinary people are congenitally blind to. This is what Jefferies has done in "Amaryllis at the Fair." The book is rich in the forces of life, in its quick twists and turns, and in its contradictions: we feel in it there is nature working alike in the leaves of grass outside the Idens' house, in the blustering winds round the walls, and in the minds of the characters indoors; and the style is as fresh as the April wind. Everything is growing, changing, breathing in the book. But the accomplished critics do not notice these trivial strengths. It is enough for them that Jefferies was not a novelist. Indeed, Mr. Saintsbury apparently thinks that Jefferies made a mistake in drawing his philosophy from an open-air study of nature, for he writes: "Unfortunately for Jefferies his philosophic background was not his Wordsworth's clear and cheerful, but wholly vague and partly gloomy." It was neither vague nor gloomy, we may remark, parenthetically, but we may admit that Jefferies saw too deeply into nature's workings, and had too sensuous a joy in life to interpret all Nature's doings, à la Wordsworth, or lend them a portentously moral significance.

The one charge that may with truth be brought against "Amaryllis at the Fair" is that its digressions damage the artistic illusion of the whole. But we must accept them as an integral part of the book's individual character, just as the face of a man has its own character and blemishes: they are one with the spirit of the whole, and so, if they break somewhat the illusion of the scenes, they do not damage its spiritual unity. It is this spiritual unity on which we must insist, because "Amaryllis" is indeed Jefferies' last and complete testament on human life. He wrote it, or rather dictated it to his wife, as he lay in pain, slowly dying, and he has put into it the frankness of a dying man. How real, how solid, how deliciously sweet seemed those simple earthly joys, those human appetites of healthy vigorous men to him! how intense is his passion and spiritual hunger for the beauty of earth! Like a flame shooting up from the log it is consuming, so this passion for the green earth, for the earth in wind and sunshine, consumes the wasted consumptive body of the dying man. The reality, the solidity of the homely farmhouse life he describes spring from the intensity with which he clings to all he loves, the cold March wind buffeting the face, the mating cries of the birds in the hot spring sunshine. Life is so terribly strong, so deliciously real, so full of man's unsatisfied hungry ache for happiness, and yet so sweet is the craving, so bitter the knowledge of the unfulfilment. So, inspiring and vivifying the whole, in every line of "Amaryllis" is Jefferies' philosophy of life. Jefferies "did not understand human nature," say the accomplished critics. Did he not? "Amaryllis at the Fair" is one of the truest criticisms of human life you are likely to meet with. The mixedness of things, the old, old human muddle, the meanness and stupidity and shortsightedness of humanity, the good salty taste of life in the healthy mouth, the spirituality of love, the strong earthy roots of appetite, man's lust of life, with circumstances awry, and the sharp wind blowing alike on the just and the unjust—all is there on the printed page of "Amaryllis at the Fair." The song of the wind and the roar of London unite and mingle therein for those who do not bring the dulled eye of superiority to this most human book.

EDWARD GARNETT.

Impressions.

XXVI.—Companionship.

DRENCHED with rain, caked with mud, we rushed into the country town, scraping the wheel of a brewer's dray as we took the bridge. A howl of execration followed us, but my friend, who was driving his new motor-car for the first time, neither turned nor spoke. His keen face peered ahead: the speed fever coursed through his veins: it was nothing to him that a trail of curses had defiled our track from London.

When we reached the Inn he thrust his hand beneath his leather jacket and drew forth his watch: "Under two hours," he said. "Good!" The motor buzzed and groaned, and just then a troop of yeomanry passed. My heart went out to the little horses so sensitive and responsive, and, with a sudden longing, I thought of a slender roan mare that had been my companion in former days in this very town, who had carried me so bravely before the inrush of my passion for machinery and speed. I dreamt of her that night, and the next morning persuaded my friend to postpone our return journey till the afternoon. For a few hours at least I would be faithful to an old love.

What a change two years had made in the Inn yard. At the corner a showy motor shop had been built; the yard had become a garage; peak-faced chaffeurs in oil-skin garments stood waiting where, in old days, easy-limbed grooms had idled. There were motors in the coach-houses, steam eddied into the air, and over all hung the horrid smell of petrol. But at the end of the yard, where the tan-strewn incline led to the upper storey, the pleasant, familiar horsey atmosphere welcomed me, and there, forlorn enough, were a few horses, and among them the slender roan mare.

She fretted for the first half-hour, tossing her head, troubled by the bit and my unskilful handling of the reins. Had much commerce with motor-cars destroyed the little cunning I once had with man's loyal and ancient companion? It seemed so; but when we reached the crest of the downs the inspiration to give her her head, that small, wise head, came over me. I let the reins hang loose, dug my knees into her slight body, swayed to her movement, and away she went, her little hoofs hardly touching the crisp turf, her head outstretched, and I recapturing all the old rapture as we scampered across the trackless land. The rain beat down, and the hail: she inclined her head from the sting just in the old way, and bore me higher, higher till there was nothing but the birds between us and the sky. Far below on the white roads that crossed and recrossed the valley, and beyond through other counties, motor-cars were racing across the land. Man had seized the new toy in both hands, crying that the days of the horse were numbered; but that brief morning when she and I were together, one and indivisible in ecstasy of motion, was worth all the journeys of all the motor-cars that have ever raced from luncheon to dinner.

Then we descended to the place of steam and petrol. The groom stroked her wet nose and said, "When the Lord takes her, he'll take a good mare." I watched the little lady step up the tan-strewn incline to her dark lodging, and turned to find my motorist waiting to start.

The country whizzed past us: a road, always a road, stretched ahead: beneath us was always the panting inanimate thing that knew nothing, cared nothing, felt nothing, while up there, on those heights, horses were taking their own wayward way over the soft turf, their little hoofs just brushing the ground, their heads outstretched, and their bodies quivering with the joy that living things feel in service that is companionship and freedom.

Drama.

A Player's Play.

THE vitality of a national drama must, of course, depend upon its modernity, not upon its traditions. Unless it can become the medium of a living utterance and maintain its active outlook upon the facts and ideals of contemporary society, no amount of loyalty to the literary past can ever make it a literary force in the present or save it from the reproach of the academic and the unessential. One may feel this as strongly as possible, and yet wish that a spirit of more liberal enterprise might come over our actor-managers not only in their dealings with the modern playwright, but also in their rarer classical revivals. In particular it is rather ridiculous that the horizon of the eighteenth century drama should be bounded for them, as it usually is, by two plays of Sheridan's and one of Goldsmith's. For this reason, rather than for the intrinsic merits of the piece, one may welcome the experiment of Mr. Cyril Maude in reproducing at the Haymarket "The Clandestine Marriage" of George Colman and David Garrick. The eighteenth century was emphatically not an age of literary art, and "The Clandestine Marriage" does not, as will soon be apparent, endure the kind of analysis which one is accustomed to apply to a comedy of the seventeenth century or a comedy of the twentieth. The action, if so it may be called, takes place in the country house of one Sterling, a rich and extremely vulgar merchant. The chief inmate of this house is Sterling's equally vulgar, if more pretentious, sister, Mrs. Heidelberg, from whom the family have expectations. There are also two daughters, of whom the elder, Betty, an affected and shrewish young lady, is courted for her fortune by Sir John Melville, while the charming and ingenuous Fanny is already married in secret to young Lovewell, a penniless clerk in her father's office. In Act I. you learn of this and of the arrival of Lord Ogleby, an ancient beau and Sir John Melville's uncle, to complete the negotiations for his nephew's match. Act II. is almost entirely devoted to the humours of Lord Ogleby's toilet, and his horror at the vulgarians amongst whom he finds himself. In Act III. all the people who should have known better begin to fall in love with Fanny. Sir John Melville transfers his affections to her from Betty, and by offering to accept a younger sister's portion persuades Sterling to consent to the exchange. Betty and Mrs. Heidelberg, who takes her part, are furious. For Fanny, too, the situation is an awkward one. She decides to appeal to Lord Ogleby, to whom Lovewell is akin, and the fatuous old gentleman thinks that she has fallen a victim to his senile fascinations. Act IV. passes mainly on the landing before Fanny's chamber. The spretae injuria formae of Betty has led her to keep a watch on her sister. The presence of a man where no man should be is discovered. A hue and cry is raised, and the whole household turn out, in picturesque night-gear, on the landing. Naturally Sir John Melville is supposed to be the culprit. But to the amazement of all, out walks Lovewell. Explanations ensue. The clandestine marriage is confessed. The good hearts that lie beneath the vulgarian waistcoat of Sterling and the foppish waistcoat of Lord Ogleby assert themselves. Even Mrs. Heidelberg relents. Fanny and her husband are forgiven, and all ends happily as a marriage bell.

The thinness of the plot is, I hope, obvious. Practically nothing happens throughout three-fourths of the play. At the end there is a bustle rather than an action. The dénouement comes by accident, not by the working out of natural laws. And for the ethical attitude to life which one has learnt to postulate of comedy one must look in vain. These things were hardly more to the taste of the eighteenth century than to that of the nineteenth. The whole interest of "The Clandestine Marriage" lies in the observation not of dynamic character, character in action, but of static character, or more precisely still, of those lesser manifestations of character which may be summed up as manners. It is a comedy of manners, a portraiture of social types. The distinction between the "cit" and the man about town is now, I am told, on the way to be obliterated. The stockbroker is usually the scion of a noble house, and makes his blameless transit twice a day between Throgmorton Street and Pall Mall. But it was still real to the consciousness of the eighteenth century, and it is from this that Colman and Garrick get their element of dramatic contrast. Lord Ogleby typifies the world of gallantry and fashion, Sterling and Mrs. Heidelberg typify the world of money-bags. And the clashing humours are neatly enough touched off. The sentimental part is put in for the benefit of the ladies, who may be expected to have the tear of sensibility ready for the languishing distress of the charming Fanny.

It must also be borne in mind that Garrick was primarily an actor, and that, generally speaking, the eighteenth century drama is the opportunity of the actor rather than of the playwright. Do not let me be taken as implying that "The Clandestine Marriage" is not vastly entertaining. On the contrary, Mr. Cyril Maude as Lord Ogleby, Mr. Rignold as Sterling, and Mrs. Charles Calvert as Mrs. Heidelberg are, one and all of them, monstrous good fun. They have telling parts and act them with spirit and finish. The minor business, too, of valets and waiting-maids and the like, so thoroughly characteristic of the kind of play, is well done, and the artificial atmosphere of the whole is admirably preserved. My point, however, is that it is in these histrionic humours, and not in any essential dramatic quality, that one's pleasure must be sought.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Whitechapel and Elsewhere.

THAT the arrangement of the present exhibition of pictures at the Whitechapel Art Gallery was "attended with many difficulties" I can well believe. The committee set themselves to form a representative collection of the work of British artists at the beginning of the present century. The result is very interesting, and very bewildering. Four hundred and forty works are crowded together: if only one had the right to select forty, and permission to hang them in such a way that the eye could focus on each in turn, with ample margin of wall space, this would be one of the salient picture exhibitions of the year. The lesson that the dwellers in Whitechapel, indeed, all of us, most need to learn is to ignore the second, third, and fourth rate, and to concentrate on the best. Half-a-dozen of these four hundred and forty works thoroughly examined and brooded over, would afford an incalculably larger measure of pleasure and profit than this collection in bulk can possibly give to the thousands who weekly wander through the galleries. The notes to the catalogue, I am afraid, do not help towards a proper appreciation of the pictures. To Mr. Swinstead's huge "First on the Antarctic Continent," twenty-five lines are given, including such a worthless piece of information as this: "Every detail of the picture, from the costumes to the sledges and equipment and dogs, was painted from the outfit actually in use at the time, and the picture was painted immediately on the explorer's return." Not a word is said about Mr. Whistler's "Convalescent"—that white dream of charm and quality in paint. When so much trouble, and so much intelligence, is given to collecting pictures for the edification of the East-end of London, it is surely worth while to indicate the pictures which are significant, and to explain why they are so. Neither is the compiler of the catalogue altogether satisfactory when he soars. I wonder what the Whitechapel resident makes of this comment on Mr. Wilson Steer's "Jonquils," which has, moreover, the defect of not being true: "A curtainless window at twilight often throws on our walls more wonderful decorations than shuttered connoisseurs can boast"; or this, apropos of Mr. Shannon's "Bunch of Grapes": "Story or incident we may not find here, but its careful abstractness is its chief fascination." What is really wanted at Whitechapel, as at most large exhibitions of pictures, is a salon carré, containing the best only of the works submitted, where the visitor could spend two-thirds of his time. Such a room at Whitechapel would give the compiler of the catalogue a rare opportunity.

Each of us makes a salon carré of our own, composed of the pictures that remain in the memory when we have left the exhibition. My pleasantest impression of the Whitechapel show is, I think, of certain pictures in the small room by artists who have, at one time or another, exhibited at the New English Art Club. The recognition of some of these pictures, which I had not seen for a long time, produced quite a thrill of surprise and pleasure, whereas certain large Burlington House pictures, widely known by means of reproductions scattered throughout the country, looked merely dull. But it was a real pleasure to be reminded of the existence of Mr. Mark Fisher's sunny "Water Frolic"; of Mr. Steer's bold and delightful "Rainbow"; of Mr. Strang's "Emmaus"; and of Mr. C. Shannon's pensively decorative "Bunch of Grapes."

In the upper gallery the difficulty of focussing one's attention on any particular picture increases. In a first rapid inspection of the room I found myself switched off from Miss Brickdale's "Proud Maisie" to Sir Noel Paton's presentment of "Luther at Erfurt," with a long comment in the catalogue, the last paragraph of which instructs us to "note, side by side, the skull, an emblem of mortality, and the crucifix, with its promise of eternal life," and adds "the fervour of the reformer in discerning the truth direct from the word of God is well shown." After that incursion into literature it was like a day in the country suddenly to meet Mr. Adrian Stokes's brilliant "Wild Cherry Trees." A little later I fell under the spell of a group of Mr. Edward Stott's golden landscapes. Mr. Stott rarely wanders from the circumscribed view of nature he sets himself, but there is no monotony in the charm of his tender country pieces even when grouped together as they are at Whitechapel. Other friends, which, to eyes grown older, still retain their former beauty, are Mr. Clausen's "Golden Barn," Mr. Alexander Mann's "Sunset," and Mr. Greiffenhagen's "Annunciation." These are the pictures I remembered while making my way along Whitechapel High Street to a more familiar quarter of the town by means of a map, that the Committee of the Art Gallery had kindly printed on the back of the invitation card.

I could have wished that some of those East-end folk whom I had seen wandering aimlessly through the rooms at Whitechapel could have experienced the pleasure that a small picture exhibition, a few and fit examples, gives—such an exhibition as that at the Dutch Gallery in Brook Street. Here, in a small room, with quiet, grave hangings, a few small pictures by two masters are being shown—flowers by M. Fantin-Latour, and landscapes by M. Harpignies. They are mingled on the walls—Spring Flowers by a River Scene, an Evening Piece by White Roses. There is nothing to disturb or distract the eye—just flowers at the height of their beauty, and Nature in her loveliest moods. How simple it all seems; how vain the striving after effective subjects that makes so many of the pictures at Whitechapel a weariness. M. Fantin-Latour's eye noticed some pansies, or two roses, or a table on which was grouped a glass of flowers, a plate of plums, and a decanter, and there were his pictures. Of M. Harpignies' landscapes it is difficult to speak without exaggeration. Here is a painter, eighty-four years of age, who is constantly producing, and whose work never shows any signs of weakness or failing power. His experimental stage is long past: he has settled down into a mellow interpretation of Nature, seeing her with all the freshness of young eyes, to which he adds a feeling for atmosphere and distance so delicately suggested that one places him with Corot. The Mediterranean itself lies beyond his "Vue prise à Beaulieu dans le Jardin de M. Livesay." What a view it is! A day's picture seeing is indeed a gain when one has absorbed such an impression of beauty as this little landscape gives.

I turned to go, and then came the contrast. On a wall in the outer room I saw a picture that revealed in a flash the other extreme of pictorial art. Neither beauty nor mystery is here, but tragedy, vivid and poignant, the effect gained not by any melodramatic subterfuges, but by an intensity of realism, and an arrangement of composition that only a man of genius could have imagined. The picture was Daumier's "Christ Mocked." It is in monochrome, unfinished, and was found in his studio at the time of his death. I described this masterpiece when it was shown at Wolverhampton last year. Always to be remembered are the tense detachment and dignity of the central figure, the flung-back pointing arm of the mocker, and the grim figures of the crowd below the balcony. Daumier had "an inexhaustible genius for mockery" and truth. This "Christ Mocked" is truth.

So the harvest of the day that was gathered into the barn of memory came out thus: Mr. Whistler's "Convalescent" for charm; M. Harpignies' peep of the Mediterranean for beauty; and Daumier's "Christ Mocked" for truth.

C. L. H.

Science.

From the Melting Pot.

NOT only practically but philosophically speaking, science must justify her existence. Despite the dictum of Mrs. Meynell (based, it is true, upon the inadequacy of the poet's slight occasion to his sublime moral), I must hold with Keats. Truth is beauty. So if science show God to be a myth, the sun a goblin, life a nightmare,—then away with her; let us have ignorance and bliss. If the chemist wish me to pay for his broken test-tubes, or the hospital asks the public to pay for its broken clinical thermometers, we ask the legitimate, the utilitarian question, "Cui bono?" The good—the beauty—may be subtle; it may be the hastened evolution of the spirit of reverence; good or beauty there must be, else Truth is not Truth. Now the crown and the goal of all science is the science of Sociology. Man is a gregarious animal. You may well refuse to pay for the chemist's test-tubes if his claim be merely that he love truth; you love your children, and their claims, in theory and in practice, transcend those of any abstraction, however noble be its name. Therefore the scientist must render an account. He and we were all in the nebula together. We can tolerate no antithesis. He and we are degrading its store of energy. Each day the chemist lives he lessens the world's store of oxygen, he increases its useless carbonic acid. He radiates into trackless space a portion of irrecoverable heat. What is his excuse to the social organism of which he is not a parasite, but a part? He has made an hypothesis; what has he to say to the man who has made a chair? The answer is simple.

Wisdom is justified of her children, for they toil—necessarily and in the nature of things—for the children of men. All organised knowledge—all knowledge of facts other than dead and ephemeral—contributes to Sociology; to what, in inchoate phrase, we call the Art of Living. This is my excuse for the circumstance that, the other day, when attempting to outline some of the relations between ether vibration and protoplasm, and remarking that the Röntgen rays cured one form of cancer, I only parenthetically observed that they are light of short wave-length. I was trying to preserve the proportions of things.

Since then, however, Lord Rayleigh has given an authoritative assent to this statement, and the history of our knowledge on this matter is so instructive that one must do more than merely state the fact. For some time there has been in the physicist's melting-pot a variety of matters which has assumed a somewhat supposititious inter-relation in the public mind. There are the Röntgen rays, the Hertzian waves of wireless telegraphy, the radio-activity of certain metals (a property possessed, it is now believed, by all matter), the theory of electrons and so forth. Now the Hertzian wave occupies the attention of sane men with families to keep, because they believe something will come of it. It will be a contribution to sociology. It will serve the body-politic. So with the Röntgen ray. No hospital is complete without it. I have described its healing power. Its diagnostic value is still incalculable. But from sheer curiosity we may hark back and consider these waves. And it may be found that all organisable knowledge is worth pursuing. For its own sake, no,—there is Art; but for its relation to life.

It is not worth while to recapitulate the various theories that have been held about the Röntgen rays. They were made by theorists: "let them rave." But first we may observe where lay the difficulty. It is just above the back part of the brim of a man's hat, in the hindmost part of the brain. For, of course, everyone's eyes are in the back of his head. The visual centres are as well defined as any in cerebral localization. In the cells of that area of the brain was the difficulty. Their protoplasm is so constituted that it can translate into conscious sensation of light only those transverse vibrations of the ether that range from about four hundred to about eight hundred millions of millions per second. The slower and the faster vibrations are invisible. The infra-red and the ultra-violet rays need other means for their appreciation. They are without our meagre octave. The ear can hear ten or eleven octaves of sound, the eye sees only one of light. And the Röntgen rays being perhaps the most ultra-violet of all light—of a wave-length perhaps one-hundredth part that of violet light—the back of our heads cannot see them. They are, in a sense, too high for our understanding. Were our visual nerve-cell protoplasm other than it is, we should have seen the rays from the first, and argument would have been superfluous.

Light consists of ether vibrations that are transverse to the line of progress. Waves of sound are to and fro in the line of progress. In a beam of light the wave is passing up and down, from side to side, in an infinite number of planes. By appropriate means one may cut off all the vibrations save those in one plane, and the ray of light then permitted to pass, having its vibrations due north and south, so to speak, is said to be polarised. M. Blondlot has succeeded in applying the crucial test to the Röntgen rays. He has polarised them and thereby supplied the final proof of their identity with light. The mystery of the rays—using the word in the vulgar sense—is gone. If a primrose by the river's brim be but a yellow primrose—named and done with—then the Röntgen rays are but fast ether-waves—rapid sunlight, nothing more. Yet of them, too, must we ask, Whence?

And, to the other question, "cui bono?" I may venture the hope that the polarised Röntgen ray will soon be tried in Surgery. It is conceivable that, in this form, it may be more efficient than even the focussed non-polarised radiation, and may penetrate so as to affect the forms of cancer hitherto unassailable.

Still in the melting pot, and full of promise is radium. This new metal, discovered by M. and Mme. Curie, is the typical example of an intensely radio-active (perish the phrase!) substance. It is five hundred thousand times as active as uranium, the properties of which were studied by M. Becquerel. The radiant power of these metals is a new and striking instance of the most familiar phenomenon in Nature, the transformation of energy. What is the exact nature of the ethereal energy that radium can translate into heat and light, just as a poker held near a fire becomes hot by transforming the ethereal energy of the infra-red rays from the glowing coal—we cannot tell as yet. It is in the melting-pot. This, however, may be noted. As Prof. J. J. Thomson has shown, matter—material particles—can move with the speed of light. This is Newton's corpuscular theory of light (that it consisted of a bombardment of minute particles that entered the eye) almost with us again. His conception, though wrong, was not absurd. Now let us learn from radium. In a couplet unsurpassable, because absolutely true, Mr. Francis Thompson has epitomized all science:—

Thou canst not stir a flower
Without troubling of a star.

Let me state, in a word, the latest instance of the Unity of things, so spiritually seen by the poet's "Mistress of Vision." Helmholtz's explanation of the sun's heat, as due to his sixteen daily inches of shrinkage, accounts for only twenty-four million years from the beginning of our nebula. The literally far-fetched theory has been brought in aid of geological time, that the sun—the solar nebula—has been aided in time past by light borrowed from other stars and translated into heat; a parallel with radium. But there needs only a trivial quantity of matter to have poured into the sun since his beginning, at the velocity of the emanations, say, of radium, at the velocity of light, that is, to have given him energy enough to keep us going until now. The astronomer justifies the poet by taking the most infinitesimal phenomena of the physicist and making them explain the continuance of suns.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

The Modern Stage.

SIR,—Your note to my statement in the "Morning Post" that the "old pattern" theatre is responsible for half the bad work on the stage is that of course I refer to the setting. I refer to the acting far more than to the setting. If an actor wishes to be seen by the entire audience in a modern theatre, by hook or by crook he must shoulder his way to the centre of the stage and hold his position if he can. It is impossible for more than one man to do this at a time, so that as each important speech or situation comes along, the shouldering commences. The muscular actor wins at this game.

Whoever saw in life (let alone in the mind's eye, Horatio) such moving about, such shifting of position, as takes place on the stage, and all this restless, unnatural, unconsidered action is due to the construction of the auditorium. All their unnatural posturing, all their lame exits and entrances, you cannot put these down to the actors—they are surely not to blame—it is the fault of the architect. Not that I believe a theatre built on the Bayreuth plan would make an ounce of difference to the acting of those gentlemen whose very life seems to depend on getting into the centre of the stage, but I believe it would make all the difference to the majority, to the younger actors whose life is at present devoted to their art and not concerned with their own importance. And it is these younger men for whom the theatres will be built in the future.—Yours, &c.,

GORDON CRAIG.

Johnson or Goldsmith?

SIR,—Pray allow me space to thank Mr. Bell for his kind correction. The phrase about "winding into a subject like a serpent" is Goldsmith's, and not, as I wrote, Johnson's. The passage is to be found in the "Life of Dr. Johnson," under date May 9, 1773, and runs as follows:—

He (Goldsmith) now seemed very angry that Johnson was going to be a traveller; said "he would be a dead-weight for me to carry," . . . Nor would he patiently allow me to enlarge upon Johnson's wonderful abilities; but exclaimed, "Is he like Burke, who winds into a subject like a serpent?"

The little outburst is a proof, were any needed, that Goldsmith did not always talk at random.

It has also been brought to my notice that some intimate glimpses of Burke are contained in Fanny Burney's "Diary and Letters," especially in her account of the party at Mr. Crewe's, at Hampstead, on June 18, 1792.—Yours, &c.,

THE WRITER OF THE ARTICLE.

SIR,—Mr. Bell is right in assigning the remark on Burke to Goldsmith, and not to Johnson, as does the writer of your article "The Praise of Famous Men." The story will be found in Chapter XXI. of Boswell.

But surely this criticism of Burke is not a gibe at all, but a compliment? It is taken in the latter sense by Forster ("Life of Goldsmith," page 183 in 1855 edition) and by Mr. John Morley.—Yours, &c.,

London, W.

K. DE WATTEVILLE.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 184 (New Series).

Last week we offered a Prize of One Guinea for the best set of humorous verses, not to exceed sixteen lines, on any subject. Forty-four replies have been received. On the whole the results are not particularly amusing. We award the prize to Mr. Montagu Lomax, The Close, Minchinhampton, Gloucestershire, for the following:—

ATRABILIA.

(With apologies to R. B.)

And did you once find Browning plain,
And did he make his meaning clear
Without your reading him again
Say, fifty times? How queer!

But you were puzzled before that,
And haply will be puzzled after,
Tho' what the plague he's driving at
Now, is no theme for laughter.

I read a book with a name of its own,
And of use at a Spelling-Bee no doubt,
But, try as I would, the name alone
Was all that I could make out.

The name of the book was "Ferishtah's Fancies,"
But what was the meaning of the rest,
Ferishtah, of course, for Ferishtah can, sees—
I never have even guess'd.

Other replies follow :—

GEORGIE'S PHILOSOPHY.

A crowd of serious fancies fill
My mind, about that pleasant hill ;
And first, 'tis stuck that way, I see,
And will not budge for you or me.
For 'tis so heavy, hard, and strong,
And has been there such ages long,
Nothing, so far as I can see,
Could rouse it to activity.
It makes me feel quite weak and faint—
And yet it is a fancy quaint—
To think how thin I'd be and flat
If I were under all of that !
And oft the thought occurs to me,
Why ever all these things should be Exactly so. But no one knows,
So we must lump it, I suppose !

[E. K. L., Birkenhead.]

"Something funny in sixteen lines"—

That's the ACADEMY'S task to-day ;
Alas and alack ! for my Muse opines
She will not enter this rhythmic fray.
She cannot abide this carnal tether :
She soareth aloft in her own old way.
And, stranded below, I am wondering whether She'll drop me down a few things to say.
Nears she now the Parnassian portals ;
And shall I grovel to her in vain
For sixteen lines that will make them chortle
At 43 in the Chancery Lane ?
Down to my boots my heart is sinking ;
A dismal thought in my gizzard sticks :
This is the thing I am sadly thinking—
April the First is the date they fix.

[J. E. B., Ipswich.]

THE SONG OF THE PEDESTRIAN.

(With apologies to Mr. W. E. Henley.)

Dust !
Dust and the whirr of a motor
Eye-scorching atoms
Of road ; the ear-splitting
Fiendish, satanic
Mockings of horn.
Masked desperate villains
Who curse the police,
Pay their fines and are gone
To commit fresh atrocities,
Tainting the air with
A hideous, clinging
Odour of Petrol !

[E. R. S., Woolwich.]

RHYMES FOR PICTURE POSTCARDS.

See on this card the town of Inverness
Where Duncan quitted quick life's storm and stress,
Here, with Macbeth, the Royal Traveller tarried,
Was welcomed by the wife Macbeth had married,
But in the night, as breath through nose he drew,
Repeatedly, she stabbed him through and through.
Far better stay at home, though dull as Hades,
Than travel and be bored to death by married ladies.

Behold the town of Banff beyond the bridge,
Slowly but surely creeping towards the ridge,
Where, in old days, the outlaw, James Macpherson,
Was taken prisoner by a nasty person,
Who, distantly related to the Duke of Fife,
Soon robbed the ranting reiver of his life.

Thus do we learn, far better than by books,
To shun acquaintance with the friends of Dukes.

[P. A. K., Eskbank.]

IN PRAISE OF BELINDA.

It is not mine with halting breath
Belinda's praise to utter :
The ancient proverb truly saith,
Fine words no parsnips butter.
Yet, though she's charming to despair,
Perfect I cannot find her :
I'd have her either much less fair,
Or else a great deal kinder :
Since, if it never may be mine
One ray of hope to cherish,
I soon shall droop and fade and pine,
And ultimately perish.
Cease, stricken heart, thy dismal groan !
Let this remark suffice one ;
So fair a maid I've never known,
And seldom such a nice one.

[J. A. W., Edinburgh.]

WHAT THE LOOKING-GLASS SAW.

I saw a gleam of gold that came upon my owner's hair.
As sunset-rays may guild an ancient thatch at eventide,
For the sombre raven tresses, which my owner used to wear,
Bid fair to whiten, if she lived—and so the lady dyed !
I saw some tiny lines appear around my owner's eyes,
The heralds of departing youth—the dregs of pleasure's cup,
They vanished, as by magic ; quote the lady, "It were wise,
If time has quarrelled with my face, to try and make it up."
I saw the girdle, tightly drawn around my owner's waist,
For age will bring increasing girth, and larger grew the span.
But fashion with economy is tempered to her taste,
So still she strives to be as little waistful as she can.
I saw—but stay, a mirror must reflect ! it would be rash
To tell the secrets I alone have with my owner shared.
If we utter our reflections, we deserve to come to snash,
An oval mirror only splits because it can't be squared.

[A. K., London.]

A GRUMBLE.

My corns have just begun to shoot,
(Without a license by the way !)
Old Brown is tootling on his flute,
And Flo's mama has come to stay !
I saw just now "our Ellen" kiss
The roughest, ugliest of loons,
Since he is spoons upon our "Miss,"
I fear we soon shall miss our spoons !
Like Cherubim our infant son
Does now "continually cry,"
I hear an Organ ! More than one !
Flo uses hers incessantly.
The Tax Collector's step ! Oho !
I'll give it him now, if I can !
My jealous friends all say, you know,
I am an over-rated man !

[F. B. D., Torquay.]

Competition No. 185 (New Series).

This week we offer a Prize of One Guinea for the best description of an April Day, not to exceed 300 words.

As we shall have to go to press a day earlier next week in consequence of the Easter Holidays, answers must reach us not later than the first post of Tuesday, 7 April.

RULES.

Answers, should be addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C." Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Adderley (James), A New Earth (Brown, Langham & Co.) 3/6
 E. E. G., The Makers of Hellas: A Critical Inquiry into the Philosophy and Religion of Ancient Greece (Griffin) net 10/6
 Martineau (James), National Duties and Other Sermons and Addresses (Longmans) net 6/0
 Booth (Charles), Life and Labour in London: Religious Influences (Macmillan) net 5/0

POETRY, CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

- Shedd (Percy W.), The Oceanides. Poems and Translations (Grafton Press)
 Heysinger (J. W.), The Light of China (Research Publishing Co.)
 Herbert (Alice), Between the Lines (Lane) net 3/6
 Johns (Edward), Legends of England and Wales in Humorous Verse (Hurst & Blackett) 1/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- Pears (Edwin), The Destruction of the Greek Empire, and the Story of the Capture of Constantinople by the Turks (Longmans) net 18/0
 Hawtrey (Florence Molesworth), The History of the Hawtrey Family. 2 Vols. (Allen) net 21/0
 Chesterton (G. K.) and Perris (G. H.), Leo Tolstoy (Hodder & Stoughton) net 1/0
 Hilprecht (H. V.), Explorations in Bible Lands during the 19th Century (T. & T. Clark) net 12/6
 Bacon (Edgar Mayhew), The Hudson River (Putnam's) net 18/0
 Dellenbaugh (Frederick S.), The Romance of the Colorado River net 15/0
 Duff (Right Hon. Sir Mountstuart E. Grant), Out of the Past: Some Biographical Essays. 2 Vols. (Murray) 18/0
 Westcott (Arthur), Life and Letters of Brooke Foss Westcott. 2 Vols. (Macmillan) net 17/0
 Mandley (J. G. de T.), Transcribed and edited by, The Portmote or Court Leet Records of Salford. Vol. II. (Chetham Society)

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- Brongh (J.), The Study of Mental Science (Longmans) net 2/0
 Schofield (Alfred T.), Nerves in Disorder (Hodder & Stoughton) 3/6
 Dixon (Charles), Open-Air Studies in Bird Life (Griffin) 7/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- Tompkins (Herbert W.), Hertfordshire (Methuen) 3/0
 Cresswell (Beatrice), The Ancient and Loyal City of Exeter (The Homeland Association) net 0/6
 His Royal Highness Luigi Amedeo of Savoy, On the "Polar Star" in the Arctic Sea. (2 Vols.) (Hutchinson) net 42/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Fraser (John Foster), America at Work (Cassell) 6/0
 The Writer's Year-Book (Writer's Year-Book Co.) net 1/6
 Rye (Walter), Edited by, The Norwich Rate Book (Jarrold) net 3/6
 Murray (Dr. James A. H.), Edited by, A New English Dictionary on Historical Principles. Onomastical—Outing (Clarendon Press) 5/0
 Churchill (Winston Spencer), Mr. Brodick's Army (Humphreys) 1/0
 Notes on the Repair of Ancient Buildings (Batsford)
 Wilkinson (Spenser), Edited by, The Nation's Need (Constable) 6/0
 Jackson (F. Hamilton), Intarsia and Marquetry (Sands) 5/0
 The Sporting Annual, 1903 (Treherne) net 2/6
 Fielding (Hugh), The A.B.C. of Cricket (Chatto & Windus) 1/0
 Autobiography of Peter Taylor (Gardiner) 3/6

EDUCATIONAL.

- Bury (J. B.), History of Greece for Beginners (Macmillan) 3/6
 Pollard (Alfred W.), Edited by, Chaucer's Canterbury Tales, The Prologue (Macmillan) 3/6
 Baker (W. M.) and Bourne (A. A.), Elementary Geometry (Bell)
 Lyde (L. W.), Commercial Geography (Black) 3/0
 Herbertson (F. D. and A. J.), Descriptive Geography: Europe (") 2/6
 David (M. S.), Beginners' Algebra (") 2/6
 Hoeser (Dr. Franz), Solid Geometry (") 1/8
 Marney (Toroua De), Toujours Prit (Marlborough) 2/0

NEW EDITIONS.

- Hardy (Thomas), The Hand of Ethelberta (Macmillan) 3/6
 Fisher (George Park), The Grounds of Theistic and Christian Belief (Hodder & Stoughton) 10/6
 Letters of Mlle. De Lespinasse. Translated by Katharine Prescott Wormeley (Heinemann) 6/0
 Barrie (J. M.), The Little Minister (Cassell) 3/6
 Dickens (Charles), The Pickwick Papers. (Fireside Edition) (Chapman, Hall, & Frowde) net 2/0
 " " Sketches by Poz. (Fireside Edition) (Chapman, Hall, & Frowde) net 2/0
 " " Oliver Twist. (Fireside Edition) (Chapman, Hall, & Frowde) net 1/6
 Bourdillon (Frances William), Translated from the Old French by, Aucassin and Nicolette (Kegan Paul) net 1/6
 Shakespeare (William), King Henry VIII. (Edinburgh Folio.) (Richards) net 5/0
 King Richard III. (") net 5/0
 Traill (H. D.) and Mann (J. S.), Social England. Illustrated Edition. Vol. IV. (Cassell) net 14/0
 Green (John Richard), A Short History of the English People. Part 21. (Macmillan) net 0/6
 Swainsland (W.), Familiar Wild Birds. Part I. (Cassell) net 0/6
 An English Garner: Critical Essays and Literary Fragments, with an Introduction by J. Churton Collins (Constable) net 4/0
 Hazlitt (William), The Collected Works of. Volume 7. (Dent) net 7/6
 The Windsor Shakespeare: Measure for Measure (Black) net 2/0
 Franklin (Benjamin), The Autobiography of (Putnam's) net 1/6
 Shakespeare's Sonnets (") net 1/6
 Sheridan (Richard Brinsley), The Rivals (") net 1/6
 Blackmore (R. D.), Mary Ancrely (") net 0/6
 Whyte-Melville (G. J.), Good for Nothing (Ward, Lock) 2/0
 Hughes (T.), Tom Brown at Oxford (") 1/6
 " Tom Brown's School Days (") 0/6
 Boothby (Guy), Long Live the King (") 0/6
 The Statesman's Year-Book, 1903. (Macmillan) net 10/6
 Grant Allen's Historical Guides: Paris (Richards) net 3/6

PERIODICALS.

- Cassell's, English Illustrated, Cornhill, Windsor, Blackwood's, Good Words, Sunday, Harper's, Temple Bar, Macmillan's, Empire Review, Century, St. Nicholas, School World, Contemporary, Pearson's, Antiquary, Genealogical, Monthly Review, Lippincott's, New Liberal Review, National Review, Devon Notes and Queries, Flora and Sylvia.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The first volume of Mr. John Morley's "Life of Gladstone" is in the press. The work, which will be in three volumes, will be published in the autumn.

The list of Mr. Bryce's twenty "Studies in Contemporary Biography" begins with Lord Beaconsfield and closes with Mr. Gladstone. The others include men so diverse as Dean Stanley and Anthony Trollope, Stafford Northcote (Lord Iddesleigh) and Mr. Parnell, Archbishop Tait and Cardinal Manning, with other scholars, statesmen, and divines. The historians are fully represented by Freeman, Green, Lord Acton; the lawyers by Sir George Jessel and Lord Cairns. In every case the sketch is only briefly biographical, for purposes of exposition: the writer's object is everywhere to present a personality, a character—sometimes, but rarely, a career.

"The Life and Letters of Sir George Grove," which has been written by Mr. C. L. Graves for Messrs. Macmillan, has its main purpose in describing his work at the Crystal Palace and Royal College of Music and as editor of "The Dictionary of Music." It contains letters hitherto unpublished from a number of distinguished personages—Carlyle, Tennyson, Browning, Matthew Arnold, Tourgueneff, Arthur Sullivan, Brahms, and Jenny Lind.

A collection of theological essays by the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and P. H. Wicksteed, written at various times and now gathered into a volume, is announced by Messrs. Dent under the title "Studies in Theology." Among the subjects dealt with are the following: "The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity," "The Place of Immortality in Religious Belief," "The Liberal Faith," "Religion and Society," with nine other articles.

The Very Rev. William Lefroy, Dean of Norwich, has undertaken to write the Memoir of Dean Farrar which will appear in the biographical edition about to be published by Messrs. Cassell and Company of Farrar's "Life of Christ's."

Tolstoy has just placed in the hands of the editor of the "Free Age Press" for publication two new articles: "The Overthrow of Hell and its Restoration," a dramatic dialogue between Beelzebub and his angels, and "An Appeal to the Clergy of all Countries."

The series of papers called "The Truth About an Author," which appeared in these columns, will shortly be published in book form by Messrs. Constable.

Mr. Heinemann will publish shortly a new work by E. F. Benson, entitled "The Book of Months." This bears no resemblance to any of the author's previous works, but, as the title implies, is written in the form of a diary of the months. The volume contains impressions and reflections upon the events of the day, people, and places.

Mr. F. H. de Quincey, whose book, "Song-Tide Murmurs" Mr. Elkin Mathews is to publish before long, is a descendant of the author of "The Confessions of an Opium Eater." With the exceptions of the sonnets and two or three other poems written during periods of enforced "resting" from theatrical work, the poems in this little volume were written before the author reached the age of twenty-five.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

*A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready,
Post Free on application.*

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE 1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 280,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,
30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., London;
and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday to 43, Chancery Lane. Terms, &c., on application.

THE WRITER'S YEAR BOOK. 500 Places to Sell Manuscripts, Photographs and Drawings.

A Commercial Directory for Professional Writers, Artists, and Photographers, giving the Address, Rates, Time of Payment, and Conditions of Contributorship of all Magazines, Papers, &c., Purchasing MSS., Photos or Drawings. Articles by AARON WATSON, ELIZABETH BANKS, and GALLOWAY KYLE.

Price 1/8, post free 1/9.

THE WRITER'S YEAR BOOK Co.,
Granville House, Arundel Street, Strand, W.C.

The Academy and Literature

Is now

POSTED FREE to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom
prepaying 13/-

FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17/6

will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d.
minimum to 2jd. per copy.

Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor,
OR DIRECT TO THE PUBLISHER OF
THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE,
43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency
E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING,
A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.O.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

(LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR.)

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORIOLETH, and PWLLHELL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

THE WYE VALLEY.

THE SEVERN VALLEY.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes?"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

LECTURE ARRANGEMENTS AFTER EASTER, 1903.

TUESDAYS. LECTURE HOUR, 5 O'CLOCK.

On TUESDAYS, APRIL 21, 28, MAY 5. Professor ALLAN MACFADYEN, M.D., B.Sc., F.R.S., Fullerian Professor of Physiology, R.I. THREE LECTURES on THE BLOOD AND SOME OF ITS PROBLEMS.

On TUESDAYS, MAY 12, 19 (The Tyndall Lectures). Professor GEORGE H. DARWIN, M.A., LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S. TWO LECTURES on THE ASTRONOMICAL INFLUENCE OF THE TIDES.

On TUESDAYS, MAY 26, JUNE 2. Professor EDMUND J. GARWOOD, M.A. TWO LECTURES on THE WORK OF ICE AS A GEOLOGICAL AGENT.

THURSDAYS. LECTURE HOUR, 5 O'CLOCK.

On THURSDAYS, APRIL 23, 30, MAY 7. Professor DEWAR, M.A., LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., Fullerian Professor of Chemistry, R.I. THREE LECTURES on HYDROGEN: GASEOUS, LIQUID AND SOLID.

On THURSDAYS, MAY 14, 21. Professor SYDNEY H. VINES, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S. TWO LECTURES on PROTEID-DIGESTION IN PLANTS.

On THURSDAYS, MAY 28, JUNE 4. Professor J. A. FLEMING, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S. TWO LECTURES on ELECTRIC RESONANCE AND WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY.

SATURDAYS. LECTURE HOUR, 3 O'CLOCK.

On SATURDAYS, APRIL 25, MAY 2. Professor LANGTON DOUGLAS, M.A. TWO LECTURES on THE EARLY ART OF SIENA.

On SATURDAYS, MAY 9, 16, 23. HAMISH MACCUNN, Esq. THREE LECTURES on MUSIC (with Musical Illustrations).

On SATURDAYS, MAY 30, JUNE 6. Professor SILVANUS P. THOMPSON, B.A., D.Sc., F.R.S., M.R.I. TWO LECTURES on THE "DE MAGNETE" AND ITS AUTHOR. I. The Book. II. The Man.

Subscription (to Non-Members) to all Courses of Lectures (extending from Christmas to Midsummer, Two Guineas; Subscription to a single Course of Lectures, One Guinea, or Half-a-Guinea, according to the length of the Course. Tickets issued daily at the Institution, or sent by post on receipt of Cheque or Post-Office Order.

Members may purchase not less than Three Single Lecture Tickets, available for any Afternoon Lecture, for Half-a-Guinea.

The FRIDAY EVENING MEETINGS will be resumed on APRIL 24, at 9 p.m., when The Hon. R. J. STRUTT will give a Discourse on SOME RECENT INVESTIGATIONS ON ELECTRICAL CONDUCTION. Succeding Discourses will probably be given by Professor WILLIAM J. POPE, Mr. H. RIDER HAGGARD, Dr. D. H. SCOTT, Dr. J. A. H. MURRAY, H.S.H. ALBERT PRINCE OF MONACO, Professor H. H. TURNER, Professor T. CURIE, and other gentlemen. To these Meetings Members and their Friends only are admitted.

Persons desirous of becoming Members are requested to apply to the Secretary. When proposed they are immediately admitted to all the Lectures, to the Friday Evening Meetings, and to the Library and Reading Rooms; and their Families are admitted to the Lectures at a reduced charge. Payment: First Year, Ten Guineas; afterwards, Five Guineas a Year; or a composition of Sixty Guineas.

A LIMITED NUMBER OF THE PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY"

May still be obtained, singly, at 2d. each, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

(Now Nearly Out of Print)

BEN JONSON
JOHN KEATS
SIR JOHN SUCKLING
TOM HOOD
THOMAS GRAY
R. L. STEVENSON
SIR WALTER SCOTT
SAMUEL RICHARDSON
THOMAS DE QUINCEY
LEIGH HUNT
LORD MACAULAY
ROBERT SOUTHEY
S. T. COLERIDGE
CHARLES LAMB
MICHAEL DRAYTON
W. SAVAGE LANDOR
SAMUEL PEPYS
EDMUND WALLER
WILKIE COLLINS

JOHN MILTON
WILLIAM COWPER
CHARLES DARWIN
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON
HENRY W. LONGFELLOW
ANDREW MARVELL
ROBERT BROWNING
THOMAS CARLYLE
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY
CHARLES DICKENS
JONATHAN SWIFT
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE
THACKERAY
WILLIAM BLAKE
SIR RICHARD STEELE
ALEXANDER POPE
DOUGLAS JERROLD
FRANCIS BACON
HENRIK IBSEN

CHATTO & WINDUS'S NEW NOVELS.

FRED WHISHAW'S NEW NOVEL.

NEAR THE TSAR, NEAR DEATH.

By FRED WHISHAW, Author of "Mazeppa." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

"A vigorously written novel."—Daily News.

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

OVERDUE. By W. CLARK RUSSELL, Author of "The Wreck of the 'Grosvenor'."

"Will be read with enjoyment. . . . As great a skill and as full a sense of humorous character as Mr. Clark Russell has ever displayed before."—Morning Post.

"Well-rigged with incident and adventure, manned by a charming heroine and a dashing hero, the good ship 'Overdue' is safely bound for the harbour of popularity."—To-Day.

"Breezy" is the word for Mr. Clark Russell always. In his latest story of the sea we have an excellent specimen of that picturesque story-telling which has made him famous. . . . A good sea-story of the kind at which Mr. Clark Russell has no equal. There are many writers, of course, about the sea and seamen; but there is always a gusto, a simplicity, and, above all, a wide knowledge, about this author which marks him off from a newer school."—Vanity Fair.

THE HEART OF A GIRL. By FLORENCE WARDEN. With Eight Illustrations by FRANCES EWAN.

"A volume which is all the better for the illustrations that adorn it is 'The Heart of a Girl,' not that the very delightful young lady needed pictures to help her literary life, for the book would have been excellent without them, but it is all the better for their presence. Miss Warden never seems to write unless she has something really worth reading to tell, and she performs her task with skill, and with an art which is of such nature that you do not have the cleverness of the story thrust in your face."—Pelican.

THE INSTIGATOR. By ERNEST A. TREETON.

"Really thrilling."—Yorkshire Post.

"A model example of this type of work. . . . Mr. Treeton uses his opportunity so well and skillfully that the interest never flags."—Daily News.

THE WILFUL WAY. By HERBERT COMPTON, Author of "The Inimitable Mrs. Massingham."

"Very lively reading. . . . Your interest is never allowed to flag for a moment." "Quite absorbing."—Daily Mail.

THE WOMAN OF MYSTERY. By GEORGES OHNET

Translated by F. BOWEN.

"One of Ohnet's best novels."—Lady's Pictorial.

"Many will read it at a sitting, since not for one moment does the interest flag."—Sketch.

THE POWER OF THE PALMIST. By VIOLET

GUTTENBERG, Author of "Neither Jew nor Greek."

"An excellent novel."—Chic.

"Entertaining, not only by reason of its ruthless attitude towards palmistry, but by the vivid feeling it displays towards the emotional impressionism of the day."—Vanity Fair.

THE MAGIC OF TO-MORROW. By CYRIL SEYMOUR.

"A most effectual time-killer."—Ladies' Field.

"A highly ingenious idea. . . . We were decidedly entertained."—St. James's Gazette.

SEMI-SOCIETY. By FRANK RICHARDSON, Author of "The Man Who Lost his Past."

"It is a clever and well-written book, and essentially of to-day."—Times.

"An amusing and readable tale."—Daily News.

MALLENDER'S MISTAKE. By LIONEL L. PILKINGTON.

"A good strong story. . . . An effective piece of work."—Sheffield Telegraph.

"The story is not only natural and feasible, but well and carefully written. The characters are firmly drawn, the dialogue is vivacious. A novel of incident, in fact, far above the average."—Outlook.

"A vigorous story."—Times.

THE TIDEWAY. By AUSTIN CLARE, Author of "For the Love of a Lady" &c.

"A strong tale of love amid scenes of high domestic interest, and with characters powerfully conceived and splendidly sustained. The general reader will find 'The Tideway' a fascinating book."—Newcastle Journal.

NEW 3s. 6d. NOVELS.

TRUTH. By ÉMILE ZOLA. Translated by E. A. VIZETELLY. Second Edition.

"A magnificent and terrible indictment."—Outlook.

THE MAN WHO LOST HIS PAST. By FRANK

RICHARDSON. With 50 Illustrations by TOM BROWN, R.I.

"One of the funniest books we have read for a long time."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE GATES OF WRATH. By ARNOLD BENNETT, Author of "The Grand Babylon Hotel."

"Thoroughly absorbing from the first page to the last."—Yorkshire Post.

HER LADYSHIP. By T. W. SPEIGHT, Author of "The Mysteries of Heron Dyke."

"The tale is full of action."—Daily Mail.

THE CRICKET A B C. A Black View of the Game. (TWENTY-SIX ILLUSTRATIONS.) By HUGH FIELDING. Demy 8vo. 1s.

"A book for teaching the alphabet and cricket at the same time."—Daily News.

AS WE ARE AND AS WE MAY BE. By SIR WALTER BESANT. Crown 8vo, buckram, gilt top, 6s.

THE STELLAR HEAVENS: An Introduction to the Study of the Stars and Nebulae. By J. ELLARD GOBE, F.R.A.S. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net. [April 23.]

NEW SERIES OF TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, picture cloth, flat backs.

Ainslie's Ju-Ju. By HAROLD BINDLOSS. [April 23.]

The Luck of Roaring Camp; and Sensation Novels Condensed.

By BRET HARTE.

Cavalry Life; and Regimental Legends. By JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

The Queen against Owen. By ALLEN UPWARD.

The Young Master of Hyson Hall. By FRANK STOCKTON. 36 Illus.

The Constable of St. Nicholas. By EDWIN LESTER ARNOLD.

St. Katherine's by the Tower. By SIR WALTER BESANT.

Dora Myrl, the Lady Detective. By MCD. BODKIN, K.C.

Vincent Trill, Detective. By DICK DONOVAN.

Dark Deeds. By DICK DONOVAN.

A Crimson Crime. By GEORGE MANVILLE FENN.

The Red Shirts. By PAUL GAULOT.

The Track of a Storm. By OWEN HALL.

In a Hollow of the Hills. By BRET HARTE.

A Sappho of Green Springs. By BRET HARTE.

Colonel Starbottle's Client. By BRET HARTE.

A Protégée of Jack Hamlin's. By BRET HARTE. With Illustrations.

In London's Heart. By G. R. SIMS.

The Lady from Nowhere. By FERGUS HUME.

Plotter of Paris. By EDMUND MITCHELL.

The Temple of Death. By EDMUND MITCHELL.

Towards the Eternal Snows. By EDMUND MITCHELL.

The Luck of Gerard Ridgely. By BERTRAM MITFORD.

The King's Assegai. By BERTRAM MITFORD.

Maid Marian and Robin Hood. By J. E. MUDDOCK.

His Own Ghost. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

The Waters of Edera. By OUIDA.

A Modern Dick Whittington. By JAMES PATN.

A Country Sweetheart. By DORA RUSSELL.

The Drift of Fate. By DORA RUSSELL.

The Tale of the Serpent. By SUNDOWNER.

Citoyenne Jacqueline. By SARAH TYLER.

Joan, the Curate. By FLORENCE WARDEN.

Sport and Spangles. By BYRON WEBBER.

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, with Marker, 3s. net each.

Condensed Novels. (The Two Series in One.) By BRET HARTE.

[April 23.]

All Sorts and Conditions of Men. By SIR WALTER BESANT.

Walton and Cotton's Complete Angler.

Sketches. By MARK TWAIN.

The Deemster. By HALL CAINE.

The Woman in White. By WILKIE COLLINS.

Under the Greenwood Tree. By THOMAS HARDY.

The Cloister and the Hearth. By CHARLES READE.

"It is Never too Late to Mend." By CHARLES READE.

The Life of the Fields. By RICHARD JEFFERIES.

Men and Books. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

New Arabian Nights. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

The Pooket R. L. S.: Favourite Passages from STEVENSON'S Works.

NEW SIXPENNY BOOKS.

The Dram-Shop. By ÉMILE ZOLA.

Strathmore. By OUIDA.

The Tents of Shem. By GRANT ALLEN.

Griffith Gaunt. By CHARLES READE.

Armada. By WILKIE COLLINS.

Diana Barrington. By B. M. CROKER.

Joseph's Coat. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

The Shadow of the Sword. By ROBERT BUCHANAN.

Children of Gibeon. By SIR W. BESANT.

[Shortly.]

[Shortly.]

[Shortly.]

THE GENTLEMAN'S MAGAZINE. In addition to Stories and Articles upon Subjects in Literature, Science, and Art. "TABLE TALK," by SYLVANUS URBAN, appears regularly. One Shilling Monthly.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1614. Established 1869. London: 11 April 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK	355
REVIEWS.
The Poetical Works of Thomas Traherne, B.D.	359
Sir A. Henry Layard, G.C.B., D.C.L., Autobiography and Letters from his Childhood until his Appointment as H.M. Ambassador at Madrid	360
Poland. A Study of the Land, People and Literature	361
The Eldorado of the Ancients	362
A Study of Metre	363
Holbein's "Ambassadors" Unridicled. The Counts Palatine Otto Henry and Philip, a Key to other Holbeins	364
SHORT NOTICES :
The Book of Months—Thoughts from Maeterlinck—Swords and Plowshares	364
FICTION :
All on the Irish Shore—Rosslyn's Raid and Other Tales—A Girl's Life in a Hunting Country	365
Notes on the Week's Novels	366

ARTICLES.
FICTION AND PROSE	317
Symbolism	368
The Roman Jeremiah	369
Impressions—XXVII. A Night Piece	370
DRAMA :
The Tyranny of Accident. E. K. Chambers	370
ART :
New Englishmen and Italy. C. L. H.	371
SCIENCE :
Between Two Nebulae. C. W. Saleeby	372
CORRESPONDENCE :
"Taken as Read"	373
"More Marc's Nests"	374
"The Light that Failed"	374
Private Copyright in National Manuscripts	374
WEEKLY COMPETITION :
Description of an April Day	375

The Literary Week.

WE note a new departure in the method of publishing sixpenny editions of popular fiction. A third of the cover of a reprint that lies before us is devoted to an appreciation of the book by Lord Rosebery, which ends thus: "I am especially delighted with your children, and think Miss Fane a most fascinating character." The interesting books published during the past week include the following:—

POETS AND DREAMERS: STUDIES AND TRANSLATIONS FROM THE IRISH. By Lady Gregory.

A fascinating and beautiful volume, dedicated to "Some Undergraduates of Trinity College." Lady Gregory draws her material from comparatively recent times as well as from the far past. The volume opens with a sketch of Raftery, the blind poet and fiddler, whose name is known throughout Ireland to all Irish speaking people. Other chapters deal with "West Irish Ballads," "Herb Healing," "Workhouse Dreams," and "Mountain Theology." "Mountain Theology" opens thus: "Mary Glyn lives under Slieve-nan-Or, the Golden Mountain, where the last battle will be fought in the last great war of the world; so that the sides of Gortaveha, a lesser mountain, will stream with blood." The volume concludes with English translations of four plays written in Irish by Dr. Douglas Hyde.

BLIND CHILDREN. By Israel Zangwill.

In a note Mr. Zangwill says: "This is a selection of the better part of the verses that have accumulated in manuscript, or in magazines, journals, and the writer's own books during the last twenty years, and represents, therefore, as many moods. The piece that has precedence as the longest is also the oldest, or rather the youngest." This piece is "Sylvia Poetorum." The dedication, "Ad Unam," opens with these lines:—

Take, Dear, my 'prentice songs,
And—since you cared for one,
"Blind Children," let them all
Share in its blessedness,
Find shelter 'neath its name.

The poems, as the author says, cover a wide range of moods.

CHRISTIANITY AND MODERN CIVILISATION. By William Samuel Lilly.

"Being Some Chapters in European History, with an Introductory Dialogue on the Philosophy of History." A considerable portion of the author's "Chapters in European History," which has long been out of print, has been incorporated in this volume. Other chapters are reprinted from the "Nineteenth Century."

A CORRESPONDENT sends us a delightful cutting from a Scotch newspaper, "which shows," he says, "to what a degree of literary criticism we have attained in these northern latitudes." It appears that an Edinburgh firm has recently issued an edition of Omar Khayyam, concerning which this Scotch newspaper says: "One is inclined to think that the Persian astronomer poet Omar Khayyam has been a diligent student of Shakespeare and Burns; if not, then the literary coincidences are somewhat remarkable." He proceeds: "For example, we have Burns' description of pleasure as like a snow-flake in the river, 'a moment white, then melts for ever'; and Omar uses the same idea under local colour:—

The worldly Hope men set their hearts upon
Turns ashes—or it prospers; and anon,
Like snow upon the desert's dusty face
Lighting a little hour or two—is gone.

Again, in his beautiful song, 'O wert thou in the cauld blast,' Burns says, 'The desert were a Paradise, if thou wert there': and Omar has it:—

Beside me singing in the wilderness—
And wilderness is Paradise enow."

This northern critic finds so many coincidences of a similar kind that he thinks "the Persian Burns" would be an accurate description of our only Omar. The notice concludes: "The work of translation has been done by Mr. Edward Fitzgerald, who has certainly done justice to Omar's lofty theme and still loftier communings."

We do not always welcome collections of fugitive work by writers who in their lives have been content to let such work lie hidden; but no objection can be urged against the pleasant volume "With the Eyes of Youth" (Sampson Low), which contains some hitherto uncollected pieces by William Black. The sketches are so grouped that they have a regular progression and give to some extent an outline of the author's life. The essay which gives the volume its title appeared in the "Fortnightly Review" for August, 1902; it was written in 1898 for an American publication, and was the last thing that Black wrote. It opens in this characteristic way:—

The writer of these lines has seen a few things here and there—the rose-white dawn awakening over Venice, the blue-black waves of the Euxine thundering along to the neck of the Bosphorus, the red sunsets of Egypt, the glamour of the moonlight irradiating the domes and minarets of Stamboul—but never, never, never has he seen anything so beautiful and wonderful as a neglected little bit of coppice lying just outside an insignificant Scotch village.

There follows a sketch, "A Wild Day in '48," which is a recollection of the riots which occurred in Scotland in that year of Continental revolutions—at which time Black was seven years of age:—

Half-frightened glances turned towards the east were a kind of guidance; and in that direction he accordingly wandered, until he came in sight of a crowd—not a beautiful, richly coloured, processional crowd . . . but a black and grumpy and amorphous assemblage of men, silent, in deadly earnest, who at the moment were engaged in tearing down the tall iron railing surrounding Glasgow Green, in order to secure weapons for themselves.

The seven-year-old youngster attacked a bar, but was carried off by "a young Highland lass" into safety. Another sketch is taken from Black's first novel, "David Merle," written when he was nineteen, and now long out of print and forgotten. "David Merle" was a remarkable performance for a lad, and has distinct force of characterisation:—

"John Macaulay, listen to me. It seems to me that naeboddy has a richt to smoke but them who are compelled to think mair than is common to the human frame—such as ministers, doctors, and the like. But for you and me, John, wha are but common people, we have nae real need o' ony sic thing, and it but begets an indolent and lazy disposition o' mind. . . ."

"Verra true, Mr. Merle, but 'tis hard to gie up a habit o' thirty years' standing."

The last sketch is a "Conversation with Carlyle," which opens thus:—

In a somewhat shabbily furnished room (but on the walls there was a large copy of the Berlin picture of Frederick the Great dressed as a drummer-boy; and on the table a number of Frederick's snuff-boxes were strewn about) in a dingy little street in Chelsea, an old man, worn, and tired, and bent, with deeply lined, ascetic features, a firm under-jaw, tufted grey hair, and tufted grey and white beard, and sunken and unutterably sorrowful eyes, returned from the fireplace, where with trembling fingers he had been lighting his long clay pipe, and resumed his seat in front of the reading-desk.

This interview took place after Black had resolutely turned author.

AMONGST the many amazing publications which reach us, one of the most amazing is the "Fiery Cross." To sit innocently in Chancery Lane and read of "the usurper Elizabeth" yielding up her spirit on the 24th March, 1603, "to her God and Judge," is startling enough, but when we are told that present-day Scotsmen are "content submissively to lick the gilded chains that bind them to their English masters," we simply collapse. The notice that all articles intended for the columns of this publication "must be contributed gratis" strikes us as the most sensible thing in it.

MR. QUILLER-COUCH, in his latest "Daily News" article on "Sundry Poets," paused to enquire why appreciative criticism of good work has done so little to popularise it. After naming certain volumes of which he has written, Mr. Quiller-Couch says:—

My eye picks out these books as it travels along the fireside shelf; and I feel sure that many critics must have discerned their excellence. Why have we done so little to get that excellence acknowledged? Are we, perhaps, afraid? Even when a man has arrived at discerning the excellence of a piece of literature produced in his own day he needs some courage to insist upon its importance. He has the quiet assurance of some thousands of years to support him, but all the clamour of the hurrying age to cow him and make him ashamed at the sound of his own voice.

We do not think the critic is in the least afraid; rather he is too uncritical, too ready to acclaim as great what is merely pretty and facile and ephemeral. The prime reason for the failure of good verse to reach the public lies in the fact that the public does not really care for verse; there is no getting away from that. Jingle they will buy, but poetry does not touch them. And a second reason is that they have been to some extent misled. A few years ago there was a distinct revival in verse; poets were discovered once a month. But the public, after nibbling, grew tired. Bubble reputations, if they did not burst, at least were withdrawn from sight. Mr. Quiller-Couch has always, so far as we can remember, praised judiciously, and we are glad to see that he is not content to keep silent concerning what he feels to be true and enduring work.

M. MAETERLINCK has been writing in the "Daily Mail" concerning Monte Carlo and its "Temple of Chance." M. Maeterlinck is always individual, and nearly always mystical. To bring mysticism to Monte Carlo would at first appear to be like carrying gems into a cellar. But M. Maeterlinck, though he may make scoffers smile, leaves with people who happen to have some faculty for abstract thought ideas worth turning over cautiously and with serious attention. He finds the temple of chance, in its externals, "insipidly emphatic and hideously blatant. It suggests the low insolence, the overweening conceit of the flunkey who has grown rich but remains obsequious." In M. Maeterlinck's view the temple of the divinity should have been far otherwise: "He should have been throned in a bare marble palace, severe, simple and colossal, high and vast, cold and spiritual, rectangular and rigid, positive and overwhelming." But M. Maeterlinck's divinity is not the gamblers' divinity. He sees in the won and squandered gold at the tables the concrete possibility which that gold represents. With the cry of "rien ne va plus" he sees this:—

That is to say, the god is about to speak! At this moment an eye that could pierce the easy veil of appearances would distinctly see scattered on the plain green cloth (not actually, then at least potentially, for a single stake is rare, and he who plays of his superfluity to-day, will risk his all to-morrow) a corn-field ripening in the sun a thousand miles away, or again, in other squares, a meadow, a wood, a moonlit country house, a shop in some little market town; a staff of book-keepers and accountants bending over ledgers in their gloomy offices, peasants labouring in the rain, hundreds of workgirls slaving from morn to night in deadly factories, miners in the mine, sailors on their ship; the jewels of debauchery, love, or glory; a prison, a dock-yard; joy, misery, injustice, cruelty, avarice; crimes, privations, tears.

A little later we read:—

While we are making these reflections, the ivory tail slackens its course and begins to hop like a noisy insect over the thirty-seven compartments that allure it. This is the irrevocable judgment.

O strange infirmity of our eyes, our ears and that brain of which we are so proud! O strange secrets of the most elementary laws of this world! From the second at which the ball was set in motion to the second at which it falls into the fateful hole, on the battlefield three yards long, in this childish and mocking form, the mystery of the Universe inflicts a symbolical, incessant, and disheartening defeat upon human power and reason.

The conclusion of all which is that "man knows that he can know nothing." That is the usual conclusion of the gambler, but he arrives at it by processes very different from those of M. Maeterlinck.

Mr. EDMUND GOSSE contributes to the "International Quarterly" a discriminating and appreciative article on Alfred de Vigny. De Vigny has never been widely known in England—less known, Mr. Gosse considers, than any other French writer of the first class. Yet he was "of all the great French poets the one who has assimilated most of the English spirit, and has been influenced most by English poetry." He was, says Mr. Gosse, "a convinced Anglophil, and the writers whom he resembles, in his sublime isolation from the tradition of his own country, are Wordsworth and Shelley, Matthew Arnold and Leopardi. . . . The other poets of France have been picturesque, abundant, gregarious, vehement. Alfred de Vigny was not of their class, but we can easily conceive him among those who, in the Cumberland of a hundred years ago, were murmuring by the running brooks a music sweeter than their own." Mr. Gosse thus sums up his impression of De Vigny's achievement:—

It is not to be pretended that the poetry of Alfred de Vigny is to every one's taste. He was too indifferent to the public, too austere and arrogant in his address, to attract the masses, and to them he will remain perpetually unknown. But he is a writer, in his best prose as well as in the greater part of his scanty verse, who has only to become familiar to a reader susceptible to beauty, to grow more and more beloved. The other poets of his age were fluent and tumultuous; Alfred de Vigny was taciturn, stoical, one who had lost faith in glory, in life, perhaps even in himself. While the flute and the trumpet sounded, his hunter's horn, blown far away in the melancholy woodland, could raise an echo in the heart of no warrior or banqueter. But those who visit Vigny in the forest will be in no hurry to return. He shall entertain them there with such high thoughts and such proud music that they will follow him wherever his dream may take him. . . . And some among them, if they are sincere, will admit that, so far as they are concerned, he is the most majestic poet whom France produced in the rich course of the nineteenth century.

PROF. PHELPS, of Yale University, has discovered such an extraordinary resemblance between M. Maeterlinck's "Monna Vanna" and Browning's "Luria," that he seems to think M. Maeterlinck has been plagiarising. We see no reason to suppose anything of the kind. Criticism by parallel is threadbare.

WE have received from Louisville, U.S.A., a booklet of verse called "When John Bull Comes a-Courtin'" by Mr. Lucien V. Rule. We understand that the book is by way of being a protest against John Bull's supposed faculty of running "at large" amongst his Colonial neighbours. The author writes—

We buy John's books and pauper princes to please our women folks;
But when we poetize he winces, and says "That minstrel croaks."
Well now, we do not make pretension to shine with Shakespeare's set;
But we would like a little mention as minnows in the net.

That "little mention" we cheerfully give.

A MISQUOTATION by a popular author has often proved annoying before, and now Mr. Anstey is called to book by Mr. Walter Herries Pollock. Writing to the "Saturday Review," Mr. Pollock says:—

Some time ago in one of his novels Mr. Anstey was kind enough to speak in the highest terms of my song, "The Devout Lover," which is known to a large public by the exquisitely beautiful musical setting given to it by Miss Maude Valérie White. But, there is always a but, he misquoted the last line by a conveyance, which I should not have dared to incorporate in my own lines, from the greatest of Poets. The last two lines, as I wrote them, ran thus:—

"Burn at her altar Love's sweet frankincense
And worship her in distant reverence."

Mr. Anstey represented the last line, given without the penultimate line, as running thus:—

"And worship her in whispering humbleness," which has neither rhyme, nor in that conjunction reason. Mr. Anstey, when I pointed out the bévue, was most pleasant and courteous in assurance that it should be set right in the next edition. Either there was no next edition or as the best of us may do he forgot all about it.

There the matter might have rested but that the "curst" misquotation has been, is being, and will be, unless this letter stops it, repeated over and over again as the correct version in all kinds of papers, London and provincial, the which have culled it from Mr. Anstey's pages.

We hope Mr. Pollock's letter will "stop it."

"THE WRITER'S YEAR-BOOK" is a publication which gives a list of "500 Places to sell Manuscripts, Photographs and Drawings." Before we reach the list we find three advisory articles on "How to Write for the Press," "Journalism for English and American Women," and "Writing for the Magazines." The advice is of the familiar sort, which is to say that it will not be acted upon. Nothing will induce the amateur writer, for instance, to consider such matters as clearness, conciseness, or the suitability of his work for the papers to which he offers it. Mr. Kyle, on the subject of "Writing for the Magazines," is inclined to be rather angry. We read:—

When you begin to write for the magazines do not expect to be a full-fledged front-cover magnate at once. You may be a big gun by and by, but if you expect to bound into the first rank at once you are an ignorant and conceited fool, and the sooner you adopt a more amusing way of killing time the better. Even if you are a literary genius, a something infinitely superior to the expert journeyman of the literary profession, you will not arrive at once. . . . Because it is an open field, Tom, Dick, and Harry are not qualified to write acceptable "copy" just because they possess pens and paper, and were clever at essay writing at school.

Do even budding authors need telling that a literary genius is "something infinitely superior to the expert journeyman of the literary profession"? Mr. Kyle is not helpful. He says things like this: "Short story writing affords you great scope. . . . Attempt good work and you'll succeed." And so forth. Mr. Kyle's style needs some careful attention.

In the recent discussion with regard to the attitude of critics in their judgment of society plays, one is amazed at the ineptitude displayed in the attempt to define what is or what is not "society dialogue." In no country in the world, except England, would we find the critics questioning an author's right to describe any set or class of persons which he may choose. When a French dramatist introduces, say, a duchess or a politician into one of his works, we do not find writers on the morning papers of Paris wasting long paragraphs in speculations as to the writer's acquaintance with members of the French aristocracy. It is time that this provinciality were dropped.

It is sometimes a good thing to put back the clock, but too much should not be claimed for the possible results. We heard the other day of certain writers whose business it has been to make books, who now propose to institute such a series of lectures as shall make it unnecessary for their hearers to read at all. That would be putting back the clock with a vengeance. There is more hope for Mr. W. B. Yeats's and Miss Florence Farr's renewed experiment in the speaking and chanting of verse. During May Mr. Yeats will lecture, and Miss Farr will speak and chant poems by Shakespeare, Shelley, Keats, Blake, Rossetti, Walt Whitman, Lionel Johnson, R. L. Stevenson, and several living poets, to the accompaniment of a psaltery. So far the experiments have hardly been more than interesting; certainly, at any rate, they have been far from satisfying. But we are glad to hear that they are to be continued.

A NEW series of "booklets with a mission" is shortly to be published under the title of the "Simple Life Series." We gather from a preliminary announcement that "the idea is to produce in a very inexpensive, but tasteful and attractive form, some of the smaller gems of the world's literature which definitely appeal to the higher feelings and the higher reason." "Tolstoy and His Message" comes first, and in the first four volumes to be published is the Rubaiyat of Omar. Rubbing shoulders with Omar comes Shelley, with his "Plea for a Simpler Diet." It is pretty clear that the "Simple Life Series" is not to be didactic all in one direction.

Bibliographical.

MESSRS. ROUTLEDGE, it appears, are to follow up their recent reprint of the romances of G. P. R. James with reprints on a similar scale of the romances of James Grant and Mayne Reid. They have, I should say, every encouragement to do this. Though the higher criticism is contemptuous of Reid and Grant, those writers contrive to be read still. When Reid died, there was naturally a recrudescence of his popularity, and several of his books were re-issued, during 1890-97, in response to a natural demand. In 1898 there was a further spurt, four more tales being re-issued by Messrs. Routledge in that year, and one by Messrs. Downey. In 1898 also, there was quite a revival in "Grants," of which, during the years immediately preceding, there had been but few reprints. In the year named, Messrs. Routledge began to publish an "Aide-de-Camp" edition of Grant, which ran into 1899 as well. Twelve or thirteen stories were reproduced, including sixpenny editions of "The Scottish Cavalier" and "One of the Six Hundred"; and two volumes of short stories were reprinted—"The Royal Regiment" and "The Scots Brigade." It was a little surprising in 1898-99 to find new life given to such tales as "Oliver Ellis," "Mary of Lorraine," "Derval Hampton," "Jack Challoner," and "The Lord Hermitage," which are not precisely of Grant's best.

Another enterprise of Messrs. Routledge is the inclusion of Longfellow's translation of the "Divine Comedy" in their series of "Autograph Classics." It is scarcely three years since they issued the work at three-and-six. In 1890 they brought out two editions of it—one at twelve-and-six, the other at one shilling; then came editions at three-and-six in 1891, two shillings in 1892, two-and-six (in the Lubbock series) in 1893, and at a shilling again in 1894. This would seem to suggest that Longfellow's version of the "Commedia" runs Cary's very close in popularity. Five years ago Messrs. Cassell reproduced Cary with Doré's illustrations, while Messrs. Bell issued the work at a shilling. There had been a three-andsixpenny edition in 1897. Plumptre's translation was successfully revived in 1899 by Messrs. Isbister. These three versions may be said to hold the field, though they have not frightened away such translators as C. E. Norton, T. W. Parsons, Paget Toynbee, and so forth.

I see announcement made of a book on "The Island of Formosa," by Mr. J. W. Davidson, U.S. Consul there. No doubt it will bring matters down to date. An interesting book was Mr. W. A. Pickering's "Pioneering in Formosa: Recollections of Adventures among Mandarins, Wreckers, and Head-Hunting Savages," published in 1898. G. L. Mackay's "From Far Formosa," a third edition of which came out in 1900, is known to me only by name.

The bibliographers of the future may, I think, safely attribute to Mr. Percy Fitzgerald the little book on "John Forster, by One of His Friends," just published by Messrs. Chapman and Hall. There is something characteristic of Mr. Fitzgerald's writing method in the frequency with which, in the earlier pages, the word "pleasant" is used. But soon come references to the author's friendship and correspondence with Dickens, his long connection with "Household Words," his "Life of Sterne," his little play called "The William Simpeon" (played at the Haymarket thirty years ago), and "a novel of mine, 'No. 75 Brooke Street,'"—which clinches the business, causing Mr. Fitzgerald to stand revealed. (It may be noted by the way that Mr. Fitzgerald anticipated Mr. Molloy's "Sailor King" so long ago as 1884, when he brought out his "Life and Times of William IV.") In the course of the present work Mr. Fitzgerald represents his mother as introducing into an after-dinner speech the line—

And e'en unmoved hears china fall.

But one feels that the lady could not have been guilty of thus misquoting Pope.

Mr. Harry Roberts, who has made a collection of "The Sayings of Jesus," just issued by Gay and Bird, appears, from his preface, to imagine that he is a pioneer in this matter. But it is only two or three years since Lord Northbrook produced "Christ's Teaching in His Own Words," for the use of the natives of India; in 1894 Mr. J. W. Mackail brought out a collection of Christ's sayings "as recorded by the Evangelists"; in the same year there was a book of "selected sayings," called "The Sure Resting-Place"; and these had been preceded in their turn, in 1893, by Mr. J. C. Walker's "Teaching of Jesus in His Own Words." Farther back than that we need not go.

"The plots of great operas," says a contemporary, "are unknown to the ordinary man." Well, if that is so, it is not from lack of activity on the part of the compilers. In 1896 there was published the eleventh edition of a book called "The Opera Glass," which professed to set forth the "plots" of no fewer than 119 operas. That work must surely have had a considerable circulation. But it by no means stands alone. Twenty years ago an American work, called "Operas: their Writers and their Plots," was put upon the English market. Then, in 1891, came a little manual called "Stories of the Operas," which was followed in 1897 by another importation from America—"Stories of Famous Operas," by H. A. Grueber.

This same Mr. Grueber, by the way, is the author of "Stories of the Wagnerian Operas," circulated over here in 1895. Prior to that we had had "The Wagnerian Drama," by H. E. Krehbiel (1891). After Mr. Grueber came A. Larnac with his "Wagner's Music Dramas" in 1898, and "Stories from Wagner" (from America) in 1899. Just now the run is upon books about the "Ring des Nibelungen," of which one, by Kobbe, came out in 1893, and another, by Irvine, in 1897.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Rediscovered Poet.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF THOMAS TRAHERNE, B.D. Now
First Published from the Original MS. Edited by Bertram Dobell. (Published by the Editor.)

Is there any end to the fecundity of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries? "The Poetical Works of Thomas Traherne," edited and published by Mr. Bertram Dobell, add another name to those of Herbert, Vaughan, and Crashaw. The "find" is undoubtedly a remarkable one; though Mr. Dobell, like most discoverers, is inclined to magnify his discovery beyond bounds, and assigns to his very own poet a rank which will scarce meet, we think, with final acceptance. The discovery is the more curious because the poems have never been published at all. They were picked up on a second-hand bookstall, in manuscript, by Mr. W. T. Brooke, who sold them to the late Dr. Grosart. Both men thought the poems (which were anonymous) to be by Henry Vaughan, and Grosart was actually preparing to include them in an edition of Vaughan when he died. They then passed into Mr. Dobell's hands, who soon doubted the ascription to Vaughan. Through Mr. Brooke, a likeness was discovered to some poems in a volume ultimately found to be by Thomas Traherne. Traherne, it was ascertained, had published two other books. One was prose, the other a poem; and this poem ("Christian Ethicks") was finally encountered among the MSS. in a shorter form, with some variations. That completed the evidence.

Traherne was a clergyman of the middle seventeenth century; and all that here concerns us is the nature and quality of his poems. They are religious poems, modelled as to form on Herbert's "Temple." That he was acquainted with Herbert Mr. Dobell admits, but he denies that the poems show any acquaintance with Vaughan. The wish is father to the belief, we think; for to admit acquaintance with Vaughan is to rob Traherne's best poems of the complete originality which it is Mr. Dobell's object to claim for them. We have ourselves come to a quite other conclusion; even as we dissent from many other of the claims which Mr. Dobell advances on Traherne's behalf. But the first duty is to recognise that a number of the poems show fine poetic quality. There is, in fact, to our mind, a clear dividing line in the book with regard to merit. It opens with a series of poems on childhood, which fully justify enthusiasm; but in the poems which follow there is a striking change—not to say diminution—of poetic quality. Now it is precisely in those poems on childhood that we cannot but perceive what seems the influence of Vaughan.

In that first section there is a strong metaphysical quality which is all Traherne's own, and distinguishes him from either Herbert or Vaughan. The poems are strenuously thoughtful. He has nothing of Herbert's fancy; there is seldom an image or an analogy. But quickening the metaphysic thought, and making the abstract concrete, there is a breath of poetic emotion which has somewhat of Herbert, somewhat of Vaughan, yet is Traherne's own, and not that of either. A beautiful example is the opening poem, which shows Traherne quite at his best. From this, "The Salutation," we quote the opening and concluding stanzas:—

These little limbs,
These eyes and hands which here I find,
These rosy cheeks wherewith my life begins,
Where have ye been? behind
What curtain were ye from me hid so long,
Where was, in what abyss, my speaking tongue?

When silent I
So many thousand thousand years
Beneath the dust did in a chaos lie,
How could I smiles or tears,
Or lips, or hands, or eyes, or ears perceive?
Welcome ye treasures which I now receive.

New-burnisht joys,
Which yellow gold or pearl excel!
Such sacred treasures are the limbs in boys,
In which a soul doth dwell;
Their organised joints and azure veins
More wealth include than all the world contains.

A stranger here
Strange things doth meet, strange glories see;
Strange treasures lodg'd in this fair world appear,
Strange all and new to me;
But that they mine should be, who nothing was,
That strangest is of all, yet brought to pass.

This is extremely fine; the thought strikingly bold, and winged by a certain fervour of delight. It is alone enough to show that Mr. Dobell has had memorable good fortune, which other students and searchers of the past well may envy. In the succeeding poem the resemblance to Vaughan is stronger, both in occasional cast of expression, and still more in the nature of the central idea. The opening line, even Mr. Dobell admits, directly recalls Vaughan's reference to—

Those early days when I
Shined in mine angel infancy.

When this is so reinforced by the character of the general conception, as it is in Traherne's "Wonder," one cannot but draw the inference:—

How like an Angel came I down!
How bright are all things here!
When first among His works I did appear
O how their Glory me did crown!
The world resembled His Eternity,
In which my soul did walk;
And everything that I did see
Did with me talk.

A native health and innocence
Within my bones did grow,
And while my God did all his Glories show,
I felt a vigour in my sense
That was all Spirit. I within did flow
With seas of life like wine;
I nothing in the world did know
But 'twas divine.

The streets were paved with golden stones,
The boys and girls were mine,
Oh how did all their lovely faces shine!
The sons of men were holy ones,
In joy and beauty they appeared to me,
And everything which here I found,
While like an angel I did see,
Adorned the ground.

Cursed and devised proprieties,
With envy, avarice,
And fraud, the fiends which spoil even Paradise,
Flew from the splendour of mine eyes.
And so did hedges, ditches, limits, bounds,
I dreamed not aught of those,
But wandered over all men's grounds,
And found repose.

Proprieties themselves were mine,
And hedges ornaments;
Walls, boxes, coffers, and their rich contents,
Did not divide my joys, but all combine.
Clothes, ribbons, jewels, laces, I esteemed
My joys by others worn:
For me they all to wear them seemed
When I was born.

This, and the preceding poem from which we also cited stanzas, are (we think) Traherne's best. Such a line as "The sons of men were holy ones" suggests Vaughan at his most characteristic. On the other hand, in "Oh, how did all their lovely faces shine!" and elsewhere in these poems of childhood, there is something which curiously and strikingly anticipates the manner of Blake. Even from these chosen stanzas, however (which necessarily show the poet mostly at his best), it will be seen that Traherne does not always sustain himself at such a height. More often than Herbert himself, he lapses into flat prose, redeemed only by the thought. Nor does he seem to move quite natively in verse: too frequently, it will be noticed, there are stiff and awkward inversions, to get rhyme or metre. It is in the sequent poem, "Eden," that he most plainly builds on Vaughan:—

A learned and a happy ignorance
Divided me
From all the vanity,
From all the sloth, care, pain, and sorrow that advance
The madness and the misery
Of men. No error, no distraction I
Saw soil the earth or overcloud the sky.
I knew not that there was a serpent's sting
Whose poison shed
On men, did overspread
The world; nor did I dream of such a thing
As sin, in which mankind lay dead.
They all were brisk and living wights to me,
Yea, pure and full of immortality.
• • • • •
Only what Adam in his first estate,
Did I behold;
Hard silver and dry gold
As yet lay under ground; my blessed fate
Was more acquainted with the old
And innocent delights which he did see
In his original simplicity.

The whole of the poem from which these stanzas are taken is, in truth, simply an expansion in idea of Vaughan's exquisite poem already mentioned. When it is considered along with the two previous poems and the following poem, "Innocence," it becomes difficult to evade the conclusion that throughout the series Traherne is playing variations upon the theme of this and Vaughan's other lovely poem on childhood. In a subsequent poem on a different theme, in the present book, we find—

My contemplation dazzles in the end
Of all I comprehend;

and we are at once reminded of Vaughan's phrase in one of those two childhood poems:—

Mine eye
Dazzles at it, as at Eternity.

When we pass from this section of poems on childhood to the second section, there is a marked change in Traherne. Two poems, "The Preparative" and "The Vision," retain the former quality with an increase of the metaphysical element. But thereafter the metaphysical element becomes knottily predominant, while the poetic quality, the charm, the rapture, if not absent, are insufficiently present. The verse has lost its wing, exactly when the additional weight of metaphysic thought needed a stronger wing. We have not room for further quotation, but the fact must strike a careful reader. And we must needs draw the inference. It is this.

Traherne is a highly thoughtful and metaphysical poet, without corresponding emotional power—insufficiently a poet, in fact. But in one group of poems, where (apparently) he had the advantage of drawing inspiration from Vaughan, he rose beyond himself, and attained striking poetic quality. It is not (save at moments) the quality of Vaughan, but his own. He has not the supreme and passionless passion of Vaughan, like that intense motion of the blue sky which seems motionless. But he has his own emotional charm, sometimes (we have said) singularly suggesting Blake. He is unequal, he has not poetry at command, he has no technique, apart from his inspired moments. Save in moments, he lacks the great magic. But there remains a handful of poetry admirable, original, of a single and captivating sweetness, overcoming by force of inspiration the lack of native instinct for verse. And Mr. Dobell's is the most remarkable discovery of recent years.

Layard's Autobiography.

SIR A. HENRY LAYARD, G.C.B., D.C.L., AUTOBIOGRAPHY AND LETTERS FROM HIS CHILDHOOD UNTIL HIS APPOINTMENT AS H.M. AMBASSADOR AT MADRID. Edited by the Hon. William N. Bruce, with a Chapter on his Parliamentary Career by the Right Hon. Sir Arthur Otway. 2 vols. (John Murray).

PRACTICALLY, the autobiographic portion of this lengthily titled volume extends, with breaks filled in by letters, to Layard's embarkation on the Nineveh explorations. It covers, that is to say, the period of his earlier life. With his return to England after the first series of excavations at Nineveh, the autobiography, virtually at an end before, ceases entirely; and there is little more in the book. A final chapter by Sir Arthur Otway reviews in customary fashion Layard's parliamentary career. The space between is occupied by a number of letters which represent his artistic interests and energies during this same parliamentary period—in a sufficiently interesting way, for Layard with pen in hand is always alive. But the cream of the volumes is the autobiography.

It was well worth publishing, comparatively brief portion of his career though it includes. During that early period Layard saw many men, many lands, many peoples—interesting men, interesting lands, interesting peoples; and to all his experiences he brings an unflagging energy of enjoyment which he has the art of communicating to the reader. With a quite natural and unaffected style, he holds attention by his own vivid character, imparted to all he relates. The Huguenot descent of his father, an ex-official in Ceylon, had doubtless something to do with this audacious energy. At three years old, introduced to a lioness in the Jardin des Plantes, he took the tawny lady's cub in his arms, while brother Frederic howled dismally beside the appalled and amazed nurse. At school in Moulins, he was plainly a Tartar. Bullied by his companions as a John Bull and a heretic, snubbed by the masters as a rebel, he allowed himself to be made ringleader in a revolt against the tyrannical writing-master. At the fixed moment, the master's back being turned, Harry slung a leaden inkstand at him. The astonished master faced round on a row of studious boys, and the betrayed ringleader sitting in solitary guilt. The confounded Harry was dragged out and thrashed on the spot. In Swiss or Florentine school he defied rule and learned what he pleased; but, be it said, in both he was beloved by the master. Meantime his father was teaching him to love literature and art, while he was receiving the education of contact with eminent men, which played a powerful part in his life.

At Florence he was familiar with Walter Savage Landor. The elder Layard, a stern Tory, short-sightedly introduced his son to the "Imaginary Conversations": on such a lad they had the natural effect of indoctrinating him with "those radical and democratic opinions which I sturdily professed even when a boy":—

The grand figure and powerful head of Walter Savage Landor, his sonorous voice, when he impressed upon me the beauty of the old Greek language, and the importance of its acquisition in order to speak and write good English, as he was often in the habit of doing, are still present to my memory. Many years after he addressed an Ode to me, which is published amongst his poetical works.

Another Florentine friend was Seymour Kirkup, known for his illustrations of the "Divina Commedia," and perhaps still better as the discoverer of the portrait of Dante ascribed to Giotto, in the Bargello at Florence. An intense Dante student, he was specially valuable to young Layard for his wealth of knowledge regarding the ancient Florence and his memories of illustrious men:—

Kirkup's library was famous for its unique collection of ancient books and treatises on magic and the black arts, of which he was an ardent student. He came to be a firm believer in the supernatural, and in all the mysteries of spirit-rapping, table-turning, and the various impostures which were at the time practised upon the weak and credulous. . . . He fell into the hands, in his old age, of a mother and her daughters, one of whom was a very beautiful creature named Regina. . . . She was easily thrown into, or feigned, a mesmeric sleep, and . . . communicated to her willing dupe messages from the other world—chiefly from Dante and the poet's contemporaries. . . . It is scarcely necessary to say that they were, for the most part, the feeble echoes of what she had heard from Kirkup himself. . . . His own appearance corresponded to the dirt, untidiness, and neglect of his dwelling. His clothes were worn almost to the last thread, and seemed scarcely to hold together. His long white locks hung over his shoulders. His sharply chiselled features, hook nose, and bright, restless eyes gave him the aspect of one who practised the black arts. . . . The street-boys pointed to him as the stregon—the magician. Hawthorne has given a lifelike sketch of him in that character in his "Transformation."

So surrounded was young Layard by art, that over his bed in the palace where he lived hung the altar-piece by Filippino Lippi, now in the National Gallery. It still witnesses to his pugnacity, showing a damaged portion caused by Layard's shoes, which he flung at his brother's head.

Such a training promised ill for the legal studies which he afterwards began with his uncle, Mr. Austen; and at Mr. Austen's house he met eminent men who further unsettled him. Benjamin Disraeli had been that gentleman's legal pupil too, and still visited him:—

I well remember 'the first time I saw Benjamin Disraeli. I must have been between six and seven years old. My Aunt had taken me with her to call upon his mother in Bloomsbury Square. Mrs. Austen asked after "Ben," and was told that he was taking a boxing lesson. He was sent for, and came into the drawing-room in his shirt-sleeves, and wearing his boxing-gloves.

During Layard's legal studies, he met Disraeli constantly:—

He excited my wonder—perhaps my admiration—by his extraordinary and foppish dress. He wore waistcoats of the most gorgeous colours and the most fantastic patterns, with much gold embroidery, velvet pantaloons, and shoes adorned with red rosettes.

He snubbed young Layard, who thought him conceited. Once Layard expressed his admiration for Disraeli's description of the orange-groves of Corfu, and asked whether he still thought it the most beautiful spot in the world. "He replied, with a mocking laugh, that he really did not know what he had written, having written so much, nor could he remember whether or not there were orange-groves in the Ionian islands." A quite characteristic bit of Disraelian affectation. He had written most of "Vivian Grey" at the Austens' house, helped by Mrs. Austen, a brilliant woman. One of Layard's recollections is of Disraeli reciting his "Revolutionary Epic" in bombastic style:—

When he had left the room, Samuel Warren, who was an excellent mimic, sent the company into fits of laughter by imitating his voice and manner, and reciting a number of heroic verses which might have been taken from the Epic itself.

When both were in Parliament, Dizzy made generous amends to Layard for the fopperies of Disraeli the younger. Layard soon resolved to try his legal fortunes in Ceylon, and journeyed towards it by way of Persia and the East. It ended in his settling at Constantinople, employed by Sir Stratford Canning in unofficial diplomacy. His picture of the terrible Ambassador, and the way he bullied the Turkish officials, is admirable, but too diffuse for quotation. Lifelike are his sketches of the Turkish officials themselves, some of whom were his personal friends. But for one anecdote of his chosen companion, Alison, we must make room. Alison was doing business with the Grand Vizir; when that personage suddenly rose and began to say his prayers:—

He concluded them with the usual curse—very audibly and significantly uttered—upon all giaour or infidels, and went through the motion of spitting over his right and left shoulders to show his horror of them; he then . . . renewed the conversation as though nothing had occurred. After a short interval Alison left the divan, and going into a corner of the room, began to repeat in Turkish an extempore prayer, in which he invoked similar curses upon the followers of Islam. The Pasha jumped up in a violent passion . . . Alison very quietly replied that, like the Pasha himself, he had only performed a duty by saying his prayers at that particular hour, and that he had no doubt that the denunciations they contained against Mohammedanism were as much a matter of form, and of as little significance, as the curses which his Highness had a short time before launched against those who professed the Christian faith.

After a period during which he rendered valuable, though informal service to Sir Stratford Canning as a diplomatic agent, Layard at last carried out his long-cherished desire to explore the site of the ancient Assyrian capital. The result was, that one dismal London day, a sallow, ascetic-looking young painter of Italian parentage saw carried in through the swing doors of the British Museum "A winged bull from Nineveh"; and prophesied how—

School-foundations in the act
Of holiday, three files compact,
Shall learn to view thee as a fact
Connected with that zealous tract,
"Rome, Babylon, and Nineveh."

There, as we have said, the autobiography really ends; and there, with his fame assured, and all fear of legal drudgery at an end, we may leave this record of a brilliant and restlessly energetic personality.

Poland.

POLAND. A STUDY OF THE LAND, PEOPLE AND LITERATURE.
By George Brandes. (Heinemann. 12s. net.)

THERE is perhaps no national literature so little known in Europe as the Polish, no national character so little illumined for us by accessible evidence as the Poles'. We therefore welcome Dr. George Brandes's "Impressions of Poland," now issued in a translation. To help combat the sluggish indifference to modern foreign literature, that has become not a little marked in England of late years, we trust that our readers will make a point of seeing Dr. Brandes' "Poland." They will be repaid.

His peculiar value as a travelled critic is well displayed in the book before us. He unites to great open-mindedness and sympathy of temperament a keen and highly-trained judgment. Add to these gifts something of the journalist's clever versatility and lightness of touch, and you have a critic whose name stands in Europe for the modern spirit of cosmopolitan culture, a spirit which interprets and champions all youthful and powerful innovating talent in a generation, against the settled traditions of academical classicism.

It is, indeed, particularly delightful to hear a voice so penetrating and sympathetic as his raised in defence of an oppressed and "partitioned" nation which succumbed a century ago to the force of three great Empires united to despoil it. The cause of Poland, so popular in England in the middle of the century, is to-day regarded generally as lost. It seems impossible that Russia, Germany, and Austria should ever relax their grip on a country so fruitful, a country whose population compared with theirs is so relatively small. But stranger things have happened in history, and it may be that a day will come when the strange conglomeration of races that make up the Austrian Empire will fall asunder, and Russia and Germany may bite off more than they can chew, when a redistribution of peoples and new federated autonomous groups may arise. It has been charged against Poland that her fate was due not less to the unbridled individualism of the Poles than to her lack of natural frontier and her lack of political instinct. In truth, Poland, as Dr. Brandes remarks, had inherited a vicious political constitution, and she might eventually have baffled her enemies if the bulk of her people had not been too long held under by the upper class, and kept in the position of feudal serfs. Brandes states the position very ably:—

The weak point in the State organization was that the nobility (Szlachta) was only a class of from 800,000 to 1,000,000 men in a population of from 8,000,000 to 13,000,000, and that the ruling class, after having realised its ideal of freedom and vitality, stood still in a dead conservatism. Until the middle of the eighteenth century, society was immovable, because the nobility regarded every reform as an attack upon their freedom, and enthusiastically upheld not only the free choice of a King, which had degenerated into an actual auction of the crown to the highest bidder, but also the liberum veto—that is the right of every single member of the Diet to prevent any enactment by his protest.

In 1795 came the third and last partition. There was no longer any Kingdom of Poland. But there was still a Polish people—a people who had heroic, chivalrous, brilliant, useless qualities enough, but very few of the useful, civic virtues. It was an enthusiastic and unpractical people, noble-minded and untrustworthy, pomp-loving and volatile, vivacious and thoughtless, a people who despised severe and fatiguing labour, and loved all intense and delicate, sensuous and intellectual enjoyments, but above all, who worshipped independence to the point of insanity, freedom to the extent of the liberum veto, and who even now, when they had lost independence and freedom, had remained faithful to their old love.

It was a credulous and confiding martial people, always ready to risk their lives upon a promise, which no one thought of keeping.

The picture that Dr. Brandes draws of Polish life under Russian rule to-day is a sad but not a hopeless picture. For the extreme severity and repressive sternness of the Russian autocracy has, naturally, tended to consolidate Polish national interests and purely Polish feeling, and the nation lives a subterranean life, compounded of memories and longings, a ghostly life more powerful still than the actual life dictated to it by its Russian overseers. Of course the author as a passing visitor is, as it were, feeling the pulse of a suffering people and has had little time to study the significance of the present generation's changing symptoms. But if his experience be typical, the Poles are to-day almost as intensely anti-Russian in feeling as the Poles of two generations ago when the rebellion of 1863 burst. It seems to be admitted on all sides that the Poles under Austria's comparatively mild rule have retained in far less a degree the passionate love of their nationality than the Poles who are subject to Russia.

The last hundred pages of "Poland" are devoted by Dr. Brandes to a study of the Romantic Literature of Poland in the nineteenth century. Though the meaning of this literature is ably summarised by the Danish critic, we must own to a certain disappointment. Brandes as a champion of Realism against the dispossessed school of Romanticism that played its part throughout Europe, and has been replaced by the succeeding movements, is perhaps not quite fair towards certain writers. He rightly says: "There is only one future for Poland's literature, after its days of Romanticism are over, and that is to become a modern, a living expression of the life of our own time." But his remark on Sienkiewicz's "The Deluge" betrays a certain bias: "I am sorry to say that of late years he has been absorbed in the production of endless historical novels, in the style of the elder Dumas, which have made his name widely popular, and produce a large income." "The Deluge" is a historical picture of high merit, and it may be doubted whether Sienkiewicz could have turned his great talent to better account than in writing this national epic. It is quite true that the time for Romanticism is over, and we had hoped that Dr. Brandes would have devoted a chapter to the contemporary Polish authors who have turned away from the Byronic tradition, and who have produced, as has Madame Orzescho, excellent imaginative fiction, modern in its tendency. In the absence of great figures the work of the minor men has particular significance. We should like to have had from Brandes some analysis of Zeromski's and Sieroszewski's work, but their names are not even mentioned. It is also a pity that the publisher could not have arranged for the few specimen translations Brandes gives from Mickiewicz and Slowacki to have been rendered direct from the original Polish. The translator has probably done his best at rendering literally the German, or the Danish versions? No translator's name is given on the title-page. A score of portraits of famous representative Poles would have greatly enriched the volume.

The Russians say that Poland deserves her fate; in reality they cannot forgive her for the days when the Empire of the Slavs seemed likely to pass into Poland's keeping. Poland has, however, long since expiated her sins, and Dr. Brandes has put this thought into most eloquent words:—

Passing through the side wing of the great Kremlin palace at Moscow, which contains the armoury (Oruscheinaya Palata), we see, in the lower storey, twenty-two marble busts of Polish Kings and distinguished Poles; in the storey above, in the large round hall, the Polish throne, and, near by, the crown worn by the last King of Poland, Stanislaus Augustus, and finally, in the adjoining room (opposite Charles XII.'s sedan chair, taken at the battle of Poltawa), sixty Polish banners, captured from 1831 to 1863, with Polish inscriptions, torn by bullets, and to the right of these, on the floor, a beautifully made close casket. In this casket is deposited the constitution of the 3rd of May 1791. Poland's patent of nobility among the people of Europe has become an object in a museum. . . . How strange it must be for a Pole, with any national feeling, to see the great men of his country, the insignia which were the symbols of the dignity of his fatherland as an independent power, its ensigns with the white eagle, nay, even the Magna Charta, which his people, in the most supreme moment of its life, formed for its future, and which was rightfully never displaced, exhibited here in the imperial palace of a foreign capital, as curiosities for the amusement of spectators! It must be like reading one's own name on a tombstone.

Yes, Poland, thou art the great symbol. The symbol of pinioned freedom whose neck is trodden upon, symbol of those who lack any outlook, yet hope against all probability in spite of all.

A German in Ophir.

THE ELDORADO OF THE ANCIENTS. By Dr. Carl Peters. With Maps and Illustrations, mostly by Tennyson Cole. (Pearson. 21s. net.)

For some years past those who stand by what Mr. Gladstone called "the impregnable rock of Holy Scripture" have rejoiced in geographical discoveries which located the biblical Ophir in South Africa with tolerable certainty.

Now comes Dr. Peters with a bulky volume in which it is shown "that the Ophir of the time of Solomon was the country between the Lower Zambesi and the Limpopo river." The base of his evidence is the record of an expedition made by him in 1899-1900 with the view of acquiring in Macombe's country—known in fable as Monomotapa—an auriferous Tom Tiddler's ground. We assume the book to be a translation for two small but persuasive reasons: first, because the name of Bishop Smythies, which Dr. Peters has disagreeable cause to remember with all accuracy, is misprinted; and secondly, because a passage supposed to be cited from Dr. Theal's "Portuguese in South Africa" is in reality only a paraphrase of the doctor's words.

Dr. Peters expressly alludes to the loss of his commission in 1896 on a charge of misusing his official power in German East Africa—a colony which owes its existence to his enterprise—and therefore it is no breach of good manners to say that our first curiosity in his book was directed to the revelation of himself, which could hardly fail to be made in the course of more than 400 pages. The revelation is forthcoming, and not wholly displeasing. Dr. Peters is perhaps at pains to show himself human and humorous. In December, 1900, for instance, he is on the Zambesi, and in one day shoots "eight crocodiles, six hippopotami, three ducks and two river-hens," but between whiles he is reading "Bleak House." He has a way of throwing over himself a grey veil of philosophy, half of Schopenhauer, half of Buddha, which becomes him very well. Scenery enchants him; he is erudite, civilised, but feels brotherly to the black when the black is Nature's gentleman. But the man is hard, and his fit brain is horridly aware that the fittest survive because their interests do not coincide with those of the unfit. His approval of the tyrannous Boer laws for blacks in the Transvaal, and his suggestion of a hut tax of "not less than £5," show plainly enough that Schopenhauer had more to teach him than a cynical quatrain about an appeal to the stomach being the passport to the heart of mankind. A little passage like the following speaks volumes for the pioneering conscience. On July 11, 1899, Dr. Peters had sent Herr Blöcker to Sherele "to examine the stone pillar there, of which the natives spoke so much." On Herr Blöcker's return he informed Dr. Peters, without the latter apparently feeling any dissatisfaction with him for an unwarrantable trespass—that the pillar at Sherele was of diorite. . . . It was apparently held in veneration by the natives, as it was fenced round; and when he had begun to dig it up in order to find out whether it was of natural or artificial origin, the natives had interposed with cries and threatening gestures.

We found the animated account of the tribe and personality of the great Chief Macombe, from whom Dr. Peters obtained concessions, the most interesting item in his book. Macombe governs the Makalanga—a name which means "Sons of the Great Sun." "They, therefore, have the same name as the ancient Inkas of Peru;" and Dr. Peters adds that "they have a stronger influx of Asiatic blood than any other nation which I know." Among them is a priestess, called Quarra Quate, who serves a god who dwells in the earth and owns all the fires in the country. This woman, whose house Dr. Peters saw, is actually believed by the aborigines to be "about six thousand years of age." When she shows herself "no red colour must be seen anywhere: the sacred colour is black."

Dr. Peters accomplished his commercial task in Macombe's country by July 23, 1899, and was soon among the ruins in Inyangana:—

Very often walls stood in a circle like the mouths of our wells, built of schist or granite and filled with rocks of another kind. Again and again we encountered quadrangular and round stone walls, evidently the remains of human dwellings. Sometimes what we saw seemed to have some meaning; then again it seemed to me as if we were entering a country in which a number of madmen had dwelt. . . . I asked . . . what this all meant.

"Ghosts have done this," was the reply of his native companions. That, of course, was hardly a solution, and if we had been Dr. Peters we should have turned back and consulted the only lady in the world who could revise Ussher's chronology. He did not turn back, however, but journeyed into the heart of Manicaland, and thence into the Sabi region.

We have no space to follow Dr. Peters in his learned disquisition on Ophir. A sentence will show his ground argument: "It stands to reason that an Eldorado, from which a single expedition, lasting three years, returned to Jerusalem with a mass of gold weighing 420 talents . . . must be indicated to-day by unassailable archaeological remains." The root of the name Ophir "written in English is A.F.R.," and this word has perhaps a connection with the name of Mt. Fura, which signifies "a mine." But when the material conditions required in an Ophir answering to the biblical references are sought for, Macombe's country springs into sudden glory. We see in the Makalanga the Punic blood, we see in their earth-god the Baal who enraged Elijah. Ruins are there and mines are there, and Dr. Peters has picked up a phallus. Macombe's country has added a chapter to the Bible. Dr. Peters has read that chapter and proven himself thereby one of Nature's chosen bookworms.

For Poets.

A STUDY OF METRE. By T. S. Omond. (Grant Richards.)

IN this book Mr. Omond takes up at greater length, and in a fuller and more extended form, a subject which he has already treated in more casual way. Particularly one remembers a pamphlet on English metre which he published some years ago, and which contained, in effect, the pith of his present book. Writers on English metre are nowadays curiously numerous, where once scarce anyone thought the subject worth handling; or perhaps there was more diffidence. If so, it was a commendable diffidence. Most present speculations are more complex than valuable. Of all living writers on the subject, there is none whose views seem to us so sound yet independent as Mr. Omond's. Among previous writers the two who have, we think, most anticipated him are Sidney Lanier and Coventry Patmore; but especially Coventry Patmore. The essay on English Metrical Principle which is appended to the collected edition of that author's poems has never received due recognition, though (as he complained) some of its results were adopted without recognition. Mr. Omond's is the first allusion to it we have seen of late years. This was partly the poet's own fault. He failed to recognise the inherent difficulty and obscurities of his own thesis, so that acute readers may well fail to grasp his whole drift. We are doubtful if Mr. Omond has grasped it: certainly Patmore was before him to a further degree than one would conceive from the terms of his reference.

Mr. Omond's great merit is that he discards totally the attempt to find a classic basis or analogy for our metre, and approaches it de novo, seeking its principles within itself. Nor does he insist unduly on the undoubted musical analogies, to the extent of attempting an actual musical notation, like Lanier and his American followers. He dismisses accent as a basis of English metre, and declares that its basis is wholly temporal. That is, a metrical line is a matter of a certain understood time; and it is built up, not from a certain number of syllables, nor even a number of accents, but from a certain number of units which are themselves time-units. Accent does indeed come in as a means of measuring time; but though usual, it is not invariable, not basically indispensable. An accent may be and sometimes is missing, without affecting the metrical length of the line. (That is, the time, the temporal length, remains unaltered.) In so far, Mr. Omond's conclusions were anticipated, more or less nearly, by Patmore. But he has pushed them to further results which have not been anticipated by any writer we have read, and with which we cordially agree. He shows that syllables may be omitted to an almost indefinite extent in a line, without affecting its metrical length. Take the familiar nursery-rhyme:—

Ding- | dong | bell !
Pussy's | in the | well !
Who | put her | in ?
Little | Johnny | Green.

It is plain that the second line here represents the typical scheme of the metre; with three units (or feet, as we usually call them), and two syllables in each, except the last which ends on the first and accented syllable;—making five syllables in all. Yet in the third line the syllables sink to four; in the first to only three—but one syllable to each unit or “foot.” All this without in the slightest degree altering the metrical length of the line, which consists still of three “feet” or units throughout. The line is read into the time of five syllables, the place of the omitted syllables being supplied by pause, or by a lingering over the remaining syllables, which is equivalent to distributing the pause over the line. This is what we consider Mr. Omond's most central position. To deal with the entire book in these limits is impossible. But it is an excellent contribution to the growing interest in the subject of metre.

Holbein's Riddle.

HOLBEIN'S “AMBASSADORS” UNRIDDED. THE COUNTS PALATINE OTTO HENRY AND PHILIP, A KEY TO OTHER HOLBEINS. With 36 Illustrations. By William Frederick Dickes. (Cassell. 10s. 6d. net.)

THE attitude of Germany to the Renaissance is shown perhaps more perfectly in the work of Holbein than in that of any other artist. Italian art, with a wealth of imagination and delight in light and space and the sanity of pagan thought, was concerned with Beauty quite as much as with Religion. But with morality and realism it had really nothing to do. German art, on the other hand, was, as it were, the handmaid of morality, oppressed by the gloom and mysticism of the temperament which had evolved Gothic architecture, that had desired to worship God not in the rare sunshine of so unquiet a land, under the soft sky, nor in an imitation or adaptation of it subdued to the comprehension of man as in an Italian church, but first perhaps in the depths of the forests full of an obvious kind of gloom and terror, and mystery; and then in a church that should retain as much as possible of the obscurity and mystery of the forest. So while the Italian mind in its subtlety desired the sunshine, more mysterious by far than the darkness and the whisper of the forest, the German in his simplicity—a little sentimental perhaps about those powers that he thought of as so mysterious, so unaccountable—desired the realistic, the obvious gloom of the Gothic? This characteristic is found in all German art, and the especial influence that the Renaissance had upon it is best seen perhaps in Holbein's pictures. From Italy too came the desire for symbols, for allegory. We see the same desire, for instance, in the “Calumny” or the “Primavera” of Botticelli, and in a more obvious and extreme but less subtle way in such pictures as Holbein's “Ambassadors.”

Mr. Dickes, whose interesting book has evidently cost him much work and thought, showing as it does a wide knowledge of Holbein's life and art, tells us that it was Alciati's “Emblems,” published first in 1522 and again in 1531, that supplied Holbein with the elaborate symbolism he has used in his picture. Thus Mr. Dickes argues that the Lute, lying between the two figures of “The Ambassadors,” signifies a treaty, and in this case the Nuremberg Treaty.

It is not possible to follow Mr. Dickes, in the space at our disposal, in his minute dissection of the picture. It will be sufficient to say that whereas the two figures in this famous picture (No. 1,314 in the National Gallery) have hitherto been looked upon as Jean de Dinterville, Lord of Policy, and George de Selve, Bishop of Lavour, Mr. Dickes asserts, and as we are inclined to think comes near to prove, that they are rather the brothers Otto Henry and Philip of Neuberg, Counts Palatine of the Rhine. With the light which this fact may throw upon the life and work of Holbein, Mr. Dickes will deal in a future work. Here he backs his opinion with a wealth of argument and knowledge scarcely to be appreciated by any save experts and specialists. It is difficult to believe that this book can be passed over in silence by those to whom it is addressed: to wit, the Trustees and Director of the National Gallery.

Other New Books.

THE BOOK OF MONTHS. By E. F. Benson. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE title of Mr. Benson's volume rather suggests the inevitable garden business, but we are saved from that. There is something of gardens in these twelve chapters, but not too much; what there is too much of is a facile and rather evasive sentiment. Mr. Benson is full of sentiment, but it is sentiment which in seeming to go deep only touches the surface of things. We never come to grips with it vitally; it is pretty, sometimes touching, but nearly always dilettante. Mr. Benson talks much about the right kind of observation; he looks at London and sees in it everything which makes for comedy and tragedy, yet his comedy is superficial and his tragedy obvious, which is almost to be expected from an author who can write nowadays: “Ten yards of Piccadilly is a volume, and the Circus an improper epic.” Here is a passage which may serve to illustrate Mr. Benson's limitations:—

Had not Shakespeare been a man of human insight, he could never have written his plays; but if we could see, we should find in life what he found. That he gave it in the form of drama to the world is another matter. That was because Nature—or I prefer to say God—gave a man of this humanity this power of speech, as well as the sense of drama. Hundreds, I soberly believe, felt as keenly as Shakespeare felt, but are, so to speak, born dumb; hundreds could write as Shakespeare wrote, could they but feel.

Which is, after all, to say nothing; to state the perfectly obvious is to waste time and print.

The introduction of a love-story into what one at first takes to be a series of personal reminiscences is rather disconcerting. The thing should be either frankly personal or frankly fictional. If it be personal we take this love-story to be a gratuitous confidence; if fictional it is dragged in by the heels. Yet the episode is prettily enough told; we cannot say more for it than that. Its appeal is to the easy sentiment of those who read in arm-chairs, and its philosophy is that of the observer who appears to evade the presentation of reality by such generalisations as this:—

For then, and even now as I write, and do know the human outcome of that love, who knows now what the meaning and the great purpose of all this is? A flaw, a failure—can one say that? Not so do I believe, for I know it is all a fragment of the circumference of that great circle, the centre of which and the whole of which—you and me, and the drunkard in the street, and the prostitute in the street, and summer rain, and love and death, are included, and none higher or lower than another—is God.

That has been said a thousand times before, and largely by clever young men who have assimilated the writings of others. What we need are practical illustrations of the formula, not its more or less eloquent re-statement.

THOUGHTS FROM MAETERLINCK. Chosen and Arranged by E. S. S. (Allen. 3s. 6d. net.)

THE influence and vogue of Maeterlinck are well suggested by this pleasant little volume. The attraction exercised by him, speaking broadly, consists in simplicity of two kinds: simplicity of statement of the concrete and simplicity of statement of the mystical, the almost unstateable. To both these qualities is added a power of poetical realization which is never without distinction and seldom without beauty. In turning over these pages we are continually brought into contact with a mind which broods and understands as well as a mind subject to lightning intuitions. The first quotation here given is from "The Treasure of the Humble":—

It is only by the communications we have with the infinite that we are to be distinguished from each other.

A statement transcendently true, but one which, discussed in a different spirit, could quite reasonably be traversed and made a subject for not unkind amusement. But this from "Wisdom and Destiny" states absolute fact with absolute conviction:—

The earnest wayfarer along the paths of life becomes ever more deeply convinced, as his travels widen, of the beauty, and wisdom, and truth of the simplest and humblest laws of existence.

We are glad to see that a whole section of this volume is devoted to that beautiful and suggestive book, "The Life of the Bee."

SWORDS AND PLOWSHARES. By Ernest Crosby. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

MR. CROSBY appears to be a perfervid advocate of "Peace at any Price." He dedicates this volume to "The Noble Army of Traitors and Heretics," and pours out the vials of his transatlantic wrath upon us and all nations who draw the sword, including America. Mr. Crosby particularly affects the manner of Walt Whitman; the imitation of manner is a long way off, and the matter is rather to seek. Mr. Crosby, as he says himself, loves his country "too well to be a patriot." Here is an example of his Walt Whitman manner:—

Who are you at Washington who presume to declare me the enemy of anybody or to declare any nation my enemy?

However great you may be, I altogether deny your authority to sow enmity and hatred in my soul.

I refuse to accept your ready-made enemies, and, if I did accept them, I should feel bound to love them, and, loving them, would you have me caress them with bombshells and bayonets?

When I want enemies, I reserve the right to manufacture them myself.

When Mr. Crosby drops into rhyme he is hardly more logical or inspiring. From some verses called "Woman and War" we extract the following:—

I saw a lamb gnashing its untried teeth,
Rending the fleece
Of its own brother, piece by piece.
Until beneath
Blood trickled red upon the heath.
And stained the mouth of that perverted lamb—
That mouth not made to frighten,
But rather to whiten
With the innocent milk of its dam.

Mr. Crosby's volume contains one hundred and twenty-six pages of this kind of thing. On the last page he says:—

I believe in the world.

I stake my reputation as a prophet on its future.

Well, we are content to let Mr. Crosby's reputation as a prophet take care of itself; for his reputation as a thinker and a poet we have not much hope.

We have received from Mr. Fletcher Moss a copy of his "Pilgrimages to Old Homes" (published by the author at the Old Parsonage, Didsbury). Mr. Moss has for some years had a considerable local reputation, and his last volume, "Pilgrimages in Cheshire and Shropshire," did something to extend it beyond merely local limits. The present volume deals with "Old Homes" mostly on the Welsh border, and includes such places as Alderley, Ledbury, and Hereford, with their many historical and topographical features. Mr. Moss writes simply and pleasantly of what he has seen and gathered together. The volume is very fully and excellently illustrated from photographs.

NEW EDITIONS: The latest addition to Messrs. Ward Lock's "Youth's Library" is Nathaniel Hawthorne's "A Wonder-Book," which we are always glad to see reprinted in a popular form.—In Messrs. Macmillan's "Illustrated Pocket Classics" we have received Charles Kingsley's "Water Babies." The illustrations, which were first published in 1885, are by Mr. Linley Sambourne.—Mr. Grant Richards has just issued a new edition of Grant Allen's "Paris." The many alterations in the museums of Paris since the descriptions were first written in 1897 have necessitated certain emendations, and a few notes on minor collections have been added, but in the main the book follows its original form.

Fiction.

ALL ON THE IRISH SHORE. By E. (E.) Somerville and Martin Ross. (Longmans. 6s.)

IT is fortunate for the well-being of humanity that humour is commoner in real life than in fiction. For one real humourist we have a score of writers who take the world with a deadly seriousness tempered, if tempered at all, with a mild and unsatisfying frivolity. But true humour is of the bone; it is not so much a flashlight upon the surface of things as a steady glow from within; it reveals deeps, and is suggestive rather than concrete. Concrete humour is usually of the mere verbal order; the broader humour includes understanding of the deeps as well as the joyful incongruities of a life which delights in its own quaintness. This broad and true humour we always find in the work of the authoresses of "All on the Irish Shore," so that a new volume from them is something of an event. These Irish sketches are as bright, as fresh, as invigorating as anything we have read for a long time. They have in them the rush and gusto of the open air as well as the observation and truth of real character and real happenings. Constructively, too, the stories are artistic and finished. The linked narratives of "Fanny Fitz's Gamble" and "The Connemara Mare" are as neat in mechanism as they are excellent in fun and characterization. It is difficult to select a story out of this batch of eleven for particular praise; for sheer laughter, however, we are inclined to name "A Grand Filly." There are not many recent stories which have made us laugh aloud and to the point of collapse, but "A Grand Filly" did. The whole thing is as true and Irish as may be. The narrator goes to the South to try a filly with Trinder's

"Rioters." He reaches his host's house to be nearly run down by a wild hunt in chase of a hound with a plucked turkey in its mouth. Then follows dinner and Trinder's aunt.

I had not expected an aunt, as Robert is well on the heavenward side of sixty, but there she was: she made me think of a badly preserved Egyptian mummy with a brogue. I am always a little afraid of my hostess, but there was something about Robert's aunt that made me know I was a worm. She came down to dinner in a bonnet and black kid gloves—a circumstance that alone was awe-inspiring. . . . I have done some roughing it in my time, and I am not over-particular, but I admit that it was rather a shock to meet the turkey itself again, more especially as it was the sole item of the menu. There was no doubt of its identity, as it was short of a leg, and half the breast had been shaved away. The aunt must have read my thoughts in my face. She fixed her small implacable eyes on mine for a quelling instant, then she looked at Robert. Her nephew was obviously afraid to meet her eye; he coughed uneasily, and handed a surreptitious potato to a puppy who was sitting under his chair.

"This place is rotten with dogs," said the aunt. . . .

The description of a hunt which follows is as vivid and humorous as anything in its kind which the authoresses have done. "All on the Irish Shore" is a volume to dispel melancholy and arouse the healthiest laughter.

ROSSLYN'S RAID AND OTHER TALES. By Beatrice Helen Barmby. (Duckworth. 1s. 6d.)

HERE at least is variety. An Elizabethan tale of the Border, a Chaldean invention and a straight story of South Iceland, furnish a volume which subdues the voice of criticism by the announcement of its author's death. The unity of the book consists in its reiteration of fierce and barbaric notes sounded in far countries or the remote past. One conceives the author as having been inspired by the fearful fascination of male strength to which women surrender so readily. In her title-story she has played lovingly with the thought that the mightiest is like unto a woman. Rosslyn, the hunted freebooter, is the embodiment of that thought. "Maist beautiful," the heroine calls him, deeming him the woman he seems by his nun's garb, but his exploits on her behalf are grander than the immortal Bussy's. That is a wonderful scene where, in the bedroom of an inn, he slays outlaw after outlaw who has stolen away from his carousing comrades below, and ceases not when wounded by a blade that stops on his backbone. It is incredible, but incredible as a splendid ballad may be—incredible because it is poetry. It is only a little unhistorical bit of a great age that is held up to our view; it is but an anecdote of secret friendship between nominal enemies, but it speaks for the age as well as could Raleigh or Drake; and even a timid reviewer may, under its glamour, allow that "it's a sair thing to be a Warden" and unable to "fecht" at will.

Space prohibits us from dwelling on "The Slave of Lagash" and "The House of the Hill Folk," the other stories in the volume. The former in escaping cheap theatricality, and in wisely making an asset of the indefiniteness proper to distance, is something of a success. To imagine a dusty instead of a damp dungeon shows a fresh imagination, and the three royal half-brothers (one of whom was a slave) are cleverly contrasted.

A GIRL'S LIFE IN A HUNTING COUNTRY. By "Handasyde." (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

A CHRONICLE of the smallest and stalest of small beer, unredeemed by any grace of style or any discernment of character. The people to whom we are introduced have such names as Bampfylde and Rave-Crave, and they talk the commonplace and the bathetic with an air which we suppose is intended to imply distinction. Only quotation can do justice to the manner of this book. Of Mrs. Bampfylde we read:—

Her nose is so well formed that it can only be described as a chiselled feature. . . .

Again:—

. . . . for though the poor receive much kindness they are not often treated politely, and no people are more discriminating than the working classes.

There are pages of this kind of thing, interspersed with quotations from various poets.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

AN APRIL PRINCESS. By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY.

A first novel. There are eighteen of "The Princess Papers." In number one we make the acquaintance of the Princess, who proves to be a bright wayward English girl, with an intense joy of life and much impatience of "domesticity." In the course of her adventures she meets the Artist, the Quiet Man, the Knight, the Dragon—each of whom is the subject of a separate paper—and at last the King. "'Give up the kingdom,' said the King. 'Come and rule mine!' So the Princess gave up her kingdom." (Cassell. 6s.)

HIS GRACE'S GRACE. By C. RANGER GULL.

At Oxford, the Duke of Dover and Mr. Luxmore talk very much as did young men in a former story by this author. "'What is Truth?' said the Duke. 'Generally an epigram,' answered Luxmore." After such truth Mr. Gull constantly aspires. (Greening. 6s.)

AN UNDERGROUND MYSTERY. By ROBERT H. SHERARD.

The hero of the story is a young journalist and author, whose early married life was beset with pecuniary difficulty by reason of the debts he had contracted at Oxford. He was charged with murder, which promised to develop into "one of the most extraordinary mysteries of modern times," and after his acquittal, found himself suddenly a popular author. This Oxford young man differs very much from the creations of Mr. Ranger Gull. He lives in the suburbs, and betrays the fact in his conversation. (Digby Long. 6s.)

IN GOD'S GOOD TIME. By MARIE LEIGHTON.

A long sensational novel by the author of "Convict 99." The villain of the story is a multi-millionaire, to whom "in God's good time" the crime connected with the discovery of the world-famous Glen Fern Reef is brought home. Murder, blackmail, stolen diamonds; "dramas" of Park Lane, the Stock Exchange, and London Society, carry forward an elaborately wrought romance. (Richards. 6s.)

THE GAP IN THE GARDEN. By VANDA WATHEN-BARTLETT.

A well written but rather fantastic story. Two sisters are the co-heiresses of a country house and estate at Lynwool, where the whole of the action takes place. There is a captious and conventionally philanthropic aunt, and a literary recluse, who believes himself to be the father of one of the girls. His servant Kerstie is a weird figure, whose madness is well presented. The book ends on a note of tragedy, but much of the dialogue is bright and entertaining. (Lane. 6s.)

We have also received: "The Mallison Mystery," by T. W. Hanshaw (Ward, Lock); "Annals of Hollyfont," by Felix Lackland (Sonnenschein); "From Crooked Roots," by John Ackworth (Marshall); "A Woman's Calvary," by Jean Middlemass (Digby Long); "Coy," by C. Howell (Digby Long); "Clashmore," by Edmund Downey (Simpkin); "Yellow Pine Basin," by Henry G. Catlin (Boston: Small, Maynard).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
Quarterly	5/0
Price for one issue	/5

Fiction and Froth.

THERE are times when the multitude of novels upon our shelves strikes us with a kind of hopeless amazement. With the best intention in the world it is impossible to deal with them all; impossible even to mention more than the titles of many of them. This, in itself, does not necessarily imply that the production of novels is too great; but when we approach the question of selection, the implication that it is too great becomes hard and unblinkable fact. The number of novels which can stand the test of a reasonable critical standard is astonishingly small: even if we accepted the modern and, as we think, the untenable theory that the main end of fiction should be to amuse, it would remain astonishingly small, for true amusement is not often to be found in these rows of many-coloured volumes. But the main end of fiction should not be to amuse any more than it should be consciously to instruct. Fiction, indeed, is an instrument of too wide a range to be brought within the narrow circle of a definition; it has all the world for its pasture, all the infinite follies and vices and noblenesses of man for theme. Yet definite theme, point of view, individuality of presentation, are precisely the things which we find lacking in so much recent fiction. A critic whose faculty has been cultivated by much practice can run, say, through a score of novels and find that he can divide them into three or four sections with unmistakable labels. The crop of this season's novels is raised from the seed of last season's; certain formulas are popular, and innumerable pens restate those formulas with no more variation than simple re-shuffling implies. We open book after book to find ourselves confronted with the very ghosts of familiarity.

The conclusion to which we are forced is plain—many of our novelists go to books for inspiration and ideas instead of going to life. It is much easier to go to books, but that is not the way to produce work which may here and there stir a reader to actual emotion, here and there touch some hidden or sub-conscious spring of the soul. It is, no doubt, given to few writers to unveil even the smallest mysteries of the terrible and beautiful spirit of man, but it is the business of every writer to strive after the highest that is in him. He may not have much to say, but he should at least endeavour to say it well, and he should not attempt to say it at all unless from some impulsion of knowledge or temperament. This is a hard saying, but it represents the only way of art. Take up half-a-dozen of these novels at random and you will find misrepresentation blatant; misrepresentation of every class of society, misrepresentation of the most ordinary affairs of existence. It may not be conscious misrepresentation, but there it is; the servant girl stands in as impossible a light and as ruinous a perspective as the countless men and women who trail titles across the pages. There comes upon us at times a positive yearning for anything vital, anything truly and personally observed, were it only a sidling tramp or a garbage-sodden gutter.

It is well to recall now and then what Ruskin wrote of books in "Kings' Treasuries." A book is written, he said, because "the author has something to say which he perceives to be true and useful, or helpfully beautiful. So far as he knows, no one has yet said it; so far as he knows, no one else can say it. He is bound to say it, clearly and melodiously if he may; clearly at all events. In the sum of his life he finds this to be the thing, or group of things, manifest to him;—this, the piece of true knowledge, or sight, which his share of sunshine and earth has permitted him to seize. He would fain set it down for ever; engrave it on rock, if he could; saying, 'This is the best of me; for the rest, I ate, and drank, and slept, loved, and hated, like another; my life was as the vapour, and is not; but this I saw and knew: this, if anything of mine, is worth your memory.' That, it may be said, is a counsel of perfection, but it has the right spirit. If it at all consorted with the spirit of the age we should have fewer and better novels; which would not mean that the novel-reading public would go empty, but that it would have more to think about. The average novel, to put the matter briefly, is concerned neither with real ideas nor with real life; it is a comment—jaunty, or sentimental, or frivolous—upon what never existed; it is a kind of ineffective phantasm, blurred, inchoate, remote. And the tendency is to level all to this average. Our greatest, as we said the other day, are silent. The call is for leaders; of followers in every kind we have rank-and-file enough.

From the loaded shelves which have forced us to some general consideration of modern fiction we select "The Star Dreamer," by Agnes and Egerton Castle (Constable). The medium of Mr. and Mrs. Castle is the medium of romance; they create an atmosphere and set in that atmosphere certain more or less realisable figures. "The Star Dreamer" opens well; it is all the more effective perhaps because the materials are so familiar. We have a half-deserted mansion, a distiller of simples, a cat, and a deaf and dumb attendant. The cat is excellently done; in the animal at least there is real observation. The Star Dreamer occupies a tower of the house, and on the evening of the story's opening he discovers a new star. On that same evening there appears the daughter of the old alchemist, who is cousin to the recluse of the new star. Both have suffered great things, each sees in the other the possibilities of healing and new life, and at the end of the story the new life begins. But before the end come plots and machinations which remove the story from the plane of reasonableness; it is good melodrama, but not life even as life should be presented in romance. The Star Dreamer talks like this:—

And did I not hear you boast, but a moment ago, that you could read the human countenance? No idea that I loved Ellinor! Why, man, have I not loved her since the first instant these eyes beheld her, ah, me, nearly a year ago! with the lamplight shining on her golden head . . . and her blue eyes, her blue eyes?

That is the kind of writing which kills romance for us; it might pass on the stage, but in cold print it is purely artificial. A little later we read of a "shaft of yellow light striking her white forehead, and flaming in her enaureoled hair. . . ." Again artificiality pounces hawklike upon poor romance, and the scattered feathers that we see are coloured by the dye-vat, not by nature. Yet "The Star Dreamer" is a piece of good mechanics, with dramatic moments, and an extremely clever setting. The pity is that it should so forsake life for no compensating value.

Again we go to our shelves and select three other books: "The Arcadians," by J. S. Fletcher (Long); "The Caprices of a Royal Incognita" (Harpers); and "The Danger of Innocence," by Cosmo Hamilton (Greening). "The Arcadians" treats of a poet's return to nature—treats of it humourously. But Mr. Fletcher adds nothing to a theme which has been worked so pitilessly already. His poet cannot find the real country of which he is in search, and by no means can come across a smock-frock. We could find a smock-frock within five-and-thirty miles of London; Mr. Fletcher's poet had not the right instinct. And surely it is no longer funny to send out a couple of men with guns, which they don't know how to use, and make one of them shoot a donkey. The humour, if it exists, is very early-Victorian. Of course this egregious versifier returns to London and finds contentment in his club: he should never have left it. It should be said that two or three of the interpolated episodes are neatly told. It is when Mr. Fletcher gets on to his poet Mercurius and the Time Spirit that we feel ourselves wrapped in the banal and the commonplace.

"The Caprices of a Royal Incognita" and "The Danger of Innocence" may be put together as representative of what we must call the unpleasant and the unnecessary. That there are readers for such books we have as little doubt as that such books make no contribution to literature. The scandals and intrigues of petty courts supply matter for the one, the preposterous follies and incredible sillinesses of the smart set the other. There is cleverness in both these books. Mr. Cosmo Hamilton is jauntily epigrammatic, makes points, of sorts, with accomplished ease, and succeeds in wearying us. His story—he calls it a "Flippancy"—is too absurd for farce, too vulgar for satire. He refers to Eton as the "insanitary menagerie on the Thames where fathers send their sons in order that they may not receive any education." An American heiress talks in this sprightly manner:—

"Piff Charley Valley," she said, only the "piff" was something quite different. "I'll see you pified before I marry such a piffing little piffler, so there, Beau, darling. It's all pified rot about your piff aunt, ain't it—what?"

We do not feel ourselves called upon to say more concerning "The Danger of Innocence."

The jaunty manner in fiction is perhaps the worst of all manners; it seems to have the wink of knowingness, the buttonholing familiarity of the undesirable acquaintance. Above all it disguises the things that matter, or leaves them altogether out of sight. We conclude as we began by repeating that what fiction requires to-day is not a fanciful return to a fanciful nature, but an actual return to actual life. Any careful observer of the growth and development of, say, a couple of allied families will see enough human material for the making of a book worth writing. The point is that he should approach his work with some sense of responsibility and some sense of art.

Symbolism.

To love literature so well as to refuse to write save at the moment of invention, in that brief heart's beat of inspiration; to be scornful of anyone who supposed that art could be the result of mere industry, would seem to be counsels of perfection too severe for an age that has produced the annual novelist and popular fiction. And yet in spite of the hurly-burly there are those who are content to produce but little so that that little be perfect. In looking around on professional literature to-day, perhaps with a little involuntary shudder, we remind ourselves quickly what exquisite work has been produced from time to time in England by men who in the best sense of the term were amateurs. Sir Thomas Browne, for instance, in an age of amateurs produced work that is even yet the most exquisite in the language: and in our day, too, those amateurs Walter Pater and Joseph Henry Shorthouse gave us work of a perfection scarcely attempted by the professional writers. Had Pater, for instance, been obliged to earn his bread by his critical and imaginative work, how much it must have lost, inevitably, in its contact with necessity. In France, where perhaps literature is more generally respected, or at least taken more seriously than in England, there has always been the amateur, who thought last of all of earning money from his work. Mr. Mosher, of America, has just reprinted an essay by Mr. Arthur Symons upon such an one. Stéphane Mallarmé was born in 1842 and died in 1898. His life work is but a collection of fragments, beautiful and various, suggesting the exquisite remnants of a statue from the hands of a great sculptor the main part of which had been lost or never finished.

"With either more or less ambition" (says Mr. Symons) "he would have done more to achieve himself, he was always divided between an absolute aim at the absolute, that is the unattainable, and a too logical disdain for the compromise by which after all literature is literature." That seems to us to be a very happy explanation, so far as explanation is possible, of a man who avowedly discarded ideas for words; using words partly as symbols, partly as living and lovely things in themselves, to express not ideas but moods, the moods of a poet, who was a little repelled by the reason. He was a Symbolist, but not a Mystic. For Mysticism, as we see it in St. John of the Cross, for instance, or St. Teresa, is really an exact science as reasonable as algebra to a mind properly prepared and equipped. With Mallarmé it is not the thought, not the idea, still less a sequence of ideas that he seeks to express, but just a mood, or the shadow of a mood, a fugitive ecstasy.

Such a writer, however exquisite his work might be, could not hope to gain popularity, could not hope to become a professional writer. "Never having aimed at popularity," Mr. Symons writes, "he never needed, as most writers need, to make the first advances. He made neither intrusion upon nor concession to those who, after all, were not obliged to read him. And when he spoke he considered it neither needful nor seemly to listen in order to hear if he were heard. . . . No one in our time has more significantly vindicated the supreme right of the artist in the aristocracy of letters. . . . Has not every artist shrunk from that making of himself 'a motley to the view,' that handing over of his naked soul to the laughter of the multitude? But who in our time has wrought so subtle a veil shining on this side where the few are, or thick cloud on the other where are the many?"

Here is a prose poem in which the matter is almost nothing, and the form almost everything; very happily it shows us something of Mallarmé's manner, not in its obscurity, but in its most expressive perfection:—

FRISON D'HIVER.

The old Saxony clock which is slow and which strikes thirteen amid its flowers and gods, to whom did it belong?

Thinkest that it came from Saxony by the mail-coaches of old time?

(Singular shadows hang about the worn-out panes.)

And the Venetian mirror, deep as a cold fountain in its banks of gilt work; what is reflected there? Ah! I am sure that more than one woman bathed there in her beauty's sin; and perhaps if I looked long enough, I should see a naked phantom.

Wicked one, thou often savest wicked things.

(I see the spiders' webs above the lofty windows.)

Our wardrobe is very old; see how the fire reddens its sad panels! The weary curtains are as old, and the tapestry on the arm chairs stripped of paint, and the old engravings, and all these old things. Does it not seem to thee that even these two birds are discoloured by time?

(Dream not of the spiders' webs that tremble above the lofty windows.)

Thou lovest all that, and that is why I live by thee. When one of my poems appeared didst thou not desire, my sister, whose books are full of yesterdays, the words, the grace of faded things? New things displease thee; thee also do they frighten with their loud boldness, and thou feeblest as if thou shouldst use them—a difficult thing indeed to do, for thou hast no taste for action. Come, close thy old German almanack that thou readeest with attention, though it appeared more than a hundred years ago, and the kings it announces are all dead, and, lying on their antique carpet, my head leaned upon thy charitable knees, on thy pale robe, oh! calm child, I will speak with thee for hours; there are no fields, and the streets are empty, I will speak to thee of our furniture. Thou art abstracted.

(The spiders' webs are shivering above the lofty windows.)

Well, it is thus Mallarmé, with a very delicate, sensitive art, as exquisite as that of the finest goldsmith, suggests his mood, as it were, setting it free for a moment from the fetters of silence. With him the style is the man, and as Mr. Symons tells us, "After a life of persistent devotion to literature he has left enough poems, a single small volume (less certainly than a hundred poems in all), a single volume of prose, a few pamphlets, and a prose translation of the Poems of Poe." But in the tiny handful of poems, in verse and prose, there are certainly masterpieces, "poems which are among the most beautiful poems of our time," prose so subtle, so exquisite, that its brevity is our only regret.

Well, after all, Mallarmé is not the only Symbolist. Something he owes to Gerard de Nerval, that inspired madman who was found in the Palais Royal one day leading a lobster by a blue ribbon, and who hanged himself outside a Paris doss house with the garter of the Queen of Sheba. There are Arthur Rimbaud, who at last went eastward and left our world; and Paul Verlaine, for whom poetry was surely the only excuse for life; and Huysmans, that serpent who peers from a monk's cowl and whispers of jewels and precious stones; and Maeterlinck, how much simpler than they all, who has expressed "The Treasure of the Humble"; and others, lesser men scarcely known in England, who have been content with nothing less than a kind of perfection.

In "The Symbolist Movement in Literature," from which Mr. Mosher has in his "Bibelot" reprinted the essay on Stéphane Mallarmé, Mr. Symons has written of all those here named, and of some others with an understanding and a sympathy that it would be difficult to find elsewhere in English. Symbolism, as expressed in the works of these men, is, he seems to suggest, but an experiment towards the solution of the riddle of life. It presents us with a theory of life, supernatural perhaps, which frees us from the material fetters of a sordid world. It is as though, by some fine perception, some delicacy of mind or soul, these men had become aware that the earth with her bars was about us for ever, in a way that others less sensitive had as yet scarcely been aware of. Truly the saints had in their own way felt the same unrest. And, in the well-known words of one of them, we may perhaps find the best explanation of much that is almost inexplicable in these men, who, irregular as they often were in conduct, would seem to have pressed so much real insight into that which cannot die, the soul of man: Thou hast made us for Thyself, and our hearts are restless until they rest in Thee.

The Roman Jeremiah.

A NEW translation of Juvenal is welcome not only for its own excellent quality, or for the sanity which has refrained from turning a good prose version into a poor verse rendering. Juvenal is welcome in himself. As all men (it has been said) are born either Platonists or Aristotelians, so all satirists are either Horatian or Juvenalian. And while the Horatian way is essentially that of good-humoured ridicule, having for its logical descendants the skit and vers de société, Juvenal is the father of all true and typical satire. Nor among his many descendants is there a name so great; not that of Dryden, his most authentic son. Dryden has faded, so much as an immortal can; he was contracted, "topical," largely personal; his splendid Muse must needs go forth with a cortège of notes. But Juvenal is of a range which makes him universal: whatever men do, or did in a city which was a microcosm of decivilising man, came within his stern criticism. Personal quarrels, spites, or criticisms bulk largely in Dryden and Pope, to say nothing of Byron or lesser men: on such poor quarry Juvenal never stooped. When Pope or Dryden plays the indignant moralist, roused to invective by a degenerate world, we smile: the pose is too obvious, too conventional. Juvenal compels our conviction, our confidence: the whole spirit of the man is so largely, so exaltedly, sincere. Save in the case of an occasional politician (as we should nowadays call him), he never launches a personal attack: his individuals are merely names which head an indictment of general corruption.

This convincing impression of sincerity is the stranger, because his style is what we call rhetorical (a misleading term). But it is spaciouly rhetorical. We cannot agree with Mr. Owen, who has translated thirteen satires of Juvenal (Metheun), that it is poetry—the spirit of satire is anti-poetic. But it is magnificent eloquence. His whole eye is on the degeneration of his age and country. Rome was then as London is now: enervated by wealth, conquest, and long prosperity; a sink for the waste and filth of every nation in the East, West, or South, whose corruptions mingled with and overbrimmed her own. Juvenal was a Roman of antique spirit, and they stank in his nostrils, and fretted his heart. In Rome religion was become a ghost; a practical scepticism and agnosticism gave license to crime, as he fiercely declared.

There are who think by sightless Chance all mortal laws are given,
With native force the vast world hurtles around the heaven,
That Nature in set order leads the dance of days and years,
Hence swears in any fane his lie the sneerer, stript of fears.

Nay, in his comprehensive indignation, he accused Heaven itself of partaking the universal degeneracy and corruption. He called for the Saturnian days—

When Juno was a maid, and Jove realmless in caves
Idæan;
Was no immortal wassailing in chambers Cyclopean,
No Trojan stripling, no fair dame of Hercules bare the cup,
Nor Vulcan in black Lipard's forge would drain the nectar up,
Then wipe his grimy arms. Each god in those days dined alone;
Nor was there such a rabble of gods as nowadays we own,
And heaven, oppressed with fewer powers, a lighter load weighed Atlas down.
No one had drawn as yet the gloomy empire of the deep,
Dire Pluto and his ravished bride had no pale court to keep;
No wheels, no furies, restless stones, and no swart vulture's pain,
But cheerful Shades led cheerful hours, without infernal reign.

A more daring rhetorical stroke could not well be in those days, nor a profounder proof of pessimism. Nor were the burglar and the bravo, or the church robber, lacking to Juvenal's vision of Rome:—

Think of the villain stabber, with his poniard out at hire, Think of the stealthy sulphur, when your gate goes up
in fire,
The thief of massy temple-cups, sacred with antique rust,
Of popular gifts, or votive crowns from monarchs lapped in ancient dust.

But Mr. Owen has a passage which is a résumé of the analogies between present London and the Rome of Juvenal's invective:—

The follies and evils of oriental and other superstitions find a counterpart in Christian Scientists, affected belief in Buddhism, occultism, spiritualism, and other crazes; fashionable adulteresses, lovers of gossip and scandal, and lady-athletes, have their modern sisters; the licentious Spanish dances still continue, but are not confined to Spain; reckless gambling is as rife, if not more so, now as then; the turf with its attendant evils is a reproduction of the contests of the circus; the aristocratic soldier, backed by the highest social influence, who is more at home in an atmosphere of horse-flesh and drinking than in his military duties, is not unknown among us; nor is the noble spendthrift, who runs through his money and goes upon the stage, or financiers and others, who make away with the property of the credulous by fraud, or fashionable and wealthy parents, who, by the example of their lives, train up their children to debauchery and folly; the pestilent poets, of whom the satirist speaks bitterly as an affront to letters, are still inconveniently frequent. . . . The worst of Nero's crimes was that he murdered the Tale of Troy divine: who shall say whether the encouragement of bad literature is still not among the worst of crimes?

It is no stale and outworn indictment, therefore, which is delivered in these resonant pages; change names, and we are reading of to-day. The more wonder that no one has done for Juvenal what Pope did for Horace in his brilliant imitations—or none since Johnson. Perhaps the grand satire, flashing with point and thunderous with energy, the sweeping and majestic verse, rise above the heads of imitators. Nor has Juvenal been fortunate in his metrical translators. Johnson's two imitations are worth any translation; Dryden has given versions of certain among the satires, some of which, such as that of the famous "Vanity of Human Wishes," are like the curate's egg—excellent in parts; but that is all. And so it is to such an admirable prose rendering as Mr. Owen's that the un-classical reader must go for his knowledge of the Roman Jeremiah. There is, in truth, something of an Hebraic rectitude, sternness, and passion in this watcher of his country's decline. And the final moral which he seems to draw from all, might be represented in the noble lines which Dryden has boldly, but splendidly, Englished:—

One world sufficed not Alexander's mind;
Cooped up he seemed, in earth and seas confined,
And struggling stretched his restless limbs about
This narrow globe to find a passage out.
But entered in the brick-built town, he tried
The grave, and found its strait dimensions wide.
Death only this tremendous truth unfolds,—
The mighty soul, how small a body holds.

Impressions.

XXVII.—A Night Piece.

DARKNESS came up while we were still talking; imperceptibly the traffic in the street ceased, and on that outlying part of London fell the hush of night. Round and about the pleasure heart of the city life sped gaily and feverishly, but in the room where we sat there was silence and stillness. The leaves of a tree in the small garden stirred—that was all. Peace had fallen upon our corner of the world, and when we moved upstairs, I was glad to find no light in the room but the flare from the wood fire. The windows, long windows that reached to the ground, were open, and the room was redolent of the scent of spring flowers. From the river, along which the lights of vessels slowly passed, fresh air blew into that pleasant flower-scented darkness. It was home, the world shut out: yet so near that we could almost feel the throbbing of its pulse. We stood at the open window watching that unrehearsed night piece—the wide sky above, the dim river beyond, just beneath us the trim public garden with its blossoming trees, and the moon, nearing the full, riding high against the flying clouds. It was the hour for reflection, very still and witching.

My companion repeated the passage he had been reading aloud to me an hour before: "Who knows whether the faithfulness of individuals here below to their own poor over-beliefs may not actually help God to be more effectively faithful to His own greater tasks."

While he was speaking rain began to fall. Something moved on one of the seats against the railing of the public garden. A wretched old man rose, turned up his face to the rain, gathered his rags closer about him, then huddled down again into his corner. A street lamp shone palely upon this outcast, so inured to hardship that rain could not vex his slumbers.

The rain stopped. The moon parted from the clouds, and revealed the river flowing through the night. Uprose the wholesome scent of moist earth and refreshed shrubs. "Once," said my companion, "on a day's walk I passed five rivers. On a hill above the third there was a convent. I climbed up to ask the way, and a nun gave me directions through a tiny opening, the size of a face, in the wicket. She—"

He ceased speaking, for just then a woman came out of the night, roused the sleeping man, pulled him to his feet, and pushed him away out of our sight. Hardly had they gone when the silence was cut by a scream—long and shrill. We moved towards the door—then waited. "The scream was not repeated. The clock struck ten.

"I have heard," said my companion, "that every night, always at the same hour when they believe the forces of evil are strongest, there is an order of nuns who pray that the souls of all in the outside world may be preserved from evil and danger. Their prayers begin at ten o'clock, and for an hour every night these lonely women entreat, with tears, that the stalking evil in the world, of which they know so little, may be resisted. Ah! those prayers! Who knows whether the faithfulness of individuals here below to their own poor over-beliefs may not—"

Another scream, quick and sharp, rent the air, and before it had died away out of the night came a file of policemen. We heard the tread of their feet on the pavement by the river side. Then a sharp "Halt!" from the sergeant. Two of them detached themselves from the file and ran in the direction of the scream. "March!" cried the sergeant. Then we heard the scream for the third time, shouting, and the rush of feet.

My companion drew the curtains. As he lighted the candles, with an unsteady hand, he finished the quotation, speaking in a low voice,— "may not actually help God to be more effectually faithful to His own greater tasks."

I looked through the curtains. All was silent. There were no clouds in the sky. Very secret was the night, very still.

Drama.

The Tyranny of Accident.

I MUST confess to a distinct sense of disappointment with "The Altar of Friendship" at the Criterion. The early Victorian sentimentality of "Mice and Men" had not, indeed, given one reason to suspect any very serious dramatic intention on the part of Mrs. Madeleine Lucette Ryley. But there was talent, and where there is talent, there is always an off-chance that the instinct of art may awake. Moreover "The Altar of Friendship" itself did not open badly. Its manner is perhaps rather unfortunate. It aspires to belong to the school of social satire and paradoxical epigram which has of late years found several brilliant exponents. But it aspires afar off. The satire is crude; the epigrams are blunt and wingless. They irritate without stinging. Substantially, however, the piece is not without its dramatic possibilities. The emotional interest centres in the love affairs of Richard Arbuthnot and Sally Sartoris. Miss Sartoris, played with exquisite humour by Miss Ellis Jeffreys, is a young lady from the States. As her beauty is now mature, her father does not expect her to return again from Europe without a husband. She finds an ally in Arbuthnot. A mock engagement is entered into for the benefit of Colonel Sartoris. The experienced playgoer will not be slow to divine that behind this a real but unacknowledged affection is concealed on both sides. But a shadow falls on the relation. Arbuthnot has a sister Florence, who is on the point of marriage with his friend Arnold Winifrith. He has also a type-writer, Mary Pinner, and Mary Pinner Arnold Winifrith has seduced. He persuades her into a pledge to keep his treachery secret. This is the situation at the end of Act I. Act II. represents the wedding of Arnold Winifrith and Florence Arbuthnot. Just before the departure of the bride and bridegroom arrives Mary Pinner's father. He is said to have come out of prison. Actually I fear he has come out of melodrama, and his behaviour certainly confirms my worst suspicions. Standing in the hall, from which by extreme good fortune all the guests have momentarily cleared away, he accuses Arbuthnot of being his child's betrayer. Florence Winifrith is just coming down stairs in her travelling dress to face the ordeal by rice and slippers. Arbuthnot grasps the situation, accepts the responsibility which is not really his, but warns Winifrith that circumstances may arise in which he will have to come forward and shoulder his own burden. In Act III. these circumstances do arise. It is a month later. The honeymoon is over. The party are once more collected in the house from which the wedding took place. Mary Pinner has come to warn Arbuthnot that her father is planning to kill him out of revenge. She is introduced, for some singular reason, into the billiard room (from which the guests have momentarily cleared away), and is discovered by Miss Sally Sartoris, who is led, not for the first time, to suspect the existence of some shady episode in Arbuthnot's past. Consequently when Arbuthnot, who is now head over ears in love, proposes to her to turn their mock engagement into a real one, she stoutly refuses, and gives him to understand the reason why. Arbuthnot realises that he has sacrificed his own happiness and that of Miss Sartoris on the altar of friendship, and not unnaturally, if not very heroically, desires to clear himself. He appeals to Mary Pinner, who declines to break her promise to Winifrith; he appeals to Winifrith, who proves a craven. The complication is complete.

And how does Mrs. Ryley resolve it? The interests of drama require that the issue, whatever it may be, should be brought about by psychological law, should be the natural and inevitable outcome of the characters involved. But is Mrs. Ryley going to be loyal to the interests of drama? Of course she is not. If she had been, she would have taken much greater trouble from the beginning to show that there were characters involved. Instead of this she has been wholly occupied, on the one hand with humours, on the other with a formal plot. The result is that there are no characters involved, and that consequently there is nothing from which a legitimate dramatic dénouement can proceed. Not that this matters to Mrs. Ryley, who is perfectly well content with a conventional substitute. Those intolerable clearances of the stage for the entry of the inconvenient personage into the impossible place at the improbable moment will have shown you whither she was tending. In the last act, artifice is naked and unashamed. Mary Pinner visits Arbuthnot's chambers in his absence to recover Winifrith's letters to her. She is discovered by Florence Winifrith who, like Miss Sartoris, has come to have suspicions of her brother's relations with Mary, and, naturally, is not undeceived by finding the girl in his chambers. She lets Mary see that she knows something. Mary thinks that she knows all, and thus lets Florence discover that the guilt lies, not upon her brother, but her husband. Thence explanations, the reconciliation of Arbuthnot and Miss Sartoris, the departure of the disillusioned Florence with her exposed Winifrith. And this is Mrs. Ryley's resolution!—a purely accidental misunderstanding! Once more blind chance has been called in to cut the knot of circumstances which the deliberate acts of human beings have woven about them. And to what purpose? In order, apparently, that a theme which, in the nature of things, was hardly capable of being treated otherwise than tragically, might masquerade before the public as a comedy. The public, poor blind beast, does not complain. It takes thankfully whatever you give it; and if you tell it that things happen so, why then, for it, they did happen so. But then, in the long run, the salvation of art lies, not in the temper of the public, but in the conscience of the artist. And to sit down and write a play which is three-fourths drama and one-fourth the cynical negation of drama is a thing which ought to lie heavy upon any artistic conscience.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

New Englishmen and Italy.

THE most devoted friend of the New English Art Club could hardly describe the present exhibition as new. The note is still, as it has been for the past two or three years, a room, often beautifully painted, displaying the figure of a woman who seldom seems quite congruous to her surroundings. She is reclining on a couch, arranging prints or china, sewing or reading, or singing while her husband plays. Three years ago this pictorial return to early-Victorian domesticity was a trifle novel: this year it is a trifle stale. Perhaps those unsophisticated persons who still seek novelty at the New English Art Club will find it in "The Little Totterer" by Mr. James Charles, a baby learning to walk in a country lane. Many of the subjects are as anecdotic as the typical Royal Academy pictures that the New English Art Club was founded to exorcise. The difference lies in this: that the best of these new Englishmen are very capable painters. Not all: here as elsewhere we find the imitators who must always be following the lead of stronger personalities. And those who do not follow the lead of others repeat themselves so faithfully that one wonders if some of the New English Art Club landscapists ever look at Nature now with the fresh eyes of the time which produced their vital work. At the Whitechapel exhibition you may see the real Mark Fisher and the real Wilson Steer: here landscapes of the school of Mark Fisher and Wilson Steer painted by themselves. The New English Art Club has become eclectic. The influence of certain personalities is obvious, and those who are not influenced by others pant up-hill trying to regain the heights they themselves once reached; but it is the same hill, not another.

This society needs to open its arms wider, to invite distinguished work, to seek it. Painters who must live by their art, who must produce work intended to sell, should be persuaded to regard the New English Art Club as a place where, say, one picture a year painted for its own sake, an attempt at a new method of expression, would be welcome. There is overmuch cousinship about the club. We look in vain for any signs of a new movement, or for the heartening sight of an elderly pioneer breaking away from the trodden path, and surprising us by some new way of looking at a thing he has seen a hundred times, but now differently. Even the drawings which have overflowed on to one of the oil painting walls have an air of monotony. Mr. Brabazon has nothing more to say to us, and I have nothing more to say about him; Mr. John's pranks I noted a fortnight ago when they were shown in another place; Mr. Wilson Steer's "Decoration for a Drawing Room" is academically decorative, not exhilarating; but it was a pleasure to rest the eyes on the faint flush of colour in Mr. MacColl's "Links of the Seine," and the finically exquisite drawing in Mr. Muirhead Bone's "Waterloo Shot Tower."

One name among the painters of oil pictures is new to me—Mr. L. A. Harrison. He, too, has caught the "Interior" fever, but in his picture of a pretty room, light and atmospheric, with peeps of green foliage through the tall windows, he has wisely omitted the figure that strikes a discordant note in so many of the New English Art Club interiors. One painter, Mr. David Muirhead, places the figure in an interior with a success that distinguishes him from almost all his fellow new Englishmen. To him has been granted the subtle mastery of tone, and the power to show the mystery that objects assume under the silent influences of light. Many of the exhibits here are studies, wrought carefully, but piecemeal, incidents of room decoration. Mr. Muirhead's "A Girl Reading" is a picture. She stands against a table, in a blue dress, with bent head, reading. The light proceeds from the left, lights her back and her hair, touches her profile, and falls upon the beautiful silver-grey wall behind her young intent figure. Note the tender touches of colour in the table-cloth, the subtle relation of the values, and the simplicity of the scheme of colour under the influence of the light that gathers all the details of this quiet room into a harmony as simple as it is reposeful. Here is a picture that gives real pleasure; watch it quietly. This artist has not studied his contemporaries, but he has doubtless sat at the feet of the Dutchmen! You can study Ver Meer, and yet remain original. Mr. Muirhead's "The Sisters" shows the same qualities, but this time it is the reflection of lamp or firelight falling into a darkened room contrasted with the blue moonlight seen through a curtainless window, beneath which the spires and roofs of a city lurk. One of the girls sits sewing, the other stands, holding some piece of dress adornment. Here, too, is the mystery that the artist's eye, seeing ordinary things, but not in the common way, can give. There is nothing exceptional about the room, or the girls, or their dress, but the picture holds that something more that made it worth doing, and will make me glad to see it again. It is just the lack of these qualities that prevented me from enjoying Mr. Furse's interior, called "The Song." Details of the picture are well painted, especially the man's head, but there is no relation between one part of the staring room and another. There is no enveloping atmosphere, and no right light creeping over faces, figures, and walls, claiming, relating, and harmonising the many details.

Mr. Orpen, as usual, goes his own way, and a very remarkable and promising way it is. This year he has forsaken the interior, contenting himself with a study of still life, a portrait called "The Red Scarf," and some drawings. He is the most capable craftsman in the club, well trained, a keen and patient observer, and able to reproduce with amazing fidelity all his eyes see. What he does not see, he does not paint. Therein lies his strength and his limitation. The graces and elegancies do not attract him. He has no sense of mystery, nothing of the subtlety verging into beauty that makes Mr. Muirhead's work so attractive. The forcible portrait of the girl called "The Red Scarf," unmodishly decorative, is so well placed on the canvas, and the face is wrought to such an intensity of expression, that one can forgive the hardness of the workmanship. But Mr. Orpen's triumph is in the small still-life study called "Reflections, China and Japan." On a table polished to the reflecting power of a mirror are placed a bowl, a peacock's feather, a small white idol, and a Japanese doll's head. It is a study of reflections. The objects repeat themselves in the polished table, while behind rises a great, white untroubled wall. This picture is a triumph of clean, sure painting, first studied with a concentration that left nothing unnoticed or unexplained, and then copied, touch by touch, with brushes cleansed till they were unsoiled by any touch of former colour. It is the deftest and most efficient piece of painting I have seen for many a day, and has the dignity of a piece of work executed, from start to finish, just as perfectly as the craftsman could. It faces Mr. Rothenstein's "Doll's House," which means whatever you may like it to mean. This picture, which is not new, is romantic, almost amusing, and in truth of tone, a desirability to which Mr. Rothenstein does not always attain, the best picture he has painted.

While I was looking at "The Doll's House" the sun came out, which tempted me to walk over to Bond Street and look at Mr. Kerr-Lawson's Little Landscapes of Italy, at the Dowdeswell Galleries. My impression of Italy is sunshine, blue lakes, and white roads, and the colour of places I have not seen has been settled for me by the magic brush of Turner. Fog at Venice, snow at Florence, leaden skies at Genoa, though felt acutely at the time, are forgotten in the memory of sunny Italy, an Italy of colour. Mr. Kerr-Lawson's Italy is somewhat grey, but he paints her with feeling and always with an eye to "the essential factor" in any town or landscape which, as Mr. Maurice Hewlett says in a note to the catalogue, sums up, embodies, and incarnates the rest. There is brave drawing in his "Piazza, Siena," beauty in his cypress trees against the "Osservanza," and a world of memories in his picture of the yellow Arno flowing by Pisa.

C. L. H.

Science.

Between Two Nebulae.

SUCH is our standpoint in Time. If we look before and after, such are the periods of our vision. The wave-length of the great Vibration is the distance between two nebulae. As the course of certain comets is from sun to sun, from star to star, so the rhythm of Universal History, the strides of Eternity, are from nebula to nebula. Between two nebulae are we at this hour; from one have we come, to another must we return. From one have we been evolved, towards another shall be our devolution. And that we may celebrate the coming of our ephemeral races to such high knowledge—knowledge which in this century we may and must at last accept as part of Truth—let us look to what has been and what shall be; remembering that the history of our brief system is doubtless that of all.

Long ago in that distant part of infinite space whence the solar system as a whole is now travelling at a speed of something like twelve miles in each second of time, there met in fierce collision two stars, old and dark and cold, mutually compelled by that force of gravity which acted then as now, and which was to reveal its governance by simple but inexorable law to the distant product of that clash of worlds whom we call Isaac Newton. The kinetic energy of those rapid stars was converted in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, into heat so great that their substance was dissipated into a cloud of gas of almost infinite tenuity. This cloud of gas we may call the solar nebula. In it Newton and Laplace and Shakespeare and Beethoven were potential. There needed not a touch of the creating hand nor a glance of the foreseeing eye that they should emerge from its spacious womb. Such is Evolution; such the grandeur of the Divine Method.

At first the solar nebula was a vast chaos such as the nebula in Orion, though on a much larger scale, presents to our gaze to-day; but, though "without form and void" (if one may transfer a phrase from Genesis), its very ions and electrons were in motion. And so subtly did they move that at a late day there was formed a philosopher named Laplace; by whose genius it was conceived that from this tenebrous commotion he and we are come.

Of the nebulae, numbering about one hundred and twenty thousand, that are known to sublunary astronomers, or those of our local race, about one-half present features which lead us to regard them as in a relatively late stage of evolution. Chaos is beginning in them to yield to order. These sixty thousand we call spiral nebulae, and the proportion of their number to the whole—no less than one to two—is alone sufficient to put their formation out of the region of chance. Though the first spiral nebula to be discovered was not seen until Lord Rosse had built his great telescope, we know already that, next to the fixed star, the spiral nebula is the most important and the most characteristic object in the whole heavens. The great nebula in Andromeda, however, which he discovered, remains without a parallel for its size. It is demonstrable by the infallible processes of mathematics that a nebula of any shape must necessarily become spiral. This is a deduction from the law of the "Conservation of Momentum." As the nebula radiates its enormous but sparsely-scattered store of heat into the cold of intersidereal space—a cold which is the absolute zero, or about -273° Centigrade—it needs must shrink, and its molecules tend to arrange themselves in certain planes, of which one is the most frequented and is called the principal plane. In the course of aeons all these planes attract one another and resolve themselves into the principal plane. A flat object is thus formed, the particles of which are revolving nearly all in one direction around the centre of gravity of the whole (this similarity of direction being conditioned by the same law of the conservation of momentum), and the plane in which all the particles lie was precisely determined from the first by the paths of the two dead suns from which the nebula was formed.

The chaotic nebulae—the infants—are entirely gaseous. Sir William Huggins placed a spectroscope in the last inch or so of a beam of light that had left such a nebula years before, and found it to consist of brilliant lines; in other words, to be the discontinuous spectrum characteristic of a true gas. Otherwise we could not be sure that such nebulae are not clusters of stars too faint for our telescopes to make discrete to our eyes. The same observer further showed that the spiral nebulae, in which the matter is denser in some places than in others, have a continuous spectrum comparable to that of sunlight. In other words, they are beginning to solidify. The spiral nebula is composed of more or less solid bodies separated by a rare and ever rarer gas. These solid bodies, in the case of our own nebula, are now planets. In the stupendous nebula in Andromeda, the more solid portions will probably be resolved into the individual stars of a cluster.

The central portion of the solar nebula we call to-day the sun. I see that Prof. Turner, of Oxford, in his courteous and crushing reply in the "Fortnightly Review" to Dr. A. R. Wallace's article on "Man's Place in the Universe," considers that the shrinking of our nebula is sufficient to account for the sun's heat. This source alone, however, as I pointed out last week, would allow the sun a period of power so short—twenty-four millions of years—as to be incompatible with the facts of geological time. Now it can be demonstrated by the theory of "irrational numbers" that granted the stars are distributed "irrationally" or irregularly throughout space, no ray of sunlight can escape to infinity. Sooner or later each ray must be intercepted by some star, and utilised by it. We have revealed here an astounding commonwealth of energy. For if this be true of sunlight, it is likewise true of the light of every star. Each contributes to and is itself aided by the energy radiant from all the others. This is the cosmic illustration of the golden rule. Here is free trade indeed. And when our sun was far larger than he is now, his greater area enabled him to arrest proportionately more starlight—of which we are at this hour the beneficiaries.

What then does the future hold? It is as certain as the past. Science is the only veritable fortune-teller. Our system is daily parting with and degrading its finite store of energy. . . . Candidly, I have not the heart to continue. Robert Louis Stevenson, in "Pulvis et Umbra," where, in my opinion, his genius is at its height, has given us all philosophy in words which are beyond my praise. Yet I must add the sequel that is also a prelude. In time to come we believe that the solar nebula of yesterday, the solar system of to-day, will have been resolved into one cold and shrivelled mass, the common tomb of our sun and all his planets and their satellites. This dark to-be, uncrawled upon by organic life, undisturbed by even molecular activities, can be not even then "stable in desolation." It will live again. Give it but the consuming embrace of such another world, and a new nebula will be born, new in time, alien in place, yet formed of the same imperishable substance as the old. Such, as we see it from between two nebulae, that which was and that which is to be, is the rhythm of the Universe. Nor is it the least of its wonders that to us, "vital putrescence of the dust" of a weary satellite of a dying sun should a scroll so sempiternal be unfolded. "Surely not all in vain."

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

"Taken as Read."

SIR,—In last week's leading article you ask the question, "Does anyone read the classics?" A glance at the book-lists of the Home Reading Union to which, in this article, you call attention, will show that even within your severe definition of the classics—"Homer, Virgil, Dante, Milton, Shakespeare"—readers are to be found. Of the thirteen thousand readers who make use of the guidance and help of our society, none are occupied with the "current fiction which to-day is and to-morrow is cast into the oven." In his recent address, at the annual meeting of the Union, Dr. Richard Garnett pressed upon the authorities of the free libraries the advantages of co-operation with our society, and gave many practical directions as to the way in which this may be carried out. Copies of this address can be obtained from the Secretary of the National Home Reading Union, Surrey House, Victoria Embankment, W.C. The free library is the inevitable consequence of free education. The Act of 1870 created a public capable of educating itself. The capacity for self-culture led, naturally, to a demand for the means. How comes it that "the sad custodians of free libraries" have to acknowledge that "their customers seldom or never put down an order for an immortal"? No one who has not had experience of the difficulty which the selection of books presents to persons of the class for whom the free libraries are chiefly intended can realise the effect upon their minds of the bewildering choice of books which a library affords. The probability of selecting the right books appears remote.

They need the guidance of such an organisation as the Home Reading Union. The Union is the outcome of the free library, as certainly as the library is the sequel to free education. It offers guidance in the selection of books; it encourages the formation of "reading circles" in which the reader gains stimulus from discussion and comparison of results; it suggests topics for consideration, criticises essays, answers questions. The frequenter of free libraries has, not infrequently, an aspiration for culture, with but a hazy notion of the direction which it should take. The crop of earnest readers is as yet unprofitably scant; but the lament of the librarians appears to me to prove that encouragement and assistance of the kind which the National Home Reading Union provides is needed to bring free libraries into bearing.—Yours, &c., ALEX. HILL.

Downing College Lodge, Cambridge.

"More Mare's Nests."

SIR,—Your review of "Is it Shakespeare? By a Cambridge Graduate," in the ACADEMY of April 4, caused me to refer to the correspondence on this subject in "The Times" between December 18, 1901, and January 27, 1902. In a letter from Mr. Sidney Lee (December 20, 1901) I find America spoken of as "the land in which the Baconian delusion first came into being and has been chiefly nurtured." Doubtless America is the land in which it has been chiefly nurtured, but (as a Briton) I am afraid that it may possibly be unjust to America to say that it originated there, in spite of Mr. Sidney Lee's high authority. The correspondence in "The Times" tells nothing as to the originator of the discussion on this question, being occupied with its latest developments. But looking lately through the volume of "The Illustrated London News" for the second half of the year 1856, I noticed on pp. 424 and 577 some account of a pamphlet then recently published by a Mr. W. H. Smith, entitled, "Was Lord Bacon the author of Shakespeare's Plays?" the author of the pamphlet being apparently an Englishman, and certainly a Baconian. Hoping that you may know, Sir, of a still earlier work of the kind by an American.—Yours, &c., T. V. HOLMES.

28, Crooms Hill, Greenwich Park, S.E.

SIR,—In your review, under the heading of "Is it Shakespeare?" it is stated that "the whole of the pullulating mess of mushroom literature which has sprung up around the question in recent years is the production of writers who, even when they are not actually dishonest, are at least incapable of dealing with any literary problem in accordance with the canons of sound reasoning." The "mushroom literature" referred to includes evidently the two works written by Lord Penzance and Judge Webb. May I ask your reviewer if he can honestly say that the words he uses can fairly apply to these two authors?

Lord Penzance was educated at Winchester, and graduated as a Cambridge M.A. He became one of the leading barristers on the Northern Circuit, a Baron of the Exchequer, and Chief Judge of the Court of Probate and Divorce. For "sound reasoning" his book is a masterpiece.

As for Judge Webb, another Baconian, and, according to your reviewer, "incapable of dealing with any literary problem," he had a distinguished career at Trinity College, Dublin, where he graduated M.A. in 1857 and LL.D. in 1859, was Vice-Chancellor's prizeman, Downes Divinity prizeman, gold medallist for oratory, scholar and fellow of his college, professor of moral philosophy in the University, regius professor of laws and public orator, and afterwards Q.C., judge, and bencher of King's Inn.

Can your reviewer show a similar record for himself or any other Shakespearean when he comes forward with his reckless charges of dishonesty and incapability against these writers of recent Baconian literature?

Another judge—Judge Willis—some time ago published a work on the subject. As it was on the Shakespearean side it was hailed by the press, the ACADEMY included, as demolishing the Baconian arguments. This judge was to them a "Daniel come to judgment," "fair," "impartial," &c., &c., but when two other judges appear on the opposite side, they are, of course, "dishonest," "incapable," &c., &c., only lawyers, and supporting Bacon because Bacon was a lawyer! Shakespearians, apparently, can accept a "lawyer" as a witness only when that lawyer's views suit their own ideas and sensibilities.—Yours, &c., EDINBURGH. GEORGE STRONACH.

"The Light that Failed."

SIR,—I suspect the dramatisation of Mr. Kipling's novel will have caused an increased demand for the number of "Lippincott's Magazine" in which the staged version appeared; and as I have found this part difficult to pick up, I think it may interest some readers to know of another form in which the story appeared. Although an assiduous Kipling collector for some years, I have only just come across a volume entitled: "Five Complete Novels by famous authors, from Lippincott's Monthly Magazine, with short stories, essays, . . . and articles . . . Ward, Lock, Bowden, & Co. (n.d.)." It is a thick 8vo., in fancy cloth, and the first novel is "The Light that Failed."

I wonder if any among your readers has for disposal a copy of Mr. Kipling's "The Destroyers, a New Poem," in the form of a 6 pp. pamphlet, issued by Ward Lock in May, 1898. The publishers inform me that a few copies were thus done up separately for a special purpose, and I am anxious to obtain one; I have the "Windsor Magazine" containing the poem.—Yours, &c., DAVID MURRAY.

54, Church Street, Falmouth.

Private Copyright in National Manuscripts.

SIR,—As an old editor of manuscripts, I am anxious that the public should understand that the point admitted in the case of Parry v. Moring and Another is not that Mr. Parry has the copyright in manuscripts now the property of the nation, because he printed an edition of them in 1888, the manuscripts dating from 1652 to 1654; but the issue raised and settled for the first time is that when you want to print a new edition, you must have the manuscripts copied afresh, even though you remove from the printed version many hundreds of errors. It now appears that, if I had thought of claiming my "pound of flesh," I could have applied for injunctions against Prof. Skeat and the Clarendon Press, Mr. Pollard, and Messrs. Macmillan, and many other well-known scholars and publishers, and could most effectively have stopped all the increased study of English literature that their admirable labours have secured. I would a thousand times rather be an honoured defendant in such an action than plaintiff.

Will some public-spirited man of means help us to settle the real point at issue by challenging, before the highest courts if necessary, Mr. Parry's belief that he could show circumstances that would entitle him to restrain publication of these manuscripts in the British Museum, if he so desired? Or let us scholars rally round Mr. Moring, as I intend to do, and start a guarantee fund to see the matter through. It is a question of the highest national importance, and should once for all (unobscured by a technical blunder) be brought to the notice of the law officers of the crown. Who will help?—Yours, &c., F. J. FURNIVALL.

3, St. George's Square.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 185 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best description of an April day. We award the prize to Mr. F. W. Huquoil, 16, Victoria Square, Penarth, for the following:—

The morning sky is white, or the colour of the breast of a fledgling bird, luminous. Before ten it has opened, for the north-west wind is come, pure, cool, and swift, gliding and gushing past the face in waves and freshets, like an aerial river. When I go out the hedges are full of small birds balancing themselves against it on the top sprays, or leaping up in it, or sweeping past on it in flocks with soft interminable twitter. But this is not a day to watch wild creatures: the light and perpetual ripple of all vegetation screens them from observation. Nor do men and women look their best: the faces of the latter want a setting, and seem strange and shadowy. Nothing is very beautiful except the high, brilliant heaven, pale-tinted save eastward, where great white torn clouds pass along against a dark blue background. Sometimes the white clouds go altogether, and there appears a raw brown wisp of rain floating right in the bare brilliance, swept writhing hither and thither across the land in the maddest way. The whole country lies round, open to the horizon, green, flooded with light: bleached whitey-grey copses and brown ploughed fields stuck therein like tesserae badly arranged. Over them go the clouds. When I was young I used to think that the wind itself blew the colours about, like great butterflies: that vast blue one especially that always flew off into the distance whenever there was a breeze, but came flitting back at twilight. The sunset of such a day is rarely splendid: one may walk without noticing it at all into the blueish-grey evening and the sight of stars: the wind continues though, and there is no feeling of sadness.

Other replies follow:—

I stood at the breakfast-room window watching slanting lines of the light rain against a background of shrubbery. Another window, which looked seaward, presented an oblong of vivid azure, divided into squares. A minute later the sun shone out strongly, and numberless globules of moisture were flashing from different parts of the lawn. I put on my cap and left the house. Here was a day to be dealt with; there was small hope of work within doors, with such brilliant doings without. What was it to be? Golf? I moved slowly towards the links considering. It was not a question I had frequently debated—at least, of late. Throughout the winter a fine day had meant golf quite naturally, and my conscience (such as it is) had interposed no word. But with this day came an unwonted sensation. In some way it seemed too good for a game, too good even for golf (which was blasphemy, as I now, in cool blood, perceive), too good, I admitted it readily enough, for me. There was something subtle in the sunlight, a delicacy, as it were, in the breeze, a suggestion of memory in the distance, that affected me like a pathos. Memory? Why, yes, I reflected, I had felt like this before; but it must have been a great while ago, perhaps twelve months. And then all my vague sensations formulated themselves simply and in a single word—Spring! I went on to the links, and over them, but without club or ball. I went onward still—over the hills and really quite far away. I lunched at a tiny inn, and during the afternoon got drenched three times at least. But I saw much and felt more, and when I came home the Spring had penetrated to my very soul. [E. K. L., Birkenhead.]

The gorse and the fat-budded thorn bushes all up the hill-side were charged with the thunder of great wind which bored into them with fierce splendid power. Under this bright clouded sky, the sun warm where a bank balks the wind, but brought only in the full ardour of its huge breath, under this blue the constant motion of the long shining grass was wonderful to the eye, the land seemed living. Standing near it, back to wind and face to sun, the grass, as it were, fled away—millions of tiny beasts galloping in a panic up to a hillock where they changed, as the things in "Wonderland" assuredly changed, into what seemed the angry boiling surface of a pot of water. The wood at the top of the downs was roaring magnificently, but behind it the barn and the few stacks stood in such calm that they seemed, when first reached, like embodied silences. A part of the upland fenced in for sheep was speckled with bright gold and silver of dandelion and daisy, a kind of fairy pocket-money "designedly dropt." A wire net was tacked to the bottom of the fence to keep the lambs from straying, and as the wind hunted the old brown leaves out of the wood they clung in a crowd, desperately as to a last hope, against the net, but at intervals some were crushed through the openings and flashed immediately away. Two butterflies ambled about in the warm quiet air around the stacks and under the screen of the barn, red and black, the first of the year. What will happen if they get in the wind current? I stood watching them, but they kept, though it seemed unwittingly, within the shelter—perhaps fluttered no otherwhere all day long.

[A. E. C., Brighton.]

I well remember a certain—and uncertain—April day spent in the vicinity of Lea Hurst, the Derbyshire home of Florence Nightingale. From an elevation near by there stretched before us an extensive, shadow-dappled panorama of hill and dale. Far down in the valley the waters of the Derwent flashed and twinkled to the morning sun. Twitterings innumerable—with a thrush as chief musician—rose above the low plangent hum of the south-west wind in the trees behind us. From a field on our left a lark sprang up rocket-like, and burst into a golden rain of song. Exhilarating airs passed by us; now this way, now that. They swished through brakes of fern and ling, stumbled boisterously over tilted planes of meadow-land, and drove the leaves of yesteryear into nooks and crannies of the winding lane before us. Everywhere the verdurous tide was rising steadily, flecked with hawthorn bloom as the sea is flecked with foam. Everywhere was that "most excellent cordial smell" of good brown earth, and we thought with Browning that it was good to be in England "now that April's here." But at mid-day a host of vagrant rain-bearers moved across the sky. Opaque and brumous spaces, hung with the streaming curtains of the rain, approached us from the west. The twittering of birds died down and gave place to the mournful sighing of the wind through dripping branches. There came grey presences on the hills, wraiths of dead winters revisiting their ancient haunts. But not for long. The wind which brought the rain took it away again, and the sun shone out. A sparkle, brilliant and jewel-like, ran along the grass, and athwart the steely darkness of the cloud just passed appeared the seven-hued bow of promise. [A. M. C., Leicester.]

April! the month of memories, and this the day at last! I did not feel conscious of waking; I found myself caressing in my mind the lingering beauties of a fair dream, and the light breeze was gently lifting the curtain of the window—for the sash was open and the cool fresh air came straight to my pillow, and the sparrows were busy on the eaves just above. The April of my dream was not this April, the day of my dream was not this day—but the air, the air was the same, purified by the evening showers, and I jumped from my bed and dressed myself, and walked rapidly along the firm country road, mastered by a pain I could not overthrow. The trees and hedges were dripping with dew—or was it with raindrops?—the primroses were looking up with innocent wonder at the morning, and the violets lay still, couched in their perfumed encampments on the roadside. The fields, the hills seemed all silent with contentment, they had put on a new robe of colour, the wind alone stirred the leaves and intensified the atmosphere of quiet hope and promise that pervaded the whole scene. Why had all things so easily forgotten the ruins of the last springtide, why did they look with such calm assurance at the sweet morning sunlight? I quickened my steps in rebellious mood, but scarce a mile further I stopped—I fancied the winds themselves had caught my troubled thought and were moving more restlessly and violently. Even then I felt a warning drop, the sunlight darkened and a quick scud of rain sped from a detachment of clouds hurrying by. April had not forgotten, and her tears were the tears of a friend. [W. H. G., Chelsea.]

His yellow eye woke me before seven and wooed me so persuasively that the inevitable occurred. As I took fire my seducer cooled, and finally left me to a wet and wakeful hour. At ten o'clock, however, he reappeared, and suggested shopping. I tried to take my umbrella, but he ridiculed the notion. During the first half of the way I inhaled nectar and exhaled charity on all mankind; during the latter half I absorbed rain-water and disgorged temper. The sun entered the grocer's shop with me, and received the man's flattery quite unabashed.

The rest of the morning I spent drying clothes, and my betrayer assisted me indefatigably. Consequently I thawed, and in the afternoon I let him coax me into my calling costume. I sat with a friend and watched that April day frolic over her lawns and shrubs like some tireless, sweet-breathed child; we even let the rogue explore our charmed hearts and escape again through happy lips and eyes. When I started to pay my second call I was a well-dispositioned, well-dressed woman. I returned aware of having damaged, if not ruined, a friendship—a carpet, a frock, a silk petticoat, a temper, and possibly a valuable constitution. And, yet, before dropping asleep that night, I was conscious, not of loss, but of an odd sense of gain; of a soft something stirring in a dark room; of little fingers pushing, probing, coaxing; of a great shutter swinging slowly open, and a rush of noiseless sounds, of noteless songs; of long forgotten thoughts. I felt a bold yet tender onslaught and absorption, sweeter than embrace: from some imprisoning stem I seemed to burst, like the green buds, into the blue, and cry myself a tiny but essential portion of fructescence. [E. L., Didsbury.]

Competition No. 186 (New Series).

Lady Gregory's just published "Poets and Dreamers: Studies and Translations from the Irish," opens with an account of Raftery, a blind poet and fiddler, who died over sixty years ago. Lady Gregory writes: "And now the songs that he never wrote down, being blind, are known, if not as our people say, 'all over the world,' at least in all places where Irish is spoken." The following is Lady Gregory's prose translation of one of Raftery's songs:—

There's a bright flower by the side of the road, and she beats Deirdre in the beauty of her voice; or I might say Helen, Queen of the Greeks, she for whose sake hundreds died at Troy.

There is light and brightness in her as in those others; her little mouth is as sweet as the cuckoo on the branch. You would not find a mind like hers in any woman since the pearl died that was in Ballylee.

To see under the sky a woman settled like her walking on the road on a fine sunny day, the light flashing from the whiteness of her breast would give sight to a man without eyes.

There is the love of hundreds in her face, and there is the promise of the evening star. If she had been living in the time of the gods, it is not Venus that would have had the apple.

Her hair falls down below her knees, waving and winding to the mouth of her shoes; her locks spread out wide and pale like dew, they leave a brightness on the road behind her.

She is the girl that has been taught the nicest of all whose eyes still open to the sun; and if the estate of Lord Lucan belonged to me, on the strength of my cause this jewel would be mine.

Her slender lime-white shape, her face like flowers, her neck, her cheek, and her amber hair: Virgil, Cicero, and Homer could tell of nothing like her; she is like the dew in the time of harvest.

If you could see this plant moving or dancing, you could not but love the flower of the branch. If I cannot get a hundred words with Mairin Stanton, I do not think my life will last long.

She said "Good morrow" early and pleasantly; she drank my health, and gave me a stool, and it not in the corner. At the time that I am ready to go on my way I will stay talking and talking with her.

We offer a prize of One Guinea for the best rendering in English verse of Raftery's song. Not to exceed twenty lines.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 15 April, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Harris (J. Rendel), The Dioscuri in the Christian Legends.....(Clay) 6/0
Brooks (Right Rev. Phillips), Lectures on Preaching.....(Macmillan) 6/0
" " " The Influence of Jesus.....(") 6/0

POETRY, CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

- Zangwill (Israel), Blind Children.....(Heinemann) net 5/0
Crosby (Ernest), Swords and Plowshares.....(Richards) net 6/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- Streeter (A.), Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture: Botticelli..(Bell) net 5/0
Whigham (H. J.), The Persian Problem.....(Isbister) 12/6
Thrasher (Max Bennett), Tuskegee: Its Story and Its Work.....(Putnam's)
Lilly (W. S.), Christianity and Modern Civilisation: Being Some Chapters in European History.....(Chapman and Hall) net 12/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- Thoughts from Maeterlinck. Chosen and arranged by E. S. S.....(Allen) net 3/6
Hall (A. D.), The Soil.....(Murray) 3/6
Powell (J. W.), Nineteenth Annual Report of the Bureau of American Ethnology.....(Government Printing Office, Washington)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- Moss (Fletcher), Pilgrimages to Old Homes.....(The Author)
Street (Eugene E.), A Philosopher in Portugal.....(Unwin) net 5/0
Cole (G. and B.), As We Ride.....(Hodges, Figgis and Co.) net 2/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Gregory (Lady), Poets and Dreamers: Studies and Translations from the Irish.....(Murray) 6/0
Benson (F. F.), The Book of Months.....(Heinemann) 6/0
A Guide to the Early Christian and Byzantine Antiquities..(British Museum) 1/0
Blackie's Standard Shilling Directory.....(Blackie) 1/0
Gale (Norman), Barty's Star.....(Walter Scott) 2/6
Evans (Rev. H. M. M.), Why I Left St. Michael's.....(Sands) net 1/0
Meade (Mrs. L. T.), Stories from the Old Old Bible.....(Newnes) net 7/6
Beard (Lina and Adella B.), What a Girl can Make and Do.....(") net 6/0

EDUCATIONAL.

- Flecker (W. H.), The Student's Prayer-Book.....(Methuen) 2/6
Hall (H. S.) and Stevens (F. H.), A School of Geometry. Parts I. and II......(Macmillan) 1/0

NEW EDITIONS.

- Mathers (John), The History of Mr. John Decastro. 2 vols......(Quaritch) 21/0
Caine (Hall), The Manxman.....(Heinemann)
Butler (Samuel), Hudibras.....(Gresning) net 3/0
Ainsworth (W. H.), The Spendthrift.....(Gibbings) net 2/6
Flandrau (Charles Maccomb), Harvard Episodes.....(Putnam's)
Hawthorne (Nathaniel), A Wonder-Book.....(Ward, Lock) 1/0
Kingsley (Charles), The Water-Babies.....(Macmillan) net 2/0
Eliot (George), Silas Marner.....(Blackwood) net 1/0
Shelley (Percy Bysshe), Poems.....(Blackie) net 2/0
Wilson (Bishop), Sacra Privata.....(Methuen) 2/0
Cooper (E. H.), Mr. Blake of Newmarket.....(Everett) 9/6
Gerard (Morice), For England.....(Ward, Lock) 0/6
Sutcliffe (Halliwell), Kiercott of Withens.....(Unwin) 0/6
Hughes (Thomas), Tom Brown's School Days.....(Dent) net 1/6
Dickens (Charles), Great Expectations. (Biographical Edition.).....(Chapman and Hall) 5/0
" " A Tale of Two Cities. (Biographical Edition.).....(Chapman and Hall) 5/0
Pemberton (Max), The Garden of Swords.....(Cassell) 0/6

PERIODICALS.

- Connoisseur, Hibbert Journal, United Service, Manchester Quarterly, Art Journal, Idler, Geographical Journal, Playgoer, Architectural Review, Reliquary, Baconiana, World's Work, International Quarterly, Lady's Magazine, Printseller, Essex Review.

Mrs. Craigie's new novel "The Vineyard," which will be published by Mr. Fisher Unwin, and Mr. Appleton in New York, will appear first as a serial in the "Pall Mall Magazine." Mrs. Craigie has also just finished a four act comedy which has been accepted for production in London, and by Mr. Charles Frohman in New York.

Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., will publish next week the Dictionary of National Biography "Index and Epitome." It will make a volume of over fourteen hundred pages. Generally speaking, each entry in the "Index and Epitome" consists of one-fourteenth of the number of words that appear in the text of the original memoir.

The authorised translation of "Babel and Bible" by Dr. Friedrich Delitzsch, with about eighty illustrations, is in the press, and will be published by Messrs. Williams and Norgate.

Mr. H. A. L. Fisher's "Napoleonic Statesmanship: Germany," is a study in civil and administrative history. The author's object has been to describe the growth, analyse the character, and estimate the influence of the Napoleonic system in Germany. No complete history of the civil side of the Napoleonic empire has yet appeared, and it is hoped that the volume, which will be published in May by the Clarendon Press, will fill the gap as far as Germany is concerned.

In a book which will be issued shortly by Messrs. Sampson Low, Marston & Co., entitled "Oliver Cromwell, H.H. the Lord Protector, and the Royalist Insurrection of March 1655," Sir Reginald Palgrave publishes the contemporary evidence that he has collected proving Oliver Cromwell's complicity in the Insurrection.

Mr. Joseph McCabe will publish, with Messrs. Duckworth, almost immediately, a volume on "Church Discipline," being an ethical study of the Church of Rome. The author says that he aims at informing sympathetic outsiders about the methods and institutions employed by the Church in the cultivation of the ethical ideal.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready.

Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE 1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 280,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C. London;
and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

TUESDAY NEXT (APRIL 21st) at 5 o'clock. Professor ALLAN MACFADYEN, M.D., B.Sc. FIRST OF THREE LECTURES on "THE BLOOD AND SOME OF ITS PROBLEMS." Half-a-Guinea the course.

THURSDAY (APRIL 23rd) at 5 o'clock. Professor DEWAR, M.A., LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S. FIRST OF THREE LECTURES on "HYDROGEN GASEOUS LIQUID AND SOLID." Half-a-Guinea.

SATURDAY (APRIL 25th) at 3 o'clock. Professor LANGTON DOUGLAS, M.A. FIRST OF TWO LECTURES on "THE EARLY ART OF SIENA." Half-a-Guinea.

ROYAL LITERARY FUND. 113TH ANNIVERSARY.

THE ANNUAL DINNER will be held on FRIDAY, April 24th, at 7 for 7.30 p.m. precisely, at the WHITEHALL ROOMS, HOTEL METROPOLE, W.C.

Lt.-Gen. Sir IAN HAMILTON, K.C.B., D.S.O., in the Chair.

Dinner Tickets one Guinea each. Applications for Tickets should reach the Secretary not later than the morning of April 21st.

A Donation of £10 10s. or upwards constitutes the Donor a Member of the Corporation, and Donors of £5 5s. and upwards are entitled to a Ticket for the Dinner free of charge.

Donations, for which the Committee appeal, may be sent to

A. LLEWELYN ROBERTS,

Secretary.

7, Adelphi Terrace, W.C.

A New Book on the Holy Eucharist. INTROIBO

A series of detached readings on the entrance verses of the ecclesiastical year.

By Rev. CORNELIUS CLIFFORD,

304 pages. Price Six Shillings.

FATHER CLIFFORD'S Book is expository and devotional, and avoids as far as possible the beaten paths of controversy. Its aim, rather, is to direct the thoughts of all lovers of the REAL PRESENCE, Anglican and Roman Catholic alike, to the immense materials for systematic meditation and reflection, which lie practically unnoticed by the great body of the faithful, in the Sunday Introits as arranged for current use in the Mass book of the Roman rite of to-day.

An introductory essay explains the origin and scope of these portions of the liturgy, and an English translation of the entire Dominical series forms a special feature of the book.

CATHEDRAL LIBRARY ASSOCIATION.
534-536, Amsterdam Aven., New York.
BURNS & OATES, Ltd.,
28, Orchard Street, London, W.

Cr. 8vo, cloth extra, 5s. net; or on hand-made paper (only 150 copies) 12s. net.

SIDELIGHTS ON CHARLES LAMB. By BERTRAM DOBELL.

"A quite agreeable book, a collector's book, a book of genial hobbies and loving research."—The Times.
"Pleasantly distinguished by its candour, geniality, and invariable good taste."—The Athenaeum.

"The most valuable part of Mr. Dobell's book consists of extracts which bear internal evidence of Elia's hand."—Daily News.

8m. 4to, very handsomely printed on hand-made paper, 7s. 6d. net.

THE POETICAL WORKS OF THOMAS TRAHERNE. Edited by BERTRAM DOBELL.

"Traherne's is a name which can never in the future be expunged from the records of English Literature."—The Times.

"Let all lovers of good poetry rejoice with Mr. Dobell, for he has rescued out of the dust and advanced him to a deserved seat beside such men as Herbert and Vaughan."—Mr. Quiller-Couch in the Daily News.

BERTRAM DOBELL,
77, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

THE FAUNA OF BRITISH INDIA, including Ceylon and Burma. Published under the Authority of the Secretary of State for India in Council. Edited by W. T. BLANFORD. Medium 8vo, with numerous illustrations.

MAMMALIA. 1 vol. £1. FISHES. 2 vols. £1 each. BIRDS. Vol. I. £1; Vols. II-IV. 15s. each. REPTILIA and BATRACHIA. 1 vol. £1. MOTHS. 4 vols. £1 each. HYMENOPTERA. Vols. I and II. £1 each. ARACHNIDA. 1 vol. 10s. RHYNCHOTA. Vol. I. £1.

London: Taylor & Francis, Red Lion Court, Fleet Street. Calcutta and Simla: Thacker, Spink & Co. Bombay: Thacker & Co., Ltd. Burma: Myles Standish & Co., Rangoon. Berlin: Friedländer & Sohn, Carlstrasse, 11.

A LIMITED NUMBER OF THE PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS TO "THE ACADEMY"

May still be obtained, singly, at 2d. each, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

(Now Nearly Out of Print.)

BEN JONSON
JOHN KEATS
SIR JOHN SUCKLING
TOM HOOD
THOMAS GRAY
R. L. STEVENSON
SIR WALTER SCOTT
SAMUEL RICHARDSON
THOMAS DE QUINCEY
LEIGH HUNT
LORD MACAULAY
ROBERT SOUTHEY
S. T. COLERIDGE
CHARLES LAMB
MICHAEL DRAYTON
W. SAVAGE LANDOR
SAMUEL PEPYS
EDMUND WALLER
WILKIE COLLINS

JOHN MILTON
WILLIAM COWPER
CHARLES DARWIN
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON
HENRY W. LONGFELLOW
ANDREW MARVELL
ROBERT BROWNING
THOMAS CARLYLE
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY
CHARLES DICKENS
JONATHAN SWIFT
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE
THACKERAY
WILLIAM BLAKE
SIR RICHARD STEELE
ALEXANDER POPE
DOUGLAS JERROLD
FRANCIS BACON
HENRIK IBSEN

NOW READY, the SECOND NUMBER of

THE BURLINGTON MAGAZINE. FOR CONNOISSEURS.

THE CONTENTS INCLUDE:

THE WARWICK MS.—By Sir E. MAUNDE THOMPSON, K.C.B., with facsimiles of four pages of the MS. (actual size).
EVOLUTION OF FORM IN ENGLISH SILVER PLATE.—By PERCY MACQUOID, R.L. with a Collotype Plate of the famous Leigh Cup, reproduced for the first time by permission of the Mercers' Company, and five other plates.
AN UNPUBLISHED MINIATURE BY HOLBEIN, in the possession of the Queen of Holland; photograph, with a note by RICHARD B. HOLMES, C.V.O.
THREE UNPUBLISHED ITALIAN PORTRAITS.—By HERBERT COOK, F.S.A., with a photograph, a collotype, and another plate.
CLIFFORD'S INN.—By PHILIP NORMAN, F.S.A. Illustrated with three full-page and three smaller drawings by F. L. Griggs.
EARLY PAINTERS OF THE NETHERLANDS.—Article II. By W. H. JAMES WEALE. With a photograph of an unpublished picture in the collection of Madame André at Paris, and five other plates after Dirk Bouts, Roger de la Pasture, &c.
HANS SEBALD BEHAM, AND A NEW CATALOGUE OF HIS WORKS. By CAMPBELL DOUGLASSON. With three plates and several illustrations in the text.
FACSIMILE IN COLOURS OF A DRAWING BY HOLBEIN in the possession of the Duke of Devonshire, K.G.
A FINE ITALIAN BEONZE in the possession of Sir William Bennett, K.C.V.O., reproduced for the first time, with a note by the Owner.

Reproductions of various other Works of Art, with notes.

PRICE HALF-A-CROWN NET.

Annual Prepaid Subscription, including the "BURLINGTON GAZETTE" (monthly supplement, price 4d.), 35s., post free. To be obtained of all Booksellers and Railway Bookstalls, or from

THE SAVILE PUBLISHING Co., Ltd., 14, New Burlington Street, London, W.

MISS BRADDON'S NEW NOVEL THE CONFLICT

Cloth, 6s.

WILL BE PUBLISHED ON MONDAY

LONDON: SIMPKIN & Co., LTD.

SENT FREE.

PAMPHLETS on The Unitarian Religion, by DR. MARTINEAU, REV. STOPFORD BROOKE, and other writers, including "UNITARIAN CHRISTIANITY EXPLAINED," "WHY AM I A UNITARIAN," "THINK FOR YOURSELF," and "CHRISTIANITY AS CHRIST PREACHED IT."—Apply to Miss FRANCES E. COOKE, 2, Silverdale Road, Oxtou, Cheshire.

The Religious Tract Society's SPRING LIST.

A NEW BOOK BY BISHOP WELLDON:

Youth and Duty:

Sermons to Harrow Schoolboys. By the Right Rev. J. E. C. WELLDON, D.D., Canon of Westminster, sometime Bishop of Calcutta, and formerly Head Master of Harrow School. With a Photogravure Portrait. Uniform with Bishop Moule's "Thoughts for the Sundays of the Year." Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

Steadfast unto Death;

or, Martyred for China. Memorials of Thomas Wellesley and Jessie Pigott. By C. A. PIGOTT. With seven full-page Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

A Miracle of Modern Missions;

The Story of Matula, a Congo Convert. By JOHN BELL, Baptist Missionary, Wathen, Congo. With a Preface by the Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, and seven full-page Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s.

Athanasii De Incarnatione Verbi Dei;

Athanasius on the Incarnation of the Word of God. An English translation, with an Introduction. Synopsis and Notes by T. HERBERT BINDLEY, M.A., D.D. Second Edition, revised throughout. Crown 8vo, buckram gilt, 2s.

Roads from Rome:

A Series of Personal Narratives. Compiled by Rev. C. S. ISAACSON, M.A. With a Preface by the BISHOP OF DURHAM. Second Edition, revised. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

CHEAP EDITION.—TWELFTH THOUSAND.

James Chalmers;

His Autobiography and Letters. By RICHARD LOVETT, M.A., Author of "James Gilmour of Mongolia," &c. With Maps and Portraits. Fifth and Popular Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Also in handsome binding for presentation, padded paste grain, gilt line, round corners, gilt edges, gold roll. 6s. 6d. net.

A NEW STORY BY MRS. VAIZEY.

Pixie O'Shaughnessy.

By Mrs. GEORGE DE HORNE VAIZEY, Author of "About Peggy Saville," "A Houseful of Girls," &c. With seven full-page Illustrations by W. H. C. GROOME. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

A NEW STORY BY AMY LE FEUVRE.

Jill's Red Bag.

By AMY LE FEUVRE, Author of "Probable Sons," "Teddy's Button," &c. With seven full-page Illustrations by ALFRED PEARSE. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s.

A Sailor Apostle.

A Story of the Sea, founded on fact. By FRANK T. BULLEN, Author of "With Christ at Sea," &c. Long 8vo, paper covers, 6d.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
LONDON.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

A GUIDE TO THE DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY.

Now Ready. In One Volume of 1,464 pages. Royal 8vo. Price 25/- net in Cloth, or 32/- net in Half-Morocco.

Dictionary of National Biography Index and Epitome.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

This volume is intended to form a summary guide to the vast and varied contents of the Dictionary and its Supplement. Every name, about which substantive biographic information is given in the sixty-three volumes of the Dictionary or in the three Supplementary Volumes, finds mention here in due alphabetical order. An Epitome is given of the leading facts and dates that have been already recorded at length in the pages of the original work, and there is added a precise reference to the volume and page where the full article appears.

The exclusive aim of the index and Epitome is to make bare facts and dates as ready of rapid reference as possible.

A few errors of fact and date which figure in the original work have been corrected in the Index; but with that reservation, the Index literally reflects in brief and bald outline the results embodied in the Dictionary and Supplement.

The separate articles which it supplies amount to 30,378; the cross references number 3,474.

NEW VOLUME BY K. & HESKETH PRICHARD.

Just Published.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

ROVING HEARTS.

By K. & HESKETH PRICHARD,

Authors of "A Modern Mercenary," "Karadac; Count of Gersay," "Tammer's Duel," &c.

SPECTATOR.—"It is as a portrait gallery of unknown, unconscious and unselfish Empire builders that this volume makes its strongest appeal. . . . These stories arrest and rivet attention by their dramatic concentration and their vivid interpretation of some of the most notable characteristics of the British race."

DAILY NEWS.—"Every page is interesting. These stories are gems of skilful craftsmanship."

NEW NOVEL BY HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

Published To-day.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

CROWBOROUGH BEACON.

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON,

Author of "Little Lady Mary," "A Friend of Nelson," &c.

"The scene is laid in Sussex at the time of the Napoleonic wars, and for its machinery the story utilizes the two great forces which moved the South Coast at that period—religious revivalism and the contraband trade. Into this is woven the romance of two neighbouring great houses."

CORNELIUS.

By Mrs. DE LA PASTURE,

Author of "Deborah of Tod's," "Adam Grigson," &c.—SECOND IMPRESSION.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

SPECTATOR.—"Cornelius" is the kind of book to which one settles down, after the experience of a few pages, with the conviction of a pleasant time to come. A book which makes one feel sorry, as we near the end, to see how little remains."

THE BONNET CONSPIRATORS.

By VIOLET A. SIMPSON. Crown 8vo. 6s.

BRITISH WEEKLY.—"A charming bit of romance. . . . A very clever story, told with considerable skill and a sense of the dramatic."

SHEFFIELD TELEGRAPH.—"A well-written, well-told, and deeply interesting story."

OUTLOOK.—"A spirited tale of smugglers on the Sussex coast in Waterloo year, with a thread of history and love interest."

NEW NOVEL BY E. W. HORNUNG.

On April 30th.—With a Frontispiece. Crown 8vo. 3s. 6d.

NO HERO. By E. W. HORNUNG,

Author of "A Bride from the Bush," "The Amateur Cracksmen," "Peccavi," &c.

The story of an officer, invalided home from the War, who is asked by a lady friend to rescue her son from the toils of a supposed adventures at Zermatt. The officer relates how he effected his delicate commission, and the unexpected denouement.

THE NEW NATION.

A Sketch of the Present Conditions of Life, and of the Economic and Political Outlook in the Australian Commonwealth. By PERCY F. ROWLAND, late Scholar of Hertford College, &c. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [On April 30th.]

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1615. Established 1869. London: 18 April 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 379

REVIEWS.

Life and Letters of Brooke Foss Westcott, D.D., D.C.L., sometime Bishop of Durham	383
Letters from a Self-made Merchant to His Son	384
A New English Dictionary	385
In the Andamans and Nicobars	386
Variation in Animals and Plants	386
Cecilia Gonzaga	387
George Canning and His Times: A Political Study	388
SHORT NOTICES:
The Autobiography of Peter Taylor—Barty's Star—Millionaires and Kings of Enterprise	388
FICTION:
As a Tree Falls—From the Unvarying Star—His Grace's Grace—Cornet Strong of Ireton's Horse	389
Notes on the Week's Novels	390

ARTICLES.

LIVING HISTORY	391
Applied Fiction	392
Paris Letter	392
Impressions—XXVIII. An Interlude	393
DRAMA:
"Everyman" on Notting Hill. E. K. Chambers	394
ART:
Marbles and Memories. C. L. H.	395
SCIENCE:
The Inner Limit of Vision. C. W. Saleeby	396
CORRESPONDENCE:
"The Sayings of Jesus"	397
Mary Arden's House at Wilmcote	397
"Piction and Froth"	397
Pioneers of the "Delusion"	398
"Taken as Read"	399
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
English Verse-rendering of a song of Rastery's from Lady Gregory's "Poets and Dreamers"	399

The Literary Week.

THE issue of books during the past week, owing to the interruptions of the Easter holidays, has been very meagre. But nothing stays the productiveness of the minor poet. No fewer than six volumes of verse have reached us since last Tuesday, ranging from a drama of the years 1431-2, to a sheaf of verses "occasionally humorous," in one of which the author frankly states that "No meanings in my poems lurk, beyond what any man can see." The Unit Library, "sold at prices based on the length of each book," proceeds apace. Keble's "Christian Year" we observe contains twelve units, Sheridan's "Plays" twenty. Among the books of the week we note the following:—

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHY, INDEX AND EPITOME.

A valuable and fitting conclusion to the great work designed by the late Mr. George Smith. The volume forms a summary guide to the general contents of the Dictionary and its Supplement. "Every name, about which substantive biographic information is given in the sixty-three volumes of the Dictionary or in the three Supplementary volumes" is mentioned in due alphabetical order. Each entry consists of about one-fourteenth of the number of words which appear in the text of the original memoir.

THE CABINET OF IRISH LITERATURE. VOLUME IV.

This volume of a new edition includes selections mainly from the work of modern writers. The selections are judicious and varied. Some of the writers are practically unknown to English readers, but many are, of course, perfectly familiar. Mr. W. B. Yeats, Dr. Douglas Hyde, Mr. Bernard Shaw, and over eighty other writers are represented. A brief biographical and literary notice is given of each author; for these, Mr. Charles A. Read is responsible, and for the extension and revision of the work, Mrs. Hinkson. The volume includes some portraits and illustrations.

TWO YEARS AT THE FRONT WITH THE MOUNTED INFANTRY. Being the Diary of Lieutenant B. Moeller.

A volume having, in the circumstances of its publication, a pathetic interest. Lieutenant Moeller served with distinction in South Africa, and died fighting. His column of 250 men had been riding all night; at dawn they were met by a party of 500 of the enemy. Lieutenant Moeller, having got his men into safety, saw one of his troopers, who was wounded and had surrendered, being treacherously shot by the Boers. He rode to his assistance, was surrounded, emptied his revolver at the enemy and fell mortally wounded. The diary is brisk and virile. We read in the preface: "Should this simple diary fall into the hands of any outside the circle of his comrades and friends, will they make allowance for the fact that the writer was a soldier and not a penman?" The proceeds of the sale of the volume are to be devoted to the assistance of disabled soldiers.

THE art of correspondence has been well illustrated by the letters appearing in "The Times" under the heading "Parry v. Moring and Another." Mr. Parry's latest letter is delightfully colloquial. We say nothing about the merits of the case, but we smile over Mr. Parry's hits at Dr. Furnivall and Mr. Gollancz. He says: "When, however, the learned doctor abuses me and my work and Mr. Skeat joins in with his words of dispraise—there was a Mr. Skeat, by-the-bye, who helped Gollancz in his work—when these two 'scholars' contend that I am an ass, utterly unfit to edit anything, so great is my respect for 'scholars'—on their literary, not on their moral side—that I can only bow my head in silence. Agreed that my book is what the modern school girl calls a 'rotter.' Why appropriate it? Why not do a better? Why crib its text and its arrangement and some of its worst notes? Why not take off your coat and do the work for yourself? I did several months' honest work at my edition. I am a 'careless fellow,' says Dr. Furnivall. So be it; but that does not allow a more careful fellow to appropriate my work." Mr. Parry will have it that his work on the Dorothy Osborne Letters has been "cribbed." "The facts of this case shall be put beyond all controversy," he says. "I will print the evidence as soon as I can find time."

"SAINT GEORGE" is naturally more concerned with Ruskin than with any one else. In the current issue most of the pages are devoted to him whom his many lovers still delight to call "the Master." Master he was, though perverse and illogical enough in detail; in the main he stood for beauty and the best in life and letters. A contributor to "Saint George" supplies some recollections characteristic of Ruskin as Slade Professor at Oxford. We read:—

Concerning the Oxford lectures much has been written, and I will not go over oft-trodden ground—only say this, that, next to the apostle himself, no one, I suppose, in style and manner was ever so Pauline. He would go off at a word, leave the main argument, give you parenthesis within parenthesis, and an argument in each, lay open his very heart to you, show how something since the last lecture had angered or pleased him, thrust at you sentence after sentence of pointed irony, as if you were against him and not with him, and then drop from the high mocking tone to that of gentlest pleading, and so back to the manuscript before him. The secret of his power lay, I think, partly in his comprehensiveness—life, not art, was really his theme—and partly in his fearlessly original way of thinking out his own thoughts and compelling language to express them. He had no faculty for making use of common material, either as accepted opinion or as accepted phrase, and this independence gave a singular charm to everything he said, whether you accepted it or not. At the same time, though he could not appropriate, he was provokingly ready to give importance to the utterances of quite unimportant people. Anything would be caught up—a letter or a paragraph, a pamphlet or a sermon—and his humility, and profession of obligation, were as perplexing as his self-reliance. I had to struggle hard myself, one day, not to be preserved in amber.

These freakish alternations of confidence and diffidence were sometimes as amusing as they were confusing. He would fling out wildly at you; at the music stool you were sitting on, with its blunt, machine-turned edges; at the pictures on your walls; and then come and stand by you, and with folded hands and half-closed eyes ask you, repentantly, to lecture him.

Some of the letters here printed are quite delightful Ruskin:—

Love to Connie; and tell her, in Utopia young ladies won't think of imitating Christ, but of imitating wiser young ladies than themselves, and street sweepers won't think of imitating Christ, but of saving pence enough to keep them from pawning their boots.

The letters given later, dated from Brantwood, are less buoyant:—

I'm not overworking, and never will any more, but the doctors are all quite unable to make me out. My work is to me Air and Water, and they might just as well tell a sick fish to lie on its back, or a sick swallow to catch no flies, as me not to catch what's in the air of passing fancy.

The last letter given indicated to its recipient, in the light of later events, the "warning sign":—

It is a shame never to have thanked you for your lovely letter—but my life is all a shame to me now, in its weakness and failure. But I have health enough yet, thank God, to do tranquil work, and my friends will, I hope, still be a little pleased about me in seeing it done. Don't plague yourself about personally helping me at Sheffield or in other things, but use your own proper influence to make people do what is wise and right—each in their place—and explain what you care for of my work and me to them—and, above all, think of the things I try to teach—non-usury for instance, and agricultural life—in themselves, and not in any connection with me. I hope we may have many talks and plays yet.

"The talks and plays," says the writer, "never came."

THERE would seem to be a quite obvious morality about the disposal of autograph copies of books, by living authors, yet it is a morality which is being continually sinned against. In half-a-dozen recent second-hand booksellers' lists we have come across volumes bearing their authors' presentation signatures. In extreme cases, of course, the thing might be condoned; it is conceivable that the recipient of an autograph copy might be so at odds with luck that he might have to compound with his conscience for a meal. But instances of this sort cannot be so common as the booksellers' catalogues would suggest. One has the same feeling in the disposal of a library; a man dies, and his executors, as often as not, disperse without compunction books which were the very life and soul of the dead. We recall a recent instance in which this certainly was the case. If a man is besieged by presentation copies, and cannot give them shelf room, he should at any rate, before disposing of them, tear out the recording page.

WE have received from Messrs. Spink an interesting letter, too long to print in full, concerning the Saitaphernes tiara. The question of the authenticity of the tiara is being carefully inquired into, but in the meantime our correspondent's letter throws some light upon the matter. Messrs. Spink's great point is that experts in the goldsmith's craft have not been heard; on the literary side, too, they assert that there is "a widespread misunderstanding as to what is claimed for the Olbia treasures":—

A favourite argument for their assumed falsity is that the style is not purely Greek. Unfortunately for this argument a purely Greek origin has never been claimed for them. Hence the ingenious fabric based upon a supposed grammatical blunder in one of the inscriptions upon the form and style of certain of the letters, and upon the incontestably unclassical nature of portions of the chasing, falls to pieces like a house of cards. Substitute for your Greek artificer a Scythian instructed in Greek methods of work and only partially imbued with Greek ideas, and how easy it is to understand the misuse of an accusative, the perhaps unusual appearance of a Greek inscription with letters in relievo and the barbarous or semi-barbarous character of some of the embossed figures. Instead, therefore, of these facts affording evidence, as has been so confidently urged, of a forger's hand, they may yet be found to range themselves on the other side of the argument, and be accepted as inferential evidence of a Græco-Scythian origin.

Messrs. Spink's own belief in the genuineness of the tiara rests as much upon intrinsic as external evidence. They do not doubt that forgeries of Græco-Scythian art treasures exist, but they assert that these false pieces only deceive superficial examiners. The present conclusion of the whole matter is that the public should suspend its judgment until the full inquiry has been held.

THE Spring Number of "To-day" is to publish a short story by the late Frank Norris, which, we are told, contains a complete "epic of the wheat" in miniature on lines which he intended to develop in the third volume of his wheat trilogy, "The Wolf." It seems to us not unlikely that this story was the first condensed draft of the projected novel. A few novelists—those who do not mind labouring at their art—make it a rule to work out their schemes not only in bare detail, but with considerable fulness—even to suggested dialogue, and so on. One writer of distinction makes a first sketch which often runs to twenty thousand words.

WE learn from the "New York American's Saturday Review" that the best selling books during a recent week were the following:—

- "Lady Rose's Daughter"
- "Lovey Mary,"
- "The Star Dreamer,"
- "Letters of a Self-Made Merchant to His Son,"
- "The Pit" and "The Four Feathers."
- "Under the Rose."

Three of these are English novels, which shows that America is not yet wholly self-supporting in fiction. Not long ago it seemed that America was by way of giving us up.

PROFESSIONAL jealousy, as we are so often told, reaches its flower on the stage; but in France it goes further than with us. A French writer has been talking to Madame Sarah Bernhardt about her still unacted play, "The Duchess Catherine," and the gist of the conversation is printed in the New York "Lamp." The writer says:—

France has no monopoly of the actor-playwright to-day, but France hampers her literary actors with restrictions which are certainly unique, and it is of these restrictions, as illustrated in one particularly notable case, that I intend to write.

Professional jealousy is at the bottom of the whole imbroglio. The spirit of jealousy and of personal interest burns so fiercely in our theatrical world that the actors in one of our companies would never consent to interpret a play written by one of their number. On the other hand the manager, who has difficulty enough in keeping the peace under the most favourable conditions, would never voluntarily court trouble by imposing upon his company a play by one of his actors. He decidedly prefers leaving the experiment to one of his fellow managers.

This, apparently, is why "The Duchess Catherine" has not been produced. Said Madame Bernhardt:—

When I think that if Molière could come back to us to-day, he would not have the right to play his "Misanthrope," or his "Avare" in his own theatre—the rules of the Société des Auteurs Dramatiques would not permit it. He would never die on the stage, now, in pronouncing the "juro" of his "Malade Imaginaire." The Société des Auteurs Dramatiques would see to it that he had no opportunity for anything so irregular. They would stand with their list of rules and forbid him to act in his own play, on his own stage, in his own theatre! Evidently other countries are more liberal than our France. One must admit it, since, in more than one country actors and authors buy theatres for the express purpose of being able to produce their own plays as they want them produced.

But some day, no doubt, we shall see Madame Bernhardt's play.

THE same magazine prints an interview with Mr. Henry Harland. The author of "The Cardinal's Snuff-Box" said:—

I write novels because it's more sport than fox-hunting. I never could shoot a bird, but fox-hunting is great sport. Novel-writing, however, is even finer. Besides you yourself always are "in at the death," and, if you are lucky, get the "brush."

Mr. Harland evidently takes novel-writing as most men take their liqueurs.

THE death of Mr. E. H. Vizetelly was, in its circumstances, more than ordinarily sad. It seems altogether wrong that the man who did such good things as a war correspondent and otherwise should be taken from a Rowton Home to an infirmary to die. Yet such things have happened before, and will continue to happen to the end of the chapter. Mr. Vizetelly's most remarkable achievement was the finding of Stanley. He was always prepared to go anywhere at any moment. When Mr. James Gordon-Bennett telegraphed to him to ask him to undertake the expedition, he replied, "I'll go to Timbuctoo if you like."

THE Chicago "Dial," discussing the matter of post-humous and contemporary fame, comes to the conclusion that in our age genius cannot go unrecognised; the means of communication are so manifold that even though only the few appreciate, that few will so influence the masses that they, too, will believe. This may be possible in the case of talent which turns itself to scientific discovery and the like, but we very much doubt whether it is true of literature. Generalizations on such a theme are of small value. The "Dial" says:—

The judgments of no age concerning itself are to be taken as wholly conclusive. It may well be that posterity will place different estimates from ours upon the work of many of the men of our age, but the general truth remains that these judgments of ours, taken as a whole, more closely approximate to those which will receive the sanction of posterity than the judgments of past ages concerning themselves have approached the final estimate of mankind.

To that generalisation we cannot give our full adherence; indeed, no serious student of modern literature and literary criticism could support it. Again, the "Dial" makes the old assertion that the man whom his own age has failed to appreciate has been in advance of that age, that only the elect saw his greatness. In the case of literature such an hypothesis cannot reasonably be supported. Was Keats in advance of his age? Not at all. Indeed, no poet—that is to say no essential poet—can be in advance of any age. The real truth of the matter is that contemporary criticism and contemporary appreciation are, in the main, ephemeral. The true test of permanence can only be supplied by the sifted judgments of the best of several generations, and even so the finest may not reach its proper place. To say, as the "Dial" says, "had Shakespeare lived in the nineteenth century instead of in the sixteenth, we may rest assured that he would have found an appreciative audience, and one whose verdict would only have become confirmed by the centuries following," is really to evade the whole question. Personally we are not at all sure that a nineteenth century Shakespeare would have been in love with his critics and his period.

THE "Whim" is one of those little American publications which reach us from time to time apparently without cause. The "Whim" describes itself as a "Periodical without a tendency." To judge from its contents, however, we gather that its tendency is in the direction of foolishness. Amongst similar matter we read: "Of all recent governmental crimes,—and what is history but a list of them?—the Durbar is perhaps the worst." Does the "Whim" find readers, even at five cents, who are interested in that kind of thing?

THE wail of the unpublished continues to assail high heaven. We have just received "Pages from Rejected MSS.," a little pamphlet of four-and-twenty pages, in verse, of course. The writer, Mr. R. Trevalga, says in his preface:—

Some of the following poems have been praised—in one or two cases very warmly praised—by several of the most prominent of English critics and men of letters. On the other hand, they have been ruthlessly rejected by all the editors and publishers to whom they have been submitted. But as those who praised them were personally unknown to the author, he still clings to the hope that the praise did not mean merely disinclination to give pain by revealing the truth in all its hardness. He, therefore, decided years ago to appeal, whenever he could, to a wider audience. Unfortunately, the same reasons which have kept these verses so long in MS., now prevent him from making the volume as representative as he would have wished of his work, and even from publishing anything at all with careful and comparatively final revision.

So much of our time is occupied in reading books which are, as it were, authentically published, that we cannot find space to discuss Mr. Trevalga's verse. If any of our readers are inclined to read Mr. Trevalga for themselves, they may procure, for half-a-crown, a copy of his pamphlet by writing to 3, Rhos Cottages, The Woodlands, Conway.

AMERICA on the whole seems to be satisfied with Mr. J. S. Sargent's portrait of President Roosevelt. The picture is simple and direct, the figure standing out strongly from a light background.

THE interest in Charles Lamb never fails; his lovers are always praising him in little books. There has just reached us a volume by Mr. John Rogers, entitled "With Elia and his Friends," which at any rate has the right Lamb spirit. Mr. Rogers says: "You must look for only scant originality in this little book. You will find in it no epoch-making enunciation of truth—only a string of quiet recognitions of the comfort of home and the companionship of books. It is just a simple record of some hours of enjoyment spent by one whose path in life leads daily into the world, and who depends considerably on the peace which lingers in a library for health to enable him to do his work."

Bibliographical.

THE issue of Mr. Kitton's "Poems and Verses of Charles Dickens" has led more than one person, I daresay, to turn to Mr. R. H. Shepherd's "Plays and Poems of Charles Dickens," published, in an edition limited to 150 copies, in 1885. One finds that Mr. Kitton gives two "poems" omitted by Mr. Shepherd, and that Mr. Shepherd printed two "poems" now omitted by Mr. Kitton. Mr. Shepherd's omissions were Gabriel Grub's song in "The Pickwick Papers" and the lines addressed to Mark Lemon. Mr. Kitton's are "The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman," first published, with pictorial illustrations by George Cruikshank, in 1839, and five four-line stanzas called "The Blacksmith" which appeared in "All the Year Round" twenty years later. It would be interesting to know whether or no Mr. Kitton accepts these two pieces as by Dickens, and, if he does accept them as such, what his reasons are for excluding them from his collection. Most of the humour of the "Lord Bateman" ballad lies in the prose notes appended to it. "The Blacksmith" opens thus:—

Old England, she has great warriors,
Great princes and poets great;
But the Blacksmith is not to be quite forgot
In the history of the State.
He is rich in the best of metals,
Yet silver he lacks and gold;
And he payeth his due, and his heart is true,
Though he bloweth both hot and cold.
The boldest is he of incendiaries
That ever the wide world saw,
And a forger as rank as e'er robb'd the Bank,
Though he never doth break the law.

I forgot to note last week that Mr. Percy Fitzgerald, in his little book on John Forster, remarks concerning a private recitation of Bulwer's "Walpole": "All the characters spoke and carried on conversation in hexameters. The effect was ridiculous." It may have been so, especially with Forster as the reciter. But may not Mr. Fitzgerald's memory, as to the hexameters, be at fault? "Walpole," as published in 1869, was described on the title-page as "a comedy in rhyme," and it certainly contained no hexameters. The versification was after this fashion. Walpole says at one point—

Yes, the change from Queen Anne to King George, we must own,
Renders me and the Whigs the sole props of the Throne.
For the Tories their Jacobite leanings disgrace,
And a Whig is the only safe man for a place.

Whereupon, Walpole's "confidant," Veasey, adds—

And the Walpoles of Houghton, in all their relations,
Have been Whigs to the backbone for three generations.

Now, this sort of thing, throughout a three-act comedy, is unquestionably no joke. But at least it is not hexameters!

Some weeks ago I had a paragraph in this column on the subject of the works of fiction published by Mr. Henry James in this country. Since then I have received from a correspondent in the West Country a request for "a complete list of that author's publications in England, with their dates and publishers." This is rather a large order, and if I am to fulfil it I must do it by instalments. I will begin by giving to-day what is, I believe, "a complete list" of Mr. James's publications in England apart from fiction:—"French Poets and Novelists" (1878), "Hawthorne" (Macmillan, 1878), "Portraits of Places" (Macmillan, 1883), "Partial Portraits" (Macmillan, 1888), "A Little Tour in France" (Osgood, 1885, and Heinemann, 1900), "Essays in London and Elsewhere" (Osgood, 1893), and "Theatricals" [four comedies in two volumes] (Osgood, 1894, 1895). If I have forgotten anything, I hope my readers will set me right. It may be added that Mr. James has written introductions, critical or "appreciative," to "The Odd Number" [thirteen tales by Guy de Maupassant] (1891), the "Last Studies" of H. Crackanthorpe (1897), Pierre Loti's "Impressions" (1898), "The Vicar of Wakefield" (1900), "Madame Bovary" (1902), and Balzac's "Two Young Brides" (1902).

According to a paragraphist usually trustworthy, Mrs. Hugh Bell intends to give to the press a play called "The Dean of St. Paul's." One wonders whether the title as thus given is a slip of the pen, or, if not, whether the present holder of the Deanery has been consulted in the matter. We have had deans in drama before now, but they have not been called Dean of Westminster or Dean of Canterbury. Mr. Pinero put a dean into his "Dandy Dick," but he called him Dean of St. Marvell's. Mr. Sidney Grundy and Mr. F. C. Philips had a dean in "A Dean's Daughter," but they dubbed him Dean of Southwick—and a good thing too, for he was a very objectionable dean. Deans, I suppose, are, as such, fair game for the dramatists, but not the Deans of St. Paul's.

No sooner are we promised a Library of Standard Autobiographies than there comes the announcement of a Library of Standard Biographies. No doubt this will find many patrons, but the idea embodied in it can scarcely be characterized as novel. It was included, for instance, in the conception of the Minerva Library, in which were comprised wonderfully cheap editions of Lockhart's "Burns," Forster's "Goldsmith," Stanley's "Dr. Arnold," Torrens's "Melbourne," and the like. Now that the Minerva Library is (apparently) discontinued, there will be a welcome for the "Library of Standard Biographies"; only, it is to be hoped that the selection will not run on too familiar or too narrow lines.

The little books which Messrs. Low and Co. advertise as "Choice Classics for Collectors" are, I take it, reprints from the "Bayard" series which Hain Friswell edited for the firm "a many years ago." The selection from Coleridge's poems will always be valuable on account of the introductory essay by Mr. Swinburne; nor, I think, has the translation of selected passages from La Rochefoucauld's "Reflections" been superseded. The same may be said of "The Words of Wellington" and of Buchanan's "Ballad Stories of the Affections." The format of the "Bayard" series was, in neatness and prettiness, much in advance of the times.

Very acceptable will be the new edition of the late Lord Dufferin's entertaining "Letters from High Latitudes." I fancy that the latest edition—the eighth—dates as far back as 1887.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Treasure of the Humble.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF BROOKE FOSS WESTCOTT, D.D., D.C.L.,
SOMETIME BISHOP OF DURHAM. By his son, Arthur
Westcott. 2 vols. (Macmillan. 17s. net.)

THE biography of a great churchman is one of the most difficult of biographies to write, particularly in times when theology and active religious work are no longer involved with political intrigue and the direction of secular affairs. The difficulty in such a work is to present the man with any degree of conviction. Most men are very properly intent upon their own affairs, but let a statesman or a lawyer or a writer be ever so intent on his profession he will yet express in his correspondence and his life more detachment and more of the perpetual interest of the carnal man than the theologian. This, no doubt, is inevitable, is even as it should be, but the task of the biographer is made heavier on account of the very virtues of his subject. Mr. Westcott has avoided the chief dangers of his task; his book, in fact, is excellent alike in tone and matter. Dr. Westcott is allowed to speak for himself, and all the letters from his correspondents which are printed really have some value as contributions to our understanding of a beautiful and most distinguished personality. Mr. Westcott's linking narrative is simple and sincere, and his reverence touches us with a quite personal directness.

The chapters dealing with the Bishop's early life naturally have more general interest than the record of his later influence and success. He was one of the many distinguished men whose nursery, as it were, was King Edward's School, Birmingham. A valuable sketch of him during his school days is given by his brother-in-law, the Rev. T. M. Middlemore-Whithard. Young Westcott was an assiduous worker, and on occasion a reasonably good fighter; he was strongly influenced by art and music, and had an inherited taste for geology and botany. Primarily and in all things he was a sincere labourer; his reading was remarkably wide, and he had an almost morbid dread of appearing to reach after University successes. He attained them, nevertheless, and was amongst the most brilliant of his Cambridge contemporaries. There was always in Westcott a certain strain of mysticism, of exaltation, which at times appeared to separate him from his fellows; mysticism and exaltation have always been a little suspect in the English Church, and there were those who later were misunderstanding enough to doubt Westcott's fidelity to the simple foundations of his faith. He had his seasons of doubt, but they were over-passed before he took any binding step. In his diary for 1846 we read:—

1st January. Communion in the morning. How shall I account for a sudden and strange feeling with which I am filled that I ought to retire to a monastery, or live in entire seclusion? Not that I believe the Romish creed, but their practise allures me.

Such a feeling was not to be avoided in such a temperament as Westcott's, though he was never practically allured by Rome. The religious revival of which Cambridge was the centre had not the same dangers as those which sprang up around the Tractarian movement at Oxford, and its public appeal was never so strong. Later, indeed, Westcott was inclined to be unjust to Rome, and in particular to Newman. At the time of Newman's secession, however, he was deeply moved, and wrote concerning it to the lady whom he subsequently married: "When a man of his learning and practical piety and long experience does such a thing, may not one young, ignorant, and inexperienced, doubt? These times are dreadful times—one need 'watch and pray.'"

The story of Westcott's courtship is very simple, but not without subconscious humour. His letters to Miss Whittard, who was a nonconformist, show considerable skill in cautious leading, a leading which resulted in the lady's baptism and the addition of the baptismal name of Mary. It would be difficult to say just how certain of these letters escape priggishness, but they do escape it; or perhaps the touch of priggishness is redeemed and overlaid by their transparent sincerity. The influence of Keble over Westcott was great; in a letter to Miss Whittard he said: ". . . I am more fully convinced than ever that Keble has found the truest and noblest end of poetry—to calm and cheer and soothe and train the mind by the simple teaching of nature, and not to rouse and ruffle and excite it by 'dream intense of earthly passion.'" In another letter he wrote:—

Yesterday we had a splendid walk to the monastery (at Gr^{âce} Dieu). . . . We went into the chapel, but I cannot say that I was so much pleased with it as before, and the reason was that I did not hear the solemn chant of those unearthly voices which seem clearly to speak of watchings and fastings, and habits of endurance and self-control which would be invaluable if society could reap their fruits. . . .

Shortly afterwards he found the doors of an oratory on a neighbouring hill open, and went in to kneel down before a "Pi^{età}":—

The sculpture was painted, and such a group in such a place and at such a time was deeply impressive. . . . Had I been alone I could have knelt there for hours.

It is rather curious to read just after this, concerning a crucifix which stood at a roadside,—“I wish it had been a cross. I wish earnestly we had not suffered superstition to have brought that infamy on the emblem of our religion which persecution never could affix to it.” But Westcott was a man of moods not always reasonable, though he was inflexible in general purpose.

We cannot follow in any detail this record of a full and eager life; we can do no more than gather together certain facts and impressions which may help our readers to some understanding of the man. For seventeen years Westcott was an assistant-master at Harrow, for twenty years he held the Divinity Professorship at Cambridge; he was a Canon of Peterborough, a Canon of Westminster, and finally Bishop of Durham, in which episcopate he succeeded his friend and beloved pupil Lightfoot. Through every change of events he remained a strenuous worker and a man of extreme simplicity of life. In his later years at Harrow, his biographer tells us, he was very full of the idea of a "C^œnobium":—

Every form of luxury was to him abhorrent, and he viewed with alarm the increasing tendency amongst all classes of society to encourage extravagant display and wasteful self-indulgence. His own extreme simplicity of life is well known to all his friends. He could never to the end of his life reconcile himself to dining late. . . . He looked to the family and not the individual for the exhibition of the simple life.

The "C^œnobium," however, remained a dream, though the younger members of Westcott's family looked towards its practical possibility with some apprehension. The move from Harrow, with comparative opulence, to Peterborough, with its precarious income, meant a very real sacrifice. Simplicity of living had to be held to the letter, and meat, save on Sundays, was abolished from the family breakfast table. The future Bishop, in order to get a summer holiday at all, was obliged to take a continental chaplaincy. Wherever he was he wrote continually to his family and friends, and particularly to Lightfoot, Benson, and Hort. Much of the family correspondence is delightful; the following extract from a letter addressed jointly to his seven sons shows a concise touch on character:—

Shall I give each of you a riddle of advice?

BR. Look at everything all round, behind and before, and then at last decide what you will do with it.

A. Build solidly and don't stuff up holes with putty.

H. They can conquer who believe they can. First thoughts are best.

G. They win who think they may lose. Second thoughts are best.

F. When you have done a thing, do it again and again.

BE. If you are happy enough to be right, be thankful. If you are wrong, blame yourself.

BA. Be very merry, and get strong while you can.

When the call to Durham came, Westcott had fears and misgivings, genuine fears and misgivings, in no way allied to the mock-humility which so often degrades satisfied ambition. To Archbishop Benson he wrote:—

I can say nothing, and I am utterly overwhelmed. If you knew my unutterable unfitness and weakness, you would not write as you do. . . . If the trial comes, perhaps light will break. At present all is dark, utterly dark. May God guide you!—

He accepted the call, although it was "in evening time," and for twelve years devoted himself absolutely to his duties. Of personal ambition Westcott had none; there is not a note of it in all this intimate and voluminous correspondence. Such honours as he attained could hardly have been withheld; to some it seemed that they came tardily. Of the four names which we associate with the Cambridge movement—Westcott, Lightfoot, Benson, and Hort—the name of Westcott perhaps arouses the strongest personal affection. He was a great Bishop because he was a simple and loyal servant of God.

Piggy's Education.

LETTERS FROM A SELF-MADE MERCHANT TO HIS SON. By George Horace Lorimer. (Methuen. 6s.)

WHEN a book promises little and gives much the reader's satisfaction is great. This will be his feeling when he lays down the budget of worldly wisdom addressed by John Graham, a Chicago pork-packer, whose friends know him as "Old Gorgon Graham," to his son Pierrepont, whose nickname is "Piggy." Piggy is a nice young fellow, soft, vain, and weak enough to need much advice, yet with sense to appreciate and act upon it. We see him only through his father's inimitably pointed letters, yet we soon know him well. He receives the first at Harvard the day after his arrival, and this is what he reads:—

Your Ma got safe back this morning, and she wants me to be sure to tell you not to over-study, and I was to tell you to be sure not to under-study. What we're really sending you to Harvard for is to get a little of the education that's so good and plenty there. When it's passed around you don't want to be bashful, but reach right out and take a big helping every time, for I want you to get your share. You'll find that education's about the only thing lying around loose in this world, and that it's about the only thing a fellow can have as much of as he's willing to haul away. Everything else is screwed down tight and the screw-driver lost.

In this way the old man pounces on his son whenever a straight and timely talk is likely to do him good. Piggy's errors of thinking and doing, though natural and harmless enough, are just those which, if left unchecked, would develop into qualities unfavourable to his success and all-round manliness. But he has chosen his father well, and reaps the reward. Old Graham never delays to send him the sound word of advice, and this he backs with so much sagacity, humour, and racy reminiscence, touched with restrained affection, that the young man's business and worldly salvation seems to unfold before us as a pleasing certainty.

Piggy incurs his first lesson in thrift when he sends in one of his Harvard expense-accounts to his father's cashier. Old Graham writes: "When I told you that I wished you to get a liberal education, I didn't mean that I wanted to buy Cambridge. Of course, the bills won't break me, but they will break you unless you are very, very careful." Old Graham, more than most fathers—English fathers, at all events—thinks of his son's college days as the threshold of business, and by business he means his start at the bottom of the ladder in his own firm, that is to say at the mailing desk. Most fathers think of all this a little vaguely, and they do not force the connection of ideas on their sons while they are yet at college. They respect the poetry of youth, and indulge it. Old Graham has no such scruples, and it is just here that we find him least sympathetic, perhaps also least sagacious. The following remarks to his son at Harvard suggest hard common sense, but seem a little premature:—

I can't hand out any ready-made success to you. It would do you no good, and it would do the house harm. There's plenty of room at the top here, but there is no elevator in the building. Starting, as you do, with a good education, you should be able to climb quicker than the fellow who hasn't got it; but there's going to be a time when you won't be able to lick stamps as fast as the other boys at the desk. Yet the man who hasn't licked stamps isn't fit to write letters. . . . I can give you a start, but after that you will have to dynamite your way to the front by yourself.

It is not surprising that young Graham wishes to interpose a post-graduate course, and then a two months tour to Europe, before the stamp-licking and dynamite, or that old Graham condemns both proposals, anticipating the usual "other fellows" argument with: "There's nothing in it. Adam invented all the different ways in which a young man can make a fool of himself, and the college yell at the end of them is just a frill that doesn't change essentials." With essentials, old Graham is fiercely intimate; his grip on them is felt in every line. As for the post-graduate course:—

There's a chance for everything you have learned, from Latin to poetry, in the packing business; though we don't use much poetry here except in our street-car ads, and about the only time our products are given Latin names is when the State Board of Health condemns them. So I think you'll find it safe to go short a little on the frills of education; if you want them bad enough you'll find a way to pick up Latin after business hours.

The proposed European tour is reduced to two weeks' holiday varied by a letter which says:—

Of course, you are your own boss now and you ought to be able to judge better than anyone else how much time you have to waste, but it seems to me, on general principles, that a young man of twenty-two, who is physically and mentally sound, and who hasn't got a dollar and has never earned one, can't be getting on somebody's pay-roll too quick.

The youth is soon on the pay-roll and feeling sore under the hand of the cross, crabbed, but entirely loyal and efficient Milligan of the mailing department. One of his first exploits is to send a letter intended for a girl, whom he is inviting to the theatre, to Mr. Jim Donnelly who is expecting a reply to a claim for shortage on his last car-load of pickled hams. Old Graham writes:—

It didn't make me feel any sweeter about the matter to hear that when Milligan went for you, and asked what you supposed Donnelly would think of that sort of business, you told him to "consider the feelings of the girl who got our brains refused to allow a claim for a few hundredweight of hams. I haven't any special objection to your writing to girls and telling them that they are the real sugar-cured article, for after all, if you overdo it, it's your breach of promise suit for you must write before eight or after six. I have bought the stretch between those hours. Your time is money—no money—and when you take half an hour of it for your own purposes, that is just a petty form of petty larceny.

Step by step the young man rises, nursed and prodded by his irresistible father who, though he maintains in one place, that life is too short for writing letters, unloads all the stores of his world-hardened wit and shrewdness, relieving them by the pithiest anecdotes. The best of it is that the love of money and the faculty of making it are not the pervading themes. On the contrary, it is on efficiency, thoroughness, and prudence, on good feeling and clean living, that the battery of advice is directed. The merging lessons of the book are for all young men in all places. Space forbids us to trace "Piggy" Graham's path from eight dollars a week to seventy-five dollars and leave to marry, but here are a few of the pork-packer's obiter dicta :—

On giving employment for friendship's sake :—

I want to say right here that the easiest way in the world to make enemies is to hire friends.

On a young lover's extravagance :—

I want to say right here that there always comes a time to the fellow who blows fifty-two dollars at a lick on roses when he thinks how many staple groceries he could have bought with the money.

On courtship :—

Marriages may be made in Heaven, but most engagements are made in the back parlour with the gas so low that a fellow doesn't really get a square look at what he's taking.

On the "society bug" :—

You're going to meet a great many stray fools in the course of business every day without going out to hunt up the main herd after dark.

On happiness in married life :—

I have made it a rule never to put off being happy till to-morrow. Don't accept notes for happiness, because you'll find that when they're due they're never paid, but just renewed for another thirty days.

On the unfitness of women for business :—

When they've got a weak case they add their sex to it and win, and when they've got a strong case they subtract their sex from it and deal with you harder than a man. . . . Instead of hiring women, I try to hire their husbands, and then I usually have them both working for me.

It is a triumph that such a book should leave the reader a good taste in the mouth and a sense of moral exhilaration. But, after all, the difference between pork-packing and poetry is not so striking as the sameness of the rules which govern success in both callings, and in all callings between them.

Diversions in O.

A NEW ENGLISH DICTIONARY. Edited by Dr. James A. H. Murray. Onomastical—Outing. (Clarendon Press. 5s.)

DR. MURRAY throws a pebble in the troubled Shakespeare-Bacon pool. Dealing with the word Out he notes that out-verbs, such as "out-Herods Herod," were much favoured by Shakespeare, but were almost eschewed by Bacon. Shakespeare has 54 such verbs, of which no fewer than 38 may have been his own coinage. In Bacon only two have been found, and one of these, outshoot, had been an archery term for more than seventy years before his time. Dr. Murray adds: "The contrast between the language of Bacon and that of Shakespeare in this respect is the more striking, seeing that other contemporary authors, e.g., Ben Jonson, used these 'out'-verbs almost as freely as Shakespeare himself." Shakespeare's famous phrase in "Hamlet" (in the speech to the players): "I would have such a fellow whipped for o'erdoing Termagant; it out-Herods Herod; pray you avoid it," derived its force from the fact that Herod always appeared as a blustering tyrant in the early Miracle-plays. How the phrase has been imitated ever since is shown by Dr. Murray. Fuller had "out-achitophelled Achitophell"; Marvell, "out-bonifaced"; the "Quarterly Review" wrote, "The following trait out-tobies Uncle Toby." Macaulay wrote of Walpole: "He played innumerable parts, and over-acted them all; when he talked misanthropy he out-Timoned Timon; when he talked philanthropy he left Howard at an immeasurable distance." Other writers have given us out-Nero, out-Milton, out-Trollope, and out-Zola. Shakespeare linked "out" with many words besides proper names; he has out-frown, out-villain, out-view, &c., and his example has been followed so literally as to produce words like out-faminize, out-balderdash, out-jingo, and out-saint. In modern journalism the "Pall Mall Gazette" has recalled the days "when each dame's object in life was to out-chignon the chignon of her neighbour"; the "Saturday Review" has talked of "out-criticking the critics," and "Black and White" of "out-fictioning fiction." Indeed it would be difficult now to out-out this usage.

Many words in this part of the Dictionary have little general interest. Scientific words like Onychia, Oosporangium, Opisthotonos and Orbitosphenoid abound; and there are many rare or obsolete words like Onsight, Ontend, Onwald, Orectic, Orf (cattle, live-stock) and Ortrow (distrust). Otherwhile is described as rare, which it certainly is; but it is a good word. Matthew Arnold had it in "Balder" :—

But the gods went not now, as otherwhile,
Into the tilt-yard.

Otherwhere also suffers unmerited neglect. How beautifully it comes in Keats :—

Full of this whim was thoughtful Madeleine:
The music, yearning like a God in pain,
She scarcely heard: her maiden eyes divine,
Fix'd on the floor, saw many a sweeping train
Pass by—she heeded not at all: in vain
Came many a tip-toe amorous cavalier,
And back retir'd; not cool'd by high disdain,
But she saw not: her heart was otherwhere:
She sigh'd for Agnes' dreams, the sweetest of the year.

"Elsewhere" is the word of plain prose; we need otherwhere for higher things; yet Hawthorne had "At Charing Cross, and otherwhere about London." In "The Earthly Paradise" Morris wrote :—

It seemed that time had passed on otherwhere
Nor laid a finger on this hidden place, where otherwhere has the sense of otherwhither, a word actually found, and quoted by Dr. Murray, in a sixteenth century work. A cognate word is otherworldliness. Sir Edward Burne-Jones was described as "the Painter of Otherworldliness."

Ouch is now a very rare word, though very many will remember it in Mr. Henley's fine lines in "Dawn" :—

And now! a little wind and sky,
The smell of ships (that earnest of romance),
A sense of space and water, and thereby
A lamplit bridge ouching the troubled sky.

Here the participle means, of course, spangling or adorning. Dr. Murray gives no use of the word between Mr. Henley's and that of Guillim, who says of some person: "He beareth Luna, a mantle of estate, Mars . . . ouched or garnished with strings fastened thereunto." The substantive, ouch or nouch, which Dr. Murray says has scarcely been in living use since 1600, means a brooch or clasp. In the Authorised Version (Exodus xxviii. 11) we have among the directions for the making of Aaron's ephod: "With the work of an engraver in stone, like the engravings of a signet, shalt thou engrave the two stones with the names of the children of Israel; thou shalt make them to be set in ouches of gold."

Under "Operetta" we have two rather contradictory quotations. Mr. Dutton Cook is quoted as stating that the word operetta was a coinage first introduced at the Lyceum or English Opera House. In view of the fact that the Lyceum Theatre will be sold this month as building material this is interesting; but Dr. Murray also quotes a writer in the "Monthly Review" of 1770: "They sometimes give operattas (sic) that are charming." In 1770 the Lyceum was an exhibition room for the Incorporated Society of Artists, and it was not until 1790 that it was devoted to music, nor until 1809 that it was styled the English Opera House.

Opificer is a rather pleasing blend of artificer and officer, but it has been obsolete, apparently, since Sterne used it into "Tristram Shandy": "Can it escape your penetration—I defy it—that so many play-wrights, and opificers of chit-chat have ever since been working upon Trim's and my uncle Toby's pattern." "Opificers of chit-chat" is a phrase we could do with to-day.

Under Opopanax we have the use of this word in modern perfumery illustrated by a quotation no earlier than 1895. We believe that it came into this use forty or fifty years ago when, one fine morning, London found itself plastered with the then mysterious word

OPOPANAX.

Time revealed its meaning, and the scent became popular, but according to an authority quoted by Dr. Murray, this perfume owed nothing to the real Opopanax plant, which has had a long botanical history.

Two rare words are Opsigamy, meaning marriage late in life; and Opsimathy, learning or study late in life. Oragious, meaning stormy, was used by Thackeray, and is rare. Orbity, the condition of being bereaved of children, or childlessness, was used by Johnson in the "Rambler" and is obsolete. Orgillous (proud, haughty) is not so old but that the "Saturday Review" could apply it to Lord Rosebery in 1890. Oscitancy, yawning, is very rare, but it appeared in the New York "Nation" three years ago. Cowper's lines in "The Time-piece" may be recalled:—

Now blame we most the nurslings or the nurse?
The children croak'd, and twisted, and deform'd,
Through want of care; or her, whose winking eye,
And slumb'ring oscitancy mars the brood!

We had noted many other words for remark, but lest our readers should oscitate we refrain.

Gleanings from Archipelagoes.

IN THE ANDAMANS AND NICOBARS. By C. Boden Kloss. With Maps and Illustrations. (Murray. 21s. net.)

SCIENCE owes a considerable debt to Mr. Kloss for the patient investigations of which this work is the satisfactory fruit. His travels were made in 1900 and 1901 as the guest of Dr. W. L. Abbott, the captain and owner of the schooner "Terrapin," in which they sailed. Between them they added sixteen to the known mammalian fauna of the archipelagoes, and thanks to their energy and tact secured a number of admirable photographs. In spite of the morbid interest of the convict settlement in the sister archipelago, which Mr. Kloss describes rather rosily, the most "absorbing" part of his work is that which deals with the Nicobars. Upon these islands we doubt not that he will be regarded as an authority of the first importance. And although he does not describe for us, as does Lancaster, anything so much "beside" Nature as "a grand tree" which—if one try to pluck from it—shrinks "down into the ground and sinketh unless you hold very hard," he shows abundantly that 1602 was not the only year for travellers in the Nicobars.

The Kar Nicobarese believe themselves to be of quasicanine descent. "For this reason they treat their dogs very kindly, and never beat them: they quiet them by simply saying 'Hush! Hush!'" Such a statement naturally causes one to turn with a lively curiosity to the photographs of Nicobarese, with the result of a distinct prepossession in their favour. The prognathism of the right hand boy facing page 226 is no doubt evident, and indeed a more curious development of features might be looked for in a nation that play such pranks with the occiput of babies as do the Nicobarese; but the face of this lad is sprightly enough for a cupid, and his tumbled hair an artist's joy. That boy seems to imply that the Nicobarese have "taken up" the dog out of sheer love of paradox, and that a certain custom which supports so indecorous a theory of origin is a slander on their true selves.

Certainly the custom is an ugly one. They disinter their dead, clean the skull and throw away the rest of the corpse. The idea seems to be that the graveyard shall be made habitable for spirits, but they are morbidly sensible of the eeriness of death, and it is possible that in their abominable familiarity with his leavings, they display the same mock courage which prompts a frightened child to make a great noise in a dark room. A Kar Nicobarese is not permitted to die at home; his end must take place in a "house of pollution," and when he is dead the tamiluanas, or devil-chasers, though they do not believe in immortality, pretend to capture his spirit and imprison it in a bunch of leaves. Yet still the instinct to meddle with death is so strong that we read of an angry Nicobarese saying, "You now call me a liar, and so I am angry, and am going to dig up a grave."

There, of course, we have an appeal to the amour propre of a ghost who would be supposed to visit his displeasure on the provoker of such an action. There too, and this is the less obvious point, we have the theatricality of feeble anger which often seeks to punish the mind because it is afraid to touch the body of its opponent. Nicobarese superstition offers to the holders of it one very practical disadvantage, however, to weigh against its benefit to them in quarrels; they dare not make any crockery! Chaura may, and does—no doubt with "chortlings" at the monopoly—but if any but a native of Chaura should do so he is believed "doomed to almost immediate destruction."

The Nicobarese are, indeed, frankly cowards, but they are also artists and, in their outlook, poets. They carve really admirable figures as scare-devils; in Nankauri, by the way, we observe that these statues "were all supplied with a piece of rancid pork, hung from the neck or placed in the mouth." It would seem that devils differ in their susceptibility to fear. A top hat associated with wings suffices for one; a human head on an alligator's body unnerves another. The poetry comes out in their tender solicitude for the moon, which they figure in an eclipse as in peril of being swallowed by a serpent. "Alas! alas!" they cry, "do not devour it," and the serpent is invariably amenable to their prayer. If the Kar Nicobarese did lose the moon, one trembles to think what ceremony they would deem adequate to express their feelings, for when one of their number lost his teeth he celebrated the fact by a great feast, and was adorned with silver wire from head to foot. And as we are not likely to find a Nicobarese more decorously clad, we are fain to leave him so.

The Corner-Stone of Evolution.

VARIATION IN ANIMALS AND PLANTS. By H. M. Vernon. The International Scientific Series. Volume 88. (Kegan Paul. 5s.)

In this admirable little book Dr. Vernon deals with the facts of variation, its causes, and its importance as the corner-stone of the whole fabric of evolution. He shows how variation in individuals, be they crabs or men, follows the Laws of Probability; the Law of Frequency of Error, in the very breadth of crab-shells, is observed with rigid accuracy. Mathematics apart, however, in this era of Sociology we must acknowledge the significance of the doctrine, reasserted by Dr. Vernon, that "suddenly occurring variations, unless artificially selected, must inevitably be swamped by intercrossing, and disappear." This is unfortunately the way with geniuses. As to the sexes, comparison between skeletons of the Ainos (a primitive Japanese tribe) and the modern French shows that though civilised man differs more from the primitive type than civilised woman so far as absolute size is concerned, he has made only about half her progress in variation, and has hardly anything to show for the progress made by civilised woman in the nice correlation of her characters. And, since correlation implies that when one organ is modified, as by Natural Selection, the others are modified also, there is great hope for the future in civilised woman. A deduction from this law of correlation, supported by the facts, is that the blonde is tending slowly to disappear.

As to the causes of variation, Dr. Vernon, arguing from Weismannism, has conceived and carried out a large amount of original work, which emphasizes the effect of nutrition upon the future of races of animals and plants. Human twins support Weismann very strongly, or rather those few human twins which closely resemble one another, which are of the same sex, and which have an intimate original affinity almost without a parallel. In a pair of such twins, examined by the author, measurements were so similar that the Bertillon system of identification would have been useless; but the finger-prints, though bearing some resemblance, were easily distinguishable. This method of Mr. Galton's may be regarded as practically infallible. Relatively trivial, of course, is this of Mr. Galton's, beside the remarkable contributions, detailed most admirably in this book, made by him to problems of variation and heredity. To him we owe not only the Law of Heredity, which allots to each parent a quarter of the characters observed in the child, to each grand-parent a sixteenth, and so on, but also the principle of "Regression towards Mediocrity," which shows the tendency of mankind to get back to the average: down to it in the offspring of the genius, up to it in the children of the criminal. Prof. Ewart, of Edinburgh, has shown in his celebrated experiments that by in-breeding it is possible to wipe out regression towards mediocrity; that it is possible, within a few generations, to produce a superior race which will continue to "breed true." So much the better.

No less interesting is the discussion of variation produced by environment, as temperature and light. Instances are the white coat developed on the approach of winter by many animals in arctic climates; the retarding effect of light upon the growth of plants, though favouring their healthy development: so that the sunflower turns to the sun because its stem grows more rapidly on the side away from the sun, and pushes the flower over towards the sun. Equally important is the effect of food, influencing the farmer's crops and manure, the soldier and the explorer and their diet.

Variation in its relation to evolution is a fundamental fact of inestimable importance. Within the last few years experiment on some little crabs that are found at Plymouth has proved the effect of Natural Selection—which Lord Salisbury said no one had seen at work—on variations. As for man Dr. Vernon says: "There is no evidence that the average vigour and vitality are increasing. Everything goes to prove that they are on the wane." Fortunately, though Dr. Vernon does not say so, man must sooner or later face and control the facts.

De Quincey's opium-eating, the length of the Hebrew nose, the curve of the stems of a plant—all are made to contribute their share to the elucidation of the great theory of evolution, which starts with a nebula or a sun, and ends with the cause of the greying of an old man's hair.

"Of a Family."

CECILIA GONZAGA. By R. C. Trevelyan. (Longmans. 2s. 6d. net.)

THOUGH it has qualities of cultivation and ability, Mr. R. C. Trevelyan's tragedy is at bottom but one of the many poetic dramas, with a family resemblance, woven about the inviting themes of mediæval Italian history—or we should rather say, Italian history of the early Renaissance. The secret lovers; the proud and powerful father; the neighbouring Duke who plays the part of the unworthy lover, destined by the father to his daughter's hand; the crafty villain and hanger-on of the evil suitor, who betrays the lovers by his intrigues to discovery and death—all these are customary ingredients of a customary dish. The characters are of the generalised and conventional type we look for in this conventional drama. The blank-verse is often little but prose. Print it continuously, and you shall sometimes find it running like this:—

Trust me, my lord, these grosser forgeries of spite with me have never found belief: but since such tales have reached Cecilia's ears, for her sake only I sought this absolute denial from you. But, my dear lord, let me be frank with you: besides these graver scandals, there is much, reported on authority more credible, which many even among your well-wishers, in part believing, scarce know what to think.

That, substantially, is flat prose; and the few inversions which are used to square it with metrical rule, or give it an air of "poetry," are merely felt as feebly intrusive. Conventional phrases are frequent in these lines, such as "a cloister's living tomb," or "the imperious impulse of your heart,"—which are only fit for Mudie's. Granted, that even in poetic drama the dialogue must frequently take on a cast of prose; that the special advantage of blank-verse in drama is the ease with which it rises to the lyric or sinks to the prosaic level: yet a master does not suffer even his more prose-like dialogue to become merely nerveless and conventional; he keeps a certain tinge of poetic vigour in the diction, as may be seen in Shakespeare. Or rather, perhaps, the prose is kept a strong prose, with a sap in it, which shall not contrast too limply with the poetic passages.

But not all is like this. Mr. Trevelyan can put colour and sinew into his lines. Thus, speaking of the hero, the villain says to the Duke:—

Admire thine enemy,
And thou shalt be promoted to a skirt;
For all who trail them are quite lost for him.

There is thew and freshness in that, such as suggests that Mr. Trevelyan has the root of the matter in him. He can at times reach a measure of poetic quality. Thus:—

So mingled are the seeds of human things,
Evil and good blent unobservably,
That, should we stay to sift and sort our grain,
The time of sowing would be come and gone,
Ere we had filled our sacks, or cast in hope
Our handful o'er the earth.

That is good; though the word "unobservably" is careless and ill-sorted, since Mr. Trevelyan means "indistinguishably." Again, when the lover urges the hopelessness of the heroine's escaping her father's instant purpose to marry her to the dissolute Duke:—

Aye, to hope now would be more vain, more idle,
Than taking thought how to outstrip by flight
This lengthening twilight creeping o'er the plains
From yonder sinking sun.

Pretty, rather than beautiful passages meet us now and again. But, despite the examples we have quoted, Mr. Trevelyan shows on the whole scant power of imagery; and his drama as a whole is not notable for poetic quality. It has not power, it has not passion: but it is adequately constructed, it exhibits literary cultivation, and a sufficient measure of intermittent distinction in the writing to forbid a wholly harsh or adverse judgment. It is quite possible he may do better things. But this is of a family, and no remarkable family.

Canning.

GEORGE CANNING AND HIS TIMES: A POLITICAL STUDY. By J. A. R. Marriott. (Murray. 5s. net.)

GEORGE CANNING is surely one of the most attractive of all possible subjects for the biographer. It should be impossible to write a dull book about him. But his private secretary, with ample materials at his command, achieved the feat, and Mr. Marriott has repeated it. There must have been something remarkable about one whose political views were recognised as a matter of public importance when he came down from the University. Colonel Fitzpatrick's well-known epigram was indirectly the highest of compliments. There are hundreds of cases of schoolboys turning their political jackets. But "no case until now was so flagrantly known" because no one cared to know it. Yet the brilliance and the charm of which Stapleton and Mr. Marriott tell us are but faintly reflected in their pages. It is easy to account for the distrust with which so many of Canning's contemporaries regarded him. Intellectual brilliance will always excite distrust in many minds, which refuse to believe that any man can be honest without being also stupid. And when the brilliance of a Cabinet Minister takes the form of writing elegant Sapphics about needy knife-grinders, and informing correct and respectable diplomatists in cypher despatches that—in commerce the fault of the Dutch

Is giving too little and asking too much, distrust is not merely pardonable; it becomes a solemn duty. Mr. Wyndham, we know, succumbs to the frivolity of the Christmas season, but it is not to be supposed that his official compositions are written in a similar vein. To parallel Canning's performance, one would have to imagine Lord Curzon declaiming to a concourse of Rajahs such verses as were composed at Balliol about himself; and to complete the parallel, there should perhaps be added a duel with Mr. Brodrick consequent upon an unsuccessful attempt to eliminate that gentleman from the Cabinet.

In justice to Mr. Marriott it should be said that his book does not profess to be a personal sketch of Canning. It is a "political study," and the study is really confined to five years—1822 to 1827. But the reader has some right to quarrel with the title, and to demand that in an account of "George Canning and His Times," rather more than seven pages should be devoted to the thirteen momentous years from 1809 to 1822, though it be true that Canning spent most of them in ploughing a lonely furrow of preposterous length. Still it was the five years on which Mr. Marriott has concentrated his attention which won for Canning the substantial and permanent reputation of a statesman. The most striking and perhaps the most characteristic incident in his life was the seizure of the Danish Fleet in 1807. Opinions will always differ as to the verdict to be passed upon that act; for our own part, we agree with Mr. Marriott in regarding it as a brilliant stroke of daring, abundantly justified by necessity and by its results. But it was not until the close of his life that Canning's tenure of the Foreign Office was sufficiently prolonged to test to the full his qualities as a statesman. It was then that he "called the new world into existence to redress the balance of the old," and initiated and directed the policy which led to the "untoward event" of Navarino; and it is by his attitude towards affairs in South America and in Greece that he must ultimately be judged. Mr. Marriott speaks of President Monroe's famous message as "help" coming to England "from an unexpected quarter." This appears to us to be an unfortunate phrase, suggesting that the attitude taken up by the United States was a happy accident, and not consequent upon or at least in striking accord with Canning's own deliberate policy and suggestion. The arguments for and against the recognition of the independence of the Spanish Colonies are stated in somewhat meagre fashion, and scarcely sufficient emphasis is laid upon the caution and correctitude of British policy. But the South American and Eastern Questions during these years are both too intricate to be treated very instructively in a small volume. Their strangest consequence was to establish for ever both at home and abroad the fame of a Conservative Foreign Secretary as the champion of liberal principles in both hemispheres against the attacks of autocracy and reaction.

Other New Books.

THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF PETER TAYLOR. (Paisley: Gardner. 3s. 6d.)

THIS little book has a quite human interest. It records no great events, it touches the world's life only in a minor way, but it has character and verve. We should judge the writer, in spite of certain gloomy generalizations, to be a man in love with life. He was never so ardently its observer as to be able to play with its possibilities, but he was always keen enough to appreciate its dramatic changes as they personally affected him. The writer was born in the year of Queen Victoria's accession, and we get some startling particulars of the price commanded by labour during the first ten years of the reign. His father was employed in a Paisley brewery:—

. . . he started at 12s. per week, and was afterwards promoted to be gaffer at the ransom of 15s. The hours generally were from four in the morning till six at night, five days a week, the sixth being from six a.m. till six p.m.; he had to go back twice on Sunday to turn the malt.

Even such work as this was not obtained without some local influence; but it must be remembered that the times were hard, following on the railway collapse.

The author set his hand to many things, from the duties of a shop errand boy to engineering; finally, having hit upon a method of making a particular small spring which was necessary to the mill in Galashiels in which he was employed, he saw comparative fortune ahead of him. He writes proudly:—

I formed a co-partnership with my brothers; our united capital was £120. . . . My brothers took charge of the commercial side, and I had only to produce. Like Kate Dalrymple, we were ardent and thrifty. In 1898, the value of our works, stock, and plant stood at £30,000.

The value of this frank and pleasant volume, however, does not consist in its commercial records—it consists in its spirit and in its general outlook. It might have been made a lecture upon thrift and perseverance, which would have ruined it; as it stands it is the simple narrative of a simple life. In some of the domestic episodes there is real pathos, and a few of the characters are touched in with real humour. The book is dedicated "with every feeling of respect to my brethren of the working-classes and specially to those who have never yet enjoyed the luxury of paying the income-tax."

BARTY'S STAR. By Norman Gale. (Walter Scott. 2s. 6d.)

A SKETCH of a child which, in effect, has for text Wordsworth's "Intimations of Immortality" ode. We like the spirit of the book, which is fresh and buoyant; the manner of it is less to our taste. Mr. Norman Gale avoids simplicity of statement with something like aversion; he elaborates his sentiment till it cloy. This is the greater pity because "Barty's Star" has sympathy and observation. We should like to believe it all, but when the author has dressed up and decorated his material we find ourselves unable to believe. To write convincingly about children is almost as difficult as to write convincingly for children. True records, careful notes, of a child's development, are sure to be of value, almost sure to possess beauty. Elaborate these records and notes, and at once we seem to touch unreality. Let us illustrate. Barty is watching the opening of an iris:—

I went up close behind him, sat down upon a camp-stool, and opened the morning paper as rustlingly as I could, on purpose to make a fresh test of his abstraction. He did not heed. Dame Nature surely never had a prettier compliment paid to her genius. I had just looked up from the current crisis, when Barty said to himself very quietly, offending me and Lindley Murray's ghost in the same breath—

"Its muvver's unbuttoning its jacket like my muvver does."

A few minutes later he shouted in triumph—

"It's open! I heard it speak."

"Have you ever heard irises speak before?"

"Ever so many," he said, in a tone belonging to the heartiest conviction.

"Where? Can you tell daddy where?" . . .

"I—I nearly can, daddy," said my little son.

Pretty, if you will, but we doubt the incident, the more particularly from an author who can write "she paid me an extravagant price in cupid's coin of the realm, fresh from a rosy mint." Mr. Gale has a fatal habit of sentimentality. He escapes from it once, and then only partially. Barty introduced into a pie two pieces from his Noah's Ark, and these pieces get on to a Bishop's plate. "Daddy" has Barty from the nursery and spansks him in the presence of the Bishop. The sentiment vanishes for a moment, and bad taste comes in: but soon the sentiment flows forth again in fuller flood than ever. Still, "Barty's Star" is a pretty and an engaging little book.

MILLIONAIRES AND KINGS OF ENTERPRISE. By Burnley. (Roy. 21s.)

THE new century has produced a host of problems centred in commercial expansion and industrial supremacy. Germany and America threaten so to alter the relative positions of nations, as to render insecure England's place in international trade, and to shake to the foundations the privileges and disadvantages of primogeniture. No passing illusion this, but a cry of warning and a tardy reminder that the national self-complacency will surely result in a mortgage of the cherished aristocracy to Pickle Kings and Oil Trusts. These are the problems which the author illustrates in these lives of millionaires. In America, where the greatest commercial successes have been achieved, the conditions have been perhaps exceptionally favourable, but the conditions have also produced exceptional men—men who from poor beginnings have transformed all previous ideas of commerce, and displayed an energy and created fortunes never before equalled.

Luck or chance has played little part in the building of an Armour, or a Leiter, or a Rockefeller, or a Carnegie. Individually handicapped at the start, they have moulded the commercial world, and only death could stop their ceaseless activity. "Selling lucifer matches is a very fine business, if only you have plenty of it," once said Baron Rothschild, and therein lies the whole situation—and moral. These men took up a variety of work, but their thoroughness was common; they accumulated a little capital, they kept their education apace with their requirements; they learnt how to employ men. The author has arranged his lives to advantage, and has provided some excellent illustrations.

In "The Gourmet's Guide to Europe" (Richards), by Lieut.-Colonel Newnham-Davis and Algernon Bastard, may be found a list of the places where a man may eat with comparative immunity. Paris naturally occupies the first place; to that city of historic restaurants over thirty pages are devoted. The book, we are told, was written with the amiable desire to help a man who wishes to dine at the typical restaurant of any place in which he may find himself rather than in the hotel in which he happens to be stopping. Such information, naturally, cannot readily be obtained from the hotel proprietor or his servants. The authors go into careful details as to the kind of food and cooking to be found in the restaurants which they name.

NEW EDITIONS: The latest addition to the "Windsor" Shakespeare (Jack) is the "Comedy of Errors," edited, with notes, by Henry N. Hudson. The volume has for frontispiece a reproduction of a topographical drawing from Van den Wyngreder's "View of London," 1542.—Mr. Grant Richards has added to the "World's Classics" series David Hume's "Essays: Moral, Political, and Literary."

Fiction.

AS A TREE FALLS. By L. Parry Truscott. (Unwin. 1s. 6d.)

THERE was a general feeling that the Pseudonym Library suspended publication either too soon or too late, if there be any vice in anti-climax. We congratulate Mr. Unwin therefore the more cordially in resuming the issue of the library with a story which is at once forcible and pathetic. The tree of the title is one of the obscure Judes who muddle their lives by a brief concession to the senses. He is a baker's assistant who aspires to a career. He would be learned, and the local representative of learning sympathises with him. Then he marries, not an Arabella, but a hardworking though untidy girl, and his aspirations dwindle to that of becoming a baker on his own account.

He is presented to us as an intelligent hoarder who, by directing all his faculties to one end, irreparably wrongs his better self. His one child excites at its birth no nobler emotion in him than regret for an intrusive "thing," which will increase his expenses. He insults Nature by explaining his early marriage by the statement "I'm a beast." He rough-rides his wife's superstition about a name for the child, and when, as it were across its grave, he divulges the fact that he can afford to start a business he receives a terrible volley of accusation and reproach.

To pursue the story in outline would be unintelligent. The tree falls materially in an accidental way, but spiritually it falls in the neglect and derision of the basic principles of justice between man and wife.

The character drawing of the story is excellent. Neither of the ill-mated pair is presented as an embodiment of one failing or infatuation. We have moments for liking and disliking each. "As a Tree Falls" might indeed be a true document pieced together out of provincial life. It is real enough to bear a moral and still be read.

FROM THE UNVARYING STAR. By Elsworth Lawson. (Macmillan. 6s.)

If art has been a handmaiden to Mr. Lawson, he has certainly tyrannised over her. He is one of those lovers of coincidence who make the world of fiction twice as round as the world of fact. Also he commits the deplorable blunder of making a nice woman, who has no connection with suburban melodrama, repeat a page of imprecation uttered by a poor man when he deemed himself "trapped" and "cheated" by his Creator. Yet is Mr. Lawson's novel one that will be read with interest and pleasure. It is the romance of a dissenting minister of liberal views at a time when it passed as argument to say, "If there's no hell, what's the good of being good?" He is placed in the position of having to choose between publishing his sister's dishonour, or submitting to a shameful slander against himself. He submits, but the story is not deprived of ultimate sunshine. The author has drawn a delightful heroine, and her meeting with the young gospeller on Royal Oak Day is conceived with a fresh and vivid sentiment for love and youth.

There is that in the novel which suggests an evolution in religious romance. Here is a rejoicing sympathy with the free and beautiful things of nature. The parson takes long country walks; he teaches a little stable boy to observe that trees can look blue from a certain viewpoint. He is "gurt," although he has delicate hands; he has it out with a hypocritical deacon in a plain practical fashion, and though he holds on to the eternal things, he carries a sprig of oak presented to him by a young lady on page 26 until page 288, when he gives it back to her. The reader will wear it in his memory as a tribute to Mr. Lawson's wholesome fancy.

HIS GRACE'S GRACE. By C. Ranger-Gull. (Greening. 6s.)

MR. RANGER-GULL describes his book as a comedy, on the ground, we suppose, that it is intended to be amusing. We can only say that it has not amused us, or rather, that the trifling amusement which we might have derived from certain parts of the story was killed by the boredom born of the rest of it. Mr. Ranger-Gull strives after smartness with a wearisome assiduity; his Oxford young men talk just as the author writes; and the manner both of the narrator and his characters may be judged from the following extracts: only by quotation is it possible to convey any idea of the manner of "His Grace's Grace":—

A little college is a dangerous thing.

People who smoke cigarettes are sometimes different. All men who smoke cigars are alike.

"I hate dumb-bells."

"To the 'Crosier' then, for a drink."

"I loathe bar-belles."

Lord Halifax, he realized, was becoming rather played out, and a Duke would quite counterbalance the influence of Lady Wimbome with her donkey and Lord Roberts with the notoriety thrust upon him by Mr. Kipling.

Hitherto he had never separated a clergyman from his church, he had watched priests from a place apart, and distance had lent enchantment to the pew.

These are quite fair examples of Mr. Ranger-Gull's buoyant brilliances; we might have quoted even more strident and vulgar instances, but these will serve to illustrate the author's manner. Occasionally Mr. Ranger-Gull becomes sentimental, and then we are given conversation like this: "Darling, here before God I give you all my heart for ever and a day. My Dear and my Lady, will you have my love?"

If this is comedy we have no idea of the meaning of the word. We should call it farce tempered with vulgarity.

CORNET STRONG OF IRETON'S HORSE. By Dora Greenwell McChesney. (John Lane. 6s.)

FEW plots are more difficult to deal with successfully than those built up round historical incidents, and a story intimately mixed up with the great struggles between Cavaliers and Puritans which preceded Cromwell's Protectorship is the less easy to succeed in, as the times were full, not only of a burning strenuousness and of unleashed passions, but of the most complicated humours. "Cornet Strong" is above the average as a novel, and at the same time, a consciousness of failure is undeniable as one reads. It is dramatic, full of exciting episodes, and the character drawing is, in its way, excellent. But the book remains unreal, a fanciful conjuring up of the past. Miss McChesney has done much, but what she has not been able to do is the one essential for a serious historical novel—the conveyance of a convincing atmosphere. Miss McChesney has a clear and vivid style of writing, and a strong sense of scenic possibilities. The canvas was a little too big for her handling, but there are excellent touches nevertheless.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE INDISCRETION OF GLADYS.

BY LUCAS CLEEVE.

Gladys was the wife of a baronet, from whom she had concealed the fact of her previous engagement to the man who is the villain of the story. He is a fine red-handed villain of the conventional sort, with the conventional name of Devereux de Lisle. He steals the jewels of the family, and is, in a general way, the evil genius of Gladys, until the agony column of the "Daily Mail" informed her friends of her whereabouts. Then he dies repentant, and the coil is unwound. (Long. 6s.)

THE MAN-WITH-THE-WOODEN-FACE.

BY MRS. FRED REYNOLDS.

Mrs. Reynolds again takes us to "Llanartro" in the Welsh mountains. The heroine of the story is a little music teacher who had lived in London many years struggling desperately with poverty, and who at last was enabled by success in a prize competition to take a holiday at "Llanartro." Here she met the "man-with-the-wooden-face." The love story is told with simplicity and directness. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE SAVING OF CHRISTIAN

BY ERNEST A. STREETON.

SERGISON.

A story of sea-coast villainy and of search for hidden treasure by the author of "The Instigator." That it follows a good model may be judged from the fact that in the first chapter a one-eyed sailor appears at the village inn, chanting at intervals the refrain, "Yo, ho! for the dead man's crew, my lads," &c., and that in the course of a conversation with the narrator of the story he produces a faded manuscript containing cryptic hints of buried treasure. The treasure is, however, in English soil, and the story passes in the smuggling days of the last century. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

ON BEHALF OF THE FIRM.

BY HAMILTON DRUMMOND.

Adventure in the West Indies. The narrator is sent to Haiti by a large firm of merchants to avenge the murder of their previous representative. "'Haiti,' I cried aghast—and who will blame me?—'Haiti, where Alvarez murdered Marshall?'" But he consented to go, and in carrying out his mission met with surprising adventures both by sea and land. There are illustrations, and the scenes illustrated are of the thrilling nature; e.g., the frontispiece: "I watched my opportunity and cleared the ugly chasm." (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

THE NEW LADY TEAZLE.

BY HELEN MATHERS.

A volume of short stories by the author of "Comin' thro' the Rye." The title story, an effective little comedy in four chapters, deals with a domestic crisis in Carlton House Terrace. "Society," says one of the characters, "is one huge sheep-pen, in which the blackest are reckoned the whitest, and get the most fun." There are nine other tales in Miss Mathers' characteristic vein. (Digby Long. 3s. 6d.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue	/5

Living History.

THE issue of a new edition of Carlyle's "French Revolution," excellently edited and commented by Mr. Holland Rose, the author of the admirable "Life of Napoleon," from the house of Messrs. George Bell and Sons, awakens many reflections and recollections. Some of us can remember when it opened to our then young eyes an enchanted land of history; vitalising for us scholastic history as we vitalised for ourselves the historic figures of our childhood, or as those we saw, "sole-sitting on the shores of old romance." Mirabeau and Danton took place beside Prince Hal and Cœur-de-Lion. To make "sober history" no less living than the history of Shakespeare and Scott—that is a feat compassed by but one man who writes the English tongue. And the name of him is Carlyle. One reads again the remembered pages, with a recollected fondness, and an associated charm. Not that they need those associations. On the contrary, one has a regretful pleasure in turning them over. For they speak out of the past to us in a day when history has gone far from the Carlylean ways. For of the many virtues and ideals possible or proper to history, it may almost be said we have retained but one—the noblest, if you will—truth. The noblest, the most necessary, but surely not all. Yet we have made it well-nigh all. It was over-much neglected, it may be, by past historians; and the whirligig of time brings in this revenge. We have a race of historians devoted to elaborate fairness of mind, careful research of fact, anxious sifting of detail, judicial weighing of evidence, scrupulous consultation and painful setting-down of first-hand authorities. It is magnificent, but is it history? Is it more than a glorified chronicle, glorified by superior care of veracity? Science and the scientific spirit have invaded history, as they have invaded every department of literature; bringing with them the letter that killeth. In history the letter is most necessary, be it granted: unless the foundations prove sound, there is no soundness in the edifice. But do we not think over-much of detail, without discrimination of its importance? And is it needful to show the scaffolding so apparently as our histories show it? Is it necessary to thresh out the whole process in front of the reader? Their text banked-up with references, and obstructed with arguments of pro and con., they resemble legal treatises more nearly than histories. Might not some portion of these things be relegated to appendices for the information of the serious student and the brother-historian?

Meanwhile, all conception of history as a literary art is pushed to the wall by this zeal for the stony fact. Nay, the philosophy of history suffers—to a less degree. There are no entrails, no viscera in these histories; in many there is scarce flesh on the ribs. Can these dry bones live? We think not: they are but skeletons, nay, fossil remains, carefully brought together for some future Owen of history. Carlyle's biographer alone upholds Carlyle's tradition; and with his pictorial inaccuracy is, after all, more of a Macaulay than a Carlyle. For this Carlyle was no scorner of accurate research. Here was one who made these dry bones live; but he had first laboured severely in the collecting of them. In this "French Revolution" there are mistakes; but he had to sift and delve without predecessors in sifting and delving. And thereto he added the spirit of life, the spirit of art: the thing stands on its feet, and is clothed with flesh, and speaks, and is an organism. And with what flesh he clothed it! Not since Tacitus had man brought to history such force of the living word. The principle of life, the ancients held, was fire; and this "Revolution" is aflame—yea, and if you will, a-smoke too—fuliginous, as he would himself have said. It is a fuming and Plutonic energy, of red glare and violent shadow, an upheaval of decorous conventions and a defiance of anointed traditions in style. Only so (Coventry Patmore is reported to have said) could he have compressed so much into so brief a compass. "The style was itself a revolution." Which is most true. Germanic that style may be, in main features of its mechanical structure or defect of structure; but inwardly and substantially, in those features which cannot be squared by the grammarian's coarse analysis, it is Carlyle and reducible to no precedent beloved of the line-and-level critic. Not only does the sentence-structure, serried, bristling, scornful of flowing and precisely connective progression, make for pregnancy. The bold figures, the startling devices, which so arrest and stimulate attention, are not there merely to astonish, for Teutonic audacity of adornment: they are hieroglyphs, with the condensing power of hieroglyphs. They concentrate like a burning-lens, bring a fulness of meaning to the focal point. Here, as throughout his work, he compels the poetic method to the service of history. Might we not even say that Carlyle had anticipated Wagner? Those nicknames, and other introductory devices by which he combines the stage-light on a prominent figure as it first fronts the reader, and keeps it on him at every successive re-entry; are they not the leit motif in history?

Many readings but increase one's admiration for the vivid art—or rather inspiration—of the performance. These Carlylean histories are scarce narrative; they are drama. The thing unfolds like a fiery frieze, turbulent, closer to us than the happenings of Morocco or Somaliland; and the dead clamours of history are borne to us voicefully. Yet out of what rubbish-heaps is the illusion produced; with what power of holding chaotic material in simultaneous liquefaction, and fusing it with volcanic completion. The swift procession of this "French Revolution" dissembles from the reader the difficulties overcome, the organising (or, rather, organic) power put forth in the overcoming of them. Think (for an example) of that royal flight to Varennes in the "Korff berline"; how the intricate details are marshalled with utmost narrative clearness, yet made subservient to a hurrying climax of dramatic effect.

In the "French Revolution" Carlyle's style is not yet pushed to the extreme of the "Friedrich," with its "Dryasdust" and other tricks for labelling minor matter, needlessly cumbrous and outré; its picturesqueness grown somewhat mechanical and taking thought to itself. A style which had its function in power of compression is applied to matter less crowded, on a larger scale, losing somewhat of its justification. All that in the "French Revolution" had made for brevity is magnified like a huge distorted shadow; nodosities pictorial on the smaller scale become unwieldy contortions in the slow-labouring amplification. But "Friedrich" remains a monumental exertion of shaggy and solitary strength. The Plutonic force of the "Revolution" has abated; the grim thoroughness is increased. And still the thing is fierily alive beside other histories. Yet more, Carlyle's history has soul and significance. He sees under all entangled factual confusions the working of transcendental powers. But does not this make for unreliability: is not this "Revolution"

(as Frenchmen have said) a huge misreading? Say it be (though we are far from saying it). Such a man can hardly put forth even a mistaken view without more illuminative flashes and suggestions of truth than a colder writer's coldest precision of factual truth: having in him a divining spirit, even when its utterance is choked and perverted by stubborn conglomerate of prejudice. Amidst compilations of conscientiously strained fact, passed through a very colander of research, we still long with regret for such another historian. Innumerable articulating of dry bones; but the spirit will not blow on them, and they do not live.

Applied Fiction.

In the fifth book of the first of the twenty-four volumes of "La Comédie Humaine" is expressed, in the form of a dedication "À une Polonaise," one of those personal secrets of Balzac which haunted a generation. We shall attempt to give a plausible, if inadequate, echo of it in English:—

Daughter of an enslaved land, angel by love, demon by fantasy, child by faith, aged by experience, man by the brain, woman by the heart, giant by hope, mother by sorrow and poet by thy dreams; to thee, who art the surviving spirit of Beauty, this work in which thy love and thy fantasy, thy faith, thine experience, thy sorrow, thy hope, and thy dreams are as the warp which sustains a woof less brilliant than the poetry preserved in thy soul, and the expression of which, when it illuminates thy countenance is, for him who marvels at thee, what are to scholars the symbols of a lost language.

That is the dedication, but in the pages of "Modeste Mignon" one searches in vain for the mysterious Pole who has captivated the heart of this French alchemist. Instead, with the fantasy still ringing in our ears, we find one of the prettiest little comedies that ever ran harmlessly through French fiction. Briefly, Modeste Mignon is a charming, lonely French girl, dimly conscious of an ideal, such as that which vibrates through the dedication. She, too, seeks to address an inconnu as "poète par tes rêves," and to find in his reply "les caractères d'un langage perdu." And because she wishes all this very much, she finds in the poetry of the Parisian Canalis the response to her most exquisite questionings. She reads his poetry again and again, and then, with the facile courage of innocence, she proceeds to write to him. Canalis tosses the letter over to his secretary, la Brière, who broods over it. In the end he decides to answer the letter for his employer. A meeting is arranged, and the sham poet succeeds in winning the heart of Modeste, who, indeed, in her own words, is not at all a Corinne. The young secretary is no poet, but he is a good fellow, and genuinely in love, and the little intrigue ends pleasantly and harmlessly without trace or hint of Gallic malice. The young couple are married and add one more to the list of good dreams that come true, which state of things, indeed, had little enough to do with the original fantasy of Balzac.

Now, some years ago, a young girl, a Slav, who in very truth had in her something of the tameless genius of this "Polonaise," was also seized with a devouring curiosity in regard to the personality of a French author. That Slav was Marie Bashkirtseff, and that author was Guy de Maupassant. Like Modeste, she addressed herself to an unknown Parisian littérateur, but, unlike Canalis, M. de Maupassant conducted his own correspondence after his own fashion. The correspondence is to be found at the end of Mademoiselle Bashkirtseff's "Further Memoirs," and, so far as M. de Maupassant's letters are concerned, is conspicuous for a lucidity at once arid and brutal.

It consists of twelve letters. In the first the lady is tantalising and appreciative, and in the second the novelist is cautious and bored. In the third the artist writes: "However, if a vague description only is necessary to draw to me the beauties of your worn-out soul, one might say, for instance: fair hair, middle height, born between the year 1812 and the year 1863." The novelist replies with a series of questions: "What perfume do you use? Are you a gourmande? What sort of an ear have you? The colour of your eyes? A musician? I do not ask if you are married. If you are you will reply 'no.' If you are not you will reply 'yes.'" Four more letters (two each) are exchanged, and in the last the Russian expresses her revolt and disgust. M. de Maupassant replies: "You know the regular way to recognise women of the world at the Opéra ball. One pinches them. The girls are used to that and simply say, 'Stop it.' The others get angry. I pinched you, in a very improper way, I confess; and you are angry." Two more letters followed, but this was practically the end of Marie Bashkirtseff's Parisian idyl, and she died that very year.

In reading this correspondence one gets an insight into that hard vividness of execution which was the goal of her realism. One recalls her youth, her genius, her intolerance, her egotism, her courage, her despair. Might it all, as Miss Blind has suggested, have been quite different if instead of the realities of the boulevards she had absorbed the dreams of the steppes? Could she have been other than what she was, she whom M. François Copée has called "l'héroïque enfant"? Will some sentimentalist dare to urge that it would have been well if some little "la Brière" had whispered to her, unrebuked, his summer pleading? Well, one knows where to find the answer to that; it is in her "Diary." For the rest, she had the courage of her tragedy, and she expressed it in her art.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

EVEN if "L'Oblat," by Joris-Karl Huysmans, were not a fine piece of literature it would still, as a curious document, be a remarkable and instructive book. But to examine first its literary and less important aspect, there are descriptive pages that can be described as nothing less than first-rate, and this is a measure of praise we have got out of the way of bestowing on books of the hour. Not that such high praise can be given to the book in its entirety, for it is far too difficult reading for perfection, and it is often monstrously heavy and dull, though never uninteresting because of the author's felicitous achievement of his purpose and his rare literary sincerity. He is a conscientious craftsman, like those wonderful craftsmen of the Middle Ages he raves, and takes not only infinite pains, but infinite delight in the accomplishment of his task and in the most minute details of labour. I would recommend to readers, in order to realise M. Huysmans' marvellous precision and surety of touch in description, such pages as 336 and 337, pages no other living writer could have written in just that way, with all the art as well as the slow and apt security of observation. "At that hour a few maids knitted beside a gigantic poplar whose hollow trunk opened in a wooden grotto on the ground level. This tree, which figures in the ancient cavalier views of Dijon, bulged out a carapace of scabby elephant, girdled with bandages, corsetted with bronze, propped up with crutches, kept in place by wire in every sense. And here and there priests read their breviaries and gardeners wheeled about cart-loads of flowers; one sniffed along the edges of the flower-beds the mixed smell of honey and fresh herbage of the iris; but now and then the sweet and ingenuous perfume was swept away by a whiff of wind which breathed a puff of the sharp and ripened odour spread by the Bohemian olive, specimens of which might be seen at the bottom of the garden, two or three trees with inky trunks, of silvery foliage and gold-tipped little flowers. And there was a smell of over-ripe melon, of rotting strawberry, of plaster being removed. Before sitting down, Durtal made the round of the alleys separated by clumps of trees. There were collections of coniferous growths, of blue cedars and varied larches, of pines whose stems were almost blond and whose spires were nearly black, and in the flower-plots baskets of salmon-hued roses, light tea-roses and roses of a sulphur shade. Maltese crosses of the bright red of bichromate of potassium, magnificent bushes of aconite, of sombre foliage, of sharp linear edges, and flowers of the celestial blue of the turquoise, but a turquoise from whose too heavy azure the white had been decanted,"—such passages, which abound, show the trained and patient vision of the writer who, in becoming a mystic, has not ceased to belong to the realistic school.

The mystical learning revealed throughout these 448 pages is prodigious, but if it overlays somewhat ostentatiously the novelist's art, it does not hide it altogether. The development of the famous convert, Durtal, whom we have met so often, and whom we always find astonishing and singularly interesting, whether as rake and sensualist or as mystic and oblat, belongs to a consideration of far deeper moment than such matter as mere literature, for whatever the significance of art, it matters greatly less than the drama of the human soul or the drama of human life. But M. Huysmans is essentially, and that before everything, the writer, the artist, and his characters are stamped with all the qualities of the artist's literary temperament. We are pleased to renew acquaintance with Madame Bavoil of Chartres, and find her no less an agreeable and original figure at Dijon, where she rejoins Durtal in the capacity of cook, housekeeper, and friend. The book might be read alone for such characters as Monsieur Lampre and his delightful middle-aged niece, Mademoiselle de Garambois, the oblate. These are easily but lastingly drawn, and the conversations and discussions are natural, with such a ring of the human voice about them that even their liturgical pedantry does not weary or irritate.

So much for the artist, whose merit is considerable. Both less and more may be said of the man. M. Huysmans is, and has always been, his own sole hero. He has never wavered in his allegiance to his minute and merciless study of his "moi." He has carried us with him through all the phases of decadence, decadence in literature and decadence in religion. His mysticism is literary, and his Christianity is purely liturgical. The "Oblat" is a hymn to liturgy, and if he adores the Benedictines, it is because of their Gregorian chaunt and the sober elegance of their offices. Outside the Benedictine cloisters, Catholicism, as practised by the immense majority of his countrymen, is a mere vulgar travesty, fit for common mortals, who in his disdainful and narrow esteem are a mixture of imbecile and "muffe." See how he handles the curé. No Jacobin could treat him more contemptuously. And his loathing of the pious nobleman who plays the organ and sings in the parish church! The unfortunate man is held up to our obloquy, because he sings the sugary music of Gounod and Massenet. The famous choir of St. Gervais all Paris delights in, is castigated as "the success of snobism," "the art of steeplechase" in singing, more fit for the racecourse than a dwelling of Christ. It would be difficult to find a religious temperament more strikingly void of charity, kindness, indulgence, and simple goodness than that of Durtal. He despises and detests all contemporary humanity, except the Benedictines. He gives us a pleasing picture of them, simple, amiable, learned men who indulge in interminable discussions with him on liturgy and unknown saints. We talk of the frivolities of the world, and after reading "L'Oblat," we are in a position to shake our head in wonder and smile at the frivolities of the cloisters. The importance allotted to etiquette and detail was never attained by any court protocol, and to turn from the Gospels, with their large and simple teaching, to those remarkable and erudite pages of M. Huysmans, with their quiet ecstasy in praise of a religion which has abjured simplicity, and finds its expression in a narrow and intolerant devotion to splendid offices, is to realize the sensation of a mystification. The whole book swells and reels with claustral pride. Some of the musical descriptions are beautiful, as, for instance, Durtal's analysis of the services for the profession of a Benedictine nun. Here he reaches an unwonted note of ecstasy. "The absolute altitude of liturgy and art is here. There are moments when during the extraordinary ceremony the quick thrill of divine splendour makes your soul tremble, and you feel exalted, projected out of yourself, far from the banality of the world that surrounds you." Of course there is a great deal said of the Law of Associations, but here M. Huysmans is surprisingly sane and just. Chapter XIV. opens with a conversation between Durtal and Madame Bavoil over the morning news that the victims of the hour would do well to meditate. This intelligent old lady wants to know why the Orders should show themselves more papist than the Pope. A monk's mission, she holds, is to be persecuted, and he should rejoice in it, or else he is no better than another man, and Durtal exclaims that at the bottom of the clamours of the moment there is a good deal of hypocrisy. "We claim to-day the liberty we have never granted to others," he cries, "and if to-morrow the wind turned, if one of the sorry vegetables grown in our Catholic kitchen-gardens supplanted Waldeck, we would be far more intolerant than he, and would render him almost sympathetic. We worried everyone to death, Madame Bavoil, whenever we had a suspicion of authority. We are getting it back now, for these things are always paid back. . . . Ah, yes, the Catholics deserve all they are getting, and we should repeat this every morning and evening on our knees before God and man." Elsewhere he blames Jansenism and Jesuitism for all the evils of the day. "Imbecile bigotry, the fear of our shadow, hatred of art, lack of comprehension of everything, lack of indulgence for the ideas of others, we owe to the Jansenists. The passion of little devotions, prayer without liturgy, suppression of offices with sole compensation of musical Benedictions, the lack of substantial nourishment, the milk diet of the soul, this we have from the Society of Jesus, and the two together have produced a strange amalgam of sectarian intolerance and feminine piety, in which we are going to pieces." Pieusarderie, a coined word, describes "piousness" with an untranslatable and indescribable contempt.

The last chapter, with the flight of the Benedictines, breathes a charming note of pathos and a mournful resignation. The reader has become attached to this little world of monks andoblats, all harmless and all mad on liturgy.

H. L.

Impressions.

XXVIII.—An Interlude.

FRUIT trees in blossom, looking as if their branches had been powdered with flecks of unmelting snow, hid the run of the valley. Beneath each tree was its tiny carpet of blown petals. Beyond the valley stretched the common, the yellow gorse shining in the sunshine; above, the air was melodious with the songs of birds. When I closed my eyes, there was no sound but their rapture, and the rustle of some busy little rodent in the near thicket.

Spring was burgeoning over the land, content just to be. In all that sweep of white blossom from this hill to the next there was no sign of man or his works.

Suddenly he appeared on horseback, a man of war, and following him, creeping like marauders from the wood, stealthily, with bent heads, a line of soldiers came out sinuously upon the common. They drew me to them. The man on horseback grasped a note-book in his left hand; the officers carried maps; twelve of the company were cyclists, and all formed up in the lee of the orchard—black uniforms against white blossoms. Whispered words of command were given, the cyclists mounted and went fanwise into the beyond, the foot soldiers in companies of four scouted forward, darting from tree to tree, taking cover in bush and whin, extending, always extending, till the country-side was dotted with those dark, darting figures seeking the enemy in that land which spring had touched with her light fingers.

"Where is the enemy?" I murmured to the man on horseback. He was the Umpire. For an hour I had assiduously followed him. Glancing up from his note-book, he pointed with his binoculars to the horizon: "I locate them there," he said. I saw nothing but the bobbing heads of our scouts, and far away the intermittent rush of cyclists across bye-roads. On we crept. Then a shot was fired, and a cyclist came racing back to report. The sun gleamed on the barrel of his gun, and he shouted to the Umpire, as he whizzed past, that somebody was captured. The Umpire made a note of the information. More shots were fired. This was war. In spring-time, in an English county—war. Three frightened children came tearing towards us from the front. The Umpire cantered forward, reining in his horse for a moment to shout to a scout that a ditch, along which he was wriggling like a snake, was out of bounds. I crossed the zone of fire on the heels of the Umpire and came up with the enemy. They were lying snug in a sand-pit. On one side was an orchard with a board marked "Trespassers will be prosecuted," on the other an ancient wall. The position was excellently chosen, indeed, impregnable. It was impossible to take them on the flank as that would have necessitated trespassing on private lands. This the attacking force knew, but daring greatly, they crept forward, one by one, hugging the wall; others advancing, step by step, tried to conceal themselves in the shadow of the iron railings that girdled the orchard. And as they ran and bobbed and crawled, the fortunate soldiers lying snug in the pit fired quickly and confidently. The Umpire wrote furiously in his pocket book, coughing, for the smoke was dense where he stood. A slim Colonel emerged from the pit, swaggered to the Umpire, saluted, and pointing to the nimble figures against the wall and the railing, said, "I say, you know, those men are all dead!" The Umpire looked, considered, acquiesced, and galloped away to tell them that they had been slain. They received the news ungraciously but obediently, and threw themselves on the ground. The bugle "cease firing" sounded. Victors and vanquished fraternised; the cyclists mounted their machines; the Umpire closed his note-book; the officers folded their maps; the north wind carried the smoke away, and cooled the hot faces of the soldiers. Then they all disappeared, and left the spring in peace.

There were cowslips in the field behind the wall, and, when the smoke and the soldiers were gone, the larks began to sing again. Once more the fire zone was fragrant with the soft scents of gorse and blossom. For a little while war had crossed the white tracks of spring to blare between the cowslips and the skylarks. The interlude was over.

Drama.

"Everyman" on Notting Hill.

THE "morall play" of "The Summoning of Everyman" was revived by the Elizabethan Stage Society, at the Coronet Theatre, as being a suitable entertainment for Passion Week. Probably every serious playgoer has by now had an opportunity of seeing "Everyman," and I need hardly expatiate upon the grave simplicity of the piece, upon its naive use of symbolism, or upon the ethical interest which it brings with it from days when the literary drama was not ashamed to be a direct utterance upon the issues of life and death and conduct. It is, I am afraid, touched with clericalism. The cloven hoof of the priesthood shows itself in the harangues of Five Wits and Knowledge to Everyman as to the value of penance, and contrition, and the seven sacraments for his soul's salvation. Says Five Wits:—

Everyman, God gave priests that dignity,
And setteth them in His stead among us to be;
Thus be they above angels in degree.

And the shavelings who sit motionless at the corners of the stage peep under their down-cast eyelids to see how the audience take the sentiment. I have little doubt that the author of the play was a priest, but the speech of Knowledge which follows, with its condemnation of all they

Which God their Saviour do buy or sell,
Or they for any money to take or tell, suggests that he was a priest who held his vocation seriously, and was not improbably in sympathy with that reforming impulse which, in spite of onslaughts upon Lollardry, was, at the time when "Everyman" was written, already beginning to make head amongst thoughtful men. However this may be, the obvious sincerity of the play has its very real fascination, and there is at least one astonishingly dramatic moment when Everyman, gaily clad and singing his song of wantonness, like the Magdalen in gaudio of the miracle-plays, is met by the grim figure who has just been sent from the conclave of the Highest to arrest him.

When "Everyman" was first revived, it was rather difficult to get hold of a convenient copy of the text. That want has now been met by Mr. F. Sidgwick, who has published through Mr. A. H. Bullen a very neat little edition in modernised spelling. The literary history of the play is curious, and well illustrates the cosmopolitan nature of mediæval and Renaissance book-making. It is not quite certain whether it is the original or a translation of a very similar Dutch play, entitled "Speghel der Salicheyt von Elckerlijck," of which the author is probably the mystic Peter Dorland of Diest. Prof. Logemann, who has made an elaborate study of the subject, takes the latter view; Dr. De Raaf, the editor of the Dutch text, the former. "Elckerlijck" was turned into Latin by Christian Sterck under the name of "Homulus." From this it got into German, and from German back again into the Dutch from which it had started. But to the "Homulus" and its translations are added several scenes from an independent neo-Latin play on another version of the same theme. This is the "Hecastus" of George Lankveld, or Macropepius, of Utrecht, of which in its turn there exist one Danish, one Swedish and six German translations. The total literature of this particular dramatic group is, as will be seen, a somewhat complicated one. The original source, alike of "Everyman" or of "Elckerlijck," whichever may claim the priority, and of "Hecastus," seems to have been a Buddhist story which had filtered down through the "Legenda Aurea" of Jacobus de Voragine and the "Speculum Historiale" of Vincent de Beauvais, from the "Barlaam and Jehosaphat" of John of Damascus, a Patriarch of Antioch in the eleventh century. This story is a parable of a man who is called before the judgment-seat to pay a debt. He has three friends, two of whom desert him, while the third remains faithful. The three represent his worldly prosperity, his kith and kin, and his righteous deeds respectively. But it will be observed that there is nothing here of what is most effective of all in the play, the figure of Death. This is the introduction of the mediæval dramatist; and of course, it is inspired by those figured representations of the danse macabre or "Dance of Death," of Death hobnobbing impartially with king and clown, with pope and fool, which form the subject of many a long series of frescoes and prints from the fifteenth century. The danse macabre was one of the principal channels through which the element of allegory, which largely differentiates the morality from the miracle-play, found its way into the mediæval drama. A jeu histoire et moralité sur le fait de la danse macabre was performed before Philip the Good at Bruges in 1449. Another example is recorded at Besançon in 1453. Of the great English cycles of miracle-plays, the one which is most influenced by the love of the later middle ages for allegory is that known, although probably incorrectly, as the "Ludus Conventiæ." Amongst other such episodes is one at the end of the play of "The Slaughter of the Innocents," in which "Dethe, Goddys masangere," enters at Herod's banquet, slays him, and sings his dirge of triumph over all mankind:—

I am sent fro God, Death is my name!

All thing that is on ground I wield at my will:

Both man and beast and birdes, wild and tame,

When that I come them to, with death I do them kill.

Herbs, grass, and trees strong, take them all in same;

Yea, the great mighty oaks with my dent I spill;

What man that I wrestle with, he shall right soon have shame,

I give him such a trepett, he shall evermore lie still;
For death can no sport.

Where I smite, there is no grace,

For after my stroke man hath no space

To make amends for his trespass,

But God him grant comfort.

When, in the fifteenth century, mediæval drama came to deal almost wholly with allegorical abstractions, rather than with Scriptural or legendary personages, and to aim less at the exposition of divine history than at the establishing of ethics and faith, the Triumph of Death was one of the three or four themes on which the morality rang its changes. In English it is treated, not only in "Everyman," but also in an earlier play, of which a fragment only has been comparatively recently discovered. This is known as "The Pride of Life." Everyman is represented in it by a King "Rex Vivus," who sports with Mirth, Fortitude, and Health, and is vainly called upon by his queen and a bishop to repent. Presently Death comes to take him, and only the prayers of Our Lady save him from the "ffendis."

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Marbles and Memories.

Two reasons prompted me to take that particular book out to the edge of the quarry, and, lying there on the turf, to turn the leaves again. First, that for the whirl and clash of spring picture exhibitions, now beginning to assert themselves again, it is well to prepare oneself by a day's companionship with some great personality of the past; second, that this was a quarry, and it is against the background of a quarry that I see the figure of Michael Angelo. Eight months was Michael Angelo in the mountains of Carrara quarrying marbles for the tomb of Pope Julius II., helped by two workmen and a horse, and without any salary but his food. In those eight months of his wilderness what dreams must have been his of lordly sculptures that those blocks of shining marble held. Perhaps there he saw the "Moses" hidden in that crag overlooking the sea out of which Condivi tells us he longed to carve a Colossus that would be a landmark for sailors: perhaps it was during those solitary months that this Titan, so brimful of exuberant life that he had not the patience to work on them to the point of finish, wrenched from the marble those rough-hewn colossal figures now in the Boboli Gardens at Florence. Thirty-four cartloads of marble he shipped to Rome, and when the great masses of marble were strewn out over the piazza of St. Peter's "they were the admiration of all and a joy to the Pope." Thus happily and triumphantly, with Rome acclaiming, and the Pope approving, began the preparations for that Tomb of Pope Julius that was to bring Michael Angelo such trouble and grief, and to proceed no further than the "Moses," and the two slaves now in the Louvre. Condivi, his friend and pupil, has told us the story of "The Tragedy of the Tomb," and it was Condivi's Life of Michael Angelo that I took out with me to read that afternoon on the edge of the quarry. This document, now translated completely for the first time by Mr. Charles Holroyd, is accompanied by a supplementary life and an account of the master's works from his own pen, with an appendix containing some conversations on painting reported by a Portuguese miniature painter who was in Rome in 1538. Michael Angelo is the chief contributor to the symposium, another is the Lady Marchioness of Pescara, "of whose divine spirit he was enamoured." Published by Messrs. Duckworth, this well-designed volume has many illustrations, and was just the kind of companion to take with one to the edge of a quarry, and to recall through a spring afternoon the deep sign-mark of Michael Angelo on the centuries.

Condivi gives a minute description of his appearance, but the picture does not compose. Heroic was his work, heroic seems the man. Those thirty-four cartloads of marble strewing the piazza of St. Peter's are typical. I see him against the background of that tumbled mountain of marble, or working for twenty months at that picture-gallery of one hundred and forty separate pictures on the vault of the Sistine Chapel. "When he had finished this work," says Condivi, "because he had painted so long a time with his eyes turned upwards towards the vault, he could hardly see anything when looking down, so that when he had to read a letter or look at a minute object it was necessary for him to hold it above his head." Out of the past come details of that stupendous work. This vault of grey sky that hangs low over the quarry might be the vault of the Sistine Chapel, and poised there upon the clouds I see the colossal figure of the prophet Jeremiah, his feet crossed, chin resting on hand, brooding into futurity: see, too, the eager head of Ezekiel, restless, minatory, his hand outstretched; the timorously knowing face of the Delphic Sibyl, and that large, lithe heaving figure of the first man touched into life by the finger of the Eternal. Or it may be that yonder dark clouds shape themselves into the cowering figures of Adam and Eve fleeing into the desert. Superhuman these gigantic shapes seem, superhuman the man who fashioned them. The human figure was his idea of decoration: he loved the human figure: had he done nothing but the vault of the Sistine Chapel his achievement in bulk would have been greater than the life work of any of his contemporaries. Truly the arch of the sky is the right place to re-create the work of such a man.

And yet it is not the painter of the Sistine Chapel that I think of when I recall the name of Michael Angelo, it is the sculptor of the Overman, who gathered up into single figures the hopes, the efforts, the destinies of generations. That massive "Moses" who sits out there in his great seat on the edge of the quarry clutching his flowing beard, tense, massive, very old, typifies the seer and the leader, pitiable, but just, and unvanquished by the world. You see the body beneath the clothes, you feel the power in the bare arms and the arrogant right leg of this "most marvellous Moses," as Condivi calls him. There he sits, unconquered, still eager, the type of the man who, playing his part well in the world, yet looks beyond it. Near by, gazing not towards the hills like Moses, but down into the valley where Florence might lie, sits the helmeted Lorenzo the Magnificent brooding over "what might have been had he acted his part in Florence." His chin rests on his hand, his eyes are heavy and downcast. Defeat has come to him, but it is splendid defeat: he takes it as he took life—magnificently. So I see these two types against the sky-line, the colossal "Moses" with his eyes upturned, and the colossal "Lorenzo" with his eyes downcast, and beneath them those four gigantic figures of Day, Evening, Night and Dawn, symbols of the poetry, emotion and effort in human life that, for over four hundred years, men have marvelled at in the dim Sacristy of San Lorenzo.

I see this mighty Michael Angelo snatching what leisure he could from his duties as commander of the forces for the defence of Florence, to labour in secret in the Sacristy on these tombs of the Medici, working hard, eating little and poorly, and sleeping less: I hear the old man's cry in a letter to the King of France, praying that if it be possible to carve statues or to paint in another life he may be allowed to do so, there "where there is no growing old": I see him when his work in sculpture or painting did not proceed as quickly as he wished, writing sonnets and madrigals: I have visions of him, an old man of eighty-two, visiting the hermits in the mountains of Spoleto, and writing to Vasari, "less than half of me has come back to Rome, for truly there is no peace except among the woods": I hear his lamentation over the death of his favourite servant, "the only hope left to me is seeing him again in Paradise . . . the better part of me went with him, nothing is left to me but endless sorrow." Thus the mortal part of Michael Angelo, grown old and sorrowful; but the immortal part of him stands up there against the sky-line—"Moses" and "Lorenzo," towering above the "Day," the "Evening," the "Night," and the "Dawn."

But it is not as old and broken that I like to think of him, but rather in his triumphant days, the arrogant friend of popes and princes—sculptor, soldier, architect, poet, painter, ascetic who asked nothing more than to be allowed to work at his art in this life and the next. "You frighten everybody, even Popes," wrote Sebastiano to him: indeed, although he was kind to a fault to his relations, sometimes his anger leaps out, as in that letter to Simone. "I have gone these twelve years past drudging about through all Italy, borne every shame, suffered every hardship, worn my body in every toil, put my life into a thousand dangers, solely to help the fortunes of my house, and now that I have begun to raise it up a little, you alone choose to destroy and ruin in one hour all that I have done in so many years, and with such labours. By Christ's body this shall not be! for I am the man to confound ten thousand such as you whenever it be needed. Be wise in time then, and do not try one who has other things to vex him."

One more picture. He is old, but still a worker, consulting scholars as to his poems, and seeing the Dome of St. Peter's, that his brain devised, rising under the hands of the master masons. His last work in sculpture was the "Pietà" for the High Altar of Santa Maria del Fiore at Florence. He spent days and nights over it: it was to be his monument. The unfinished head of Nicodemus—sad and worn—who clasps the body of his Lord was to be his own portrait. Vasari saw him in his vast and dimly-lighted studio working by night at this great block of inchoate marble with a lighted candle stuck in the paper cap on his head. So illumined I think I see him down there in the gloom of the quarry. I hear the click of the chisel on the marble, see dimly the "Pietà" growing into life, and the sound of mallet and chisel goes to the rhythm of that sonnet of his that Wordsworth cast into his own pure English: so poets are linked to poets:—

The prayers I make will then be sweet indeed
If thou the spirit give by which I pray. . . .

His last work! A prayer in stone!

C. L. H.

Science.

The Inner Limit of Vision.

THE revealing power of the microscope is limited by the nature of light. Herein is one of the many cases where science deliberately asserts that, in a most fruitful direction of research, the very means which are employed by her impose the inviolable restriction, "thus far and no further." Whatever developments are forthcoming in the use of the microscope, the wave-length of light must be reckoned with. The law is simple enough in statement. It is theoretically possible for two points to be distinguished under the microscope if the distance between them be at least equal to the wave-length of the light that is used. This relation holds with light passing perpendicularly upwards through the object examined, if it be transparent; or reflected perpendicularly from its surface to the lenses of the microscope and of the eye, if it be translucent or opaque. With oblique illumination the inner limit of vision is reduced to half the wave-length of the light employed. I use the word vision in this relation to include the sensitiveness of the human retina or of a photographic plate. And it is particularly to be noted that a sensitive plate may record rays of wave-length too short to affect our eyes. It follows, in theory, that the photographic method may reveal minuteness of structure—in a germ-cell, for example—which we can never directly see. Here is a surprising parallel to the value of this artificial eye when vicariously applied to the telescope; for in the furthest heavens also it can reveal what we may never see by direct vision. I am not going to discuss the chances of an astronomer ever seeing the disc of a fixed star; but it is of high philosophical importance to consider the reasons why the physicist will never be able to see even the largest of molecules, far less an atom or an ion; and why the biologist will never be able to gaze unashamed upon the beauty of the hidden face of life, nor see bare before him the heavy-veiled mystery of the structure of living protoplasm. And am I not justified in speaking of "high philosophical importance," if the secret of life be thus locked for ever within the untrodden ways of a burning network that defies our inmost analysis?

If we wish to know where the limit lies we must consider the entire spectrum of light. For convenience we defy etymology and talk of the "invisible spectrum"—the unseeable seen. I suppose this unfortunate term must be accepted. As we at present know the spectrum of light (letting philology go), it begins with the rays of low pitch that we recognise as radiant heat—the "infra-red" rays. From these it passes upwards through the visible spectrum—the vibrations becoming regularly more rapid and the wave-length shorter—to the ultra-violet, beyond which, as we are just coming to know, is a long gap, closed at last by the Röntgen rays. Beyond these tiny narrow waves we know of nothing. (And, by the way, I think it is time to discontinue the use of Röntgen's own modest term, "X." The rays are no longer "unknown," and now, after eight years, the discoverer's name or a descriptive one should be allotted to them. There are enough phenomena in Nature that we may put under "X" without including the few that we can define.) Now, if we apply the general theorem with which I began, we may fairly state, I think, that as far as we at present know (for there may be something beyond even the Röntgen rays) the most intimate revelation possible to us would be obtained by microscopic examination of an object obliquely illuminated by the Röntgen rays. Their wave-length is probably less than one four-millionth of an inch; so that by their use two points under the microscope could be separately identified if there were one eight-millionth part of an inch between them. This indicates approximately the utmost limit theoretically possible; wherefore I have worked it out. Possibly it will never be more than theory. To begin with, the Röntgen rays are so narrow that they are not deflected by ordinary matter. At present they cannot be bent or refracted, and they may prove to be essentially irrefrangible. Hence no lens or series of lenses such as a microscope could utilise them. And, furthermore, we would need a surface that would record the form of the rays, even supposing that they could be bent. The retina, of course, would record nothing.

But now let us turn to the gap between the ultra-violet and the Röntgen rays. It is a tremendous hiatus and contains tremendous possibilities. The visible spectrum consists of just about an octave; that is to say, violet light consists of vibrations about twice as frequent as those of the red. Now, if the Röntgen rays be only one hundred times as rapid as violet light—and the ratio may be several hundreds—it follows that there is a possibility of obtaining hundreds of octaves of ethereal vibration in the gap. I must interrupt myself to protest that this is all speculation on my part and is to be taken as such. But, at any rate, there is nothing in the known properties of the ether to preclude the possibility of its vibrating at any or all of these intermediate speeds.

It seems to me that we may soon discover one or many of these possible octaves that I have supposed. I am puzzled for a name, but I suppose I may provisionally call them the infra-Röntgen rays. The Röntgen rays may never be refrangible, but, had we the whole ethereal gamut at our beck and call, we might well find some rays nearer ordinary sunlight and therefore refrangible as it is. Then may we hope for some new light on heredity and on the supreme problems which the grey surface of the human brain offers to itself.

Now I do not want the readers of the ACADEMY to think that I am offering them raw speculation because it amuses me. I suggested this possible source of light on heredity to Lord Rayleigh the other day and he agreed, with a smile at my biological frenzy, that certainly there must be a rational possibility of an advance in our knowledge by the use in connexion with the microscope of the hypothetical form of radiant energy which I have called the infra-Röntgen rays—or, if you like, the "gap" radiation.

Finally, let me give one reason for supposing that these hitherto unknown rays, helping to fill up the "gap," may be present in the solar radiation. Sir William Crookes and M. Curie hold different views as to the source whence radium obtains its energy. M. Curie, in his latest paper in the Comptes Rendus, supposes an entirely unknown form of energy. Sir William Crookes believes that radium gets its energy from the movements of the molecules in the air that surrounds it. That amounts to saying that radium gets its energy from the atmospheric pressure; there is no real distinction. The question is still sub judice; but I should like to note a property of this new element which leads me to guess that M. Curie's "entirely unknown form of energy" may be simply what I have called the "infra-Röntgen" radiation. Radium has the power, corresponding to fluorescence, of transforming Röntgen rays into visible light and heat. So it is not unreasonable to suppose that a radiation of lower pitch than the Röntgen rays, but shriller, so to speak, than the highest known ray of ultra-violet light, may be similarly transformed and constitute the hitherto unidentified source of the energy of radium. These "gap" rays may well be refrangible and therefore available for the microscope. Being of shorter wave-length than the shortest "actinic" rays they will afford a higher magnification; and if they also can be made to affect sensitive paper there will be for our eyes a wider though ever incomplete unfolding of the gates of the temple of life.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

"The Sayings of Jesus."

SIR,—Your correspondent "The Bookworm" always provides one of the most interesting pages of the ACADEMY, but I just ask for a very few lines wherein to correct a slight misunderstanding displayed in his last week's contribution. In preparing the little booklet with the above title, my least wish has been to be thought original—the general hunt for originality being in my sight the greatest hindrance to dignity and repose in modern life and modern literature. I am, of course, quite familiar with the admirable books which "The Bookworm" mentions, but none of them met my own personal needs. I therefore prepared "The Sayings of Jesus" solely for my own use. I found it so satisfactory to myself that I determined to permit its publication. From letters that have reached me from those whose needs and interests at all resemble my own, I find that the book was worth publishing. I merely wish to point out that "The Sayings of Jesus" is not a little piece of hack book-making. By the way, I think "The Bookworm" has overlooked the fact that I have—possibly impertinently—extensively modified the words of the Authorised translation where, in my opinion, that translation, through error or archaism, gives an inaccurate rendering of the original.—Yours, &c.,

HARRY ROBERTS.

Hayle, Cornwall.

Mary Arden's House at Wilmcote.

SIR,—My attention has been called to a letter signed Marie Corelli, which appears in your issue of March 21, and in which Miss Corelli states that Mary Arden's House "has been turned into three tenement dwellings." As the owner of the house in question, will you kindly permit me to say that this statement is absolutely incorrect. The house is in the occupation of one tenant only, and has been so for very many years.

As to its rustic and picturesque beauty having been destroyed, nothing has been done to destroy it beyond what was absolutely necessary for the preservation of the building. To this end, in 1899 the greater part of an old pear tree, which had forced itself through the roof of the gable, had to be cut away, and some of the creepers had also to be removed.—Yours, &c.,

G. E. SMITH.

13, Warwick Road, Stratford-on-Avon.

"Fiction and Froth."

SIR,—Every thoughtful person who reads many current novels must thank you for your temperate protest against the spirit of misrepresentation which pervades so much of the fiction of the day. The name of those novels is legion which one opens only to find a series of libels upon human nature. One is tempted to wish there were any means of punishing those who "imitate humanity so abominably," or at least of deterring them from future outrages.

Happily there is always a brighter side. There are established reputations which require no defence, and of these I do not speak. But I have found among new writers some who evidently are, as your article puts it, "careful observers of the growth and development of, say, a couple of families"; who have made—again I quote your article—"an actual return to actual life." Two such writers have lately given us as a result of this method, a couple of sane, wholesome, and interesting volumes, without devising impossible characters and impossible situations. These writers are as unknown to me as I am to them: I have therefore all the more pleasure in calling the notice of those who are tired of froth and flummery to "Changes and Chances" and "The Fetich of the Family." I enclose my card.—Yours, &c.,

A REVIEWER.

Pioneers of the "Delusion."

SIR,—Mr. T. V. Holmes suggests that Mr. Sidney Lee is not quite accurate in his contention that America is "the land in which the Baconian delusion first came into being and has been chiefly nurtured." If by "Baconian delusion" Mr. Sidney Lee refers to the "Shakespeare-Bacon Controversy," Mr. Sidney Lee is perfectly correct. Both its birth and nurture are justly claimed by America.

The first known publication questioning the right of Shakespeare to the authorship of the Shakespearean dramas was "The Ancient Lethe," published by Harper and Brothers in New York in 1848, and written by Joseph C. Hart, a brilliant New York lawyer, journalist, and yachtsman, the friend and associate of Willis and Poe, and a colonel in the National Guards. He contrasted Shakespeare with the other Elizabethan writers, and argued that the facts known in the life of Shakespeare, so far as they are known, are incompatible with the authorship, taking up the plays in review and claiming that Shakespeare had very little part in them. Hart suggested no author, however.

The scene then changes to Scotland, where an article, "Who Wrote Shakespeare?" appeared in 1852 in "Chambers's Edinburgh Journal," in which the same arguments were adduced. "We repeat," the author states, "there is nothing recorded in his [Shakespeare's] every-day life that connects the two [the man of Stratford and the author of "Hamlet"] except the simple fact of his selling the poems and realising the proceeds, and their being afterwards published with his name attached; and the statements of Ben Jonson, which, however, are quite compatible with his being in the secret." It may interest your readers to know that the author of this article in a Scotch journal was a Scotchman, the father of another famous Scotchman, "Dr. Jim," the "author" of a more celebrated work—"the Jameson Raid."

Next came America to the front, with an article by Delia Bacon in "Putnam's Monthly," in January, 1856, entitled "William Shakespeare and His Plays: An Enquiry concerning them." It was only a short paper of nineteen pages; but Miss Bacon, who was the friend of Emerson, Hawthorne, and Carlyle, was indubitably the first writer who connected the name of Francis Bacon with the authorship of the Shakespearean dramas. This article she afterwards expanded into a huge tome, "The Philosophy of the Plays of Shakespeare Unfolded," in 1857. Poor Delia's life was a sad one, but in London she was kindly received and treated by Carlyle and his wife, on her introduction to them by Emerson and Hawthorne. She drew, in her article, with a singularly skilful hand, the contrast between the known facts in the life of Shakespeare and the magnificence of the dramas that bear his name. She also advanced in her book, for the first time, the theory of a hidden under-current of philosophy in the works of both Bacon and Shakespeare, veiled in cipher and allegory for the Elizabethan times, but to be read and understood by a future age. This theory Nathaniel Hawthorne admirably outlined in his preface to the volume.

In the same year appeared an English work, "Bacon and Shakespeare: Letter from William Henry Smith, on the Psalms Translated by Bacon," in which it was claimed that these translations show the poetic faculty in Bacon, and that "his mind was so essentially poetical that it was as great a constraint to him to write prose or to spare or pass by a jest." Shortly afterwards Mr. Smith issued an enlargement and extension of this letter as "Bacon and Shakespeare: An Enquiry touching Players, Play-Houses, and Play-Writers, in the Days of Elizabeth." Mr. Smith is still alive, and took part in the recent correspondence in "The Times." His book is a small one, but the quality is excellent.

It will thus be seen that in the "delusion," in point of priority, America comes first, Scotland second, and England third.

Since 1857 what a mass of literature has appeared on the subject! In 1884 Mr. Wyman published a "Bibliography" of 255 items—to which I am much indebted for my facts—subsequently added to by supplementary lists in "Shakesperiana," April and July, 1886, April and December, 1887, and May and December, 1888, also "Poet-Lore," February, 1889, forming a condensed consecutive record of the whole controversy, full also of curious side-lights upon odd corners of Shakespearean study, and affording the student matter of peculiar interest.

The last item numbered by Mr. Wyman is 424. The last item in my collection—the largest in the world, as Messrs. Romeike and Curtice can certify—is numbered 2,621, which will prove that the subject has attracted some attention since the year 1889. This collection, which will eventually become the property of the Bacon Society, is till then at the service of any of your readers who care to apply to me for information on any point in connection with the controversy in which they are interested.

When, at the commencement of my too-long letter, I gave Colonel Hart the first credit of the so-called "delusion," I forgot that Byron, years before, had stated that he expected to wake up some morning to find that "Shakespeare had never written Shakespeare"; and that Disraeli in "Venetia" (1837) had said: "And who is Shakespeare?" We know of him as much as we do of Homer. Did he write half the plays attributed to him? Did he ever write a single whole play? I doubt it. He appears to me to have been an inspired adapter for the theatres, which were then not so good as barns. I take him to have been a botcher-up of old plays. [Sidney Lee (p. 59) says: "Criticism has proved beyond doubt that in these plays Shakespeare did no more than add, revise, and correct other men's work."] His popularity is of modern date, and it may not last; it would have surprised him marvellously. Heaven knows, at present, all that bears his name is alike admired, and a regular Shakespearean falls into ecstasies with trash which deserves a place in the Dunciad."

Perhaps, after all, England has first claim on the services of a Shakespearean doubter, as Mr. Holmes suggests—and his name Beaconsfield. As a Tory and Baconian of forty years' standing, I trust this is correct.—Yours, &c.,

GEORGE STRONACH.

7, Warrender Park Crescent, Edinburgh.

"Taken as Read."

SIR,—It may be interesting to you to have the views of one of those "sad-eyed" public librarians on the use made of the "immortals." A great deal is said and written on the neglect of them by people who, having neglected them themselves, imagine all other people do so. In the course of my official duties I have taken account of the number of readings of certain classics with surprising results. With regard to Dante and Homer, we have Cary's translation of the former, and it is so constantly in use that I dare to call it a popular book; Lang's, Pope's, and Morris's versions of Homer are used here, and to take figures from the first only it has been issued about 200 times in four years. Am I to imagine that these books are only borrowed for mere show? I do not think so.

Again, critics of such standing as Mr. Frederic Harrison declare that George Eliot is not read now; others that Scott is unpopular, Thackeray remains unread; and as for Milton and Shakespeare, they are mere furniture on the shelves. Now all this betrays a painful ignorance of the actual reading public. We have two sets of George Eliot, and it is a fact that they are always out; "Adam Bede" is as popular as "East Lynne" or "Lady Audley's Secret." Each of Thackeray's, Scott's, and Peacock's works find at least twenty readers yearly; "Ivanhoe," "The Bride of Lammermoor," "Vanity Fair," and "Pendennis," a great many more. Could your writer but see how thumbed and worn by constant use are our volumes of Milton his tone would be modified. We have three copies of Shakespeare; these too, except in the three summer months, are so popular that many borrowers wait weeks for them. We have two copies of "The Vicar of Wakefield," and their circulation is equally great.

All this may seem romance to the writer of your article; it is sober fact. The National Home Reading Union and the University Extension Movement are excellent supplements to the public (not free) library, and I, for one, shall be glad to see Dr. Garnett's advice as to the union and co-operation of all these adopted. Meanwhile, I am fully convinced that a public exists which does not take the classics as read; and much good work is done in helping it by the "sad-eyed" librarians.

Where the library is arranged on the same principle of open access, as here, the results are always good. Reviewers, seeing that the proportion of fiction does, and always will, overshadow the issues of heavier books, do not consider the effect on the community that the annual issue of 20,000 serious books—and that is a fair number for the average public library—must have.—Yours, &c.,

W. C. BERWICK SAYERS,

Central Public Library,
Bournemouth.

Sub-Librarian.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 186 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best rendering in English verse of a song of Raftery's which we quoted from Lady Gregory's "Poets and Dreamers." Twenty-four replies have been received. We award the prize to Mr. Frank Mathew, Kent Cottage, Lyme Regis, for the following:—

I know a flower that grows where a mountain byeway goes,
With a dearer voice than Deirdre's, or Helen's fair to see,
Or a bird's upon a spray; she is light and bright as they;
It is not for man to find on the earth a fairer mind
Since the hills were black with sorrow for the Pearl of Ballylee.
She is slender tall and white, a fountain of delight;
The darkness of the blind would be broken by her breast
When its gleaming has outdone all the glory of the Sun,
And her proud and noble grace. Love's one home is in her face
And the promise of the evening star that brings the weary rest.

Her rich hair wanders free in waves below her knee,
As delicate and amber as the tears of early morn,
And illumines the blackest rays. I shall not live many days
If the gladness of her voice does not wake me to rejoice.
O she is as pure and shining as the dew on golden corn!
In darkness and despair I am sure of honour there:
She says "Good-morrow" kindly and courteously to me.
If I were a lord with land, many miles, at my command,
This would be my only pride,—young Mairin would be my bride.
When I should be groping onward, it is there that I would be!

Other replies follow:—

It's along the road she's walking beneath the open sky,
Her long hair streams behind her like the dewy harvest pale;
Sure, if there met her a-dancing, a man with never an eye,
He'd see her slender whiteness all through her amber veil.
Of all the girls that open their eyes still to the sun,
There's none of her upbringing. Ah, if it fell to me—
The grand estate of Lord Lucan—it's I would have this one,
This loveliest of jewels since the pearl of Ballylee.
It's the blessed love of hundreds shines in her morning face,
And in her eyes the promise of the evening star I see;
No flower by the wayside is like her slender grace.
Or the waving, winding splendour to the shoe's mouth falling free.
With Deirdre's own voice she greets me in the pleasant hush of morn,
And brings a stool from the corner, and drinks a health with me;
While the song of her "Good morrow" is the cuckoo's on the thorn:
Ah, flower-faced Mairin Stanton, there's none the like of ye.
Oh, the dew of all her brightness is a-dropping on my soul,
And it's talking I sit and talking when I should be far on my way;
But if the time was coming that I should lose my dote
Of a hundred words from Mairin, I'd never outlast the day!
[E. R., London.]

There's a flower by the side of the road whose beautiful voice can beat
The beautiful voices of Deirdre and Helen the Grecian Queen:
She has light and brightness as they, and her mouth as a cuckoo is sweet,
And since the Ballylee pearl no spirit like her's has been.
If she walk out under the sky when the roads in the sunshine are,
By the flashing white of her breast a man might see without eyes.
Her face has the love of hundreds and the hope of the evening star.
Had she lived in the time of the gods not Venus had won the prize.
Her hair falls down to her knees, yea, down to the mouth of her shoes,
Winding and waving and leaving the pathway behind her bright,
Spreading out wide and pale with the width and pallor of dews,
And she is the nicest taught of all who behold the light.
Had I Lord Lucan's estate, this jewel were mine, I know—
Slender lime-white shape, flower-face and amber hair,
Neck and cheek, O Virgil, and Homer, and Cicero,
Sing nothing like her who is dew that the harvest meadows wear.
You must love the flower of the branch seeing it move and dance.
If I cannot speak with Mairin my life will not last a day:
With "Good morrow" she drank my health and gave me a stool,
perchance,
Not in the corner, and so I talk when I should away.

[V. M. W., Auchterhouse.]

Beside thee, Deirdre, sings meanly, my flow'ret, my traveller's-joy,
To me thou art Helen the queenly, for whom the lads fought around Troy:
The throat of the cuckoo outwelling thro' woodlands, is thine in its glee:
None like thee, since she the excelling lost jewel of old Ballylee!
O that bosom its ivory brightness wakes sight in a man without eyes:
Talk of Venus! thy gleaming star-whiteness would win the gold apple for prize.
Those tresses, their glorious expansion, the sweep of their manifold growth!
Were I lord of Earl Lucan's proud mansion, 'tis I that would plight her my troth.

Thy looks and thy locks are far brighter than amber, or dewfall divine:
Sure never was classical writer that ever praised beauty like thine!
My bloom of the bough, hear my chant on thy charms as they dance into view;
Speak threescore sweet words, Mairin Stanton, or my years upon earth will be few!
How blithe her "Good-morrow": bestowing the pick of her chairs on poor me!
Faith, it is time it is time I was going: but it's talking with Mairin I'd be!

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

Was thy voice, Deirdre, sweetest, thy face, Helen, fairest
Of all voices we hear, of all faces we see?
Nay, my Mairin is fairest, my Mairin is rarest,
Since the pearl of the world forsook Ballylee.
Her lightness, her brightness, her sweetness, her fleetness,
Can you catch them, or match them? my fairy's a bird,
Her walk and her talk are perfection's completeness,
Did she speak? 'twas the voice of all angels I heard.
Full blossomed the road-side that felt but the tread of her.
One flash from her eye gave the blind man his sight;
Could Paris but gaze from the foot to the head of her
The apple were hers by divinest of right.
Waves and winds to her shoes the bright cloud of the hair of her,
'Tis of silk, no, of amber, nay, glorified dew,
'Tis a lamp to the hundreds that love her; the care of her,
Were I but a lord, were the dearest I knew.
I've no time. I am busy, but Mairin is kind to me,
My time's in thy hand, love, I'll creep to thy side;
Every poet would swear 'tis my duty to bind to me
The flower of the world, aye with her to abide.

[T. C., Buxted.]

Competition No. 187 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best letter describing an incident which occurred during the Easter Holidays.
Not to exceed 250 words.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY,
43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 22 April, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.
Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Thomas (James), The First Christian Generation.....(Sonnenschein) 6/0

POETRY, CRITICISM AND BELLES LETTRES.

Kittton (F. G.), collected and edited by, The Poems and Verses of Charles Dickens.....(Chapman and Hall) net 3/6
Wallis (Arthur F.), Stars of the Morning: A Play.....(Matthews) net 3/6
De Quincey (F. H.), Song-Tide Murmurs.....(") net 2/6
Lewis (Arthur), Ginevra: A Drama in Three Acts.....(") net 1/0
Watson (E. H. Lacon), Verses Occasionally Humorous.....(") net 1/0 Rogers (John), With Elia and His Friends in Books and Dreams
(Matthews) net 2/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Morris (William O'Connor), Memoirs of Gerald O'Connor....(Digby, Long) net 7/6
Cowper (Dean), Autobiography and Reminiscences....(Angus and Robertson)
Möller (Lieut. B.), Two Years at the Front with the Mounted Infantry
(Richards) 6/0
Welch (Charles), History of the Worshipful Company of Pewterers of the City of London. 2 vols.....(Blades) net 6/0
Mew (James), Traditional Aspects of Hell.....(Sonnenschein) 6/0
Kirkup (Thomas), South Africa: Old and New.....(Macdonald) 3/6
Nesbitt (W. Blair), The Programme of the Jesuits....(Hodder and Stoughton) 3/6
Cassidy (Captain Gordon), The Land of the Boxers, or China under the Allies
(Longmans) net 10/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Weed (Clarence Moores) and Crossman (Ralph Wallace), A Laboratory Guide for Beginners in Zoology.....(Heath) 2/6
Freuen-side (C. S.), The Tutorial History of England
(University Tutorial Press) 4/6
Wyatt (A. J.), edited by, *Chaucer: Canterbury Tales, The Prologue and Nun's
Priest's Tale*.....(University Tutorial Press) 2/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

Newnham-Davis (Lt.-Col.), and Bastard (Algernon), The Gourmet's Guide to Europe.....(Richards) 3/6
Wade (Claude F.), Exmoor Streams. Angling Notes.....(Chatto and Windus)
Whittaker (Joseph), Tales of Tumblie Fold.....(Henderson) net 3/6
Reade (A. Arthur), The Story of Life Assurance.....(The Author) 5/0
The Union-Castle Atlas of South Africa.....(Donald Currie) 3/6
Twining (Louisa), Thoughts on Some Social Questions.....(Stock) 1/6
Gilbertson (Lawrence), The Pocket Guide to the Education Act.....(Osborn) net 1/0
Lane (O. H.), Rabbits, Cats, and Cavies.....(Dent) net 10/6
Mallik (M. C.), The South African Problem.....(King) 0/6
Weir (Harrison), Our Poultry. Part 12.....(Hutchinson) net 0/7

NEW EDITIONS.

Pattee (Fred Lewis), The Poems of Philip Freneau. Vol. I.
(Princeton Historical Association)
Hume (David), Essays: Moral, Political, and Literary.....(Richards) net 1/0
The Windsor Shakespeare: Comedy of Errors.....(Jack) net 2/0
The Temple Bible: Maccabees I. and II......(Dent) net 1/0
Fitzgerald (Edward), Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyám.....(Grant) net 1/0
Rossetti (Dante Gabriel), The Blessed Damozel.....(") net 0/6
The Intelligent Officer, On the Heels of De Wet.....(Blackwood) 9/6
Crier (Sydney C.), His Excellency's English Governess.....(") 0/6
Thackeray (W. M.), The Book of Snobs.....(Dent) net 3/0
Cumfall (J. W.), edited by, America Abroad.....(Greening) 0/6
Owen (J. L.), Seven Nights with Satan.....(") 0/6
De Brémont (Comtesse), Daughters of Pleasure.....(") 0/6
Read (Charles A.), The Cabinet of Irish Literature. Vol. IV.
(Gresham Publishing Company) 8/6
Sheridan (Richard Brinsley), Plays.....(Unit Library) net 1/3
Kelce (John), The Christian Year.....(") net 1/0
Laing (Samuel), Human Origins.....(Watts) 9/6

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

Mr. Bodley, after eight months of hard work, has sent to the printers his book on the Coronation written by His Majesty's command. It will be published by Messrs.
Methuen in May. The Coronation of King Edward is dealt with not as an isolated incident, but as the consecration of the British Empire, developed and consolidated in the previous reign.

The illustrated "History of English Literature," by Mr. Edmund Gosse and Dr. Garnett, is nearly complete.
The first and third volumes are ready, but Mr. Heinemann proposes to issue the whole four volumes together in the autumn.

The publication of Mark Twain's new book, "Christian Science," has been postponed for the present.

Mr. Edward Clodd has thoroughly revised, and in part rewritten, Mr. Samuel Laing's "Human Origins," a sixpenny edition of which is being issued this week for the Rationalist Press Association by Messrs. Watts and Co. The next reprint in this cheap series (of which 250,000 have already been sold) will be Mr. Cotter Morison's "Service of Man," to which Mr. Frederic Harrison will contribute an introductory "In Memoriam" sketch of the author.

Messrs. G. P. Putnam's Sons are about to issue "The Law of Mental Medicine," by Dr. T. Jay Hudson. The author's aim is not to inculcate new doctrines or to "explode" the fallacy of the medical profession. He gathers a vast number of beliefs and quasi-medical practices from all times and all ages. By a correlation of these with existing medical theories, whether of causation or cure, he shows that there is a real repetition—"a law"
—of the same ideas in various forms.

Miss Fanny Byss has in the press a work entitled "Milton on the Continent," which will be published very shortly by Mr. Elliot Stock. The authoress maintains that she has discovered the key to the question which has exercised the minds of many students—when and where the twin poems "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso" were written. The work will be illustrated by views, an historical chart of Milton's time, and a copy of an original portrait of Galileo.

"The Conflict," by Miss Braddon, which Messrs.
Simpkin announce for publication next week, is a story of the present day.

J. W. ARROWSMITH, BRISTOL.
AN IMMEDIATE SUCCESS IN GREAT BRITAIN,
THE COLONIES, AND THE UNITED STATES.

RED-HEADED GILL.
By RYE OWEN. PRICE 6/-

Red-Headed Gill is a splendid young country gentlewoman of Cornwall. Under a weird East Indian influence she is forced to live over again the part of life of a beauty of the days of Queen Bess—the famous Gill Red-Head.

Bristol: J. W. Arrowsmith.
London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd.

NEW BOOK ON VERSE STRUCTURE.

A STUDY OF METRE.
By T. S. OMOND.

Crown 8vo, Buckram, 5s.

"Mr. Omond's sense of metre seems to me very delicate, just, and sane."

WM. ARCHER, in The Morning Leader.

"This volume contains a very judicious and sensible treatment of a problem too often mis-handled by prejudiced pedants."—Glasgow Herald.

LONDON:

GRANT RICHARDS, 48, Leicester Square.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready,
Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE
1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 200,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.;
241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., London;
and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday to 43, Chancery Lane. Terms, &c., on application.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 8d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery Lane.

Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD'S Popular Novel, LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

"The most appealing type of heroine ever presented in fiction."—Mr. W. D. Howells.

Over 110,000 COPIES

Sold in England and America.

LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

SECOND LARGE IMPRESSION.

With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

LATEST PRESS OPINIONS.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.—"If 'Lady Rose's Daughter' contained no other characters, the portrait of Julie le Breton and Lady Henry would make it a notable piece of fiction. . . In lightness of touch, variety of mood and temperament, and in ease of mood this story marks Mrs. Ward's highest achievement. In no other novel has she given so many evidences of the possession of the original qualities of the novelist: knowledge of life, dramatic power, sympathy of imagination, humour, and the gift of pathos."

GLOBE.—"We are inclined to think that on the whole this is the best work that Mrs. Humphry Ward has yet given us. . . It is a story of strong human interest; it goes down into the depths of mental and spiritual experience; it seizes the attention and holds it firmly to the end."

REVIEW OF REVIEWS.—"The story is intensely interesting, the characters are very delicately and vividly portrayed. . . Miss le Breton is a much more charming heroine than any of her predecessors in the long procession of Mrs. Ward's creations."

WORLD.—"Julie le Breton is presented with consummate skill. . . The novel, which possesses high literary excellence, is distinguished by evenly sustained interest, the completeness of the personality of every actor in the drama, and the skill with which the author, never straining probability unreasonably, makes them all subservient to the purposes of Julie le Breton."

STANDARD.—"As a novel pure and simple, 'Lady Rose's Daughter' is the best thing Mrs. Ward has done. The characters are highly individualised, the grouping is admirable, and the conversations are most natural."

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

MEMORIES OF "BOZ."

By PERCY FITZGERALD.

To-day's issue of "T.P.'s WEEKLY" will contain some interesting personal reminiscences of Charles Dickens by Percy Fitzgerald, one of the oldest surviving friends of this great novelist.

1d.

Every Friday Morning. Of all Newsagents.

1d.

T.P.'s WEEKLY.

The Academy and Literature

Is now

POSTED FREE to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/-

FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17/6

will secure it being sent Post Free to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy.

Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or News vendor,

OR DIRECT TO THE PUBLISHER OF

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE,

43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

A LIMITED NUMBER

OF THE PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS
TO "THE ACADEMY"

May still be obtained, singly, at 2d. each, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, CHANCERY LANE, W.C.

(Now Nearly Out of Print.)

BEN JONSON
JOHN KEATS
SIR JOHN SUCKLING
TOM HOOD
THOMAS GRAY
R. L. STEVENSON
SIR WALTER SCOTT
SAMUEL RICHARDSON
THOMAS DE QUINCEY
LEIGH HUNT
LORD MACAULAY
ROBERT SOUTHEY
S. T. COLERIDGE
CHARLES LAMB
MICHAEL DRAYTON
W. SAVAGE LANDOR
SAMUEL PEPYS
EDMUND WALLER
WILKIE COLLINS

JOHN MILTON
WILLIAM COWPER
CHARLES DARWIN
ALFRED, LORD TENNYSON
HENRY W. LONGFELLOW
ANDREW MARVELL
ROBERT BROWNING
THOMAS CARLYLE
PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY
CHARLES DICKENS
JONATHAN SWIFT
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE
THACKERAY
WILLIAM BLAKE
SIR RICHARD STEELE
ALEXANDER POPE
DOUGLAS JERROLD
FRANCIS BACON
HENRIK IBSEN

Mr. T. Fisher Unwin's List.

GEORGE MOORE'S NEW BOOK.

THE UNTILLED FIELD.

By GEORGE MOORE, Author of "Evelyn Innes," &c.
"Red Cloth Library." 6s. [April 27th.

"Mr. George Moore's new book deals with the continual emigration of the Irish peasantry to America. His hero is the emigrant ship, and in a series of episodes—some grave, some gay, some romantic, some pathetic, and all filled with vivid and absorbing interest—the author develops his heartfelt theme."

FOR THE BI-CENTENARY.

WESLEY AND HIS PREACHERS.

Their Conquest of Britain.

By G. HOLDEN PIKE, Author of "Cromwell and His Times," &c.

Illustrated, small demy 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d.

In this book Mr. Pike presents a popular picture of the great preacher and his work, and of the old world in which he lived.

TWO NEW PSEUDONYMS.

AS A TREE FALLS.

By L. PARRY TRUSCOTT, Author of "The Poet and Penelope."

Cloth, 2s.; paper covers, 1s. 6d. [Second Impression.

A NE'ER DO WELL.

By VALENTINE CARYL.

Cloth, 2s.; paper covers, 1s. 6d. [May 11th.

AUGUSTUS.

Life and Times of the Founder of the Roman Empire (B.C. 63—A.D. 14). By E. S. SHUCKENBURY, Litt.D. With 47 illustrations and Photogravure Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s.

"His book is in the best sense a popular book, which any intelligent man or woman, whether he or she be a classical scholar or not, can read with profit and pleasure. . . . The book is a really valuable contribution to the popular literature about a splendid moment in the history of the ancient world."
—Athenæum.

TRUE TALES OF MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE FOR NON-CLIMBERS, YOUNG AND OLD.

By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND (Mrs. Main).

With numerous illustrations and Frontispiece. Demy 8vo, cloth, 10s. 6d. net.

[Second Impression.

"The tales are far more thrilling than the most sensational of novels."—Westminster Gazette.

STORY OF THE NATIONS.

MEDIÆVAL INDIA UNDER MOHAMMEDAN RULE. (A.D. 712-1764.)

By STANLEY LANE-POOLE.

With 56 illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth, 5s.

A PHILOSOPHER IN PORTUGAL.

By EUGENE E. STREET.

Crown 8vo, buckram, 5s. net.

This book is a record of observations on the country and customs, and on men and manners, made during a somewhat prolonged visit to Portugal.

THE INTERNATIONAL QUARTERLY.

No. 3. APRIL-JUNE. Price 5s. net.

Contains articles by EDMUND GOSSE, T. W. RHYS DAVIDS, BRANDER MATTHEWS, J. W. JENKS, H. W. MASSINGHAM, &c.

* * Mr. FISHER UNWIN'S Spring Announcement List, containing particulars of several important new Historical Works, Biographies, Travel, Fiction, &c., is now ready and can be had free on application.

T. FISHER UNWIN,
Paternoster Square, E.C.

FROM Mr. MELROSE'S LIST.

At 2s. 6d. Net.

By CUTHBERT LENNOX.

THIRD EDITION.

JAMES CHALMERS OF NEW GUINEA. Missionary, Pioneer, and Martyr. By CUTHBERT LENNOX, Author of "Henry Drummond." Large Crown 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. net. Two Maps and Eight Illustrations, including a Fine Portrait.

At 2s. 6d. Net.

FOURTH (ENLARGED) EDITION.

HENRY DRUMMOND, A Biographical Sketch (with Bibliography). By CUTHBERT LENNOX. With Photographs and a special Wash Drawing by SCOTT BANKIN. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards. Price 2s. 6d. net.

At 2s. 6d.

"BOOKS FOR THE 'HEART' SERIES.

Edited by ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A. Foolscape 8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 2s. 6d. NEW VOLUMES.

THE DIARY AND JOURNAL OF DAVID BRainerd. With an Introduction by the EDITOR. Two Volumes, 5s.

At 3s. 6d. Net.

By DR. R. A. TORREY.

FOURTH EDITION.

HOW TO PROMOTE AND CONDUCT A SUCCESSFUL REVIVAL. By R. A. TORREY, D.D. Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, gilt top, price 3s. 6d. net.

The Christian says:—"A book which many workers may find of service. . . . Mr. Torrey aims to direct us in these activities, and we trust his very practical papers will find many sympathetic readers."

By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A.

NEW WORK.

By the Author of "THE CROWN OF SOLENOE."

At 6s.

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A. Large Imp. 16mo, cloth boards.

THIRD EDITION.

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE:

The Incarnation of God in Mankind.

By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A. 224 pages.

Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d. net.

The Examiner says:—"Fresh and wonderfully convincing. . . . The subject is a fascinating one, and is treated here by one who has bestowed much thought upon it."

At 3s. 6d.

By Dr. J. R. MILLER.

SECOND EDITION.

SHINING AND SERVING:

Six Addresses on the Christian Life.

By J. R. MILLER, D.D. White fancy back, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

The King's Own Library, 3s. 6d.

NEW VOLUME.

TORN FROM ITS FOUNDATIONS.

From Brazilian Forests to Inquisition Cells.

By DAVID KER, Author of "Cossack and Czar." Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

The Bookman says:—"Another established favourite. Mr. David Ker has used his own experience of wild lands to first-rate effect in 'Torn from its Foundations,' a thrilling story of Brazil."

At 5s.

By Rev. ALEX. SMELLIE, M.A.

SECOND EDITION.

IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.

Brief Daily Meditations for a Year. By ALEX. SMELLIE, M.A. Imp. cloth boards, gilt edges.

The Expository Times says:—"All is original and all of choicest quality. . . . The thought is never abstruse, but in touch with the simple realities of our spiritual life; yet it is always fresh. . . . We have not had a book of daily meditations so near to what it ought to be as this is, though many have tried to furnish one."

At 5s.

THE MAKING OF THE EMPIRE:

The Story of our Colonies. By ARTHUR

TEMPLE, Author of "Our Living Generals," &c.

With New Portraits and Illustrations. Fifth Edition, re-written, extended, and brought up to June, 1902. Cloth boards, 6s.

16, PILGRIM STREET, E.C.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

JAMES BRYCE'S NEW BOOK.

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY BIOGRAPHY.

By JAMES BRYCE.

Author of "The Holy Roman Empire," "The American Commonwealth," &c. 8vo, 10s. net.

Morning Post.—"Variety, impartiality, and just admiration strike us as being the salient characteristics of this series of twenty biographical studies. . . . Mr. Bryce writes of all with an absence of prejudice, whether favourable or unfavourable to their reputations, which lends a special value to his book."

1903 ISSUE NOW READY.

THE STATESMAN'S YEAR BOOK.

Statistical and Historical Annual of the States of the World, for the Year 1903. Edited by J. SCOTT KELTIE, LL.D. With Maps. Crown 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF BROOKE FOSS WESTCOTT, D.D., D.C.L.,

sometime Bishop of Durham. By his Son, ARTHUR WESTCOTT. With Photogravure Portraits and Illustrations. In 2 vols., extra crown 8vo, 17s. net.

MACMILLAN'S ILLUSTRATED POCKET CLASSICS.

NEW VOLUME.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; or in leather limp, 3s. net.

CASTLE RACKRENT AND THE ABSENTEE.

By MARIA EDGEWORTH. With Introduction by ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE and Illustrations by CHRIS HAMMOND. [Ready on Tuesday.

POPULAR UNIFORM EDITION OF

THOMAS HARDY'S WORKS.

With a Map of Wessex in each. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each. LATEST ADDITIONS.

DESPERATE REMEDIES. [Ready on Tuesday
A LAODICEAN.

May Numbers Ready on Tuesday.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

CONTENTS FOR MAY:—

JOHN MAXWELL'S MARRIAGE. By STEPHEN

GWYN. Chapters IX.—XII.

THE YOUTH OF FEAR. By W. H. Chesson.

THE FOUNDATIONS OF OUR FIGHTING POWER.

By Lieut.-Colonel F. N. Maude.

SEVILLE CATHEDRAL. By Havelock Ellis.

THE LITTLE SISTER OF THE POOR. By Miss

Edith Sellers.

RALPH WALDO EMERSON.

SWITZERLAND OF THE WAYSIDE. By H. C.

Macdonald.

BLACKBIRDS AT LANCING. By Joseph Truman.

THE PLEASURES OF THE TABLE.

TWO PEOPLES AND A PROPHECY. By G. D.

Hazzled.ne.

A WHITE STRANGER. By Mrs. Chan-Toon.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

ILLUSTRATED.

Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The MAY Number contains:—

WITH THE SULTAN OF MOROCCO. (An Artist's Reminiscences.) By Arthur Schneider. With

Introduction by Talcott Williams. Pictures by the Author.

MODERN MUSICAL CELEBRITIES. II. ADELINA

ATTI. By Hermann Klein. Pictures from photographs, and a Daguerreotype.

THE FOOL IN THE DESERT. By Mrs. Everett

Cotes.

THE YELLOW VAN. VII. By Richard Whiteing.

And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

* * Also Ready Vol. LXV. Nov. to April. Price 10s. 6d.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The MAY Number contains:—

THE ARTIST, THE SPARROW, AND THE BOY.

Story. By John Y. Coryell.

"REMOSE." Story. By Alice Gertrude Field.

NATURE AND SCIENCE FOR YOUNG FOLKS.

And numerous other Stories for the Young.

* * Also Ready Volume XXX. Part 1. Nov. to April.

Price 8s. 6d.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1616. Established 1869. London: 25 April 1903. Price Threepence.
[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK	403
REVIEWS.
The Plays of Leo Tolstoy	407
A Popular History of the Free Churches	408
On "The Polar Star" in the Arctic Sea	409
Mr. Munchausen	410
J. O. Jones	410
Official Report of the Nature-study Exhibition and Conferences	410
The Diary of a Turk	411
Ancient Athens	412
SHORT NOTICES :
Verses Occasionally Humorous—The Tramp's Handbook—A Philosopher in Portugal	412
FICTION :
The Gap in the Garden—Cornelius—An April Princess—The Eternal Woman	413
Notes on the Week's Novels	414

ARTICLES.
SAVED FROM OBLIVION	415
The Wisdom of the Ages	416
Indiscretions	417
Impressions—XXIX. Faith	417
DRAMA :
Miss Terry's Experiment. E. K. Chambers	418
ART :
"For Their Own Pleasure." C. L. H.	419
SCIENCE :
Crickets. C. W. Saleeby	420
CORRESPONDENCE :
Shakespeare Bacon, and Dr. Murray	421
Parry v. Moring and Another	422
"The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman"	423
A Correction	423
WEEKLY COMPETITION :
Description of an Incident which occurred during the Easter Holidays	423

The Literary Week.

MR. BRYCE has been the most widely reviewed author of the week. Every daily paper has discussed his "Studies in Biography" at such a length that the industrious reader could almost pass an examination in the volume. A book of the week, valuable in its particular way, but not one that will be extensively reviewed, is Mr. Bendall's "Catalogue of the Sanskrit Manuscripts" in the British Museum. The novels have been few but interesting. They include volumes by Mr. Conrad, Mr. Quiller-Couch, and Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne. Mr. George Moore's "Untilled Field" will be issued on Monday. Among other publications of the week we note the following:—

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY BIOGRAPHY. By James Bryce.

The studies are twenty in number, and include such names as those of Beaconsfield, Arthur Penrhyn Stanley, W. E. Gladstone, Charles Stuart Parnell, Anthony Trollope, and John Richard Green. In his preface Mr. Bryce says: "These Studies are . . . not to be regarded as biographies, even in miniature. My aim has rather been to analyse the character and powers of each of the persons described, and, as far as possible, to carry the impression which each made in the daily converse of life. All of them, except Lord Beaconsfield, were personally, and most of them intimately, known to me."

STUDIES IN THEOLOGY. By T. Estlin Carpenter and P. H. Wicksteed.

A volume containing thirteen essays, seven being written by Mr. Carpenter and six by Mr. Wicksteed. All have appeared before, either as separate publications or in periodicals or collections. The opening study is by Mr. Wicksteed on "The Religion of Time and the Religion of Eternity." Some of the other titles read: "The Place of Immortality in Religious Belief," "The Liberal Faith," "The Place of Jesus in History," "Religion and Society." The last named concludes thus: "But above all and in all they will keep alive in their own hearts, and strive to wake in the hearts of others, that living love of nature, of man, and of God, which if a man have not, it is in vain for him to gain the whole world."

THE EDINBURGH WAVERLEY.

With the four volumes just issued, containing "Count Robert of Paris" and "Castle Dangerous," and the tenth volume of Lockhart's "Life of Scott," this beautiful edition reaches completion. The publication has extended over two years. The plates form a valuable collection of Scott portraits, and many authentic portraits of Scott's relatives, friends, and contemporaries are also included. The "Edinburgh Waverley" is a worthy example of modern publishing; page, paper, and type are alike excellent, and the binding appropriately simple. The novels and the life together make a total of fifty-eight volumes.

EDWARD FITZGERALD wrote to F. Tennyson in 1850, "I have begun to nibble at Spanish," and three years later his renderings of "Six Dramas of Calderon" were published. These renderings have just been re-issued in the "King's Classics" series. Whatever FitzGerald touched took colour from his own personality; he never pretended to be an exact translator, he always strove to get at the spirit of his author. He was, in a sense, a "nibbler" all his life, but he was a divine nibbler. People have often conjectured what he might have done if he had overcome his natural propensity to passive contemplation. Such conjecture, however, is useless. He was primarily an intense and original appreciator, and on the lines of appreciation he achieved greatness. When the Calderon translations were published the reviewers, as Mr. Aldis Wright said, "did not take the trouble to understand him." The "Leader" was unfavourable, and the "Athenæum" had "a more determined spit" at him. FitzGerald wrote to Crabbe: "I told you how likely this was to be the case: and so am not surprised. . . . I believe those who read the book, without troubling themselves whether it is a free translation, like it. . . ." Criticism to-day is all on FitzGerald's side. He has come fully into his own. No great reputation was ever founded on so small an amount of almost perfect work.

In the May number of the "Pall Mall Magazine," Mr. Henley has an article, apropos of Prof. Raleigh's study, on "The Secret of Wordsworth." We do not find Mr. Henley in this instance particularly illuminating or reasonably critical. Such a general statement as this may be allowed to pass: "the world at large, 'tis safe to say, is still scarce conscious of his fateful and enormous presence, and after all these years has but begun to concern itself blindly and fumblingly with his true meaning, his secret, what he said to himself in the privacy of his soul, but was not poet enough to express in the authentic terms of poetry, excepting now and then and here and there." The statement, we repeat, may be allowed to pass, though it returns to that old matter of "true meaning" and "secret" which really does not come in at all. There is no mystery about Wordsworth's meaning, and his "secret" is open to any reader who does not insist upon searching for the non-existent. Therefore when Mr. Henley goes on to say that "none has explained him" we simply reply that it is no one's business to undertake the unnecessary. Comment we have had in plenty on every phase of Wordsworth's life and work, and much of it has been valuable comment, but of explanation, save for the very young, none was required. For "four-fifths of his time," Mr. Henley says, Wordsworth was "but a piddling poetaster." Mr. Henley's exuberance of phrase will out at all cost, even though justification lags far behind. Wordsworth at his worst, and his worst was bad enough, was never a "piddling poetaster." Later Mr. Henley writes:—

... in Wordsworth's handling of metre there is nearly always, as it seems to me, a touch of the pedant, or—still better!—of the bumpkin, the yokel, the lout. In "The Prelude" he uses what words he wills; but the effect of his use of them is essentially formal, uninspiring, dull. And when he leaves the heroic iambic, and essays to scour the plain in lighter rhythms, he affects me nineteen times in twenty with a sense of hobnails and grey worsted stockings.

There are certainly many passages in "The Prelude" which are neither formal, uninspiring, nor dull.

MR. RICHARD HENRY STODDARD has recently given to the Authors' Club of New York part of his library and collection of manuscripts. The manuscripts include many autograph letters of Scott, Dickens, Thackeray, Wordsworth, and Hawthorne, and the books some fine early editions, particularly of seventeenth century writers. On the top margin of the title page of a copy of Aleman's "Life of Guzman d'Alfarache," 1634, is the inscription, "John Keats, from his friend J (ames) R. (ice), 20 April, 1818." On two of the pages are notes in Keats's hand, and a pencilled caricature. Such a gift as this of Mr. Stoddard's is far rarer than it should be. Much valuable material of all kinds is scattered by executors: the right thing is to fix the destination of cherished books and papers before the owner is called away. This Mr. Stoddard has generously and wisely done.

In her introduction to "Poems by John Keats" in the "Red Letter Library" Mrs. Meynell says:—

"Simple and sensuous"—part of a famous phrase—are words that describe the secondary poetry of Keats, and the ideal that it suggests—a good custom corrupted—suited his worst mood only too well. The senses of Keats were not vigorous, but they were exceedingly luxurious and sensitive. . . . At his best he has the true passion of thought. The "Ode to a Nightingale" has simple thought, but true thought, living grief, and an immediate contemplation of the living world.

Mrs. Meynell says later: "His taste went wrong, apparently, under the influence of such 'poetry' as that of Leigh Hunt's 'Rimini,' and he improved much upon all the characteristics of this wretched model." As a model, no doubt, "Rimini" is bad enough, yet it has alert and gracefully gliding passages. And in thinking of Leigh Hunt we can never forget what Keats and Shelley, as well as others, owed to his constant sympathy and appreciation.

THURSDAY was the anniversary of Shakespeare's birth and death day, and the occasion has naturally produced the usual crop of comment and verse. From Canon Rawnsley, who never neglects such opportunities, we have received the following sonnet:—

ST. GEORGE'S DAY.

Stratford-on-Avon, 23rd April.

This is the day the burgher-bailiff's son
Saw light by gleaming Avon—this the day
He found a fuller light, exchanged the bay
For Amaranth, heard the angels shout "well done,"
And, welcome, joined the high communion
Of those whose song unstopped dull ears of clay,
Who brought earth echoes of the heavenly lay,
And back to truth the soul of Nature won.
And shall we not on such a morning cry
"St. George for Merrie England," seeing he ran
Full tilt at lust of fame and lust of pelf,
And having mirrored England to herself
Came home to Stratford's fields, to live and die,
True mirror of an English gentleman.

NEXT Sunday and Monday the Stage Society is to produce at the Imperial Theatre Mr. Christopher St. John's translation of H. Heijerman's "Good Hope." The cast includes Miss Rosina Filippi, Miss Lilian Braithwaite, Miss Edith Craig, Mr. Lyall Swete, Mr. Granville Barker and Mr. C. B. Clarence.

THE "Pilot" prints an article "In Defence of the Soliloquy." The writer defends the soliloquy against its modern critics, and asserts that it is both artistic and necessary. If it be beautiful or dramatic in itself no one would be likely to object, but when it is employed, as it constantly is, for conveying explanations which might very well have been given in dialogue, the objection is a perfectly legitimate one. The writer says:—

Imagine Hernani without the great twofold soliloquy before the tomb of Charlemagne, imagine Le Roi s'amuse without the awful pæan of Triboulet! (It may be that this last travels in conception beyond the just limits of the horrible in tragedy, but the execution atones.) Such soliloquies would, of course, be impossible in a country where people attend the theatre only to be entertained, and where a historical disquisition, although entirely in keeping with the character and germane to the situation, would be incomprehensible, but still even in reading the pleasure is immense. Such soliloquies are not to be given up in any circumstances.

No one suggests, we imagine, that such soliloquies should be given up; the objection is to the inartistic and slovenly patches which disfigure so many plays in order to save dramatists the trouble of careful construction.

THE compilers of indexes are, as we all know, easily led astray. A correspondent of the "Daily Chronicle" points out a curious error in the index to the "Encyclopædia Britannica," in which the name of J. Taylor Brown, who was a contributor to the "Encyclopædia," appears as the author of "Horæ Subsecivæ" and "Rab and His Friends." The "Chronicle's" correspondent points out, however, that the Dr. John Taylor Brown, whose library was recently sold in Edinburgh, had no connection with the Dr. John Brown who wrote "Horæ Subsecivæ," a work of which "Rab and His Friends" formed a part. He adds: "Both had the inexplicable misfortune to live in windy Edinburgh, but, so far at least as the confusing relationships of the posterity of Dr. John Brown, of Haddington, from whom the author of 'Horæ Subsecivæ' was descended, is known to me, no connection existed between them, though I admit that for several generations Dr. John Brown's family have possessed a sad habit of confusing all genealogists by running rashly into second marriages."

A CORRESPONDENT writes: "In a little pamphlet that Emile Faguet, of the Académie Française, has just published on Zola, he raises a very interesting literary question. He says: 'Zola écrivit trop tôt. Tout homme qui écrit avant trente ans et qui ne consacre pas l'âge d'or de la vie, de la vingtième année à la trentième, à lire, à observer et à réfléchir, sans écrire une ligne, risque de n'avoir pas de cerveau et de n'être qu'un ouvrier littéraire. Il y a des exceptions: mais elles sont rares.' Is Faguet right, or those who contend that perfect writing comes from practice: fit fabricando faber? I do not think the exceptions are as rare as M. Faguet seems to think."

THE Anglian Cross which is to be set up as a memorial to Bede on Roker Point has been designed by Mr. Charles Hodges. The shaft of the Cross on the west side will be ornamented with scroll patterns from the Lindisfarne Gospel and from the stones at Jarrow, and will contain, within a twisted loop of the duck-billed serpent seen on the Monkwearmouth door-way, pictorial subjects from the life of Bede. On the east side will be Roman lettering giving two extracts from Bede's works—one from the Ecclesiastical History, one from his life of St. Cuthbert—both extracts speaking of the accuracy and care with which he worked. On the south side, within a vine scroll, will be carved in alto and bas relief the heads and busts of the friends and associates of Bede. On the north side, a scroll introducing bird and animals, springing from a harp emblematic of his poetic gifts, will show Bede's love of Nature. Beneath these four sculptured sides will run in a band the little verse written by Bede on his death-bed, beginning, 'Fore there nedfaræ,' in Latin, in Rune, in Minuscule and in English.

AN admirable article on the work and character of the late Lord Acton is printed in the current "Edinburgh Review." The paper closes with these eloquent and balanced words:—

... he was truly an artist: his work of art was his life. Within the bounds of human frailty he preserved it free from any taint of meanness, of selfishness, of wrong, and of sin. In the light of this moral fulfilment he practised his religion. Centuries of errors, heavily burdened with the work of man, did not shake his faith in the promises which have attended the advent of Christianity. He wooed religion with the unflinching sincerity of love, grateful for the graces which, from the cradle to the grave, had been the blessing of his life. He committed the future of Catholic Christendom, and with it of mankind itself, to the paternal love and care of One who is patient because He is Eternal, of One to whom a thousand years are as a day.

THIS week the first of the series of Westminster Lectures was delivered by Mr. H. Belloc in the old Westminster Town Hall. Mr. Belloc dealt with the example of modern Paris in so far as it could be applied to the problems which confront London to-day. The object of this series of lectures is to present as vividly and concisely as possible expert explanation and comment upon current changes in literary and historical opinion, and also in the development of applied science. In the second lecture Mr. G. K. Chesterton is to discuss the effect of modern political developments upon contemporary literature. Amongst other lecturers we notice the names of Mr. W. B. Yeats and Mr. Bernard Shaw.

THE will of the late Mr. Augustus Hare has been proved at £22,157. There are no fewer than eighty-four legatees named in the document. A portrait of himself is bequeathed, if acceptable, to the library of Harrow School, and his "little dog Nero" is confided to his housekeeper.

Two volumes full of interesting material have reached us in "An Anecdotal History of Old Times in Singapore," by Mr. Charles Burton Buckley. The period covered is from the foundation of the Settlement under the Honourable the East India Company in 1819 to the transfer to the Colonial Office in 1869. Much of the book appeared in the form of articles in the "Singapore Free Press," which articles have now been revised and added to. The work is confessedly only a compilation, but it is packed with valuable and suggestive matter for the observant eye.

IN "The Avon Star," which is edited by Miss Marie Corelli, and described as a "Literary Manual," we find twenty-seven pages devoted to the "Spoliation of Henley Street" and the "Carnegie Free Library." In a letter to "The Times" the Secretary of the London Shakespeare League asks for time in which to get signatures to a popular appeal against the proposed demolition. Such a request can hardly, we should suppose, be refused.

THE choice of a successor to the late Colonel Henderson as official historian of the Boer War has fallen upon Major-General Sir John F. Maurice. Major-General Maurice won the Wellington Prize Essay Competition in 1872 against Lord Wolseley, who shortly afterwards made his victor his private secretary. Major-General Maurice has written largely on the art of war, and contributed to Messrs. Macmillan's "English Citizen" series a monograph on "National Defences."

THE "New York American" has discovered that Mr. Joseph Conrad is the "New Great Figure in Literature." We read:—

In the early criticisms of his work Conrad was compared to Kipling and to Bret Harte. He is a greater than either. He equals their intimacy with their scenes and characters and presents them as vividly, but with this skill he combines a largeness of literary purpose and a universality beyond them.

Unlike Kipling, the mechanism of his composition is noiseless and all hidden. He leads you into brilliant passages and you are only dazzled, when you turn back the pages to re-read the lines that have moved you so deeply.

As for the people of his books, they are the actual beings of the life he describes. The second mate of a trading ship is a good enough hero for him. He can make a fascinating chapter of a ship sailing without incident over a glassy sea, and a whole book of a single storm—and make you regret there is not more of it.

When a man writes like this it does not matter what he writes about or whether he lays his scene in the Eastern seas or on Broadway. He chooses the background for his drama instead of fabricating a story to fit a background.

Every book he has written bears the unmistakable mark of genius. The stories he tells brim with life and strength and interest; the manner of their telling is as good as the matter.

There is a buoyant certainty about all this, but it is not criticism.

THE current issue of the "Studio" is the tenth anniversary number. The "Studio" was the pioneer of the new development in art magazines, and it remains the best of them. This number contains two valuable articles—one by Mr. Wynford Dewhurst on "Impressionist Painting," the other on "The Art of Painted Enamels," by Mr. Alexander Fisher.

THE correspondence in the "Parry v. Moring and Another" case seems interminable. The plaintiff's solicitors have now entered the field with a letter to "The Times" of three-quarters of a column. Those who desire to study the case so far as it has gone in all its bearings, will find the matter set forth in a pamphlet which has just been issued. This contains a report of the Chancery action, and the correspondence between the plaintiff and Dr. Furnivall. The publishers are Messrs. Sherratt and Hughes.

Bibliographical.

"A GOOD biography of Poe is still to be desired," says "C. K. S." in "The Sphere." Let us look for a moment at what we already have. Omitting all anonymous prefaces or introductions, we find that the following memoirs of Poe have been issued in England of late years: "Life, Letters, and Opinions of Edgar Allen Poe," by Mr. J. H. Ingram (1880, 1886, 1891); sketch by R. H. Stoddard as preface to the Works (1884); another by N. H. Dole, as preface to the Poems (1897); and another by George Woodberry in an edition of the Works (1895-6). "C. K. S." refers only to the memoirs by Stoddard and Woodberry; why ignore Mr. Ingram, who has done more than any Englishman or American to bring out the truth concerning Poe? That good work was begun in 1857 by Mr. W. Moy Thomas, but was not taken up seriously until 1874, when Mr. Ingram started a series of articles which led up to his biographical preface to the edition of the Works brought out in that year. He wrote a special account of Poe for an edition of the Poems and Essays in 1884. His full biography of 1880 was reproduced in 1891 as a unit of the Minerva Library, and probably is still procurable in that form. It has the great merit of being transparently honest and disinterested, and has not yet been superseded. Meanwhile, the memoirs by Stoddard and Woodberry are practically out of the reach of the average English buyer. The handiest edition of Poe is still that prefaced by Baudelaire and issued by Messrs. Chatto, though, in all but its criticism, Baudelaire's essay is much behind the times.

"C. K. S." remarks further upon the absence from the "English Men of Letters" series of biographies of Leigh Hunt and Thomas Moore. The omissions are inexcusable; but in the case of Hunt the "amende" was very successfully made by the late Mr. Cosmo Monkhouse in the "Great Writers" series. Great writer Hunt was not, but a very agreeable one, surely? And he did much, certainly, to popularize what is best in English literature? Of Moore I know no separate, handy memoir save that which Mr. A. J. Symington wrote for a short series called "Men of Light and Leading" (Blackie & Son, 1880). This is inadequate, of course, but better than nothing, and rendered especially acceptable by the liberal quotations from Moore's "Diary." By the way, a little book of selections from that "Diary" appeared about four years ago; and one wondered that the thing had not been done before.

We are promised a new Life of Columbus which, I gather, is to put all its predecessors in the shade and render any successor unnecessary. This is rather good news, for of biographies of Christopher there are many, and one would be glad to see the procession brought to a full-stop. One remembers, in particular, the flood of memoirs of Columbus which fell upon us in 1891-3. In the first-named year came Justin Winson's work; in 1892, "Lives," large or small, by C. R. Markham, E. E. Seelye, C. K. Adams, F. Saunders, and C. I. Ellon; in 1893, ditto ditto by H. B. Adams and H. Wood, Margaret Dixon, A. Innes, Mariana Monteiro, and E. S. Brooks. The year 1892 also brought with it a new edition of the "Life" by Washington Irving, and an edition of the writings of Columbus edited by Paul Leicester Ford. Since then (in 1896) we have had a new edition of Sir Arthur Helps's volume.

In "The Canterbury Pilgrims," written by Mr. Percy Mackaye, and published by Messrs. Macmillan, we are to have, I note, "a comedy or comic masque based on Chaucer," in which the poet is himself to play the "central" part. The treatment, says my authority, is "boldly American and colloquial," the author being "more concerned to write vigorous farce, intermixed with spirited poetry, than to be mediæval in form." Meanwhile, one is left in doubt as to whether this is to be a work of narrative fiction or a dramatic composition. If the latter, Mr. Mackaye may be reminded of the opera called "The Canterbury Pilgrims," written by Gilbert & Beckett, composed by Villiers Stanford, and produced at Drury Lane in the early eighties. In this case, fortunately, the treatment was not "boldly American."

Among forthcoming reprints, it seems, we are to have, from Messrs. Newnes, a new edition of Charles Whitehead's "Richard Savage." This, no doubt, will be welcome as coming (I presume), in regard to price, between the seven shillings and sixpence which Mr. Bentley asked for his edition of 1896, and the simple sixpence which Messrs. Dicks asked for theirs in 1891.

"G. A. B." asks me to tell him of a moderately-priced edition of Richard Jefferies' "Story of My Heart." Messrs. Longman published that book in 1891 at three-and-six, and no doubt copies of that edition are procurable.

I proceed, as requested, with my list of the books published by Mr. Henry James in this country. I have given the miscellaneous works. Now come the novels: "The American" (1877), "The Europeans" (1878), "Roderick Hudson" (Macmillan, 1879), "The Reverberator" (Macmillan, 1880), "Confidence" (Chatto, 1880), "The Portrait of a Lady" (Macmillan, 1881), "The Bostonians" (Macmillan, 1886), "The Princess Casamassima" (Macmillan, 1886), "The Tragic Muse" (Macmillan, 1890), "The Other House" (Heinemann, 1896), "The Spoils of Poynton" (Heinemann, 1897), "In the Cage" (Duckworth, 1898), "What Maisie Knew" (Heinemann, 1898), "The Awkward Age" (Heinemann, 1899), "The Sacred Fount" (Methuen, 1901), "The Wings of the Dove" (Constable, 1902).

Now for Mr. James's volumes consisting of two or more short stories, and named (in most cases) after the first story in each: "Daisy Miller" (Macmillan, 1879), "The Madonna of the Future" (Macmillan, 1879), "Washington Square" (Macmillan, 1881), "The Siege of London" (Macmillan, 1883), "Tales of Three Cities" (Macmillan, 1884), "Stories Revived" (Macmillan, 1885), "The Aspern Papers" (Macmillan, 1888), "A London Life" (Macmillan, 1889), "The Lesson of the Master" (Macmillan, 1892), "The Private Life" (Osgood, 1893), "The Real Thing" (Macmillan, 1893), "Terminations" (Heinemann, 1895), "Embarrassments" (Heinemann, 1896), "The Two Magics" (Heinemann, 1898), "The Soft Side" (Methuen, 1900), "The Better Sort" (1903). If I have omitted anything, perhaps someone will let me know.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Tolstoy as a Dramatist.

THE PLAYS OF LEO TOLSTOY. Translated by Louise and Aylmer Maude. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

It was an excellent idea of Mr. and Mrs. Maude's to couple together "The Power of Darkness" and "The Fruits of Culture," and so make a volume of "Plays" in the "Revised Edition" of Tolstoy's Works, which edition Mr. Maude modestly announces in his Preface "should consist" of twenty-nine volumes! The more good translations of Tolstoy offered to the English public the better. The translation of both the plays in question is capitally done, being racy and idiomatic. Certainly the present version of "The Fruits of Culture" is far superior to that made by Dr. Dillon in 1891, which some of our readers may remember was "introduced" to the English reading public with a rather superior "Note" by Mr. Pinero. The English dramatist found nothing to say in praise of Tolstoy's drama, though he suggested indeed that its adaptability to stage representation might not be very patent to English readers. Of course Tolstoy is not a "dramatist" in the modern narrow sense—i.e., a writer who depends chiefly upon his knowledge of effective stage technique to make his manœuvred creations sufficiently plausible to his audience. Tolstoy's dramas are more like Molière's, i.e., naturalistic scenes from daily life, dramas which depend for their artistic illusion more on their minute portrayal of human nature and their satiric picture of human society than on the effective interaction of stage types in producing dramatic situations. It may be remarked here that all the great dramatists create such strongly and richly defined human types, however highly idealised they may be, that the actors have only to produce a natural rendering (and the more subtle the dramatist's poetic conceptions the more difficult, of course, are the actors' tasks) to be a success; whereas with the ephemeral third-rate dramatists the human types they create are so thinly and vaguely drawn, so weak and ill-determined is their truth to human nature, that the actors themselves have to put most of "the character" into the part—as in Sardou's dramas—or make the play rest on the basis of a stirring, farcical, or a sensational parody of life.

"The Power of Darkness," written for the Russian People's Theatre, has no great human figures in it, figures to appeal to the imagination universally in all countries or ages: on the contrary, it is so absolutely a product of Russian earth, that the European spectator must view it with a mind purged of the prepossessions of his own time and culture. That is to say, the tragedy, as it appeals only to two audiences, the audience of Russians and an audience of artists, is never likely to be properly interpreted on the French, German, or English stage. But although the audience will be wanting, a great national drama, this cruel and sombre study of peasant life, will remain. The subject of the play is human weakness and human sin. Anisya, the peasant wife, married to the sickly Peter, has a secret intrigue with Nikita, a young labourer in their employ. Nikita's old mother, Matryóna, wishing to see Nikita settled in life, persuades Anisya to poison her husband so that her peasant lover may step into the dead man's shoes. She commits the crime, but Nikita, married to her, secures the money, and hating her crime, seduces Akoulina, her stepdaughter. When Akoulina has a child, the jealous Anisya and the old hag Matryóna, afraid of the scandal, persuade Nikita to kill it, so that Akoulina may be married off to a distant peasant suitor. Nikita being a weak man, consents, but stricken by remorse confesses, and lays open the whole web of sin, on the eve of Akoulina's wedding. Now this black study of human greed and human sin, abounding in terrible scenes (and the scene of the child murder is perhaps the most terrible ever put on the modern stage) has the moral force and poetic dignity of an ancient Greek tragedy. "The Power of Darkness," this drama of coarse, squalid peasant life, with seduction, murder, and infanticide treated with a horrible realism, nevertheless "purges the soul by pity and terror" no less than does "King Lear" or "Othello." If we are to believe a certain school of critics, this prerogative of "purging the soul" belongs only to "noble" drama in which "elevated subjects" are treated in a noble, poetic style. But "The Power of Darkness," filled with peasant slang and repulsive and sordid details, proves again that in great literature the stuff of life or subject-matter may be anything, and that it is not the technical treatment, classic, romantic, or realistic, that determines its rank, but the artist's own attitude to life, his own spirit. And Tolstoy's attitude being that of a great artist-moralist, who knows human nature in all its variants, and analyses unerringly human motives and passions, this terribly realistic picture of depraved life is truly as "noble" in itself and carries with it as strong a breath of the littleness of human life and the force of destiny as any great drama of the heroic school.

Of course each school of drama has its special beauties, its particular excellences. But modern society does not love great drama of any kind. Why are the great Greek dramas never staged to-day? Why is Molière never interpreted on the English stage by English actors? Why is Calderon an unknown name to a European audience? Why is Shakespeare represented by perhaps three or four plays at irregular intervals annually in London? Why are the other Elizabethan dramatists a dead letter to actors? Simply for the same reason that Tolstoy's "The Power of Darkness" will not be acted in our day, in England, or if acted, will be burlesqued. And that reason is not that Sophocles, Euripides, Molière, Calderon, Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Ibsen, Ostravsky, or Tolstoy are not worthy of our modern audiences, but that a modern audience is not cultured enough, is too fettered and local in its æsthetic sympathies, to appreciate great drama. The truth is no doubt disconcerting, but why plaster it up with fallacious excuses? Great drama presupposes in the spirit of its audience something that has a certain fineness or loftiness to which it can appeal. And so our mixed audiences of to-day get the drama they deserve.

But is Tolstoy a great dramatist? the reader may enquire, and the critic must reply—no, not great as a dramatist, but his technical powers are strong enough to make "The Power of Darkness" absolutely convincing on the stage. The play has a succession of enthralling dramatic situations. The characters of Anisya the tempted wife, Nikita, the weak man, being led step by step to his destruction, of Matryóna, the wily, insinuating, wicked old woman, a character who knows no fear and no remorse—all these are such psychological masterpieces that the intercourse of the wife, mother, and son bound together by their crime abounds in drama at every turn. A very remarkable feature of "The Power of Darkness" is the same feature that strikes us in the story "Ivan Il'yitch" (both written in 1886), viz., that in each case the reader feels that the author is bending his course towards a predestined moral conclusion, and yet the artistic value of the whole is scarcely injured, if injured at all, by this moral predetermination. The fact is, Tolstoy's genius is the most extraordinary fusion of great moralist with great artist that has ever been seen in literature. Occasionally the moralist drags the artist over the line, as in the end of "Anna Karenina," and of "Resurrection"—but more often the artist's faculties keep the suspicious moralist from wrecking the æsthetic value of each production. And yet the force of "The Power of Darkness" is the force of the moralist who is making the artist obey his behests up to the line of æsthetic danger! In "The Fruits of Culture" (1889) we have an engaging satire on Spiritualism, and here the moralist in Tolstoy is in a lighter mood, and works maliciously and gaily with the artist in playfully transfixing educated "gentlefolk" much as a naturalist transfixes his specimens with pins. The comedy is too Russian in tone and colour to be acted successfully on an English stage, and some of its scenes are too lengthy to be effective drama, but it is a delightful play for reading in the closet. Tolstoy's amazing eye for character could scarcely be better evidenced than in the funny séance scene in Act III., where, moreover, the scientists of hypnotism get a handling that recalls some of the best attacks in Molière on the medical charlatans of his day. Nobody in short who cares for real drama can afford to let this volume of Tolstoy's plays go unread.

The Free Churches.

A POPULAR HISTORY OF THE FREE CHURCHES. By C. Silvester Horne. With 38 full-page Illustrations. (Clarke. 6s.)

A CLOSE and meditative study of Mr. Horne's history, which begins with the reforming activities of John Wyclif and leaves off at those of Mr. Perks, raises a problem that constantly lurks unnoticed at the heart of intellectual life. Why do we reason and dispute? Why, for example, were all the notable men whose actions are set forth in Mr. Horne's chronicles so anxious that other men should share their opinions about religion? To give a true and complete answer is not so easy as one may at first suppose. The motives of a man in controversial mood have a complexity which he himself does not suspect. It is natural to take it for granted that when the subject of controversy is religion a man is moved by consideration for the welfare of those whom he is addressing. Convinced that the truth is in him, and that the truth is of extreme importance, he is vicariously anxious to impart it to his fellows. The assumption is reasonable to a certain extent; but there are alarming abatements. In days not long gone by. Anglican Churchmen cut the ears and slit the noses of fellow-subjects whom they could not by reasoning persuade into Conformity, and Dissenters, in similar predicament, resorted to measures no less atrocious. It is obvious, therefore, that concern for the welfare of our fellows is not the main or the only motive of proselytism. If we were really anxious about other people's souls we should not be so brutal towards their bodies as we habitually tend to be when in the mood of Inquisition. We should not hustle to their eternal fate poor creatures living in the unpardonable sin of heresy. That is absolutely certain. What, then, are the other motives from which we reason and dispute? If we are not mistaken they are, first, a desire to strengthen our belief in our own theories through perceiving their acceptance by other people, and, secondly, sheer delight in contention. Sympathy and rivalry, that is to say, are alike essential to the happiness of man. If there dawns upon us what seems to be a saving truth, we are not quite sure about it until we joyfully witness its adoption by other minds: that is the function of sympathy. Similarly, exercise being as necessary to the health of the mind as it is to that of the body, we naturally find pleasure in a scrimmage of intellect just as we do in a scrimmage at football: that is the function of rivalry.

All these three motives of proselytising energy are to be seen at work in Mr. Horne's vigorous book. Wyclif, who "was a Protestant before Protestantism," declared that "there is such a thing as private judgment in matters theological, and that it is open to the Christian thinker and teacher to call in question even the most cherished dogma of the authoritative Church, and make appeal to the simplicity of the teaching of Christ." Enthusiastically in sympathy with this proposition, Mr. Horne traces its progress from the Reformation to the present day. The broad history of that period is too familiar to need recapitulation here. It is sufficient to say that Mr. Horne deals with it faithfully according to his lights. Not being superior to the failings of the partisan, he may be thought by the High Churchman and the Erastian to be not quite fair, while to the Catholic, of course, his proposition and his rhetoric will seem wholly absurd. To be specific, let us say that Mr. Horne attributes all episodes of wrong-doing on the part of the Conformists to innate or engrained wickedness, and all episodes of wrong-doing on the part of the Nonconformists either to well-meaning lack of judgment or to the irresistible constraint of circumstance. Against this, however, it would, perhaps, be unphilosophical to protest. Mr. Horne really believes that Conformity is essentially sinful and Nonconformity essentially righteous, and on a subject such as that of religion it is a man's beliefs that we seek in his writings. On Mr. Horne speeds; on, and on, and on; rejoicing over the collapse of ecclesiastical authority which began in earnest with the downfall of Laud, in the great evangelical revival initiated by Wesley, and in the dramatic triumph over Erastianism which he perceives in the disruption of the Church of Scotland. It is all very stirring, and, saving for a constant sorrow that it is internecine strife about which we read, the admirably written pages give us something of the joy of battle; but every now and then creeps over us a chilling doubt. Let it be granted that we do have a right to private judgment in theology: is this a right the theory of which has ever been ideally accomplished? Clearly it is not. A judgment which is the result of constraint from outside cannot be considered private; yet it is in every case a judgment of that kind in which Mr. Horne exults. Each of the Methodist Connexions is the result of a surrender of the right of man's private judgment in favour of the published judgment of some powerful mind, and every one of the other churches known as free is in exactly the same case. There is not a single communion which is free in the sense that a man's judgment is free in theory. There is not a single church which has abandoned the right to expel for heresy. It is not yet thirty years since Dr. Robertson Smith, an exceedingly accomplished as well as highly spiritual scholar, was driven out of the Free Church in Scotland because he had written in "The Encyclopædia Britannica" what he believed to be the truth about the Scriptures. There are innumerable instances of the exercise of absolute authority over men's conscience by churches considering themselves free; but the instance mentioned will suffice. Mr. Horne's attempt to explain it away, and to leave intact the theory that man's right to private judgment is vindicated in the Free Churches, is astonishingly limp. "It should, in fairness, be remembered," he says, that Dr. Robertson Smith "was a minister under the Confession of Faith," and "it may be urged with some force, therefore, that the Church, by its action, did not exceed its duty." That, while true, is utterly irrelevant. Men who abandon allegiance to the Thirty-nine Articles for a Confession of Faith in some other terms do not thereby become free. They merely exchange one compulsion of their consciences for another.

The truth is that a Church which could give scope to the right of private judgment in religion is inconceivable. This was perceived hundreds of years ago by Robert Browne, who, when the Parliament of England was thinking of disestablishing Episcopacy to make way for Presbytery, shrewdly observed that "then in steede of one Pope we shall have a thousand, and of some lord Bishops in name a thousand Lordlie tyrants in deed which now do disdain the names." It is impossible to harmonise the unquestioned fulfilment of this prediction with Mr. Horne's zealous assumption that what he calls "the romance of the Free Churches" has been the emancipation of man from domination in the matter of religious belief. Those who have shaken off the domination of the old order have put themselves under another. They are free in relation to the Bishops and the Articles; but they are not free in relation to the authorities and the standards of their new Connexions. Thus, calmly considered, "the romance of the Free Churches," so vividly narrated by Mr. Horne, leaves the important question, the fundamental question, unsettled, and even untouched. Whether it is Romanism, or Anglicanism, or Dissent that is right, who can tell? Our privilege of private judgment on that question, or of suspension of judgment, is wholly unaffected by Mr. Horne's industry. That, of course, is as it should be. A thinker who affirms the right of private judgment to be the most valuable of human privileges should rejoice to think that his words have no weight whatever. Theoretically he should rejoice; but really, being human and liable to err, he does not. In the preface, which is in lyric strain and apparently written when the last page was completed, Mr. Horne is frankly political. "In sending this book forth I am glad," he says, "to think that it may be of some service in the great struggles that await Free Churchmen. . . . Men and women of the Free Churches are bracing themselves to renew the fight for unsectarian education and religious equality." Certain men and women, Mr. Horne means, are preparing for a fresh effort to vindicate the claim of minorities, whatever their religion may be, to equal treatment by the State. How are they proposing to proceed? Mr. Perks, with whom Mr. Horne, as we have noted, leaves off, told us in a letter published during the recent political contest in the Chertsey division of Surrey. As Home Rule would probably lead to a university designed to foster the private but general judgment in Ireland that the Catholic version of Christianity is correct, the Nonconformists of England will permanently wreck the Liberal Party, which, after all, does not belong to them exclusively, unless it proclaims definite separation from the Nationalist minority in the United Kingdom. After this, who shall say that Nonconformity does not stand for liberty of private judgment and equality in civil right? We are not arguing in politics: we are merely, as in duty bound, thinking about Mr. Horne's exultant proposition: and the query to which it has led calls us to a halt, dismayed.

Is the North Pole Accessible?

ON "THE POLAR STAR" IN THE ARCTIC SEA. By the Duke of the Abruzzi. With Statements by Commander U. Cagni and Dr. A. Cavalli Molinelli. Translated by William Le Queux. Two vols. (Hutchinson. 42s. net.)

It is now three centuries since the earliest systematic invasion of the North Pole; and the pole is still inviolate. The experiences of the intrepid explorers have been all broadly uniform, and one can in a measure share the not uncommon feeling that accounts of them are tedious. To many of us, however, this is an encyclopædic age, an age in which knowledge of every subject of world-wide interest is eagerly sought; and thus the narrative of the most recent adventure to the extreme, that of Luigi Amedes of Savoy, Duke of the Abruzzi, will probably be justified by being widely circulated and diligently read. On the whole it is a good narrative. As rendered into English it has not much literary grace; but it has abundant scientific exactitude, and so serves its serious purpose well. Whosoever would know about the equipment necessary for a new enterprise towards the Pole, what it would cost, and what are the chances of success on the familiar plan, will be thoroughly informed by the Duke's handsome tomes. At the same time, the enquirer will be disposed to think that the prospects of a voyage on the old plan are not very encouraging. The progress of "The Polar Star," a seasoned craft manned by Norwegians and Italians, was arrested at Teplitz Bay, in 81° 47' N. latitude, where, the crust of ice having made her spring a leak, she had to be abandoned for the winter. Her officers and the crew, together with all the provisions which she carried, were transferred to a large hut built upon the shore from spars, and sails, and tents. Ere long, two fingers of the Duke's right hand were frost-bitten, and bits of them had to be cut off. Hereupon the command of the expedition, which thenceforth was to be by means of sledges, was bestowed upon Captain Cagni. The Duke and a few others staying where they were, the party with the sledges pressed forward. Ultimately they arrived at 86° 34' N. latitude, and in so doing surpassed all previous pilgrimages. On the return of Captain Cagni and his companions "The Polar Star," considerably damaged, was recovered from the ice; the provisions and the crew were restored to her amid general rejoicing; and the expedition returned to the South. It had lost two men and gained one glory for Italy.

The glory? One must not presume to describe it in Anglo-Saxon. It must be recited in the very words of the Captain. At a certain stage of the expedition, the stage at which all earlier rivals had been outclassed, he and his chief officer found themselves in an emotional mood. They had not exchanged a word for hours; but warmly they clasped each other's hand. Cagni meant to say that he considered Petigax a friend indeed, but does not know how he contrived to express himself. Petigax sought to say that he had only done his duty, and tears shone in his eyes:—

"The flag," I said to him, and we left the tent without further thought of the cooking-stove. We searched hastily in the kayak for our little flag, tied it to a bamboo pole, and I waved it to the cry of "Long live Italy! Long live the King! Long live the Duke of the Abruzzi!" And to each of my cries the others answered with a shout which expressed all the exultation of their souls. Resound on, sacred words; resound throughout these regions of pure and eternal ice, this sparkling gem! For never shall a conquest won by the sword, nor by the favours of fortune, adorn the crown of the House of Savoy with one of greater lustre!

Lest anyone should think these words excessively tall, we make haste to mention that the gallant Captain was in love. Did not he himself tell us so when he left the amputated Duke helpless in Teplitz Bay? It is to the benefit of the book that Captain Cagni was always thinking of the girl he left behind him. It is only in his contribution to the narrative that we ever come upon a patch of colour. All the rest is white, chilling, desolate. To quote the legend under one of the many pictures of lonely heroes labouring against the snow and ice, "it is downright maddening."

In fact, whilst doing our utmost to feel stimulated by this book, we cannot wholly suppress a surmise that the Duke of the Abruzzi and every other enthusiast about the North Pole is in kinship with a weird gentleman of our acquaintance. When well up in years, though strong and quite able to work, he wandered gravely about the outskirts of his native village murmuring about a great book he was going to write on The Light of Other Days. The Duke of the Abruzzi is wrapped in a similar assurance. "If only the moral advantage to be derived from these expeditions be considered, I believe," he says, "that it would suffice to compensate for the sacrifices they demand." The Light of Other Days; Moral Advantage: Is it possible that, like our wandering philosopher whose great work never got beyond the title, the Duke, sharing in his own way an incapacity common to many another man who never suspects the malady, is the victim of One Idea, boundlessly glorious to himself, and to mankind at large—a figment? The physician of "The Polar Star" has no suspicions of that kind. Perhaps that is because lack of perception is contagious, and many of us are the victims of phrases. At any rate, Dr. Molinelli is in no doubt as to the general results of the expedition:—

Intellectually and morally [he writes] the continued struggle rendered us more energetic and self-reliant, more calm, tranquil, and steady in the presence of danger, cool when judging a difficulty, and prudent, resolute and firm when overcoming it. The mental strain had truly the effect of intellectual gymnastics, which rendered the perception, the analysis, and the synthesis of things and events more easy and rapid, and the decision more prompt and certain. Our personal temperaments came forth from it more gentle, less exacting, more tolerant.

This sounds sincere and persuasive; but it must be remembered that it is from defeat, not from victory, that the moral is drawn. What the pæan would have been had our Italians actually reached the North Pole we hesitate to imagine. One thing certain is that there would have been less talk of the softening effect which adventurous travel has on character. We shall see when there has been an expedition wholly successful. That, we think, will be when some explorer sets sail with a motor sledge as part of his equipment.

Munchausen and Jones.

MR. MUNCHAUSEN. By John Kendrick Bangs. Illustrated by Peter Newell. (Richards. 5s.)

J. O. JONES. By R. S. Warren Bell. Illustrated by Gordon Browne. (Black. 3s. 6d.)

THERE is naught but a laughing connexion between "Mr." (why not Baron?) Munchausen and Mr. Jones, but it may serve for a sermonette on humour, of which the simple text shall be that one of these books is fundamentally wrong and the other not quite right.

The reason why "Mr. Munchausen" is fundamentally wrong is simply because the type he stands for is no longer dramatically real. Everybody is almost too afraid of being thought conceited. Good Form even discourages Uniform. Hence the tall story must dress itself anew in fresh living humanities, if its height is not to impede its circulation. Good Form is irritated by a joke about Bathsheba and David's sling; she is bored by a cheese "considerably larger than the continent of all Europe," and she more or less forgives Mr. Raspe—"the onlie begetter" of the Baron, and himself a wit of genius—by ignoring him. Mr. Bangs, however, might almost be Mr. Raspe's contemporary in regard to his humorous education. In justification one has only to say that "Mr. Ananias" reports the "interviews" in Mr. Bangs' volume for the "Gehenna Gazette." Perhaps in the whole history of humour there is nothing more baffling to the understanding than its appropriation of one of the most tragic and significant incidents of the New Testament. Ananias and Sapphira are not champion liars, they are the greasy sham philanthropists of every civilisation. Their horrible fate accuses their Maker of partiality. They are not crude or odd, they are children of decorum, and they convict Mr. Bangs of a breach of it. So too does Benedict Arnold whom Mr. Bangs (Ch. VI.) announces as a bicycle rider across the Styx.

Our remarks must not imply that "Mr. Munchausen" is, superficially speaking, out of date. Quite otherwise, since he has anticipated Sarah Grand in consigning the heavenly twins to Gehenna, where the lively youngsters extract story after story from the great boaster. Droll some of these stories undoubtedly are; there is a triumph of explanation, for instance, in that which recounts how Munchausen escaped sixty-three violent deaths, at one and the same moment. Moreover, disgusting as it should be to find laughter in cannibalism, one confesses it difficult to avoid smiling at the penitent cannibal who lay "groaning under the weight of a hundred potted plants, which he placed upon himself in memory of Wilkins," of whom he was at once the murderer and the grave. Mr. Bangs owes able support to Mr. Newell, whose coloured drawings admirably realise the frolics of the text.

Mr. Warren Bell's humour frolics after a very different fashion. His pleasant school story merely errs by the overdrawing of the parlour boarder who politely puts spokes into several bad wheels. "Ah! as I feared—damp! Careless chambermaids cause much mortality," he observes to the matron on the very day of his entrance into Adderman's School; and the faculty of turning out any number of suave sentences with a sting in them accompanies him right through the book, whence he emerges alive in spite of his asking for a tin-opener when an irate grocer tells him to "pass over the cackle and get to the 'osses." Mr. Bell "goes one better" than the late Mr. Talbot Baines Reed in "The Master of the Shell," by making his Jones not simply a rather second-rate graduate, but an uncertificated rolling stone. Jones succeeds by sheer grit and kindness, backed up by a colossal athleticism, for which he finds a medium in football. The motif of the book is the antagonism of a master in holy orders towards this excellent creature, and it is fair to add that all the pedagogues at "Adderman's" are presented humanly, although in two instances with touches of caricature. And so farewell to Messrs. Munchausen and Jones.

A Boom in "Nature" for Schools.

OFFICIAL REPORT OF THE NATURE-STUDY EXHIBITION AND CONFERENCES. (Blackie. 2s. 6d. net.)

THE publication of the Official Report of the Nature Study Exhibition Association marks, in a sense, the recent introduction and recognition of a new element and feature in English schools and methods of teaching; and the small committee that so successfully organised the exhibition and conferences, held last summer in London, have therefore to be congratulated on the result of their efforts. The volume now issued will no doubt be of service to many as a permanent record of an educational exhibition which was unique, as it was devoted entirely to one element in education, namely, the study of Nature; but those who turn to this report to find therein an answer to the question, What is Nature-study? will, we fear, be disappointed. In fact the answer to such a question seems to have been purposely evaded, for in the introduction we find it alluded to in the following terms: "It will be noted that no attempt was made to define the scope of Nature-study. Definition involves limitation, and to define the scope of such a new and vigorous growth might prove a fetter to future development." Yet the use of the word "study" implies definition, and we fear that, perhaps through diffidence, an excellent opportunity has been lost for constructing a via media, seeing that so many extreme and contradictory views are held on this question. One Nature-study authority, for example, tells us that "Nature-study is understood to be the work in elementary science taught below the high school—in botany, zoology, physics, chemistry, and geology"; but another recognised authority, equally as important as the first, states that "Nature-study is not the study of a science as of botany, entomology, geology, and the like," and adds, "It is wholly informal and unsystematic, the same as the objects are which one sees," while "it is entirely divorced from definitions and explanations in books." Where such conflicting views are held guidance would have been welcome—at any rate, the expression of a decided opinion would have been of assistance.

About three-fourths of the volume before us is taken up with the papers read at the conferences, and this is preceded by the report of the judges and by a long and detailed report on the exhibition itself by the executive committee. Each section is interesting in itself, but in the reports of the judges and the executive committee especially there is much to be noted that will benefit future organisers of Nature-study. The judges, however, seem to be chary of expressing any decided opinions, and rest contented with recording "two general impressions," viz., "that a large amount of sound work in 'Nature-study' is now being done in British schools, but that a good deal of energy is being expended along lines which are not likely to yield the best return." The judges in this case all belong, as professors, to a privileged class—"the knowledge class caste," to use Thring's expression—so that one is not surprised to find they are willing to accept unnatural nature, such as the growing of plants in solutions, or various forms of classified knowledge, as Nature-study. After all Nature-study is nothing more than a return to the methods of Gilbert White, methods which, while they have never failed to attract, have unfortunately been sadly neglected by the professional botanist and zoologist, so much so, that the laity or amateurs, as represented by field naturalists, have lost touch with the professional, and fail to appreciate the results which he elaborates in the privacy of his laboratory, surrounded by his multitudinous reagent bottles and his instruments and apparatus for dissection and analysis. Nature-study, as an educational influence or subject, has nothing to do with technicalities as to structure and classification, or with the histology and physiology of any living thing. No one, for instance, has the right to call botany work Nature-study. From the judges' report, however, one fails to learn if they recognise any distinction between the teaching of elementary science and Nature-study, and from the tenour of their report one would surmise that they do not, for it appears they consider the demonstration of "scientific facts" as coming under Nature-study, instead of leaving these, if they are ever to be taught at all, to the specific science subjects usually taught in schools.

Passing next to the report of the executive committee, there is here again noticeable the same anxious non-committal attitude which vitiates all the reports in the volume. Yet, when closely studied, this report is found to be really valuable, because it classifies the exhibits that were shown under the heads to which they properly belong, with the result that we have our attention directed to classes for "Nature-study and Field Work," "Economic Nature Study," "Nature Object Lessons," "Observational Lessons," "Nature Knowledge," "Agriculture," "Horticulture," "Economic Entomology," "Botany," and "Science Teaching." It is obvious when such distinctions are drawn, that the exhibits which are considered, say, under the head of "Observational Lessons," or "Horticulture," or "Botany" are so classified as they were considered out of place under "Nature-study." It is also pleasant to see in this report that the giving of definite lessons in schools on natural phenomena or objects is not regarded as Nature-study, though the great tendency to give these object lessons as such is duly noted. Although this volume lacks the definite guidance which at present is so needed by teachers who are interesting themselves in Nature-study, still we hope it will be carefully read by every responsible teacher.

There can be little doubt that much constructive work has yet to be done before "Nature-study" becomes a "living power" in our schools. We are therefore glad to have this official report as a record of a successful educational exhibition, and, notwithstanding its obvious limitations, as a contribution towards securing Nature-study teaching in our schools, on rational lines and on a permanent basis.

A Turk on Turkey.

THE DIARY OF A TURK. By Halil Halid. (A. & C. Black. 6s.)

THE author of this book was born at Angora in Asia Minor, and his great-grandfather was a holy hermit with a praying-carpet of deerskin, on which he was accustomed (so it was said) to ride every Friday from his home in Asia Minor to Mecca in Arabia. "The responsibility of vouching for the fact lies with the narrator," is an Arab saying, which the writer discreetly adds. Mr. Halil Halid was educated first at a preparatory mixed school, where the teacher kept order with a long pole, accurately proportioned to the size of the room. Thence he passed to Constantinople and a theological seminary or "Mad-rasseh," and then having attended lectures at one of the more modern educational institutions, essayed to be a barrister, but without much success. In a Turkish bath—a real Turkish bath—he gathered that the Sultan's spies were after him as a "young Turk." So he came with a portmanteau and forty pounds to England. He was invited back with a promise of a Government post. He returned, and found that he was expected to be a spy himself. Wherefore, after elaborate preparations, he swung himself once more upon a British ship in the Bosphorus, and here he is, sitting down to criticize Turkey, with a glance at Christian countries. Such a book, from a man who had worn a turban over his shaved head (the shaving made him squeal), and can write good simple English, cannot fail to be interesting.

For we do not understand Mohammedanism, and the author looks at all things from the point of view of a Mohammedan—progressive and furiously opposed to the tyranny of the Yildiz kiosk. To him Christianity, as seen in the Christian quarter of Constantinople, as well as in the Levant, implies drunkenness, prostitution, and the eating of pork, all three of which to the Moslem are horrible; and even a residence in London has not convinced Mr. Halil Halid that pigs, prostitutes, and pewters are not the essential elements of the Christian religion. We have equally false ideas of the harem:—

When an Englishman uses the word harem, he means thereby the numerous wives whom a man in our part of the East is supposed to shut up in his house. He, moreover, believes that every man in the Mohammedan East may marry as many women as he pleases. This idea is not only mistaken, but grotesque. There are thousands of men who would consider themselves fortunate if they could marry even a single woman; while, on the other hand, there are thousands who would be happy to get rid of the single wife they have. Any man who can manage to keep two, not to say more, wives in peace, must be an exceptionally brave person.

To the Englishman who may depend on his own eyes and ears in the choice of a wife the Turkish method has always appeared undesirable. The Turk has to fall in love with a second-hand description of a lady he has never seen, and will not see until he has paid over the stakes. Such a system would cut the ground from under the British novelist. But it makes for Turkish happiness. Slight disappointments may occur when the husband lifts the veil. But, as our author explains, he does not often see other feminine faces, and his notion of beauty is limited by his experience.

This "Young Turk," who turned up at King's Cross nine years ago with a bag and the word "Olympia" as a talisman, who faced the confusion between Kensington and Kennington, and finally found Olympia peopled by others than his countrymen, has written a book which gives the European mind a wrench. There are not many ways open to an educated man under the rule of the Sultan (the head of police in the most important quarter of Constantinople cannot write his own name).

At present there are only two ways in which Turkish subjects can obtain a livelihood. Either they must be content to pocket their pride and labour as workmen, small tradesmen, ordinary craftsmen, farm labourers, and so forth, or they must somehow get a Government appointment. A man of education must make a Government salary his ambition in life, and must direct all his energies to increasing it.

Mr. Halil Halid has discovered a third way, which consists in leaving Turkey and writing a very interesting book about it.

In Athens.

ANCIENT ATHENS. By E. A. Gardner. (Macmillan.)

THIS scholarly and liberally illustrated volume is upon the lines of the work done by the late Prof. Middleton for the art and archaeology of ancient Rome. The progress of research in and about the Acropolis has been so untiring during the last quarter of a century, and the result arrived at so considerable, as to make a summary in usum laicorum eminently desirable. And Prof. Gardner's own connection with the investigation as director of the British School of Athens has been so intimate and prolonged that he was obviously the man to undertake it. It was not altogether an easy task. The process of conjecturally reconstructing the outlines of buildings and circumvallations from fragmentary ruins and equally fragmentary records is always a hazardous one. Nor is the way rendered less obscure in the present instance by the dust of controversy which such topics as the internal management of the Dionysius theatre have raised around them. Through all such debatable matter Prof. Gardner steers his way with ample knowledge and with that scholarly caution which ample knowledge alone begets. His opening chapter deals with the situation and natural features of Athens, its water-supply and the building materials available for its walls and temples. The rest of the book is made up partly of general descriptions of the city and its art at various stages of their development, partly of special studies of the leading points of interest, such as the Parthenon, the Erechtheum, the Theatre, the Ceramicus, and the Piræus. On the problem of the Theatre, Prof. Gardner, after a very careful review of the evidence, is disposed to refuse his adhesion to the revolutionary view of Prof. Dörpfeld, which denies the existence of a stage during the classical period, and asserts that the proscenium with its columns was used as a background for actors on the level of the orchestra, not as a raised platform for them to stand upon. "The use," he says, "of the raised proscenium or λογεῖον as a stage for the actors is established by very clear evidence in the case of the later Greek theatre, and this analogy would lead one to expect some such platform in the Greek theatre of earlier times also." Another point on which one naturally looks with some interest for Prof. Gardner's opinion is that of the application of colour to Greek sculpture. This can best be studied in the series of sixth century statues on the Acropolis, dedicated to Athena, and known as the "Maidens."

The use of colour is restricted within narrow limits. It is, in the first place, applied to the hair, the eyes, and the lips, the pigment used for the hair and lips being red, and the same for the iris of the eye, and usually for the outlines of iris and pupil; but a darker pigment is generally used for the pupil itself, and sometimes for the outline of the iris. It will be seen that this colouring is still partly conventional, certainly not naturalistic in character; but the red colouring on hair and iris is probably intended to represent an actual and admired type. The usual colour of the hair of the Tanagra statuettes is the same, and the red-brown eyes of the Delphi charioteer, itself probably an Attic work, will not easily be forgotten by those who have seen them. On the drapery we find similar principles of decoration. No garment is covered with a complete coat of paint unless only a small portion of it is visible. The main surfaces are always left white, showing the natural texture of the marble, but they have richly coloured borders, and are sprigged with finely drawn decorations, the colours shown being mostly rich and dark ones—dark green, which was in some cases originally blue, dark blue, purple, or red. The effect of this colouring, whether on face or garments, is to set off and enhance by contrast the beautiful tint and texture of the marble. Those who have only seen white marble statues without any touches of colour to give definition to the modelling and variety to the tone, can have no notion of the beauty, life, and vigour of which the material is capable.

The white lucency of Attic marble has rooted itself ineradicably in the historic imagination—a most singular example of the iniquity of oblivion.

Other New Books.

VERSES OCCASIONALLY HUMOROUS. By E. H. Lacon Watson. (Matthews. 1s. net.)

MR. LACON WATSON'S verse is neat, and consistently thin. The humour is merely verbal; indeed, to apply the word humour to it at all is hardly accurate. Humour implies much more than the easy trivialities which supply Mr. Lacon Watson's material. However, the little volume makes pleasant and innocuous reading. As the author says in the verses somewhat over-weighted with the title "Apologia pro Arte sua":—

My verses are not much, I grant,
Not mine to cater for the crowd;
But what I sing my maiden aunt
Could read aloud.

That stanza, including the apparent inconsequence of the second line, is fairly representative of Mr. Watson's verse. His favourite subject appears to be the old quarrel between author and reviewer; but at this time of day any shafts hurled at the critic in Mr. Watson's manner are already, surely, as blunt as clothes-props:—

Cease to belabour the thankless muse,
But just turn Critic and write Reviews, is an echo of echoes. When the author is sentimental we like him less; the sentiment is sound enough, but its expression never approaches distinction. The first stanza of "Doubt" reads thus:—

Dearest, lay down your head,
Rest it upon my shoulder.
What was it, sweet, you said?
"Must our love, too, grow colder;
Will it ever, perhaps, lie dead?"

The two opening lines belong to an impossible class of writing which can by no means be suffered without protest. But in justice to Mr. Watson we must add that we have found nothing else in the book quite so bad.

THE TRAMP'S HANDBOOK. By Harry Roberts. (Lane. 3s. 6d.)

EVERYONE has his handbook to-day; and now comes the tramp's. But not the tramp of the back-door and the dusty road, who sleeps under hayricks or in casual wards; rather the bank-clerk with a fortnight before him intent on a holiday on foot. We could spare the opening chapters in praise of walking and vagabondage—their sentiments should be taken for granted; but the rest of the book is good and useful. It is superfluous now and then, as in the passage on pages 80 and 81, containing instructions as to producing fire by rubbing together two pieces of wood—as everyone who has been to "The Admirable Crichton" will agree; but in the main Dr. Roberts talks what the Red Indian calls straight talk, and we prophesy an enormous impulse to camping-out wherever the stimulating little book finds its way into a school—perhaps its best destination. We intend to give it to many boys. Now and then Dr. Roberts does not tell everything; he does not say, for example, that a wax vesta burns better in a high wind if some of the strands of waxed thread of which it is made are unpicked from the other end with a pin or knife and wound loosely round the head before striking. We doubt, also, whether it is wise to recommend a diet of fungi without coloured pictures by which to identify those which are safe. But the book is as pleasant an invitation to the road as we have had for some time.

A PHILOSOPHER IN PORTUGAL. By Eugène E. Street. (Unwin. 5s. net.)

WHY the author of this volume should describe himself as a philosopher does not appear in the course of the narrative. One experiences an initial irritation at the use of the word, an irritation which increases with almost every page. The philosopher, indeed, becomes a bore, and we are not particularly sorry to part from him when the end comes. Mr. Street, he tells us, hates the globe-trotter; "if he carries off any impression at all upon what is conveniently known as his or her brain," it is compounded of scraps from books, with no leaven of personal observation. It cannot justly be said that Mr. Street has no observation, but such as it is it is of a superficial and uninspiring kind. He does not fail, for instance, to give us descriptions of the casual incidents of travel, incidents which could only be saved from dullness by real observation and real humour. But neither the philosopher's observation nor humour has any grip. When he meets a man who knows no English we hear of "linguistic shortcomings," and the like; the philosopher, indeed, revels in clichés.

For the rest the volume contains no new light upon Portugal. Mr. Street travelled about, often away from the beaten track, and he writes of what he saw; but that is not enough to make a book. A man with the right instinct might, never having seen the country, sit at home and write about it more truly and convincingly than Mr. Street. Chronicles of small beer may be all very well, but there is more than one way of chronicling even small beer, and Mr. Street's way is not the right one.

The fifth and sixth volumes of "The Poetical Works of George Barlow" consist of "Loved beyond Words" and "The Pageant of Life" (Glaisher). The first named includes the contents, with some omissions and alterations, of three books published in 1883-4-5; "The Pageant of Life" first appeared in 1888, and has now been considerably abridged. Mr. Barlow's productiveness is rather appalling; he writes with an ease which seriously injures his work. There is no pause for concentration, no search after the right phrase. At the same time it is accomplished verse, with occasional strength of flight.

NEW EDITIONS: We have received from Messrs. Pearson a two shilling reprint of Miss Muloch's "John Halifax, Gentleman," with illustrations by Mr. H. M. Brock. There seems no end to the popularity of this tearful story.—The latest addition to Messrs' Macmillan's "Illustrated Pocket Classics" is Tom Hood's "Humorous Poems." The volume contains the introduction by Canon Ainger included in the 1893 issue.—The fifth edition of Prof. James's "Human Immortality" comes to us from Messrs. Constable. The little book deserves wide recognition.

Fiction.

THE GAP IN THE GARDEN. By Vanda Wathen-Bartlett.

"SUGGESTIVE" is a convenient word, and they who have to pronounce upon "The Gap in the Garden" will certainly have recourse to it. In strict truth it is not a work of art—this medley of moods through which no purpose is perceivable or end in sight. Perhaps it may be regarded as an allegory. The garden as it was, safely enclosed by trees, a place for tea and gossip and bickering, represents (let us say) material life secure in uninquisitive commonplaceness. Then the garden, after the breaking of its leafy belt, represents life as it is, when there is a breach in the wall of sense and the mind is haunted or pursued by the unseen. However that may be, the heroine, who is responsible for the alteration of the garden, suffers strangely from the pressure of occult forces. She is an orphan, but a man lives who believes that she was the creation of his will working in the mother when their bodies were apart. "There is no such thing as privacy of thought . . . Thoughts are existing things . . . flowing into the minds of men," he declares before the Ninth Wave calls him; and the saying recalls another from the same lips: "Hate is an energy, a separate distinct force."

Hate, in the person of a mad Scotchwoman, destroys the heroine who seems to have been swept away from the safe society of a cross and fidgety aunt, an idle painter, and a hard-headed doctor, out of the rose-garden, through the gap into the mystic moorland and towards the hate that burned for her. The mind which dwells in such a work as this is certainly interesting. It may, however—in spite of a few flashes of merry wit—be called morbid because it has not shaped its imaginings artistically; it has not called forth a beautiful form from its own nightmare.

CORNELIUS. By Mrs. Henry de la Pasture. (6s.)

MRS. DE LA PASTURE has above everything a pleasant manner of writing. There is a vein of geniality, and an element of cheerfulness in her outlook upon life generally, which gives her present novel a refreshing absence of strenuous undercurrents. In "Cornelius," at any rate, she treats the vicissitudes of existence as a philosopher, without an exaggerated emphasis being laid either upon the joys or pains of humanity. "Cornelius" himself, the son of a gentleman on one side and a Somersetshire dairy-maid on the other, is treated with the same tranquil absence of partizanship which characterizes the whole management of the story. The discovery is made that Cornelius is the son of a certain Lord Polart, but just when the exciting development of his inheriting both estate and title seems imminent, the book ends with the discovery that his birth was illegitimate after all, and his mother's story of marriage, and the false signature on her marriage certificate, were merely an outcome of peasant cunning and foresight. True, she had subsequently been married, but to an old village acquaintance, who had signed the name of Cornelius' father under the impression that by so doing he made "an honest woman" of her, and rectified the position of the coming baby of the other man.

The rest of the characters are drawn with care and vivacity. The best are undoubtedly the elderly brother and sister, whose coming into the village has such an immense influence upon the future of Cornelius, until then little more than a superior country yokel with a passion for book learning and gardening. Cornelius himself is the least convincing of them all, but for the large number of readers who want only a fairly light and amusing story we can thoroughly recommend this book.

AN APRIL PRINCESS. By Constance Smedley. (Cassell. 6s.)

PUBLISHED separately, the dialogues that make up the story of "An April Princess" might have passed very well as journalism of the light and frothy kind; but they suffer considerably by being presented in book form. This kind of thing does not make a book; even the dialogues of which the lady named Dolly was the heroine, scarcely bore the test of being read continuously—and the April Princess is a long way after Dolly. The author, too, has the rather irritating trick of referring to her puppets as the Poet, the Queen, the Prince, and so on, instead of calling them by their real names; and this helps to destroy any human interest they might otherwise have had for us. There is a certain amount of promise in the book, a certain suggestion that the author could do something much better if she were to drop her mannerisms and cease to mistake flippancy for wit. But as it is, her men and women of the fantastic titles are merely tiresome, and occasionally a little ill-bred as well; and the Princess herself is far too superficial to be able to bear the strain of occupying the most prominent place in the book. And she has two particularly annoying characteristics: one is her sentimentality over her women friends, and the other, her habit of referring to her men friends as "pals." The sentimentality, especially in her conversations with the Queen, would not appear at its best in quotation; but here is a specimen of the Princess's dealings with one of the "pals":—

"Don't quarrel," said the Princess pleadingly. "You've always some one new," said the Knight. "The more new people I see, the more it makes me love my old friends," said the Princess. The Knight preserved a sulky silence. He had heard this several times before. "My cushions have fallen down," said the Princess. The Knight picked up a cushion: the Princess's hand was somehow in his. The hint of a smile hovered round the corner of the Knight's exceedingly well-shaped mouth. . . . "I'm so glad to see you!" said the Princess, and the Knight's blue eyes began to laugh. . . . "Let's be pals!" said the Princess. The Princess's hand was still in the Knight's. "Do be pals!" said the Princess. So the Knight and the Princess made friends.

THE ETERNAL WOMAN. By Dorothea Gerard. (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE bright, readable, blameless novel still holds its own in spite of the abolition of its three volumes; and "Dorothea Gerard's" latest story, in everything but its form, carries us back to those earlier works of hers in which one-third was beginning and one-third was end, while the remainder was padding. It is true that the padding is now left out; but we must confess, for all that, to feeling a little disappointed in "The Eternal Woman." We had expected more from the author after reading her last book, "Holy Matrimony," which certainly was an advance on anything she had done previously; and it is saddening to find that, after all, she has turned again to the public that wants only pretty things. It will get what it wants in this book. The story is that of a girl of twenty, neither pretty nor plain, but extraordinarily attractive, who finds herself penniless through the death of her patroness, and has to face the necessity of earning a livelihood. A strong-minded friend offers her a year's training at the University with a choice of becoming either a lawyer or a doctor at the end of it; but Clara goes home, tumbles upon "Vanity Fair," and resolves instead to start upon a career of earning her living by her wits rather than by her brains. She determines, in fact, to become a harmless kind of Becky Sharp. Somehow, the experiment does not work very well; she is neither good enough nor bad enough for the part, and she ends in falling desperately in love with the man she has tried, quite in an innocent sort of way, to entrap into marriage. Of course, everything comes right in the end; in this kind of book the wedding bells tinkle pleasantly from the first page to the last—but there is no reason why it should not have done so without being quite so sugary. We feel all the more strongly about it because the writer is so capable of doing better work, as even this book shows now and then.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

TYPHOON.

By JOSEPH CONRAD.

Four characteristic stories. Mr. Conrad has brought all his descriptive power and intimate knowledge of the sea to the account of a typhoon in Chinese waters. "Amy Foster" is the story of an emigrant from the Carpathians who was shipwrecked on the English coast. "Falk" is called a reminiscence. Here is a sentence: "'Imagine to yourselves,' he said in his ordinary voice, 'that I have eaten a man.'" The volume is dedicated to Mr. Cunningham-Graham, and has a quotation from Keats on the title page.

REPROBATE SILVER.

By ROY DEVEREUX.

"Being the Later History of the House of Orpington." Upon the title-page stand these words: "Reprobate silver shall men call them, for the Lord hath rejected them." The story deals with the decline of a family, and touches with distinction many phases of character. "There was nothing left for him to learn concerning the end of the House of Orpington, save only the essential thing—the inward significance thereof. Were they really all blotted out—not only from this intermediate plane of consciousness, but from the Book of Universal Life?" A thoughtful and well-written book. (Richards. 6s.)

CAPTAIN KETTLE, K.C.B.

By CUTCLIFFE HYNÉ.

On the cover we find the little Captain, with the cigar and the red torpede beard, as of old—but, alas! with a wooden leg. It appears that in the course of his recent adventures he fell into the hands of a malignant Moor, who endeavoured to pervert his faith. Captain Kettle declined to become a Mahomedan, and paid for his obstinacy with the loss of a limb. His last adventures are of such a character that he has been proclaimed a great Empire builder and created a K.C.B. (Pearson. 6s.)

THE GOLD WOLF.

By MAX PEMBERTON.

An elaborate romance of modern life. The central figure is a millionaire who comes under the suspicion of having murdered his wife at their house in Park Lane. There is a typical happy-go-lucky Irishman who follows us through the story, and part of the action takes place at Cambridge, where the May races are described with all the gusto of one who remembers what time he was taught to "get his hands away." There are many illustrations. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

THE CONFLICT.

By M. E. BRADDON.

The hero of Miss Braddon's sixty-fourth novel is the youngest son of a peer, described by his elder brother, the heir, as a man who had neither vices nor virtues. "He was an odd volume of the Aldine poets in a frock coat." The first part of the story is occupied with his Quixotic attempt to rescue his landlady's daughter from a man whom he ultimately kills in a duel. Then the scene moves to Klondyke. There is an abundance of incident and a frequent suggestion of supernatural causes. (Simpkin, Marshall. 6s.)

CROWBOROUGH BEACON.

By HORACE E. HUTCHINSON.

A leisurely historical romance of a hundred years ago. It opens at Tunbridge Wells. The "bucks and fine ladies" of the period gather round the newly arrived mail to hear the latest news of town and of the French War. There is a dispute, a duel, and thus the story is set going. The action passes in Sussex, and is of a quieter sort than is common in historical romances. Mr. Hutchinson quotes his authorities in frequent and somewhat voluminous notes. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
Quarterly	5/0
Price for one issue	/5

Saved from Oblivion.

In the history of the world the title to remembrance comes by way of infamy as well as by way of accomplished good; the poisoner lives side by side with the man whose happy toil it was to ease suffering and nurse the waning flame; the singer of nature's mysteries touches hands with the destroyer of man's temples. The inexorable law of nature is that only those who do shall be remembered; there is no compounding with posterity for the continuance even of a name. And how many men achieve the little which shall entitle them to the briefest record? Reckoned in terms of centuries, they are but as the odd grains of gold left in an outworked vein. The Index and Epitome to the Dictionary of National Biography contains 30,378 names, and the whole work was designed "to supply . . . biographies of all noteworthy inhabitants of the British Islands and the Colonies (exclusive of living persons) from the earliest historical period to the date of Queen Victoria's death on 22 January, 1901." That thirty thousand odd seems a number incredibly small; in an optimistic mood we might suppose that our own time would supply future recorders with a sixth of that total. But time winnows with his ceaseless and callous fans, and we who think ourselves to be something, may even be as they who are nothing.

This index and epitome is in its way more impressive than the sixty-six volumes which it represents; certainly it is more suggestive. It strikes us as a kind of roll of the rescued from oblivion, a summary of the elect, both of the mire and the sky. At all points it touches life, and also that mysterious force which we call destiny. There grows upon the imagination a sort of terror in the contemplation of so much great achievement, so much intolerable degradation. And there comes also the thought that amongst the unrecorded were those whose claims were ignored by the mere accident of chance. There recurs to us that noble and moving passage in the "Hydriotaphia" of Sir Thomas Browne:—

To be nameless in worthy deeds, exceeds an infamous history. The Canaanitish woman lives more happily without a name than Herodias with one. And who had not rather have been the good thief than Pilate?

But the iniquity of oblivion blindly scattereth her poppy, and deals with the memory of men without distinction to merit of perpetuity. Who can but pity the founder of the pyramids? Herostratus lives that burnt the temple of Diana, he is almost lost that built it. . . . In vain we compute our felicities by the advantage of our good names, since bad have equal durations. . . . Oblivion is not to be hired. The greater part must be content to be as though they had not been, to be found in the register of God, not in the record of man. . . . The number of the dead far exceedeth all that shall live. The night of time far surpasseth the day, and who knows when was the equinox?

The right to remembrance, indeed, cannot definitely be claimed save by those who have themselves set down the record of their lives—and such claims are as likely as not to be unavailing. Only with the written or printed word came any certainty of posthumous fame; scores of names live in literature, which else had been forgotten by an unseeing or misunderstanding world. Dante preserved Beatrice as an immortal type, and Shelley, in "The Cenci," vitalized the history of an almost forgotten tragedy. Knowledge of greatness in any kind is practically subject to the mechanical processes of the printing-press. And that mechanical process is employed with hardly any possibility of selection; we have created the means, but the means can no longer be controlled. True literature must always remain selective, but true literature is far removed from the clamour of countless tongues. At the same time literature, by reason of its very exclusiveness, could not be trusted to record everything of actual moment in the progress or decline of the world. In the sum of things it stands for beauty and sanity and understanding; but the earth spins to more stupendous ends than may find expression in any or all of the arts.

Those stupendous ends are illustrated in such a succinct and valuable epitome as this. They who have searched the heavens and they who have explored the deeps have their few simple lines. Romance, tragedy, comedy, the inextricable puzzle of life, are entangled in this web of pages. To turn them over is to be convinced of one's individual ignorance; it is like going to school to Time. How many people off-hand could name a score, or half-a-score, of the great Smith family who have left any mark upon their generation? Here we find one hundred and eighty-two of them, lawyers, soldiers, churchmen, bookmen, artists, antiquaries, engineers—all phases of life and work represented in a single surname. An isolated name, again, may touch the springs of terror and romance. One Sexby only finds a place in the volume—that Edward Sexby who entered Cromwell's regiment of Horse in 1643, became Governor of Portland six years later, fought at the Siege of Tanton Castle, was deprived of his commission, and afterwards negotiated with the governor of the Spanish Netherlands and Don John of Austria for an invasion of England and the assassination of Cromwell. Then followed his arrest and the publication of his "Killing no Murder." But that apology for tyrannicide was of no avail against the inexorable tyranny of death, which found him in that familiar home of silence and crushed hopes, the Tower of London. In so brief an outline glows the inner fire of a thousand lives—ambition, revolt, desolation, and over all the brooding shadow and the encroaching doom.

Certain entries bring together in violent contrast the extremes of personality and of action. On the same page we have the names of Sir Thomas Browne and Elizabeth Brownrigg—the one a great physician, a supreme writer, a servant of God and an enemy of witches; the other a murderess whose name stands for the worst and the most brutal in the sordid calendars of crime. Here is subject enough for endless moralities; they start from the page. Yet with moralities the records of fact have nothing to do; they merely, as it were, mark the boundaries of the country, and in their very explicitness suggest the narrowness of human destiny. We move, indeed, hardly knowing where we move; our day is but a twilight; we were, and are not, and still the individual takes himself for something, and labours and sins and builds his house of dreams in the face of an inscrutable purpose and an uncomprehended eternity. And in that lies the glory of the game; only so can the soul come to any understanding of itself, only so can we win with decency to the strait haven of quietness which somewhere awaits us all.

It is impossible, it would seem, in considering such a volume as this in its wider aspects, to avoid moralities. Take it in what way you will and they force themselves upon the mind. The philosophy of history means something after all, though it can never be tied down to a formula or made convincing in an epigram. These fifteen hundred pages, as we have said, touch life at every point, and so touching it they bewilder as much as they illumine. But one is rather inclined, it must be confessed, to search out the problems and to let the simple statements pass; the complex personality allures us more than the frankly single-minded. This is a concession to the spirit of mystery which is in all of us, as well as an uncertain striving after some explanation of ourselves. A man is always more of a mystery to himself than to his fellows, except he be a man of vigorous and splendid action. Drake, we may suppose, never troubled much about problems of the soul when he was sailing the seas for the building up of England; he was merely a man rejoicing in his strength and in the chances of the game. And it was so, happily, with many, perhaps the larger number, of our greatest, and is so still. In a little turmoil we forget the much peace; the beatific silences often go unrecorded. So at the last we fall back upon the thought that these crowded names represent in the main the work of centuries accomplished quietly and without fear. And there always remain the unrecorded, the men and women of their time who went about the day's work gladly and lay down to rest with the assured benediction of toil. These had no desire for greatness, no yearning that their faith could not satisfy, no passions in revolt against the established order. Perhaps they missed something of the extreme beauty of life, but they never fell into the darkness which is beauty's shadow. They had no wish either to hire or cheat oblivion; oblivion to them was a word of little meaning. They lived, and loved, and passed.

We can conclude upon no more satisfying thought. Splendours, degradations, conquests, defeats, pass over the world, but the individual, quietly labouring, remains. He may be ignored by art and letters, yet to him art and letters must turn in the last appeal. He represents continuance, stability, and the steady flow of life. That he goes unrecorded is perhaps his chief proof of happiness.

The Wisdom of the Ages.

THE Wisdom of the Ages! It is curiously stationary. Below the smaller comforts and discomforts of the daily life are always the things of the spirit, which are not concerned with the doings of the chemist and the engineer. And to the man who cares for anything beyond his dinner and his banker's pass-book, those who have written of the things of the spirit make an appeal which no lapse of time can weaken. The most important questions, the questions which any man asks who seriously endeavours to put himself in right relation with his surroundings, have always been answered—in various ways—since man emerged from his cave-dwelling and sat down in the sunlight to think. To take one or two only from the list of those who in one way or another have tried to formulate the rules for the art of living, which is the art of arts: Job, Hesiod, Buddha, Socrates, Omar Khayyam, Mohamed, Confucius—whichever one chooses will come with an absolutely direct and contemporaneous appeal, an appeal as potent as that of, say, the writer of the leader in this morning's "Times." For the problem is always the same, always insistent, and these are but one or two answers to the first difficulty. Possibly they are all wrong. But there is one curious thing about the answers that have been given by the men of old, by inspiration, or guessing, which you will. They have made splendid generalisations which we of a later age have reached and verified only by laborious research into particulars.

To the ordinary Englishman the Taoist religion is a liar. Buddhism has had many European exponents, and Confucianism, the third of the Chinese religious systems, is known at least superficially. But Láo Tsze, who founded the philosophy of the common people of China, is scarcely known by name to most educated Englishmen, and the metrical rendering of the Táo Teh King which Dr. I. W. Heysinger has made, and the Research Publishing Company of Philadelphia have issued under the title "The Light of China," will repay inspection, if only to assure the reader that the human mind is at base the same from China to Peru. Láo Tsze was born by fifty-four years the senior of Confucius. He was born in the year B.C. 604 and lived for about a century. He was then uttering words of wisdom, which still guide millions of his countrymen, while the Seven Wise Men of Greece were building their maxims on observations of life and the Hebrew prophets were thundering their warnings to a perverse generation. The Taoism of to-day, as Dr. Heysinger explains, is overlaid and misinterpreted by theology, fancy and later commentary; but the Táo Teh, the only work left by its writer, at once became one of the Chinese "king," or classics. When about a hundred years old Láo Tsze "disappeared" into the north-west of China. Here at the outset is the human mind at its ancient work of attributing not only strange birth but abnormal death to its Buddhas, its Elijahs and its Messiahs.

But turning to the translation of the Táo Teh you will be struck by the curious familiarity of the ideas, thus:—

The sage lays up no treasure,
No hoard of goods or gold,
For they who keep a storehouse deep
A constant watch must hold.

The more he works for others
The more he works for his own,
For it grows by use, is lost by abuse,
And he gathers by what he has sown.

The more he gives away,
The more does he have himself.

There is not a line there that could not be paralleled again and again in Western thought or capped by Biblical quotation, and here perhaps is an instance yet more striking:—

He who knows others is wise,
But he who knows himself is wiser still;
He who conquers others is strong,
But to conquer self needs greater strength and skill;
He who is satisfied is rich,
He who is firm in action has a will;
He who loses not his place lives long,
But the man who dies and does not perish, he lives longer still!

"He who knows himself." "E cœlo descendit spiritus creator." And at the same moment a wise man in China and another wise man in Greece were proclaiming the same principle. One might, if space permitted, collect dozens of similar instances of the identical working of the human mind at opposite ends of the world, as though synchronised by some standard clock at some celestial Greenwich, and one might work out a theory, without even a touch of paradox, that all the great teachers who have touched mankind have preached over and over again the same truths; only they have rarely been listened to, still more rarely understood.

Here and there, in turning over the maxims of Láo Tsze, one comes across phrases that suggest his prophetic insight, as by a flash of inspiration, into the scientific discoveries of a later age and alien clime. Goethe, you will remember, as well as Lucretius, saw dimly but splendidly in splashes of colour what Darwin built up by laborious mosaics. And here is a phrase from Láo Tsze:—

Weight is the root of lightness, stillness the master of motion.

Another, too:—

There is nothing weaker than water,
Or easier to efface;
But for attacking the hard and strong
Nothing can take its place.

Is it too curious to suspect here an anticipation of Sir Isaac Newton or a dim foreseeing of the hydraulic lift? Possibly. But imagination plays a huge part in scientific discovery.

While we are grateful to Dr. Heysinger for his rendering of this Chinese classic, we are not sure that he was right in casting it into metrical form. His excuse is that the original is rhythmic. But this is a case in which we seek for accuracy, and the necessities of rhyme and metre do not make for the accuracy desired. Even with Omar Khayyam we wish to check Fitzgerald by a literal rendering, and Dr. Heysinger is not a Fitzgerald. This is another reason for regretting the metric form of this work. Nor need we give any further proof than the selections we have quoted.

Indiscretions.

THERE are some few great Englishmen who, though dead, are personally dear to us. They have passed through our intellect to our emotions, and we go to the sale-room where the pen or the sword is put up for auction and bid against each other for the honour of possession. Even their indiscretions endear them the more. The list is easily made up. Shakespeare stands at the head of it, and Dr. Johnson holds a high place. And running chronologically down the list we find curious inconsistencies. In genius and in national service Nelson and Wellington stand fairly level. But as a personality, how much nearer the national heart the naval hero stands than the victor of Waterloo? Dickens and Thackeray are the two great names in mid-Victorian fiction. Yet here again the difference is seen. Dickens, though there are still hundreds of men of middle age who have set eyes upon him, has already become a cult. He is the centre of a Fellowship, the smallest thing that reminds of him is treasured, and to many the route travelled by Mr. Pickwick passes through a Holy Land. This enthronement of the dead in the common heart is a mysterious process. Darwin was the contemporary of Dickens, and Darwin did infinitely more to influence human thought than all the Victorian novelists together. But put up to auction the chair in which Dickens wrote "Pickwick" and the whole furniture of the room in which the "Origin of Species" was completed, and the chair would fetch the higher price.

That is why there is some excuse for Mr. F. G. Kitton's collection of the "Poems and Verses of Charles Dickens" (Chapman and Hall). Dickens was not one of the prose writers who, like Stevenson and Kipling, choose to express themselves alternatively in verse. He never made the slightest claim to be a poet. He wrote verses as lesser men write them in stray moments of emotion, he wrote them for the newspapers to jingle a needed reform into the public ear, and he wrote them out of pure exuberance and used them as "fill-ups" in "Pickwick." Mr. Kitton has gathered specimens of all these, though the most famous he has omitted—Mrs. Leo Hunter's "Expiring Frog." That, however, is but a fragment. From "The Village Coquettes" we have several long-forgotten lyrics. We should perhaps explain what "The Village Coquettes" was. John Hullah had some music which he had made for a libretto that went wrong. So he appealed to one "Boz," who was writing certain "Sketches" in 1834, for a new libretto. Dickens accepted the commission, and the operetta ran for nineteen nights in London. Nine years later Dickens was unwilling that it should be revived. "I did it," he explained, "in a fit of damnable good-nature long ago, for Hullah, who wrote some very pretty music to it. I just put down for everybody what everybody at the St. James's Theatre wanted to say and do, and I have been most sincerely repentant ever since." And a year before his death Mr. Frederick Locker-Lampson asked him if he had a copy of that play. "No," said Dickens, "and if I knew it was in my house, and if I could not get rid of it in any other way, I would burn the wing of the house where it was." Now here is surely involved a question of literary ethics. How shall the worshipper of Dickens show most respect to the object of his devotion? By respecting his wishes, or by dragging out and bowing down before his very indiscretions? And is the Rhadamanthus of criticism bound by statute to give the verdict "Littera scripta manet"? We will quote a stanza from Rose's Song in "The Village Coquettes":—

Old maiden aunts so hate the men,
So well know how wives are harried,
It makes them sad—not jealous—when
They see their poor dear nieces married.
All men are fair and false, they know,
And with deep sighs they assail 'em,
It's so long since they tried men, though,
I rather think their mem'ries fail 'em.

That was the sort of thing that some actress at the St. James's Theatre "wanted to say and do." And there will be many admirers of Dickens who will prefer his judgment to that of Mr. Kitton.

Everyone, we suppose, remembers "The Ivy Green" from the sixth chapter of Pickwick, which is the high-water mark of Dickens' verse. It was set to music by Henry Russell, who received ten shillings for a song that sold by tens of thousands. But the occasional verses in the Press are less remembered. To the "Examiner" in 1841 Dickens contributed a parody of "The Fine Old English Gentleman." Here is a stanza:—

The good old laws were garnished well with gibbets, whips, and chains,
With fine old English penalties, and fine old English pains,
With rebel heads, and seas of blood once hot in rebel veins;
For all these things were requisite to guard the rich old gains
Of the fine old English Tory times;
Soon may they come again!

Of quite another character is the set of verses—signed with his own name—which Dickens published in the newly founded "Daily News," a few weeks after relinquishing the editorship. The "Hymn of the Wiltshire Labourers" caught the public ear at the moment when the corn laws were starving the peasant. We give the concluding stanza:—

Oh God, remind them! In the bread
They break upon the knee,
These sacred words may yet be read,
"In Memory of Me!"
Oh God, remind them of His sweet
Compassion for the poor,
And how He gave them Bread to eat,
And went from door to door!

Here perhaps we may find a suggestion of the cause of Charles Dickens's personal hold on following generations—his intense sympathy with all who suffered, or were oppressed. So even indiscretions may be pardoned, and become a redintegratio amoris.

Impressions.

XXIX.—Faith.

I ENTERED the wood walking hurriedly, as it was near sunset, and the village where I proposed to sleep was a long mile on the other side. Halfway through the wood I came upon a clearing, perhaps half a mile square, and in the middle of this reclaimed space, the smoke of the chimneys going up to the quiet sky, stood the woodcutters' cottages. They were surrounded by a hedge: all about were stacks of wood, and under a roof of withered branches were chairs, some finished, some still in the making. The day's work was over, the men sat in the porches of their cottages; but one was digging in his garden. Him I knew: had known aforetime very well. "What, you?" I cried. He smiled, and came towards me.

"Yes; this is my second year here with nature," he said, presently. "I cut wood, design chairs, dig, and paint. Read? No. I've done with books for the present. A new view of education came to me, and I am now putting it to the test. May I say that wisdom, not knowledge, is my goal? I am quite content, for the present, to let the world go by, while I reflect, dig, design chairs, and paint."

"You still paint, then?"

"Yes, but not in the old way. I paint dreams, not actualities. You see out here my eyes are always absorbing beautiful effects—the flight and poise of birds, the bark of beech trees against the sky, the shimmer of grasses bending before the wind, the folds of great uplands, all the changes of nature in sun and shadow. This morning, for instance, I was awakened by a thrush singing in that tree. I threw open the window and leaned out. The world was very new, very grey, very potential, very silent. I shall paint that thrush singing in a still world."

"How can you paint a thrush's song?"

"It is difficult to explain; but you see all my pictures have an intention, an ordained background in which is set a certain young figure. When I paint a little work called 'The Lamb Bleats for Her,' or 'The Poet Speaks for Her,' or 'The Nightingale Sings for Her,' or 'The Shepherd Hears for Her,' each of the pictures expresses her awakening joy in the beauty of the world, her cries of gratitude to God. That's my mission now. The morning stars, you know, shouted for joy: my pictures are a small tribute, but they are the best I can offer. For the service of man, there are the chairs. I design them. It may be I am useful to these woodcutters."

"Then your pictures have a meaning for those who are able to understand?"

His eyes looked a deep affirmative. "You know those wonderful old pictures in German galleries by nameless painters who are known as 'The Master of the Life of Mary,' 'The Master of the Death of Mary,' and so on. Well, scenes from her bright and happy youth are the foundation of all my pictures, not interiors, but in the open air, set in this beautiful country, and in each picture she discovers for the first time some new loveliness in the world—lambs, sunsets, morning skies, spring blossoms, the songs of birds, the young green of trees, the Gothic aisles of woods, purple hills, the sunlight dappling the turf in orchards. I have proof, indubitable proof that these little tributes of mine are acceptable."

"How so?"

"I sell these pictures to a dealer in London for five pounds each. We have a contract. He takes all I paint. That is my entire income, small but regular. Last week I sold two for which he gave me a ten-pound note. Coming home I had not time to take a ticket. It was a corridor train. I was standing in the passage by an open window when the guard asked me for my ticket. I handed him the note. A gust of wind snatched it from my hand, and whirled it away. I was in despair, without a farthing in the world; I could not earn more for months, for I am a slow worker. The passengers sympathised, talked about stopping the train, and such nonsense. Then the door leading from the first-class compartment opened, and a girl, slight and beautiful, wearing a white veil, came towards us, paused, and placed in my hand a ten-pound note. I was too dumbfounded to thank her. She disappeared. Later I searched for her to explain and apologise for my boorishness. Of course, I could not find her!"

"Why not?"

"Don't you understand? She was Our Lady."

Drama.

Miss Terry's Experiment.

ONE cannot help feeling a little sentimental over the opening of Miss Ellen Terry's season at the Imperial Theatre. That an actress of delightful genius, who has already charmed more than one generation of playgoers with her immortal youth, should now be identifying herself with some of the strongest forces which make for the renaissance of the drama in the immediate future, with Ibsen, the reformer of dramatic psychology, and with Gordon Craig, the reformer of scenic art, is at least as encouraging as it is unexpected. [In "The Vikings," Mr. Craig, in particular, has an admirable opportunity of essaying whether the principles of stage lighting and stage decoration, which have already commended themselves to a small knot of curious persons, will bear the very different test of production before a general and imperfectly discriminating public. I see no reason for dissatisfaction with the success of the experiment. Doubtless Mr. Craig has made certain concessions to the existing stage conventions, and has avoided anything which might reasonably be regarded as eccentricity. But he keeps his distinctive note; and, whatever else may be thought of the play, it at least lingers in the memory as a succession of well composed and richly coloured pictures, which one was able to absorb without the perpetual irritation caused by the imperfect feeling for illusion ineradicable from the minds of the ordinary scene painter and the ordinary stage carpenter. The most effective scene was, perhaps, that of the banquet with its setting of simply draped and splendidly hued curtains: and the most interesting that by morning in Gunnar's house; because here Mr. Craig is grappling with the problem of daylight, which I suggested in a previous paper as one likely to tax his system of top-lighting. On the whole I think the system came well enough out of the ordeal. Neither a stage lit from the top nor one lit from the foot can ever be more than a far-off and symbolic representation of actual daylight. Whichever convention is adopted, one has to subdue one's imagination to it. And Mr. Craig does succeed in so manipulating his lighting as to produce a relative effect of luminosity in his day scenes in comparison with his night scenes, which perhaps is all that could reasonably be expected.]

The Viking business, with its gleaming armour and its semi-barbaric raiment, affords excellent material for Mr. Craig's really fine sense of the effective in costume to work upon. Apart from this I must own to some disappointment with the play, as a play. Of course, one did not expect typical Ibsen. "The Vikings at Helgeland" belongs to the period when the playwright had not yet felt his way to what ultimately became his true and characteristic method of expression, and was still touched by his younger enthusiasm for the blue rose of romance. But, even as romance, I fail to find it very effective or striking. The theme is an adaptation, in a pseudo-historical setting and with the mythical element left out, of that of the "Völsungasaga." This is, or should be, familiar to English readers in the magnificent verse of Morris's "Story of Sigurd the Volsung." Sigurd the Volsung is the brother in arms of Gunnar the Niblung, and has wedded his sister Gudrun. Gunnar is to ride the Flickering Flame and win the hand of Brynhild. But he fails in the task, and it is by Sigurd, magically vested in Gunnar's semblance, that it is accomplished. And the deed was the spring of woes:—

A flame of bitter trouble, and the death of many a man,
And the quenching of the kindreds, and the blood of the broken troth,

And the Grievous need of the Niblungs and the Sorrow of Odin the Goth.

Brynhild is married to Gunnar whom she believes to have achieved her. But Sigurd has revealed the secret to Gudrun, and Gudrun, in a moment of anger, reveals it to Brynhild. And Brynhild, deeming herself wronged, moves the Niblungs to slay Sigurd, and he is slain. And many years after Gudrun in her turn takes vengeance, and the Niblungs are treacherously slain in the hall of Atli. So the great simple tragic story wears to its end in fire and blood.

Ibsen's plot repeats pretty closely the main outlines of the situation in the saga. Sigurd and Gunnar keep their names, although, as I said, they become pseudo-historic Vikings instead of mythical heroes. Brynhild becomes Hiördis, and Gudrun Dagny. The supernatural element goes out of the story, and the achievement of the Flickering Flame gives place to the conquest of a mighty bear, which guards the entrance to the maiden bower of Hiördis, and is slain by Sigurd, who then, passing as Gunnar in the darkness, wins the lady. In many respects the play seems to me inferior to its original. In the first place it is less simple. The central theme is complicated by a second, of which the elements are drawn from other sagas, dealing with another Viking, Örnulf of the Fiords, and the woes of his house. And secondly, the events of the plot are very much better adapted to narrative than to dramatic treatment. There is a lapse of time between the deed and its requital, and a lapse of time cannot be satisfactorily represented on the stage. The action is of violence and blood, and violence and blood again are not plausible in drama. The great passages of the saga, at any rate in Morris's version, are the description of the ride through the Flickering Flame and its sequel, and the description of the death of Sigurd in the house of the Niblungs. The battle with the bear, which corresponds to the first of these, does not come into the play at all. The action begins five years later, and the preceding events are only known to the audience by the frequent and not very skilfully-introduced accounts of them given in the course of the dialogue. The second episode is deliberately altered by Ibsen. Hiördis loves Sigurd and not Gunnar. Instead of merely having him slain for the insult done her, she kills him herself with an arrow, intending to die with him and to ride to Valhalla in his company. But she finds, too late, that Sigurd is an adherent of the Great White Christ, and will not be riding to Valhalla at all. Against the modification of the story, with a view to the dramatic contrast of the heathen and Christian ideals, I have nothing to say, except that if Ibsen desired to make this point, it would have been more natural to make it earlier. There is no hint whatever of Christianity before the last ten minutes of the play. Dramatically, I think the closing scene is the most effective of all. What I do not quite understand is the degradation to which the character of the heroine is subjected. Brynhild is a magnificent poetic conception. Hiördis, as interpreted by Miss Terry, and, I think, also as conceived by Ibsen, is hopelessly unsympathetic. In fact, she is neither more nor less than a shrew. I do not quite know what object Ibsen had in this, or wherein it finds its dramatic justification. It makes the play very unpleasant.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

"For Their Own Pleasure."

THE words printed above are a quotation from the catalogue of the Rowland Club—a club composed of men interested in the arts, which is now holding an exhibition in the hall of Clifford's Inn. Six of the artist members of the club, Messrs. Brangwyn, Holroyd, Selwyn Image, Stirling Lee, Mackmurdo, and Short are showing specimens of their work, done mainly "for their own pleasure," and so arranged in this old Hall that the visitor feels neither lassitude nor satiety. This is a move in the right direction—the thing done for its own sake from a genuine impulse.

Here you may see Mr. Frank Brangwyn as an etcher. His work with the needle, like his work in painting, is bold and broad; in his "Assisi" and "A Road in Picardy" the blacks are massed, and contrasted with the spaces of white, with the same large comprehension of colour that distinguishes his work in oils. Oils, too, he shows, notably a large picture of "Leeks," and another of "Mushrooms," very decorative and imposing. Mr. Frank Short, laying aside his etching needle for a time, offers to the small householder a series of delicate water-colours, notes, touched lightly with faint but not weak colour. His "Sands of Dee" may be slight, but it has space and air. Mr. Charles Holroyd is something of a surprise. At the Painter Etchers' exhibition his work was singled out in this journal for special consideration; last week his book on Michael Angelo was the theme of my discourse; at Clifford's Inn his many exhibits in water-colour and etching add considerably to the distinction of the exhibition. The composition of his "Sack and Faggots" is more than ingenious; in a space so small that a sheet of foolscap would cover it, he has contrived a real picture, a bitter pastoral of the soil. Crowning the upland is a copse against a flying sky, and climbing upwards from below, their old bodies bent under their burdens, an old tanned peasant man and woman ascend painfully and patiently. In another manner is his "Young Triton," a fantasy of mermaids sporting in a roaring sea, their tails and bodies intertwined, the topmost of them bearing aloft the trumpeter of Neptune. Mr. Mackmurdo shows cabinets, a treasure case, and articles of furniture in mahogany, praiseworthy simple in design and of excellent workmanship. When so much modern furniture is decorated mainly to catch the roving eye, it was an agreeable discovery to find that the inside walls of one of his cabinets was decorated, as if the dark interior would always be visible. If called upon to state which of the exhibits gave me the most pleasure, I should name Mr. Stirling Lee's "Marble Head." Carved, I believe, direct from the block, this head of a girl is tenderly alive. The lips are parted, abundant hair folds the smooth brow; the sightless eyes look out reflectively upon the world with an expression that belies their sightlessness. The art of sculpture has made strides in this country during the last generation, mainly through the example of M. Rodin and Mr. Alfred Gilbert, but to many householders sculpture is still the statuary of the mason's yard. Let those who are not yet convinced of its appropriateness for room decoration stroll into Clifford's Inn Hall, and glance at this beautiful head of Mr. Stirling Lee's carved from an ancient piece of Lychnitis marble that holds and reflects the light. It is very youth, tentative and unspoiled, the marble so old, the head eternally young. Assuredly a thing the artist chiselled for his own pleasure.

A small, well-arranged exhibition like this is heartening. I carried away with me distinct impressions of a few artistic personalities, of a few attractive art objects. They did not jostle one another on the walls as I knew would be the case at the summer show of the Old Water Colour Society in Pall Mall. The one hundred and thirty-second exhibition of this venerable Society is infused with new blood; and it contains several drawings that one feels were inspired by no other motive than the pleasure of production. Academic drawings, scenes niggled and laboriously finished, representations of plums and primroses à la Hunt still linger on the walls, but there is also a sensible leaven of newer, individual work. I found the drawings of Mr. James Paterson particularly interesting.

The Society has not yet adopted the system of grouping an artist's contributions together, but there was no mistaking Mr. Paterson's style after his first contribution had been examined. Thrice I found him, and each time it was a gratification to the eye. To some the small swift splashes of colour that stand for figures in his view of "The Anagas, Santa Cruz," might seem too impressionistic, but how well they compose in the pattern of his blue impression of this sunny, sultry corner of the world. Who would have prophesied a few years ago that such a brilliant example of impressionism would be shown on the walls of the Old Water Colour Society? In a different manner is his "Gale Brewing, Orotava," a study of crested waves and spray, white dashing against blue, really moving, and showing that Mr. Paterson has earned the right to work as an impressionist by virtue of having taught himself how to draw. His third drawing, "The Tower, La Laguna," is skied, but its frank simplicity loses nothing from being placed so high above the line.

Mr. Edmund J. Sullivan is another artist whose work one would have expected to see at the New English Art Club rather than here. He is an exceptionally clever draughtsman, fertile in design and decoration, but he has not yet shown that he is a colourist. Indeed, I would go further, and suggest that his proper medium is the outline drawing. Clever as his six studies at this exhibition are, they have not the power and grip of his book illustrations. His figures, especially in "My Lady in Treble," a prankishly ingenious study of reflections, and "The Nuns of Theleme," are well drawn and well posed, but there is a forbidding muddiness about the colour. It would almost seem as if his interest in form is so keen, that he can allow himself to be careless about the colour quality of his textures; careless, too, in not hiding all the traces of his labour. The woman in "A Book of Verses" has a splash of paint on the side of her nose that amounts to a disfigurement. Mr. Arthur Rackham shows a distinct vein of originality in his romantic drawings and illustrations of fairy tales. Other drawings which might be included in the "for their own pleasure" category are Miss Swan's "Dawn, Mürren," Mrs. Stanhope Forbes's "Ragged Robbins," Mrs. Allingham's "Purple Moonlight, Venice," and Mr. J. M. Swan's scholarly and picturesque study of "Tigers in Jungle."

Mr. Roger Fry certainly paints for his own pleasure, but under rigorous rules fixed for himself by himself. He is an upholder of the classical tradition, a willing disciple of the older masters; in some of his water-colours, not the most attractive, he is cousin-german to Girtin. He is also a learned writer on art, a student of the history of painting, calm, competent, severe when necessary, without, I am sure, the least temptation towards impressionistic writing. His style has not the colour or the literary flavour of Mr. MacColl's, but he has something to say, and I, for one, would always buy a journal containing an article from his pen. As a painter he is sparing in the use of the figure; architecture and landscape are his especial themes; among his thirty-five water-colours now being shown at Messrs. Carfax's galleries there is not one that has not been well-considered, studied, and expressed in the best way at his command. Mr. Fry is not a Brangwyn or a Paterson, and probably does not wish to be. His oil pictures are built on classical lines, and do not make any vast appeal to me; but then I am not an ardent admirer of Poussin. That master does not "intrigue" me, as Mr. Harland would say. But some of Mr. Fry's water-colours are quite charming, say the "Verona" bathed in the delicate decay of age, the "Mole," with its tawny light, cut trees, and reflections, and the "St. George and the Dragon." This delighted me, so gaily classical is the rendering of the legend, so well placed are the figures of the Saint, the praying monk, and the sprawling dragon in the little landscape. It would look well on a wall against Mr. Holroyd's "Sack and Faggots," and in the corner of the room I would place Mr. Stirling Lee's young marble head, all done "for their own pleasure," and giving pleasure.

C. L. H.

Science.

Cricket.

ASSIDUOUSLY buttoning his left glove, the batsman wends his way to his wicket, widened or otherwise. His intentness and his difficulty in that adjustment may be correlated with the presence of more or less "funk." Now "funk" is an actual psychological entity. One may define it as the effect of the emotion of fear upon the neuro-muscular centres, the nerve-cells that control muscular action. To the cricketer this is anathema, to the singer a fearful joy. It has no value for the batsman; it is an aesthetic force for the vocalist. Mr. Edward Lloyd has admitted that he never sings so well as when he is slightly nervous, which is to say that this activity of the emotional centres lends tears or laughter to the voice. But the batsman dreads "funk," for his skill is only incidentally aesthetic. If you take the trouble, as I once did, of observing the frequency with which a batsman makes nothing in both innings—achieves the "pair of spectacles"—you will find that the ratio exceeds that which could be accounted for by chance. The obvious explanation is that the batsman who failed to score in the first innings is all the more likely to repeat his distressing feat in the second, since that nice muscular co-ordination upon which depends his success is unbalanced by the memory of his previous failure and the apprehension of its repetition.

But whether or not he be hampered by this "moral fear," the batsman has next to come to terms with what we know as physical fear. For when he faces the bowler he may remember that a cricket ball is an object of considerable mass—its weight on this planet being five and three-quarter ounces—and possessed, on its course towards him, of no inconsiderable velocity. The crack Australian bowler, Turner, was tested at Woolwich Arsenal many years ago, and was shown to bowl at sixty-six miles per hour. Now the mass multiplied by the velocity gives the momentum— $mv = M$ —and M is an exceedingly palpable force if the wicket be bumpy and the ball impinge upon your thigh or eyebrow. The tyro acts in accordance with the instinct of self-preservation, the first law of protoplasm; he therefore steps backwards, away from the line of the ball's flight—"runs away from his wicket"—and is inevitably bowled. The first essential of batting (and it applies equally to the bowler who has to stop a hard return or the fielder who must get in the way of the ball and, lest his hands should fail, must "keep his legs together") is therefore to defy the natural impulse. So difficult is this that some coaches will fasten the beginner's right foot to the ground so that he cannot budge though he would. And the process by which the batsman "stands up to the bowling"; by which you forbear to return a blow or to fling back an angry taunt; by which we exercise self-control and self-restraint; and by which, rather than by speech or reason, we are distinguished from the brute creation, is known as inhibition. It is at once the antithesis of volition and its highest expression.

The new science of psychology is, in this year of grace, by far and away the most interesting subject of human thought. The Greeks studied mind rather than matter, but to-day our study of matter has led us to the fact that the grey surface of the human brain—the cortex cerebri—is, for the denizens of our planet at any rate, the most wonderful thing in the universe. It has been a long climax from the beginning of our nebula. Evolution is in climax yet, but its acme, for us, is the soft grey nervous protoplasm by the subtle chemical changes in your share of which you are at this moment conceiving the import of these words. And the most truly admirable of the functions of the cortex is this of inhibition. Can we analyse, then, this faculty by which the batsman stands his ground?

We must first consider what it is that he must inhibit. It must be recognised that the essence of all movement, whether in animals or plants, is reflex action. This simply means a movement in response to any external force. The amoeba moves towards a particle of food that has favourably influenced its sense of smell (as we may figure it), or away from an undesirable particle that has disagreeably affected it. Each movement is a simple reflex action. Volition, as we conceive it, is not involved. Now take the sixth eleven schoolboy facing the professional at the practice-nets. His sense of sight informs him of the rapid advent of an undesirable particle; he is disagreeably affected by the sensation; he voluntarily gets out of the way, and is bowled, or deserves to be. But, after all, there is not much volition in the matter. It is barely more than a simple reflex, as in the case of the amoeba. The boy will be a man, and the miff a batsman, when he attains to inhibition of his reflex actions.

The vision of the ball takes place in the hindmost part of the brain. Thence nerve fibres pass to the centres for muscular movement. These are most precisely defined. They lie at the sides of the brain in the "Rolandic area." As a result impulses are sent downwards to subordinate cells in the spinal cord from which fresh impulses pass to the muscles of the right leg, which is withdrawn; and the pusillanimous batsman's leg stump is knocked out of the ground. The volitional centres, which have not yet been localised, are only slightly concerned in this process, as I have shown. But the trained batsman inhibits the performance of this all but reflex action. I suppose Grace has not run away from a ball for thirty years. His inhibitory centres have gained complete control of the quasi-reflex arc. Where the inhibitory centres are, no one has any idea; but nerve-fibres must pass from them to the cells of the Rolandic area and arrest or modify their motor activity. I am conscious of having done much injustice to this wonderful faculty, but I am at present trying to work out a theory of the actual relation between volition and inhibition—between easy acquiescence and "the power to say 'no'"—which I hope to formulate some day upon this page.

Of course, inhibition comes in again a thousand times in batting. If you have the bad habit of counting your runs and know that they number ninety-nine, you must inhibit the almost irresistible impulse to smite wildly at the next ball that comes and thereby complete—or lose—your century. (And this reminds me that the tyro is often a "blind smiter." He shuts his eyes and then lets fly. Shutting the eyes is, of course, an obvious reflex, based upon the need for protection of such delicate organs. This reflex of winking is the most rapid known.) Then again, if you are a "stone-waller," accustomed to bat for an hour without making ten runs, and your side needs fifty runs to win with only twenty minutes to make them in, you must inhibit the long-cultivated reflex—the "habit"—of carefully "blocking" every "half-volley," and must exercise a subtle form of self-control in deliberately conquering yourself and adopting the forcing tactics of a Jessop.

And now what is it that puts batting as a feat of muscular co-ordination far above golf or even billiards? It is the fact that the batsman addresses a moving object. He has to "time" the ball; and, assuming that he has acquired inhibition, he is a good batsman almost in proportion to this power of "timing." The ball has twenty-one yards to travel from the bowler's arm to your bat. With fast bowling I reckon that its whole journey occupies about three-fifths of a second. To get the best result, from your point of view, your bat must meet the ball at one particular moment near the end of this short period. It is as delicate a nervous feat as I know. Your two eyes must work exactly together, else you will receive two images of the ball, which would be fatal. To this end each eyeball must be moved by the co-ordinated action of no less than six muscles. The twelve are controlled from one centre in the brain, which not only enables the images in each eye to correspond with one another—so that you may see but one ball at the back of your head—but also enables those images to be formed on the "yellow spot," the most sensitive part of your retina—so that the resultant single image may be well defined. Here another sense is called in; one of the many unknown to those who prattle of a "sixth sense." It is called the muscular sense, and gives you a consciousness of where the muscles concerned precisely are, for of course a muscle alters its exact position in space when, and in proportion as, it contracts. The twelve ocular muscles combine to form a stimulus of this muscular sense. This informs you to what degree, and in what direction the eyeballs have been moved in following the ball's flight. The muscular sensation is combined and co-ordinated with the visual impression, the two together actually defining for you the precise position of the ball in space. This fact determined, the volition sets a-going the motor centres in the Rolandic area. They command the spinal cord cells, which transmit the mandate to the cells of the many muscles of the back and shoulders, and arms and legs, which instantly burn the sugar stored within them, and transform its potential into kinetic energy by which they contract and propel the "right spot" of the bat to the exact part of space where the flying ball was previously determined to be—and the batsman scores a boundary, or is caught in the long field; the difference between the two being mainly determined by the nicety of his inhibition over his left shoulder-cap or deltoid muscle. And this feat, of which, if we try to conceive its chemistry, this is obviously only a ludicrously inadequate summary, is accomplished in about the time that you take to the inconceivably more wonderful feat of attaching ideas to the black marks that cover this paper.

C. W. SALEBY.

Correspondence.

Shakespeare, Bacon, and Dr. Murray.

SIR,—In your article "Diversions in O," it is stated that Dr. Murray notes in the "New English Dictionary" that "'out'-verbs . . . were much favoured by Shakespeare, but were almost eschewed by Bacon. . . . In Bacon only two have been found"—one of these being "outshoot," which he maintains had been in common use for seventy years. According to Dr. Murray's own statement, "out"-verbs were "eschewed," not "almost eschewed," by Bacon, and that "while Shakespeare uses fifty-four of these verbs . . . we cite Bacon only for two." "Dr. Murray," as you say, "throws a pebble in the troubled Shakespeare-Bacon pool." It is only a "pebble," and won't make a big splash in the water.

Now "using" or "finding" a word is one thing and "citing" its use is another. In the "New English Dictionary" I have found that invariably for the historical use of a word—even of common words like "change" and "changed"—Dr. Murray adopts Shakespeare in preference to any other author, even when a better and earlier or a contemporaneous use could be "cited" from Bacon. In fact

Dr. Murray "eschews" Bacon, confining his attention to the "Advancement of Learning," "Essays," "Henry VII.," and "Sylva Sylvarum."

For example, to give an historical use of the verb "to countenance," Dr. Murray "cites" Shakespeare in "2 Henry IV." (1597) with the words "to countenance William Visor of Wincot." Now this is a favourite word with Bacon, and a prior and equally good reference, I contend, might have been made to a letter written by Bacon to the Queen in 1593: "Your Majesty has been gracious to me both in countenancing me" (Spedding's "Letters and Life," I., 240.)

Then, again, with the word "impediment," often used by Bacon, Dr. Murray's reference is, of course, to Shakespeare, "Richard III." (1594), although in 1593 Bacon uses the word in a letter to Cecil. (Spedding, I., 237.)

Another pet word with Bacon, used frequently in his "Works and Letters," and only four times by Shakespeare, is "advertisement." For this word Dr. Murray "cites" Shakespeare's "Much Ado About Nothing" (produced (?) 1599, published 1600), although Bacon employs the word in a letter to Essex in 1593. Then there is the word "disloyalty," used twice by Shakespeare and many times by Bacon. For his historical use Dr. Murray "cites" Shakespeare's "Much Ado" (1599-1600), and fails to "cite" the use of the word by Bacon in his "Advice to Essex" in March, 1599. Frequently in connection with Essex's rebellion, we find Bacon using the verb "barricado" in 1601, but in the same year Shakespeare uses the word in "All's Well," and this use is credited to him as being the first use in English literature. Then there is the word "fumble," which Shakespeare uses four times, and is "cited" by Dr. Murray for three different uses. Bacon uses the word in his "History of Life and Death," but Bacon is not "cited." Shakespeare uses "blab" three times, and is "cited" twice by Dr. Murray. Bacon uses the word in the same sense more than once in his "Letters" (Spedding, VI., 114), but is not "cited." The Dictionary gives no use of the word "brigue" between 1496 and 1678, but Bacon uses it in 1613 (Spedding, IV., 372). And so also with words like "coagulation," "bates," "counterfeit," "commodities," to "gravel," "goods and chattels," "curds," &c.—Shakespeare is "cited" for their use, not Bacon. I think, therefore, I have made it clear that the non-citation of a word in Bacon does not prove the non-usage of that word by Bacon.

But in many cases I have found Dr. Murray refusing Bacon credit for the first use of a word. One of these is "barricado," already instanced. Another is the noun "buzz," defined by Dr. Murray as (1) "A condition of busy activity, stir, ferment," or (2) "A busy rumour." In the former sense, Dr. Murray's example of the first use is taken from Feltham's "Resolves" (1627), and in the latter sense from Shakespeare's "King Lear" (1605). But the word is frequently used by Bacon in his "Letters," as early as 1601, where we read "to make the more buzz of the danger he stood in." (Spedding, II. 268, and also V. 40 and 43). The first use of "affrontedly" is given as 1656, although Bacon writes in 1616 "most affrontedly." (Spedding, V., 363.)

But, strangest of all, when Bacon is generously accorded and "cited" for the first use of a word, I can find instances of a prior use of the word by Bacon himself, anterior in date to that given in the Dictionary. For instance, the first use of the expression "In competition with" given in the Dictionary is ascribed to Bacon in the "Advancement of Learning" (1605), but in a letter of Bacon's to Sir Thomas Egerton, dated 1597, (Spedding II., 63), he writes: "I see no man ripened for the place of Master of the Rolls in competition with Mr. Attorney-General." And again, the first use of the word "concurrency" (common with Bacon) is also attributed to the "Advancement of Learning" (1605), although in 1597 Bacon said, in a "Speech on the Subsidy": "So this concurrence of occurrences. . . ." (Spedding, II., 88.)

My contention is that Bacon has not received the same attention as Shakespeare at the hands of Dr. Murray, possibly because there is a Shakespeare "Concordance," which can be more readily consulted than the fourteen volumes of Spedding's "Works" and "Letters" of Bacon for any use of a word, of which works there is no similar "Concordance," although I am glad to know that Mrs. Pott has been for long engaged on what will prove a very useful and interesting volume. From the "Works" of Bacon, we are supplied with the first uses of words in the language, such as "application" (in the sense of "self-adaptation,"), "adventive" (used twice in English literature, and both times by Bacon), "allusive," "axiom" (meaning "empirical law"), and "athletic" ("art of activity"). But there are first uses of words in the "Letters" which are not "cited" in the Dictionary. Why? Because the "Letters" were never consulted for such a use. Here is a specimen. The first use of "aggregative," is ascribed by Dr. Murray to Jessop, who uses the word as an adjective, in 1644, but if he turns to Spedding, IV., 54, he will find the word "aggregative" used by Bacon in 1608 as a noun—"3 pilles of aggregative." Dr. Murray "cites" no use of the word as a noun although he has a "quasi substantive" equivalent to "aggregate." Here is a new noun actually coined by Bacon, and not "cited" in the Dictionary. Had it been found in the Shakespeare "Concordance" it would have been "cited" right enough, I have not the smallest doubt.

The "Letters" have never, to my knowledge, been "cited" in the Dictionary, and in these, "out-" verbs (in addition to "outshoot") and "out-" words are to be found, unknown to Dr. Murray. Take the verb "outface," for example, for the use of which word Shakespeare is "cited" by Dr. Murray—twice for the same meaning of the word—"2 Henry VI." (1593), "Merchant of Venice" (1596), "1 Henry IV." (1596), and "King Lear" (1605). Even Nathaniel Bacon is "cited," 1649; but Francis Bacon in 1601 (Spedding, II., 225) writes: "Outface it with impudency." Of course he is not "cited" for the use of this "out-" verb. The necessity of "citing" Shakespeare twice, in 1593 and 1596, for the use of a word with a similar signification, is not very apparent. Would the use of the word by Bacon in 1601, instead of the second example from Shakespeare in 1596 (only three years after the first), not have been an improvement in a "historical" Dictionary? Then, the "out-" verb "outlawed" is only used once by Shakespeare, but is common in Bacon ("Works," Vol. VII., and "Henry VII." passim). In the next Division of the Dictionary—the new section of which only goes the length of "Outing"—I expect to find Shakespeare, not Bacon, "cited" for the use of "outlawed." And so with "outstrip" (used thrice by Shakespeare) and at least twice by Bacon ("Nov. Org." II., 48; "Letters," IV., 100). Will Bacon be "cited" for "outstrip"? Then there is "outcast" used thrice by Shakespeare, and "cited," of course, by Dr. Murray, from the "Sonnets" (ascribed to 1600, but first published in 1609). Dr. Murray could not get an historical use of this "out-" verb "outcast" between 1600 and Southey's use of the word in 1795, but we have two intermediate uses of it by Bacon in 1612 (Spedding, IV., 268) and in 1623 (Spedding, VII., 549). Then we have an "outweigh" in the "De Aug." VII., 1, an "out-run" in the "Nov. Org." I., 36, and numberless nouns and adjectives compounded with "out," one of them "outlet" ("Essay," XV.) not to be found in Shakespeare! Among these words are "outline," "outrage," "outset," "outworks," &c.

It seems to me, it may not to Dr. Murray, an extraordinary circumstance that more first uses and only uses of certain words in the English language can be drawn from the writings of Shakespeare and Bacon, two men who lived contemporaneously with each other, were not acquainted with each other (we are informed), and never referred to each other, than from any other dozen other authors combined. Take the word "barricado," the first use of which is, as I have said, by Bacon and Shakespeare in the very same year, 1601, and the word "dexteriously" used for the first time in "Twelfth Night" (1601) (first printed in 1623), used by Bacon in the "Adv. of Learning" (written 1603, printed 1605), and not used again till 1635—a curious history. If Shakespeare invented the word, Bacon must have borrowed it from "Twelfth Night," or from the stage MS. version or performance, as he had no printed copy available till 1623.

Recently Judge Willis maintained: "I do not believe that either the author of the Folio, 1623, or Lord Bacon, added a new word to the English tongue, or used for the first time an old word with a new meaning." Why, we have hundreds of such additions and first uses in Shakespeare and Bacon—newly coined words and new meanings being used by the two writers, or one or other of them, and used by no others, practically at the same time.

Who was the more likely etymologist? I would ask Dr. Murray—for it is a question of etymology—whether Emerson's "man of Stratford," who left school at the age of thirteen or fourteen and at once became a butcher's apprentice, whose father and mother could not write, and who left his "bookless" native town without an education, in English (as English, except the A.B.C. per the horn-book, formed no part of any Grammar School curriculum in the days of Elizabeth), but with a vocabulary, according to Max Müller and Stopford Brooke, of 15,000 pure English words, many of them used for the first time according to Dr. Murray—a vocabulary twice as large as the scholarly Milton's; or the great philosopher and English scholar, carefully educated, whose father was Lord-keeper and whose mother was governess to Edward VI., and spoke and wrote English, Latin, Greek, Italian and French "as her native tongue," the man who had left Cambridge, while at the age of 15, as there was nothing more they could teach him, the genius who in his youth declared "I have taken all knowledge to be my province"? (Spedding, I., 108.)

This is apart from the subject; but in conclusion I would suggest that, although the "New English Dictionary" is far advanced, it would be to its advantage, for citations of the first and other uses of English words in the forthcoming sections, if Dr. Murray would set his readers upon Spedding's "Letters and Life of Bacon."—Yours, &c.,

Edinburgh.

GEORGE STRONACH.

Parry v. Moring and Another.

SIR,—As you have quoted with approval Mr. Parry's chaffing letter which contains several misstatements of facts, may I set these right. Mr. Parry, after admitting that his book is a "rotter," asks: 1. "Why appropriate it?" I answer, Mr. Gollancz hasn't appropriated it. 2. "Why not do a better?" Mr. G. has done a better, has given us for the first time an honest text of the book, printing the 130 lines which Mr. Parry deliberately and needlessly left out, and correcting over 600 of his mistakes. 3. "Why crib its text and its arrangement and some of its worst notes?" Mr. G. hasn't crib'd its text, but has turned it into a genuine one: he hasn't crib'd its arrangement, but has independently worked that out for himself; he hasn't crib'd its worst notes, but has accidentally made two of the same blunders Mr. Parry made. 4. "Why not take your coat off, and do the work for yourself?" This is exactly what Mr. G. has done. Why, he gave a week's work to explain one difficult word which floored Mr. Parry. Mr. P. says: "I did several months' honest work at my edition": so did Mr. Gollancz at his: he has been off and on at it for years, as an old admirer of Dorothy Osborne. In fairness to Mr. G. I hope you'll print this answer.—Yours, &c.,

F. J. FURNIVALL.

"The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman."

SIR,—"Bookworm's" note on the above delightful little book falls so far short of satisfaction, that it does not mention the fact that there is good evidence for supposing that Thackeray's hand is to be found, not only in the ballad itself, but in the even more delightful prose notes appended to it.

Indeed, I am of opinion that Dickens wrote the introduction only, and that Mr. Kitton has no right to include the Ballad amongst the "Inimitable's" Plays and Poems.

In the first edition will be found the misspelt "soubriquet" for "sobriquet," of which certainly Thackeray would not have been guilty.—Yours, &c.,

G. S. L.

A Correction.

SIR,—I must thank a correspondent for pointing out to me a stupid error of calculation on my part in my article, "The Inner Limit of Vision." In speaking of what I have called the "gap" rays, which may be postulated to intervene between ordinary light and the Röntgen rays, I referred to an interval of "hundreds of octaves." Probably I should have said "dozens"—which also may be incorrect; but the wave-length of the Röntgen rays has only been guessed. Our foremost English authority—Lord Rayleigh—spoke to me the other day of "hundreds," as a shot at the ratio between the speeds, and that is all we can say at present.

I may take this opportunity of adding that the essential identity of the Röntgen rays with sunlight is further shown by the fact that the rays do effect a very faint illumination of the retina. That is to say, though their form cannot be traced, they can be faintly seen.—Yours, &c.,

C. W. SALEEBY.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 187 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best letter describing an incident which occurred during the Easter Holidays. Twenty-seven replies have been received. We award the prize to Mr. J. C. Segrue, Thrale Hall, Streatham, S.W., for the following:—

We were at Brussels and it was Maunday Thursday. A glorious evening following an equally glorious day had tempted us to take a promenade along the Boulevards. The streets were crowded, people of all nationalities were coming to and fro, some on pleasure bent, others like ourselves enjoying an evening stroll. Wandering aimlessly on, we found ourselves opposite the Café Victoria; here the crowd was especially dense, long queues forming up outside the doors. Our curiosity being aroused, we entered; a curious sight met our eyes, for in the large salle seated at the numerous little tables were men and women of almost every class and condition of life. What did it all mean? Surely no ordinary programme (it was a café chantant) could bring together so strange and curious an audience: We were right. M. M——, the famous Belgian dramatist and author, had promised to recite his new and thrilling poem "La Belgique heureuse," which will in future take the place of the present Belgian "National Anthem." Leaning on a staff draped in the Belgian colours, he commenced his recitation; in measured tones, he told the story of their race; its birth, its infancy, its sorrows and its joys. Back to the herds of ancient Flanders he carried us, and as he spoke tears came to his eyes, whilst his audience cheered and cheered. . . . We left the café—it was raining—the streets were deserted—from the Belgium of yesterday we had passed to the Belgium of to-day.

Other replies follow :—

I joined my militia regiment on Sunday last, and have been doing real soldier's work all this week, protecting railway property from the strikers. Last night I stood sentry on the "Holfweg" bridge. Just after sunrise a group of men came towards the railway dyke about fifty yards from where I stood; they started walking on the line in the direction of Amsterdam, and away from me. Of course, the moment they did so, I challenged them. They paid no attention; I challenged again—and a third time. Then I fired in the air. Upon this one of them looked round and shouted something, which I did not hear. They kept walking on the line, however, and I had no choice then but to fire at them. I aimed low at the man who had shouted, hoping to disable without seriously wounding him; but I was nervous, and in the act of pulling the trigger I felt that it was a bad shot. The man collapsed on the spot as if his legs had been mowed away from under him! He was killed outright! It was a sickening sight, and I fear that the memory of it will haunt me all my life. And after all it turned out that the men were not strikers. They had passes, but did not know they had to show them! Surely some one has blundered. I am under arrest pending inquiry.

[K. B., Amsterdam.]

You ask what memorable incident has Easter brought to any of us? To me certainly one thing, the thought of a strange expression passing over the face of a peasant woman. She let us into her cottage for shelter from a thin rain that came sweeping across the Welsh mountains, a tall, reserved woman, haggard of face, with hair growing grey, and asked us to sit down in the inner room, a bedroom, as the other she was then washing up. It was so dark within that I did not noticed a child lying asleep on the bed, till it stirred and began to cough. My sister said it was hooping-cough. "Let's go then," I cried dismayed; "I don't want that in my holidays." My voice, raised unconsciously, caught the woman's attention perhaps, for she came in quickly, and going to the bedside, looked down at the child; looked and said nothing. But then the singular expression I have mentioned came over her face. Pity and maternal love? Yes, these, but something more. Here, for a moment, was a wise shining-faced one, full of an infinite and delicate apprehension of far-off things. Only twice before, at long intervals, have I seen that strange look; once it was a young girl with her lover (oh, the force of it as it swept over her face); once a monk. All three were very silent. Something undiscoverable to us others they had doubtless found, each of them, but they kept their secret.

[F. H., Penarth.]

I was leaning from my open window on the evening of Easter Monday. Presently three girls came swinging along the road arm in arm, talking shrilly. My ear distinguished repeatedly "e sez to me, 'e sez," and in triumphant accents, "I sez to 'im—!" Just opposite to my window they pulled up abruptly. "Ere, where's my cowslips?" cried a voice in consternation. One of the figures detached herself and began shaking her clothes, exclaiming in tones of grief (she had the most piercing voice I had ever heard) "An' I picked 'em for mother an' all, to give 'er a smell of the country!" Presently her companions became impatient. "Come along, Annie," they urged; "they'll think we're lost!" "You can just shut up!" returned Annie, hotly, "I'm going back to look for mother's cowslips." They banded rapid speech, Annie's shrill retorts coming bitterly from an increasing distance. Suddenly the other two made a rush for her and, each seizing an arm, started to hustle her down the road. She was small and ineffective, but her extraordinary voice divided the night with florid vocables. Suddenly one of the captors gave a shriek of discovery. "Wy 'ere they are, silly, stuck inside your blouse with your 'ankey!" "That's a mercy, anyway!" came in relieved tones, and then, "Well, an' so I sez to 'im—!" The voices died away and I tried to remember whether cowslips appeared so early in Spring. I decided at last that they may have meant primroses.

[E. K. L., Birkenhead.]

Competition No. 188 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best criticism of any book, new or old, which our competitors may have read this year. Replies not to exceed 300 words.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 29 April, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Clifford (Rev. Cornelius), Introlbo(Cathedral Library Association) $1.50
Wellson (Rt. Rev. J. E. O.), Youth and Duty(Religious Tract Society) 3/6
McCabe (Joseph), Church Discipline(Duckworth) net 3/0
Carpenter (J. Estlin) and Wicksteed (P. H.), Studies in Theology(Dent) net 5/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Cleather (Alice Leighton) and Crump (Basil), The Ring of the Nibelung: An Interpretation(Methuen) 2/6
Wreaths of Song from a Course of Divinity.....(Gill) net 2/0
Middleton (J. A.), Love Songs and Little Lyrics(Limpus) net 2/0
Thomsett (Richard Gillham), Thoughts in Verse(Partridge) 1/0
Platt (Agnes), The Stage in 1902(Richards) net 1/0
Boynton (H. W.), The Golfer's Rubāiyāt(") net 3-6
Tadema (Laurence Alma), Songs of Womanhood(") net 3/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Buckley (Charles Burton), An Anecdotal History of Old Times in Singapore . 2 vols.....(Fraser and Neave, Singapore)
Bryce (James), Studies in Contemporary Biography(Macmillan) net 10/6
Woodburn (James Albert), Political Parties and Party Problems in the United States(Putnam's) 9/0
Pike (G. Holden), Wesley and His Preachers(Unwin) 7/6
Rushton (William Lowes), selected and arranged by, Letters of a Templar, 1820-1850(Simpkin)
Mee (Arthur), edited by, England's Mission by England's Statesmen(Richards) 6/0
A Report of the Facts of the Copyright Action brought by Edward Abbott Parry against Alexander Moring and Israel Gollancz.....(Sherratt and Hughes) net 0/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Livingston (Burton Edward), The Role of Diffusion and Osmotic Pressure in Plants(University of Chicago Press)
Dopp (Katharine Elizabeth), The Place of Industries in Elementary Education(University of Chicago Press)
Bain (Alexander), Dissertations on Leading Philosophical Topics(Longmans) net 7/6
Gore (J. Ellard), The Stellar Heavens(Chatto and Windus)

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Shoemaker (Michael Myers), The Great Siberian Railway(Putnam's) net 9/0
Beant (Sir Walter) and Mitton (G. E.), The Fascination of London: Holborn and Bloomsbury(Black) net 1/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Macrae (Rev. Alexander), Principles of English Grammar(Relfe) 1/4
Wyatt (G. H.), Preliminary Geometry(") 1/4
Blouet (H.), How to Read French(") 0/9
Carter (George), Extract from Outlines of English History(") 0/9
Slade (William), Preliminary Tests in Geometry. Parts I. and II.(") 0/6
Thornton (J. and F. O.), The Junior Book-keeping Examiner, 1903(Macmillan) 0/6
" " Key to the Junior Book-keeping Examiner, 1903(Macmillan) 3/6
Mukerji (Chintamani), Elementary Geometry(Indian Press)

MISCELLANEOUS.

The Royal University of Ireland Examination Papers, 1902.....(The University)
Catalogue of Additions to the Manuscripts in the British Museum in the Years 1894-1899.....(British Museum)
Paul (Alexander), The Vaccination Problem in 1903(King) 2/6
The Nip.....(Richards) 2/6
Douglas (Elizabeth), The Pudding and Pastry Book(") 2/0
Crosland (T. W. H.) and Monsell (J. R.), The Old Man's Bag(") 1/6
Cambridge à la Poupee by Two 'Varsity Men.....(Galloway) net 1/6
Bendall (Cecil), Catalogue of the Sanskrit Manuscripts in the British Museum(British Museum)

NEW EDITIONS.

Barlow (George), Poetical Works. Vols. V. and VI.(Glazier) each net 5/0
Mulock (Miss), John Halifax, Gentleman(Pearson) 2/0
Hardy (Thomas), A Laodicean(Macmillan) 3/6
Keats (John), Poems(Blackie) net 2/6
Hood (Thomas), Humorous Poems(Macmillan) net 2/0
James (William), Human Immortality(Constable) 2/6
Doyle (A. Conan), Micah Clarke(Newnes) 0/6
Green (John Richard), A Short History of the English People(Macmillan) net 0/6

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle," which Mr. John Lane will publish at the end of this month, will contain upwards of 250 hitherto unpublished letters of Mrs. Carlyle, her unabridged journal, and "her humorous and quaintly candid story of her first love." In the course of his introduction, Sir James Crichton-Browne, we are informed, "brilliantly indicts the late Master of Balliol for his scathing and illogical condemnation of Carlyle."

Mr. Fisher Unwin will shortly publish a work by Dr. Rhys Davids on Buddhist India, in the "Story of the Nations series." It is a first attempt to present Indian history from a point of view independent of that of the Brahmins.

NOW READY NEW LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE.

Annotated by THOMAS CARLYLE and edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, with an introduction by

SIR JAMES CRICHTON-BROWNE,
M.D., LL.D., F.R.S.,

with sixteen illustrations.

Two volumes in box. Demy 8vo.

Price 25/- net.

The Daily News.—"Their publication is an act of elementary justice. With Carlyle's accompanying notes they serve to give us a credible and human picture of the real relationships of Carlyle and his wife. . . . The letters show all the incomparable qualities which gave the 'Letters and Memorials' a supreme place in the literature of intimate correspondence. . . . Every page, whether from the letters or the journal, rekindles with keen thoughts, biting criticisms, flashing phrases, and touches of bright comedy. . . . At last we have a means of forming a true picture of the Carlyles."

The Pall Mall Gazette.—"There is one perfect jewel of literary instinct and execution now given to the world for the first time in the simple story of 'My Own First Love'—an effusion to which the rarest introspections of Charles Lamb himself are the only fit comparison."

The Daily Chronicle.—"But leaving the dust and heat of controversy let us turn with all gratitude to the new series of letters which the editors here give. . . . Mrs. Carlyle has long ranked with Byron, Lam, her husband, and one or two more among the best letter writers in our language."

A new book by HELEN MILMAN. MY KALENDAR OF COUNTRY DELIGHTS.

With 15 Full-page Illustrations by DONALD MAXWELL. Crown 8vo, cloth.

Price 5/- net.

°. A special feature of this book is the remarkable black-and-white work of Mr. Donald Maxwell, who has shown in his admirable drawings how sympathetically he has entered into the author's scheme.

A NEW HUMORIST.

Mr. John Lane will publish on Thursday,
May 7, a new and original story, entitled

"NINE POINTS OF THE LAW,"

by a new writer, Mr. Wilfrid Scarborough Jackson. The publisher claims that his author has written a story of humorous complications which has not been surpassed since 1882.

NINE POINTS OF THE LAW NINE POINTS OF THE LAW

By Wilfrid Scarborough Jackson.

By Wilfrid Scarborough Jackson.

Ready on May 7th.

At all the Libraries and Bookstalls.

Price 6/-

JOHN LANE, LONDON & NEW YORK.

MRS. WARD'S NEW NOVEL, LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

112th THOUSAND.

LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

"Readers have rarely been led with such interest along the course of any novel."

—WILLIAM DEAN HOWELLS

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

SECOND LARGE IMPRESSION.

[With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

NORTH AMERICAN REVIEW.

"In lightness of touch, variety of mood and temperament, and ease of mood, this story marks Mrs.
Ward's highest achievement. In no other novel has she given so many evidences of the possession of the original qualities of the novelist."

ACADEMY.

"Mrs. Ward writes of the things that matter in the inner, individual life, and in no former book, we think, has her touch been surer, or her insight into motive and character more searching and sympathetic."

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH
and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added
as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING
WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue
is now ready.

Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at
GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE
1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects.
A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and
Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL
TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HIS-
TORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY,
SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and
JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 260,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria
Street, E.C., London;

and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday
to 43, Chancery Lane, Terms, &c., on application.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.
CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.
CROWN THEOLOGICAL LIBRARY.

NOW READY. Vol. I. Crown 8vo, with 77 illustrations, cloth, 5s.

AUTHORIZED TRANSLATION OF

BABEL and BIBLE

Being Lectures delivered before Members of the Deutsche Orient-Gesellschaft in the presence of the German Emperor.

By Dr. FRIEDRICH DELITZSCH,
Professor of Assyriology in the University of Berlin.

These are the Lectures which have caused such a sensation in Germany, and which called forth the letters from the German Emperor on the inspiration of the Old Testament.

Among the Volumes that have also been arranged for inclusion in this Library and are in active preparation, the following may be mentioned:—

THE DOGMA OF THE VIRGIN-BIRTH
OF CHRIST. A Christological Study. By Professor P. LOBSTEIN, of Strassburg. Translated from the French with Notes, specially prepared for the English Edition, by the Author.

IM KAMPF UM DIE WELTAN-
SCHAUUNG. A Pastor's Struggles to reconcile
Faith and Reason. By R. WIMMER.

TWO ADDRESSES ON PRESENT-DAY
QUESTIONS: Roman Catholic Morals, Evangelical Faith, and Ritschl's Theology. By Professor W. HERMANN, of Marburg. Author of "The Communion of the Christian with God."

LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM: Its Origin,
Nature, and Mission. By JEAN REVILLE, of Paris.

Also Ready To-day, Stiff Wrapper, Price 6d. net.

Professor Harnack's letter to the "Preussische Jahrbücher" on the German Emperor's Criticism of Professor Delitzsch's Lectures on "BABEL und BIBEL."

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,

14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, London, W.C.;
and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

A. & C. BLACK'S LIST.

"Everyone who wishes well to Oxford should read this book."

OXFORD AT THE CROSS ROADS.

A Criticism of the Course of Literæ Humaniores in the University.

By PERCY GARDNER, M.A., Litt.D.,
Lincoln and Merton Professor of Classical Archaeology, Oxford.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d. net.

"It is a very serious, and to our mind unanswerable, criticism on the whole course of Oxford study."—The Spectator.

"An admirably thoughtful study of the problems which confront Oxford to-day."—The Daily Mail.

"Riding through the Bible."

LETTERS FROM THE HOLY LAND.

By LADY BUTLER,

Painter of "The Roll Call," &c.

Square demy 8vo, cloth, containing 16 page illustrations in colour, price 7s. 6d. net.

EDITION DE LUXE, 300 signed and numbered copies for England and America, price One Guinea net.

"The letters in themselves afford their own justification; the sketches are by Lady Butler, and when we have said that we have said all. Combined, they make a book that is at once a delight to the eye and a pleasure to handle. The coloured illustrations, marvelously well reproduced, provide in a panoramic display faithful representations of the Holy Land as it is seen to-day. They make a singularly attractive collection, worthy of the distinguished artist who painted them."—The St. James's Gazette.

"Deserves to be widely read and carefully studied."

THE DIARY OF A TURK.

By HALIL HALID, M.A., M.R.A.S.,

Teacher of Turkish to Student Interpreters in the University of Cambridge.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 5s.

"His book is permeated, one may say, with a deep political moral, which everyone who values the integrity of the British Empire and the keeping of India should take to heart."—The Westminster Gazette.

"Merely as a record of exciting experiences, the story is one of great interest, to which must be added much information regarding the social and political institutions, described with the thoroughness of intimate knowledge."—The British Weekly.

"A useful little volume."

THE BOERS IN EUROPE

A Sidelight on History.

By G. W. T. OMOND.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 3s. 6d.

"We obtain a clear and comprehensive record of the great Leyds intrigue, which is as astounding as it is undoubtedly interesting."—The St. James's Gazette.

"The South African question cannot be thoroughly understood, nor can its difficulties be fully realised, unless adequate consideration be given to the action of the Boers in Europe during the war and after the war, and for this purpose Mr. Omond's book is of great service."—The Literary World.

"A very attractive little series."

DAINTY DAMES OF SOCIETY.

A Portrait Gallery of Charming Women.

By W. WILLMOTT DIXON,

Barrister-at-Law ("Thormanby").

Four vols., Foolscap 8vo, cloth, illustrated. Price 2s. net each; or in limp leather, price 2s. 6d. net each.

"The little series contains undoubtedly the grace which is claimed for the subjects of the memoirs—charm."—The Bookman.

"As dainty in form as its subject."—The Times.
"The series will be esteemed by lovers of the literature of beauty and the beauties of art."—The Dundee Advertiser.

A. & C. BLACK, Soho Square, London.

CASELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

In Four Parts, price 1s. net each, or in One Volume, cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.

ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1903.

This year's issue will contain FOUR BEAUTIFUL REMBRANDT PHOTOGRAPHURES of notable pictures, one of which will form the Frontispiece to each Part, and all will be included in the Complete Volume. Part I., containing a Rembrandt Photographure of "SUNSET AFTER RAIN," by B. W. LEADER, R.A., will be published early next week.
"The most perfect representation of the Academy ever placed within reach of the public."
—Westminster Gazette.

NOW READY, price 6s.

THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY REVEL.

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH.

Daily Chronicle says:—"One of the very best of the many good stories that have borne his name upon the title-page." It is conceived and designed upon the true Stevensonian model, and sustains the Stevenson tradition with extraordinary skill and aptitude."

NOW READY, price 6s.

THE DUKE DECIDES.

By HEADON HILL.

With 8 Full-page Illustrations.

"Here is a pretty complexity, which Mr. Headon Hill unravels in his accustomed manner."—The Times.
"An excellent and most exciting story."—Daily News.

NOW READY, price 6s.

JOHN GAYTHER'S GAROEN.

By FRANK STOCKTON.

With 8 Full-page Illustrations.

"Written in the characteristically quaint style which has endeared this gentle humorist to thousands of people on both sides of the Atlantic."
—Daily Express.

Popular Edition, Now Ready, price 3s. 6d.

THE LITTLE MINISTER.

By J. M. BARRIE.

Re-set in new type, and containing Eight Full-page Illustrations by W. HOLLS, R.S.A.

"The reader is held spell-bound."—Spectator.

READY SHORTLY, price 21s. net.

THE BUTTERFLIES & MOTHS OF EUROPE.

By W. F. KIRBY, F.L.S., F.E.S.

With 54 Coloured Plates and numerous Illustrations.

VOL. IV. Just Published, price 14s. net, of the ILLUSTRATED EDITION OF SOCIAL ENGLAND.

By EMINENT WRITERS.

Edited by H. D. TRAILL, D.O.L., and J. S. MANN, M.A.
This Volume covers the Period from 1603 to 1714, and contains upwards of 500 Illustrations and 10 Coloured Plates.

JUST PUBLISHED, price 6s.

AMERICA AT WORK.

By JOHN FOSTER FRASER.

With 33 Illustrations.

"Vivid and observant studies."—Times.
"A book which is calculated to startle Britons."
—Athenæum.

"A vivid and picturesque book calculated to make the phlegmatic British manufacturer uncomfortable."
—St. James's Gazette.

N.B.—A Fifth impression of "THE REAL SIBERIA," by the same Author, has already been called for.

CASELL & COMPANY, Ltd., London,
and all Booksellers.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

"A valuable and fitting conclusion to the great work."—Academy.

In One Volume of 1,464 pages. Royal 8vo.

Price 25s. net in cloth, or 32s. net in half-morocco.

DICTIONARY OF NATIONAL BIOGRAPHYINDEX AND EPITOME.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

This volume is intended to form a summary guide to the vast and varied contents of the Dictionary and its Supplement. Every name, about which substantive biographic information is given in the sixty-three volumes of the Dictionary or in the three Supplementary volumes, finds mention here in due alphabetical order. An Epitome is given of the leading facts and dates that have been already recorded at length in the pages of the original work, and there is added a precise reference to the volume and page where the full article appears.

The separate articles which it supplies amount to 30,378; the cross references number 3,474.

GLOBE.—"An invaluable addition to the list of books of reference. We have had brief biographical dictionaries before now, but none at once so comprehensive, so full, and so accurate as this."

SCOTSMAN.—"This volume of the Dictionary will soon be the best-thumbed of them all. Only long and frequent use upon particular occasions fully tests a book of this kind; but it needs no very extensive scrutiny to reveal that the epitome is a work well organised, of exact learning, and of careful compilation. Useful in itself, it must largely enhance the usefulness of the Dictionary which it serves."

* Prospectus post free on application.

BY THE AUTHOR OF

"LOVE AND HONOUR."

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

GEORGE GORING'S DAUGHTERS.

By M. E. CARR,

Author of "Love and Honour."

NEW NOVEL BY E. W. HORNUNG.

NOW READY.

With a Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NO HERO.

By E. W. HORNUNG,

Author of "A Bride from the Bush," "The Amateur Cracksmen," "Peccavi," &c.

NEW NOVEL BY HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

CROWBOROUGHBEACON.

By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON,
Author of "Little Lady Mary," "A Friend of Nelson," &c.

THE NEW NATION.

A Sketch of the Social, Political, and Economic Conditions and Prospects of the Australian Commonwealth. By PERCY F. ROWLAND, late Scholar of Hertford College, Oxford, &c. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. [Just published.]

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co.,
15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1617. Established 1869. London: 2 May 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 427

REVIEWS.

Blind Children..	431
Poets and Dreamers: Studies and Translations from the Irish ..	432
The Letters of Mille de Lespinasse ..	433
The Despatches of Field-Marshal The Duke of Wellington ..	434
Correspondence of Lady Burghersh with The Duke of Wellington ..	434
Songs of Womanhood ..	435
America at Work ..	435

SHORT NOTICES:

Christianity and Modern Civilization: being some Chapters in European History—The Spirit and Origin of Christian Monasticism—Republics versus Woman—The Romance of the Colorado River: ..	433
---	-----

FICTION:

The Adventures of Harry Revel—Reprobate Silver—Lovey Mary ..	437
--	-----

Notes on the Week's Novels	438
------------------------------------	-----

ARTICLES.

A PORT'S TABLE-TALK.. .. .	439
Is English Literature Dying?	441
Impressions—XXX. Fear and Joy	441
DRAMA:
A Play of Good Hope. E. K. Chambers	441
ART:
From Watts to B. Lini. C. L. H.	442
SCIENCE:
Song. C. W. Saleeby	443
CORRESPONDENCE:
"The Grammarian's Coarse Analysis"	444
Canning's "Elegant Supplices"	445
Letters of the 12th Duke of Somerset	445
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
Criticism on book, old or new, read this year	445

The Literary Week.

THE two volumes of letters by Jane Welsh Carlyle referred to below, bring up to eleven volumes the total of semi-official books that have been written about the Carlyles since their death. Judging from the reviews, these letters and comments have by no means settled the controversy that has raged around the domestic relations of Mr. and Mrs. Carlyle. Collectors of the works of Mr. Andrew Lang must add two new volumes to their shelves. To one of them, however, a collection of seventeenth century tracts, Mr. Lang is responsible only for the introduction. Birthday or year books have received an addition in a selection from the writings of Phillips Brooks, with this quotation on the title-page: "The thought is stronger for us because he has thought it. The feeling is more vivid because he has felt it. And always he leads us to God by a way along which he has gone himself." Among the publications of the week we note the following:—

NEW LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE. 2 vols.

The editor of these volumes is Mr. Alexander Carlyle, the annotations are by Thomas Carlyle, and an Introduction is provided by Sir James Crichton Browne. These new letters have the qualities which are familiar to us in the old—they are brilliant, frank, and often unwise. The main object of the editor and the writer of the introduction is to vindicate Carlyle at the expense of his wife. Sir James Crichton Browne comes to the conclusion that she suffered from "cerebral neurasthenia," and hazards the assertion that Carlyle "must have been nearly flayed alive during her mental derangement."

SOCIAL ORIGINS. By Andrew Lang. PRIMAL LAW. By J. J. Atkinson.

The portion of the volume called "Primal Law" was written by the late Mr. James Jasper Atkinson. Mr. Atkinson spent most of his life in New Caledonia, where "his ingenious mind was much exercised by the singular laws and customs of the natives of the New Caledonian Archipelago and the adjacent isles." Mr. Lang's dedication is to Annabella Alleyne, and reads thus: "Dear Annie, as you first pointed out to me the facts which are the germ of my Theory of the Origin of Totemism, you are one cause of my share in this book. The other is affection for the memory of the author of 'Primal Law.'"

ISABELLA D'ESTE. 2 vols. By Julia Cartwright.

A study of the Renaissance, 1474-1539. Mrs. Ady says in her preface: "The life of Isabella d'Este has never yet been written. After four hundred years, the greatest lady of the Renaissance still awaits her biographer." Attempts have been made before by French, German and Italian scholars, but their work was either interrupted or cut short by death. Mrs. Ady's biography does not claim to be exhaustive; it is put forth as likely to be of interest to readers who are already familiar with the writer's Life of Isabella d'Este's sister Beatrice.

MR. EGERTON CASTLE has written to the "Morning Post" complaining of a review of "The Star-Dreamer" published in that journal. After setting forth his grievance Mr. Castle says: "The question of literary criticism is one of so much importance to writers that there is a feeling among us that it is time to make a stand against the reckless, spiteful, or weary reviewer." By all means let a stand be made against reckless and spiteful reviewers; the weary reviewer, however, is bound to be always with us. His weariness, unfortunately, is usually induced by what he has to read in the way of indifferent fiction.

THERE are certain little books which, without achieving actual popularity, have a steady sale and are talked about amongst quiet people. "A Digit of the Moon" was such a book. From its author we are to have shortly another volume called "The Descent of the Sun," which is said to be translated from the original manuscript. We do not know whether the translation is real or a literary device.

Mr. D. S. MACCOLL has been writing in the "Saturday Review" concerning what he calls the "maladministration of the Chantrey Trust." The word "maladministration" appears perfectly justifiable on the facts which Mr. MacColl presents. The express stipulations laid down by Sir Francis Chantrey were as follows:—

1. The works of art might be by artists of any nationality, with the one condition that they must have been executed and completed in Great Britain.
2. The works of "deceased or living artists" were eligible.
3. There is no limit to exhibition in the year of purchase.
4. There is no limit to exhibition at the Royal Academy.

It is a matter of common knowledge that these terms have been ignored. With a very few exceptions, says Mr. MacColl, "the policy and practice has been to select pictures and sculpture from the current exhibitions of the Royal Academy, and to treat Academicians, more particularly, in the most generous spirit. Of the total of about £60,000 expended up to date, over £30,000 was paid to members of the Academy, between £17,000 and £18,000 to those who shortly after became members, between £12,000 and £13,000 to other exhibitors." Thus the wide range of choice deliberately provided by Chantrey has been narrowed to the buying of works by living artists, and those works in most cases have not been representative of the artists' best. Chantrey particularly guarded against the danger of hurried choice "by relieving the Trustees of any obligation to buy every year." The Trustees, however, have glorified in hurried choice. They have, says Mr. MacColl, "ignored this provision, with the rest; they have never given judgment a chance to mature, they have bought, except in the case of Hilton, works fresh from the artist's hand, and have only in three years out of twenty-six abstained from those hasty purchases among pictures and sculpture of the year."

This is a pretty broad indictment. It is possible, as Mr. MacColl suggests, that the present Trustees are unaware of the conditions of the Trust; Sir Charles Eastlake, who was President of the Academy in 1863, was certainly unaware of those conditions, for he asserted before the Commission that Chantrey's bequest was for the benefit of British artists only. Mr. MacColl writes:—

To bring these remarks to a point I put it to the conscience of the President and Council of the Academy as men of honour whether it is not a clear duty before they go further, to secure for the nation a picture by Mr. Whistler. No one will now dispute that the gap is inexcusable in view of Chantrey's instructions to his Trustees; and the Trustees may be reminded that if they are warned against personal sympathy, it ought to be taken for granted that personal antipathy, if it exists, should not interfere with a public duty. Generosity is often enough lost sight of among the miserable jealousies of artists; but we may at least demand of public bodies a measure of justice and decency. I will cite, for the present, one other case. The Trustees have purchased a number of watercolours, of which only Mr. Smythe's can be called in any way exemplary. The chief master of one exemplary kind since Turner is now an old man, and nearing the limit of his wonderful production. Is it not a scandal that Mr. Brabazon is ignored in this collection?

We have no doubt that both general artistic and public opinion are with Mr. MacColl. The Trust obviously should not be employed "to reward exhibitors in current Academy exhibitions"; its business is to get the best work executed in this country. We trust that Mr. MacColl's appeal will not fail of effect.

THE inaugural address of Prof. Bury, who succeeded Lord Acton at Cambridge, lies before us. Prof. Bury's view of history is in accord with his predecessor's and the general tendency of the times. He insists "that history is not a branch of literature":—

The facts of history, like the facts of geology or astronomy, can supply material for literary art; for manifest reasons they lend themselves to artistic representation far more readily than those of the natural sciences; but to clothe the story of a human society in a literary dress is no more the part of a historian as a historian, than it is the part of an astronomer as an astronomer to present in an artistic shape the story of the stars.

It is, of course, not the historian's business, but if he can make a happy marriage between history and literature his influence will be the wider. But this, of course, can only apply in more or less broad history. It is, however, as Prof. Bury said, always the duty of the historian to get a grip of the progressive human story; a duty which is becoming clearer every day.

THE "Ancestor" cannot leave alone the unfortunate novelist who is imprudent enough to introduce heraldry, parish registers, and the like, into his pages. In the current issue Mr. Oswald Barron proves quite conclusively that Grant Allen, in his "Blood Royal," went hopelessly wrong. The novelist, in antiquarian matters, should never be explicit. Mr. Barron says:—

In dealing with all these things the novelist will remember that in vagueness, vagueness, and again in vagueness will be found ease and safety and the shadow of accuracy. And here we pause, being unable to affect any longer the belief that the novelist is looking up at us and drinking in our words. For we know very well he is doing nothing of the kind.

Mr. Barron's conclusion is fully justified by the facts.

WE are glad to hear that Mr. George Allen is to publish an English edition identical with the French edition of "The Romance of Tristan and Iseult." The English version of J. Bédier's text has been done by Mr. H. Belloc, and the whole of Robert Engel's beautiful illustrations are to be reproduced in colour.

THE latest volume in the "World's Classics" contains "Selected English Essays." The editor's choice has been wide. The first selections are from Bacon, the later ones bring us to quite modern times. We have work by Thackeray, Dr. John Brown, and Matthew Arnold; then come J. A. Symonds's "A Venetian Medley," Richard Jefferies's "Meadow Thoughts," and Stevenson's "Walking Tours." To re-read this paper of Stevenson's is to be convinced more firmly than ever that his place is assured in the small company of enduring essayists. This is writing that will find many a generation eager to read:—

We are in such haste to be doing, to be writing, to be gathering gear, to make our voice audible a moment in the derisive silence of eternity, that we forget that one thing, of which these are but the parts—namely, to live. We fall in love, we drink hard, we run to and fro upon the earth like frightened sheep. And now you are to ask yourself if, when all is done, you would not have been better to sit by the fire at home, and be happy thinking. To sit still and contemplate—to remember the faces of women without desire, to be pleased by the great deeds of men without envy, to be everything and everywhere in sympathy, and yet content to remain where and what you are—is not this to know both wisdom and virtue, and to dwell with happiness?

MR. ARTHUR SYMONS contributes to the current number of "Harper's" a vivid and well-wrought impression of Constantinople. Mr. Symons' descriptive work is always admirable, particularly when it deals with the East; we recall an impression of Moscow which was full of life and colour. The following passage touches the squalid human element :—

Your feet slip in slushy mud, and catch on the cobbles or in the gaps of the road. A dog with a red wound behind his ear, and a long strip of mangy skin on his back, lies asleep in the middle of the pavement. You step into the road to avoid the dogs and the hamals, and wheels and horses are upon you. You step back into the midst of the dogs and the hamals; as you stand aside for a moment, a beggar with a handless arm rounded into a stump, a woman with her face eaten away in the cavity of the hood which she draws back before you, appears suddenly, filling what had seemed the only alley of escape. The sun soaks down into the narrow street; the smell of the mud rises up into your nostrils, mingled with those unknown smells which, in Constantinople, seem to ooze upwards out of the ground, and steam outwards from every door and window, and pour out of every alley, and rise like a cloud out of the breath and sweat and foulness of the people.

By way of contrast we may quote the following :—

Below, under my windows, are the cypresses of the Little Field of the Dead, vast, motionless, different every night. Last night each stood clear, tall, apart; to-night they huddle together in the mist, and seem to shudder. The sunset was brief, and the water has grown dull, like slate. Stamboul fades to a level mass of smoky purple, out of which a few minarets rise black against a gray sky with bands of orange fire. Last night, after a golden sunset, a fog of rusty iron came down, and hung poised over the jagged level of the hill. The whole mass of Stamboul was like black smoke; the water dim gray, a little flushed, and then like pure light, lucid, transparent, every ship and every boat sharply outlined in black on its surface; the boats seemed to crawl like flies on a lighted pane.

In the same magazine we find an article entitled "Recent Impressions of the English." The writer is troubled by what he considers the undue regard paid to our aristocracy. To the aristocracy, he says, go the best places in Army and Government, and he comments: "It is impossible to believe that such a Government represents the best abilities, the real energy, of the English people." "Stupid" and "aristocratic" he holds to be synonymous terms. When the writer comes to other matters, however, he is sounder. Comparing England with America, he says :—

The standard, both in literature and in the fine arts, is higher in England than it is here. It is the same in respect to oratory. The average of the speaking in the House of Commons is lower than it is in the American House of Representatives, but the best English speakers surpass the best American speakers. Even the judicial opinions of the English judges are better expressed than those of our judges—more racy and spontaneous, more literary. In learning generally, especially in theology, there can be no question of English superiority.

We may be thankful for so much, even though America beats us in applied science.

Of the seven volumes of Mr. J. S. Farmer's dictionary of "Slang and its Analogues" six have already been published. With the seventh volume will be issued a revision of the first, which the editor frankly confesses to be below the level of the later volumes.

"PUNCH" this week reports a "Sketchy Interview" with Mr. H. G. Wells :—

On our pressing the electric button the door was opened by a well-trained Martian, who in answer to our question hooted politely that Mr. Wells was out on his Aeroplane, superintending the flying drill of the Sandgate Highlanders, and was for the time being an invisible man, but that he was expected in any moment.

While he was speaking a whirring noise was heard overhead, and Mr. Wells swooped to earth. Divesting himself of his celluloid cloak, studded with plasmon buttons, Mr. Wells, on demanding and receiving our assurance that we belonged to the middle classes, ushered us into his sanctum. We experienced considerable difficulty in keeping our feet, owing to the curvature of the floor—Mr. Wells adopts this system to prevent the collection of dust—but finally succeeded in anchoring ourselves to a selenite paperweight, while our host settled himself comfortably in the cushioned seats of his Time Machine and began to talk.

The reporter left the house by way of a moving staircase and came to himself "in the surgery of a Sandgate practitioner." It is all very pleasant fooling.

We like to follow the meteoric course of "Weo MacGregor," partly because we tried to read the story ourselves and failed. It has now reached America, and the "New York Times Saturday Review" devotes over a column to reviewing it. For once an author who published his own book has "got ahead" of the publishers.

We have received the first four volumes of the "Simple Life" series, to which we referred the other day. For sixpence you may buy a book of fables by Mr. Bolton Hall, or "Tolstoy and his Message" by Mr. E. H. Crosby. For half that sum you may purchase Thoreau's "On the Duty of Civil Disobedience," or Fitzgerald's "Omar Khayyam." The little books are nicely printed and have pleasant green paper covers.

A CORRESPONDENT of the "Spectator" has recently called attention to the excellent English spoken in Ireland; "there is nothing in Ireland," he says, "outside Ulster to resemble the English spoken by the lower classes in Yorkshire or Devonshire. This is a remarkable fact; all or most Irishmen speak with a rich mellifluous brogue, but they speak very pure, correct English." The fact is remarkable. The ordinary Irish peasant certainly speaks better English than the ordinary English peasant, though it is by no means always very pure and correct.

A WRITER in the "New York American" has been criticising what Jeffrey once said of Shakespeare. This is what we read :—

His poetical conceptions, images, and descriptions are not "given" at all; they are "turned loose." . . . They race out, as shouting children from a country school. They distract, stun, confuse. So disorderly an imagination has never itself been imagined. Shakespeare had no sense of proportion, no care for the strength of restraint, no knowledge of the art of saying just enough, no knowledge of art of any kind.

We are always learning something new about Shakespeare.

THE authors of "Wisdom while you Wait" have escaped the usual fate of writers of sequels; their "Wisdom on the Hire System" is as funny as the earlier venture, which is saying a good deal. The new testimonials are as amusing as the old ones, and the illustrations make for genuine laughter.

MR. SARGENT'S "Redemption" is now in its place in the Boston Public Library. A writer in the current "Century Magazine" says:—

As a composition the "Redemption" balances completely the scheme of the opposite wall. While treated in a like spirit, the impression it makes is radically different, although held in continuity with the first part both subjectively and artistically. Like another chapter in a book, another movement in a symphony, it introduces new themes and arouses different emotions.

The figures of Adam and Eve appear bound to the central figure of Christ on the cross, a piece of beautiful and direct symbolism indicating the trinity of the body, while above appears the Trinity of the Spirit, enveloped in one common garment, upon the golden hem of which the word "Sanctus" is incessantly repeated. Of the work in general the writer says:—

The color has a resonant depth that augments the majestic solemnity of the composition, splendid masses and accents of mellow-toned gold relieving the full, soft richness of dull reds, deeply tranquil blues, and restful grays, that in a few firmly developed, dominant chords characterize the work in the quiet breadth of its magnificent solemnity.

THE first of a series of exhibitions of "Neglected Artists" will be held early in October by John Baillie, at the gallery, 1, Prince's Terrace, Hereford Road. George Wilson, who died in 1890, has been selected to open the series, and Mr. Baillie would be grateful for particulars of any pictures and sketches which owners may be willing to lend.

Bibliographical.

A CORRESPONDENT who has been reading the new Carlyle Letters writes to me: "There are one or two points in the work on which I should like fuller information. Who, for instance, was the author of 'Cecil,' the book which Mrs. Carlyle 'liked immensely' and recommended (in 1845) to Lady Harriett Baring (i. 176)? Again, can anybody tell me anything more about the 'Madame de Winton' who is mentioned (ii. 97) as the author of 'Margaret and her Bridesmaids,' and of whom Mrs. Carlyle writes so enthusiastically (1856)? 'Perhaps,' says Mrs. Carlyle, 'I shall go this summer to visit her at her castle in Wales.' Who was this lady? I remember when 'Margaret and her Bridesmaids' was one of the most popular of novels. There is another point. In October, 1849, Mrs. Carlyle writes: 'I have taken a spree of Novel reading, too—read "Shirley" last week, by the authoress of "Jane Eyre," and one of Trollope's—having been taken one day to Mrs. Procter's to see Trollope in her own house' . . . 'and having found her a shrewd, honest woman to hear talk. But her Book is rubbishy in the extreme; and "Shirley" isn't much better.' Now what is the 'Book' by Mrs. Procter here referred to?" Perhaps some of my readers can answer that last question. The "Cecil" which Mrs. Carlyle "liked immensely" was presumably Mrs. Gore's story so-named, which came out in 1841. For "Madame de Winton," with its Frenchified air, we should read "Mrs. de Winton." The author of "Margaret and her Bridesmaids" (Miss Collinson) was married first to Mr. Walter de Winton, of Maedlwch Castle, Radnorshire. After his death, she became Mrs. R. W. Stretton. Miss Yonge wrote a pleasant sketch of her.

There is one passage in the notes to the "New Letters" on which I, and I dare say others, would like some fuller information. It will be remembered that, in the second volume of Mr. Froude's "Life of Carlyle, 1795-1835," the biographer ascribes to the pen of Mrs. Carlyle some stanzas addressed "To a Swallow building under our Eaves." That they were written at Craigenputtock, says Mr. Froude, is certain, "for they are dated from 'The Desert.' I find them among loose fragments in her own portefeuille." On this, in the new volumes, Mr. Alexander Carlyle thus comments (I. 41): "Had he turned the sheet of paper on which the poem was written, he would have read in Carlyle's unmistakeable hand, 'Copied again by Jane.' The verses are not Jane's, but Carlyle's!" Now, is this so absolutely certain? True, there is a reference, in one of the stanzas, to some mystic turn of thought, Caught under German eaves and hither brought, which suggests Carlyle; but would he have described Craigenputtock (st. 2) as "this waste," and would he have dated from "The Desert"? One likes to think of the verses as being Mrs. Carlyle's.

For the bibliographer, the main interest of the new volume of the "Library" Ruskin, devoted to the "Poems," lies in the "hitherto unpublished" pieces. Of these the most considerable (running to 42 pages) is the unfinished play called "Marcolini," which was written when Ruskin was seventeen (1836), and is referred to by him in "Praeterita." Two extracts from it appeared in Mr. Collingwood's edition of the "Poems" (1891). The other and much shorter novelties are "Verona" and "The World of the Sky," both penned in 1835; "For a Birthday in May," belonging to 1847; "The Zodiac Song," written about 1865; and "A Moment's Falter." "The World of the Sky" is only an excerpt from a rhyming letter to the author's father. "In some cases," says Mr. E. T. Cook, "where editorial excisions were made in the edition of 1891, passages have been restored from the MSS." Nevertheless, I suspect that, looking at this ponderous tome of 586 pages, those who already possess the two handy volumes of 1891 will not very greatly envy the owners of the newer publication.

In the new volume of "The Ancestor," Mr. Oswald Barron makes much sport with the views on the subject of the Jewish strain in men of genius which Lady Jeune has been attributing to James Russell Lowell. This, of course, is an old story. So long ago as 1894 Sir Leslie Stephen contributed to the "Letters of J. R. Lowell" a sort of epilogue, in the course of which he adverted to this little fad of his friend: "He was so delighted with his ingenuity in discovering that everybody was in some way descended from the Jews, because he had some Jewish feature, or a Jewish name, or a Gentile name such as the Jews were in the habit of assuming, or because he was connected with one of the departments of business or the geographical regions in which Jews are generally to be found, that it was scarcely possible to mention any distinguished man who could not be conclusively proved to be connected with the chosen race."

Concerning "The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman," to whose authorship a correspondent of the ACADEMY referred last week, it may be noted that Mr. F. G. Kitton devotes to it a short section of his "Minor Writings of Charles Dickens" (1900). Herein will be found all the pros and cons of the matter. Carefully weighed, they seem to suggest that Thackeray wrote the Ballad and Dickens the prose Notes to it. Says Mrs. Richmond Ritchie, in "Harper's" (1892): "My own impression (for which I have absolutely no foundation) is that the Notes sound like Mr. Dickens's voice, and the ballad like my own father's." And the probability is she is right.

"A. C." kindly informs me that from my list of Mr. Henry James's volumes of short stories I omitted "An International Episode" (Macmillan, 1883).

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Novelist's Verse.

BLIND CHILDREN. By Israel Zangwill. (Heinemann.)

THE verse of a master of prose is always interesting, and sometimes more. In the case of Stevenson it is more; in the case of Mr. Hardy it is much more; but in the case of Mr. Zangwill it is interesting only, although very interesting. Mr. Zangwill remains a prose writer. If a shaft of poetic inspiration alight upon him, it irradiates only his brain and not his technique. There are poetic thoughts in this slender book, but very little poetry. On the other hand, it is rich in very interesting statements such as only Mr. Zangwill could have framed, and a few Heinesque echoes which one is very glad to hear. The resemblance to Heine may have been striven for, and it may be accidental, temperamental; but whichever it is matters little. Our own feeling is that Mr. Zangwill, by perfectly natural means, reproduces much of Heine's spirit. He belongs to the same race (and we cannot too cordially express our satisfaction that he is not ashamed of it, so refreshing is it to come to the work of a Jew who exults in his religion; so tired are we of treading delicately in order to avoid wounding the susceptibilities of those Jews who masquerade as Christians and forswear their older faith). It would be enlightening to know whether the following poem could have been written just as it is if Heinrich Heine had not come first:—

ASTI SPUMANTE.

Its pop excites my fellow-diners' glances
With images of reckless revelry,
Within a broad-brimmed glass it froths and dances,
Showy as Moët and as cheap as tea.

I pass the bottle to my silent neighbour,
He smacks his lips and spouts of mother Earth,
The ripe grape's tang and Nature's tropic labour,
Her tameless travail of eternal birth.

I pass the bottle to the man loquacious,
The tragic bard of Asti he recalls,
And Pisa's Campo Santo, white and spacious,
With that quaint fresco on the ancient walls.

The Vintage—grapes and grapes in purple splendour;
Green-kirtled gleaners; feet in vats deep-sunk;
O'erbrimming baskets borne by maidens slender,
And in a corner Noah lying drunk.

Ah yes, the Asti brings them pleasant fancies,
For me alone it works a miracle,
My childhood with its glamorous romances
Lies in a drop of that cheap Muscatel.

One sip—and fled the public foreign table,
Trust, innocence and wonder, all are mine!
For Asti, though Spumante, is unable
To hide relationship to raisin-wine.

The raisin-wine of ceremonies holy,
Wherein—to fête old Pharaoh's overthrow—
We dipped unleavened bread: the East moves slowly,
'Twas only some three thousand years ago.

O witching night when Earth was near to Heaven,
O blessedness to be a little Jew!
Where lay the magic in not eating leaven,
And how was Noah aped on raisin-brew.

I know not, but by Asti re-created,
All dewy-fresh the young enchantments rise,
And I forget that I am old and sated,
Lonely, and stained of soul, and worldly-wise.

Prate on, O friends, of Nature, Art and Dante,
Nor note my tears are weakening the wine.
Your world is stale as yesterday's Spumante,
My Ghetto sparkles youthfully divine.

In some ways that is Mr. Zangwill's best poem; and it is certain that no one else could have written it. A large part of Mr. Zangwill's temperament is in it—not all, but the best of it. If the whole book were conceived in the same vein it would be a very remarkable work. But unfortunately Mr. Zangwill has always been unable to discern the difference between best and second best. In everything that he has done this flaw has been only too perceptible, this lack of critical faculty, this tendency to the bizarre. In "The Grey Wig," for example, he can collect together such a charming piece of work as the title story and the poor pot-boiler known as the "Big Bow Mystery"; and again in the present volume he can associate "Asti Spumante" with dozens of scraps of verse that might well have been left in manuscript. "Get someone else to weed your turnips"—James Russell Lowell's advice to a poet—should have been taken by Mr. Zangwill. It is odd that so deft a literary craftsman and so shrewd an observer of life should have so faulty a power of self criticism. But the Jews are a nation of triumphs and short-comings (as Mr. Zangwill suggests in one of his poems), and Mr. Zangwill's triumphs are so satisfactory that his short-comings may be pardoned, particularly as he offers us his poems with a very deprecatory gesture. This is his first and possibly his last volume of verse: he is not going to bore us. Let us then think only of his best.

Here is a charming lyric, which we would not have altered in any syllable:—

WITH THE DEAD.

Light shadows fall across her grave,
A sweet wind stirs the flowered grass,
The song-girt branches slowly wave,
The solemn moments softly pass.

The afternoon draws quiet breath
At pause between the eve and morn,
And from the sacred place of Death
The holy thoughts of Life are born.

I fret not at the will of doom;
Her soul and mine are not apart.
Dear violets upon her tomb,
Ye blossom in my heart.

Here is another, more poignant still—a fine utterance of a reverent ironist:—

TO THE BLESSED CHRIST.

O blessed Christ, that foundest death
When life was fire and tears,
Not drawing on a sluggish breath
Through apathetic years!

Still, still about Thy forehead gleams
The light we know Thee by.
O blessed Christ, to die for dreams
Nor know that dreams would die!

And lastly we will quote this, another ironical statement, less poetical than the other, but very interesting. If an Englishman had written it he might be called a "Pro-Boer" by the thoughtless, but an Oriental like Mr. Zangwill is privileged:—

IN MENTONE.

An Afric lion in a cage,
Worn dumb with woe and futile rage,
His forest eye-sight dimmed with age.

Grim-couchant on his balcony,
He turns his back to sun and sea,
And scowls upon humanity.

Swift-thunder past his prison doors
To Monte Carlo's gala shores
The motors of his conquerors.

The flouting females throned elate
Make bitterer his kindred's fate,
He blinks and mourns his buried mate.

Oom Paul, believing over-much,
Your faith in God and man was such
You dared to put it to the touch!

And so you finish far from home,
 Your Temple split from door to dome,
 Your Empire smashed like yon white foam.
 But yet you chew no novel crust—
 Who has not staked his dreams? What trust
 Has Fate not smitten to the dust?
 One trusts in Love. Friend, keep aloof!
 Of moonbeams weave both warp and woof,
 Put nothing to the solid proof.
 One trusts in Fame. Already surge Oblivion's waters. What! Émerge?
 Your juniors chant your funeral dirge.
 One trusts in Truth. Ay, shout her praise,
 But march not to her Marseillaise—
 A crown of thorns her only bays!
 One trusts in Justice. Cursèd Jew
 To put our France in such a stew!
 Your champion chokes—and so may you!
 Take, Paul, a fellow exile's hand,
 I, too, have lost my fairyland,
 I, too, have waked to understand.

We have quoted enough to show Mr. Zangwill's poetical quality: too much to illustrate the quality of the book, for the bulk of it falls below the level of these four pieces. We are, however, very glad to have Mr. Zangwill's verses, for we have long nourished the belief that in default of the best poetry the poetry of good prose writers is the most desirable product. They at any rate have something to say—Mr. Zangwill always has—and probably, within certain limits, will know how best to say it. The poet who begins by being a poet has much to unlearn, and he unlearns it in verse; the prose writer has unlearned it in prose before he asks us to read his verse. Moreover, the prose writer is more modest than the poet; he makes fewer demands upon our charity; he feels for us more. In the present dearth of poetry we should like to see volumes of verse by other writers of prose. Where are Mr. Hale White's poems, Mr. Bernard Shaw's, Mr. William Archer's, Mr. Herbert Spencer's, Mr. Balfour's, Lord Rosebery's? These are the verses we want to read.

A Book of Peasants' Dreams.

POETS AND DREAMERS: STUDIES AND TRANSLATIONS FROM THE IRISH. By Lady Gregory. (Murray.)

THERE are perhaps two sets of people and two only who have, artistically speaking, a certain obvious interest. They are those who want everything and those who are tired of everything. Balzac fashioned a whole world of the former, monsters of volition determined to survive and to enjoy. Byron, the robust islander, became a European poet because he recognised that the banquet of life was not enough, and because he caught from satiety itself a craving for something that he who had run the whole gamut of emotions could never satisfy. The Human Comedy of Balzac passed into the Human Machine of Zola. The fierce rebellion of Byron was transfused into the sombre disillusion of de Musset. In each case other modifications necessarily followed, but plus ça change plus c'est la même chose.

But in England, the country in which the prizes of life are essentially good-conduct prizes, attention is very properly paid to the vast majority of mankind who are, figuratively or literally, neither hungry nor bored. On the Continent the ghosts of René and Obermann are doomed to eternal wanderings, but in England Manfred is at rest for ever. Something, definite and incisive, killed him once and for all. It was the spirit of English family life. And the spirit which abolished Byronism and Wertherism created something to satisfy its own supreme need—the domestic novel. Now the essence of the English domestic novel is this: through whatever period of history its hero and heroine may amble there must be no appeal whatever to general ideas. Thoroughly understanding the sociological side of his craft, the English novelist raised, so to speak, the economic man to the 7th power. For he must not only be a good living Englishman but he must be fashionable, since conduct is apt to be prosy unless it is on the grand scale. The English novelist, recognising this important fact, has, for generations, been reproducing his two creative masterpieces, the gentleman and the snob. Powerful minds have been employed on this task with rather whimsical results. There have been rebels, too, but speaking generally, these have been driven to the wall. Mountains of volumes on both sides of the Atlantic proclaim the triumph of this peculiar cast of thought which has deliberately substituted for an analysis of life a study in behaviour. In short, so dominated are we by this attitude of thought, that a volume like Tolstoy's "Que faire?" for example, appears to us as the work of a well-meaning madman.

This education of generations has naturally made us a little rigid, a little distrustful of other points of view. The cry of "conduct" has passed into the cry of "action," and we are becoming dimly conscious of a "thinking in continents" as opposed to parishes, but surely that is change enough? Notwithstanding all this, however, a group of young Irish writers have had the audacity to thrust aside these racial traditions, and have produced work as alien from the English or American spirit as, let us say, the "Idiot" of Dostoevsky is alien from Thackeray's "Book of Snobs."

Lady Gregory has given us in this volume, as it were, the very source of this strange and truculent aberration. It is a book of peasants' dreams. At first glance that does not seem to be so very alarming after all. English fiction has made us perfectly familiar with that good fellow, the peasant. His few and simple lessons have been admirably expressed. His blasphemy, adroitly modulated by the board school and the curate, and then edited into a certain jocose decency, has been for long the legitimate jargon of fiction. Then, too, he lends himself so admirably to the elemental requirements of behaviour as elaborated in fiction. He knows his place, he knows when to and, more important still, when not to touch his hat. He has an almost animal scent for poverty in disguise. He knows a gentleman who is a gentleman, and he also knows, to a recurring decimal, the exact amount of insolence to be administered to a gentleman who isn't. He knows a dissenting minister from "the cloth" and acts accordingly; he knows the retired merchant from the squire and acts accordingly. His hand, however, closes indiscriminately on all coins, and, to do him simple justice, he is at all times ready with his fists, except when, for the rather frequent purposes of fiction, he has to be thrashed in one short round by a gentleman half his weight. But dreams? Occasionally one hears the honest fellow bawling the might of England as he drinks the squire's health in a pothouse, but "dreams" have no place in the department of behaviour. No, no, admirable as he is, this product of respectable fiction is not at all an introduction to the peasants of Lady Gregory.

They are a strange race, these peasant dreamers, and they belong neither to the class which is avid of the joy of life nor yet to the class which craves for relief from satiety. Nor yet do they belong to the great mean who seek for comfort through the medium of conduct. In want of everything, they disdain the make-shifts of reality in favour of the divine splendour of dreams. Actuality gives them the bog-land, barren and naked; imagination restores the fairyland of Ossian and Finn. They see a cabin, a disgrace to the Empire, but it is not there in which this strange inner life is passed. Apparently hopelessly beaten in the race of life, they would proclaim that their goal is aloof and far off, that they have never entered for that other race at all. For the rest the supreme mercy of the ages has been spared to them, the consolation of mystery. Such people there are, and when one has read this book one forgets willingly the traditions of domestic fiction for the sake of this strange, new reading of life.

The chief link between these peasants and their legendary heroes is Raftery, whose "songs have gone all through the world; and he had a voice that was like the wind." This blind wandering poet saw what the people longed to see, and about him, too, legends are springing up, not without triumph, for in Ireland there is a triumph attached to "sorrow and defeat and death." Raftery is the symbolic figure that unites the present to the past, and it is [the past that these peasants are craving from the future.

This book is filled with exquisite fantasies, delicate imaginings, sombre broodings of a world remote from our world, suggestions of foam-laden waves breaking endlessly upon an enchanted coast, inviolate, impregnable to the outer world. And there are whispers, too, from forests re-echoing the hidden secrets of the Sibyl to whom no other race will listen. The real mysteries find utterance here, for in the very wildness of their dreams these peasants have preserved the supreme wisdom of putting away from them the side-issues of the soul.

To English readers "not to the manner born" many of these fantasies must appear necessarily formless, necessarily evanescent, mere survivals of the legendary cycles whose beauty they have in part preserved. But in the translation of Dr. Douglas Hyde's "The Twisting of the Rope" a direct challenge is made to the tribunal of contemporary literature. It consists of only one scene, but there is life in that scene, and poetry. It is laid in a farmer's house a hundred years ago. The characters are a wandering poet, a girl, the girl's fiancé, her mother, and some neighbours. That is all, but in this sordid setting the ideal is conquered by the real, which is the ultimate secret of tragedy from the "Antigone" of Sophocles to the "Lear" of Shakespeare. And here the old, old tragedy is played out by this wandering poet, who woos Oona by the subtle witchery of his dreams, and the girl listens to him and the wonder of new possibilities breaks in upon her soul. But the others turn upon him with the old hatred, the old malignant fear of him who has turned aside from the set path. They lure him into twisting a rope of hay, and, stepping backwards, he twists it, singing to the woman he loves. Backwards outside the open door he goes, still singing, and then they hold the girl to her destiny and shut the poet out in the night. Hanrahan calls to them:—

Open, open; let me in! Oh, my seven hundred thousand curses on you—the curse of the weak and of the strong—the curse of the poets and of the bards upon you! The curse of the priests on you, and the friars! The curse of the bishops upon you, and the Pope! The curse of the widows on you, and the children! Open!

And reality answers:—

I am thankful to ye, neighbours; and Oona will be thankful to ye to-morrow. Beat away, you vagabond! Do your dancing out there with yourself now! Isn't it a fine thing for a man to be listening to the storm outside, and himself quiet and easy beside the fire! Beat away, beat away! Where's Connach now?

Well, that is just a little Irish play, written for peasants, and loved by peasants, but many will catch a note in it which brings them away from the haberdashers of family fiction back to the days when Aeschylus first charged living lips with the mysterious messages of destiny.

Mdlle. de Lespinasse.

THE LETTERS OF MDLLE. DE LESPINASSE. With Introduction by Sainte-Beuve. Translated by Katherine Prescott Wormeley. (Heinemann. 6s.)

READERS of "Lady Rose's Daughter" will welcome this new edition of Mdlle. de Lespinasse's Letters. They are as unique, as moving, and as pathetic as the diary of Marie Bashkirtseff. They divulge a similar intensity, they lay bare a capacity for agony and self-torture as immense as is found in any utterance of the other. In a certain sense they are unreadable, and nevertheless they are engrossing. So distressingly "inward" is the entire correspondence that its publicity offends as an outrage upon the right of every human being to some privacy, to some thoughts and utterances not exposed to the judgment of others.

The whole fabric of passion and of tenderness is woven before our eyes. We learn every thread that goes to the making of both. And the knowledge in the end becomes rather a pitiable possession. Illusion crumbles as one reads. With a plaintive lucidity, a heart-breaking insistence, Mdlle. de Lespinasse proves that in extremity everything goes—pride, self-possession, subtlety—everything but the helpless craving to be loved. True she had apparently an inordinate capacity that way. But the uneasy question is roused in the face of her outwardly calm and gracious life, as to how many other women, smiling and seemingly undisturbed, suffer inwardly such violence and such pain.

But the letters have a further interest, apart from their intrinsic value, as a profound expression of passion in a refined and tender woman. They are the letters of a remarkable personality. Mdlle. de Lespinasse is more interesting than her correspondence. Taken in conjunction with it she is unforgettable. To read at the beginning of the present volume Sainte-Beuve's introduction is to be instantly fascinated—and bewildered. No woman has ever been more consummately feminine. As if with a touch of genius, she made a masterpiece of her own femininity. The seduction and the appeal, the grace and the disturbance, were all mingled and incarnate in her. She moved—without actual beauty of face, without brilliant wit, or a memorable originality of intellect—among the best brains of her epoch, and became the magnet all followed spontaneously, all loved, and remained faithful to. Brought up in the provinces, and at the beginning nothing but a poor companion of the brilliant Madame Duffard, her social career is wonderful reading. For Mdlle. de Lespinasse, who will live probably by her impassioned and monotonous letters to a man unworthy to have been even her friend, ought to be remembered as among the few inspiring women who understand with a certitude and insight absolutely faultless, how to be a woman. She had in truth the ideal qualities, for her fascination was always unseizable, evading definition. Nothing stood immovably prominent, but she seemed to possess every faculty that endears, every trait that retains affection. Grimm says of her, "She possessed in an eminent degree that art so difficult and so precious of making the best of the minds of others, of interesting them, and of bringing them into play without any appearance of constraint or effort." D'Alembert says also, "What distinguishes you above all is the art of saying to each that which suits him; this art, though little common, is very simple in you; it consists in never speaking of yourself to others, but much of them." Mdlle. de Lespinasse, in fact, was charged with the essence, equally mysterious and irresistible, called charm—a force due in a measure to unfailing sympathy, to sensitive and rapid perceptions, to tenderness and grace of feeling, wrought upon continually by an infinitude of tact and self-repression. She was so distinguished and so rare—both in intellect and person—as Guibert wrote of her after the death he had—innocently enough, however—largely contributed to bring about. She was always a woman, “natural, but not simple.” He add a little later, speaking of her appearance, “She was tall and well made. I did not know her until she was thirty-eight years old, and her figure was still noble and full of grace. But what she possessed, what distinguished her above all, was the chief charm without which beauty is but a cold perfection—expression of countenance. . . . I have seen faces animated by intellect, by passion, by pleasure, by pain, but lights and shades were all unknown to me until I knew ‘Eliza’ (Mdlle. de Lespinasse).”

Always dainty, with an exquisite elegance and simplicity of attire, she remained at forty so movingly femme from her head to her foot, and at the same time so unconscious of the fact, so subtly disregarding of any deliberate attempts at attraction, that once to realise her was to retain a tender madness to the end. Finally, to deepen interest in an already astounding career, there is the episode of D'Alembert. The tragic conclusion of her love story with Monsieur de Mora is easily condoned. Honestly one can allow her in it to have been largely the victim of a disastrous fate, a creature stricken through a deplorable but generous excess of emotional capacity. But in the case of D'Alembert, Mdlle. de Lespinasse does not seem to us to have been above reproach. Possibly done out of kindness, the fact remains that she lied to him more than once with considerable verve and plausibility. These lies D'Alembert betrays after her death—bitterly, and yet with a note of resistless forgiveness, as if, even with them, she was one of those impossible not to love acutely. “My dear Julie,” he calls her, forgiving unconsciously even while he reproaches.

Nevertheless, as late as ten months before her death, she told him, he writes, “that I was always what you treasured most, the object most necessary to your happiness,” only to leave him undeniable proof, both in her will and in the papers entrusted to him, that he was nothing of the kind, and practically never had been.

The callousness of this posthumous revelation is Mdlle. de Lespinasse's great element of mystery. The lie can be made comprehensible—with a little effort even kindly and tender-hearted, but the subsequent disregard shown by her conduct, in actually thrusting into his hands every possible means of disillusionising him, is out of harmony with the rest. It takes away from her character, but it adds to the interest of her biography.

The Iron Duke.

THE DESPATCHES OF FIELD-MARSHAL THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON. Selected and Arranged by Walter Wood. (Grant Richards. 12s.)

CORRESPONDENCE OF LADY BURGHESH WITH THE DUKE OF WELLINGTON. Edited by her Daughter, Lady Rose Weigall. With Portrait. (Murray. 7s. 6d. net.)

PERHAPS the most amusing volume, published of late years, which threw an entertaining sidelight on the Duke of Wellington's character, was “The Correspondence of Miss J. with the Duke of Wellington.” Miss J. was a beautiful and intensely bigoted young girl who early conceived it to be her mission in life to marry the great Duke, and wean him from those lusts of the world whereby the lady conceived the Duke's immortal soul was imperilled. For a score of years or more the undaunted Miss J. corresponded with the Duke till age had impaired her beauty, and the wary old warrior seemed to be even further from salvation than before. The courtesy of the Duke was shown by the fact that years after Miss J.'s communications had become absurdly gratuitous he still answered them punctiliously with his own hand. In reading Mr. Wood's admirable selection from the Duke's

Despatches, and Lady Rose Weigall's “Correspondence of Lady Burghersh,” we are struck by the fact that this wonderful grasp of detail, and amazing faculty for conducting personally a great private correspondence in the midst of harassing official duties, led finally to the Duke being buried under an increasing avalanche of letters that threatened to engulf him altogether:—

Nov. 30, 1841.

I wish that I could venture to depart from a resolution which I have formed never to apply to anybody, Minister or otherwise, for any thing whatever.

If I do in any instance I must apply to everybody for anything.

As it is I have scarcely any leisure time for repose or for meals, doing no more than writing to decline to apply. That which people will not understand is that the whole labour and business and ceremony and everything else in the world cannot be thrown upon one man, and that an old one!!

I'll do what I can. But I really think that people now and then should apply in the proper quarter, and not come to me.

Believe me,
Ever yours most affecy.

W.

(On this very morning I have received no less than fifty letters which might as well have been written to anybody else as I have really nothing to say to that to which they relate.

Answer the majority of the letters he apparently did. Whatever the Duke writes is stamped with his individuality. Much highmindedness, sagacity, great shrewdness and inflexibility of purpose, a high sense of personal dignity, together with much punctiliousness, innate courtesy, and a dry sense of humour mark all his official and private correspondence. Take, for example, the following letter on the subject of a meddling officer:—

August 2, 1803.

You will receive by this day's post, orders to carry into execution the sentence of the general court-martial on the two Sepoys.

Lieutenant Burnes' letter is a curious production, and I beg that you will do me the favour to inform him that for reasons which I thought valid, but which I do not think it necessary to communicate to him, I thought it proper to bring the prisoners, Harry Sing and Harry Rao, to trial for the crime of desertion only, and that, in future, I beg that he will do me the favour to confine his attention to his own business, and leave my duty to be done by myself and the officers appointed to assist me.

P.S.—Let your communication with Lieutenant Burnes be verbal, as I wish to avoid all future correspondence upon this subject. Indeed, that mode of communication is to be preferred upon all occasions.

The strongest impression left by a perusal of the Despatches is, however, of Wellington's humane spirit, of his high-minded detestation of all brutality, of his stern soldierly love of justice and obedience to orders. His Despatches are full of his determination to put down the excesses of his Peninsula army at any cost:—

September 29, 1813.

I am sorry to observe that robberies on the highway still continue in the neighbourhood of Beauvais, committed by the British troops. . . . This is a most disgraceful circumstance. . . . If nothing else will answer, you must have guards placed and a chain of vedettes in sight of each other, along the highroad through the whole length of your cantonments, and the rolls must be called every hour during the day and night, officers and all being present, in order to prevent the soldiers from quitting their cantonments for the purpose of highway robbery.

The Duke's contempt, as a fine old Tory for “the mob,” and for public opinion in general, as well as for the Press in particular, is well illustrated by the following letter which he addressed to an Editor:—

Nov. 24, 1815.—My name is frequently mentioned in your newspaper, and as it is a sort of privilege of modern Englishmen to read in the daily newspaper lies respecting those who serve them, and I have been so long accustomed to be so treated, I should not have thought it necessary to trouble you on the subject, if you had not . . . I am really quite indifferent respecting what is read of me in the newspapers—

The Duke was by no means a believer in Palmerston's plan of bullying Europe in order to exalt the name of Englishman all the world over. It is as refreshing to find him castigating English conceit as it is delightful to find him urging people to marry for love without any false pride as to the keeping up of appearances.

August 30, 1852.—What we require is to be able to flatter the vanity of the sovereign people! to be cried up by their vile Press as a Government bullying the world in protection of the sole amusement and habits in foreign countries of each thirty-millionth part of the sovereign people wandering about in search of amusement. I know them well; I have had to deal with them.

July 12, 1826.—If Caroline likes this marriage she ought to make it and live upon her income whatever it may be. They talk of her having only £500 per annum. As if hundreds did not marry having less than that income.

In the half dozen extracts we have given above from the Duke's correspondence, the attentive reader will find the fundamental lines of his character, and so of his genius, clearly exhibited. He had that rare combination of gifts which makes up the perfect man of action—the sagacity which penetrates to the main issues, the prudence which makes sure of the ground, the energy which strikes with all its collective force. In the disposition of his battles he showed to an extraordinary degree the most far-reaching prudence with youthful fire. His judgment retained under practically all circumstances its perfect equilibrium, and that is why he beat the French armies from pillar to post in the Peninsula War.

An Elemental Lyrist.

SONGS OF WOMANHOOD. By Laurence Alma Tadema. (Grant Richards. 3s. net.)

THOUGH these poems are now for the first time given to the public at large, many of them (as Miss Alma Tadema states in her preface) have already appeared in the pamphlet-volumes, "Herb o' Grace" and "Songs of Childhood." The best part of the book is still to be found in these older poems rather than in the later additions now for the first time included. Her most distinctive work is undoubtedly the poems of childhood and the poems of girlhood which are strongly allied in spirit. There are poems on children which appeal not to children but to their elders, and there are poems for children which appeal primarily to children themselves. Miss Tadema's, we think, belong mainly to the latter class. It is a class very difficult to write well. Even to write a poem which a child, of average literary intelligence, shall understand and enjoy, is a far more difficult task than appears on the surface, than would be conceived from the plain and baby-forthright result. The adult mind does not readily go back to short-clothes; and a single grown-up thought or phrase will mar the performance. But to do this, and withal give it literary merit—still more, poetic inspiration—is a feat extremely few can compass, or have compassed. But Miss Tadema is of those few. To say the bulk of her work is inspired, we will not indeed venture. But it has very decided and unusual literary merit. Here and there, moreover, is a poem which, without losing the elementary quality of the others, attains absolute poetry. And that, we repeat, is a very difficult achievement indeed. The best of these is the charming first poem, "King Baby":—

King Baby on his throne
Sits reigning O, sits reigning O!
King Baby on his throne
Sits reigning all alone.

His throne is Mother's knee,
So tender O, so tender O!
His throne is Mother's knee,
Where none may sit but he.
His crown it is of gold,
So curly O, so curly O!
His crown it is of gold,
In shining tendrils rolled.
His kingdom is my heart,
So loyal O, so loyal O!
His kingdom is my heart,
His own in every part.
Divine are all his laws,
So simple O, so simple O!
Divine are all his laws,
With Love for end and cause.
King Baby on his throne
Sits reigning O, sits reigning O!
King Baby on his throne
Sits reigning all alone.

That, indeed, is rather beyond a child's understanding; and perhaps when these poems do pass over into absolute poetry, it is by the intrusion of an adult thought. But they still remain within childish compass as a whole, and in their general tenor. So with "Bath-Time":—

Baby's got no legs at all,
They're soft and pinky, crumpled things;
If he stood up, he'd only fall:
But then, you see, he's used to wings.

The "Songs of Girlhood," not handicapped by like conditions, have some true poetry, with an artistic simplicity and sense of lyric form. Such are "The Clouded Soul" and "The Open Door." The essential gift is the same. Whether the author turns the daily cheep of a mother to her babe into an authentic little lyric like "Solace," or the cry of a girl's heart into poetry, it is the gift of seeing the lyricism in elemental things, and setting it simply down—natural as the cry of birds. And that is a rare gift in our artificial and outworn day. The sonnets and other poems in which the writer is frankly complex and modern are less distinguished from the bulk of present verse; but some of these, too, have a true poetic note in them. It is a volume modest and minor, but individualised and sincere, which deserves and should gain success.

Business America.

AMERICA AT WORK. By John Foster Fraser. (Cassell.)

THE author was born with an investigating mind, and in this book he inquires, at first hand, into the great industrial concerns of the United States, with a view to giving suggestions to the British manufacturer. It cannot be said that he is an expert, but he is at least a trained journalist: equitable, and plays neither to the gallery of one country nor the other. His opinions will not always be popular, but they merit appreciation.

Maybe the American employer is tired, just tired, worn out, just living to work and making money, but all the same there will be no "America at Play." America is in business with "both hands." The industrial community is of the first generation; the working man has the spice of adventure in him. You don't hear "I've got a wife and a family, and for their sakes I put up with a great deal." The American puts up with nothing. He has no master; he is just as good as his employer, as his "boss," and may be a bigger employer in five years time. And the "boss" encourages him, sucks his brains, pushes him on, lets him make mistakes if need be because of the potential grit. And so a man changes his profession a dozen times in as many years, quickly adapting himself to new conditions, patching up his education when at fault, always with his eyes open to material advantage and personal independence.

Mr. Foster says that the American business men did not impress him as having superior business qualities, but their secret of success seemed to be their supreme confidence. He specialises, and if a man misses chances, it is because he lacks brains. The weary-eyed employee, the clock-watcher, does not exist; the atmosphere, the environment, the mixture of races, will not allow a man to crawl where every one else is running.

"Had to!" "Have to!" is the real motive power. And the pace is furious. The healthy, fresh-faced, sleek employer has not yet put in an appearance; speaking of Chicago, Mr. Fraser says the streets are crammed with flabby-faced men, Teutons most of them, and a great proportion of them corpulent to unhealthiness, but they hustle:—

You bump into a man. It is no good apologising, for he is nearly half a block away. . . .

The elevators are always packed, tossing men to the top storey and dropping like stones to the ground floor. . . .

Talking to business men it is necessary to sit close and shout for the air shivers with the clatter of type-writers.

This is a useful book, and it has its lessons. Free from exaggeration, it prevents facts, gathered in the right place and put on record with an incisiveness that British Consuls the world over might copy with enormous advantage. And the moral of it all is this, that man for man the English employee is as good if not better than the American, but the British employer himself is at fault. He is not in business "with both hands," he is suffering from the complacency which sees with pride the reddening of the map, but does not realise that his bit of empire is at his own mill, his own works, his own office, his own store:—

Young America is getting ready to wrest the world's commerce from Great Britain . . . the competition will be relentless, savage, and there will be little consideration of humanity in it. The country with the best brains, the best machinery, and the cheapest transit will win.

The effect of this book is to make one wonder if material success in America, under the conditions described by Mr. Foster, is worth the winning. To us the life that some of these makers of America lead would be a nightmare.

Other New Books.

CHRISTIANITY AND MODERN CIVILIZATION: BEING SOME CHAPTERS IN EUROPEAN HISTORY. By W. S. Lilly. (Chapman and Hall.)

THIS is not a book at all. It has abundant bias, but no thesis. Are you interested in the Inquisition, its methods of cross-examination and of torture? You will find within these boards an essay on that "fascinating" subject. Would you have an opinion on St. Paul's style, or the authenticity of the various letters ascribed to him? These also are here. But you may reasonably urge that we are in the twentieth century, that the nineteenth has been, and you will turn the pages for something upon modern civilisation. And you will find it. From the chapter on the Inquisition you will pass, over a gulf of centuries, to the final essay, that upon marriage. Here, then, is an instant theme. Mr. Lilly has given us an account of the institution by the Church of the sacrament of holy matrimony. "We owe, then," he says, "to the severe teaching of the Catholic Church that institution of indissoluble monogamy which, more than anything else, marks off our modern civilisation from all other civilisations." Which is, having begged the question, to state the questioned truth. For does "indissoluble monogamy" express the entire relation between the sexes to-day? We fear not. Mr. Lilly calls in Prof. Karl Pearson and Mr. H. G. Wells to prophecy, which they do to his displeasure—and there he leaves us.

But this volume might yet be a book, for it might demonstrate Christianity to have been a weighty force in the production of modern society. True, this has been done already, but now-a-days it were well worth doing again. Unfortunately, however, it cannot be done by an aggregation of dis coherent essays, without organic unity, even though each, as we doubt not, has its own value. The sum is informed by enthusiasm, but the whole (if we can call it a whole) is a contribution, we fear we must say, to nothing.

THE SPIRIT AND ORIGIN OF CHRISTIAN MONASTICISM. By James O. Hannay. (Methuen. 6s.)

WE have read Mr. Hannay's book with a good deal of interest. He has studied his matter with a thoroughness born of genuine enthusiasm, and in presenting the reader with a purview of a great historical subject, has worked up a vast amount of particular detail into the woof of his narrative without overloading it with irrelevant ornament. He is neither dry nor prolix. He knows very clearly the conclusions towards which he is driving, and rarely, if ever, wanders from the direct path of his historical survey.

His sympathies are wholly with the ascetic ideal—the germ of which he has no hesitation in assigning to apostolic times, and indeed to the distinction between Counsels and Precepts by which the hard sayings of the Sermon on the Mount are traditionally interpreted. The place that the ascetic occupies in ecclesiastical polity he illustrates happily by a modern example:—

In the physical evolution of the higher forms of animal life from the protozoan, certain portions of the protoplasm set themselves apart for specialisation into the organs which possess the senses of sight and hearing. Sensitiveness to light, which was in some degree common to the whole body of the protozoan, got lost in process of development to all parts of the organism except those which had specialised into organs of sight, but in these organs was immensely intensified. Just so, in the development of the Christian Church, the vague asceticism which was once common to all believers specialised for the production of a certain kind of life, deliberately ascetic, sometimes very severely ascetic, tending always to become more clearly differentiated from ordinary Christianity.

It is curious that, having worked his way from the desert of Egypt into the West and lavished praise on the Benedictines, even this sympathetic observer of the Roman Catholic Church cannot part from his subject without a little preachment for the Society of Jesus. The Benedictine rule, we are told, "aimed at making good men, and left the question of their usefulness to God. The Jesuit discipline aimed at making men parts of a great machine . . . for the service of the Pope." Well, and what, since the world went ahead of the Church and began to think and act for itself, has the Benedictine Order done? It has written a little history, mainly about itself and its past grandeur, and it has discovered, it thinks, an ancient and more excellent way of rendering Plain Song. The Jesuits—but that is too long a story.

REPUBLICS VERSUS WOMAN. By Mrs. Woolsey. (Gay and Bird. 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a strange book. The author is a lady who—as we are informed in a biographical note—comes of a stock that has done the American State some service, but she is apparently seeking to do it the service of fostering discontent, by showing how badly off are the millions of women living under the rule of the great republics compared with those other millions who bloom under the benign influences of European monarchies. While travelling in Europe several years ago she was invited to give an address to a gathering of women anarchists—it being assumed that as an American she must be in sympathy with all forms of revolt against European social conventions—but her “extemporaneous address” must have come as a surprise to her listeners, for it went to show how much better off women are under the old rule than the new. Looking upon republicanism, anarchism, and socialism as “triplets,” Mrs. Woolsey thought that by showing how worthless was the eldest she could alienate her audience from the others: “two of the women especially would have been serious dangers to any government, and I am proud to relate that I changed their views and disbanded their organisation.” Rarely indeed is it given to an orator to achieve so prompt an end. Fortunately—and especially fortunate for those women living in their fool’s paradise in the West—there was a stenographer present, and the extemporaneous address thus becomes, with introduction and appendix, a book. Reading it, we are amazed to find from this transcription of a shorthand writer’s notes (“with about 50 added lines”) that the speaker could quote spontaneously definitions from many sources and pages of extracts from authorities in support of her case. We have here an extreme view which is not uninteresting, but which from the manner of its presentation is also somewhat more entertaining and less convincing than it is intended to be. If Mrs. Woolsey is so convinced of the wrong done to women by the republic, she might have prepared a careful, and perhaps convincing, statement of the position; the reproduction of stenographic notes of an extemporaneous address delivered to a gathering of foreign extremists may be curious, but it really carries little weight as argument. In one paragraph we seem to read the secret of the marriage of so many American women into the European peerages. “The greatest misfortune that ever befel American women was that their colonies broke away from English rule, for they must always desert their native land, kith and kin, and live under a foreign flag in order to gain the superior sex-recognition which a republic denies them.”

THE ROMANCE OF THE COLORADO RIVER. By F. S. Dellenbaugh. (Putnams.)

In spite of its alluring title, this book will be read for instruction rather than for delight. Mr. Dellenbaugh was a member of Major Powell’s second expedition in 1871–2 for the exploration of the Colorado Canyons. His personal narrative occupies four chapters out of fourteen, and is his excuse for the volume, which covers the whole known history of the experiences of white men in that remarkable region. The conquerors of Mexico, dazzled by rumours of seven yet more opulent cities, sent out expeditions by sea and land. The existence of the Colorado was discovered, but the seven cities declined into myth. Until the close of the eighteenth century patient Spanish missionaries maintained amongst the tribes of that fearsome wilderness the most unfruitful mission in the history of Christianity. Then came the trappers, by whom the grandeur and the terror of the Canyons were spread abroad. Not until 1869, however, was the work of exploration scientifically undertaken, though attempts to navigate the river from its mouth had been made without success. No great river in the world is so unfriendly to the purposes of man; sawing its cleft, sometimes 3,000 feet deep, through the great plateaus and mountain ranges, it descends in a series of six hundred rapids. These were passed by Major Powell in his two expeditions without loss of life.

The general effect of Mr. Dellenbaugh’s book is monotonous, and the human interest slight. The most interesting part of it is the sketch of Major Powell’s life and character. The volume is fully and excellently illustrated; it lacks, however, a good clear map of the whole district.

Fiction.

THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY REVEL. By A. T. Quiller-Couch. (Cassell. 6s.)

MR. QUILLER-COUCH has shown himself again and again to be a master of the short story; we doubt, indeed, whether we have an English writer able to surpass him in the art of brief and delicate suggestion. But we still wait for the novel which is to prove to us that Mr. Quiller-Couch’s talent can adapt itself to the wider field. The author’s earlier novels have had dramatic quality, invention, beauty, and a fine sense of romance; but these rare and admirable ingredients have never been perfectly blended. They are present in “The Adventures of Harry Revel,” but here again they are not blended into a compelling whole. The story lacks proportion; the first third is deliberate, detailed, and lovingly handled. The Foundling Hospital, Harry, and the delightful Miss Plinlimmon are presented with the assured simplicity and knowledge of real art. The remarkable incident of the sailor’s funeral, too, though it is told at too great length, we would not be without; it is a bit of the past made living and authentic. But after that the story seems to go to pieces; it is hurried without being cumulative in interest, and the conclusion is rather a compromise than a natural finish. Yet the book is one to be read and remembered. Miss Plinlimmon, that simple and kindly soul, is a piece of easy and finished portraiture; so, too, are Major Brooks and the seaman Joep. The style of the story has all Mr. Quiller-Couch’s quiet and controlled distinction; here at least we have clear and beautiful English. The author never strains after effects, yet he achieves them; he never forces a metaphor, yet the impression springs instant from the page. We shall not quote, because the author’s work does not lend itself to detached illustration.

We believe that some day Mr. Quiller-Couch will write a fine novel; but as yet he has not quite found himself.

REPROBATE SILVER. By Roy Devereux. (Grant Richards. 6s.)

IF we say that this story is in part a study in heredity we do not mean to imply that it is dull. But underneath the often flippant and generally amusing descriptions of a society which has reverted to the morals of the poultry yard, and even says such things as “How duckie of you to come!” there is a really strong idea, lending as it were a body to justify the froth. Lora is the adored daughter of Lord Orpington, for she is the living image of the mother she cannot remember, the mother who after a short and brilliant reign as a beauty was “reconciled” to the Catholic church by Monsignore Ferroni and retired to a convent to die. One night Lora, searching in an old cabinet of her mother’s, finds in a secret drawer some letters which prove that she is not the daughter of the fond and rather foolish Lord Orpington, but of some nameless lover of her dead mother. Such a secret—for, of course, it must remain a secret—necessarily colours the life of Lora. She instantly accepts an offer of marriage from an elderly American millionaire, who lifts Lord Orpington out of debt, builds his wife a palace on the Embankment, and never asks for greater reward than a kiss upon her cheek. For five years and more Lady Lora Kean keeps herself unspotted in a world of mud tempered by nuggets. Then, after the first act of “Tristan”—

“So always,” she said, “should love be born in one terrible lightning flash, obliterating the past and the future alike. If ever love comes to me, which is unlikely, it will come that way.”

It came within a few minutes—with Cyril Burdon. We will not disclose further the working out of a story of peculiar poignancy set in a framework of frivolous and sordid immorality. But behind all is the background of the mother's sin, unknown to anybody but her daughter and that daughter's father, and dominating the fortunes of many who are unwitting, more especially of the daughter, who is horribly conscious. Mrs. Devereux has built an airy structure—of the debased “tween-cent” order, as Lady Harborough might say—on a very solid foundation.

LOVEY MARY. By Alice Hegan Rice. (Hodder & Stoughton. 5s.)

Mrs. Rice has achieved something of a triumph, and has come into the kingdom she pegged out for herself. It is not a large kingdom; it is a mere “Cabbage Patch” on the edge of a big American city, where the trains go thundering by. But she has peopled that kingdom with real subjects, and in this succeeding volume Mrs. Wiggs appears once more, in the capacity, as it were, of chorus. Lovey Mary is a little derelict in a Home, and is put in charge of Tommy (an unauthorised baby). She is so fond of Tommy that when his mother threatens to take him away she elopes with Tommy, now able to walk with credit. She finds the Cabbage Patch. There is no story to describe, or rather what there is has no relation to the merits of the book, which lie solely in the delightful study of the colonists of this settlement, within din of the trains, and yet so apart, and so real. Miss Hazy, the incompetent, who accepts Lovey Mary as a boarder, and is straightened up by her; Billy, who will yet grow up to marry Lovey Mary if he knows what he is about, all are punched out clearly enough by the author of their being, but Mrs. Wiggs remains the queen of the patch. One might quote many instances of her cheerful facing of difficulties. But here is an example of her philosophy. Lovey Mary was a little anxious about her position as the abductor of Tommy:—

Mrs. Wiggs eyed her keenly. “Pesterin’ about somethin’?” she asked.

“Yes’m,” said Lovey Mary, in a low tone.

“Somethin’ that’s already did?”

“Yes’m”—still lower.

“Did you think you was actin’ fer the best?”

The girl lifted a pair of grey eyes shining with honesty.

“Yes, ma’am, I did,” she said, earnestly.

“I bet you did!” said Mrs. Wiggs, heartily. “You ain’t got a deceivin’ bone in yer body. Now what you want to do is to brace up yer sperrits. The decidin’ time was the time fer worryin’. You’ve did what you thought was best; now you want to stop thinkin’ ’bout it. You don’t want to go round turnin’ folks’ thoughts sour jes to look at you. Most girls that had white teeth like you would be smilin’ to show ’em, if fer nothin’ else.”

This philosophy of Mrs. Wiggs pervades the Cabbage Patch, and the humour of it pervades Mrs. Rice’s book.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week’s Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

PARK LANE.

By PERCY WHITE.

The narrator of the story is described as “the sort of fellow a small competency ruins.” He is a familiar figure in contemporary fiction, garrulous, light-hearted, a keen observer of the trivialities of life, and entertaining in youth a vague aspiration towards journalism because of its “didactic opportunities.” He lost his illusions, but became secretary to the Society for Promoting Rational Knowledge, and the rest is just what we have learned to expect from Mr. Percy White. (Constable. 6s.)

GEORGE GORING’S DAUGHTERS.

By M. E. CARR.

“Combe Chace lies above the valley of the Swift, in the very heart of the moor.” There the two girls grew up, alone, but for the occasional visits of their father, a man of fashion intimate with the Count D’Orsay. About their mother, whom they never see, there hangs a mystery. Their early influences, the books in the library, the moor and the old servants are carefully described, but we are nearly half way through the book before the girls are sent to school, and the movement of the story is deliberate throughout. Miss Carr is the author of “Love and Honour.” (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

ANGEL JIM.

By A. G. HALES.

A story of farm life in California. Mr. Hales’ sympathetic portraiture of quiet pastoral scenes, of the Zionist population, the Indians, and the old Spanish monastery, makes us forget that he was ever a war correspondent and the author of “Campaign Pictures.” Angel Jim became a jockey, and for a time the scene changes to London, where we get the note of Imperialism, and hear of “the historic waters of the mighty Thames.” But happily we are soon back in California among the Zionists. (Treherne. 6s.)

THE SUBSTITUTE.

By WILL N. HARBEN.

A story of middle-class life in America. In the first chapter we have a quaint picture of a provincial court of law in which the father of the hero is convicted of stealing a bale of cotton from a neighbour’s barn. The crime of the father becomes an obsession to the son, and the story is occupied with his struggles. Mr. Harben manages the dialect well and displays a considerable appreciation of American life and character. (Harper. 6s.)

THE DUKE DECIDES.

By HEADON HILL.

The Duke, before he became a duke, was an impecunious gentleman engaged in adding up columns of figures in a draper’s shop in New York. He had been in a cavalry regiment, and “extravagance beyond his means had brought swift ruin in its train,” so that he fell an easy prey to the gang of swindlers who lured him to take part in a daring enterprise. But no sooner had he joined the criminal classes than he became the Duke of Beaumanoir. That is Mr. Headon Hill’s latest notion for a plot, and he develops it with all his accustomed resource. (Cassell. 6s.)

FRANCEZKA.

By MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL.

A spirited romance of the eighteenth century. It opens in Paris in the year 1726, where we first meet the heroine, a niece of the Countess Riano, playing a leading part in one of the open-air theatres. The prank is discovered, and in the course of a buoyant description of Parisian life we are introduced to Voltaire, who alights from a coach in company with Mademoiselle Lecouvreur for whom he has written the part of “Marianne.” (Richards. 6s.)

A BONNIE SAXON.

By SILAS K. HOCKING.

One [of Mr. Hocking’s pretty sentimental love stories. The Bonnie Saxon was the squire’s daughter. The Celt was a disillusioned young man of seventeen who hated the squire and all his race. (Warne. 3s. 6d.)

BENEATH THE VEIL.

By ADELINE SERGEANT.

The story of a good woman, a bad woman, and “a very straightforward young man.” The women were half-sisters. The elder became a professional singer, but in the fifth chapter we meet her as Madame Zaresco, engaged in luring young men to a “little gamble” in which they invariably lost. A study of some of the seamy sides of modern life. (Long. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage) 17/6
„ Quarterly 5/0
„ Price for one issue /5

A Poet's Table Talk.

THE words "Poetry, Vol. VI.," on the back of Mr. Murray's new edition of "Don Juan," have more arithmetical than literary importance, for if all the poems in the preceding volumes were to perish to-morrow, Byron's reputation would stand unshaken on "Vol. VI." It is become a commonplace that "Don Juan" embraces all that he could do in literature. It conveys his best in his aptest manner. It is large, various and headstrong as himself, throbbing with those energies of love, hate, contempt, analysis, and worship to which his unsteady genius could give no perfect separate expression. He could fuse these inimitably after one fashion, the fashion of "Don Juan." This poem is not more alone among his works than it is alone among all English books. Many poets have given life and spiritual unity to a story, some have built up an argument with Orphean grace, but only Byron has maintained the warmth and tension of a giant through sixteen cantos of miscellaneous remarks. Well was that friend inspired who wrote to him: "Stick to 'Don Juan,' it is the only sincere thing you have written, and it will live after all your 'Harolds' have ceased to be 'a schoolgirl's tale, the wonder of an hour.' It is the best of all your works—the most spirited, the most straightforward, the most interesting, the most poetical." This far-seeing reader did not need to be told that Byron's fame would cease to rest on his poems and dramas of dark-souled loneliness, and would be firmly re-established on his dashed-off letters and his poetic table-talk.

For Don Juan is table-talk: the finest in the language. It has neither story nor purpose. Its integral form never troubled Byron. He finished its first canto in Venice in 1818, and wrote to Moore: "It is called 'Don Juan,' and is meant to be a little quietly facetious upon everything." Type-writing was not, and what with his rides on the Lido, his love-making to Margarita Cogni, and his chance intrigues at opera and ridotto, he found the copying of his rough draft an intolerable bore. The poem struggled into being by fits and bits, and was regarded by him with mixed feelings of indifference and jealousy. "The poem will please, if it is lively," he wrote Murray with the second canto, "if it is stupid it will fail: but I will have none of your damned cutting and slashing." Three months later it is: "You ask me if I mean to continue D.J., &c. How should I know? What encouragement do you give me, all of you, with your nonsensical prudery? publish the two Cantos, and then you will see."

The one purpose that grew in him was to write his mind into "Don Juan." "Come what may I never will flatter the million's canting in any shape." Later still, he will let Murray suppress the cantos he has in hand, aye, and burn them if he is afraid of the growing outcry, but patch and palliate he will not; he will either "make a spoon or spoil a horn," and there's an end." Almost three years pass before he is on the fifth canto, but this is "hardly the beginning," and he does not know how he will go on or whether, if he lives, he will go on at all. Three months later he has promised the Countess Guiccioli to drop the work; Murray is to look upon the finished cantos as the last; the Countess's objection, he explains, "arises from the wish of all women to exalt the sentiment of the passions. . . . Now Don Juan strips off this illusion, and laughs at that and most other things." And so the see-saw of work and neglect continued. The first canto was of 1818, the sixteenth was of 1823. The length and shapelessness of the work became his own jest:—

I rattle on exactly as I'd talk
 With anybody in a ride or walk, a statement in which there is no affectation. "His conversation," says Stanhope, "was a mixture of philosophy and slang, of everything, like his 'Don Juan.'"

We save much unprofitable discussion by accepting "Don Juan" as the metrical table-talk of a man full of fire, sensibility, and experience. It bursts into poetry, as such talk will; it is wilfully and abundantly changeful; the white-hot outburst is cooled by a gibe; the expected climax is delayed by a caprice; and the torrent rushes headlong or whirls idly, but always with the strength or restraint of a great and whimsical whole. The one persisting poetic character is the measure. Never was verse so managed and moulded. Impassioned poetry, trivial badinage, tersest narrative, lightest reflection—all find in Byron's ottava rima an easy vehicle. Compare:—

Ave Maria! blessed be the hour!
 The time, the clime, the spot, where I so oft
 Have felt that moment in its fullest power
 Sink o'er the earth—so beautiful and soft—
 While swung the deep bell in the distant tower,
 On the faint dying day-hymn stole aloft,
 And not a breath crept through the rosy air,
 And yet the forest leaves seemed stirred with prayer,

with the death of the highwayman on Shooter's Hill:—

But ere they could perform this pious duty,
 The dying man cried, "Hold! I've got my gruel!
 Oh! for a glass of max! We've missed our booty;
 Let me die where I am!" And as the fuel
 Of life shrunk in his heart, and thick and sooty
 The drops fell from his death-wound, and he drew ill
 His breath,—he from his swelling throat untied
 A kerchief, crying, "Give Sal that!"—and died.

And then compare both with the description of the picture gallery at Newstead Abbey:—

But ever and anon, to soothe your vision,
 Fatigued with these hereditary glories,
 There rose a Carlo Dolce or a Titian,
 Or wilder group of savage Salvatore's:
 Here danced Albano's boys, and here the sea shone
 In Vernet's ocean lights; and there the stories
 Of martyrs awed, as Spagnoletto tainted
 His brush with all the blood of all the sainted.
 Here sweetly spread a landscape of Lorraine;
 There Rembrandt made his darkness equal light,
 Or gloomy Caravaggio's gloomier stain
 Bronzed o'er some lean and stoic anchorite:—
 But, lo! a Teniers woos, and not in vain,
 Your eyes to revel in a livelier sight:
 His bell-mouth'd goblet makes me feel quite Danish
 Or Dutch with thirst—What, ho! a flask of Rhenish.

But the secret of "Don Juan's" appeal lies deeper. Why will men not willingly let die a poem so charged with irreverence for things above and contempt for things below? Is it not because we all savour Byron's opinions in moments and crises of our lives, and are pleased to find them finely phrased, and linked to a splendid personality? It must be remembered that "Don Juan" produces no impression of world-weariness. It is not a sigh, but a shout. Open it where you will it flashes life. The negations and nihilisms with which it abounds are uttered as roundly as other men's faiths; there is no miserable infection of the utterance; no miasma or helpless ranting. Every line reveals the cheerful yet implacable fighter. Naturally, the poem offers no regular inspiration or guidance. It is rather an armoury, to be visited on occasion.

Indeed, its mission to the individual now is not different from its mission to society eighty years ago. The collapse of Napoleon had brought every government to its feet, resolved to shut those fateful swinging doors through which men had for twenty-five years caught maddening glimpses of a new social order, wider institutions, a sunnier freedom. It was Byron's aim to keep alive these visions and the formative discontent they produced, to explode the closing mine, to probe the healing wounds. He attempted this in the only way possible to himself; he flung his own picturesque denials, his own passionate protests, broad-cast over Europe. He gave a form and a human reference to all these hesitant geyser-like aspirations, these smouldering thoughts of destruction and reconstruction; he gave them the embodiment of his own heart and career. While kingship and the old institutions and the old banalities were returning to their seats he remained convinced that their day was over, and that, though he would not like to live to see it, the breath of republicanism must soon fill the nation's lungs and bring new light to their eyes. There has been no rapid or striking fulfilment of his dream, and where the fulfilment has been greatest—in England, in France, in America—there has been re-action. The world will mend at its own pace, and largely in deviation from programmes. Yet Byron sowed the spirit of questioning, and the courage of denial, deep in the hearts of men; and without these nothing can be done. His scorn of social selfishness has made such scorn easier of attainment, and more to be dreaded. His independence has had the same result.

Nor is the appeal of "Don Juan" weakened because for a hundred years Europe has seen no upheaval of earth-shaking magnitude. The poem is not a gospel or a propaganda: it is an armoury of opinions and phrases to which men will have recourse according to their needs. Few men shape their lives by a steady compass. Faith they must have, but a secret loyalty to truth forbids them ever to lose touch of doubt. Ease they seek, but deep down in their hearts there is a response to a noble discontent. Morality they all preserve, but with a haunting conviction that the rules must be altered. Woman they worship, yet with memories of the Apple which will still be uttered. Knowledge they amass, but ever they will go behind it and say "We know nothing." Thus it is that though Byron is no man's guide, he will always have a hearing. The mere stimulus of his opinions and ejaculations is of value. He is our deputy-rebel, and he has this advantage, that he speaks not as a croaker in a corner, but, with incomparable strength of utterance, as a man who had seen the kingdoms of the world and their glory.

The permanence of "Don Juan," then, is accounted for by its almost unparalleled display of reckless intelligence warmed by poetic fervour. In it Byron meets us on no practicable plane of social or individual aspiration: he has none for his own feet; but he does help us by the abundance and courage of his ideas on man and his turbid feelings, on the world and its welter of affairs.

Is English Literature Dying?

Is English literature dying? Mr. W. M. Lightbody, by the title of his article in the April number of the "Westminster Review," implies that it is, though he does not directly assert it. We have our own views on the point; but if we substitute, "Is English literature at present languishing?" we shall remove the question from the range of serious controversy, and perhaps represent better Mr.

Lightbody's meaning. For no man of fine taste can doubt that English letters are just now in a bad way, despite individual writers who maintain the high tradition—at what cost to themselves perhaps they best know. Mr. Lightbody's comments on the causes of this decadence are in the main just; but they are not complete, and are accompanied with some extravagance. To say that posterity will look back upon the last decades of the nineteenth century (which is a polite way of saying our own day) as a blank in English literature is rashness. The ranks, he says, are too full, owing to lenient critics; and there are no prominent names to mark the period in the eyes of posterity. But the truth is, there are reviewers and reviewers. The few who discern are perhaps more numerous than they ever were. The many half-competent are certainly more numerous than ever they were. It is the half-competent who praise mediocrities with hyperbolic and guilty verbiage. But they have a saving quality—they fasten instinctively and savagely on anything original which appears. For the old truculence is not extinct, nor ever will be while man is man. So, also, we have a great fecundity of writers of eminent talent: among whom it is doubtless difficult to single forth the few of actual genius. But was it not so in the earlier part of the nineteenth century? Their names stand clear now, but they did not stand clear then. Any cyclopædia of English literature will show what thronging mediocrities then obscured the recognition of the true stars.

Mr. Lightbody, however, is surely right when he recognises a main cause of our declension in the democratizing (if we may use the phrase) of modern literature. The small but educated audience of previous ages is replaced by a great scarce-educated audience. Mr. Lightbody hopes that the education of this democracy will gradually broaden and deepen, till they replace the old select audience. This is one of those pathetic beliefs which fill us with despairing pity. When we shall have attained universal perfectibility; when we shall have acclimatized Heaven in England; when men cross-breed with angels, evolving a progeny that has lost its wings, but is yet capable of passing through brick walls and living on theories supplemented by mild ginger-ale; then we look for this enlightened democracy which shall trifle with Meredith and toy—between working-shifts—with the novels of Mr. Henry James. Undoubtedly, as things stand, the majority of writers drift towards the best paid market, and write for the democracy which is our new patron of letters. And undoubtedly this does much to sap the integrity of literature. But this is not all. The small but cultivated circle of readers which made the audience of former writers is ceasing to exist. The aristocracy formed an influential element in that audience. It was part of a nobleman's character to have a taste for and patronage of letters, in the days of our ancestors: now, the aristocracy is the last quarter to which one looks for literary cultivation. And the circle of those who love letters grows smaller year by year. That, at least, cannot be ascribed to the advent of the democracy. If every year adds to the readers of scraps and snippets, while it takes away from the narrowing number of intellectual readers, if an unlettered democracy is balanced by an unlettered aristocracy, the cause lies in the deepening materialism of the age, the race for wealth, the struggle to live. Men who will not take time to digest their food, are not likely to take time to digest their books. Quick-lunching and hasty reading go together. To read properly is to think; and to think requires leisure. Something, again, is perhaps due to declining energy. Numbers find leisure for foolish reading, who would faint at the notion of concentrating their minds on a book. A tired and blasé generation has lost the sap for mental effort. Finally, the thirst for gold and pleasure is contagious, more contagious than the thirst for knowledge. It must increase, while the other decreases.

Impressions.

XXX.—Fear and Joy.

THE man's nervousness communicated itself to me. That heavy motionless air heralding the thunderstorm affected him painfully, as if he feared the something that threatened him; when the lightning forked across the night sky he threw up his head and chewed his lips. In appearance he was not an apprehensive man. Big made, burly, bearded, he looked like one who could hold his own in any combat, real or imaginary. His hands were hard and huge as a blacksmith's; but they were always, as it were, working, trying to grasp, handle, knead, and polish something that was not there.

It was those agitated hands that first told me the man was suffering acutely from the oppression of the night. He was away from his right environment, that was plain. Inaction tormented him; thought or reflection could not ease the internal disquietude that the portentous atmospheric conditions of the night had kindled in him. He needed his own accustomed method of alleviation, but what it was I could not guess. And his hands continued to grasp and knead impalpable things. Suddenly he turned to me and said, "We go home the same way, I hope." There was fear in his eyes.

The night was black when we started, but the right-of-way path across the slushy fields had been newly gravelled, and it was not hard to follow that spectral, yellow, upward climbing trail. This man, burly and big-chested, clung to my arm like a child, muttering, "The corner, the corner, it will be all right when we have passed the corner." "Why?" I asked at length. "You can see the light in my room when we have passed the corner," he answered. "I always keep the lamp burning. It shines through the holland blind across the common."

At the corner the wind blew us off the yellow path. We stumbled together, he dragging so heavily on my arm, and the wind contesting every attempt to stagger from the mire, that I thought we should never recover the yellow ribbon of path. But once on it again we set ourselves at the corner, turned it panting, nearly spent, and there, right before us, across the common, shone the lighted window.

The man ran; I in pursuit. He vaulted the gate, and disappeared within the cottage. For some seconds I fumbled with the lock, then followed him indoors. He was not in the parlour where the lamp stood, but I heard him singing somewhere at the back. I sought the voice across a paved yard to a large outhouse, brilliantly illuminated. It was the studio of a sculptor, craftsman, worker in metal. On a deal table stood a great, gleaming centre-piece. The base was a wide silver bowl, the sides fashioned like breaking waves, cresting outwards: the bed of the bowl was rippled like the shore-reaching sea. From the middle of the bowl sprang a slender tree-like erection of bright silver, broken halfway by the figures of four ragged mariners listening, and at the summit was a figure of Pan—goat-footed, smiling, exultant—protected by a group of symbolical woodland creatures half concealed, half-emerging from foliage.

The man broke off in his song, and cried to me over his shoulder: "You know the legend—in Plutarch—ah!" Then he sang again, and all the while his hands were polishing the silver. Over the shiny surfaces, over every nook and cranny, passed the palms of his hands with swift, affectionate movements, polishing and re-polishing. Those nimble, nervous movements on the gleaming metal hypnotised me, and I watched him till dawn broke into the room, and fought silently for mastery with the lamp-light. He was a changed man. Activity, the occupation of his hands, had exorcised the fear that brooding through the night had wrought in him. When his arms dropped with fatigue, he would dip a brush into a bottle of benzine, and wash the faces of marble busts with the liquid. Then, singing again, he would return impetuously to the polishing, a vision of joy in work, in life, in himself, and above his head shone the figure of Pan—goat-footed, smiling, exultant.

Drama.

A Play of Good Hope.

THE Stage Society have really triumphed with their fourth production for the present season. In "The Good Hope," written by the Dutch playwright Hermann Heijermans, and translated for the Society by Christopher St. John, we have, for once, no make-believe or travesty of emotion, but honest, profound and purifying emotion itself. The piece is by no means without its technical faults. It is not what you would call a well-made play. It has its longueurs. It labours and repeats some of its points. But it succeeds, because it keeps close to life itself, and to the essentially tragic in life. Hermann Heijermans writes of what he knows, of what he has observed closely, and felt pitifully. His theme is of the eternal sorrow of the fisher-folk, which has been theirs since first the neolithic ancestor contrived his coracle of skins, and trusted his well-being, and that of his mate and his children, to the most treacherous and remorseless of the deities. Day by day, or month by month, as the case may be, the fisherman sets out, with the thin plank between himself and eternity, and at the bottom of his heart he knows well that one such voyage will be his last. Custom and the stress of work, and the goad of hunger, are his narcotics. But the women sit at home and tremble through every storm, waiting for the inevitable day which shall add them and theirs to the number of the widows and the orphans. For them the terrible realities of life never cease to be real and imminent. Their existence is profoundly human, for it is constantly attuned to the expectation of disaster. It is this sense of humanity, with its brooding atmosphere of tragedy, that has passed into Heijerman's play and made of it a genuine and touching work of art. "The Good Hope" goes out to sea and half the village, all the audience, know that she will never come back again. The men in her are sons and lovers. She bears the livelihood of ancient parents, the hope of children yet unborn. There is drinking and singing, and the fear of the heart is silent. The lasses troop to the quay with their lads, and return to bear the burden alone. One boy is afraid to go. His father and two of his brothers have been drowned before him. But he has signed on, and go he must, and his mother looses the hands that cling to the door-posts. It is his body that will be washed ashore, in an advanced state of decomposition, and will give the first definite tidings of the wreck. The finest part of the play is probably the third act. It is the night of the storm. The winds and waves buffet each other outside the poor cottage where the women are huddled together for company. The smack-owner's daughter is there, and the elder women, in whom the sense of tragedy has been partly deadened by use and want, tell her tales of former storms which have left them, one after another, widows. On the outskirts of the group are two girls, for whom the tension is intolerable. They are with child by two of the fishermen, and each of them knows that, if the ship does not come back, the child that is to be born to her will be a child of shame.

Heijermans has complicated his story with another motive. The play is not only an expression of the inevitable tragedy of them that go down to the sea in ships. It is also an indictment of a human wrong. "The "Good Hope" is unseaworthy, a coffin ship. She is not meant to come back, and behind the picture of the natural sorrow you have that of the hypocrisy of the smack-owner, and the distress of the daughter who has surprised his secret. I do not feel sure that the play would not have been finer if this element had been omitted. I am not in the least one who desires to hold a brief for capital. On the contrary, the shipping trade, like every other branch of the great system, whereby human lives and human souls are daily exploited for individual profit, seems to me admirable game for the drama. The indictment of the capitalist is a legitimate and pressing duty of literature. But I rather feel that Heijermans has mixed up two things, both of which would have been more effective if they had been kept apart. The tragic theme is big enough and absorbing enough to stand by itself. By juxtaposing the human perversity you only detract from its dignity. On the other hand, I am sure that when drama sets out to right human wrongs, its proper weapon is comedy and not tragedy. Mr. Bernard Shaw is on the right track in "Widowers' Houses." Tragedy moves and comedy teaches. It is by a clearance of the brain, not by a purging of the heart, that the coffin ship and the other abominations of an industrial civilisation are to be got rid of. For obviously it is not the smack-owner himself, whom the dramatic exposition of his wickedness is to affect, but the community as a whole. And that the community as a whole lets the accursed thing stand where it ought not is a fact rather to be expressed, one hopes, in terms of mental blindness, than in those of original sin.

The play is my business, rather than the players. But one hardly likes to let the performance of "The Good Hope" pass without taking notice of the extraordinary merit of the representation. Fortunately neither the funds nor the principles of the Stage Society, nor the structure of Heijerman's play, encourage the "star" system. But I have rarely seen a piece to which so many comparatively young actors brought so much intelligence, sincerity, and talent. Miss Rosina Filippi, Miss Margaret Halstan, Miss Beryl Faber, Miss Edith Craig, Miss Irene Rooke, Mr. Lyall Swete, Mr. Granville Barker, Mr. C. B. Clarence—all these, to name no others, struck me as, in their various ways, astonishingly good. And it is certainly a hopeful augury that the unconventional and unremunerative opportunities offered by the Stage Society should appeal as strongly as they appear to do to precisely those actors and actresses with whom the future of the stage as a profession will probably rest. Shall I be thought hypercritical if I say that, in spite of its individual merits, the acting of "The Good Hope" seemed to me, as a whole, to lack repose? I am convinced that the acting of tragedy should be as little restless and as far rhythmical as possible; and, though I am not concerned for realism in the matter, I do not think that, in the present instance, a nearer approach to my ideal would have been in any way untrue to the actual facts of the life depicted.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

From Watts to Boldini.

QUARTER of a century ago the opening of the Grosvenor Gallery added to the influence of the artist and to the gaiety of the amateur. Burne Jones was the protagonist of the new movement, and around him gathered many artists of individual vision, who were antipathetic to the methods of Burlington House. To-day the Grosvenor Gallery is being converted into a sale room for a new kind of musical instrument. With the opening of the New Gallery some fifteen years ago another pebble of protestation was thrown into the Art stream. Painters sympathetic to the new movement (there is always a new movement) were invited to contribute. Last Monday at the hour of 10 a.m. the sixteenth summer exhibition of the New Gallery began.

Its period of protestation is over. Many of the protestors have sunk into the everlasting arms of the Royal Academy, and the protestors of the hour must be sought at the new English Art Club, and in little, grave galleries in quiet West-end streets. The New Gallery is now as Catholic as the Royal Academy: it offers hospitality to Mr. Watts's embracive idealism, and to Signor Boldini's last word in modernity. Away from the Italian master there is little that is novel or original about the present exhibition. It is a Royal Academy in miniature: on the walls are pictures quite as bad as some at Burlington House, and I do not think that the most indulgent critic would assert that the average is higher. In subject pictures the tendency of British art to-day, as exemplified by this exhibition, is towards symbolical, allegorical, and religious themes. They range from the large works of Mr. G. F. Watts to the small works of Mr. Bernard Sleight, who is, I believe, a member of the Birmingham group of neo-PreRaphaelites. He has succeeded perfectly in eliminating every trace of religious or mystical suggestion from his "Annunciation." It contains a piece of furniture that might have been copied from a model at the recent Arts and Crafts Exhibition.

Mr. Watts's chief contribution is a large blue arrangement, his favourite blue which it is always a pleasure to see, called "The Sower of the Systems." The Eternal, comets flaming above his concealed head, strides across the sky scattering embryonic worlds into the blue void. One hand and one foot, ancient and ardent, are visible. Possibly there are some who will be impressed by Mr. Watts's sincere desire to portray on canvas the figure of an anthropomorphic deity. I was not. There are some subjects left that are beyond painting, and surely this is one. Stupendous themes expressed in paint or words do not necessarily incite awe or reverence in the beholder, else the late John Martin, whose colossal works have now found a refuge at the Alexandra Palace, would still be hailed as one of the masters of the last century. Such a picture as Mr. Watts's "For He Had Great Possessions" at the Tate Gallery, which has the right note of simplicity, impresses me much more than his "Sower of the Systems." Few if any of the religious or allegorical pictures at the New Gallery have the rare note of simplicity of treatment. Mr. Byam Shaw's "Here We Have No Continuing City, But We Seek One To Come" conveys nothing but a sense of sombrely decorative confusion. Sir James Linton's "Washing the Beggar's Feet on Maundy Thursday" is memorably painstaking. It has eighteen figures, each figure is as important as its companions, and each is devotedly occupied with its own incidental business. The jester playing with a bladder is quite as prominent as the central figure. Similarly in Sir James Linton's "Madonna and Child" it is the painting of the velvets that arrests the attention, and not the figures of the Mother and Child to whom all the accessories should minister. Some of the other religious pictures, ambitious and futile, are better left unnoticed. After these would-be religious works it was a relief to pause before Mr. Ralph Peacock's "All's Right With The World," a domestic picture if you will, a mother tossing her baby in the air, but full of life and movement. Pleasant, too, was it to meet Mr. George Wetherbee's fresh nude with the streaming hair, poised on the crest of a wave, onrushing through the spray, and the honest workmanship of Mrs. Stokes's "Melisande." Imagination and invention are excellent qualities in art as in literature, but discipline, control, and the determination to be guided by the eye, to master the modest subject rather than to grapple in the dark with the superhuman, is for most of us the wiser course.

Portrait painters have not this temptation to overreach themselves, and it is the portraits that give distinction to the present exhibition at the New Gallery. The sensation is Signor Boldini's presentment of Mr. Whistler. An eminent critic has said that "if we except Mr. Whistler's own pictures this is the most extraordinary example of portraiture exhibited in this country during recent years." The portrait is not new. Paris and other continental cities have seen it, but this typical example of modernity in portraiture has not been seen before in London. Seated sideways in a grey chair placed in an empty room, the slight, alert figure of Mr. Whistler, with a claw-like hand thrust into his ruffled hair, peers, a little malicious, a little amused, shrewdly, out upon the world. An architectural silk hat rests on his knee, a decoration, a tiny point of red, gleams from his button hole. You look at it and say: "How clever! how brilliant! how very modern! how restless!" True, but a great portrait demands something more—dignity and suavity; a great portrait does not hover so near to the border of caricature.

Between the demoniacal cleverness of this portrait, and the ideal visions of Mr. Watts, the contributions to this very various collection range. Close to the Boldini hangs Mr. Lavery's "Spring," well named. It is a portrait picture of a girl in a white dress, carrying a branch of white blossom; in her straw hat is a note of blue. This delightful figure in easy movement is touched with a lightness so virginal and spring-like that the wall is brightened by her presence. Mr. Lavery's other portrait of "Miss Idonia La Primaudaye," equally imaginative, is a study in repose. The blue stone hanging from the wrist, the shimmer of blue in the front of the dress, the grey background, the gilt chair, all give point to the dark distinguished figure so naturally posed. Accomplished, too, is Mr. Shannon's rich but austere treatment of his decorative portrait of "Baron de Meyer," and his sympathetic rendering of Miss Penelope Lawrence, one of his many admirable portraits of pensive, intellectual women. All these have imagination. There are other portraits which no doubt are excellent likenesses, but unless the painter can add that something over and above the capacity of the camera, the critic does not feel compelled to make any commendatory comment. Many of them would gain by a little of Mr. Watts's idealism, or a little of Signor Boldini's cleverness.

It is impossible to overlook Mr. Austen Brown's "A Peasant Idyll," which shines out from a wall in the north room, as conspicuous an object as the reflection of a big fire in a night sky. An ardent painter of sunlight always predisposes me to offer a ringing welcome, but there are limits even to the presentation of sunshine, and this picture of two peasants seated at their evening meal, under trees, in a glow of light that I cannot imagine could emanate from the most powerful of southern suns, is keyed up so high above even exhibition pitch, that their near neighbours must wish the peasants had chosen a less garishly illuminated spot for their evening meal. But the blue of the dishes is beautifully rendered. By way of contrast, and as a reminder how differently painters select their subjects, look at Mr. Peppercorn's "Evening," a view of a wide, faintly luminous sky above an arm of sea. There is quality and truth in this still, grey-green seascape. I should never tire of it, but the "Peasant Idyll" would make me start as regularly as the postman's knock. Mr. Moffat Lindner has treated light with respect in his beautiful "The Flowing Tide," letting it gleam out from the foam on the crest of the waves, and linger delicately in the purple of the shallows.

Among the other pictures that gave me more than a passing pleasure were Mr. Padgett's wet marshes of Winchelsea, Mr. Edward Stott's cottage garden with the dim flower-beds disappearing in the illumination from the lighted window, Mr. Bernard Priestman's pastoral with the very feeling of early morning, and Mr. Adrian Stokes's vivid picture of mountains. But when I went a second time to the gallery it was primarily to look again at the "Mr. Whistler" and the "Spring," and to try if I could persuade myself into liking "The Sower of the Systems" by Mr. Watts.

C. L. H.

Science.

Song.

PERHAPS there is some irony in the insinuation that this is an appropriate season to discuss the physiology of singing, when the past week has been occupied with valiant attempts on the part of many vocalists to sing the almost unsingable music of the later Wagner; but Mozart and the earlier Verdi are to follow, wherein to sing one must be a singer.

Over the human larynx itself, the mere motor machine, I am not going into raptures. Delicate though its construction be, man's voice-box or "Adam's apple" is not the finest musical instrument we know. The entire arrangement, including the left half of the cerebrum of the brain (with which all right-handed people sing), is not to be paralleled anywhere; but the human larynx itself is surpassed in many of the lower animals. The birds, for instance, have an admirably contrived larynx that is quite as good as ours; but to this stringed or reeded instrument they add the syrinx, which is simply an organ-pipe. They have wind and strings in one. Nor am I going to discuss at length the evolution of the larynx, nor question why the "wise thrush" of April is always of the sterner sex. Suffice it that our organ of voice is the homologue of one of the gill arches of the fish, as our organ of hearing is a homologue of another. It is so; but we will wonder not less but more, at the larynx of a Santley or a Jenny Lind, and the ear of a Hallé or a Richter, if we remember the base degrees by which they did ascend.

The vocal cords are made of fine elastic tissue covered with a single layer of flattened but living cells. They are attached and fixed in front to the cartilage the projection of which is known as the "thrapple" or "Adam's apple." Passing backwards they slightly diverge, each being attached to a movable nodule of cartilage behind. These posterior cartilages can be rotated by muscular action around a vertical axis, so that the glottis or chink between the chords may be obliterated or widened. This widening is the preliminary to every breath we draw, from the cradle to the grave. The singer takes such a breath. He then apposes his cords so that only a tiny chink is left. Thereupon he makes a forced expiration and drives a column of air against the resisting cords, which are thereby thrown into vibration. Now the pitch of the note produced depends upon the rate at which the cord vibrates. This, in its turn, depends upon the tension, length, and mass of the cords. The two latter factors vary in each of us. A man's larynx is larger than a woman's, his cords are longer and heavier, and therefore his voice is of lower pitch. But, excepting the falsetto, which I fear I have not space to discuss, each singer must accept his cords as they are. He can only affect their tension. This is done by tilting forwards the front attachment of the cords—which raises the tension and therefore the pitch of the note; or by tilting backwards the posterior attachment—which makes the cords slacker and the note more grave.

The simple unmodified laryngeal note—called by the teachers of singing the "naked tone"—is a hideous thing. It is utterly without resonance or emotional quality or beauty. It varies hardly at all in different people. The distinction between a note of given pitch, sounded on Caruso's larynx or mine, on a violin or a Jew's harp, on the superb new organ at York Minster or a penny whistle, is a question of harmonics, "partials," or overtones. It is by these that we recognise which of our friends is speaking to us. All these overtones are contained in the laryngeal note. No sound is produced elsewhere. But we use certain resonators which pick out and reinforce certain overtones and thereby give the voice its individual quality. If these overtones be numerous and well-selected, so as to form definite musical intervals (such as the octave and the fifth), with the fundamental note, the voice is made rich and full and sweet. The teacher of singing is mainly concerned with the use of these resonators; but I believe the difference between voices to depend not so much on the anatomical form of the resonators (which shows little variation) as upon a difference in the ear—that is, in brain. Your strident singer likes strident tone, and produces it. Your de Reszke likes velvet tone and produces that—even at the cost of effect or ignorant applause. The resonators are the chest—which mainly reinforces the lower notes—and the cavities of the mouth and throat. To these we must add the air-containing spaces in the familiar bony projections behind the external ear and above the eyes. Everyone knows that a child has no such frontal bosses, and that they are more prominent in a man than in a woman. All these cavities communicate with the mouth and throat, and so with the column of air which the larynx has already thrown into complex vibration.

Now all this is mere triviality beside the nervous action involved in singing. The pitch of every note depends upon muscular contraction which is determined by nervous impulses. Exactly in proportion to the strength of the nervous impulse the muscular contraction—and therefore the pitch of the resulting note—will be. Some idea of the fineness of gradation possible may be obtained by remembering the singer of last century who could sound eleven distinct notes between two consecutive notes on the piano; within a semitone, that is. And so we come to the crux of the matter, which is this. How is a singer enabled to strike a desired note? How is it that some are able to send exactly the right degree of nervous force to the laryngeal muscles, whilst others are doomed for ever to send "the little less and what worlds away"—or, in other words, to sing flat? How is it that, as George Eliot has put it in "Adam Bede," one may never sing in tune, and another, utterly untrained, may be "as true to his intervals as a lark"? (As a matter of fact a lark has no real sense of intervals, but that does not matter. Browning alone was right—

We shall have the word
In a minor third
There is none but the Cuckoo knows.)

And for the answer to this question we are thrown back upon "ear."

Now, "ear," in this sense, is in a well-defined area of the Cortex cerebri, on the left side of the brain. We hear, of course, as we also see, on both sides; but sense of pitch is probably confined to the music centre on the left or "leading" side in right-handed people, just as the sense of colour is probably confined to the left side in such people; the facts, in each case, being reversed in left-handed people. The music centre is just in front of the hearing centre; by which I mean the centre for sound. That which understands the meanings of words is in another and distant part of the cortex, though also, of course, on the left side. Now, to be quite candid, I believe the music centre is non-existent in some of us. Nor can it necessarily be developed as, in everyone but an idiot, the word-hearing centre can. And it is the music centre which controls and informs the whole act of singing; aided by the muscular sense. A recent Italian author has maintained—and I think he is right—that, in order to achieve a definite interval, as, for instance, from the dominant to the key-note, the brain must receive an impression from the laryngeal muscles, which it couples with the sound received by the singer's own ear. These form an image of the desired interval in the music centre which determines the degree of nervous force necessary to cause precisely the degree of muscular contraction that will enable the singer to strike his high note true.

Of course it is impossible to do more than outline the subject here. Beside the falsetto, which is an impertinence with most of us, but a delight when used by such singers as Mr. Hedmondt, there is the effect of varying emotion upon the laryngeal tone. Again, we might consider the various shades of tone which lie within the possibility of one voice; or that vain topic of the "vocal registers"; or the production of the vowels by modifying the overtones, or the formation of the consonants, or the phenomena of vocal compass, or of mere vocal power. To attack these questions one must first obtain some accurate ideas as to the nature of sound and the distinctions between a musical note and a noise, besides considering that microscopic replica of a piano in the inner ear, our knowledge of which, as of the "heat o' the sun," we owe to the omnivorous genius of Helmholtz.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

"The Grammarian's Coarse Analysis."

SIR,—In the interesting and strikingly able essay on "Living History" published in a recent number of the ACADEMY there is a surprising remark. Speaking of Carlyle's method of expression, the writer says: "Germanic that style may be, in main features of its mechanical structure or defect of structure; but inwardly and substantially, in those features which cannot be squared by the grammarian's coarse analysis, it is Carlyle and reducible to no precedent beloved of the live-and-level critic." Will you quote a passage in illustration? I rather think you will find it difficult to recite one which cannot be construed. Carlyle's individualities of expression are not originalities in grammar, which are inconceivable; they are originalities in style, which are quite another thing. There may be grammar without good style; but there cannot be good style without grammar. Science can live without art; art cannot live without science. Grammar is science, intelligent knowledge; style is art, intelligent action. Carlyle's individualities, which are attributes of his art, are justifiable because they are in accord with syntax, which is a mode of logic. I am startled at finding your penetrating essayist speaking of "the grammarian's coarse analysis." A few months ago, in a Science article, one of your contributors actually anticipated and elaborated the theme suggested by that astonishing phrase. Hitherto I believed that grammar was "coarse" only to those who did not understand it.—Yours, &c.,

Monachyle, Perthshire, N.B.

J. M. S. M.

[There was no thought of assailing Carlyle's grammar. The word was used (somewhat hastily, doubtless) in the larger and older sense, according to which all matters of style come within a grammarian's province. When Browning wrote of "A Grammarian's Funeral" he did not mean a teacher of grammar. The inner spirit of style is not to be captured by the relatively coarse methods of the student of its externals—that was all which was meant. Your correspondent's assertions are, of course, indisputable—and never by me disputed.—YOUR REVIEWER.]

Canning's "Elegant Sapphics."

SIR,—Reference is made in your last week's issue to Canning's "elegant Sapphics"—to wit, "The needy knife-grinder." "Elegant" may pass as the stereotyped "epitheton ornans" of "Sapphics": but surely the verses are not Sapphics at all.

There are two theories of the way in which English Sapphics should be constructed: (1) Calverley's theory is that the scansion should not declare itself, but be latent in the lines. But there is no trace of the Sapphic scansion in (for instance):—

I give thee sixpence? I will see thee damned first!

(2) The other theory is that, apart from scansion, the rhythm must be the trochaic rhythm of the Sapphic line, which consisted of two pairs of trochees with a dactyl in the middle; though later the second trochee became a spondee. But Canning's verses are pure iambs—"trimeters catalectic" is, I suppose, the technical description. Thus the lines:—

I should be glad to drink your Honour's health in A pot of beer, if you would give me sixpence, correspond exactly with—

Is this a dagger which I see before me?

The nearest approach to a trochaic line in the poem is—

Custody. They took me before the justice which, however, stands quite alone.

The average schoolboy's idea of the Sapphic rhythm is represented by the line—

Saturday fortnight, Fébruary fourteenth.

Canning's verses may be read either in conformity with that model, or as simple iambs. How they can pass for Sapphics I am at a loss to understand.—Yours, &c.,

ARCTURUS.

Letters of the 12th Duke of Somerset.

SIR,—Will you allow me to turn to pleasure a little slip made by a recent reviewer of yours? As an admirer of the volume of Letters of the 12th Duke of Somerset, edited by Mr. Mallock, I often regret having no relevant opportunity of speaking in its praise. Your reviewer of Mr. Fitzgerald Molloy's "Sailor King" seems to afford me one where he singles out as the only new matter in Mr. Molloy's book the letters of the Duchess there quoted. These have, however, been already published in the collection of Mr. Mallock's editing. I am glad to be able to put your able reviewer, and perhaps others besides, on the track of those very interesting, and very much neglected, records of "the proud Duke."—Yours, &c.,

BOOKMAN.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 188 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best criticism of any book, old or new, which our competitors had read this year. Thirty-five replies have been received. We award the prize to Mr. A. E. Coppard, 27, Gladstone Place, Brighton, for the following:—

"CLARA HOPGOOD," BY MARK RUTHERFORD.

Good scholarly work is this, with many admirable passages to be marked and placed among the treasures. The completest figure in the tale is Madge Hopgood, a young sweet woman who, in the circumstance which generally wrecks the woman's history, adhered steadily to the extreme phases of her own impulsive principles. "She was destitute of that power, which her sister possessed, of surveying herself from a distance. On the contrary, her emotion enveloped her, and the safeguard of reflection on it was impossible to her." That is finely put, though imperfectly true, and may be compared with Thomas Hardy's introduction of Elfride Swancourt. The immediate consequence to her of her sudden sensual fault committed with Frank Palmer, her betrothed, was, curiously, a strengthening of her previous misgiving as to her own love's depth and honesty. Her persistent refusal thereafter to marry the father of her child is the imperfectly gripped "motive" of the book. The character drawing is thin, unhandy, and at times the psychology is overstated—I can't believe in Clara Hopgood on the evening when Baruch Cohen was hers for a look, a touch, and that "divinely beautiful but divinely terrible" moment of prevision came to her, and stayed her half-spoken gracious words; and so Baruch Cohen in the after days married her sister Madge. Most of the people, too, talk "Mark Rutherford." This is, perhaps, the book's condemnation as a work of art, the fault of a man who thinks and sees, who thinks out his way to the ultimate vision, working by a reversal of the greater process of first seeing, and then thinking back to the springs of impulse; but as a volume of earnest human aim it holds much of the good and true. These things being so one overlooks its aesthetic limitations.

Other replies follow:—

NEWMAN'S "CALLISTA."

One wonders how many of the rising generation are under the potent influence of the great Tractarian leader; yet few names of the 19th century will rank higher than Newman's as masters of English prose. If one wishes to experience his peculiar vivifying influence one cannot do better than read "Callista." His "exquisite tenderness," his spirituality, his poetic imagination, combine to give this little book a wonderful fascination. The impression is that of a keen, original thinker, endowed with a powerful imagination, a supreme power over the harmonies of language, and an unerring instinct as to the power of language over the human heart. Narrative, analysis, dialogue, landscape, are all used with masterly power to produce the desired effect. And over the whole work hangs an air of self-restraint, of fierce intellectual activity controlled by vivid spiritual insight. Though the story deals mainly with religious influences, the artist is everywhere apparent in light touches that reveal the lover of nature or the kindly critic of human foibles. Agellius' condition agitated between human love for Callista and divine love for his Master is vividly drawn, and what wonderful power and tender insight does not the final interview between them disclose! What intense realization is shown alike in the delineation of the awful ravages of the locusts, and in the career of that terrible mob in Sicca, whose cry "Christianos ad leones" led Callista to seek Agellius to warn him, and led herself to that fateful meeting with Bishop Cyprian. Then Juba's mad career of demoniacal possession is outlined with weird power forming a striking contrast to the self-possession and constancy of Callista, whose girlish beauty is tenderly depicted and whose intellectual grasp betrays Newman's keenness of dialectic. Her martyrdom is a fitting climax to a beautiful and pathetic career.

[T. G. G., Wealdstone.]

SIR ALEXANDER BURNES' "TRAVELS IN BOKHARA."

It was published by Murray in '34, and so far as the travel's go is of course of little interest to-day: the places visited with so much danger and trouble are now almost familiar to many. But what should redeem it from the limbo of "forgotten books" is the remarkable personality of the author, his essential modernity as one who lived before his time and scarcely knew it; one of the keen souls who have made Britain what she is, only half from sense of duty, the other half a restless necessity to do and see, to cram the years full with experience. "Bokhara Burnes" grasped his brimming share of that. He was murdered in Kabul before he was forty, but every minute of his life had been lived, and a jolly and momentous life it must have been. At the time of the famous journey he was but twenty-six.

No author, but remote cousin to the great Robert of Ayrshire, one of his race could turn his hand to nothing and achieve it wholly ill. Through studied phrase and measured word, held appropriate to all literature in such pre-Victorian days; glimpses of the man's self, his marvellous common-sense, his delightful humour, his innate courtesy and intelligent tolerance; spring like sunshine through the chinks of some great old ruined wall; stretch hands across the intervening years till we can scarce believe this all took place so long ago. It is with something of a shock we find allusion to the recent conflagration of Moscow. Surely he is one of ourselves! And yet—Queen Victoria was but a schoolgirl when Ranjut Singh showed him the Koh-i-Noor in the city of Lahore; when he adopted the Uzbek garb and threaded perilous deserts to become an honoured guest in sinister Bokhara.

The names of our pioneers should not be allowed to die.

[B. C. H., London.]

ALEXANDER SMITH'S POEMS.

Alexander Smith took himself too seriously, and fifty years ago the public followed his lead; but a recent re-perusal of his work suggests that there was much to excuse this too lofty estimate. He certainly lacks both humour and discretion, two of the most essential components of good taste, whether in literature or other walks of life. His serious ballads are almost as funny as Ingoldsbay, and he abounds in such incongruous metaphors as a more genial self-appreciation would have surely corrected. Yet his work is imbued with such fundamental ardour as cannot fail to appeal—not the unsullied poetic ardour of a Keats, but marred by his native Calvinism and blundering taste.

Thus, while still fettered to effete poetic formula, his tense poetic power degenerates too often into sheer violence.

As to his message, he did very little more than reduce to commoner terms the moral threads already woven into Tennyson's more serious works, replacing their finer poetic subtlety with a cheap irony of a kind which appeals to earnest people impervious to the higher æsthetic qualities of verse; while over his earlier work there is a vague glamour and hopeless confusion of unchastened images which is too readily mistaken for poetic depth.

The real capacity of emotional vehemence, which led him to copy the less commendable extravagances of Keats, gained him an audience among people of like tendencies; while he displayed none of that absolute literary sufficiency which always bores the unliterary.

But that fine Titanic insolence, tamed only by what it holds intransitory in nature, flames out in spite of his depraved artistry, as may be seen in the lines entitled "The Change," with which the volume closes.

[W. C. T., Hencham.]

"FIELD AND HEDGEROW."

The secret and open ways of wild things, the changing subtleties of sky and wood, the voice and sweep of onrushing winds—these are part of the open-air freedom which Jefferies knew, loved, and enjoyed. But there is an undercurrent of almost defiant sadness, which reveals his peculiar temperament, and shows that while his gifts of vision and of knowledge are supreme, he has not the joy of the entire acceptance of Nature's order which we find in White of Selbourne. The imagination of Jefferies every now and then shies at reality, and he turns abruptly aside from those pleasant ways along which, for the most part, we pass with a sense of wonder and delight. Like Hamlet, he sometimes considers too curiously, and so we come across thoughts like these:—"The earth is all in all to me, but I am nothing to the earth: it is bitter to know this before you are dead." This may be true, but it is a truth which need not have been set down in the place where it is to be found. The brighter "woodnotes" of Jefferies jar in those subjective moods and frequently unprofitable moralisings, which break the even flow of refined enjoyment which he has the power of exciting. We must accept so instructive and adequate a writer with all his limitations. If he erred at all it was in his passionate devotion to truth. He could not rest content with external beauty, but he sought to wrest from Nature her deeper meanings; and, as happens with all who ask questions which are unanswerable, he leaves an impression of unrest and defective happiness which saddens, while it cannot lessen the value of, his contributions to the mystery and poetry of Nature.

[A. E. W., Greerock.]

Competition No. 189 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best set of verses in Praise of Walking. Not to exceed 20 lines.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 6 May, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Phillips Brooks Year Book. By H. L. S. and L. H. S. (Macmillan) net 3/6

FICTITIOUS, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

Walkley (A. B.), Dramatic Criticism..... (Murray) net 5/0
 Ryves (Evangeline), Frebus: A Book of Poems..... (Ulverston Press) net 2/6
 Poets of the Renaissance: Surrey—Wyatt—Sackville..... (Treherne) net 1/6
 Marshall (E.), An Old-Fashioned Garden, and Other Poems..... (Nisbet) 1/6
 Bruce (Robert), Re-Echoes from Coondambo..... (Long) net 5/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle. 2 vols. (Lane) net 25/0
 Cartwright (Julia), Isabella D'Este. 2 vols...... (Murray) net 25/0
 Allen (Philip Schuyler), and Hatfield (James Taft)—edited by, Diary and Letters of Wilhelm Müller..... (University of Chicago Press)
 Dubnow (S. M.), Jewish History..... (Macmillan) net 2/6
 Joly (Henri), Saint Teresa (1515-1582)..... (Duckworth) 3/0
 Trent (William P.), The Nineteenth Century Series: Progress of the United States of America in the Century..... (Chambers) net 5/0
 Doolittle (W. H.), The Nineteenth Century Series: Inventions in the Century (Chambers) net 5/0
 Orr (James), David Hume and his Influence on Philosophy and Theology (T. & T. Clark) 3/0
 Goffrey (Elizabeth), Home Life Under the Stuarts 1603-1649.... (Richards) net 12/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Oliphant (James), The Educational Writings of Richard Mulcaster (1532-1611) (Maclehose) net 2/6
 Bennett (Edward T.), The Society for Psychological Research.. (Brimley Johnson) 1/0
 Foster (Prof. Sir Michael), and Lankester (Prof. E. Ray)—edited by, The Scientific Memoirs of Thomas Henry Huxley. Supplementary Volume (Macmillan) net 7/6
 Bingham (Lt.-Col. C. T.), The Fauna of British India: Hymenoptera. Vol. II...... (Taylor and Francis)
 Lang (Andrew), Social Origins. Atkinson (J. J.), Primal Law. (Longmans) net 10/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Arkell-Hardwick (A.), An Ivory Trader in North Kenya..... (Longmans) net 12/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Harrison (Joseph), Practical Plane and Solid Geometry..... (Macmillan) 2/6
 Yates (M. T.), The Temple History Readers. Book 3..... (Dent) 1/6
 Shuckburgh (E. S.), Xenophon Oxyperela. Book II...... (Clay) 2/0
 Bury (J. B.), An Inaugural Lecture..... (Clay) net 1/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

A Confidential Clerk: What a Business Man Ought to Know.... (Pitman) net 1/0
 Milman (Helen), My Kalendar of Country Delights..... (Lane) net 5/0
 Sutter (Julie), Britain's Next Campaign..... (Brimley Johnson) net 1/0
 McKenna (Ethel M. M.)—edited by, The Woman's Library: Nursery and Sick-Room..... (Chapman and Hall) net 5/0
 McKenna (Ethel M. M.)—edited by, The Woman's Library: Some Arts and Crafts..... (Chapman and Hall) net 5/0
 Dowie (Maud Muriel), Thing About Our Neighbourhood..... (Richards) 6/0
 Peacock (W.), Chosen and Arranged by, Selected English Essays (Richards) net 1/0
 The Century Magazine. Vol. XLIII, 1902-1903..... (Macmillan) 10/6
 St. Nicholas. Vol. XXX, Part I..... () 7/6
 Natal Almanac and Directory, 1903..... (Davis)

NEW EDITIONS.

Wilkins (W. H.), The Love of an Uncrowned Queen..... (Longmans) net 12/6
 Barlow (Montague) and Macan (H.), The Education Act, 1902 (Butterworth) net 3/6
 Scott (Sir Walter), The Edinburgh Waverley: Count Robert of Paris. 2 vols. (Jack)

Castle Dangerous..... ()
 Lockhart (John Gibson), The Life of Sir Walter Scott..... ()
 Cruik (Mrs.), The Head of the Family..... (Ward, Lock) 1/6
 Whyte-Melville (G. J.), Bones and I..... () 2/0
 Warden (Florence), The Fog Princess..... () 0/6
 Fitzgerald (Edward), translated by, Six Dramas of Calderon.... (Mooring) net 3/6
 Blackmore (R. D.), Cripps the Carrier..... (Low) 0/6
 Furness (Horace Howard)—edited by, A New Variorum Edition of Shakespeare. Vol. II. Macbeth..... (Lippincott) 18/0
 Dickens (Charles), The Old Curiosity Shop. (Fireside Edition). (Chapman and Hall and Frowde) net 2/0
 " " Nicholas Nickleby. (Fireside Edition) (Chapman and Hall and Frowde) net 2/0
 " " American Notes. Pictures from Italy (Fireside Edition) (Chapman and Hall and Frowde) net 1/6
 Harte (Bret), Condensed Novels..... (Chatto and Windus) net 2/0 & 3/0
 Dante, The New Life..... (Kegan Paul) net 2/6 & 3/6
 Borrow (George), The Romany Rye..... (Methuen) net 1/6
 Lindsay (Mayne), The Whirligig..... (Ward, Lock) 0/6
 Clapton (Edward), The Life of St. George..... (Sonnenschein) net 0/6
 Farrar (Denny), The Life of Christ. Part I...... (Cassell) net 0/6
 Austen (Jane), Sense and Sensibility, &c...... (Nelson) net 2/0
 Eliot (George), Silas Marner..... (Laure) net 1/6
 Arber (Prof.), An English Garner: Social England. Illustrated.... (Constable) net 4/0
 Hardy (Thomas), Desperate Remedies..... (Macmillan) 3/6
 Edgeworth (Maria), Castle Rackrent and The Absentee..... (Macmillan) net 2/0
 Green (John Richard), A Short History of the English People. Part 23 (Macmillan) net 0/6
 Crossland (T. W. H.), The Unspeakable Scot..... (Richards) net 1/0

VOLS. I. and II. Now Ready.
THE WORKS OF
JOHN RUSKIN.

"LIBRARY EDITION."

Edited, with additions, from the Original Manuscripts,

By E. T. COOK AND ALEXANDER WEDDERBURN.

In about 32 Volumes, arranged in Chronological Order.

Not sold separately. 21s. each net.

The Edition for sale in the United Kingdom and America is limited to 2,000 Copies.

CONTENTS. All Mr. RUSKIN'S published works will be reprinted.

THE TEXT throughout is that which was last revised by the Author; but in Footnotes or Appendices passages from the MSS. are occasionally supplied or variations noted.

Each Volume is prefaced by an INTRODUCTION which is at once Bibliographical and Biographical. In the compilation of these Prefaces, Ruskin's DIARIES, LETTERS, and CONVERSATIONS have been largely used.

Most of the Volumes contain some New Matter.

THE PLATES. Every Illustration hitherto published will be included. In addition, a large number of unpublished Drawings will be given, as well as numerous unpublished Plates already engraved under the Author's personal supervision.

Some of the best Portraits of Mr. Ruskin are inserted as Frontispieces, and Facsimiles of the MSS. are also given.

THE PAPER is a special make of unbleached Arnold, and bears the watermark of Mr. Ruskin's Seal and Monogram.

VOLUME I.

EARLY PROSE WRITINGS,
1834 to 1843.

Consisting of 612 Pages, Large Medium 8vo (9½ by 6½), with Frontispiece in Colour, 20 Plates, 78 Woodcuts, and a Facsimile of MS., bound in a special Holliston cloth, with uncut edges.

VOLUME II.

POEMS.

Consisting of 590 Pages, with 25 Plates, and 5 Facsimiles of MS.

Followed by other Vols. at intervals of about one month.

NOW READY

THOUGHTS FROM MAETERLINCK.

Foolscap 8vo, 256 Pages. Cloth, gilt top.
3s. 6d. net.

LONDON:

GEORGE ALLEN, 156, Charing Cross Rd.

The Religious Tract Society's Spring List.

A NEW BOOK BY BISHOP WELLDON.

YOUTH AND DUTY:

Sermons to Harrow Schoolboys. By the Right Rev. J. E. C. WELLDON, D.D., Canon of Westminster, sometime Bishop of Calcutta, and formerly Head Master of Harrow School. With a Photogravure Portrait. Uniform with Bishop Moule's "Thoughts for the Sundays of the Year." Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

STEADFAST UNTO DEATH:

or, Martyred for China. Memorials of Thomas Wellesley and Jessie Pigott. By C. A. PIGOTT. With seven full-page Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

A MIRACLE OF MODERN MISSIONS:

The Story of Matula, a Congo Convert. By JOHN BELL, Baptist Missionary, Wathen, Congo. With a Preface by the Secretary of the Baptist Missionary Society, and seven full-page Illustrations from Photographs. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s.

ATHANASII DE INCARNATIONE VERBI DEI:

Athanasius on the Incarnation of the Word of God. An English translation, with an Introduction, Synopsis and Notes by T. HEBBERT BINDLEY, M.A., D.D. Second Edition, revised throughout. Crown 8vo, buckram gilt, 2s.

ROADS FROM ROME:

A Series of Personal Narratives. Compiled by Rev. C. S. ISAACSON, M.A. With a Preface by the BISHOP OF DURHAM. Second Edition, revised. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

CHEAP EDITION.—TWELFTH THOUSAND.

JAMES CHALMERS:

His Autobiography and Letters. By RICHARD LOVETT, M.A., Author of "James Gilmour of Mongolia," &c. With Maps and Portraits. Fifth and Popular Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d. Also in handsome binding for presentation, padded paste grain, gilt line, round corners, gilt edges, gold roll, 6s. 6d. net.

A NEW STORY BY MRS. VAIZEY.

PIXIE O'SHAUGHNESSY.

By Mrs. GEORGE DE HORNE VAIZEY, Author of "About Peggy Saville," "A Houseful of Girls," &c. With seven full-page Illustrations by W. H. C. GROOME. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

A NEW STORY BY AMY LE FEUVRE.

JILL'S RED BAG.

By AMY LE FEUVRE, Author of "Probable Sons," "Teddy's Button," &c. With seven full-page Illustrations by ALFRED PEARSE. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s.

A SAILOR APOSTLE.

A Story of the Sea, founded on fact. By FRANK T. BULLEN, Author of "With Christ at Sea," &c. Long 8vo, paper covers, 6d.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY, LONDON.

Contents of the NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER
For MAY, 1903.

THE IRISH LAND BILL:

(1) "A SCHEME OF PERNICIOUS AGRARIAN QUACKERY." By His Honour Judge O'CONNOR MORRIS.

(2) THE LATEST: IS IT THE LAST? By the Right Hon. Lord MONT-EAGLE.

THE CRISIS IN THE CHURCH: A REPLY TO LORD HALIFAX. By J. LAWSON WALTON, K.C., M.P.

THE SOCIAL DEMOCRATIC PARTY IN GERMANY. By O. ELTZBACHER.

THE CANALS OF MARS: ARE THEY REAL? By the Rev. EDMUND LEDGER (Gresham Lecturer on Astronomy).

THE MONUMENTS IN ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. By ALFRED HIGGINS.

THE DETERIORATION IN THE NATIONAL PHYSIQUE. By GEORGE F. SHEE.

WHAT IS THE ADVANTAGE OF FOREIGN TRADE? By the Right Hon. LEONARD COURTNEY.

SOME MORE LETTERS OF MRS. CARLYLE. By AUGUSTINE BIRRELL, K.C.

LONDON CONGESTION AND CROSS-TRAFFIC. By Captain GEORGE S. C. SWINTON, L.C.C.

A FORGOTTEN ADVENTURER. By the Countess of JERSEY.

THE NEW ZEALAND ELECTIONS. By O. T. J. ALPERS.

RADIUM AND ITS POSITION IN NATURE. By WILLIAM ACKROYD, F.I.C.

THE LOST ART OF SINGING. By M. A. R. TUKER.

A FUTURE FOR IRISH BOGS. By Lieut.-General Sir RICHARD SANKEY, K.C.B., R.E.

LAST MONTH. By Sir WEMYSS REID.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co., Ltd.

SOCIETY for PROMOTING CHRISTIAN KNOWLEDGE.

WAVES AND RIPPLES IN WATER, AIR, AND ÆTHER.

Being a Course of Christmas Lectures delivered at the Royal Institution of Great Britain.

By J. A. FLEMING, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S. With numerous Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

CHRISTIAN WORSHIP, ITS ORIGIN AND EVOLUTION.

By the Monsignore DUCHESNE. Translated by M. L. McCCLURE from the Third Edition of "Les Origines du Culte Chrétien." Demy 8vo, cloth boards, 10s.

The Third Edition of the French Original has just been published in Paris. This Translation represents not only the latest revision of that celebrated work, but contains also some Notes added by Monsignore Duchesne since the latter was published.

THE OLD TESTAMENT IN THE LIGHT OF THE HISTORICAL RECORDS AND LEGENDS OF ASSYRIA AND BABYLONIA.

By THEOPHILUS G. PINCHES, LL.D., M.R.A.S. With several Illustrations. Large post 8vo, cloth boards, 7s. 6d.

ANALYTICAL BIBLE CONCORDANCE. By Dr. Robert Young.

Seventh Edition, with Four New and important Supplements, and Portrait of Author, demy 4to, cloth boards, 21s.; half-bound morocco, 25s. Illustrated Edition, with New Maps, Views, and Facsimiles, half-morocco, 30s.

THE BABYLONIAN EXCAVATIONS AND EARLY BIBLE HISTORY.

By Prof. KITTEL, of Leipzig. Translated from the German by EDMUND McCCLURE, M.A. Edited, with a Preface, by the Rev. HENRY WACE, D.D. Small post 8vo, paper covers, 6d.

This is a translation of a discourse by Prof. Kittel. The publication of Delitzsch's "Babel und Bibel," in which the Babylonian account of the Creation, the Flood, &c., is regarded as earlier and purer than that of the Bible, has called forth a great number of pamphlets in reply, of which this is one of the most striking. It treats of the subject as a whole, and is not therefore strictly a reply, but it deals incidentally with Delitzsch's arguments.

EARLY BRITAIN:

ROMAN BRITAIN. By Edward Conybeare. Fcap. 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d. [In the Press.]

ROMAN ROADS IN BRITAIN. By Thomas Codrington, M.Inst.C.E., F.G.S. Fcap. 8vo, with Maps, cloth boards, 5s. [In the Press.]

"CHRISTIAN SCIENCE" CONTRASTED with CHRISTIAN FAITH, and with ITSELF. By WILLIAM LEFROY, D.D., Dean of Norwich. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE BIBLE AND MODERN INVESTIGATION. Three Lectures delivered to Clergy at Norwich at the request of the Bishop, with an Address on "The Authority of Holy Scripture." By the Rev. HENRY WACE, D.D. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

WORDS OF COUNSEL AND COMFORT. By William Dalrymple, Archbishop of York. Imperial 32mo, cloth boards, 1s.

IS THERE A RELIGION OF NATURE? Lectures delivered in St. Paul's Cathedral, January, 1902. By the Rev. P. N. WAGGETT, M.A. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 1s. 6d.

MY LIFE IN MONGOLIA AND SIBERIA. From the Great Wall of China to the Ural Mountains. By JOHN, BISHOP of NORWICH. With several Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE REVISED VERSION OF HOLY SCRIPTURE. Addresses on. By the Right Rev. C. J. ELLICOTT, D.D., Bishop of Gloucester. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s.

THE LIFE OF GEORGE HERBERT, OF BEMERTON. By the late Rev. JOHN J. DANIELL. New Edition, with Addenda, Portrait, and Illustrations. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

GRIFFITH JONES, OF LLANDDOWROR, Life and Times of. By the Rev. DAVID JONES, B.A. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

VERBA VERBI DEI. The Words of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ. Harmonized by the AUTHOR of "CHARLES LOWDER." Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

TO WHOM SHALL WE GO? An Examination of some Difficulties presented by Unbelief. By the Rev. C. T. OVENDEX, D.D. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE CHURCH OF ENGLAND. An Historical Sketch. By the Rev. H. W. CARPENTER, Canon and Precentor of Salisbury. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 6d.

THOUGHTS BY THE WAY. By the Rev. F. C. Woodhouse, M.A. Author of "The Life of the Soul in the World." Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 3s. 6d.

ST. ALDHELM: his Life and Times. Lectures delivered in the Cathedral Church of Bristol, Lent, 1902, by the Right Rev. G. F. BROWNE, D.D., D.C.L., F.S.A., Bishop of Bristol. With several Illustrations. Small post 8vo, cloth boards.

THE DAWN OF CIVILIZATION.—EGYPT and CHALDEA. Fourth Edition, Revised and Enlarged by Prof. MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Translated by M. L. McCCLURE. With Map and over 470 Illustrations, including 3 Coloured Plates. Demy 4to, cloth, bevelled boards, 24s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 48s.

THE STRUGGLE OF THE NATIONS (Egypt, Syria, and Assyria). By Prof. MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Translated by M. L. McCCLURE. With Maps, 3 Coloured Plates, and over 400 Illustrations. Demy 4to (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 25s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 30s.

THE PASSING OF THE EMPIRES. 850 B.C. to 330 B.C. By Prof. MASPERO. Edited by the Rev. Prof. SAYCE. Translated by M. L. McCCLURE. With Maps, 3 Coloured Plates, and numerous Illustrations. Demy 4to (approximately), cloth, bevelled boards, 25s.; half-morocco (bound by Riviere), 30s.

POISONOUS PLANTS IN FIELD AND GARDEN. By the Rev. Prof. G. HENSLow, M.A., F.G.S., F.L.S. With numerous Illustrations. Small post 8vo, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE ROMANCE OF SCIENCE: Sounding the Ocean of Air. Being the Six Lectures delivered before the Lowell Institute of Boston in December, 1898, by A. LAWRENCE BOTCH, S.B., A.M. Small post 8vo, with numerous Illustrations, cloth boards, 2s. 6d.

THE ROMANCE OF SCIENCE: The Machinery of the Universe. Mechanical Conceptions of Physical Phenomena. By A. E. DOLBEAR, A.B., A.M., M.B., Ph.D., Professor of Physics, Tuft's College, U.S.A. Small post 8vo, with several Diagrams, cloth boards, 2s.

BRITISH BIRDS, SKETCH BOOK OF. By B. Bowdler SHARPE, LL.D., F.L.S. With Coloured Illustrations by A. F. and C. Lydon. 272 pp., crown 4to, cloth boards, 14s.

"Briefly he has produced a most interesting and informing book, which has been admirably illustrated."—Guardian.

NATURE AND HER SERVANTS; or, Sketches of the Animal Kingdom. By the Rev. T. WOOD. With numerous Woodcuts. Large post 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

STAR ATLAS. Containing Maps of all the Stars from 1 to 6.5 magnitude between the North Pole and 34° South Declination, and of all Nebulae and Star Clusters in the same Region which are visible in Telescopes of Moderate Powers. With Explanatory Text by Dr. HERMANN J. KLEIN. Translated by EDMUND McCCLURE, M.A., M.R.I.A., F.L.S. With 18 Maps. Third Edition (R.A. and Dec. brought up to 1900 as far as Text is concerned), Revised and Enlarged. Imperial 4to, cloth boards, 10s.

MATTER, ETHER, AND MOTION: the Factors and Relations of Physical Science. By A. E. DOLBEAR, A.B., A.M., M.B., Ph.D., Professor of Physics, Tuft's College, U.S.A. English Edition, edited by Prof. ALFRED LODGE. Illustrated. Crown 8vo, cloth boards, 5s.

ROMANCE OF LOW LIFE AMONG PLANTS; Facts and Phenomena of Cryptogamic Vegetation. By M. C. COOKE, M.A., LL.D. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 4s.

FREAKS AND MARVELS OF PLANT LIFE; or, Curiosities of Vegetation. By M. C. COOKE, M.A., LL.D. With numerous Illustrations. Post 8vo, cloth boards, 6s.

LIBRARY EDITION OF MRS. EWING'S WORKS. Complete in Eighteen Uniform Volumes, crown 8vo, half-cloth, 1s. 6d. each. The Complete Series, Volumes I.-XVIII., in cloth case, 28s. This is the only Complete Edition of Mrs. Ewing's Works. The last two volumes contain much new matter.

LONDON: Northumberland Avenue, W.C.; 43, Queen Victoria St., E.C.; BRIGHTON: 129, North St.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

TUESDAY NEXT (MAY 12th) at 5 o'clock. Professor G. H. DARWIN, M.A., LL.D., D.Sc., F.R.S., FIRST of TWO LECTURES on "THE ASTRONOMICAL INFLUENCE OF THE TIDES." Half-a-Guinea the course.

THURSDAY (MAY 14th) at 5 o'clock. Professor S. H. VINES, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S., FIRST of TWO LECTURES on "PROTEID - DIGESTION IN PLANTS." Half-a-Guinea.

SATURDAY (MAY 9th) at 3 o'clock. HANISH MACCUNN, Esq., FIRST of THREE LECTURES on "MUSIC," with Musical Illustrations. Half-a-Guinea.

Booklovers & Bibliophiles take Note!

SHORTLY WILL BE PUBLISHED THE
FIRST NUMBER OF

THE AVON BOOKLET

A monthly reprint for Booklovers of famous contributions to English Literature for the most part from rare and obsolete sources.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION 3s. POST FREE.

In THE AVON BOOKLET an endeavour will be made to collect in permanent easily accessible form those famous contributions to English literature by modern writers which through various causes have been allowed to become forgotten or known only to the student. In the first year of THE BOOKLET, the editor hopes to publish forgotten works of Robert Browning, William Morris, R. L. Stevenson, O. W. Holmes, Lord Tennyson, George Borrow, William Black, and many others at present very difficult to obtain, or lost in the pages of forgotten magazines. THE AVON BOOKLET will revivify them, and restore them to their rightful place in literature, presenting them in a delightful format, beautifully printed on a strong, pure linen paper, and bound in annual volume form in old style boards.

Subscriptions can be received only for a year's issues, 12 Nos., 3s. post free. The first number, containing Browning's suppressed essay on Shelley, will be ready shortly.

Send 3 stamps for a specimen Avon Leaflet, beautifully printed in black and red on finest ivory card.

Cross cheques and postal orders, and address—

J. THOMSON, Avon Glen, Emscote, Warwick.

JOHN LEA'S "VERSES"

Price 1/- net.

Can be obtained from the following Booksellers:
Messrs. MILLER & GILL, Cambridge Circus,
Charing Cross Road, W.C.
Messrs. A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, W.C.

ADVERTISEMENTS (Select Trade) for the COVER PAGES of the ACADEMY should be sent not later than Noon on Thursday
to 43, Chancery Lane. Terms, &c., on application.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery Lane.

MRS. WARD'S NEW NOVEL, LADY ROSE'S DAUGHTER.

116th THOUSAND.

LADY

ROSE'S

DAUGHTER.

REVIEW OF REVIEWS.—"The story is intensely interesting, the characters are very delicately and vividly portrayed. . . . Miss le Breton is a much more charming heroine than any of her predecessors in the long procession of Mrs. Ward's creations."

MR. DOUGLAS SLADEN in THE QUEEN says:—"Julie le Breton is one of the best female characters in fiction. . . . The book is interesting to the very last page, and deals with some of the latest aspects of the age so intimately that it is full of unconscious portraits."

By Mrs. HUMPHRY WARD.

With Illustrations, crown 8vo, 6s.

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"The character drawing of the whole book is as excellent as its detailed episodes are natural, but its high and genuine merit is to have given vivid presentations to the bundle of vehement and conflicting passions which constitutes the heroine."

GLOBE.—"We are inclined to think that on the whole this is the best work that Mrs. Humphry Ward has yet given us. . . . It is a story of strong human interest; it goes down into the depths of mental and spiritual experience; it seizes the attention and holds it firmly to the end."

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING.

President—SIR LESLIE STEPHEN, K.C.B.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.;

The Right Hon. W. E. H. LEUCKY, D.C.L.; GEORGE MEREDITH, Esq.; HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.

Trustees—Rt. Hon. LORD AVEBURY, F.R.S.; Rt. Hon. EARL OF ROSEBURY, K.G.;

Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.

Committee:

Rev. Canon Ainger.
Dr. J. H. Bridges.
Professor Lewis Campbell, LL.D.
Austin Dobson, Esq., LL.D.
Sydney Gedge, Esq.
Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S.
Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S.
Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D.

Mrs. J. R. Green.
Frederic Harrison, Esq.
Rev. W. Hunt, M.A.
Sir C. P. Ilbert, K.C.S.I.
Sir C. M. Kennedy, K.C.M.G., C.B.
Sidney Lee, Esq.
W. S. Lilly, Esq.
Sidney J. Low, Esq.

Frank T. Marzials, Esq., C.B.
Sir F. Pollock, Bart.
Rev. J. Rigg, D.D.
S. Arthur Strong, Esq.
H. R. Tedder, Esq.
Rev. H. Wace, D.D.
Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B.
A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D., LL.D.

The Library contains about 220,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages Subscription, £3 a year; Life Membership according to age. Fifteen volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-room open from Ten to Half-past Six. The NEW CATALOGUE (1,026 pp., 4to, 1903) is now ready, price 35s.; to members, 25s.

O. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready,
Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE

1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 260,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., London;
and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

Chatto & Windus's New Books.

MAX O'RELL'S NEW BOOK.

Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

RAMBLES IN WOMANLAND.

By MAX O'RELL, Author of "Her Royal Highness Woman."

NEW SIX-SHILLING NOVELS.

New Novel by the Author of "The Gun-Runner."

HAVILAND'S CHUM.

By BERTRAM MITFORD, Author of
"The King's Asseai."

ON MAY 21.

ALGERNON GISSING'S NEW NOVEL.

KNITTERS IN THE SUN.

By ALGERNON GISSING,
Author of "A Secret of the North Sea."

OVERDUE. By W. CLARK RUSSELL,

Author of "The Wreck of the Grosvenor."

"The customary epithets applied to nautical fiction are quite incommensurate with the excellence of Mr. Clark Russell's narrative powers, and these are thoroughly at their best in 'Overdue'. . . . 'Overdue' is the story of a voyage, and its romantic interest hinges on the stratagem of the captain's newly-wedded wife in order to accompany him on his expedition for the salvage of a valuable wreck. The reader gets a vivid share of the animation of such a journey and all the varied pleasures of a first long sea-trip. The plot thickens so gradually that a less competent novelist would be in danger of letting the reader's attention slip. But the climax of Benson's conspiracy to remove the captain and carry off the wife is invested with the keenest excitement."—Pall Mall Gazette.

SEMI-SOCIETY. By FRANK RICHARDSON,

Author of "The Man who Lost his Past."

"Cleverly written. . . . The thrilling interest is sustained to the very end, which is striking in the extreme."—Liverpool Post.

NEAR THE TSAR, NEAR DEATH.

By FRED. WHISHAW, Author of "Mazeppa."

"A thrilling romance."—Ladies' Field.
"An excellent piece of work."—World.

MALLENDER'S MISTAKE. By

LIONEL L. PILKINGTON.

"A story which is very much alive, with a well-conceived and absorbing plot, and crisp, gossipy dialogue."—Bolton Chronicle.

THE HEART OF A GIRL. By

FLORENCE WARDEN. With 8 Illustrations by FRANCES EWAN.

"An absorbing and well-constructed tale."—Yorkshire Post.

THE INSTIGATOR. By ERNEST A.

TREETON.

"The book is undeniably clever."—St. James's Gazette.

THE WOMAN OF MYSTERY.

By GEORGES OHNET. Translated by F. ROTHWELL.

"One of Ohnet's best novels."—Lady's Pictorial.
"Many will read it at a sitting, since not for one moment does the interest flag."—Skech.

THE POWER OF THE PALMIST.

By VIOLET GUTTENBERG, Author of "Neither Jew nor Greek."

"A lively and well-written story . . . brisk and entertaining."—Book-Lovers' Library.

THE MAGIC OF TO-MORROW.

By CYRIL SEYMOUR.

"A most effectual time-killer."—Ladies' Field.

IN CLARISSA'S DAY. By SARAH

TYTLER, Author of "Cloyenne Jacqueline."

"We question whether Miss Tytler has given us a sweeter or fresher tale, and it is a life-like picture of the age."—London Quarterly Review.

THE TIDEWAY. By AUSTIN CLARE,

Author of "For the Love of a Lass," &c.

"Enthralling in its intensity, painful in realisation, no reader will remain unmoved."—Birmingham Post.

THE WINE OF FINYARRA. By

O. L. ANTROBUS, Author of "Wilderness" and "Quality Corner."

"The story which gives the title to the volume contains one of the most brilliant ideas that have been realised in recent fiction."—Morning Post. "All the tales are good, but three or four stand out from the others as worthy of even higher praise."—Guardian.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

FROM
Mr. MURRAY'S LIST
OF NEW BOOKS.Just Out. A New Novel by
Horace Annesley Vachell,

Author of "John Charity," entitled

THE PINCH OF PROSPERITY.

Large crown 8vo, 6s.

Ready on May 12. A New Work,

By Mary E. Wilkins,

Author of "The Heart's Highway," entitled

THE WIND IN THE ROSE BUSH,

And other stories of the Supernatural.

Large crown 8vo, 6s.

A WORK OF POETRY.

THE PIPES OF PAN. From the Book of Myths. By BLISS CARMAN. Fcap. 8vo,

2s. 6d. net. [Just out.]

DRAMATIC CRITICISM. The

Ideal Spectator—The Dramatic Critic—Old and New Criticism. By A. B. WALKLEY. Crown
8vo, 6s. net. [Just out.]

PARIS IN '48. Letters from a Resident describing the events of the Revolution.

By BARONESS BONDE (née ROBINSON). Edited by Mrs. WARR. Large crown 8vo, 8s. net.

[Just out.]

ISABELLA D'ESTE, Marchioness of Mantua, 1474-1539. A Study of the Renaissance. By JULIA CARTWRIGHT (Mrs. ADY).

Author of "Beatrice D'Este," "Madame," "Sacharissa,"
"The Painters of Florence," &c. With Illustrations. 2 vols., demy 8vo, 25s. net.

[Just out.]

THE ARTS IN EARLY ENG-

LAND. By G. BALDWIN BROWN, M.A., Watson
Gordon Professor of Fine Art in the University of Edinburgh.Vol. I.—The Life of Saxon England in its Relation to the Arts.Vol. II.—Ecclesiastical Architecture in England from the Conversion of the Saxons to the Norman Conquest.

With Illustrations. 2 vols., royal 8vo, 32s. net

[Just out.]

SERVICE AND SPORT ON

THE TROPICAL NILE. Some Records of the Duties and Diversions of an Officer among Natives and Big Game during the reconquest of the Nubiotic Provinces. By CAPTAIN C. A. SYKES,
R.H.A. With a Map, and Illustrations from Photographs and from Drawings made by Major
E. A. P. HOBDAV, R.F.A. Square crown 8vo, 12s. net. [Ready immediately.]

NOTES AND REMINISCEN-

CES OF A STAFF OFFICER. Chiefly relating to the Waterloo Campaign and to St. Helena matters during the Captivity of Napoleon. By Lieutenant-Colonel BASIL JACKSON. Edited by
R. C. SEATON, M.A., late Fellow of Jesus College, Cambridge; Author of "Sir Hudson Lowe and St. Helena." With Map, Portraits and other illustrations. Crown 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

[Ready immediately.]

JOHN MURRAY, ALBEMARLE ST., W.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s
NEW BOOKS.ACADEMY.—"A valuable and fitting conclusion to the great work."In One Volume of 1,464 pages, royal 8vo, 25s. net in cloth, or 32s. net in half-morocco.Dictionary of National Biography
Index and Epitome.

Edited by SIDNEY LEE.

ATHENÆUM.—"The appearance of this Supplement to the 'Dictionary of National Biography' puts the coping-stone upon a work which is justly regarded as a national possession. . . . We can, indeed, conceive no volume of reference more indispensable to the scholar, literary man, the historian, and the journalist."

WESTMINSTER GAZETTE.—"A volume of the highest practical utility. . . . We have tested the work by several consultations, and have found it answer exactly to the excellent plan outlined in its preface."

CONTEMPORARY REVIEW.—"An independent work of biographical reference which, in comprehensiveness and detail, far surpasses any other work of the kind."

PALL MALL GAZETTE.—"This final volume will convince every one of the Dictionary's wonderful utility, and, indeed, introduce the work to many who may not be able to afford the original volumes."

NEW NOVEL BY E. W. HORNUNG.

NOW READY.—With a Frontispiece, crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

NO HERO.

By E. W. HORNUNG,

Author of "A Bride from the Bush," "The Amateur Crackman," "Peccavi," &c.

The story of an officer, invalided home from the war, who is asked by a lady friend to rescue her son from the toils of a supposed adventuress at Zermatt. The officer relates how he effected his delicate commission, and the unexpected dénouement.

THE NEW NATION.

A Sketch of the Social, Political, and Economic Conditions and Prospects of the Australian Commonwealth. By PERCY F. ROWLAND, late Scholar of Hertford College, Oxford, &c. Large crown 8vo, 7s. 6d.

New Novel by the Author of "Love and Honour."

JUST PUBLISHED.—Crown 8vo, 6s.

GEORGE GORING'S DAUGHTERS.

By M. E. CARR,

Author of "Love and Honour."

CROWBOROUGH
BEACON.By HORACE G. HUTCHINSON,
Author of "Little Lady Mary," "A Friend of Nelson," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

TIMES.—"A good story is told, and the narrative has charm and freshness and suspended interest."
DAILY NEWS.—"The story is well told, and contains hardly a dull page."

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co.,
15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1618. Established 1869. London: 9 May 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 481

REVIEWS.

New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle	455
Studies in Contemporary Biography	456
Social Origins. Primal Law	457
Between the Lights	458
Hephæstus and Other Poems	458
Oxford at the Cross Roads	459
A New Portrait of Shakespeare	460

SHORT NOTICES:

The History of the Hawtrey Family—Rambles in Womanland—Twenty-six Historic Ships—The Hudson River	460
---	-----

FICTION:

The Hill of Trouble—What Befell a Bristol Trader	461
--	-----

Notes on the Week's Novels	462
------------------------------------	-----

ARTICLES.

MR. CONRAD'S WAY	463
The True Traveller	464
Impressions—XXXI The Pause	465
DRAMA:
The Experiments of Mr. Yeats. E. K. Chambers	465
ART:
A Choice Among Many. C. L. H.	466
SCIENCE:
The Impassable Barrier. C. W. Saleeby	467
CORRESPONDENCE:
The Browns	468
"The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman" and "The Blacksmith"	468
"Like a Forked Radish"	469
Wanted, an Author	469
Poe or Chivers?	469
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
In Praise of Walking	470

The Literary Week.

NOVELS and new editions have been the feature of the week's publishing. Among the new editions are a re-issue of George Herbert's "Temple" with the late Mr. Shorthouse's preface, and a second edition of Mr. Barber's fascinating compilation on the origin and meaning of British family names. Two new stories of exceptional interest will begin in an early number of the "Pall Mall Magazine": "The Vineyard" by Mrs. Craigie, a story of modern life, and Mr. Maurice Hewlett's romance based upon the life of Mary Queen of Scots. The new books of the week include:—

THE ODYSSEY. Books I.—VIII. Translated by J. W. Mackail.

Mr. Mackail does not overwhelm us with books, but, having his life of William Morris in mind, we expect sterling work from him. This venture is ambitious. To translate the Odyssey at all demands courage, but Mr. Mackail has chosen to cast his rendering into the difficult form of the FitzGerald Omar quatrain. We quote the opening stanza of the third book:—

And the sun left the lovely lake and clomb
Upward across the sky's brass-paven dome,
To light the deathless gods, and mortal men
That have the acres of the corn for home.

The volume is dedicated "To the memory of Evelyn Abbott, Fellow of Balliol, A Man, brave, wise, much enduring."

BABEL AND BIBLE. By Friedrich Delitzsch.

The volume consists of the two lectures delivered before the members of the Deutsche Orient-Gesellschaft in the presence of the German Emperor. Mr. C. H. W. Johns says in his introduction: "The announcement that Prof. Friedrich Delitzsch, the great Assyriologist, had been granted leave to deliver a lecture upon the relations between the Bible and the recent results of cuneiform research . . . naturally caused a great sensation; in Germany first, and, as a wider circle, wherever men feel interest in the progress of science." The preliminary sensation was fully justified by the results. Mr. Johns deals with some of the violent criticism which was directed against Prof. Delitzsch's conclusions.

ANTHOLOGY OF RUSSIAN LITERATURE. Part II. By Leo Wiener.

This part of Prof. Wiener's work covers the nineteenth century. In his introductory sketch the compiler says: "Compared with its humble beginnings in 1800, Russian literature has made a wonderful record in the nineteenth century. The Russian language has been moulded into an instrument of great perfection; it is melodious, and capable of all shades of expression and literary forms. The great authors of its literature have become the possession of all nations. Intellectual Russia no longer stands aloof. . . . It has well learned its lessons from the West: it may yet become its teacher." The volume has for frontispiece a portrait of Turgenev.

THE other day "Jean Lorrain," novelist and manager of the Paris "Journal," was sentenced to two months' imprisonment and ordered to pay a considerable fine for a libel on a lady contained in a short story. The sentence, apparently, was just, for the libel appears to have been particularly gross and ill-bred. The case, however, revives the old question of how far a novelist is justified in drawing from the life. Some writers always make composite portraits, but others have not the faculty for such combination. These, therefore, must draw either upon knowledge or mere imagination; in the one case they run the risk of offending their friends, in the other they hopelessly weaken their work. The ethical rights of the subject are difficult to define, but it would seem to be perfectly legitimate to use the human material at hand so long as the delineation and comment are reasonably unbiassed. After all, a writer does not as a rule select his villain from amongst his acquaintances. But novelists are certain to be suspected of making copy out of their friends to the end of time.

MR. UNWIN'S facsimile reprint of George Herbert's "The Temple," with an introduction by the late Mr. J. H. Shorthouse, has been long unobtainable. It is now reissued with a short introductory note. No man was better qualified than Mr. Shorthouse to appreciate the value of Herbert's work, and more particularly of Herbert's place and influence in the Church of England. Donne, Henry Vaughan, Wotton, Wither, Quarles, John Vaughan, Ferrer, and Herbert, "these men," said Mr. Shorthouse, "were the true founders of the Church of England." We quote the opening paragraph of this beautiful and characteristic piece of writing:—

The invitation to write this introduction came to me, with a surprising appropriateness, upon Easter Day—upon an Easter morning such as even an English spring can sometimes afford, a morning bright with sunshine and cherry-blossom and flowers. The primrose, the daffodil, and polyanthus were around the windows, and the fresh green of the woodlands tinted the distance, from which the church bells were faintly heard;—a season chosen by God for festival, who knows how many thousand years ago!

The particular mission of Herbert and his fellows was to show the English people "what a fine gentleman, who was also a Christian and a Churchman, might be."

THE "New York Times Saturday Review" is very angry with the "Author," which it describes as a London "class" magazine. The "Author" recently stated that the American book shops were large, but that there were few of them. "How long," asks our incensed contemporary, "must a man have stayed in any American city to reach that conclusion, and in what state of development must his powers of observation be?" The United States, we are told, is notably a land of many well-ordered and intelligently-managed book stores, whereas, out of London, bookshops are comparatively scarce, and so stupidly managed that London publishers have a reasonable grievance against them. Three London booksellers are named as good, and we are asked, "Are there any other bookshops in all that vast metropolis fit to compare even with the book departments of our great general stores?" Our acquaintance with the book departments of American general stores is not large, but we could name a round dozen of London booksellers who have never failed us.

A WRITER in the Philadelphia "Conservator," that remarkable journal whose Collects we have sometimes quoted with wonder, has been thinking about "The Reality of Joy." We read:—

As a young man I promised myself to write a full and fervent booklet of Joy. A few connected sketches were made—and then the project awaited further time. Later, in a grayer mood, I wrote two essays bearing on the subject. These in turn were put aside. At last, gathering up these fragments, it struck me suddenly that the booklet was done. Here let it tell its own tale.

There follow outbursts on Color, the Beauty of Nature, The Religion of Two Lovers, The Awe of Love, and a Marriage Hymn. The writer says: "How full the world is of color, glorious color, color everywhere! The air, night and day, is one perfume of color. . . ." We should have supposed that the "Reality of Joy," implied an instinct which would have rejected such a terrible phrase as "perfume of color." Evidently this booklet needs revision.

MR. LEWIS MELVILLE, in the current issue of "Temple Bar," discusses Bulwer Lytton as a novelist. Mr. Melville is surprised by the fact that since the late fifties Lytton has not been seriously discussed as a novelist in any considerable review. We cannot, ourselves, share this surprise. Lytton, at his best, was a good story-teller; at his worst, and his worst was pretty frequent, he was full of the most meretricious kind of sentiment and banality. Of course he took himself seriously; his portentous seriousness was one of the things which Thackeray so delighted to parody. Mr. Melville compares him with Dickens in respect of popularity, and in other ways as well. Says Mr. Melville:—

Like him he often sought for strong effects in pathos, and worked in strong light or deep shadow. He was far more literate than his greater brother of the pen, but he was excelled as a delineator of character. He could not tell a story so well as Wilkie Collins; he did not possess the vivid imagination or the graphic descriptive powers of Charles Reade; or the satire of Disraeli; or the brightness of Lever; neither is his humour to be likened to that of Thackeray, or his style to be compared with that of the master-stylist of the century. Because he was not pre-eminent among the giants, it has become the custom for "superior" people to speak slightly of his work.

We should like to know what Mr. Melville means when he says that Lytton was "far more literate than his greater brother of the pen." Certainly Lytton did not write such good English as Dickens. As to his pathos, it is of the kind which we nowadays call cheap. No doubt Lytton's novels will continue to be read for a generation or so, and we have no quarrel with his readers. But do not let us try to revive a reputation on literary grounds whose successes, such as they were, had small concern with true literature.

QUITE the latest novelty in the way of book-making reaches us in the form of a tiny edition of FitzGerald's "Omar Khayyam." It is small enough to go into the smallest waistcoat pocket. We shall soon expect to see the quatrains being furtively read in omnibuses and in evening trains.

MR. RAYMOND BLATHWAYT has been interviewing Mr. Aylmer Maude for "Great Thoughts" on the subject of the "Doctrines of Tolstoy." The doctrines of the great Russian, we confess, do not greatly interest us. He goes to the Bible and writes a "Criticism of Dogmatic Theology," which sets out to prove that dogmatic theology is fraudulent, and designed to bolster up the Church. But this fine disregard of tradition and interpretation, although it may be heroic, is not logical. It is when Tolstoy sets himself to interpret human life and destiny that we accept him. Then he becomes a great writer and a great artist. More of the world's time has been wasted over abstract theorising than over any other activity.

APROPPOS of our review in this issue of the new letters of Mrs. Carlyle, we may quote the following extract from a letter of Carlyle's to a friend who had been disappointed in a love affair with a literary lady. We take the passage from a communication of Mr. Thomas Henderson's to the "Westminster Gazette":—

She was a person of genius, if I mistake not: and much as I admire, not to say idolise, that characteristic in a mistress (a sweetheart, as we call it), I confess I should pause before recommending it to any honest man in a wife. These women of genius, sir, are the very d—l, when you take them on a wrong tack. I know very well that I myself—if ever I marry, which seems possible at best—am to have one of them for my helpmate; and I expect nothing but that our life will be the most turbulent, incongruous thing on earth—a mixture of honey and wormwood, the sweetest and the bitterest—or, as it were, at one time the clearest sunshiny weather in nature, then whirlwinds and sleet and frost; the thunder and lightning and furious storms—all mingled together into the same season—and the sunshine always in the smallest quantity! Judge how you would have relished this: and sing with a cheerful heart, E'en let the bonny lass gang!

Here, at any rate, the prophet spoke truth.

VERSE with thought in it and a distinct human idea is so rare that we cannot pass without recognition a poem in "Macmillan's Magazine" by Mr. W. H. Chesson. It is entitled "The Youth of Fear"; we quote three of the four succinct stanzas:—

I saw a scoundrel impotently base
Whose mask had fallen between us on the ground,
And in the pride of judgement saw our race
File past him with contempt too felt for sound.
He did not speak; a sudden scorching wind
Dried up an eloquence of fair repute.
His lips pulsated, hinting "I have sinned,"
While all the alphabets in him were mute.
And then I saw him human, and his past,
Blown like a bubble from his puckered mouth,
Burst in the air. Almost I was aghast
For fear had made him younger than a youth.

THE Society for the Encouragement of Arts, Manufactures and Commerce are offering a gold medal, or twenty pounds, for a Dust-arresting Respirator for use in dusty processes, or in dangerous trades. This is sensible and practical, though we may perhaps be forgiven an involuntary smile.

"THE TIMES" printed on Wednesday an article by M. Emile Faguet on the King's visit to Paris called "Impressions Parisiennes." M. Faguet is jerkily picturesque; he dashes short sentences down in the manner which so often distinguished Victor Hugo, and the Hugo tradition still lives. We quote the two opening and the concluding paragraphs:—

Le Roi descend de wagon. Il est tranquille et souriant. On sent l'homme fort et solidement assis sur une constitution robuste, habitué aux voyages, à la fatigue et aux "corvées de majesté," et qui sait depuis très longtemps son "métier de roi."

Il s'avance avec une bonhomie tranquille vers M. le Président de la République française et lui dit, "Nous avons une belle journée."

Une heure et demie.—Ciel lavé. Orage disparu. Temps splendide. Le ciel voulait seulement tirer quelques coups de canon pour le départ du Roi. C'est un départ dans la tempête, à la Lohengrin. Mais cela ne dure pas. Simple épisode. Tout rentre dans l'ordre. "Nous avons une belle journée."

THERE seems to be some doubt in America as to the value of travelling libraries. Our general idea of a travelling library is confined to boxes from Mudie's, but in America it means a very different thing. The institution exists in twenty-six states; some are supported by State grants and others by women's clubs. These libraries, says a writer in "Scribner's Magazine," "justify lurking suspicions—we all have at times entertained them—as to the possible survival of traditional reading habits and book attitudes." The main idea of the supporters of the travelling library appears to be quite up to date; they want new books and are tired of the classics. "An Indianapolis 'club woman' wrote: 'Those who do not care for books or reading will not send for travelling libraries. Those who do send have read nearly, if not quite, all the books they contain. People in the smaller cities and towns, I venture to say, are better acquainted with standard books than the average resident of a large city.' That, we should have thought, was a very good thing for the people in the smaller cities and towns, but the 'club woman' will have none of it. She yearns for facts; her fellow-women 'wear themselves out to find material for a given subject that is snugly compiled in some book that is as far beyond their reach as if it were in the moon.' Upon which the 'Scribner' commentator remarks: 'What a picture this is of the place the book is coming to fill in the modern life, that of an authority for reference, not of a solace for refreshment; in particular in the life of 'up-to-date' women of eclectic interest in all things.' On the whole we are glad that the travelling library does not yet exist in England.

THE New York "Bookman" publishes a tabulated list of "successful authors" in America from 1895 to 1902. The list is compiled from the record of all their books quoted in the "Bookman," and goes in to all manner of details as to "times quoted," "relative rank," and so forth. The first six names are these: Winston Churchill, Gilbert Parker, Rev. John Watson, James Lane Allen, H. Sienkiewicz, Charles Major. A considerable way down come the names of Rudyard Kipling and J. M. Barrie. There is a moral in all this which we do not propose to drive home. The editor of the "Bookman" was also asked to give a list of the ten worst books in the English language. These are the ten which he named, confining himself to "books whose authors might have been expected to do better": Thackeray's "Philip"; Mark Twain's "Joan of Arc"; Kingsley's "Alton Locke"; Miss Porter's "Scottish Chiefs"; Mr. Watts-Dunton's "Aylwin"; George Eliot's "Daniel Deronda"; Disraeli's "Lothair"; Richardson's "Clarissa Harlowe"; Hawthorne's "The Blithedale Romance"; Longfellow's "Hyperion." We cannot congratulate the editor of the "Bookman" on his discrimination.

WE are glad to get a humorous light upon the Shakespeare-Bacon controversy, and Mr. A. R. Atkinson gives it in the "Monthly Review." He touches the question lightly and with a kind of disguised hilarity. He also makes good practical points. Thus:—

Honour in its higher senses was as foreign to Bacon's thoughts as to his practise. There is not a single word about real honour in the essay "Of Honour and reputation," as published in 1597; a single sentence was devoted to it in the edition of 1625. If the man who drew Hotspur in 1597 and Henry V. in the following year—the two finest incarnations of honour in our literature—had been putting his name to a prose treatise on the same subject at the same time, he would not have waited till his third edition, published nearly thirty years later, before announcing the belated discovery that "There is an Honour likewise, which may be ranked amongst the Greatest, which happeneth rarely: That is of such as Sacrifice themselves to Death or Danger, for the Good of their Country. As was M. Regulus, and the Two Decij." Nine years before the Essayist made his first appearance a certain Invincible Armada, which set sail from Spain for England but failed to reach it, discovered that there were men in England of that rare degree of honour to "sacrifice themselves to death or danger for the good of their country," and even enough of them to conquer the invincible. The lesson was not lost upon the Spanish King, but it made no impression upon the cold heart of Bacon. Within ten years, at any rate, he had forgotten that there was such a virtue as that which had saved England; and when at the age of sixty-five he reminded himself of its existence among men, it was as of a thing "which happeneth rarely," and of which he had to go all the way back to Roman history to find examples.

Mr. Atkinson scores many other points which will appeal to the unprejudiced, and after all the "many-sided Bacon" cry will not suffice to refute them.

A CORRESPONDENCE has been going on in the "Daily Chronicle" for some time concerning the cheerfully-named universal language Esperanto. We have had much talk from time to time about such a language, but nothing came of it. Esperanto, however, seems to be making way. A correspondent of the "Chronicle" states that business men are already using it for their commercial communications with such countries as Russia, China, and Turkey. Esperanto may be acquired by a few hours' study, and it possesses, according to the "Chronicle's" informant, "celestial simplicity and inherent elasticity." Also, Esperanto has a soul—a composite soul, made up of English, French, and German parts. We wish Esperanto success—for commercial correspondence.

We notice that the guests at the "John Bull" dinner each week have the honour of seeing their names under the "Court Circular" heading of the "Times." This week we find, in addition to the staff, the names of two M.P.'s, a distinguished editor, and also that of the "eminent physician" who contributed the fighting introduction to the new Mrs. Carlyle Letters.

Bibliographical.

Will the works of Bulwer Lytton ever form the subject of a bibliography? When that volume appears (if it ever appears) the compiler will have to relate that in (or a little before) May, 1903, three writers and three magazine editors woke up to the fact that the centenary of Bulwer's birth might be, with more or less advantage, celebrated in a critical disquisition. Hence the articles in "The Bookman" (by Mr. Lewis Melville), in "Blackwood" (by Mr. Charles Whibley, it is understood), and in the "Fortnightly" (by Mr. Francis Gribble). I place them in this order, because Mr. Melville's seems to me the broadest-minded, and therefore the fairest of the three. There is internal evidence that Mr. Melville has read his author, largely if not fully; I am not so sure about Mr. Whibley or Mr. Gribble. But I must not myself stray into criticism. I am concerned here only with the bibliographical aspect of the case, and, in that connection, I cannot but regret—for the sake of a writer who appears to me to be, though faulty, unduly depreciated nowadays—that, apparently, for twenty years or more, no effort has been made by his publishers to put before the public anew his "Student," his "Caxtoniana," his "Quarterly Essays," his "St. Stephens," and his "New Timon"—his essays and his satiric verse being among the best of his literary products. Bulwer's fictions—his "Caxtons," his "Harold," his "Strange Story," and his "Coming Race," quite as frequently as his "Pelham," his "Alice," his "Eugene Aram"—have been reproduced over and over again; and there is therefore no excuse for judging him only by his more affected and more melodramatic inventions. Messrs. Routledge would do a good service both to Bulwer and to the reading public if they would reprint the "Birthday Book" (made up of the usual prose and verse selections) which they published in 1879. This was much more favourably representative than the volume of "Wit and Wisdom" compiled by Mr. Charles Kent in 1885.

The desiderated bibliography of Bulwer would show, with other things, that he suffered much from the humorous antagonism of Thackeray. He had also to bear as well as he could the contemptuous sarcasm of Tennyson's "New Timon and the Poets." For some reason or other he did not greatly interest the critics, and in that department the bibliographer would not have much to record. I know of only three literary censors who thought it worth their while to write at all elaborately and judiciously about Bulwer—Nassau W. Senior, W. Caldwell Roscoe, and George Brimley; and who reads them nowadays? On the other hand, one remembers that Lander thought "The Caxtons" a "delightful book"; that Macaulay found something to commend in "Pelham," "Alice," and "The Last Days of Pompeii"; that "My Novel" was praised both by Robertson of Brighton and by Matthew Arnold; that Dickens considered "The Strange Story" "most masterly and most admirable," and that Ruskin admired "Night and Morning" "excessively." This may console Bulwer in the shades.

There will now, of course, be a certain measure of demand for the extant works of Mr. Paul Belloni du Chaillu, who, about forty years ago, was one of the most discussed of travellers. It was in 1861 that he came to the fore with his "Explorations and Adventures in Equatorial Africa; with accounts of the manners and customs of the people and of the chase of the gorilla . . . and other animals." This was followed in 1867 by his "Journey to Ashango-Land, with further penetration into Equatorial Africa." After this came, in succession, "Stories of the Gorilla Country" (1868), "Wild Life under the Equator" (for the young, 1869), "Lost in the Jungle" (also for the young, 1870), "My Apingi Kingdom" (1871), "The Country of the Dwarfs" (1872), "The Land of the Midnight Sun: summer and winter journeys through Sweden, Norway, Lapland, and Northern Finland" (1881, new edition 1899), "The Viking Age: the early history, manners, and customs of the ancestors of the English-speaking nations" (1889), "Ivar the Viking: a romantic history based upon authentic facts" (1893), "The Land of the Long Night" (1900), "The World of the Great Forest" (1901), and "King Mombo" (1902).

In 1901 some of us read with a fair amount of amusement a book, obviously American, called "A Journey to Nature," purporting to be by "J. P. Mowbray"; and this was followed in 1902 by two more books from the same hand, called "The Making of a Country Home" and "Tangled Up in Beulah-Land." We are now told that "J. P. Mowbray" was really the American writer Andrew Carpenter Wheeler, who, over the nom-de-guerre of "Nym Crinkle," had been writing about the New York stage for many years. It seems that either as Wheeler or as Crinkle he published in America "Chronicles of Milwaukee," "The Primrose Path of Dalliance," and some other books. Over here, however, he has been represented only by the "Mowbray" books.

All the way from the Gold Coast Colony there comes to me a request that I should "give a complete list of Edith Wharton's works." "I know," says my correspondent, "of 'Crucial Instances, &c.,' and 'The Valley of Decision.' Are there any more?" Well, there are not many. Apart from the two books named, Mrs. Wharton has published in this country only "The Greater Inclination, and Other Stories" (1899) and "A Gift from the Grave" (1900). The volume on "The Decoration of Houses," in which she seems to have collaborated in 1898, hardly counts, perhaps, among "works." Meanwhile, my correspondent asks, concerning her, "Is she not a second Henry James in the making, with, perhaps, a dash of Harland?" Readers are enthusiastic on the Gold Coast!

In reply to a correspondent at Glasgow, I may mention that Maguire's "Lectures on Philosophy" were published by Messrs. Kegan Paul in 1885 at the price of nine shillings.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Carlyle Pair.

NEW LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE.
Annotated by Thomas Carlyle, and Edited by Alexander
Carlyle, with an Introduction by Sir James Crichton
Browne. 2 vols. (John Lane. 25s. net.)

HERE, edited by one of Carlyle's family, annotated by another, and introduced by a distinguished physician, we have the letters of Mrs. Carlyle which Froude rejected from his edition of her correspondence. Remainder-viands, therefore. And yet they fill two volumes, and yet they are quick and interesting as the chosen letters of few other men or women would be. Unfortunately (to our thinking) these volumes are published with a controversial purpose, and the controversy is managed in no judicious spirit. The controversy is, inevitably, the old quarrel as to Carlyle's treatment of his wife. We have long had our opinion concerning the ungracious and indiscriminate obloquy which—like the bag of a cuttlefish—darkened the literary waters on the publication of Froude's biography. Doubtless that wrong to Carlyle's memory needed righting, and has waited to be righted. We have long, also, had our own opinion concerning the character of Mrs. Carlyle. Doubtless it had become needful to say the truth on this matter: doubtless her unwise partisans had made it necessary. But the associated compilers of this book were not content with a moderate and judicial rectification of the sentence which had gone forth against Carlyle: they have swung back the whole length of the pendulum, and given us a Carlyle fit to hang beside Froude's Mrs. Carlyle—a hero blameless and long-suffering as the Tennysonian Arthur. So it was, and is, and will be: mankind journeys toward truth as a horse accomplishes a hill—by progression from side to side, and extreme still answers to extreme; till finally the mean is struck, and truth attained, in somewhat the tardiest and clumsiest way. In fifty years, perhaps, the public will strike a mean between these extreme contentions concerning the Carlyle pair. Opening its slow mouth, it will say: "Six of one and half-a-dozen of the other"—and shut it again. And it will have done rough justice, after its wont. Individuals may nicely allot the proportionate blame between the two. But for working purposes that rough verdict will stand, and our subtleties shall not avail against it.

Dr. Crichton Browne (in his Introduction) charges it home against Mrs. Carlyle, and whittles away everything which might tell against her husband. Many of the notes pursue with perfect one-sidedness the guerilla-war against Mr. Froude and against her. We do not dispute that their view of Mrs. Carlyle is mainly correct. We think she was more ill to live with than her husband. Doubtless she was sharp of tongue and exacting, doubtless her angles grew sharper with nervous illness, doubtless that illness developed "preternatural suspicion." Very likely she exaggerated the Ashburnham affair; very likely she brooked ill Lady Ashburnham's conversational ascendancy, which poached on her own preserves. But that Carlyle's self-reproaches after her death were baseless and causeless, that he was virtually free of fault towards her—this we do not credit. The character of the man—in friction with the character of the woman—makes it almost impossible. That he blamed himself for airy trifles is like enough. It is a way men have, when their mind is troubled by matters they do not care to dwell on: as they "take out" in trifles their irritation against a woman for something which is no trifle. She may have been the more blameworthy of the two: it seems to us quite probable. But beyond that we think it impossible to go, in judging this couple of unquiet ones. They none the less loved each other to the last, and it was really a much more successful match than one had any right to expect. Let it drop.

This was a woman born for her own unhappiness, and scarce the happiness of others. Quite capable of passionate love (her letters to her husband have warmth and tenderness enough), she had a mordant wit which might have tempted a saint from charity. It scintillates over her letters, and darkened her life; it is a meteor from a morass. Well may she write: "I might have known by myself that the excitability of nerves which makes amusing letters is very compatible with serious ailment." That satiric power settled on everyone, like a mosquito. "Creosote" (spirit of soot) her husband called her, for this diabolic cleverness. Here it leaves its mark:—

What is that quality in the skins of some women, both in pictures and real life, which always suggests nakedness, striptness? Mrs. G., for instance, reminds one always of a servant girl who has pulled off her gown to scrub herself at the pump!

Her description has the same blood-drawing quality, as when she narrates the jealous outbreak of "Geraldine" (Miss Jewsbury):—

All yesterday . . . her vagaries exceeded my reminiscences of Mrs. Jordan in the Jealous Wife. Nothing but outbursts of impertinence and hysterics from morning till night, which finished off with a grand scene in my room after I had gone up to bed. . . . Such mad lover-like jealousy on the part of one woman towards another, it had never entered into my heart to conceive. . . . I got her to laugh over her own absurdity, and, with her hair all dishevelled, and her face all bewept, she thereupon sat down at my feet and—smoked a cigaret!! with all the placidity in life.

For this annoyance she revenged herself by a characteristic epigram:—

I set the whole company into fits of laughter, the other day, by publicly saying to her after she had been flirting with a certain Mr. --- that "I wondered she should expect me to behave decently to her after she had for a whole evening been making love before my very face to another man!"

Audacity she dearly loved, and was tempted to the shocking of highly respectable people—as a laugh is peculiarly irresistible in church. Thus she records during her Liverpool tour, how at dinner—

I found . . . the Clergyman who had preached to me in the morning, and three other men. . . . If you had heard me "putting down virtue and all that sort of thing," in opposition to the sermon I had been forced to listen to in the morning, you would have wondered where I had found the impudence. As for the arguments, I got them, of course, all out of you. But the best of all was to hear James Martineau backing me out in all that,—almost as emphatically as yourself could have done. In taking me down to supper he said, with a heavy sigh, "that it was to be hoped the world would soon have heard the last of all that botheration about Virtue and Happiness." He is anything but happy, I am sure: a more concentrated expression of melancholy I never saw in a human face. I fancy him to be the victim of conscience, which is the next thing to being the victim of green tea!

Though under pressure of illness she in later life developed a certain religious tendency, it is clear that even her childhood made for religious indifference. She records how in a childish crisis she "prayed to Minerva." "I had got converted to Paganism in the course of learning Latin, and Minerva was my chosen goddess." A characteristic choice; and characteristic is another story: "My mother once, after lecturing me on the impropriety of crying when I hurt myself, nearly fell into fits on hearing me fall downstairs and utter no cry after it." An unchildlike strength of will was there; the same which maintained her fiery energy under suffering in after-life. The like independence was in her judgments of men and books, which (despite what she says concerning the dispute with the clergyman) were no mere echo of Carlyle's. Herself a brilliant person, she had but a chastened love for brilliant people. "One brilliant person at a time is a charming thing," she says; "but a whole houseful of brilliant people, shining all day and every day, makes one of George Sand's opinion, that good, honest stupidity is the best thing to associate with." Well, we should most of us find it trying to live on champagne: and for a clever nervous woman it would be killing—she would find no repose, which is the central need of nervous people. Though she makes an exception in favour of brilliant individuals, she would scarce have lived well with them (was not Carlyle a brilliant individual?); and her husband's choice among them was not always to her savour. Browning, for instance, she loved not. Hear her:—

Oh, what a fuss the Brownings made over Mazzini this day! My private opinion of Browning is, in spite of Mr. C.'s favour for him, that he is "nothing," or very little more, "but fluff and feathers!" She is true and good, and the most womanly creature.

Browning reciprocated these benevolent sentiments by pronouncing her hard and unloving. Truly she wrote: "I might well tell Mr. Ross when he spoke of his first 'remarkably disagreeable' impression of myself: 'of course, these things you know are always mutual!'" But Browning stands not alone. The young Rossetti carried with him into after life (as he told Hall Caine) the memory of "a bitter little woman," and doubtless such was the effect Carlyle's soured and ailing wife had on men in her later years. She can scarce have been more favoured by women; yet Miss Jewsbury's behaviour shows that she was capable of being greatly loved by her own sex, as does the behaviour of some among her servants—though she quotes with disbelief the common phrase "affectionate of heart as a woman." Whether she included Mrs. Browning's poems in her admiration of Mrs. Browning does not appear: but she disliked "Shirley" when that novel appeared (its author still a mystery, as her inquiries show):—

Do not trouble to send me "Shirley": I have just finished that not-masterly production. Now that this Authoress has left off corning and schwearing (as my German master used to call it) one finds her neither very lively nor very original. . . . If she have not kept company with me in this life, we must have been much together in some previous state of existence. I perceive in her book so many things I have said myself, printed without alteration of a word.

Perhaps that last sentence explains the matter: Charlotte and Jane were too much of rival prophetesses—and Jane had not got her prophecies into print. It is a very bitter thing to be out-propheesied with one's own prophecies. But the prophet Kingsley gets worse measure for "Alton Locke" in a letter to Carlyle:—

A mere—not very well-boiled—broth of Morning-chronicle-ism, in which you play the part of the tasting-bone of Poverty Row. An oppressive, painful book! . . . And then, all the indignation against existing things strikes somehow so numbly! Like your Father whipping the bad children under the bedclothes!

In other ways, indeed, besides this, the book conveys a sorry impression—the prophets, and the wives of the prophets, snarling on each other and giving back snarl for snarl, like beasts from their neighbouring cages. Our Jane of the venom-dipped tongue would seem to have borne out Shakespeare's impulsive dictum regarding those that have no music in their souls. While her first Oratorio (in her girlhood) ravished her, she confesses that her second, in maturer years, left her "cold and critical on her rather hard bench"; alive to the conventional surroundings, dead to the music of the "Messiah." Something had changed in her for the worse.

But when all is said, let us pardon the woman who fought so strenuous a battle with life and her own frail body; who, racked by nervous pain, sent forth letters still vivid with unconquerable personality. What a picture, for instance, is this of Count d'Orsay's Olympian descent on Carlyle!

There stooped, with a prancing of steeds and footman thunder at the door, an equipage all resplendent with sky-blue and silver, . . . from whence emanated Count d'Orsay! ushered in by the small Chorley. Chorley looked "so much alarmed that he was quite alarming;" his face was all the colours of the rainbow, the under-jaw of him went zig-zag; indeed, from head to foot he was all over one universal quaver, partly, I suppose, from the soul-bewildering honour of having been borne hither in that chariot of the Sun; partly from apprehension of the effect which his man of Genius and his man of Fashion were about to produce on one another.

A sight it was to make one think the millennium actually at hand, when the lion and the lamb, and all incompatible things should consort together. Carlyle in his grey plaid suit, and his tub-chair, looking blandly at the Prince of Dandies; and the Prince of Dandies on an opposite chair, all resplendent as a diamond beetle, looking blandly at him. D'Orsay is a really handsome man, after one has heard him speak and found that he has both wit and sense; but at first sight his beauty is of that rather disgusting sort which seems to be like genius, "of no sex." And this impression is greatly helped by the fantastical finery of his dress: sky-blue satin cravat, yards of gold chain, white French gloves, light drab great-coat lined with velvet of the same colour, invisible inexpressibles, skin-coloured and fitting like a glove, &c., &c. All this, as John says, is "very absurd"; but his manners are manly and unaffected, and he convinces one shortly that in the face of all probability he is a devilish clever fellow. Looking at Shelley's bust, he said, "I dislike it very much; there is a sort of faces who seem to wish to swallow their chins, and this is one of them." He went to Macready after the first performance of "Richelieu," and Macready asked him, "What would you suggest?" "A little more fulness in your petticoat!" answered D'Orsay. Could contempt for the piece have been more politely expressed?

The Last of the Dandies, often portrayed, never lived before. He lives here, set down once for all by the hand of a master (terms of sex would be an injustice in this connection). For such things, and the brilliancy of them, let Mrs. Carlyle be remembered. The glimpses of her husband, touched with character, we have not quoted, since our eye was rather on herself than her well-known husband. But we have quoted enough to show how vivid are even the gleanings of this remarkable and strangely-fortuned woman, who would have stood to the front had she married a sweep.

Sane, Sensible, and Cautious.

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY BIOGRAPHY. By James Bryce. (Macmillan. 10s.)

MR. BRYCE's merits as an historian are admitted and secure; but he hardly displays brilliant qualities as a biographical essayist. These studies are in one sense ambitious, since they range over personalities of very various kind, whose distinction was obtained in widely different fields. Statesmen like Beaconsfield and Gladstone, novelists like Trollope, historians like John Richard Green—such are but a few of the heterogeneous eminences which Mr. Bryce has elected to study. To exercise judgment indifferently in regions thus diverse presupposes a combination of faculties certainly not common, and considerable literary courage. Yet it is not judgment which these studies lack: we can pay Mr. Bryce that compliment. What he has to say about each of his subjects is sane, sensible, dispassionate, and judicial. He has carried into those various fields the tone and mental habit acquired in historical study: you listen to a man who is above all cautious of excess, of anything unbalanced, who is resolute to treat everything with a temperate gravity and a due weighing of the best authorities. But among the excesses which Mr. Bryce successfully avoids is novelty: his caution of the undue includes undue originality. The essays are sober with a Quakerish sobriety, which eschews the immoderation of anything but the gentlest and most tentative originality. Nor does Mr. Bryce evince the biographical gift. You have a little skirmishing introduction, a somewhat arid and formal biographical "sketch," recalling a work of reference, and then the study. On this trite model most of the essays are framed.

In such a purely literary subject as Trollope the absence of brilliancy and the decorous correctness are specially apparent. Anthony Trollope is an eminently decorous subject, hard to treat with brilliancy, and giving scant room for obtrusive originality of criticism at this time of day. Singularly Britannic, rendering with placid and equable success the drab surfaces of English middle-class life (itself the very formulation of correct and bovine mediocrity), he was the apotheosis of talent, almost challenging you to distinguish it from genius. His special merit Mr. Bryce states carefully and clearly:—

The conspicuous merit of Trollope's novels is their value as pictures of contemporary manners. . . . If even his best-drawn characters are not far removed from the commonplace, this helps to make them fairly represent the current habits and notions of their time. They are the same people we meet in the street or at a dinner-party; and they are mostly seen under no more exciting conditions than those of a hunting-meet, or a lawn-tennis match, or an afternoon tea. They are flirting or talking for effect, or scheming for some petty temporary end; they are not under the influence of strong passions, or forced into striking situations. . . . For this reason again they represent faithfully the ordinary surface of English upper and upper middle-class society. . . . Nor, again, has anyone more skilfully noted and set down those transient tastes and fashions which are, so to speak, the trimmings of the dress . . . and which will have an interest for one who, a century or two hence, feels the same curiosity about our manners as we feel about those of the subjects of King George the Third.

That is not only true, but the truth; and equally impossible is it to dissent from Mr. Bryce's comparison with Jane Austen. The following passage, indeed, reminds us of Macaulay's remarks concerning Jane Austen's discrimination of common-place characters:—

His range was not wide. His wings never raised him far above the level floor of earth. But within that limited range he had surprising fertility. His clerical portrait gallery is the most complete that any English novelist has given us. No two faces are exactly alike, and yet all are such people as one might see any day in the pulpit. So again there is scarcely one of his stories in which a young lady is not engaged formally or practically, to two men at the same time, or one man more or less committed to two women; yet no story repeats exactly the situation, or raises the problem of honour and duty in quite the same form as it appears in the stories that went before.

But all this, if undeniably true, is undeniably trite: we have heard it all before, nor does the author redeem the familiarity of matter by any novelty of presentment. Neither does he convey to us any very intimate impressions concerning the character of the novelist, so like Thackeray in his great stature and John Bullism, so different in his art. There is, perhaps, somewhat more of novelty in the concluding passage, which sums Trollope's structural defects:—

He crowded his canvas with figures; he pursued the fortunes of three or four sets of people at the same time, caring little how the fate of the one set affected that of the others; he made his novel a sort of chronicle, which you might open anywhere and close anywhere, instead of a drama animated by one idea and converging towards one centre. He neglected the art which uses incidents small in themselves to lead up to the dénouement and make it more striking. He took little pains with his diction, seeming not to care how he said what he had to say.

The last sentence applies very much to the writer himself. In the passages we have quoted, for example, the language has as little freshness as the criticism. "Wings never raised him far above the level floor of earth," "crowded his canvas with figures," "led up to the dénouement"; this ragoût of stale imagery and juiceless phrase serves nowise to brighten a common-sensible and judicious but unoriginal essay.

Mr. Bryce, however, can do better than this. When he deals with an historian like J. R. Green he is on his own ground, and even the style seems to undergo a perceptible quickening. If not striking or nervous, it is no longer weary, half-hearted, and slovenly. The biographical portion is fleshless and unattractive; but his study of Green is alert, discriminating, and sympathetic: it adds to one's understanding of the man and his work. Mr. Bryce has here the additional advantage of personal acquaintance with Green, and gives us some real picture of his personality:—

Such talk has rarely been heard in our time, so gay was it, so vivid, so various, so full of anecdote and illustration, so acute in criticism, so candid in consideration, so graphic in description, so abundant in sympathy, so flashing of insight, so full of colour and emotion as well as of knowledge and thought. One had to forbid oneself to visit him in the evening, because it was impossible to get away before two o'clock in the morning. . . . His appreciation of whatever had any worth in it, his comments and replies, so stimulated the interlocutor's mind, that it moved faster and could hit upon apter expressions than at any other time.

That is well; but better is this which follows: it realises for us essential and characteristic traits:—

When he went out to dinner, he noted every person present whom he had not known before, and could tell you afterwards something about them. He had a theory, so to speak, about each of them, and indeed about everyone with whom he exchanged a dozen words. When he read the newspaper, he seemed to squeeze all the juice out of it in a few minutes. Nor was it merely the large events which fixed his mind; he drew from stray notices of minor current matters evidence of principles or tendencies which escaped other peoples' eyes. . . . He had the Herodotean quality of reckoning nothing, however small or apparently remote from the main studies of his life, to be trivial or unfruitful. His imagination vitalised the small things, and found a place for them in the pictures he was always sketching out. To give literary form to everything was a necessity of his intellect. He could not tell an anecdote or repeat a conversation without unconsciously dramatizing it, putting into people's mouths better phrases than they would have themselves employed, and giving a finer point to the moral which the incident expressed. Verbal accuracy suffered, but what he thought the inner truth came out the more fully.

That is a vital and salient bit of portraiture; and Mr. Bryce's discussion of Green's work is on a level with it. Indeed, the character and the work are one, and are made reciprocally to illustrate each other. In proportion, in fact, as these essays approach or recede from Mr. Bryce's proper domain of history, they approach or recede from excellence. Had he narrowed his scope, and eliminated the biographical element, we might have praised the whole as we can only praise a part.

Totemism and Primaeval Marriage.

SOCIAL ORIGINS. By Andrew Lang. PRIMAL LAW. By J. J. Atkinson. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

THE late Mr. Atkinson's essay comes second in this volume, but its subject-matter places it first in order of time. It deals, to use the author's own words, with "man in the brutal stage," or, rather, with the anthropoid ancestor of man. That distant fellow whom Stevenson calls "probably arboreal" has come down to earth, however, when Mr. Atkinson takes up the tale. His studies of native manners and customs, during the thirty years and more which he spent in New Caledonia, led him to form an hypothesis, presented in this essay, as to the evolution of Primal Law, which he conceives to have been concerned with the relations between the sexes. His attention has been mainly directed to the curious custom of "brother and sister avoidance," which obtained amongst the natives who surrounded him:—

The rigorous severity of this particular law in daily action is almost incredible. In New Caledonia, for instance, all intercourse between brother and sister by speech or sign is absolutely forbidden from a very early age. . . . They cannot mention each other's names, and if the sister's name is mentioned publicly before the brother, he will show much embarrassment, and if it is repeated he will retire precipitately. She can eat nothing he has carried or cooked. . . . They remain interested in each other's welfare.

Mr. Atkinson's theory attempts to explain the origin of this custom in anthropoid times, when he assumes a sort of patriarchal system, which yielded to a stage in which a son was permitted to dwell within the paternal band but was compelled to seek a mate from without that band. The argument is very complete and interesting, but its details are hardly of a nature to be discussed here; indeed, we scarcely understand for what readers this essay is intended. We can only say that this remarkable custom of "avoidance"—now entirely extinct under European influence—appears to us to have been explained in sound and logical fashion, without the assumption of anything incompatible with the somewhat scanty data—resting mainly on the accounts of native observers—which we possess concerning the habits of the anthropoid apes.

Mr. Lang's essay deals with a much later period. That its value is hardly scientific may be gathered from his remarks upon the "creature, half-ape, half-human . . . on which I venture to express no opinion: as not being persuaded that man ever had such a direct ancestor." This sentence puts us out of temper with Mr. Lang at once. What meaning has the word "direct"? Does he mean that man had such an indirect ancestor, and, if so, what was his direct ancestor? Or does he wish us to understand that he prefaces a supposed scientific essay by questioning the established and central fact upon which its only value can depend?

Let us pass on, then, to Mr. Lang's Theory of the Origin of Totemism, for the subject is an interesting one, and has been discussed by many previous writers. For a definition we will quote Mr. Lang's own words: "The tribe contains a number of totem kindreds, that is, of sets of kins deriving their names from totems, plants, animals, or other objects in nature." Mr. Lang gives an admirable account of the various theories which have been propounded to explain this custom. Their name is legion. Mr. Jevons suggested that a primæval human group jointly and deliberately selected and retained a totem, under the belief that animals were powerful and gifted personalities, whose friendship was worth the having; that "men made a covenant with Bear, or Wolf, as Israel did with Jehovah." There are also many savage speculations as to the origin of totemism. "The most common savage myth is of the Darwinian variety, each totem kin is descended from, or evolved out of, the plant or animal type which supplies its totem." In 1884 Mr. Lang himself guessed that "People united by contiguity, and by the blind sentiment of kinship not yet brought into explicit consciousness, might mark themselves by a badge, and might thence derive a name, and, later, might invent a myth of their descent from the object which the badge represented." That guess does not now appear satisfactory to Mr. Lang. His present theory is that the small primæval groups, at first anonymous, had to be identified by a local habitation and a name. This was accomplished by utilising the name of some plant or animal to which they were thought to bear a resemblance or which was suggested to them or to their neighbours by some fancied trait or character. Totemism arose subsequently as an effort to explain the name of the clan.

Long ago, Mr. Herbert Spencer—as every reader of his "Principles of Sociology" knows—advanced the theory that totemism originated in the familiar custom of giving "animal nicknames." This theory, like those of Lord Avebury and some half-dozen other writers, derives from individuals, in one way or other, the most archaic names of human groups. Mr. Lang's theory maintains that the name was that of a group from the first. He disposes most curtly and unconvincingly of Mr. Spencer by saying, "No theory which starts from an individual male ancestor, and his name bequeathed to his descendants, can be correct." Then it seems to us a pity to have bound Mr. Atkinson's "Primal Law" between the same boards. Mr. Spencer may quite well be wrong, but such a serious thinker needs much more controverting than Mr. Lang has seen fit to employ. For ourselves, we would incline to a theory which fitted in more closely than Mr. Lang's with the probable biological facts. He has begged the question of the period at which totemism arose. If he can demonstrate that there was a stage when women ruled, and that totemism arose so early as that, then well and good. On the contrary, he expressly says, "We are presuming that the jealousy of the elder males drove the younger males out of the group, or at least compelled them to bring in females from other groups, which would mean war." This seems to us practically to invalidate the author's arguments against such scientific writers as Mr. Spencer and Lord Avebury.

However, Mr. Lang is always interesting and always amusing. And if you are interested in Totemism, you will certainly find the subject very completely discussed here, and abundance of varying opinion, of varying weight, on which to decide. But you must take a rest and gain a different mood before donning your thinking-cap, and going on to "Primal Law."

Minor and Modest.

BETWEEN THE LIGHTS. By Alice Herbert. (John Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

HEPHAÏSTUS AND OTHER POEMS. By Arthur Stringer. (Grant Richards.)

THE flight of poems which has of late alighted on our desk is not brilliant, and suggests that poetry more than shares the general eclipse which seems to have obscured literature. Much of it belongs to that absolutely feeble kind which makes one marvel how any publisher should incur responsibility for it; and some is without elementary sense or knowledge of technique, in its simplest meaning. Yet we are happy to note at least one quite truthful voice among the crowd of imitators, or those without even the originality to imitate. Mrs. Herbert's "Between the Lights" is quite minor and modest; it has no great technical accomplishment, sense of form, or gift of diction; it is written in language sometimes over-near to the domestic language of a cultivated woman—the language of serious and thoughtful letters and so forth. Yet the plain sincerity of it lifts it into line with poetry. It bears the impress of a woman who has felt, thought, and suffered—felt and suffered with dignity and intelligence. "The Widow" has dramatic point and a feeling which at times is not far short of intensity. These are some of its stanzas:—

While you lived, while you lived, did I often turn and leave you?
Did I hold the sunshine lightly till it faded from the sky?
It has left a bitter darkness. Come again, and if I grieve you,
You may take your great revenge again, beloved,— you may die.

I have sinned against the light, for I have always understood.
I have known the mean and sullied from the lovely and the good.
Heart and soul of me could read you: and I read and turned away,
But I never turned so far or lay so cold as you to-day.

Nay, I know—laugh to know—that you never can go
free!
There is no heaven sweet enough to drown your need of me.
Under the very smile of God you listen for my voice.
Will they let you hear its breaking when they bid you to rejoice?
For me with all my folly, and for me with all my sin,
You would wait with heaven before you, and refuse to enter in.
And I, for just one hour of you, to feel your touch
again,
Would give—O words, O dreams, how late! how utterly in vain!

That is a fine close to the first of our quoted stanzas. A kindred, if less concentrated touch, is in other of the lyrics, longer or shorter, such as "Unremembering Spring," for example. Nor can we part from the volume without quoting a sonnet with much beauty of feeling and expression, "Love":—

What can I sing of you, last, dearest, best?
You, not my lover as the world counts love,
You, whose rare touch is such a sweet unrest,
That, fearing, it grows rarer. You who prove
In spite of all the world's sad wisdom told,
That Love can live, with all its earthly fire,
Yet unfulfilled. Not cold the lips—not cold,
That will not dare to drink of their desire.
Beloved, if the sword that guards the door
Fell from our angel's hand and left it wide,
Should we dare enter? Is it less or more
Of Paradise that lies the other side?
More than I give you could I hardly give:
More than I have I could not bear and live.

There is a reticence and dignity of utterance in this which fitly matches the substance.

Mr. Arthur Stringer, whose work we have also singled out from the rest, is in precise antithesis to Mrs. Herbert. He is a careful student of form, and his diction is elaborately rich. It is all, however, in the fashionable manner of the day—half Tennyson, half Swinburne; and there is a lack of central substance, of any authentic originality of feeling or idea, when we pierce the veil of artistically woven language. Of Mr. Stringer's style this is a specimen:—

Then did your body seem a temple white
And I a worshipper who found therein
No god beyond the gracious marble, yet
Most meekly kneeled, and learned that I must love.
The bloom of youth was on your sunburnt cheek,
The streams of life sang through your violet veins,
The midnight velvet of your tangled hair
Lured, as a twilight rill, my passionate hands;
The muscles ran and rippled on your back
Like wind on evening waters, and your arm
Seemed one to cherish, or as sweetly crush.
The odour of your body sinuous
And saturate with sun and sea-air was
As Lesbian wine to me, and all your voice
A pain that took one back to times unknown.

That has colour, and a certain imagination; its merit is evident; yet we feel that we have heard a like strain from many modern harps. That is the drawback of Mr. Stringer's craftsmanlike book, "Hephæstus": it is an exercise in a familiar kind, it is imitative. But admitting this, in its kind it is good.

Oxford and Change.

OXFORD AT THE CROSS ROADS. By Percy Gardner.
(A. & C. Black. 2s. 6d. nett.)

THE reader of "Oxford at the Cross Roads" will naturally ask himself the question—Where do the diverging paths lead? A possible reply would be that one leads to the inclusion of archaeology in the final honour school of litterae humaniores, and the other doesn't. The answer is unfair, but it is not altogether unnatural. Prof. Gardner is an archaeologist of distinction who has made not a few valuable contributions to our knowledge of classical antiquity. Naturally he sees with disappointment the branch of study in which he is particularly interested comparatively neglected in the University; he sees an irresistible attraction drawing the majority of the best men of every year towards "greats"; now and then one of them warms into a St. Martin's summer of polite learning, discovers the Discourses of Christ or the Hymns of Boethylides, or the Palace of Minos, and satisfies Prof. Gardner's severest requirements; but too often they forsake the skirts of alma mater, forget all about the idol Besas and the astrologer Petosiris, provoke the contempt of Prof. Ubrich von Wilamowitz-Moellendorff, and become Viceroy of India like Lord Curzon, or High Commissioner of South Africa like Lord Milner, or write "Dolly Dialogues" like Mr. Anthony Hope. Pity the sorrows of an archaeologist! The above is something of a parody of Prof. Gardner's attitude. He admits it to be both necessary and desirable that "greats" should be something more than a training for the scholar, and that it is the function of a university to educate the man of affairs and the man of letters as well as the man of research. He believes it to be possible so to modify the Oxford system as to adapt it to the requirements of each of the three. He takes a broad and liberal view of the place of a University in the life of the nation, and in advocating the claims of research he befriends other studies besides those in which he is primarily interested. The main feature in his scheme is the institution in the Final School of a system of alternatives among which each student should take his choice; he would give greater inducements to research by making it more profitable for examination purposes; and he would attach more importance to the achievement of solid and original work than is possible under the present system. It is impossible not to feel a good deal of sympathy with his object. But he does not seem to us fully to appreciate the danger of altering a course which, though open to criticism from many sides, has been upon the whole an admitted success. It may be granted that original work finds scant recognition in the University. But ought such recognition to be found for it in an ordinary degree examination? We are familiar with the theses turned out by the score from American universities. Their intrinsic value as a rule is little enough, for they are the work of immature craftsmen, who are not yet masters of their tools. And it appears to us to be of the utmost importance that the man who proposes to carry on any branch of original research should first be trained by a course which aims solely at educating the mental faculties, and not at all at producing tangible achievements of learning. We would reserve for post-graduate study what Prof. Gardner would include in the preparation for a degree. Encourage research in Oxford by all means, but let it be carried on by men who have received such a training and equipment as the "greats" course can give them. No doubt there are men who go down from Oxford believing that they have taken all knowledge to be their province, and ready to write essays, as the typical Balliol man was once supposed to be, on "The world; its past history and future prospects." But the training which will eradicate vanity and folly from the minds of the vain and foolish has yet to be invented. We do not believe that the "greats" course encourages superficiality; we do believe that it discourages that worst of mental vices, the pedantry of the half-learned. In calling attention to the neglect of research in Oxford, Prof. Gardner has performed a public service. He has pointed to a great and conspicuous defect, of which Oxford herself began some years ago to be conscious, and to the significance of which she is not yet fully awakened. In proposing to remedy it by altering "greats," he appears to us to be adopting mistaken means to a desirable end; and we venture to suggest that if he had himself had his preliminary training in that school, he would have learned to take a less extreme view of its deficiencies, and would have discovered that it is not incompatible with the methods and ideals of true scholarship.

Shakespeare's Portrait.

A NEW PORTRAIT OF SHAKESPEARE. By John Corbin. (John Lane. 5s. net.)

THIS book raises a very interesting discussion. The "new portrait" of the title is the Ely Palace Portrait, now in the Stratford Museum; and the book considers the respective claims of this and of another portrait in that collection (the alleged original of the Droeshout engraving) to be original paintings of Shakespeare. Shakespeare portraits are perilous things. In the later eighteenth century "originals" were manufactured wholesale, generally by painting a new head on an old picture of anyone the forger came across. One of these men, Holder, after describing an "original" made out of a Dutch admiral, says: "I afterwards made another Shakespeare worth a score such as the above." As Mr. Corbin observes, this "other" Shakespeare of Holder (which has not been traced) is a lurking terror to all who have to do with supposed original portraits of Shakespeare. The only portraits which certainly belong to the poet's time are the engraving by Droeshout prefixed to the Folio, and the Stratford bust. They agree in general features, such as the contour of the face, the moustache, the domed forehead; but differ in details, such as the nose, which is so much shorter in the bust that it is suggested it may be due to a fracture of the stone in carving the bust.

The Ely portrait was discovered by a Bishop of Ely in 1846, in a second-hand dealer's shop. It was found to have an inscription, giving the date 1603, at 39, which agrees with Shakespeare's age in that year. The inscription is in the block characters usually employed in paintings of the early seventeenth century; and the portrait has an evident resemblance to the Droeshout engraving. Many good critics (including the Director of the National Portrait Gallery) believe it to be a genuine painting of the seventeenth century, whether or not it be a portrait of Shakespeare. The colours are too thin for any picture underneath, nor is there any such trace where they have been removed by scrubbing. For the picture has been scrubbed, and restored in parts, though the upper portion of the face is luckily pretty safe. The inscription bears trace of repainting only in one minute portion—enough, however, to make it insecure evidence. The hair and moustache are auburn, as they are said to have been in the Stratford bust; but the eyes are greenish-gray, while the Stratford eyes were hazel. The dress has a general resemblance to that in Droeshout's engraving.

The painting which is claimed as the original of Droeshout's engraving has practically no history. It belonged to a private person, and is on a panel. It exactly resembles the engraving, save that the face is painted with somewhat more skill. Setting aside the opinions of judges, which vary greatly, Mr. Corbin's arguments against it are these. The inscription is not in block letters, but in freehand characters, which are seldom found in paintings of the supposed time. There is clearly another picture underneath—a suspicious thing, seeing the habits of forgers. The moustache corresponds with that in the later prints of Droeshout's engraving, not with that in the original state, before the engraving had been tampered with (as it has very largely). Now the original painting should correspond in this point with the original engraving. It looks as if it had been made after the engraving, and from a late state of it. Finally, the points of bad drawing in the dress, which the engraving shows, are exaggerated in the painting. We should expect an original painting rather to correct this bad drawing. These are certainly points against the picture. In the Ely painting, on the other hand, we find just such improvement in the drawing of the dress as seems to suggest how Droeshout's mistakes came about; while the moustache corresponds with that in the first state of the engraving. Without following the matter into more subtle and artistic details, it must be said that Mr. Corbin makes it plausible that the Ely picture is an original portrait of the poet, though not perhaps the original of the engraving; while he certainly shows a case against the supposed Droeshout original. And there the thing must for the present stand.

Other New Books.

THE HISTORY OF THE HAWTREY FAMILY. By Florence Molesworth Hawtreay. 2 Vols. (Allen. 21s. net.)

"HAVE regard to thy name: for that shall continue with thee above a thousand great treasures of gold." This text from "Ecclesiasticus" appears on the title page of this work, and it accurately indicates its inspiration and limitations. Miss Hawtreay has had regard to her family name, but very little regard for the outside reader. Her preface does nothing for him; it promises him no reward for his toil in reading nearly a thousand pages. The Hawtreay family is a very old one, and according to a note in its pedigree preserved at the Bodleian Library, was "of a noble estimation in Normandy before the Norman Conquest." However, four-fifths of Miss Hawtreay's pages are concerned with the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries, and with family comings and goings. The lack of index makes the book difficult to explore.

RAMBLES IN WOMANLAND. By Max O'Rell. (Chatto and Windus. 3s. 6d. net.)

MAX O'RELL has rambled a good deal over all manner of subjects; he has generally been amusing, always superficially observant, and occasionally witty. In the present volume he combines epigrams (divided into labelled sections) with more or less serious matter. We find neither the epigrams nor the serious matter greatly to our taste. The epigrams are of the obvious order and the seriousness appears to be inspired by an amiable but undiscerning sentiment. As a champion of women Max O'Rell reminds us of the astute lecturer who states a onesided case to an appreciative audience, and states it without distinction; as a critic of women he merely indulges in generalizations which are practically valueless. We do not find this kind of thing in the least stimulating:—

Passion excites vanity, noise, envy: it plays to the gallery.
Love seeks retirement, and prefers a moss bank against some wall covered with ivy, some solitude where silence is so perfect that two hearts can hear each other beat, where space is so small that lips must forcibly meet.

As for the epigrams, we must quote to show their quality:—

Many virtues, when carried too far, become vices.
In love it is better to be a creditor than a debtor.

All the efforts that an old woman makes to hide her age only help to advertise it louder.

If a man is not to a certain extent ill at ease in the presence of a woman, you may be quite sure that he does not really love her.

These sayings illustrate fairly the quality of Max O'Rell's work in the present volume. We have no doubt a great many people will enjoy the book, and the enjoyment will be innocent and wholesome. For ourselves, we prefer stronger meat.

TWENTY-SIX HISTORIC SHIPS. By Frederick Stanhope Hill. (Putnams.)

THIS volume contains the story of certain famous vessels of war in the navies of the United States and of the Confederate States of America. We are not, therefore, carried back to the fighting days about which romance has so gloriously gathered, though in this record there is no lack of romance. Says the author, proudly, in his preface: "From colonial days to this the doings of our men of the sea have been of resplendent character." The passion for the sea was in the blood, and necessity found material ready. The earliest colonial life demanded water-traffic, and with expansion of commerce the ships of the New World sailed into the waters of the Old. The history of the founding of the American Navy is astonishingly concrete; it sprang into being at a bound, and its hero was the splendid and immortal Paul Jones. The fight between the "Bon Homme Richard" and the "Serapis" was as fine a piece of work as any on record, and the dramatic conclusion, when the conquerors had to leave their sinking ship for the surrendered "Serapis," remains, in its way, unapproached. The author's account of this great fight is necessarily brief, as are also his other records, but they are succinct and clearly stated. The book covers the period 1775-1902, and naturally concludes with the recent Spanish War. Amongst the ships dealt with are the "Laurence," the "Monitor," the "Kearsage," the "Alabama," and the "Tennessee," and the volume contains many interesting portraits and illustrations. The author naturally has enthusiasm and believes in the future of his country's fighting fleet. Of the present officers and men he says: "Happily in them is still found—even as when Paul Jones hoisted the rattlesnake flag at the mast-head of the 'Alfred' a century and a quarter ago . . . the true strength of the Navy of the Republic."

THE HUDSON RIVER. By Edgar Mayhew Bacon. (Putman's Sons.)

THE author presents in this work the gist of many volumes dealing with the traditions and history and manners of the Valley of the Hudson River; he has also added some hitherto unpublished material: but the result is a pot-pourri, disjointed, satisfying neither on the historical, legendary, nor picturesque side. There is the usual implied consciousness of the impossibility of exhaustively treating so vast a subject in a single volume: but is the subject really so vast? The river, no doubt, is rich in legends and historic associations, and every mile of it from ocean to source crowded with reminders of the early explorers, of the Indian wars, of the Colonies' struggles. Mr. Bacon knows his subject well, but the book for all that is largely for American readers.

It is a history, perhaps complete, perhaps glorified, and suffering from the usual faults when the subject is treated topically instead of consecutively. The historical part is snatchy and the legendary rather sparse; unless it be contained in the abundance of small type introduced by way of quotation. But the fascinating feature of the book is the ten-foot map showing the valley of this great river with its twin rail of steel on either bank stretching endlessly. On this map are indicated the riverside residences of moneyed America, but there is no gossip about these millionaires, no hint as to what their mansions cost, or who laid out their Italian gardens; but there are patches of the War of Independence, suggestive of American magazines, and patches of Aaron Burr; there are comparisons between the early Dutch settlers and their prototypes in the Transvaal: such things do not make desperately interesting reading to the average English reader. The volume is splendidly produced, and weighs four pounds five ounces. No light task.

Fiction.

THE HILL OF TROUBLE. By Arthur C. Benson. (Isbister. 6s.)

THIS volume consists of twelve short studies, or, to be more accurate, of twelve studies in the phases of a single emotion. That emotion is fear. Sometimes it is the brute, unreasoning fear that makes a man cower beneath the terror of his own thoughts. Sometimes it is the fear of one conscious of an intangible something lurking in the midst of the most harmless external phenomena. Sometimes it is the soul's terror before the certitude of a tribunal other than that of one's fellow men. But always the atmosphere is one of dread. But with this atmosphere of dread there is the consolation of spiritual courage arriving ultimately at the tranquil and steadfast recognition of the soul's freedom through death.

Perhaps "The Gray Cat" is the most typical of these stories, because in it we have the combination of physical and spiritual fear culminating in absolute spiritual peace. In it, too, is the fear of place which very few authors—Edgar Allen Poe is, of course, one of them—can interpret more convincingly than can Mr. Benson. A knight, Sir James Leigh, lived with his wife and his only child Roderick in a lonely valley of the Welsh hills. Now on the summit of a neighbouring mountain, shadowed by a cruel peak, was a certain dark pool which had an evil name and which the boy discovered for himself by accident. He is forbidden to go there again, but in spite of his promise he revisits the place and there he finds the gray cat. The cat is glad to see him and purrs with pleasure, and he returns and visits it again. And little by little the idea of the gray cat banishes all other thoughts from his mind. It becomes the secret sin. At first the cat had refused to leave the vicinity of the pool, but afterwards it visited him at all times and places. And once he awoke suddenly and found the cat watching him with a gleam of hatred in its eyes, and though it came wheeling up to him on the instant he could not forget that look. The idea of the cat haunts his dreams. He falls ill, and a priest watches at his bedside, knowing well that it is the boy's soul as well as his life that is at stake. And "a small and shadowy thing, like a wren, only white with dusky spots upon it," came from the boy's mouth, and the priest knew that it was a human soul:—

Then the priest was aware of a strange and horrible thing; there sprang softly on to the bed the form of the great gray cat, very lean and angry, which stood there, as though ready to spring upon the bird, which hopped hither and thither, as though careless of what might be . . . Then the priest signed the cross and said "In Nomine"; and as the holy words fell on the air, the cat looked fiercely at the bird, but seemed to shrink into itself; and then it slipped away.

At last, after a terrible ordeal of watching and prayer, and in spite of "a creeping blackness" that had overshadowed the bird, it returns to the boy, and he lives and his soul is saved.

The black form shrank and slipped aside, and seemed to fall on the ground; and outside there was a shrill and bitter cry which echoed horribly on the air.

And that is how the secret sin, which is also the secret terror, was finally mastered. The restraint and almost archaic simplicity of Mr. Benson's style are admirably suitable to these tales of mediæval mysticism.

WHAT BEFELL A BRISTOL TRADER. By J. Johnson. (Henry J. Drane. 6s.)

We think that Mr. J. Johnson may possibly "find himself" in his next novel. A French writer has said aptly that young writers give their minds much exercise and little food, and the saying certainly applies with justice to "What Befell a Bristol Trader," which we take to be the first essay at novel writing by an unpractised hand. The defect of the story is that it is full of hurried incidents, and that the unresting author never develops his situation adequately. Mr. Johnson brings together a mixed company on the deck of a merchant barque of the eighteenth century, and unfolds scene after scene with a prodigality that ends by leaving the reader a little sceptical and a little indifferent. The artistic strength of the novel is, that, despite its somewhat crude local colour and amateurish plot, the characters are living individual people, who seem to have strayed by chance into naively make-believe surroundings. Should the author make a second attempt we advise him to write a novel of character study and eschew incident. Incident and action are not artistically ends in themselves, but must be treated as inevitable steps in the development of the whole theme. If we are to consider "What Befell a Bristol Trader" simply as an imitative narrative of the eighteenth century we must pronounce it to be a failure, but a failure which offers hopes of Mr. Johnson's success in the field of the novel of character.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

CATHERINE STERLING.

By NORMA LORIMER.

The story opens in Yokohama. "'A marriage in the sight of God, but without benefit of clergy?' the girl asked." She consented, and that is the initial situation. The man died, and the girl unexpectedly came into a fortune through a gold find in Klondyke. Then the story moves westward. We have pictures of Italy, and at last, London. The problem is worked out in "Society." (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE HEBREW.

By JOHN A. STEUART.

"A story of the time." The Hebrew on the cover wears a frockcoat, and appears to be counting out gold coins on a table. But the story opens in Cherry Tree Court, a typical slum, and is largely concerned with Whitechapel poverty. The central figure is an Irish clergyman, the vicar of an East-end parish. Mr. Steuart, who is the author of "The Minister of State," has made a laborious study of his subject. (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

PIGS IN CLOVER.

By FRANK DANBY.

A long story of modern political and social life. The father of the heroine was a rising politician whose career is described with frequent reference to recent political events. Aline makes a tragic marriage in the third chapter, and then we are in the whirlpool. There are Jews, millionaires, politicians, dukes, South African speculators, and all the familiar figures of this school of contemporary romance. Part of the action takes place at the Cape. (Heinemann. 6s.)

STAY-AT-HOMES.

By L. B. WALFORD.

A domestic story. Most of the action passes at an English country house, in which there are three daughters, one of whom has become imbued with the modern passion for self-realization. There are visits to London for the season, but the story has a quiet atmosphere. It originally appeared in the weekly edition of "The Times." (Longmans. 6s.)

No HERO.

By E. W. HORNUNG.

A story, told in the first person, which opens with a letter and the question: "Has no writer ever dealt with the dramatic aspect of an unopened envelope?" The letter results in an interview with the lady of the narrator's aforetime affection, and his departure on a mission to save her son from certain foolish complications. The unravelment is ingenious, and the story is well-written and high-spirited. (Smith, Elder. 3s. 6d.)

A BURGHIER QUIXOTE.

By DOUGLAS BLACKBURN.

A Boer story by the author of "Prinsloo of Prinslooedorp." The narrative has reality and a point of view. "The mistakes I have made—and I admit they are many—will help the world to know the real character of many of my countrymen, among whom I have been as a Don Quixote, fighting on behalf of Great Britain against the folly and ignorance that have caused such loss and suffering." The book is inscribed to Robert Douglas Clark, "whose culture, wit, and humour have established a literary standard in South Africa." (Blackwood. 6s.)

THE MAN OF LETTERS.

By SIR GEORGE DOUGLAS, BART.

A slow-moving story of two friendships, one of which, beginning with great promise, ended badly, the other, beginning indifferently, ended well. The Man of Letters tells the story in the first person, though literature does not appear to be very vitally concerned in the narrative. The note of the book is a naïve simplicity. (Hodder and Stoughton. 5s.)

SOUL MUSIC.

By J. N. CARLYLE.

A modern love story with the atmosphere of conventional romance. Of the two men who love the heroine, one is her godfather, and the other the worthless son of a farmer in the village who is sent to Edinburgh to study medicine, but prefers marriage with the heiress in order that he may live on her money. She chooses the wrong man, and justifies the title, which is taken from Shakespeare. (Black. 6s.)

RONALD CARNAQUAY.

By BRADLEY GILMAN.

An American novel with a purpose. The sub-title is "A Commercial Clergyman." "The aim of this book," says the author, "is to 'hold the mirror up to nature' as manifested in certain phases of the church-life of our time." The story opens with a vestry meeting and develops into a serious criticism of parochial life in the United States. Mr. Gilman is himself a clergyman, and is the author of "The Parsonage Porch." (Macmillan. 6s.)

We have also received: "The Death Whistle," by Richard Marsh (Treherne); "Shapes of Clay," by Undine Dixon (Treherne); "At Noon," by "Maisey" (Elliot Stock); "Near of Kin," by Leslie Keith (Hurst and Blackett); "Haviland's Chum," by Bertram Mitford (Chatto and Windus); "The Secret Way," by J. S. Fletcher (Digby, Long); "The League of Twelve," by Guy Boothby (White); "Thoroughbreds," by W. A. Fraser (Heinemann).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue	1/5

Mr. Conrad's Way.

Of the many orders of romance perhaps the romance of the sea is the most constant in its appeal, and this, primarily, because it touches so nearly the uncertainty of human life and brings men face to face with a force mysterious, alluring, and unconquerable. It represents the unknown, and demands a humble affection and something of a shuddering worship. In our time the cult of the sea has changed the tone of its interpreters; the old rollicking sea-story has still its representatives, but writers have arisen who have brought to the old subject a different outlook and a different method. They have seen with a more subjective eye and realised the inner meanings of power in relation to individual temperament. The first of the new school, perhaps, was Herman Melville, who is still, in his particular way, unapproached; but he did not bring to his subject the creative imagination which we find, say, in the work of Mr. Kipling and Mr. Conrad.

Two books largely concerned with the sea lie before us: Mr. Conrad's "Typhoon" (Heinemann) and Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne's "Captain Kettle, K.C.B." (Pearson). Mr. Hyne treats the sea jovially, objectively, in a way vividly; he understands the handling of a ship and he gives us characters reasonably in keeping with their environment. Captain Kettle is something of a creation; he has stood the strain of several volumes, and in this latest volume we are glad to meet him again. But Captain Kettle is, after all, a convention; he occupies a stage and appeals to the suffrages of a popular audience. He is presented from the outside; we never approach to any intimacy with the soul of the man. This does not detract from the excellence of Mr. Hyne's work; it merely marks its limitations; limitations, no doubt, deliberately accepted by the author as necessary to a popular scheme. Mr. Conrad, on the other hand, has no idea of popular appeal; he is a writer who is so possessed with the terror and wonder and beauty of the sea that he brings to his work a sense, as it were, of profound responsibility, a consciousness of vastness and of wide and sinister horizons. And against this background move his characters—characters most faithfully observed, alive, full of nerve, or smitten down by the fear of sudden and awful death. We never question the truth of Mr. Conrad's characters. We may sometimes dislike his method, we may find fault with his construction, but the essential human element of his dramas stands beyond cavil. In a word, his psychology has the accuracy of brilliant diagnosis.

Many critics have complained of Mr. Conrad's indirectness; he leaves his main theme to go off on a side issue, to introduce the point of view of a minor character into his narrative, to pick up a thread apparently dropped with something of the carelessness of a child. There is reason in the complaint; though, for ourselves, we are willing to accept Mr. Conrad's work just as it stands. For this indirectness, this returning upon himself, this effect, often disconcerting, of an abruptly introduced outside comment, are inherent parts of the extraordinary subjectivity of Mr. Conrad's method. When Jukes, in the "Typhoon," is writing to his friend in the Western Ocean trade we feel that Mr. Conrad is endeavouring to correct his own conception of Captain MacWhirr by the commonplace conception of the first mate; the result is to heighten the effect of MacWhirr's simplicity, stolidity, and sublimely unimaginative pluck. The course of the terrific storm is followed with a cumulative and crashing power; it is, indeed, the typhoon itself which is the vital personality of the story; it is against that implacable monster that the battle is waged in turmoil and darkness. Mr. Conrad has the rare faculty of investing with a kind of savage personality the forces which are themselves subject to the unknown and invisible force which is at the heart of the world. His winds move upon the clamorous waters like driven and helpless deities. We must quote a passage from "Typhoon." The storm has not yet reached its climax, but the boats are going. Jukes sees "two pairs of davits leaping black and empty out of the solid blackness":—

He poked his head forward, groping for the ear of his commander. His lips touched it—big, fleshy, very wet. He cried in an agitated tone, "Our boats are going now, sir."

And again he heard that voice, forced and ringing feebly, but with a penetrating effect of quietness in the enormous discord of noises, as if sent out from some remote spot of peace beyond the black wastes of the gale; again he heard a man's voice—the frail and indomitable sound that can be made to carry an infinity of thought, resolution and purpose, that shall be pronouncing confident words on the last day, when heavens fall, and justice is done—again he heard it, and it was crying to him, as if from very, very far—"All right."

Captain MacWhirr had never turned his face, but Jukes caught some more words on the wind.

"What can—expect—when hammering through—such—Bound to leave—something behind—stands to reason."

The main incident of "Typhoon" is the fight amongst the battened-down Chinamen when their boxes break loose and the hoarded dollars get adrift; it is an admirably told incident, but just in that place we hardly need it, it is not one of Mr. Conrad's characteristic digressions. It strikes us, indeed, as an interpolation, a concession to those who insist on incident. Mr. Conrad, in our view, should make no concessions.

The remaining stories in the volume deal less directly with the sea, though through all of them runs the note of it, and over all of them broods the spirit of it. "Falk" is a most remarkable study; it illustrates Mr. Conrad's way in Mr. Conrad's most elaborate manner. It is as certain that no other living author could have written it as that no other living author would have attempted it. In its way, the thing is architectural, or rather, like a mosaic, built up out of infinite fragments. The heart or secret of it is almost unimportant; we should have been content to let Falk's misfortune remain undiscovered. We are almost inclined to resent anything in the nature of a plot in Mr. Conrad's work; he has no need of adventitious aids. He is an interpreter not of incidents mechanically contrived, but of moods and the human spirit. At times we seem to hear a cry of revolt, the first breathings of a passionate protest against the pain and mystery of the world; again, we are carried away by the splendid energy of action and the insurgence of immortal youth. Mr. Conrad is one of the few writers who think intently and express lucidly; the apparent diffuseness of his method indicates the eager searching of a masterful mind.

The story in this volume called "Amy Foster" is a piece of true tragedy—the tragedy of attraction and misunderstanding. But the misunderstanding is not of that sort which is the current coin of fiction, it is rather an absolute lack of understanding which reaches to the depths of essential and inevitable tragedy. The simplicity of it leaves no room for side issues; from first to last we are engrossed by the narrative as by a dream made actual

Here is bare life, handled with extraordinary skill—life free from any kind of sentimentality, bare to the nerve. The concluding story is more commonplace both in idea and treatment, yet one of the characters raises it far above the level of ordinary fiction. Mr. Conrad can give us in a few strong touches the history of a quiet, half-developed and baffled soul.

There is no secret about Mr. Conrad's power: he who runs may read and understand. It lies in an intense reality of observation, a profound sense of the mystery of all creation, a deep pity for the human tragedy, and an unshakable belief in the joyous possibilities of life. This, of course, should be the full equipment of every writer who essays to interpret life; we know how seldom any writer has a real grip of even one of these necessary qualities. Mr. Conrad, of course, has faults; it would be easy to criticise certain points in any one of these stories. But before such distinct achievement criticism may well lay down its arms. To recall in quietness the massed impressions which this volume leaves with us is to be convinced that in Mr. Conrad we have a writer whose work is worthy of a time which, though great in a hundred ways, is still not great in literary expression. Mr. Conrad is great in literary expression; but he is greater in a breadth of outlook which takes into account the actual forces which move and console the world.

The True Traveller.

It is surely strange when we consider the number of travellers that our country boasts, the ever-growing mass of travel books and the immense curiosity of all sorts and conditions of persons concerning unknown lands, and every kind of possible adventure, that the ideal book of travel should be so rare. And indeed in our day it is becoming rarer than ever. Innumerable books are published that deal certainly with countries known and unknown, but they are as far from our ideal book of travel as is Baedeker. And they are as far from literature too. In Hakluyt's Voyages, quite apart from the wonder of the new discoveries and the adventures to be met with on the infinite seas of that world, there is a spirit that in some way or other touches reality and our hearts too as but very few modern books are able to do. It is as though—

The road calls and the sea calls
And Day and Night is enough—for every one of those old adventurers, as though indeed in some wholly ingenuous but still subtle way they touched the absolute, and apprehended God, while our modern writers knowing all things have dreamed that they have comprehended Him, viewing the world that was "very good" from a first-class carriage on the railway or the hearts of men whose language too often they fail to understand, vulgarly; boasting of their science while they denounce superstition; believing in their scientific contrivances as though they were indeed civilisation. Mr. Gissing, in a delightful volume "By the Ionian Sea," has shown us in a slight but almost perfect book how reverently and with what care even the sorriest and oldest things should be dealt with. He tells us of Magna Gracia with more love and understanding than many a Christian writer has expended upon Palestine, and he revives for us the ancient books that go to make so scholarly a pilgrimage sweet indeed. And Mr. Hilaire Belloc too, in a volume as refreshing as the south-west wind, has told us of a journey on foot to Rome. Such books are, however, rare. Far more common are the excellent and informative volumes without any real sense of literature, offering us no spiritual glimpse of the people with whom they deal, and yet useful, wise even in a narrow way, interesting the average sensual man by reason of the practical information which they display. Such a volume lies before us in Mr. Wirt Gerrare's "Greater Russia" (Heinemann). Within its limits it is an excellent piece of work, but it is not literature, and it is not our ideal book of travel. While reading it we are never sufficiently carried away to forget our immediate surroundings, or to whisper "to-morrow" to ourselves in sympathy with the author with whom we too shall set out in the morning for a long day of adventure, into the unknown; knowing only that sleep will come with evening. It is perhaps too much to expect of one so concerned with the railway that he should note the dawn or the sunset. In comparison, however, with the usual travel book, Mr. Wirt Gerrare's "Greater Russia" is far from being commonplace. It is in comparing it with a real book of travel that it fails. The same, however, cannot be said for a book ridiculous and futile, that in a vain imitation of Mark Twain is called "Anglican Innocents in Spain" (Simpkin). It is almost needless to say that this amateur volume fails in comparison with any sort of book that is literature, whatsoever. It is the supreme example of what a travel-book should not be. Vulgar and insular, it is inaccurate and feebly humorous in the manner which characterises Mark Twain in his worst moments. It is the experiences of a "High" Anglican in Spain at Easter time, and the result, in the form of a book, is rather blatant than anything else. It is dedicated to the Rev. A. H. Stanton, of St. Alban's, Holborn, but whether with or without his permission we are not told. This, for instance, is the kind of thing we are given as the result of observation:—

Now I was going into a real Catholic country—for all Spain is Catholic. . . . I naturally wanted to know what a Spanish clergyman was like. Well, I saw him at one of the first stations on entering Spain. Dressed after the usual manner of clergymen abroad, but in rags as far as his trousers were concerned, poor man! at least what portion of them I was privileged to see. He didn't wash, looked decidedly "high" church, and was blessed with an awful squint. Between ourselves, I wouldn't trust him with a shilling. Now I don't say that all clergymen in Spain are like this, but I am simply describing the first one I saw, and a fair sample of a Spanish rural clergyman: in fact, I came, I saw, I smelt him.

Quite apart from the good or bad taste of that extract, it gives a wholly false impression. The priest Mr. Sidney saw was not "a fair sample of a Spanish rural clergyman."

Again, in speaking of the change of gauge at Hendaye (should it not be Irun?), Mr. Sidney says, "this annoys people, which is what he (the Spaniard) wants." The which is as untrue as it is discourteous. For of all peoples we ever heard of, the Spaniards are the most courteous, and, indeed, it is not the tourist from Great Britain who should complain of the annoyance to be met with abroad. Mr. Sidney speaks of the badness of the Madrid streets. Some of the streets are certainly bad, but the greater thoroughfares are as good as, and much cleaner than, the streets of London. The Puerta del Sol he calls the Trafalgar Square of Madrid, an unhappy comparison; it is rather the Piccadilly Circus.

Again, the author speaks of Spanish painting as being wholly religious, which it was not, and adds: "There, secular subjects were rarely produced during the best periods of Art," which surely a very large part of the whole of the work of Velasquez would refute. He then proceeds to explain why this which is not, is. He says the proverbial owl was stupid, which no true traveller could assert. Mr. Sidney then proceeds, why we cannot imagine, seeing that it is almost impossible he can have had time or opportunity to study them during his short tour:—

The picture of the middle and upper classes is reversed [from that of the poor], bad low cunning wicked faces predominate. Spaniards as a rule are honest individually but dishonest collectively. In fact they are subject to the usual failings of the Latin race.

The italics are, of course, our own. The poor Latins, with whom after all we, the splendid and virtuous Anglo-Saxons, share the world, get but a short shrift from this redoubtable Anglican tourist.

But enough. It is such a book as this that should be passed by as an unusually discourteous outbreak of the inevitable co-operative tourist. And the tourist is by no means a traveller. The writer of an ideal book of travel will love the Latins for certain things which happened long ago, and it will be difficult to persuade him that in some way, not wholly material, they are not the salt of the earth. Take them and their achievements away and but little is left in the world that is very beautiful. But love is not to be hired, neither can you buy knowledge with anything but love. That is the real secret of your true traveller: having seen the world he has loved it, and written of it with joy.

Impressions.

XXXI.—The Pause.

SOMETHING had happened. What had happened one man alone knew—the Conductor. Five minutes before he had emerged from beneath the stage and taken his seat amid tumultuous plaudits. Then, silence and expectancy. The orchestra was ready, the first page of "The Valkyrie" score was open before the Conductor; each musician eyed him: to him the interminable faces of the audience were turned. He waited—the baton was rigid in his raised hand. A minute passed. The tension was almost unbearable. Another minute passed. The raised baton did not move. In those age-long minutes it seemed as if the whole world paused in sympathy with us waiting for relief from that silence. Would that baton never descend and release the music?

I looked around. Every cranny of the auditorium was filled; in the gallery, where I sat, you could not have squeezed a flute between the enthusiasts, and this gigantic audience had been willing, nay eager, to devote four nights of a week to "The Ring of the Nibelung"; had been willing to leave the sunshine at five in the afternoon for the sake of "my Nibelung poem." This amazing Tone-Poet, who had worked for twenty-five years on "The Ring," at one period leaving "Siegfried" unfinished because he was "tired of heaping one silent score upon another," had actually changed the habits that generations had engrained in us. He had pushed back the clock for three hours. From his grave he had spoken, and thousands, at the tea-hour, were dressing themselves for the evening. Parliament would not dare so much.

Still that baton remained poised in the air. Would it never descend and relieve this tension? It was as if the whole account of our spiritual and emotional life was garnered into that building awaiting the movement of that baton. Beyond, and around, the agitated world revolved, but on us had fallen the pause between two eternities. Here, in London, Wagner nearly half a century ago stayed, working in his spare time on the score of "The Valkyrie," and complaining that the fret and noise caused him to lose "the inner memory."

"The inner memory!" Down there, far below, open before the rigid figure of the Conductor was the silent score. A light shone upon it, but from where I sat no notes were visible. To my eyesight, in accordance with what we proudly call our experience, it was nothing but a sheet of white paper. Yet by faith I knew, poor maligned faith! that in this book was written the great duet of love and spring when the high doors sweep open inwards, revealing the loveliness of the forest by moonlight; that in this book was recorded the wild ride of the Valkyries.

By faith I knew that; to my experience there was no scrap of notation on the open page. The key to those harmonies the Conductor held—still motionless, still with the baton upraised. Would that white wand never descend?

What vicissitudes of reverie two minutes can hold! Upsprang, to my imagination, above that white wand, the figure of Wagner, velvet-capped, velvet-coated, strong-jawed, deep-eyed, inspirer of wild enthusiasm and wilder hatred, exile, windlestraw of fortune, to whom was sent in his darkest hour that momentous message from Ludwig of Bavaria—"Come here and finish your work." Upsprang the turrets of Neuschwanstein, that fairy palace of art and music where King and Subject forgot the world in the mazes of melody. In my ears sounded that passage in one of Wagner's letters to Roeckel: "If one wishes to express the highest knowledge in popular images, one cannot do it otherwise than in the pure original teaching of the Buddha. . . . For that last result of Knowledge, for Fellow-suffering, there remains but one possible redemption—conscious denial of the will."

Then, just then, the lights in the auditorium were lowered. For that, the Conductor's wand, poised in the air, had been waiting. Twilight descended, the baton started, the musicians swayed to the signal, the lamps on their desks gleamed out, and into the darkness surged the opening of the overture.

Drama.

The Experiments of Mr. Yeats.

SIR HENRY IRVING has never shown himself curious about the literary quality of the modern plays which he has chosen for production. If one may judge by "Dante," his indifference has grown into an absolute cynicism. It is a most catch-penny piece. The liberties which it takes with Florentine history and Dantesque biography find no possible justification in the incoherent and unmoving melodrama which is the result. Even as spectacle the only scene which seemed to me in any way especially attractive was the May-day revel in the streets of Florence. I can imagine nothing more unconvincing than the pyrotechnics of the "Inferno." One is a little sorry to find Miss Lena Ashwell in this galley. Her very genuine histrionic power has its dangers on the side of stridency: and melodrama is its worst possible discipline.

I turn gladly to matters which concern the healthier side of modern drama. By the courtesy of the Irish Literary Society, I had the opportunity of witnessing the performances of Anglo-Hibernian plays given by the Irish National Theatre Society, under the direction of Mr. Yeats, at the Queen's Gate Hall. It was an interesting experiment. The best hope for the future of the drama lies in its seeming to writers like Mr. Yeats a possible means of expression for the truth that is in them. And the plays which I saw had the advantage of being produced by a company of clever amateurs who, if they lack something of technical training, have also escaped many of the irritating conventions which technical training is only too apt to bring with it. They are able, for instance, to stand still, and do not think it necessary to wriggle in the background when they have nothing to do or to say. I was sorry to miss Mr. Yeats' "The Hour-Glass," which I understand to be on the lines of a fifteenth-century morality. Of his other two plays, the least ambitious and the most completely successful was a delightful little bit of fooling called "A Pot of Broth." This was admirably acted, and displayed unexpected reaches of humorous observation and high spirits in the writer. "Kathleen ni Houlihan" is probably known to many readers of the ACADEMY in book form, as it was published last autumn by Mr. A. H. Bullen, and also in the last number of "Samhain." It has great merit. It is simple, direct, and charged with genuine national feeling. But the criticism which I am going to make seems to me rather a fundamental one, and it is that the dramatic illusion of the presence of an unearthly or allegorical personage amongst human beings is almost an impossible one to secure upon the stage, where all the parts have to be played by obviously living and breathing men and women. The difficulty can be got over to some extent, although not, I think, wholly, by the use of mystical lighting and the devices of the machinist, which do not enter into Mr. Yeats's scheme. And, of course, it does not arise in the same way when, as in a morality or a legendary play, all the characters are more or less removed from the ordinary human level.

The mysterious visitant in "Kathleen ni Houlihan" is none other than an impersonation of Ireland, one of the poetic names for whom gives the title to the play. This brings me to the point of the "national" character of this Irish theatre, which was further illustrated by Mr. T. E. Ryan's "The Laying of the Foundations," a play that, in spite of its excellent intentions, is not constructed with quite the literary felicity of Mr. Yeats. I understand Mr. Yeats to conceive of his theatre as only one expression of the growing and widening national consciousness. It is to speak to the people, to mirror the national life and voice the national ideals. This is a feature of the enterprise with which one cannot but have the greatest sympathy, provided that it is not forgotten that in one sense art must always be cosmopolitan; that it is the law of its being to stand in a perilously unstable equilibrium between the here and now and the universal; that it takes its impulse from local and momentary causes only on the condition of seeing these sub specie æternitatis and of realising that even so vital and fruitful a conception as that of nationality is, to the purged outlook, at most a manifestation of the mutable and the transitory.

I gather it to be part of Mr. Yeats's theories that the drama of the future, for Ireland at least, will not only be founded on national sentiment, but will also be a folk-art, making its appeal to a society which has either never attained to or has discarded the printed book. Herein it is to take rank with Mr. Yeats's other "new art," that of spoken poetry, about which he lectured in Clifford's Inn on Tuesday, while Miss Florence Farr illustrated the lecture by speaking and chanting beautiful ditties to the accompaniment of one of Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch's psalteries. It was a very charming performance, and if the dramatic recitation would give way to the musical recitation one would have reason to be grateful, even if one did not altogether give up the printed book. In insisting that the musical accompaniment of verse must bring out and not obscure the expressiveness of the words Mr. Yeats is on thoroughly firm ground. He will, of course, be the first to admit that his so-called "new art" is a very old art indeed. Thus and no otherwise did the mediæval minstrel use his singing voice and his vielle, to support the interminable laissez of his romans and dits and contes. If Mr. Yeats will look at the musical notation printed in Mr. Bourdillon's edition of "Aucassin et Nicolette," he will find that the viel caitif who tells that story did precisely the sort of thing which Miss Farr does. He chanted his metrical passages to two simple musical phrases, which he repeated over and over again, and brought in a third phrase, slightly more cadenced, for the concluding line of each passage, before he went back to his prose. I should rather like to demur to Mr. Yeats's description of this particular way of speaking poetry as a folk-art. He admits that it only comes to the folk by inheritance from the bards, who are minstrels. But the folk had its own poetry long before the development of the chieftain and the imperative desire of this over-weening person to have his praises sung amongst his followers led to the development of the minstrel. And I think it is clear—shall I be thought pedantic if I refer to Bücher's "Arbeit und Rhythmus"?—that primitive folk-song was accompanied, not by the rhythms of a musical instrument, but either by those of labour itself—the pull of the oar, the sweep of the scythe, the flash of the shuttle—or, more characteristically still, when the pulses of labour momentarily sank, to the rise and fall of the feet of women in the festival dance. Take Rossetti's "Sister Helen," which Miss Farr recited with such exquisite feeling and subtle art. "Sister Helen" is based on the ballad with its refrain. And the ballad goes straight back to the ballatio of the dancing ring, whose leader sings couplet after couplet, while the rest of the company strike in after each with their burden. Merely to listen to the song and lute is a strictly heroic deed and unworthy of the free folk.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

A Choice Among Many.

IN the first room of the Royal Academy exhibition I met a critic who was smiling, not at a joke, but from quiet pleasure in a picture. The cause of his gratification was Mr. Wetherbee's "The Music of Pipe and Brook," a pastoral fantasy, sheep, grass and a sky, unobtrusive and in perfect tone. "It put me in a good temper," he said, as we seated ourselves to absorb in comfort the other pictures on the facing wall. But my companion's eyes did not rove: they focussed on Mr. Sargent's portrait of "Lady Evelyn Cavendish." There they remained, and the inward smile persisted. "No one else," he said, pleasurably purring the words, "could paint that sleeved arm, or give such tenderness to a background; and the dress—what quality!"

I did not remain long on the bench with this gentle appreciator of the best, for there were 1,880 exhibits to consider, but the encounter was fortunate: it italicised for me the little band who seek, before all else, quality in painting. That quest simplifies picture-seeing. You may still be interested in the anecdote, the illustration, the architectural landscape, the domestic interior, or the classical reconstruction, but he who seeks quality has a clue that should save him from false admirations.

I can imagine such a wight lingering before two pictures that flank the entrance to the second room—"A Provençal Winter" by Mr. La Thangue, and "Dusk" by Mr. Clausen. In his brilliant landscape Mr. La Thangue has expressed every facet of his talent for direct observation and all his acquired knowledge. The sun shines on the rose shrub, on the old wall, on the woman's pink gown, on the white cloth laid on the ground upon which she is tumbling the oranges, and you feel the quality of the paint in all the various passages of this little masterpiece. There is quality, too, in the crepuscular light that lingers on the haystack in Mr. Clausen's picture, fading light that sweeps across the bending trees to the pool in the foreground. The slumbering orange and blue in the lower sky is blacked out by the tree, but shimmers on the edges of the trunk; on the waters of the pool it falls palely. These two pictures with, let me say, Mr. Fred Hall's lyrical "Duck Pond," Mr. Stanhope Forbes's brilliant "Hay-cart," purple shadows and movement, Mr. Adrian Stokes's vivid study of slender yellow birches, blue hills and snow-capped mountains—are typical of that luministe movement that has brought sunshine to the walls of the Academy, as some years ago the Newlyn painters brought the grey light of their Cornish coast. But these painters of the sun, of poetical visions of vibrating light, are apt to repeat and worry their formula till it loses the impulse that gave it birth. Mr. Stott and Mr. Clausen both stumble before this danger, but Mr. La Thangue, by some fusion of character with his temperament, escapes. Not one of his four pictures of figures and flowers in sunlight and shadow but looks as if it had been seen for the first time; not one but attracts instantly by its gay vigour. I do not call them great pictures. They have not the unity, or the fundamental sweep of comprehension of the Barbison masters, but they stand forth to-day as typical of the sun-loving movement.

The sea, too, is being painted in a way that might have surprised even Mr. Henry Moore. In Room VII. are three marines that would do honour to any exhibition. Mr. William T. Richards, a new name to me, has in "After the Gale" given to his hollow-curving translucent waves the true sullen storm-following movement. There is nothing painty about this desolate sea, arched by a sky gleaming with fitful lights. It gives the illusion of the ocean as does Mr. Julius Olsson's "The White Squall," with its portentous cloud, world-high, uprising over the waves. Seaweed encrusted stakes rise from the sand on Mr. Arthur Meade's "Wind-Swept Shore," through which a river lighted by a blue sky crawls to the sea. A notable landscape is Mr. Joseph Farquharson's snow picture on the line in the large room, called "The Shortening Winter's Day is near a Close." It has not the impulse of the pictures of the La Thangue school: it is, if I may say so, a constructed landscape, but for ingenuity of painting, and for the power to convey the illusion of sunlight on snow, darkened by the shadows of the leafless trees behind which the winter sun is setting, this landscape is a tour de force. Mr. Farquharson's vision of nature is always interesting, and he is one of the few members of the Academy who resist the shackles of conventionalism. His "Dawn," a heron flying over a sea lighted by the opalescent mists of daybreak, is an original attempt to portray an effect not because it is untoward or sensational, but because it is beautiful.

Of Mr. Sargent's six portraits there is not one but will repay minute examination by the student of painting; but the visitor seeking for the stirring Sargent of former years may be disappointed. The "demoniac frenzy" is quiet in him this year: he is painting men and women as they might seem to themselves or to their friends, not with that swift revelation of dormant characteristics that once gave a psychological interest to his portraits. Neither has he produced any groups of brilliantly-gowned sisters. The healthy optimism of his "Mrs. Joseph Chamberlain," the spirituality of his "Mrs. Julius Wernher," the smart accomplishment of his "Mrs. Philip Agnew," the grace of his "Lady Evelyn Cavendish" are characteristics of the sitters, not hidden attributes revealed by the "inly glancing" eye of the artist. Best I like his "G. McCorquodale, Esq." There is character and quality in the intent head, and how fine is the painting of the velvet coat and vest. Note the skill with which the watch-chain is indicated, and the touch of paint that makes the eyeglasses in Lord Cromer's portrait. Mr. Furze has essayed, with much success, the decorative portrait group. He sends two, both large, and both, for some reason known to the Hanging Committee, placed high above the line. In each there is a noble horse. The figure of Lieut.-Col. Sir John Jervis standing beside his steed in the group in the large room has an air of martial dignity rare in these days; in the other picture the easy grouping of the two figures, and the bold treatment of the landscape, proclaim that Mr. Furze is an adept in the large manner. It is one of the mysteries of the artistic temperament that one man in the same year should produce these two fine compositions and also the flashy portrait group at the New English Art Club. It is good to see so distinguished an artist as Mr. Greiffenhagen exhibiting again. His little, reticent, well-wrought portrait is of course placed in an inconspicuous place. Four of them would not cover some of the sprawling pictures on the line.

The popular subject picture of which Mr. Fildes's "Doctor" was a type is no longer in fashion. Is this because the Old Masters, and not six-foot modern pictures, are attracting the attention of merchants and Americans? "Why do you never paint a large picture now?" I asked a popular painter. "Because," he answered, sadly, "I have no more room in my house." There are some large narrative pictures in the present exhibition, but neither the quality of the painting, nor the interest of the subject, tempts my pen. The President's Storm Nymph picture is but an enlargement of a smaller version; Sir Alma Tadema repeats himself with no loss of skill: Mr. Orchardson's "Mrs. Siddons in the Studio of Sir Joshua Reynolds" is delicate, but not imposing. And I find it hard to take any pleasure in the fanciful imaginings of Sir W. B. Richmond and Mr. W. L. Wyllie; or in the Dante picture of Mr. Goodwin, who can paint so sympathetically at times that it seems a pity he should pit himself against the Inferno scenes at Drury Lane.

But to the majority of visitors to the Royal Academy the painted anecdote, the real or imaginary historical episode, will always be metal infinitely more attractive than the picture that some effect of light or colour, some rhythm of line, has instigated. This was always so: it will always be so. At the private view the crowd was densest before Mr. Bacon's Coronation picture; you might have gazed the whole afternoon at Mr. Aumonier's fine Herefordshire landscape without being jostled. A morning paper which knows the public mind, as an actor knows the Strand, chooses for illustration Mr. John Collier's "Prodigal Daughter" and Mr. Lomax's "The Bitterness of Dawn." So it will always be. Occasionally it is a painter's good fortune to please both publics—the few and the many. In this category I should place Mr. Napier Henry. There is vigorous drawing and a fine sea in his picture of a yacht race. It is a pæan of joy in mere living. The boat rushes through the sea. Supreme moments in the lives of these sailors in the pink and pearl of virility are vivid before us. This joyous realisation of physical well-being at its zenith is rightly called "Youth."

C. L. H.

Science.

The Impassable Barrier.

THE thinker who does not recognise that there is, in the nature of the case, an impassable barrier to our knowledge of the universe and ourselves, will soon follow Haeckel and the other unscientific dogmatists who claim to have found the solutions to the "world-riddle." It is well, therefore, before venturing on any opinions as to ultimate facts, that we should do what these hasty reasoners have never done, and ask whether there be any necessary limitation to human knowledge, or, indeed, whether there be any possibility of human knowledge at all. The Greek sceptics said that science was impossible, and, in a sense, they were right. The modern "sceptic" is entitled to the name only in so far that he doubts the dogmas of theology. Elsewhere this doubter will dogmatise with the loudest. For he knows neither his Locke nor his limitations.

When, more than two centuries ago, John Locke, sanest and most pious of philosophers, proved the non-existence of "innate ideas," he defined the impassable barrier. He showed that we have no ideas save what come by sensation and by reflection on previously gained sensations. Nihil est in intellectu quod non prius fuerit in sensu:

nothing is in the mind that was not first in the senses. Our senses are the gateway of knowledge, but a gateway implies a barrier. Recognising that our eyes appreciate only a narrow portion of the compass of a certain type of ethereal waves; that our ears appreciate only a few octaves of those waves which, if audible, we term sound; that our sense of touch appreciates only the outsides of tangible things, and never the true inwardness even of these; that our senses of taste and smell appreciate only a few chemical compounds—we acknowledge at once that the range of sensation is limited. But the imperfection of our knowledge is far more evident if we consider the nature of sensation. It becomes necessary, therefore, to ask how valid a sensory impression is, and in what it really consists.

The source of all our ideas and of all our knowledge is to be found in changes in our own consciousness. When I see this paper I am aware of a change in my consciousness—a change in myself—and no more. Bishop Berkeley therefore argued, in his system of Idealism, that there is no such thing as matter or substance, in the ordinary sense; that material things have no objective existence, no existence outside ourselves; and that the external world, which other people postulate as the substance (or “thing standing under”) the attributes which we recognise, is a figment of the imagination. We put together certain attributes, as form, colour and tangibility, and the result of our synthesis we call matter. Berkeley said that the synthesis was mental, and mental only.

The universal belief of mankind is against Berkeley; but he has never been answered, for his arguments are irrefutable, save by the denial of his right to assume that his knowledge was the absolute measure of things. But if we abandon idealism and accept realism, we must face the consequences of our recognition that our knowledge is only relative. We must admit that our belief in the objective reality of matter is an unproven and unprovable assumption.

And, having made this assumption—that matter really exists—we must consider what we really know of it. We know it, then, only by its appearances or its attributes. The thing—in itself—we can never know, for we are only aware of the changes which its attributes produce in our consciousness. Our knowledge is only of phenomena or appearances. Absolute truth is unattainable by us; there can never be such a thing as a science of being; but only a science of appearances; only of phenomenal knowledge.

Against certain fallacies we can be on our guard. Knowing that, in the ultimate analysis, all our knowledge comes through our senses, we also know that the untrustworthy evidence of these senses needs the constant criticism of reason and experience. If I were to see a “ghost,” I should mutter “hallucination.” If I saw a delirious patient catching at an imaginary insect in the air, I should not rub my eyes because I could not see that insect. Again we can forestall the fallacy that what is not appreciable to our senses is therefore non-existent. The Quaker had a pertinent retort for the young fool who said he believed in nothing he could not see. “How dost thou know thou hast a brain?” But, however rigidly supervised, the evidence of our senses informs us only of the attributes of things, never of the things in themselves.

We will do well, then, to be humble. Last week Lord Kelvin affirmed that science proves the existence of God. Haeckel says that science proves the non-existence of God. Neither assertion is postulated from absolute knowledge. Haeckel and his followers assume, first, that Berkeley is wrong, and that matter really exists. This assumption they can only make, as I have shown, by asserting that our knowledge is relative, not absolute. Thereupon they abandon this position, assume that their tiny perceptions of phenomena have positive and absolute truth, and therefrom deny a First Cause. Yet all Haeckel's knowledge is derived from certain changes in his consciousness, for he was born, like the rest of us, without an idea in his head, and has since acquired nothing more than certain partial recognitions of certain attributes of a “Substance” of which he asserts that it is “self-existent” (whatever that means) without having any proof that it exists at all. He can assert as positive actuality only his recognition of his own consciousness: “cogito; ergo sum,” as Descartes has it.

In “Positive Science,” so-called, is therefore to be found no key to the world-riddle. No one admires science more than I do. I find in her not merely a source of intellectual interest but a force making for individual and general happiness. But I recognise the basis on which she rests and to which she is confined. Ultimate questions can never receive from her a positive answer, an answer positive in the sense that two and two are positively four. These can be answered for each only by the faith of each. And if you ask me what business have I to talk of faith I answer that science is built upon faith. Even Haeckel's dogmas are built upon faith,—faith that what he sees exists and that he sees all that there is to see; faith that his data are absolute and his logic sound.

And, similarly, the justifiable dogmas of science are built upon faith. Take a great induction like the law of gravitation. It asserts that every body in the universe attracts every other body with a force which varies directly as the mass and inversely as the square of the distance. But Newton had not tested every body in the universe: nor have we. We believe that the law obtains everywhere. So if Dr. A. R. Wallace, in support of his reassertion of the Ptolemaic or geocentric cosmogony, which makes our earth the centre of a supposed finite universe, cares to suggest, as he does, that at the supposed confines of the universe the law of gravitation will probably not hold, and that consequently life could not be developed there—well, we cannot contradict him. He has no facts in his favour, it is true, but our assertion of the universal applicability of Newton's law depends on faith; which Dr. Wallace need not share unless he likes. We who are not committed to untenable hypotheses have one fundamental article of faith—for it is no more—from which we always argue. We cannot prove it or disprove it, but we believe it. It is that causation is universal. When Hume and Kant have had their say, it resolves itself into a question of faith. I cannot prove to you that causation exists on the moon. I can only argue that effect has always followed cause in my experience, and so I make the induction that causation is universal. But it is only a belief. Science is a splendid edifice, but it has only the imperfect evidence of our senses—changes in our own consciousness, that is to say—on which to rest, and upon these we can only build by faith. Each of us has his own philosophy, therefore: nor do we question your right to yours. And there are more things in heaven and earth than are dreamt of in the philosophy of any of us—can you doubt?

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

The Browns.

SIR,—With reference to the mistake in the Index of the “Encyclopædia Britannica,” ascribing the authorship of “Horae Subsecivae” to the late John Taylor Brown, LL.D., your correspondent is of course correct in pointing out that the book was written by Dr. John Brown, not by John Taylor Brown; but he falls into error when he states that there was no connection between the genial author of “Rab” and the great book collector whose library was recently sold by Messrs. Sotheby. Dr. John Brown was a great grandson and John Taylor was the last surviving grandson of that famous divine, John Brown of Haddington. They were therefore cousins, though not first cousins.

Nor did either of them consider it "an inexplicable misfortune" to live in Edinburgh.—Yours, &c.,

Edinburgh.

SCOTUS.

"The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman" and "The Blacksmith."

SIR,—I have only just read the Bibliographical comments (in the ACADEMY of April 18) upon "The Poems and Verses of Charles Dickens," which I recently edited for Messrs. Chapman and Hall. The writer observes that "it would be interesting to know" whether or no I accept the two pieces—viz., "The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman" and "The Blacksmith"—included in Shepherd's "Plays and Poems of Charles Dickens," as by the author of "Pickwick," and, in the event of my so regarding them, why they are excluded from my little volume.

In the following issue of the ACADEMY it is pointed out by "G. S. L." (? Mr. Layard) that, in his opinion, I had no right to include it, and I agree with him. The version of the old ballad, which Cruikshank illustrated, is far more likely to have been composed by Thackeray, and it is still a moot question whether Dickens was responsible even for the Introduction or Notes.

With regard to the verses entitled "The Blacksmith" (published in the first number of "All the Year Round"), it is evident that Shepherd's authority for attributing them to Dickens is based upon Forster's statement, this originating in information supplied to the biographer by the late Sir John Lawes, of Rothamsted. That Sir John's assumption was incorrect is satisfactorily proved by a manuscript entry in an "office" set of "All the Year Round" in my possession, in which the names of the authors are written against their respective contributions. To the verses on "The Blacksmith" the name of Bryan Procter (i.e., Barry Cornwall) is appended, and they constituted the beginning of a series of "Trade Songs" furnished by him to the pages of "All the Year Round."

—Yours, &c.,

Pré Mill House,
St. Albans, Herts.

F. G. KITTON.

"Like a Forked Radish."

SIR,—A good many years ago I was reading the late Dr. Farrar's excellent little treatise on "Language." In Chapter V. I came across a clerical error to the effect that Thomas Carlyle had originally compared man to a "forked radish with a head fantastically carved." (I am quoting from memory.) Being a very particular and exact youth in those days, I ventured to write a polite letter to Dr. Farrar pointing out the error; and in a brief note, which I still preserve, Dr. Farrar acknowledged the stern impeachment. Curiously enough, in reading an article the other day on Mr. Andrew Carnegie, by Mr. W. T. Stead in the "Harmsworth Magazine," I found a similar error. "George Stephenson's famous aphorism," says Mr. Stead,—"'take their clothes off, and all men are but forked radishes with nothing to show the difference between them'—applies to millionaires as well as to other men." The persistence of error in matters literary is surely one of the most amazing things in life. I was astonished that Mr. Carlyle should have been saddled with the origin of this very questionable compliment, but my astonishment knows no bounds that George Stephenson the Practical should be credited with such a violent phantasy. The fact is that Stephenson had as much to do with it as Carlyle. It was Shakespeare who originated the remark, and to Shakespeare must be given all the credit or discredit that the image deserves. The passage occurs in the Second Part of King Henry IV., Act III., Scene 2. It is Falstaff who is speaking, and he is passing some very uncomplimentary remarks on Justice Shallow. He says: "I do remember him at Clement's Inn, like a man made after supper of a cheese-paring: when he was naked, he was, for all the world, like a forked radish, with a head fantastically carved upon it with a knife."—Yours, &c.,

RICHARD FREE.

St. Cuthbert's Lodge, Millwall, London, E.

Wanted, an Author.

SIR,—Will you or any of your readers kindly let me know where I may find the following lines?—

Eternal Hope! When yonder spheres sublime
Pealed their first notes to sound the march of Time,
Thy joyous youth began, but not to fade.
When wrapt in fire the realms of ether glow,
And Heaven's last thunder shakes the world below,
Thou, undismayed, shall o'er the ruins smile,
And light thy torch at Nature's funeral pile.

—Yours, &c.,

I. H.

Poe or Chivers?

SIR,—In the Bibliographical notes of a recent issue, there is a stanza printed which, the writer states, is by Mr. F. B. Doveton believed to be part of a lost poem of Poe. In a letter which I sent you about a year ago on the subject of Poe, it chanced that I had to mention the discovery of an alleged lost poem of Poe by the "New York Sun," and I then gave my reasons for believing that poem to be false. Between the "New York Sun" poem and the stanza Mr. Doveton gives us there is a strange family likeness; I don't mean that they are verbally the same, but rather that they have the same tone and the sameness of look and inflection which may often be perceived in two brothers who yet are not twins. There is to be found in both a mixture of all Poe's moods and a jumbling together of all those phrases peculiar to him which, however, in his own work lie pretty far apart from each other. It is worthy of note that Poe in his chief poems never repeated any verbal or metrical peculiarities: he brought them to bear once and did not recur to them. "Ulalume" is the great arsenal of the Poe vocabulary, but as a matter of fact the distinguishing words and phrases of "Ulalume" do not appear elsewhere in his own work, though they are the very ear-marks of his imitators. I would say, moreover, that each of the principal poems of Poe springs from some separate emotion, and is different essentially and technically from all the others; so that there would be no trouble in believing that the man who wrote "The Bells" did not write "The Raven," and that "Israfel" and "The Haunted Palace" were the work of a poet other than he who composed "The Raven" or "The Bells" or either one of the two indicated. Certainly in Poe we do not find the continuity of sentiment, of impression, even of sight which generally underlies the various forms of a great poet. The only undertone which may be said to glide through all the poems is that of sadness; but sadness is shared by many poets. And as for sadness, it cannot even be said that there is any relation between the sadness of each poem—that you get from Poe's poems, as a whole, the impression of one soul and one heart suffering: there is no continuous insistence upon the mood of sadness as affecting the poet himself, like the acid defiant sadness of Baudelaire, or the timid drooping sadness of Ernest Dowson. I once remarked this lack of mental resemblance, so to speak, in Poe's poems to Mallarmé, and he was able to agree with me: I mention this here because Mallarmé had, besides his own great genius to help, a special insight into the mental processes of Poe's poems, for he had made (as some of your readers may know) an admirable translation of them all. In what I have written I shall not be taken, of course, as speaking of Poe's juvenile poems which he afterwards reworked, preserving in the revised versions the lines which pleased him best.

If the verses sent by Mr. Doveton really do belong to the Poe period, they might be put down to Dr. Thomas Holly Chivers with more likelihood than to Poe, though Chivers, it is true, rarely wrote such mediocre stuff: he was generally either much more barbarous, more raw, or infinitely better. Indeed, whenever a poem with strong marks of Poe's method, which can be securely traced to the Poe period, turns up, it is critical, I think, to attribute it not to Poe, but to Chivers. Chivers wrote a great deal more verse than Poe, and from his habit of inflicting his MS. poems on all sorts of people these poems drifted into all sorts of unlikely places. If the poem in question was actually found among Poe's papers, as your correspondent states, it is odd that it should have been overlooked by Griswold and also by the editor of the recently edited Griswold papers. But even if it were so found, that would be very far from a proof that Poe was the author, for Chivers used to send his poems in MS. and in type to Poe, and Poe was careless about sending them back.—Yours, &c.,

VINCENT O'SULLIVAN.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 189 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best set of verses in Praise of Walking. Thirty-two replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss May Doney, 18 Foley Street, Lougham Place, W., for the following:—

What of the conquerors that be,—
Of conquered seas and isles?
Mine is a bloodless victory,—
The mastery of miles;
The land, as far as I can see,
Stoops down and smiles.
Behind the marching of my feet
The wide horizons fall;
A hundred vales and hills retreat,
A hundred vistas call;
I tread a triumph brave and sweet,
And take my ducats from all.
Betwixt the dawn fires and the flame
Of sunset burning red,
I trudge free ways that bear no name,
And strike grim humours dead;
And all the road by which I came
With happy thoughts is spread.

Other replies follow:—

BY A PAIR OF OLD BOOTS.

Used to stride o'er moors, sir; jaunty, strong and free;
Trod the King's highways, sir; sometimes by the sea;
Paths beside the waters, fern and flower grown;
Idly traversed meadows—meadows newly mown!
Noon, or starlit eve, sir; miles and miles on end;
Every step a joy, sir; every road a friend;
Always sweet, fresh country—towns we ever shunned—
Country gives so freely to the Great Health Fund.

Now I shuffle streets, sir,—Gutters of the Earth!
Warehouse-bound each day, sir,—Owner's City berth!
For the dear old Owner, plansman of the jaunts,
Cast me off to perish in these blackened haunts.

All those dear old walks, sir, thrill me to the seams;
Joyous mem'ries those, sir, welcome back in dreams;
Tramping in the Open, keen on Pleasure's scent:
Spent my life in walking; what life better spent?
[R. P., Sheffield.]

Take now thy staff and shoes
For furthest travelling,
And bring thy lass with thee
Unto the shining day,
Into the sting of winds,
And pride of topping cloud.
The roads are very white,
The waters very clear,
That slip and wander thro'
The green lands and the red,
Towards the fronting hill
Whose brows are bright with day.
Wherefore God's praise be given
For the far travelling,
And all the blue in the sky,
And the untiring feet.

[A. E. C., Brighton.]

Who will may sing the joys of speed
And chase them headlong through the land,
When spring comes smiling o'er the mead
Be mine to join the humbler band.

And pace afoot, as paced of yore
The happy nomads of our race;
To find their subtle fairy lore
Has peopled every silent place.

Each common bush is still aglow
For those who turn aside to scan;
And vales sequestered seem to show
The footsteps of the Mighty Pan.

The glad "mechanic Exercise"
Stirs brain and heart to saner beat;
All Nature's music underlies
The simple rhythm of the feet.

The retrospect of joyous miles—
That nerve and muscle still confess—
Brings Sleep, who fastens with her wiles
The golden thread of happiness.

[S. C., Hove.]

It passes. Wondrous whirling wheels!
A Ghost that comes by day,
Silently, verily, it steals,
Flashes—and far away!
Oh, swift and bright—but for delight
Give me a walk in May.
Put out your hand: 'twill touch the year!
Feel how these leaves are new:
Now hold this blossom to your ear,
And let it speak to you.
What does it tell? We know so well,
Yet no one ever knew.
Let some go driving in the dust,
And some go whizzing—see!
Oh, while they pass, they surely must Envy great You and Me,
Standing, with May for host, to-day,
Under the first May-tree!

[E. C. M., Cork.]

Gi'e me a road that winds about
Past kirk an' clachan, burn an' moor;
On Shankum's naigie I set oot—
Ye wadna see my heels for stoor.
Along the road frae morn to nicht
I see the ferlies o' the warl',
An' whiles my seasoned cutty licht
An' crack wi' some auld canty carl.

Messrs. CONSTABLE'S LIST.

NEW 6s. NOVELS.

THE STAR DREAMER.By AGNES & EGERTON CASTLE,
Authors of "Young April," "The Secret Orchard," &c.THE PAGAN AT THE SHRINE.By PAUL GWYNNE, Author of "Marta."PARK LANE.By PERCY WHITE, Author of "The West End."CASTLE DMERAGH.By FRANKFORT MOORE, Author of "The Jessamy Bride."THE NATION'S NEED:Chapters on Education. By GRAHAM WALLAS,
P. S. HARTOG, J. J. FINDLAY, J. O. TARVER,
H. J. MACKINDER, and others. Edited by
SPENSER WILKINSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.CITIES OF INDIA. ByG. W. FORREST, C.I.E., ex-Director of Records, Government of India. Demy 8vo, fully illustrated, 10s. 6d. net.HUMAN IMMORTALITY.By Prof. WILLIAM JAMES, Professor of Philosophy at Harvard University. New Edition, 2s. 6d.THE INTERNAL WIRINGOF BUILDINGS. By H. M. LEAF. Illustrated.
New Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Fcap. 8vo,
3s. 6d. net.POEMS. By Beatrice Helen*BARMBY, Author of "Gisli Sursson." Fcap. 8vo,
3s. 6d. net.HAROLD. By Lord Lytton.Reissue of the Edition containing Mr. GEORGE
LAURENCE GOMME'S Introduction and Notes.
Illustrated. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

UNIFORM WITH "HAROLD."

READING ABBEY. ByCHARLES MACFARLANE. Reissue of the Edition containing Mr. GEORGE LAURENCE
GOMME'S Introduction and Notes. Illustrated.
3s. 6d.AN ENGLISH GARNER.INGATHERINGS FROM OUR HISTORY AND LITERATURE.

Demy 8vo. To be completed in 12 vols. 4s. net each.

NOW READY.

TUDOR TRACTS. With anIntroduction by A. F. POLLARD, F.R.Hist.S., Author of "Protector Somerset," "A Life of Henry VIII.," &c.STUART TRACTS. Withan Introduction by O. H. FIRTH, Fellow of All Souls, Author of "The Life of Cromwell."VOYAGES AND TRAVELS.Mainly of the Seventeenth Century. With an Introduction by C. RAYMOND BEAZLEY, Fellow of Merton, Author of "The Dawn of Modern Geography." 2 vols.SOCIAL ENGLAND ILLUS-TRATED. With an Introduction by ANDREW LANG.CRITICAL ESSAYS ANDLITERARY FRAGMENTS. With an Introduction by CHURTON COLLINS.

Popular Edition of De Wet's Book.

THREE YEARS' WAR.

3s. 6d. net.

A. CONSTABLE & Co. LIMITED,
Westminster.MESSRS. LONGMANS & CO.'S LIST.*SOCIAL ORIGINS.By ANDREW LANG, M.A., LL.D.,

AND

PRIMAL LAW.By J. J. ATKINSON.

8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

* * Mr. Atkinson's work deals with his theories as to the origin of human society, and especially as to the marriage relation. These were based on his knowledge of the natives of New Caledonia, among whom he spent nearly the whole of his life. Mr. Lang edited this part of the book, and his own part of it is of the nature of introduction and commentary.

THE INDIA OF THE QUEEN,

And other Essays.

By the late Sir WILLIAM WILSON HUNTER, K.C.S.I., C.I.E., LL.D., &c.Edited by LADY HUNTER.With an Introduction by FRANCIS HENRY SKRINE, Indian Civil Service (Retired). 8vo, 9s. net.

* * Uniform with the "Life of Sir William Hunter."

THE DESTRUCTION OF THE GREEK EMPIRE,

And the Story of the Capture of Constantinople by the Turks.

By EDWIN PEARS, LL.B., Author of "The Fall of Constantinople."

With 3 Maps and 4 Illustrations. 8vo, 18s. net.

"Mr. Pears has earned the gratitude of all students of history by a work in which there is thought no less than scholarship, and colour no less than judgment. The general reader, too, may go far before he lays hands on a story of more thrilling interest or of such world-wide importance."—Daily News.AN IVORY TRADER IN NORTH KENIA:The Record of an Expedition through Kikuyu to Galla-Land in East Equatorial Africa, with an Account of the Rendili and Burkeneji Tribes.By A. ARKELL-HARDWICK, F.R.G.S.

With 23 Illustrations from Photographs, and a Map. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

THE LAND OF THE BOXERS.

China under the Allies.

By Capt. GORDON CASSELY, Indian Army.

With 15 Illustrations and a Plan. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

"An extremely entertaining and valuable book. Capt. Cassely's narrative is picturesque and graphic. It gives a very clear and concise account of the principal military operations during the campaign."

—St. James's Gazette.THE CROSSBOW:Mediæval and Modern: Military and Sporting; its Construction, History, and Management, with a Treatise on the Ballista and Catapult of the Ancients.By Sir RALPH PAYNE-GALLWEY, Bart.

With 220 Illustrations and Plans. Royal 4to, 63s. net.

ALPINE FLORA: for Tourists and Amateur BotanistsWith Text descriptive of the most widely distributed and attractive of Alpine Plants. By Dr. JULIUS
HOFFMANN. Translated by E. S. BARTON (Mrs. A. Gepp). With 40 Plates, containing 250 Coloured Figures, from Water-Colour Sketches by Hermann Frieze. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.DISSERTATIONS on LEADING PHILOSOPHICAL*TOPICS. Being mainly reprinted from Mind. By ALEXANDER BAIN, LL.D., Emeritus Professor of Logic in the University of Aberdeen. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.HAMPSHIRE DAYS. By W. H. HUDSON, Author of "Nature inDownland," &c. With numerous Illustrations from Drawings by Bryan Hook, &c. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.NEW NOVEL BY MRS. WALFORD.*STAY-AT-HOMES. By L. B. WALFORD, Author of "Mr. Smith,"

"The Baby's Grandmother," &c. Crown 8vo, 6s.

CECILIA GONZAGA: a Drama. By R. C. TREVELYAN

Fcap. 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

"A pleasant play for the closet, and a piece of pure literature, and pure literature, welcome as it is from any quarter, will be sure of a special welcome when it comes from the son of Macaulay's nephew and Fox's biographer."—Times.LONGMANS, GREEN & Co., London, New rk, and Bombay.

The rain comes doon; I skelp alang
Through glaur that's thick as pea-meal brose;
I carena, I but croon a sang
An' dicht the rain-clraps frae my nose.

The sun comes oot; my claes sune dry,
Wi' neives in pooches buried deep
I snoove on 'neth the glintin' sky,
Or lie amang the gress an' sleep.

Syne, when the nicht is comin' doon
An' sunset lows up in the west,
I reach a howff kent a' aroon'
An' cawp my dram aff wi' the rest.

[T. E., Belfast.]

Competition No. 190 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best appreciation of "My Favourite Poem." Replies not to exceed 300 words.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 13 May, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Carson (Rev. W. R.), Reunion Essays.....(Longmans) net 6/6
Delitzsch (Friedrich), Babel and Bible.....(Williams and Norgate) 5/0
Lambert (Rev. John C.), The Sacraments in the New Testament
(T. and T. Clark) 10/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES

Dry (Wakeling), Nights at the Opera: Wagner's Der Ring des Nibelungen.
I. and II.....(Moring)
Dry (Wakeling), Nights at the Opera: Wagner's Die Meistersinger.....
Burnie (Robert D.), Idle-Hour Flights.....(Gay and Bird) net 2/6
Meyer (Kuno), edited and translated by, Four Old Irish Songs of Summer and Winter.....(Nutt)
Lovenan (Robert), The Gate of Silence with Interludes of Song.....(Putnam's)
Wiener (Leo), Anthology of Russian Literature. Part II......(Putnam's) net 12/6

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Turner (Sir Llewelyn), The Memories of.....(Isbister) 16/0
Hill (Frederic Stanhope), Twenty-six Historic Ships.....(Putnam's) net 15/0
Dixon (W. Willmott), Dainty Dames of Society: The Kembles—Countess of Cork—Mrs. Procter.....(Black) net 2/0
Dixon (W. Willmott), Dainty Dames of Society: "Clarinda," and other Edinburgh Belles, &c......(Black) net
Players of the Day.....(Newnes) 10/6
Bradshaw (F.), Self-Government in Canada, and How it was Achieved
(King) net 10/6
Bonde (Baroness), Paris in '48.....(Murray) net 8/0
Hunter (The late Sir William Wilson), The India of the Queen(Longmans) net 9/0
Worsfold (T. Cato), Staple Inn and its Story.....(Bumpus)
Cromb (David L.), Hector Macdonald.....(Mackay) 2/6
Hycett (Francis A.), Florence: Her History and Art.....(Methuen) net 7/6
East (W. Quartermaine), The Last Days of Great Men.....(Low) net 6/0
Messerschmidt (Dr. L.), The Ancient East. No. VI. The Hittites.....(Nutt) 1/0
An Account of the Right Hon. Joseph Chamberlain's Visit to South Africa
(St. Martin's Press) 1/0
Stephen (Leslie), Robert Louis Stevenson: An Essay.....(Putnam's) net 1/6
Cairo and the Khedive.....(Cassell) net 0/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Hoffmann (Dr. Julius), Alpine Flora.....(Longmans) net 7/6
Borsdorf (A. T. W.), The Literary Theories of Taine and Herbert Spencer
(Nutt) net 1/0
Hann (Dr. Julius), Handbook of Climatology.....(Macmillan) net 12/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Zimmer (Allee), Greek History for Young Readers.....(Longmans) 4/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

O'Rell (Max), Rambles in Womanland.....(Chatto and Windus) 2/6
The Handy Shilling Atlas of the World.....(Newnes) net 1/0
By a Belgian, The Truth about the Civilisation in Congoland.....(Low) net 1/0
Cook (E. T.), edited by, The Century Book of Gardening. Part I.(Newnes) net 0/6
Mathews (Norris), Redland Library Catalogue.....(Bristol Libraries Committee)
Tippins (L. R.), Miniature Rifle Shooting.....(Low) net 2/0
Royal Academy Pictures, 1903. Part I.....(Cassell) net 1/0
The Royal University of Ireland Calendar, 1903.....(The University)

NEW EDITIONS.

Drummond (Henry), The Greatest Thing in the World
(Hodder and Stoughton) net 2/6
Thackeray (W. M.), From Cornhill to Cairo.....(Dent) net 2/0
Mackail (J. W.), translated by, The Odyssey. Books I.-VII......(Murray) net 5/0
Farrar (Frederic W.), Social and Present Day Questions
(Hodder and Stoughton) 3/6
Herbert (George), The Temple.....(Unwin) net 3/6
De Wet (Christian Rudolf), Three Years' War.....(Constable) net 3/6
Wallace (William), selected and edited by, The Poems of James Hogg
(Isbister) net 5/0
Phyfe (William Henry P.), Ten Thousand Words Often Mispronounced
(Putnam's) 3/6
Ainsworth (W. Harrison), Old St. Paul's.....(Newnes) net 2/0
Evelyn's Diary.....() net 3/6
The Windsor Shakespeare: All's Well that Ends Well.....(Jack) net 2/0
Steele (Robert), The Mirror of Perfection.....(Dent) net 1/6
Briscoe (J. Potter), edited by, Early British Ballads.....(Gay and Bird) 2/6
Bible Classics: Ecclesiastes and the Song of Solomon.....(Gay and Bird) net 1/0
Rubaiyat of Omar Khayyam.....(Treherne) net 0/6
Gunter (Archibald C.), Mr. Barnes of New York.....(Ward, Lock) 0/6
Russell (W. Clark), The Two Captains.....(Low) 0/6
Le Quex (William), A Secret Service.....(Ward, Lock) 0/6
Dante. Illustrated by Gustave Doré. Part I.....(Cassell) net 0/6
Church (A. H.), Josiah Wedgwood.....(Seeley) net 7/0
Barber (Rev. Henry), British Family Names.....(Stock) net 10/6
Smedley (Frank E.), Frank Fairleigh.....(Treherne) 1/6
Agnus (Orme), Jan Oxher.....(Ward, Lock) 0/6

PERIODICALS.

Contemporary, National, Architectural Review, Idler, Good Words, Sunday,
American Historical Review, Connoisseur, Sale Prices, Geographical Journal, United Service, New Liberal Review.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

Messrs. Methuen are preparing a re-issue of Edward FitzGerald's "Euphranor," which was described by him as a "dialogue of youth."

Canon Newbolt and the Rev. Darwell Stone, the editors of the Oxford Library of Practical Theology, have written, in view of present-day controversies, a brief statement of Church of England principles. The book, which will be called "The Church of England: an Appeal to Facts and Principles," will be published immediately by Messrs. Longmans.

Next week Mr. E. Arnold will publish the authoritative life of Robert Dolling. It is written by the Rev. C. E. Osborne, who worked with Father Dolling at St. Agatha's, Landport, for seven years. The profits from the book will be devoted to the Dolling Memorial Fund.

Under the title "Interludes" Mr. Arthur Symons has made a collection of the papers he has contributed to various journals on music, art and the drama. The volume will be published by Messrs. Duckworth.

Messrs. Frederick Warne & Co. announce the publication of a complete edition of "Dante's Vision: Hell, Purgatory, and Paradise," reprinted from the translation by the Rev. Henry Francis Cary.

A new volume in Mr. Fisher Unwin's "First Novel Library" will appear next week. The title is "The Flame and the Flood" and the author is Miss Rosamund Langbridge, the daughter of the Rev. Frederick Langbridge.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

SUBSCRIPTIONS FROM ONE GUINEA PER ANNUM

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready, Post Free on Application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE, 1s. 6d. Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 260,000 vol.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, Ltd., 30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.
241, Brompton Rd., S.W.; & 43, Queen Victoria St., E.C., London;
and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Each 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.
THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

THE ISLE OF WIGHT.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

THE WYE VALLEY.

ROSS, TINTERN, and OHPSTOW.

THE SEVERN VALLEY.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

{ LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR. }

{ LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON. }

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHELI.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.

"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 8s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.,

The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers. Paris and New York: BRETAGNO'S.

A LIMITED NUMBER OF THE

PORTRAIT SUPPLEMENTS to 'The ACADEMY'

May still be obtained, singly, at 2d. each, or in complete sets for 3s. 6d., on application to the Office, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.

BEN JONSON
JOHN KEATS
SIR JOHN SUCKLING
TOM HOOD
THOMAS GRAY
R. L. STEVENSON
SIR WALTER SCOTT
SAMUEL RICHARDSON
THOMAS DE QUINCEY
LEIGH HUNT
LORD MACAULAY
ROBERT SOUTHEY
S. T. COLERIDGE
CHARLES LAMB
MICHAEL DRAYTON
W. SAVAGE LANDOR
SAMUEL PEPYS
EDMUND WALLER
WILKIE COLLINS

JOHN MILTON
WILLIAM COWPER
CHARLES DARWIN
ALFRED LORD TENNYSON
HENRY W. LONGFELLOW
ANDREW MARVELL
ROBERT BROWNING
THOMAS CARLYLE
PERCY BYSSIE SHELLEY
CHARLES DICKENS
JONATHAN SWIFT
WILLIAM MAKEPEACE
THACKERAY
WILLIAM BLAKE
SIR RICHARD STEELE
ALEXANDER POPE
DOUGLAS JERROLD
FRANCIS BACON
HENRIK IBSEN

THE JUNE NUMBER

OF

THE SMART SET

A MAGAZINE

OF CLEVERNESS

CONTAINS:

THE HUSBANDS' COMEDY

By JAMES BRANCH CABELL

MATRIMONY AND THE MUSTARD POT

By LADY COLIN CAMPBELL

THE DIARY OF DEWDROP

By ONOTO WATANNA

THE ARTFUL ARABELLA

By MARGARET VINTON HAMILTON

A MAN, A HORSE AND A GIRL

By MOLLY ELLIOT SEAWELL

THE

PASSING OF THE ARISTOCRAT

By ELIZABETH DUER

In addition to the above, full fifty other contributions appear in this number by writers who have made themselves favourites the world over.

There are no continued Stories in The Smart Set; each number is complete in itself

ESS ESS PUBLISHING COMPANY

90-93 FLEET STREET, LONDON, E.C.

NOW ON SALE

Elliot Stock's New Books.

NEW NOVELS AND SKETCHES.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered, price 6s.

AT NOON: Where Two Ways

Meet. A Novel by "MAISEY."

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 2s. 6d. net.

THE COLLIERS OF WINDY

HILL. Crucial Moments in a Welsh Village. By WILFRID SPARBOY, Author of "Persian Children of the Royal Family."

In crown 8vo, cloth, price 6s. net.

FALLACIES IN PRESENT DAY THOUGHT.

By J. P. SANDLANDS, M.A., T.C.D., Author of "Natural Food," "Sanitation, Public and Personal," &c.

The object of this book is to take some of the prominent thoughts and theories that now occupy men's minds, and show wherein many of them are erroneous. It deals fairly and honestly with these things in plain and simple language, as so many of these thoughts and theories are shrouded, if not in mystic jargon, in language, nevertheless, that is "not understood of the people." The author, therefore, sets them in their proper light, and thus exposes what is fallacious in them. The subjects with which he deals are those of everyday life.

"A bright little book of short discursive essays."—The Rock.

NEW BOOKS FOR YOUNG PEOPLE.

In crown 8vo, tastefully printed and bound in cloth, with two illustrations, price 1s. 6d.

MOSES AND THE WILDER-

NESS. JOSHUA AND CANAAN. For Boys and Girls. By Mrs. E. R. CONDER.

In crown 8vo, cloth, gilt lettered and illustrated, price 5s.

THE CROSS OF PEARLS;

or, The Story of a French Family in the Fourteenth Century. By Mrs. BEARNE.

"A pretty little romance of fourteenth century France, full of the bustle of warfare, and with charming pictures of chivalry and medieval life clustered around the fortunes of a pair of noble lovers."—Pall Mall Gazette.

ELLIOT STOCK, 62, PATERNOSTER ROW,
LONDON, E.C.

The Proprietor of "The Academy" purchased "Literature" from the Proprietors of "The Times" in 1902, and amalgamated the two papers under the title of

The ACADEMY and LITERATURE

3d. A Weekly Review of Literature and Life. 3d.

HAS gathered traditions which have won it the support of Book Readers and Book Buyers throughout Great Britain and Abroad.

IT has steadily increased its circulation and influence for many years, and, if tested, its readers would now be found to be more numerous than those of any other exclusively literary newspaper.

SPECIAL SUPPLEMENTS, constituting Double Numbers, are issued without extra charge.

THE NEXT, on June 13th, will be

A TOURIST SUPPLEMENT, dealing with the current Literature of Topography and Travel (Home and Foreign), and directing attention to the scope and special feature of each work reviewed.

THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE is now POSTED FREE to every ANNUAL SUBSCRIBER in the United Kingdom prepaying 13/- FOREIGN SUBSCRIBERS by a PREPAYMENT of 17/6 will secure it being sent Post Free and regularly to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 24d. per copy.

Orders may be sent through any Bookseller or Newsvendor OR DIRECT TO THE PUBLISHER OF
THE ACADEMY AND LITERATURE,
43, Chancery Lane, London, W.C.

HAKLUYT SOCIETY.

New Volume for 1902.—Series II., Vol. 10.

The Portuguese Expedition to Abyssinia, in 1541–1543, as narrated by Castanhoso, with some contemporary letters, the short account of Bermudez, and certain extracts from Correa. Translated and edited by R. S. WHITEWAY, Bengal Civil Service (retired). With a Bibliography, and a Map by Capt. A. S. THOMSON, C.B., pp. cxxxii, 296. London, 1902, 8vo.

BASIL H. SOULSBY, Hon. Sec.,
Map Room, British Museum, W.C.

Booklovers & Bibliophiles take Note!

SHORTLY WILL BE PUBLISHED THE
FIRST NUMBER OF

THE AVON BOOKLET

A monthly reprint for Booklovers of famous contributions to English Literature for the most part from rare and obsolete sources.

ANNUAL SUBSCRIPTION 3s. POST FREE.

In THE AVON BOOKLET an endeavour will be made to collect in permanent easily accessible form those famous contributions to English literature by modern writers which through various causes have been allowed to become forgotten or known only to the student. In the first year of THE BOOKLET, the editor hopes to publish forgotten works of Robert Browning, William Morris, R. L. Stevenson, O. W. Holmes, Lord Tennyson, George Borrow, William Black, and many others at present very difficult to obtain, or lost in the pages of forgotten magazines. THE AVON BOOKLET will revivify them, and restore them to their rightful place in literature, presenting them in a delightful format, beautifully printed on a strong, pure linen paper, and bound in annual volume form in old style boards.

Subscriptions can be received only for a year's issues, 12 Nos., 3s. post free. The first number, containing Browning's suppressed essay on Shelley, will be ready shortly.

Send 3 stamps for a specimen Avon Leaflet, beautifully printed in black and red on finest ivory card.

Cross cheques and postal orders, and address—

J. THOMSON, Avon Glen, Emscote, Warwick.

JOHN LEA'S "VERSES"

Price 1/- net.

Can be obtained from the following Booksellers:
Messrs. MILLER & GILL, Cambridge Circus,
Charing Cross Road, W.C.
Messrs. A. & F. DENNY, 147, Strand, W.C.

Just Published. Fourth Edition, thoroughly revised, demy 8vo, cloth, 15s.

THE LAW OF COPYRIGHT.

Including the Musical Copyright Act, 1902, the American Copyright Act, the Berne Convention, the Consequent Order in Council and Cases to Date. By THOMAS EDWARD SCRUTTON, M.A., LL.B., K.C., Author of "Charter Parties and Bills of Lading," &c., and Lecturer in Common Law to the Incorporated Law Society.

"Mr. Scrutton's book is well written and has been carefully revised, and will be found a safe and acceptable guide through the mazes of the existing law."—Law Journal.

"We think it is not only the easiest, but the most useful and practical work on copyright."—Law Quarterly Review.

LONDON:

WM. CLOWES & SONS, LTD., Law Publishers,
7, Fleet Street (adjoining Middle Temple Lane).

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

THIRD THOUSAND.

JAMES BRYCE'S NEW BOOK.

STUDIES IN CONTEMPORARY BIOGRAPHY.

8vo, 10s. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS. New Series.

BROWNING.

By G. K. CHESTERTON. Crown 8vo, gilt top, flat back, 2s. net. [Tuesday.]

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW READY.

LIFE AND LETTERS OF BROOKE FOSS WESTCOTT,

D.D., D.C.L., sometime Bishop of Durham.

By his Son, ARTHUR WESTCOTT.

With Photogravure Portraits and Illustrations.
In 2 vols., extra crown 8vo, 17s. net.

THIRD THOUSAND.

CHARLOTTE M. YONGE: HER LIFE AND LETTERS.

By CHRISTABEL COLERIDGE. With 9 Photogravure Portraits and other Illustrations. 8vo, 17s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN'S GUIDE TO SWITZERLAND.

With 31 Maps and 6 Plans.
Globe 8vo, 5s. net. [Ready on Tuesday.]

THIRD EDITION READY ON TUESDAY.

INDIA:

Its Administration and Progress.

By Sir JOHN STRACHEY, G.C.S.I. Third Edition.
Revised and Enlarged, with Map. 8vo, 10s. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES. New Vol.

THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE.

By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.
With an Introduction by Sir LESLIE STEPHEN.
Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net. [Ready on Tuesday.]

NEW IMPRESSION NOW READY.

RUBAIYAT OF OMAR KHAYYAM, The Astronomer-Poet of Persia.

Rendered into English Verse.

Imperial 8vo, parchment binding, 10s. 6d.

FIRST VOLUME NOW READY.

POCKET NOVELS BY FAVOURITE AUTHORS.

Pott 8vo, cloth elegant, gilt tops, and full gilt backs,
2s. net each.

PHILOSOPHY 4.

A Story of Harvard University.

By OWEN WISTER,

Author of "The Virginian."

With Photogravure Portrait of the Author, and some other Illustrations.

MACMILLAN'S ILLUSTRATED POCKET CLASSICS.—New Volume.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; or in leather limp, 3s. net.

ORMOND.

By MARIA EDGEWORTH. With Introduction by ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE, and Illustrations by CARL SCHLOSSER.

POPULAR UNIFORM EDITION OF

THOMAS HARDY'S WORKS.

In Fortnightly Volumes.

With a Map of Wessex in each. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

Latest Addition:

WESSEX TALES.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1619. Established 1869. London: 16 May 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 475

REVIEWS.

The Odyssey	479
The Age of Shakespeare	480
The Society for Psychical Research: Its Rise and Progress, and a Sketch of its Work	481
Things about our Neighbourhood	481
For His People	482
The Land of the Boxers	483
History of the Worshipful Company of Pewterers of the City of London, Based upon their own Records	483

SHORT NOTICES:

The Chatelaine of Vergi—The Last Days of Great Men: Cromwell, Napoleon, Mahomet—In the Land of the Black Mountain	484
---	-----

FICTION:

The Untilled Field—Park Lane—Semi-Society—George Goring's Daughters—He for God only	485
---	-----

Notes on the Week's Novels	486
------------------------------------	-----

ARTICLES.

ANCIENT TRAGEDY IN ENGLISH VERSE	487
A Bewildered Poet	488
Swift's Famous Joke	489
Paris Letter	490
Impressions—XXXII. The Sage	491
DRAMA:
Dramatic Hedging. E. K. Chambers	491
ART:
The Royal Academy Re-Visited. C. L. H.	492
SCIENCE:
The Source of Life. C. W. Saleeby	493
CORRESPONDENCE:
Totemism	494
Irish Plays and Players	495
Bulwer Lytton	495
Mrs. Wharton's Works	495
"Mediocre Stuff"	495
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
"My Favourite Poem"	495

The Literary Week.

WHAT are the ethics of dedication? Mr. Abbott's volume on Macedonian Folklore is, we observe, dedicated "without permission" to the author of "The Golden Bough"! Mr. Fraser will probably not have any objection to this reference to himself in a volume where "many a nursery rhyme, shorn of all its familiar simplicity, has been—

Started at home and hunted in the dark
To Gaul, to Greece, and into Noah's ark."

Mr. Osborne's life of Father Dolling is dedicated to "the Sisters, whose untiring labours lightened the labour of his toil." From other publications of the week we select two significant volumes:—

IDEAS OF GOOD AND EVIL. By W. B. Yeats.

A volume containing nineteen essays full of thought and beauty. Some of the titles run: "Magic," "William Blake and the Imagination," "Symbolism in Painting," "The Symbolism of Poetry," "The Autumn of the Body." Mr. Yeats turns to his favourite subject of symbolism, and illustrates it from the work of Blake and Shelley, Maeterlinck and Morris. The opening essay deals with the question "What is 'Popular Poetry'?" Are there many more "than the ten thousand the prophet saw," asks Mr. Yeats, who speak the English tongue, who can tell good verses from bad ones? Those ten thousand must preach their faith that "the imagination is the man himself." It is a real delight to see a book such as this, a book of pure literature, insight, and atmosphere.

HAMPSHIRE DAYS. By W. H. Hudson.

A true country book by the author of "Nature in Downland." The greater part of the matter is new, but a few magazine articles have been drawn upon. Mr. Hudson writes in his characteristic way of nature in the broad as well as in infinite detail. The first chapter touches on small mammals, squirrels, the cuckoo controversy, and concludes with a "Discourse on mistaken kindness, pain and death in nature, the annual destruction of bird life, and the young cuckoo's instinct." The volume is dedicated to "Sir Edward and Lady Grey, Northumbrians, with Hampshire written in their hearts."

We have often had occasion to comment on the number of unnecessary books which are published. Amongst such unnecessary books we should place a volume just issued, entitled "Arthur James Balfour: the Man and his Work." We cannot but think that this stout compilation of three hundred and sixty-seven pages might have waited. In his preface the author says: "It may appear somewhat singular that no biography of Mr. Balfour has hitherto been published. . . ." We see nothing singular in this at all. We hardly suppose that a small portrait of Mr. Balfour as an Eton boy, set in a large white margin, can be of particular interest, even to his many admirers. This kind of contemporary biography is little to our liking.

LITERATURE seems to be getting a footing again in the House of Commons. Mr. Yoxall published a novel recently, and next week Mr. Lowther's play, "The Gordian Knot," is to be produced by Mr. Tree. The association of Mr. George Wyndham with literature has been a long and close one. We find in a volume of letters, to which we shall return, addressed by Ruskin to two ladies who bear well-known names, a preface by the Chief Secretary for Ireland which concludes thus: "In Ruskin . . . in his life and in these letters, there is a special note of courage. His despair over all that is known of human politics, and all that may be guessed of their future development, throws up in a higher light the gracious courage with which, whilst treading a via dolorosa, he placed a posy before every shrine of Beauty and Gentleness and Love."

THE announcement of the engagement of Mr. Sidney Colvin and Mrs. Sitwell is of particular interest to all Stevensonians. R. L. S., as readers of his correspondence know, had a deep affection for both Mr. Colvin and Mrs. Sitwell.

WHEN "A Journey to Nature" was published, its author was hailed as a new and original writer. But the "J. P. M." of the title-page was Mr. Andrew C. Wheeler, whose death was recently recorded. Mr. Wheeler was an active American journalist who, at the age of sixty, cut himself adrift from his old literary associations and disappeared, so far as the reading public knew. But he disappeared to do his own work in his own way, and some interesting particulars of his later years are given by Mr. E. W. Bacon in the American "World's Work." To start upon a new track at an age when most men feel that their best has been accomplished required a rare strength of purpose and a determined outlook. "J. P. M." was quite conscious of the risks which he ran. Mr. Bacon writes:—

One very important question involved in this change will be appreciated by every man of letters who lives by his pen. To give up his journalistic work meant to give up his emoluments with his market; in other words, to commence life afresh. For possibly the first time in his life this man must become acquainted with the keen disappointment and self-distrust that are so frequently enclosed with rejected manuscripts. The re-adjustment could not be accomplished in a day or a year. That it was accomplished at all seems little short of the miraculous.

Some of the letters written to Mr. Bacon by "J. P. M." have the self-revelation and charm of a real personality. When the country experiment was in full swing, there came that feeling of remoteness and isolation which comes to all men who have known the rush and fever of packed cities:—

Hibernation is played out. I have chewed more or less on my own vitals this winter. Solitude may make a man a philosopher, but it puts too high a premium on the grave. There is such a thing as erecting meditations into a mausoleum. I may go out this spring better equipped with reflections, but they are not negotiable—I have got to that intellectual point where I want to hit somebody with a pen, and not a fountain pen either. I have piled up a lot of "copy" this winter, and I am beginning to suspect that I have piled it up where moths do not corrupt and thieves break not through and steal—that is to say, the thieves do not want it. However, the sap is running in the maple trees—why not in the hibernating scribbler?

The sap ran to good purpose in the "hibernating scribbler"; he came into closer touch with nature, and at the same time his interest in men and the best in literature deepened. One of his latest sayings was this: "It must be an awfully lonesome world to those men who outgrow everybody in it, and I honestly think that when a man reaches that distressing point of development he ought to be looking for a leasehold in some other world." In a copy of "Amiel's Journal" he wrote:—

Here was a great soul lowering buckets into his own consciousness all his life. They came up brimming and sparkling, but the man never got away from the winch. You will hear its little squeak occasionally. Sometimes his faith gets tires of trying to lift itself in this way and he wants to lie down and rest himself.

Instances are rare in our time of such writers as "J. P. M." His work was good, but one feels that better still was the vital and alluring personality behind it.

ALL the hawking on Salisbury Plain this year has been done with "haggards." It is a change from Shakespeare's time. A haggard is a wild hawk taken for use when in its adult plumage, a bird of much superior flight to the hand-reared eyas or nestling which mostly served Elizabethan falconers. Shakespeare uses the word in "Much Ado" in its simple noun-sense:—

I know, her spirits are as coy and wild
As haggards of the rock.

The modern falconer, more skilled than the mediæval, does not much consider, it seems, the word's adjectival sense of "intractable." In Shakespeare's mind that sense was inherent in it, and when Othello says, "If I do prove her haggard," he is thinking back to the dread possibility suggested by Iago's first unspoken hint, that Desdemona was "wild" before he married her. We miss the full, clear meaning of that bitter imagery:—

If I do prove her haggard,
Though that her jesses were my dear heart-strings
I'd whistle her off, and let her down the wind
To prey at fortune.

To get the full force of that passage it is almost necessary to see the sport and mark that the jesses go with the bird.

THE taming and use of adult falcons has long been known, however, in India, a fact which can surprise nobody who saw the little collection of birds and beasts shown by some Indian jugglers at Earl's Court last year—the health and good temper of those wild creatures were so remarkable. What he saw in India may well have given Mr. Kipling his supreme idea of a kind of familiarity between man and all things feræ naturæ, realised in the wonderful "Jungle Book." Mowgli is after all a type. Mr. Ozer, the falconer of the Old Hawking Club at Lyndhurst, has a touch of Mowgli's skill, and some of the most successful flights on Salisbury Plain this spring have been accomplished with a falcon that was wild two months ago. She came from Holland, where they know how the hawk may be captured. Holland sends us most of the hawks employed in English falconry. With hand-reared birds it would be almost impossible to hawk the sea-gull, a sport for which rook-hawking in the spring is only a preparation and weeding-out process, training the strongest falcons.

THE following inscription for a sword of honour has been sent to us by Mr. Herbert Trench:—

Draw me not! Let your laurels round me wreath,
You that have borne, since you began to breathe,
The soul within you ready to unsheathe.

It was anticipated by most reasonable and clear-thinking people that Mr. Justice Ridley's judgment in the case of McQuire v. The "Western Morning News," would be reversed, and that anticipation has been realised. The question was of much greater importance than the £100 originally awarded to the plaintiff involved, and the "Western Morning News" is to be congratulated on the result of its appeal, and thanked for carrying the matter through. Its criticism of Mr. McQuire's play was severe, but no personal malice was alleged; it came within the bounds of perfectly fair criticism. If actions could be taken successfully against newspapers for severe criticisms of plays or books, there would, at once, be an end to all honest critical work. The matter was not one for the personal opinion of the jury, and in that point the jury was misdirected. The conclusion of the judgment by the Master of the Rolls was as follows:—

Further, as to misdirection, I think that, though at the outset of his summing-up the learned Judge correctly laid down the law as to the extent of the defendants' right of criticism, the later part of his summing-up may have helped the jury to apply the standard of their own taste to the appreciation of the thing criticized, and to measure the rights of the critic accordingly. We have had excerpts from the play, including the songs and the stage directions, read to us; and I think it right to say that, in my opinion, it would be matter of regret for all well-wishers of the stage if an honest critic were debarred from commenting in the sense of this criticism on such a production.

Newspapers have often suffered at the hands of juries. This judgment should go far to save them in future from irritating and unnecessary attack.

THERE are advantages, no doubt, of various kinds, in being a President. If he happens to be an author, for instance, his books will sell. President Roosevelt has written some fourteen books, and there is an increasing demand for them in America. They are now being published in a new and limited edition.

By the death of Mr. W. T. Maud, the correspondent and artist of the "Daily Graphic," another name has to be struck off the narrowing list of war correspondents. Mr. Maud had seen much of war during the past eight years; he was in Armenia at the time of the 1895 massacres, in the following year he was in Cuba, and later was in Thessaly and the Soudan. He was in Ladysmith during the siege, and when G. W. Steevens died he was at his side. Concerning that tragic incident the war correspondent of the "Daily Chronicle" says: "From first to last Maud nursed him with the patience and gentleness of a woman, and the skill of a trained nurse. It was to him that Steevens said his last conscious words about this being a 'rather sideways ending,' and I have never known grief more prostrating than was Maud's after we had carried our friend—our man of genius—to the grave." Mr. Maud escaped the dangers of flying bullets; he died of syncope. But he died in harness.

MR. EDMUND GOSSE the other day had an article in the "Daily Chronicle" on "The Irony of Anatole France," apropos of M. France's latest novel, "Histoire Comique." Irony in England, as Mr. Gosse very pertinently pointed out, is suspect:—

No one who has endeavoured for the last hundred years to use irony in England as an imaginative medium has escaped failure. However popular he has been until that moment, his admirers then slip away from him, silently, as Tennyson's did when he wrote the later sections of "Maud," and still more strikingly as Matthew Arnold's did when he published "Friendship's Garland." The result of the employment of irony in this country is that people steal noiselessly away from the ironist as if he had been guilty in their presence of a social incongruity.

The fact is that our national temperament does not lend itself to irony—certainly not to such delicate and elusive irony as that of M. Anatole France. There is no more subtle mind at work to-day than that which created the inimitable volumes of the "Histoire Contemporaine." But the irony of M. France is, as Mr. Gosse said, "a tender and consolatory railleury, based upon compassion." There are few European reputations to-day of which it may so confidently be asserted that they will live as the reputation of M. Anatole France.

OUR correspondent "I. H." should be fully satisfied by the response to his letter printed in our last issue. We have received over a dozen communications pointing out that the lines occur in Campbell's "Pleasures of Hope." One of our correspondents says: "I am afraid 'I. H.' is a bit of a wag. The lines about which he inquires terminate Campbell's 'Pleasures of Hope.' Campbell, if my memory has not grown too avid of the picturesque, is the poet who would walk three miles to change a comma into a semicolon. How many miles would he not have walked to reclaim the whole line lost in your correspondent's quotation?"

APROPOS of a recent comment in these columns concerning "Wee MacGregor," a correspondent asks us in "what way" we do not like the book. Our statement was not that we did not like it, but that we tried, unsuccessfully, to read it. Our correspondent adds: "If I may say so, I myself, after some hearty laughs, had to put the book aside, as my room seemed to fill with these 'Glesca' folk, and I felt inclined to open the window. But to May, 1903, Realism which recognises Truth as Beauty, even when she wields a dung-fork, that should be a recommendation." Since our correspondent's letter reached us we have been looking at the book again. Perhaps our primary difficulty is that we know little more of the Scots dialect, and particularly of the Glasgow dialect, than we do of Erse; we get tired of the perpetual "speirin'" of Wee MacGregor and his parents and relations, and also of Wee MacGregor's passion for eating sweets. Also, we are convinced that dialect may be run to death. This, however, is more a generalisation than a remark applicable to "Wee MacGregor," which was a book frankly written for a particular public. What has surprised us is its success outside that particular public. Our reading of it has convinced us that the book has both humour and reality, however, and for that we are ready to forgive certain touches of sentimentality which have shaken our nerves. There is always a market for humour, even outside Scotland. We notice that Mr. Barry Pain's "De Omnibus" is in its ninety-eighth thousand.

THE Newdigate Prize for English verse was not awarded this year; it is over fifty years since such a lapse has occurred. The subject was "Charles I. at Oxford." Perhaps the subject suggested too much romance, and possibly the judges were afraid of Jacobite enthusiasm. It strikes us as being the most hopeful subject-set for many years.

THE uncertainties of literature are being continually discussed, particularly in American literary journals. There is an article on the subject in the current New York "Critic." The writer had access to a book kept by an unnamed author in which he entered the titles of all his articles and stories and the magazines to which they were sent. From such a record nothing, after all, is to be learned: some manuscripts were sent out a dozen times before acceptance, others only two or three times. That kind of thing is inevitable: we ourselves know of cases where manuscripts have been sent out a score of times, and finally have found a home in unexpectedly high places. The point that strikes us in this article, however, is the curiously commercial attitude of this unnamed author. He is reported to have said:—

In my own case—and I am making a fairly good living by my literary work, although I do not claim the right to be classed among the "well-known writers" as yet—I never destroy anything that I have written. I used to do it, and I do not think I exaggerate when I say I never destroyed anything that I did not have cause to regret it later. The time always has come when that story or that article could have been used to advantage. So now, when anything has "gone the limit," I carefully file it away and wait.

We really have nothing to say to the man who never destroys anything he has written. He may be an admirable mechanic, but literature is not a question of mechanics. We think of Guy de Maupassant, and are satisfied.

THE Toirac prize of four thousand francs, founded in favour of the author of the best play presented at the Comédie-Française in the course of the year, has been awarded by the French Academy to M. Maurice Donnay, the author of "L'Autre Danger."

On Tuesday Mr. Israel Zangwill presided at a dinner of the Maccabees at the St. James's Restaurant. Herr Joseph Israels was the guest, and in proposing the toast of the evening, Mr. Zangwill named, as examples of Dutch art, Spinoza and Joseph Israels, and indicated how a nation's art is influenced by physical surroundings. Dutch art, said Mr. Zangwill, was the expression of the joy of life and a "perpetual grace to God for the beauty of common things." That was well said. Mr. Zangwill suggested that it was Herr Israel's Jewish nature which had enabled him to make so great a contribution to Dutch art, for the predominant note of his work was the pathos and tragedy of life.

* THE front of the house known to postmen and directories as No. 6, Wine Office Court, Fleet Street, has been condemned as unsafe, and will shortly be removed. Goldsmith lived there, after leaving Green Arbour Court, from 1760 to 1764, and it is possible that there he wrote "The Vicar of Wakefield." Our literary landmarks are fast disappearing, but when a house-front begins to bulge there is nothing else for it, we suppose, but removal. The pity is that remedies are not applied in time.

THE authors of "Wisdom while you Wait" suggested various uses for the Insidecomplectuar Britanniaware, one of which was practically demonstrated the other day at Southampton. Lord Avebury was to open the new art gallery, and just before the proceedings commenced it was ascertained that he proposed to read his address. A kind of lectern was improvised by piling books upon a table, and those books were part of Southampton's set of the "indispensable work."

Bibliographical.

MR. ANDREW LANG kindly reminds me that he contributed to the "Cornhill" for February 1900, a paper called "The Mystery of Lord Bateman," in the course of which he dealt with the "Loving Ballad" and its history. In regard to the versions illustrated by Thackeray and Cruikshank, the conclusion at which he arrived was this: that "Cruikshank and Thackeray used a text with merely verbal differences, which was popular among the least educated classes early in this century. Again, Thackeray contributed the notes and critical apparatus to Cruikshank's version. For this the internal evidence of style is overpowering: no other man wrote in the manner and with the peculiar humour of Mr. Titmarsh." In opposition to this, a correspondent of Mr. Lang's wrote in 1900 as follows: "Somewhere about 1840 there was a frequent visitor at our house named Burnett, who had married a sister of Charles Dickens. He said, as you state, that Cruikshank had got the words from a pot-house singer. He added that Cruikshank sang or hummed the tune to him, and he gave it the musical notation which follows the preface. He also said that Charles Dickens wrote the notes."

Nevertheless, Mr. Lang finds it "impossible," he tells me, "to believe that anyone but Thackeray wrote the notes to Cruikshank's version." That version came out originally in 1839, being published by one Charles Tilt of Fleet Street. There was an edition, issued by Bogue, in 1851; another in 1870, brought out by Bell and Daldy; another, by Bell and Sons, in 1883; and yet another, by David Bryce and Sons, Glasgow, in 1886. This last had a preface from the pen of Blanchard Jerrold, including a note from Frederick Locker-Lampson in which he mentions that he possesses a copy of the 1851 edition. The Bryce text of 1886 is reproduced, it seems, in the thirteenth volume of the Biographical Edition of Thackeray's Works, of course with Thackeray's illustrations, which were first published in 1892. It may be mentioned that the British Museum possesses two texts of the "Loving Ballad," in broadsheet form, dated conjecturally 1830 and 1835. They are practically identical, and represent, no doubt, what Cruikshank derived from the pot-house singer.

Talking of the big book-place in Bloomsbury, I see that a lady novelist is to give us a story which she (or her publisher) describes as "a romance of the British Museum." I doubt not that many a romance has had its origin or its consummation within that stately pile; I doubt if even in the solemn Reading Room the voice of flirtation is wholly unheard. The literary class ought to celebrate the Museum; it is its duty. And I remember some pretty verses by Mr. Ernest Radford (you will find them in "Chambers Twain," 1890, and also in "Old and New," 1895) which tell how two young people took their modest luncheons together in "the dim Egyptian room":—

Love spreads the feast; their lips have met!
So grace is said, and lingered o'er!
Grey gods, ye smiled! Nor look ye yet
All grimly serious as before.

Mr. Radford has further poetised over a "Fragment in the British Museum"— a stone, no common stone,

"A fragment"—of a woman's breast.

A correspondent of my Editor's blithely suggests that I should supply a bibliography of the vers-de-société of the nineteenth century. I should not object, if some person, or body of persons, having authority, would kindly decide what vers-de-société is, or is not. There have been three anthologies on the subject—"Lyra Elegantiarum" (1867), "Muses of Mayfair" (1874), and "Songs of Society" (1881)—and in each case the editorial point of view is different from that in the others. Is vers-de-société the poetry of the "beau monde" and "fashion," or is it simply all verse which is light in tone and easy in style?

The announcement in "The Bookman" that Sir Leslie Stephen is to write a volume on Thomas Hobbes for the "English Men of Letters" series is surely belated. "Man of Letters," I suppose, Hobbes was, if only because of his translations from Homer, Aristotle, and Thucydides, and of his "poem" on "The Wonders of the Peak." But it is as a "philosopher" that he is famous and remembered, and very properly he found a place in the "Philosophical Classics" of Messrs. Blackwood, for whom Dr. G. Croom Robertson wrote a monograph, biographical and expository, which was admittedly excellent.

Apparently not much of the late Mr. R. H. Stoddard's literary work found its way across the Atlantic. The American editions of his "Henry Wadsworth Longfellow: a Medley of Prose and Verse" (1882) and of his "Life of Washington Irving" (1886) had some circulation over here; but of late years only two of his books have had English publishers—"The Lion's Cub and Other Verse" (1891) and "Under the Evening Lamp" (1893).

Altogether to be welcomed is the new edition of Arthur Golding's Ovid which Mr. Moring promises us. This version of the Metamorphoses came out (in its complete form) in 1567, and was reprinted in 1575, 1584, 1587, 1593, 1612, and 1675. This shows how popular this version was for a century and more, but during the intervening centuries it has been neglected.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Modernity of Homer.

THE ODYSSEY. Translated by J. W. Mackail. Books I.—VIII. (Murray. 5s. net.)

FOUR or five years ago Mr. Mackail printed—we are not sure if it was ever published—an experimental version of the seventh book of the "Odyssey," which was at once recognised by all who saw it as being of quite exceptional quality. That delightful little pamphlet has grown into the present volume, and doubtless, having gone so far, Mr. Mackail will not pause until he has completed his task. This is a translation of the very highest order. A learned scholar, a fastidious critic, and a poet of considerable accomplishment have combined to produce it. Alike for the student familiar with the original and for the unlettered reader anxious to catch as much as possible of the large Homeric utterance, it will at once take rank as the English Homer of our day. And a day which can produce almost at the same moment Mr. Mackail's "Odyssey" and Prof. Gilbert Murray's "Euripides" may claim at least, so far as the minor art of translation is concerned, to hold up its head with the best. Every age may be known by its translations. Chapman's Homer is fully as characteristic of the sixteenth century, Pope's Homer of the eighteenth century, as any original poem which the England of Elizabeth or the England of Anne produced. And Mr. Mackail's work, too, could only have been written in a generation which has taken its conceptions of narrative poetry from the genius of William Morris. It will not be forgotten that Morris himself translated the "Odyssey," translated it with a spilt of archaism and in the saga manner of "Sigurd the Volsung." Mr. Mackail goes for his inspiration to the earlier Morris. His rendering recalls the "Earthly Paradise," with its delight in external beauty, its limpid atmosphere and its pure translucency of colouring. As a sample we will quote one or two of the more famous descriptive passages. Here is that which Mr. Stephen Phillips has made familiar to modern readers, the visit of Hermes to Calypso's isle:—

And now that island far amid the foam
Reaching, from out the violet sea he clomb
Over the mainland, to the cavern great
Wherein the fair-tressed nymph had made her home.

Within he found her in the cavern-cell:
Where from a brazier by her, burning well,
A fire of cloven cedar-wood and pine
Far through the island sent a goodly smell.

And in it she with voice melodious sang,
While through the warp her golden shuttle rang
As to and fro before the loom she went.
But round the cave a verdurous forest sprang

Of poplars and sweet-scented cypresses,
And alders: and long-pinioned birds in these Nested, owls, falcons, chattering cormorants,
And all that ply their business in the seas.

But round the hollow cavern trailing went
A garden-vine with heavy clusters bent:
And rising all arow, four springs abroad
This way and that their shining water sent.

And on both sides fair-flowering meads were set,
Soft-clad with parsley and with violet.
Even an immortal, if he came, that sight
Marvelling might view and joy thereof might get.

Here again are the halls and gardens of Alcinoüs in the pleasant land of Phæacia:—

Withindoors fifty serving-women sit:
Some turn the mill and grind bright corn in it;
And others weave at looms or twist the yarn,
While, like the leaves of a tall poplar, flit

The glancing shuttles through their finger-tips,
As from the warp-threads down the thin oil drips;
For far as the Phæacians pass all men
In skill to sweep the sea in racing ships,

No far their women in the weaver's art
Excel all others, since to them apart
Athena skill in lovely workmanship
Has granted, and an understanding heart.

Without the courtyard of the house of state
An orchard of four acres nigh the gate
Is planted, with a fence all round it drawn;
And there grow fruit-trees flourishing and great:

Pear-trees and pomegranates, and apple-trees
Laden with shining apples, and by these,
Sweet-juiced figs and olives burgeoning,
Whose fruiting ceases not nor perishes

Winter or summer, all the year: for there
The western breezes ever soft and fair
Ripen one crop and bring another on.
Apple on apple growing, pear on pear.

Grape-bunch on grape-bunch, fig on fig they lie
Mellowing to age: and trenched deep thereby
The many-fruited vineyard of the king
Is set: one side of it lies warm and dry,

Where raisins in the heat of the sun are spread,
And on one side they gather grapes, and tread
The vintage in the wine-press: while in front
The clusters newly set their blossom shed,

And midway some the first faint colour show.
There likewise, by the vineyard's utmost row,
Are set trim garden-beds of every sort,
Full-flowering while the seasons come and go

And there two springs gush forth, and of the two
One is divided all the garden through,
And one beneath the courtyard gateway runs
Toward the high house: from it the townsfolk drew.

Evidently Mr. Mackail enjoys these descriptive passages, delighting to set the threads in his arras, which make the delicate landscape pattern of foliage, and fruit, and streams. But he is no less happy in the humanity of other parts of the story. The whole of the sixth book, perhaps the finest thing in Homer, with its fascinating picture of Nausicaa carrying her woful of dirty clothes to the washing pool in the simple patriarchal life, is admirably done. The ripple of underlying humour is caught, and the ethos of the scene between the unkempt sea-married castaway and the high-hearted daughter of a king. How extraordinarily modern it is:—

So saying, bright Odysseus from his bed
'Crept, and from off the bushy thicket shred
A leafy bough to hide his nakedness,
And like a lion on the mountains bred

Strode forth, that, in his might of none in awe,
With eyes afire, through rain and gusty flaw
Goes hunting after the wild woodland deer,
Or sheep or oxen; for his hungry maw

Even the fenced yard where the flocks are pent
Bids him adventure: So Odysseus went
Among the fair-tressed maids to cast himself,
Though naked: for his need was imminent.

Dreadful to them the sea-stained man drew nigh:
And up and down they ran dispersedly
Along the jutting beaches: only then
The daughter of Alcinoüs did not fly:

Such courage put Athena in her breast:
Unfaltering she stood up and undistressed,
And faced him: and Odysseus held debate,
Whether to clasp her knees in prayer were best.

Or where he stood with supplicating speech
From far away her mercy to beseech:
Till thus debating best he thought from far
The lovely maiden with soft words to reach.

Mr. Mackail's diction strikes us again and again as curiously and exactly right. In the main straightforward and transparent, it has just the faint touch of archaism which, without ever becoming an affectation or a mannerism, is needed to preserve the atmosphere of a fairy-tale which hangs all about the "Odyssey." His rhythm also runs very delicately. And of course he deserves the very highest praise for the insight which discovered the adaptability of the Fitzgerald quatrain to the purposes of continuous narrative and for the fine sense of metre which enabled him to carry out the adaptation. To preserve the interest of the rhyme-arrangement and at the same time to break down the barriers between quatrain and quatrain so as to make them not independent units, but merely, as it were, single waves in the flow of a tide, required some subtlety. Mr. Mackail has accomplished it by the skilful use of what technical metrists call "light endings" and "unstopped lines" at the close of his quatrains, and to our mind with a remarkable success.

An Unconventional Handbook.

THE AGE OF SHAKESPEARE (1579-1631). By Thomas Seccombe and J. W. Allen. (Bell.)

THIS is the age of handbooks, of little guides, of manuals, of text-books, in all of which well-equipped scholars will intrepidly boil you down an age and offer you its intellectual quintessence in three or four hundred neatly packed pages. It is said by the faculty that meat extract will keep no one alive, but the convenience of the handbook as a stimulant to weak literary digestions is not to be gainsaid. Here, in "The Age of Shakespeare," Messrs. Seccombe and Allen have prepared an admirable critical digest of the leading and minor Elizabethan poets, critics, novelists, satirists, controversialists, historians, travellers, and a conspectus of the Elizabethan drama. The amount of research required, of miscellaneous reading, of checking of facts and figures, of comparison of bibliographical details, of acquaintance with the latest researches of modern scholarship, not to speak of the actual critical judgments delivered on the chief works of over a hundred authors, all this is so formidable a labour that one scarcely expects to find, in a literary handbook, a fresh and piquant style of literary judgments in addition to soundness of scholarship. Most text-books, in fact, are dry and sapless because their learned authors have been over-burdened by the prodigious accumulation of literary facts they have been forced to sift and classify, and their works consequently breathe back to us the exhausted air of lecture rooms and museums. Whether Messrs. Seccombe and Allen are scholars with special recuperative powers, or whether it be that "the spacious times of great Elizabeth" have quickened their vital spirits and purged them of drowsy humours, we know not, but "The Age of Shakespeare" is fresh and unconventional in its brisk outlook and shows not a trace of pedantry in its critical dicta. The book's aim is to give us a quick but comprehensive view of the main body of Elizabethan literature and to assess its documentary and æsthetic value in a running critical commentary, and in both these respects "The Age of Shakespeare" is an achievement quite out of the common. We cannot, indeed, believe that the authors have deliberately read through all the literature they pass in review—they are far too intelligent for that; but they have evidently the faculty of getting at the pith and marrow of a book without waste of time, and have fruitful memories of the salient features of the folios and quartos they have browsed amongst. Of course, the critical dicta the joint authors deliver themselves of are often matters of taste. But the majority of literary judgments in the book are distinguished by an effective boldness in expression which seems to us far preferable to the attitude of so many critics who fear to speak their own minds lest they be thought not to be "judicial." The great advantage of a critic's boldly speaking out his mind is that the question sub judice is much more likely to be exposed in all aspects by the conflict of opinions generated in the reader's mind than by any mere cautious summary. The following passage on Bacon is an illustration in point:—

Bacon completed his services on behalf of the Crown against his old patron by penning an official declaration of the treason of Essex, 1601. Three years later he drew up a palinode, or an apology, for his behaviour with regard to the noble but unfortunate Earl, in whose interests, he now declared, he had neglected the Queen's service, and his own fortune. The whole incident illustrates but too plainly Bacon's extraordinary power of interested self-persuasion and his faculty for concentrating his attention less upon his actual deeds and utterances than upon the general rectitude of his intentions. He was paid £1,200 for his efforts in proving his friend a traitor, but he failed to secure the Mastership of the Rolls, or other definite preferment.

The essays are representative throughout of Bacon's shrewd and sententious humour, his almost incomparable power of generalizing and of crystallizing the utterances of sage men of all periods. Their author was, in very truth, "a discloser of lights the most overwhelming in flashes of wit." Yet Bacon's gift for transmitting his personality is so great that they reveal with equal distinctness his too clear apprehension of the base side of human nature, his poverty in respect of genial humours, emotion and the higher imaginative qualities, his total lack of what Milton describes as the three prime elements of poetry—the simple the sensuous, and the passionate.

Now this is excellent criticism. It is of course open to the counsel for the defence to say that Bacon's motives were intellectually loftier than our authors have construed them, but the passage cited has the great merit of throwing the onus on the adversary of proving that the quality of Bacon's intellect can be divorced from the quality of his moral character. This being impossible, the critic will have to go afresh to the essays for evidence that Bacon was not lacking in the higher imaginative qualities, and genial humour and emotion. For ourselves, we are in agreement with our authors, and hold that their analysis of Bacon's mental characteristics is very near the mark.

The general criticism advanced on the minor Elizabethan dramatists is also refreshingly to the point. The authors point out that Lamb, who wrote with the enthusiasm of a lover and a discoverer, was "merely the instrument of the romantic movement in literature." The eulogies of Lamb, enthusiastically expanded by Mr. Swinburne, have been echoed by a crowd of lesser critics. The lyrical school of criticism has almost exhausted the language of eulogy in the Elizabethans praise:—

No one nowadays would deny that, even putting aside Shakespeare and Jonson, the later Elizabethan or strictly Jacobean drama is remarkable for its variety and its strength. It has the splendid vitality, the joy and carelessness, the freedom and audacity and idealism of youth. It is strewn with jewels of imagination, it is full of the mystery and horror of unrestrained passion. There is something in it for all tastes; brilliant or striking character, sketches and pictures of manner, wide reaching thought, piercing aphorism, lyrical flights, cynicism, rhetoric passion, farce.

But it is a drama of passages, of passionate or joyous moments, of inspirational flashes. It is amazingly unequal, crude, careless, and wayward. Putting Shakespeare and Ben Jonson aside, we doubt if there be a single play of any serious pretensions which is not disfigured by faults so gross as to be almost damning. We must not allow ourselves to be blinded by its scattered excellences to its fundamental defects, or to be hypnotised by the chorus of praise which has arisen from its later critics. . . . Shakespeare's creative power combines incongruous elements; in the minor dramatists these elements mix. . . . The foundations of drama must be laid deep in human nature; for drama is the interaction of character. . . . But in the minor Elizabethan dramatists without exception, in Beaumont, Fletcher, Webster, Middleton, Tourneur, Ford, Chapman, Dekker, the power of characterization is small.

Their work is too grossly disfigured and too lacking in essentials ever to be more than the playground of a few scholars, the pleasure of a few adepts.

We should prefer to phrase the last criticism thus: 'their work was too lacking in the essentials of great art to last: for nothing can last except really great or most exquisite art. Eighteenth century society required a drama reflecting its own moods, conventions and worldly outlook, and that drama is now a dead letter. So with the novels of our own day: only a few great pieces will survive. "Coherence and reality in drama" would not, as our authors in one passage seem to imply, have saved the Elizabethan drama. Middleton's "A Chaste Maid in Cheapside" has reality and coherence enough, but is deficient in those essentials that only great genius can give. Messrs. Seccombe and Allen, however, sum up their argument with a frank force that wins our respect: "The eighteenth century was not so far wrong. It is a case of Shakespeare first, Ben Jonson a bad second, and the rest nowhere."

The eighty-four pages of Volume II. devoted to Shakespeare are a masterly précis of the whole subject. The amount of biographical information, Shakespeariana, critical notes on Shakespeare's editors, and Shakespearian problems comprised in this section, is quite astonishing, and we should like to see this portion of the book issued separately in cheap form, and used as a text book for colleges. The criticisms of the plays are fresh and stimulating, and the authors are not afraid of being a little uncompromising at times. Of course, the finest shades of æsthetic criticism are not to be found, but only a criticism of outlines and details, and naturally the authors succeed better with the plays of Shakespeare's early period than with the great tragedies. However, there is more sound original criticism contained in the eighty-four pages than in many more pretentious works.

With the Best of Intentions.

THE SOCIETY FOR PSYCHICAL RESEARCH: ITS RISE AND PROGRESS AND A SKETCH OF ITS WORK. By Edward T. Bennett. (Brimley Johnson. 1s.)

As a sign of our times, a bye product, an epiphenomenon, the S. P. R. is easy prey, no doubt, for those who can compel laughter at will, but the Society possesses an interest of its own, for it has no predecessors in history, and, in a scientific age, it boldly claims, by scientific methods, to prove the existence of that which science either denies, or of which, shrugging her shoulders, she says, "Nescio." We may outline, therefore, its rise and continuance, if not, as our title-page says, its "rise and progress."

The Society has recently attained its majority, its active founder having been Prof. Barrett, of Dublin, and its first President the late Prof. Sidgwick, of Cambridge. Subsequent Presidents furnish a most interesting list of names: Prof. Balfour Stewart, a distinguished physicist; Mr. Balfour, Prof. William James, Sir William Crookes, Mr. Fred. W. H. Myers, and Sir Oliver Lodge. Upon which list we would make only these comments, that Prof. James alone can claim any acquaintance with nervous physiology and its branch psychology, that he must have been greatly interested by the fascinating psychological studies which the members of the Society afforded, and that none of these gentlemen had or has studied morbid mental phenomena. They have, so to speak, attempted a commentary upon Shakespeare before learning to read or to see. That by the way.

As to this matter of progress, says Mr. Bennett, "The attitude of the public mind towards Psychical Research has so changed during the twenty years that it is difficult now to realise the feelings of contempt which were almost universal among educated people, in regard to some branches of the enquiry." We had not noticed this change, nor can we conceive how it could have been effected; but the public attitude to any scientific work matters little if work has been done. What, then, is the Society's record of achievement? First, as to its own account. These are its claims:—

(1.) That proof is afforded that there are other means than the "five senses" by which knowledge can be acquired by the human mind; in other words, that Telepathy is a Fact.

(2.) That one human mind has the power of influencing other human minds in ways not heretofore recognised by science; in other words, that the effects of Suggestion, Hypnotism, and Psychic Healing represent groups of actual Phenomena.

(3.) That there is a realm of undeveloped and unrecognised Faculty in Man, provisionally termed the Subliminal Self.

(4.) That there is a basis of fact in many stories of Hauntings and Apparitions of various kinds.

(5.) That in Psychical Research the enquirer does meet with Intelligences other than human beings in the flesh. And that there is evidence—small though it be in amount—which is sufficient to prove the Continuity of individual life after death, and that communication does take place between those in this and in another condition of life.

Now these are great claims. The last is stupendous. All are profoundly important. What, then, is the verdict of the scientific world, which has been wise enough to begin at the beginning, upon those who claim to be their co-workers in this field? That "Telepathy is a Fact" is denied by those competent to judge. Suggestion, hypnotism and psychic healing are commonplaces. They were not discovered by the Society, nor has its work added to our knowledge of them. The discussion of psychic healing in this volume is not only puerile and worthy of the advertisements in a Transatlantic journal, but much worse. We must make a quotation, which, if generally credited, would cost countless lives and hours of misery:—

An attempt has been made to draw a line between nervous cases, or cases due more or less to the imagination, [a most ignorant comment] and actual physical or organic cases. It has been alleged that only the former class are amenable to psychic treatment. But experience does not justify this conclusion. Physical and organic effects, even diseases, can be caused simply by mental impression. It seems, therefore, unreasonable to reject the idea that mental treatment may be efficacious as a remedial agent, not only in nervous disorders and in what may be called imaginary ailments, but also in cases of organic disease, even in cases which, under ordinary circumstances, require surgical treatment.

This is beneath comment. To the third proposition, vague and obvious, everyone would assent, as to more important platitudes; whilst no one's belief or disbelief in the remaining clauses could be affected by anything we might say here, or the S. P. R. might say or do elsewhere. Pity 'tis that people who seek reality of one sort or another, do not as certainly find what they wish to find as our well-intentioned friends of the S. P. R.

We are aware that our remarks must cause pain to many people whose aims and motives are beyond praise. But we nevertheless feel it necessary to record the conviction, based on some considerable experience of the "phenomena" which concern the Society, that its existence is a necessary evil, fortunately ephemeral, at which we need not cavil. In this early age of science it was inevitable that such a quasi-scientific body should be formed. But we believe its influence to make for the efflorescence of superstition, for the blasting of many hopes, and for the discredit of many things which we, like the S. P. R., hold to be truth, and its credulous and exploded expositions of which we therefore the more deeply deplore.

Real Country.

THINGS ABOUT OUR NEIGHBOURHOOD. By Ménie Muriel Dowie. (Richards. 6s.)

THESE four and thirty chapters make up a book which is neither dull nor gaudy, neither foolish nor perverse. It is a book written quite clearly by one born, as Miss Dowie puts it, to "the freedom of the country"—a phrase which means a great deal. For it is a freedom which may by no means be purchased with a country estate; as often as not the true freedom is found in the cottage tumbling to insanitary decay outside the lodge-gates. "To work faithfully with and for Nature," says Miss Dowie, "should leave one both strong and humble; that I am conscious of my limitations may therefore be believed. But in my love I am strong, and so to all fellow-lovers of plants, trees, and beasts I offer hopefully what is, inside its thin envelope of fiction, my Country Book." No reader is likely to be disappointed with a volume so full of acuteness, humour, knowledge, and friendly charm.

Miss Dowie gives us the round of country life both in its human and natural aspects; some of the character sketches, slight though they are, are excellently touched in; the Countess, and the Admiral, and the Martindales are all very much alive, particularly the Admiral. The chapter called "An Old Labourer," too, is full of quiet observation. There are not many men left who have old Christian's firm love for the soil and knowledge of its ways, just as there are very few men left who can do sound and honest spade-work. The art of digging, as anyone with experience knows, is almost a lost art. Yet the land responds to honest spade culture with a kind of understanding gladness.

The humours of poultry-rearing, and cow-keeping, and pig-raising are treated by Miss Dowie with exhilarating freshness; not many people are born with the selective instinct, it has generally to be acquired at the expense of both spirit and pocket. Incubators are well enough when you get the right one and know how to use it, and pig-raising is all right when you have got over the initial obstacles. Betty, fortunately, had a genius for acquiring knowledge through humorous failure, and in the end her ventures were justified. Betty is an altogether charming little person, whom we cheerfully forgive for her slangy tendencies.

Miss Dowie's style in this volume is frankly colloquial, but occasionally it fits itself to a deeper theme. Here is a delicately felt passage concerning an aspect of autumn:—

Nature may be sad—Man must revel. It is Man's moment: he is face to face with what he has made; potent; beneath his foot is the bared earth, in his hand the increase he has compelled from her. It is not in spring, summer, or winter that the peasant dances—it is in autumn. It is in autumn he gets the crick out of his back, and stands erect to look over the wide fields. There where the pale reek rises from the little dung-heaps on the stubble, there where the blue smoke draws along the ground from the rubbish fires on the fallow, and quaint Belgian cows marbled in black and white, crop soothly after the fourth cutting of alfalfa—there, in those fields, Man has won his battle, he has come into his own.

A great deal of practical value may be learnt from these engaging pages, though it must always be remembered that what suits one county may not suit another, and also that individual idiosyncrasy is a powerful factor in the raising of fruit and flowers. Given what appear to be exactly similar soil and conditions, and with the same seeds or cuttings, two people may obtain very different results. It is the loving hand that in some unaccountable way induces the response of growth. We particularly commend to readers what Miss Dowie has to say on the apparently uninspiring subject of potatoes.

One of the chapters, "A Sporting Girl to Her Hunter," is in verse—swinging, vigorous verse, too. But we like better the verses in a later paper called "The Moon-Dogs." We quote two stanzas:—

On the moors in Moon-land,
The dead dogs range,
Where the bracken's always ruddy
And the seasons never change;
Where the gorse has ne'er a prickle,
And the Moon-heather's sweet,
And they gallop all the year through
And never hurt their feet.

* * * * *

For when we're growing weary,
And our days down here run low;
When our eyes are rather bleary,
And our paws are stiff and slow;
We can see Them tireless, running,
We can dream Their sweet repose,
In a sandy warm Moon-burrow
With a feather on Their nose.

For these delightful verses all true dog lovers will be indebted to Miss Dowie. We have not, for some time, come across a volume so bright and sound and free from sentimentality.

A Japanese Story.

FOR HIS PEOPLE. By Viscount Hayashi. (Harpers. 5s.)

WE have seen much of Japan during recent years through European eyes, from the cynically amorous "Madame Chrysanthème" of Pierre Loti, to the notes of the latest tourist who has scampered over the beaten track. But these give us not the slightest glimpse into the soul of a people mainly made up of toiling peasantry, with legends, stories, feeling, ideals of their own. Viscount Hayashi is the Japanese Ambassador to the Court of St. James's. He has rightly regarded his functions as including the establishment of some sort of understanding between the people of Japan and the people of Great Britain, and to that end—if we may impute an obvious motive—he has rendered into English, simple and vivid English, the story of Sogoro and his great sacrifice, a story which is attested by official documents, and for two centuries and a half has been an inspiration to Japan. The story, which the Japanese call "The Cherry Blossoms of a Spring Morn," has been dramatised, it is known throughout the country, and the tomb of Sogoro is an honoured shrine. But for the English reader the interest lies in the curious revelations of Japanese life and thought in the days when a Stuart still sat on the English throne. Like all stories that reach the heart of a people, the story of Sogoro is simple. About forty miles east of the capital, which was then called Yedo, stood, and still stands, the hamlet of Kodzu. Here, two hundred and fifty years ago, the peasants were terribly oppressed by Sugiyama, the dishonest steward of the Baron Hotta, feudal lord of the province. No access could be obtained to the absentee lord; and as a last resource it was determined by the villagers to present a petition to the Shogun. Now the Shogun always acted on a petition, with good reason; for the petitioner's penalty was death, and it was not likely that the penalty would be faced without serious cause. As headman of the village Sogoro claimed his right to sacrifice himself. And the story is mainly of Sogoro's preparations and his journey to the capital. Before he started, remembering that his wife and children might be involved in his punishment, he thus addressed his wife; and under the formality of the scene one finds humanity:—

"Accordingly I am prepared, my dear Tsuta, to dissolve our marriage tie, by giving to you in writing a formal divorce. But think not that this act of mine implies any diminution of affectionate regard for you and our little ones, for it is, in truth, a proof to the contrary."

Sogoro, with these words, placed on his wife's lap the document he alluded to, and which, by a set phraseology and close adherence to a time-honoured method of framing it, has come to be generally spoken of as a "three-lines-and-a-half" letter.

Tsuta started as though stabbed to the heart at this new phase of calamity, and it seemed to be the culminating point of her many sorrows. But she rose to the occasion, and, in a tone of remonstrance, said:—

"It is absolutely cruel of you to pretend that in me you have a wife who would cling despicably to mere existence after witnessing her husband's noble sacrifice of his own life for others' good. Do you forget that I am the daughter of Kinzhi Soyemon?"

Sogoro departed for Yedo with his petition; hid himself under the bridge over which the Shogun must pass, and at the right moment, thrust the document, held in a cleft bamboo, within the screened window of the palanquin:—

The Shogun, who was in no way disturbed, quietly grasped the folded paper, and nodded in a kindly way to the bold petitioner, who caught the glance, and felt that his mission had been fulfilled. Prostrating himself instantly, with his forehead to the boards of the bridge, in token of profound respect, Sogoro allowed himself to be bound, with his arms at his back, and was immediately carried off to prison.

Sogoro was executed, as were his wife and children; but he had accomplished his purpose, and on the tomb of the man who died for his people fresh flowers are still laid. The unjust steward and his accomplices voluntarily committed "seppuku," falling upon their swords whilst their best friends stood by in readiness to decapitate them, and so end their sufferings. And the ghosts of Sogoro and his family still haunted the Baron Hotta. It is a simple story of self-sacrifice such as is common to East and West; but the charm lies in the quaint mixture of simplicity, courtesy, and cruelty of which the details are composed.

A Cheerful War-Book.

THE LAND OF THE BOXERS. By Captain Gordon Casserly. With 15 Illustrations and a Plan. (Longmans. 10s. 6d. net.)

As an officer in the Indian Army, Captain Gordon Casserly took part in the recent military action in China of the Allied Powers, and now he publishes his reflections on that highly important campaign. The book bears traces of hasty production. Perhaps it was hurriedly put together in the belief that an association of England with Germany in the matter of the Bagdad Railway would lead to trouble between England and Russia. That prospect has been dimmed by a statement from the Prime Minister; but Mars, in his course amid the constellations, has been favourable to Captain Casserly. Recent events in relation to Manchuria were ominous. Russia has disowned the designs which a fortnight ago raised a scare throughout Europe and the United States; but those who are acquainted with her methods of policy will not be surprised if ere long the crisis again arises, and that in earnest. What then? We have only to recall the terms of our Alliance with Japan in order to perceive that the situation will be grave. In the event of either Ally finding itself at war in the Far East with a single Power, the other is to be neutral, and to endeavour to impose general neutrality; but should the enemy be not single-handed the other Ally is to take the field, and the seas as well. It is not impossible that this contingency may become actual. The interests in vindication of which Japan went to war with China lie largely in Manchuria, and they are incompatible with the well-known though dissembled ambitions of Russia. Sooner or later, then, it seems clear, there must be war between the Tsar and the Mikado. It is doubtful whether Russia would have found help had she not withdrawn the demands which, if we may judge from the statements by Lord Lansdowne, and Lord Cranbourne, she undoubtedly, in some tentative manner, made last month. There are two strong influences making for the dissolution of her alliance with France, the only Power from whom succour could be expected. France having paused in the increase of her Navy, the relations between St. Petersburg and Paris are already cold; and, from causes which cannot with propriety be discussed at present, France and England are arriving at friendly understanding.

Still, even apart from our Treaty of Alliance with Japan, it is difficult to perceive how England could have remained neutral had war over Manchuria been declared. She, too, has interests in that vast region, and she could not have left them in neglect. She could not have stood non-combatant between Russia and Japan as the humble Kaffirs stood while Boers and Britons were between them making South Africa a waste. Thus, it is with keen concern that we read what Captain Casserly has to tell about the troops of the various Powers that joined in the subjugation of the Boxers. His disclosures are reassuring. It was only when they came into contact with detachments of our Army that the soldiery of the Great Powers got over a general contempt for the military forces of England.

The Misterie of Pewter.

HISTORY OF THE WORSHIPFUL COMPANY OF PEWTERERS OF THE CITY OF LONDON, BASED UPON THEIR OWN RECORDS. By Charles Welch. 2 Vols. (Blades, East and Blades.)

THE first and obvious thing that strikes the reader taking up these volumes is the beauty of their type and illustrations. We have never seen finer reproductions in colour of old illuminated charters and documents. The next thing that comes home is the continuity of pewter in London's history. Down all the crowded centuries since 1348, this industrial thread is visible through the dense fabric of English life. Men have changed their clothes and their religion, but the honest pewter has kept its state in Rome. The pewterers, worthy men, have from the thirteenth year of Edward IV. been a recognised and chartered band of men, intent on making "pots, salt-cellars, equelettes, platters, and other things by good folks bespoken." They never had a motto of their own, but cheerfully shared the Brewers': "In God is all my Trust." We did not know that the alliance between beer and pewter was so absolute.

All the usual burdens of taxation, whether in money or blood, which fell on the old City companies were endured by the Pewterers. A store of armour was kept in the Hall in Lime Street for war service, and an armourer was employed to keep it in condition. The settling of internal disputes and the correction of misdemeanours occupied much time and produced many hundreds of records. That the Elizabethan pewterers contended with something of the vigour of men used to the hammer may be gathered from the rule made in 1558 that—no parson of the sayde fellowship shall interrupt one another in telling of his tale before the maister and wardens setting in their Courtes, or presume to speak in another man's tale till he hath tolde his tale to an end.

Sometimes a quarrel was too hot and serious to be settled domestically. Thus, in 1562 one Robert West complained bitterly of a man who had openly slandered him in Westminster Palace, pointing him out to the bystanders as a "false maker of measuer pottes; for where they should be a quart he makith them a pynt and a half, and goith abowt to deceyve you of yo^r drink." Both men appeared before the wardens, and it was resolved to refer their dispute to trial before the Lord Mayor. A more excellent way was adopted in a quarrel which temporarily disturbed the relations between Thomas Wansworth and John Boulting in 1572. They were ordered to invite each other to dinner, each invitation to include the guest's wife:— not omyttinge therein there good mother-in-lawe, and so to contynue thencfurthe lovers.

Here and there in the records the eye alights on the awful moment when "Othello's occupation's gone"—when a pewterer ceased, for his sins, to be a pewterer. One sentence runs: "Wherefore the sayde Ellis ys quyte dismayssed for occupying in the crafte of pewterers for ever."

On every page of these records some curious fact or word leaps to light. Thus in a seventeenth century list of vessels made in pewter we find such objects as children's beakⁿ, greate duble bells, greate sawcers, cawdle potts, longe hooped Winchester pints, and Great Coffin saultes. Very striking, too, is the unbroken list of masters and wardens of the company from 1450 to 1902. Chronological sequence, indeed, is the note of the book. Mr. Welch has been supplied so abundantly with material that he has found it best to arrange it in order of date, with a minimum of comment. Nor has he been able, within the space at his disposal, to bring his story up to a later date than 1760, in which year occurs the first mention of punch bowls. But the Pewterers can now see themselves as in a mirror of polished pewter.

Other New Books.

THE CHATELAINE OF VERGI. Translated by Alice Kemp-Welch. (Nutt. 2s. net.)

A PROSE version of the familiar thirteenth century romance, with an introduction by M. Brandin. M. Brandin writes: "At the Court of the Dukes of Burgundy, as well as that of the Count of Flanders, and amongst the entourage of Queen Margaret of Navarre, the dainty story of the Chatelaine of Vergi caused many tears to be shed. It made the hearts of many lords and ladies beat, and excited the pity of many a poet." The story has been referred to and used by many writers, from Froissart to M. Gaston Raynaud, whose text is reproduced at the end of this volume. The origin of the story is not of much importance, though we think that M. Brandin's reasons for rejecting M. Raynaud's theory that it deals with the scandal in which Hugo IV., Beatrice of Champagne and Laura of Lorraine are not sufficiently conclusive. However, the story is the thing, and a graceful and touching story it is. It tells of how a certain knight loved the Lady of Vergi, who made it a condition, that if he should ever discover their love to another, that love should cease. Then comes in the lady of the Duke "who ruled in Burgundy," with a plot to ruin the Knight who declined her advances. The catastrophe is quite simple and, in the spirit of the time, inevitable. The ending in this English rendering is thus summed up:—

Ah, God! All the distress and trouble of the Knight came to him because he so mischanced as to make known that which he ought to have kept secret, and which his Love had forbidden him to speak of so long as he would have her love.

Miss Kemp-Welch's version is on the whole poetical and simple; she does not strive too assiduously after effect, though now and then she falls into rather unhappy phrases. But we are glad to have so pleasant a translation of so delightful a story.

THE LAST DAYS OF GREAT MEN: CROMWELL, NAPOLEON, MAHOMET. By W. Quartermaine East. (Sampson Low. 6s. net.)

MR. EAST has at least the virtue of modesty. He does not claim to have made any new discoveries concerning these three great men, he merely claims that his studies are "inspired by a genuine love of their subject, and though falling far short of what the writer could desire, may yet throw fresh light on the lives and characters of these remarkable men." Mr. East is a frank hero worshipper, with the hero worshipper's limitations. The main object of his essay on Cromwell is to prove Cromwell's sincerity as a Christian: a question too metaphysical for proof at this time of day. The author's general attitude in the matter of the Civil War may be judged by this comment concerning Charles I.'s execution: "An act of justice had to be done, the feelings of an outraged nation had to be liquidated." We have never been able to discover how the feelings of an outraged nation were "liquidated" by that piece of unnecessary folly: the nation, indeed, was very little concerned in it. We cannot enter fully into Mr. East's estimate of Napoleon and Mahomet; his enthusiasm we respect, his conclusions, to say the least, are open to grave dispute. But the volume has distinct interest, though it has not much literary distinction. There is included in it a translation of the Diary of Napoleon's Journey from Smorgoni to Paris.

IN THE LAND OF THE BLACK MOUNTAIN. By R. Wyon and C. Prance. (Methuen.)

A QUARTER of a century ago the travellers who had visited Montenegro might have been counted on the fingers, and though nowadays Montenegro is becoming better known, it is too far off and too difficult of access to be really one of the holiday places of Europe. Messrs. Wyon and Prance did not content themselves with merely visiting the capital, Cettigne, but penetrated into the mountains, to Kolashin, Moraca, Ostrog, and Niksic, where the old life of these primitive mountaineers is to be seen in all its simplicity. Like most men who go to Montenegro, but do not push on to the interior of Albania, the writers became thoroughly Slav in their sympathies, and look at all questions with Montenegrin eyes. But that the Montenegrins are not exactly easy neighbours to get on with may be judged from the following conversation which took place when the travellers visited the prison in Cettigne. Mr. Wyon asked what most of the prisoners had done, and received the reply: "Oh, they have mostly quarrelled among themselves. They are not criminals. We have very few thieves and robbers in Montenegro. This youth," went on our informant, pointing to a young man with a pleasant face, and (sic) who grinned with joy as he noticed the attention with which we favoured him, "has a ten years' sentence for quarrelling." "But quarrelling," we repeated, "is it punishable to quarrel?" "Yes, too many lives are lost," was the laconic reply. "Oh," we exclaimed, a light breaking in upon us, "you mean murder. They are all murderers?" "We have no murderers," came the indignant response. "Our land is as safe from murder as any other in the world. No one kills to rob or steal in Montenegro. But we just quarrel among ourselves. We are hot-blooded, and shoot quickly, that is all." The book is capably illustrated with photographs taken by the authors.

A useful little pamphlet reaches us from Messrs. Limpus Baker called "The Fraud of the Label." The object of the publication needs no explanation; it simply warns buyers against the substitution by dishonest tradesmen of inferior goods for those which are asked for. The imitation of labels by unscrupulous manufacturers has long been a grievance with which the law does not yet adequately deal.

The third and fourth volumes of the "Woman's Library" (Chapman and Hall) consist of "Nursery and Sick Room" and "Some Arts and Crafts." In the former the "Ethical Training of Children" is discussed by Lady Isabel Margesson, while the "Practical Care of Children" and "Nursing in and out of Hospital" are dealt with by Dr. Ethel Lamport and Miss H. F. Gethen. The subjects are treated practically and clearly. "Some Arts and Crafts" contains six sections, each treated by a different writer.

Fiction.

Mr. Moore's Ireland.

THE UNTILLED FIELD. By George Moore. (Unwin. 6s.)

IRELAND, as seen by Mr. George Moore, is, it seems to us, not so much an "untilled field" as a field incapable of crop on account of the huge weight of ecclesiastical masonry with which it is encumbered. That impression of a people "who live in a dreamy submissiveness," which we recorded in reviewing (2 August 1902) this volume in Irish containing six of the tales in the present publication, is only enhanced by reading Mr. Moore at greater length in our own tongue. Against this submissiveness we have the logic of facts driven home with calm force, if we may speak of driving in connection with a book that is for the most part drawn. The facts we get are, that the priest is a killjoy in Ireland, a menace to a meagre population, and an absorber to a startling degree of the industry and wealth of the land. In the end our ears are full of two priests arguing that "bad statues were more likely to excite devotional feelings than good ones, bad statues being further removed from perilous Nature," while our eyes are riveted on three Irishmen—"one seeking a country with a future, one seeking a country with a past, and one thinking of going back to a country without past or future."

The book, as now rounded off, considerably strengthens our regard for Mr. Moore as a creative artist. It is so frankly and unlaboriously Irish that it should pass as a genuine product of the soil. The stories are nearly all memorable, though perhaps none is quite so good as the story of Biddy and the church-window, from which we have already quoted. Our quotation, compared with the corresponding passage on page 103 of Mr. Unwin's volume, shows that Mr. Moore has been as busy as usual in recasting his thought. Formerly, if Mr. O'Sullivan (from whom we translated) was to be trusted, the "chickens" broke in anonymously upon Biddy's meditations about her Virgin's cloaks. The chickens are now Minorcas, Buff Orpingtons, and Plymouth Rocks! "Let knowledge grow from more to more."

Perhaps the best of the new stories is "A Play-House in the Waste." Here the priest, against whom, as an individual, Mr. Moore displays little or no animus, has had an inspiration for the enlivening of his peasant flock. "The prettiest girl in all the parish was to play Good Deeds." It was a parish of hovels with green water in front of each, and the bailiff for bogie-man. Its one bastard had been strangled by the indignant grandmother: it was not a place likely to develop Mænads on the strength of a mystery-play. But a storm came and punished the fabric of the theatre before any performance had been given in it, and the priest, half seeing the hand of God in the accident, discontinued his enterprise, and knitted to pass the time, because "there wasn't a woman in the parish that could turn a heel properly," and because "if one is absorbed in a book, one experiences a certain reluctance in putting it aside."

There is less in "The Untilled Field" of that sagacious sensuality which has heretofore given a rather waxen complexion to Mr. Moore's art. One meets it here, it is true, in a certain chilly isolation, as of the leg on a Manx coat of arms (if we may borrow a simile from Robert Buchanan), but the book presents several women with sympathy, and one even with spiritual admiration. The priest-ridden woman of fortune, whose religious instinct separates her from her husband, whom she at once loves and emancipates, is a touching embodiment of an ideal which every really selfish man of brains creates when he is fast asleep. But there must be no suspicion of satire in our concluding sentence, which recommends all who have a taste for the significant in literary art to read Mr. Moore's admirable volume.

PARK LANE. By Percy White. (Constable. 6s.)

SEMI-SOCIETY. By Frank Richardson. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

MR. PERCY WHITE and Mr. Frank Richardson belong to that class of novelists best described by the epithet Entertaining. They write stories that the lazy man may take up after dinner, and finish by midnight, conscious as he lights his candle that he has spent a pleasant, self-forgetful evening, and made the acquaintance of certain men and women, amusing enough, and about as near to his own life as the strangers he meets in a railway carriage. We have no intention of decrying such novels. We read them, we enjoy them, and we are well aware that a deal of intelligence and observation go to the making of them, as well as that mixture of humour and cynicism that the man of the world acquires in his journey through life. But what has criticism to say to such books, except that they are entertaining and readable, and quite near enough to human nature to be credible.

Of these two amusement providers Mr. Richardson is the fresher: his characters are bitten a little more deeply into the plate, and the action of his story is brisker. Compared with "Mr. Bailey-Martin" and "The West-End," Mr. White's new story flags just a little. The elderly bachelor, "a quiet man, successful rather as a philosophic listener than an amusing talker," who tells the story, is a little too much inclined to be prolix, and his digressions verge too near the commonplace; but it a good enough yarn about a successful business man who merged into a company promoter, with a house in Park Lane; of a lady's maid who became Lady Oxley, and on that altitude behaved beautifully. But Mr. White must beware of dullness, the unpardonable sin of the novel of Entertainment.

Mr. Richardson's story of "Semi-Society" is never dull. It is melodramatic, often epigrammatic, occasionally witty, and not in the least edifying. In all the characters there are sparks of life, particularly in the Jew financier, and his pretty fairy-like wife who takes morphia to assuage the pangs of love aroused in her bosom by the hero, a masterful man, who at the beginning of the story has just emerged from prison. This man, Vincent Skrene, is no ordinary gaol-bird: essentially he is the Ouidaesque hero, reincarnated into a world of fashionable restaurants and mammon worship. Mr. Richardson has set out boldly, with considerable equipment, to amuse the idle hours of our busy days, and we see no reason why he should not find his journey pleasant and profitable. He knows well enough that problems and psychology are not his métier. Let him continue to be entertaining, and we are quite agreeable that he should produce and multiply.

GEORGE GORING'S DAUGHTERS. By M. E. Carr. (Smith Elder. 6s.)

THIS is a singularly dull book. It is dull in its conception, and dull in the way it is carried out; indeed, it is difficult to see why anybody took the trouble to write so very many words without making sure first of having something to write about. The opening chapters are the least uninteresting in the book, for there is no reason why they should not lead to something later on; and if we quibble at the obvious influence of the Brontës in Miss Carr's descriptions of the two girls in their lonely moorland home, it is only because we have not gone far enough into the book to realize how much more readable it is when it reminds us of some one else's book than when it is only like itself. The quotation from "Villette" on the title page—"Life is still life, whatever its pangs"—seems to promise a human drama of some sort, though this kind of quotation when torn from its context really does not mean very much; but the human drama, as played by three women and one man, never thrills us for an instant, and finally fizzles out in a sentimental effusion that lingers over many pages. There is one moment in the book when we expect an interesting development: it is when the sisters, having reached the age of twenty and twenty-two, go to school for the first time, and are thrown among ordinary schoolgirls who have had an ordinary up-bringing. But the situation, original though it is, is slurred over in a single chapter; and that chapter is as lifeless as the rest. If "George Goring's Daughters" could be judged as an immature work, we should say that it contained promise; for imitativeness is always a promising fault in a beginner, and the dullness that is produced by a conscientious avoidance of sensationalism is not wholly to be condemned in a young writer. But Miss Carr is not a beginner, and we suppose her work ranks as finished work. As such, we cannot possibly praise it.

HE FOR GOD ONLY. By Kathleen Caffyn. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

THE title is somewhat obscure and suggests a novel of a sombre religious disposition. It turns out to be, on the contrary, if anything, a plea on the side of worldliness and a certain amount of earthly enjoyment. There is a good deal of idealism in the story. Human nature is rather played with for the purpose of accentuating its attractive and adaptable qualities. Circumstances also are freely twisted in order to heighten the picturesque side of the situations. In reading it is necessary to realize that neither the saints nor the sinners are the ordinary flesh and blood creatures of genuine existence. Those of real life are different—less persuasive—less effectual, as a rule, in fact, considerably less dramatic and convenient.

At the same time Mrs. Caffyn's new novel has distinct charm. In spite of the conviction that the authoress is playing fast and loose with the unfortunate limitations of personality, all her characters hold attention. More or less they all possess—except the saintly George—the elements of fascination. The impossible looking Rebecca, the delightful villain Jaspas, the cynic Heron, and especially the ardent little creature Joan, seize a temporary attention. The book could be shortened with benefit, but even the minor character sketches are clearly outlined, and in the case of Mrs. Worrall suggest a faint suspicion of humour. The style is good, with a grace of phrasing and a discretion in the choice of adjectives, that makes it a welcome change from the average slipshod novel. Mrs. Caffyn's danger is a little tendency to affectation.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE MACHINATIONS OF JANET. BY SARAH TYTLER.

A domestic novel. Janet was an orphan of humble origin, who unexpectedly came into a fortune. Her machinations consist of kindly endeavours to be useful to her less fortunate neighbours in spite of the embarrassments of her wealth. An unpretentious and carefully written story, distinguished by unusual simplicity of narration. (Long. 6s.)

HIS HEART'S DESIRE.

BY KATHERINE S. MACQUOID.

An historical romance. The scene is laid in France in the seventeenth century, and the central figure is Richelieu, whom we first meet as a young man taking part in a brilliant cavalcade at a Parisian riding school. "I believe," says the author in a prefatory note, "the evolution of Richelieu's character from early youth will be new to most readers." The book is dedicated to Mr. Weyman, "master in historical fiction." (Hodder and Stoughton. 6s.)

THE PINCH OF PROSPERITY. BY HORACE ANNESLEY VACHELL.

"A study of some twisted lives." The book presents strongly contrasted scenes of poverty and riches, and is intended to point the moral, "The prosperity of fools shall destroy them." The hero is a cadet of the house of Wyndquest, who, declining through unsuccessful authorship and journalism, is at length found selling matches on Waterloo Bridge. Then he becomes a famous novelist. The story appeared serially under the title of "The House of Quest." (Murray. 6s.)

THE FLAME AND THE FLOOD. BY ROSAMOND LANGBRIDGE.

A new volume in "The First Novel Library." We first meet Susette in a theatre, where she makes the acquaintance of the musician. As he came on the stage "his presence was like a flame; its effulgence spread flickering over the sea of faces." And in the last chapter she is to choose between the love of this man, and the child of the man who is her husband. An ambitious study of passion in conflict with duty. The title comes from some lines by Mr. Yeats. (Unwin. 6s.)

THE GHOST.

BY MRS. CAMPBELL PRAED.

The story opens in the Australian Bush, and the plot turns on the authorship of a novel, the manuscript of which was presented to Adela by "a hanger-on at a shanty near the station," in the belief that she had inspired it. The scene changes to London, where Adela, hearing that the author has been "turned out of a public house to die of delirium tremens in the Bush," solves her pecuniary difficulties by publishing the novel as her own. Then in the plenitude of her success appears "The Ghost," with a claim upon the royalties. (Everett. 3s.6d.)

THE ABSURD REPENTANCE.

BY ST. JOHN LUCAS.

Another story about a novel and its author. The action passes in the Cotswolds, where we find a Bohemian artist, a curate, the lord of the manor, and the anonymous author, who, while on a walking tour, is detained in the village by a storm. The conversation of these young men is in the scintillating manner. Max confesses that he is wet,—"I am a male Niobe, a tear on the cheek of eternity Take me away and wrap me tenderly in soft apparel,"—and he quotes the Odyssey in the original Greek. There is much of this, and some love. (Arnold. 6s.)

THE PAVILIONS OF LOVE.

BY MILDRED SHENSTONE.

A curious and rather formless story alternating between love and the supernatural. In the Prologue we make the acquaintance of two young men at Rackstraw Court who had been friends at Oxford. "'My mother has become an Esoteric Buddhist,' said Jack savagely. 'I told you that matters on this plane no longer affect her!'"—and the rest is a series of romantic adventures ending on a note of tragedy. (Arnold. 6s.)

We have also received "A Girl Soldier" by Kathleen P. Emmett (White) and "William de Winton" by Rev. A. Charles Highton (Drane).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/8
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue	/5

Ancient Tragedy in English Verse.

QUITE recently Sir Charles Dilke, in the course of a speech, referred to the persistent influence of Greek thought upon modern civilisation. In some respects, however, we appear to be always and hopelessly antagonistic to the Greek conception of life. "Few things in the history of speculation," says Sir Henry Maine in his "Ancient Law," "are more impressive than the fact that no Greek-speaking people has ever felt itself seriously perplexed by the great question of Free-will and Necessity." And because of this "it does not seem an irrelevant suggestion" that the Greeks never "showed the smallest capacity for producing a philosophy of law." None the less it was the Greek, as Sir Henry Maine himself points out, who, from a very early period in his history, evolved the idea of an inherited curse. This inheritance was not one of punishment, but rather of fresh offence evoking its own punishment, so that "the responsibility of the family was reconciled with the newer phase of thought which limited the consequences of crime to the person of the actual delinquent." This, indeed, was the Greek notion of Necessity, and nowhere is it more forcibly expressed than in the treatment of the legends which grouped themselves around the house of Pelops.

In his masterly introduction to "The Electra," Sir Richard Jebb has outlined the development of the Pelopid tradition. Briefly, in the "Iliad" there is no ancestral curse attached to the descendants of Atreus. It is in the "Odyssey" that the hint of fate is first suggested, when it is held in the council of the gods that Ægisthus has acted "beyond his destiny," and that punishment is due to him from Orestes, son of Agamemnon. Later on the idea of the inherited curse becomes definite, and Clytæmnestra, and not Ægisthus, is represented as the chief criminal. At this stage, too, the avenging furies are introduced. Pindar throws into the already complicated myth the idea that Clytæmnestra's crime is prompted by revenge for Iphigeneia's sacrifice at Aulis. The story commenced with a son's just vengeance on his father's murderer, but it was developed until it became a motif for the most profound drama. Here Æschylus takes up the theme and weaves it into a trilogy in which the individual destiny is finally subordinate to the supreme necessity, the higher law of Zeus. Sophocles, on the other hand, reverts to the simple Homeric legend, and for him there is no balancing of motives, no analysis of the greater and lesser guilt. For him Orestes stands as the just performer of a just action. With Euripides the tragic legend enters into contact with common life.

Elsewhere, in his introduction to "Œdipus Tyrannus," Sir Richard Jebb traces the modern treatment of the Sophoclean Œdipus from Corneille to Voltaire, showing the overwhelming modern tendency to depart from the simplicity of the central Greek notions: "the irresistible power of destiny, and the sacredness of the primary natural ties, as measured by the horror of an unconscious sin against it." The fascination of these two ideas is witnessed by continual efforts to reproduce them in modern poetry, and at the same time to preserve the ancient form. The very fact that these dramatists one and all depart from the spirit proves the permanent hold which the Greek idea of form has, to a certain extent, always preserved upon the modern mind. This has accounted for what we like to call the "pseudo-classicism" of the French stage, and it explains why Milton originally intended that "Paradise Lost" should have the outward appearance of the "Samson Agonistes." That play, indeed, is consciously Greek in form, and obeys in all outward respects, not excepting—as Prof. Butcher has pointed out—the Æschylean conception of suffering in place of action. But how different is the spirit! Let us glance at one passage, the chorus commencing at line 1268 and ending at line 1307. In the first eighteen lines we have an Hebraic psalm, then come ten lines which might have been translated almost word for word from Euripides, while the chorus closes with all the outward objectivity which belonged to the Greek looker-on, blended with the Hebraic hint of prophecy.

Again, how impossible it was for Voltaire to restore a lost drama of Euripides, in spite of all his calculated frigidity and the difficult suppression of romantic love. Imagine the proverbial:—

Le premier qui fut roi fut un soldat heureux;
Qui sert bien son pays n'a pas besoin d'aïeux, spoken through a tragic mask. We moderns are occasionally haunted by a sensation that there is a certain truth in the saying that the ancients alone have been artists.

In "La Faustin" Edmond de Goncourt admirably interprets this involuntary respect when he brings the great French actress to M. Athanassiadis to learn from Greek lips the heart of Phædra before she interprets Phædre. For, Athanassiadis, modern as he is, has preserved the secret of the ancient source:—

Et Athanassiadis, arrivé à l'accusation posthume de Phèdre contre son beau-fils, se mettait à expliquer aux deux femmes, avec une intelligence qui surprit la Faustin, cette figure de fatalité bien autrement grande, bien autrement humaine, bien autrement nature dans son ressentiment amoureux, que la femme conventionnelle et théâtralement sympathique, peinte par le poète de la cour de Louis XIV.

But to return to the legend of Pelops. Prof. Tyrrell, in his preface to Mr. Arnold Graves's "Clytæmnestra" (Longmans), writes:—

I have already pointed to the fact that he deals with the story from the standpoint of the modern dramatist. By this, I do not mean to suggest that he has followed the example of Voltaire, Alfieri, or Thompson, and made his characters modern, complex, neurotic, hysterical. On the contrary, he has kept them simple, strong, restrained, archaic.

These words written by a scholar who is impregnated with the spirit of Greek tragedy are conclusive evidence that Mr. Graves's drama is a genuine exception to what we have ventured to call the overwhelming modern tendency. This fact, apart from all other literary considerations, makes this drama worthy of serious study.

To Prof. Tyrrell the note of Greek tragedy is near and actual, but the general reader is not easily convinced of the illusion of Hellas. How far is this modern interpretation likely to produce for him the lost charm, so cold, so inexplicably remote from the gush and strain of modern sentiment? On the surface he will recognise some obvious differentiations from Greek tragedy. He will recognise that the chorus is neither the expression of "ideal" nor average opinion, nor yet merely ornate and detached from the action. He will recognise that the unities of time and place are not observed, and that one is irresistibly reminded of a double motif of action in following the fortunes of Electra. He will see at work the psychology of the human will rather than the overhanging necessity of Zeus. These things, apart altogether from variations from any Greek legend and the introduction of fresh characters, the general reader will recognise. But he will also see that a trilogy has been treated as an organic whole, and that the unities have been observed in regard to each subordinate part. Moreover, he will recognise a genuine tendency towards the acceptance of certain theories, essentially Greek. He will see a tendency towards avoiding violence before the curtain, the use of the messenger, and above all the haunting repetition of the actual words of the soothsayer. These things are so, and if in deference to modern taste the author has in this or that particular departed from the ancient legend, he has none the less infused into English verse something of the atmosphere of Greek tragedy. Here is a passage in which Cassandra describes the murder of Agamemnon:—

He casts aside
His coat of mail, and drops his trusty sword.
She takes a goblet, fills it full with wine,
He takes it from her hand, and drains the bowl,
And lays him down to rest. [Pauses.] See how his lids
Already droop, half closed; his limbs relax;
She wraps a robe around him, croons a stave
To soothe the slumberer; then rises soft,
Seizes a twisted net, and in its toils
Makes fast the drowsing victim to the altar. [Pauses.]
All is made ready for the sacrifice.
The axe is raised: now through the yielding air
The swift steel flashes in its lightning sweep.

Now, it is submitted that this is not at all a metrical adaptation, but rather a genuine interpretation, after the Greek manner, of Greek thought.

Above all, Mr. Graves has the supreme fidelity of simplicity, the simplicity of the dignified but immediate expression of the immediate emotion which drew from Edipus, as he listened to the herdsman's tale, that appalling utterance of despair; the simplicity which caused that same Edipus, no longer "Tyrannus," to cry out to "the all-seeing Eumenides": "Pity this poor wraith of Edipus—for verily 'tis the man of old no more." This simplicity is the keynote to swiftness of action, and Mr. Graves has caught something of its spirit. The deepest note in Greek tragedy on its human side is the farewell to light. From the royal appeal of Antigone, as she prepares to face the terrible darkness, to the mournful acquiescence of Polyxena awaiting a swifter death, there is always the infinite regret at leaving the sunlight. This note, also, Mr. Graves has caught, and there is a genuine and restrained dignity in the passage commencing "Good-bye, dear Argos," which Electra utters, already, as she imagines, upon the threshold of death.

Greek tragedy may almost be considered as the touchstone of modern nations so inevitably do they read their own racial characteristics into its severe harmony. And because he has kept his characters "simple, strong, restrained, archaic," Mr. Graves's work is a profoundly interesting anomaly.

A Bewildered Poet.

LITERATURE has had many spectres, and by this we mean not men who had outlived the common meed of their fame, but rather men who had exhausted their own emotions. Of these spectres Alfred de Musset was perhaps the most significant, because he was the most pitied and the most loved. But de Musset lived his hour, and could always remember that once the wine of life had tasted sweet, that once the rhythm of hope and youth had rung true, that once a woman's smile had reflected destiny. But there are other spectres to whom there is no consolation, for whom there is no appeal from the stale verdict of the world. And of these condemned ones the most pathetic figure of all is James Clarence Mangan, the centenary of whose birth is being celebrated this month.

Others have turned consciously aside from the mental grooves of their generation, and sought from art not the healing consolation which should be common to all, but rather a personal enjoyment, exclusive, exotic, dangerous. Such were Charles Baudelaire and Edgar Allen Poe. But there is no just parallel between either of these and the unfortunate Irish poet. For each of these, after his manner, obtained the reward of his sacrifice. The Frenchman who had exchanged, as it were, his store of human life blood for strange artistic vibrations, fashioned from these poisoned dreams masterpieces of form, permanent manifestations of what he had purchased from art at the expense of life. The American, abandoning the main currents of the national life around him, none the less drew, from his very loneliness, his suffering, his despair, the joy of the artist. Neither of these could ever have regretted their strange barter. Such as they were, in spite of external circumstances, these men were masters of their destinies and did the thing they willed in the way they willed. But it was quite otherwise with Mangan.

The Irish poet was not at all a rebel in any sense of the word. He came into the world incongruous and alien, and he lived and died incongruous and alien. Sensitive, imaginative, beautiful, he was the son of a Dublin grocer. Then, after a few years of study under an erudite Irish priest, necessity turned him into a bread-winner for his family. He worked at a scrivener's for seven and at an attorney's for three years. They were long years for Mangan. They were long years and bitter years, for his fellow-clerks knew well that this strange figure was such as no other clerk had ever been or could ever be. And their subtle intelligences resented the incongruity, and for ten years it was driven home to Mangan that it is a hard world for those who do not fit into the settled niches. But Mangan never fitted in, could not fit in after any fashion. It was as though one were to initiate the Faun of Praxiteles into the mysteries of Wall Street, this moulding of a dreamer to the mental standpoint of a scrivener's office. It may have been discipline in realities, but Mangan was incapable of learning from realities—that was the secret of his temperament. But he was very sensitive, and between them all they knew well how to handle him: he was their butt for ten difficult years. Mangan came out of it all more confused by actuality than ever. It was still necessary, apparently, to remain in this odd world, and so, after trying two or three other phases of employment, he took definitely to journalism. His past, incidentally, had not driven him mad, but it had driven him to the hopeless relief of alcohol. Mangan the poet-dreamer, who sought vaguely from life the fleeting illusions of a lost poetry, had become a "case" for well-meaning philanthropists. It was certainly an odd world, but they never drove him mad—he died at forty-six.

Mangan was probably no more a journalist in the accepted sense than he had been an attorney's clerk. But even he had at one time some glimpses of the actual wonder of life. We need not recall the poor faded romance of the lady who had once the power to woo Mangan from his dreams. It is enough to say that the memory of this futile little tragedy blended easily with such sombre impressions as had been stamped upon the poet's heart.

As a man he seems to have been not so much miserable as dazed. He could not suffer from life quite as his companions intended that he should suffer, because he was bewildered. But sometimes the poet in him, so much greater than the man, burst out. Then he spoke as one who had peered into the depths of life. But these were only glimpses, for Mangan the poet, as well as the man, was baffled by reality.

He adhered always with curious tenacity to the two sources of his inspiration. Everybody knows that he "translated" foreign languages of which he was completely ignorant, but he did learn German, and he did appreciate that detachment from actuality which is to be obtained from German philosophy. That, together with the legends of the past—Eastern and Celtic—was the woof out of which Mangan's fantasies were woven.

It is well that we should remember him, for he was a poet, and a poet, moreover, who, not consciously like Baudelaire and Poe, was yet true to the divine suffering within him. This was a suffering of which attorneys' clerks and well-meaning philanthropists never dreamed. And he gave it out in song, too bewildered to recognise that the artist's fire and the poet's rapture were really his. Pathetically noble in an ignoble setting, revealing the dreams of the centuries without interpreting his own, giving gold and having, as it were, alms thrust upon him, he stands for ever a symbolic figure of his race.

Swift's Famous Joke.

THE "Critical Essays and Literary Fragments" which Messrs. Constable have reprinted, in an arranged and chronological form, from Mr. Arber's well-known "English Garner," present a very interesting bird's-eye view of the lanes and alleys in English prose, from the sixteenth to the end of the eighteenth century. They are taken from the pamphlets—the journalism of the past; and rescue for us all manner of curious and valuable writings long vanished from the public eye. Amidst such various riches, we are disposed to fasten on one series of pamphlets, which not only are from a great and "vanished hand," but preserve a once celebrated jest, unknown to the present day.

Did the volume contain nothing but the Partridge pamphlets, it would be justified, for they are the record of the most whimsical and amusing hoax ever perpetrated. To take the full flavour of it, let us conceive that Mr. Stead (for example) were the victim; and that Mr. G. B. Shaw, not content with predicting and afterwards publishing an account of his death, proceeded earnestly to demonstrate to Mr. Stead that he was under a delusion in imagining himself to be alive. That is a fair image of Swift's famous joke. Partridge played helplessly into Swift's hands. Partridge, let us add, resembled Mr. Stead only in his public connection with occult matters. He was a well-known maker of almanacs, after the fashion of Old Moore, Zadkiel, and other modern prophets. Swift, under the name of Isaac Bickerstaff, published an ironical attack on these men; in which he put forth a string of predictions on his own account. One prediction was the death of the Duke of Noailles; but the first was the death of the prophet Partridge himself, which was fixed for eleven at night on the 29th of March, 1708. The date past, out came a letter from a Revenue Officer to a Noble Lord, giving a minute account of Partridge's death—in the realistic style which Defoe afterwards made his own. Partridge engaged a writer to defend him; but the writer wickedly upheld the jest, and Partridge put forth the defence in all good faith. The Portuguese Inquisition actually burned the pamphlet predicting the Duke of Noailles' death; and our own Stationers' Hall, not to be behindhand, struck Partridge's name off the rolls, as defunct. Verses on his death, written by Swift, were hawked through the street, tradesmen called to arrange for his funeral. Poor bewildered Partridge published in his almanack a solemn declaration that he was still alive, and as well as ever he was in his life: "as I was also at that 29th of March"—the date of his alleged death. Up to this point Swift's pamphlets, apart from the hoax itself, are not very humorous. But now he saw his chance, and joyously seized it. Partridge had called him (or the supposed Bickerstaff) "fool," "villain," and "impudent fellow," for asserting Partridge to be dead, whereas he was alive. Swift declares these very improper terms to apply to anyone, "only for differing from him in a point merely speculative." "A point merely speculative" is delicious; and one feels that Swift has at last recovered his trick of fence, is "in form," as we should say. So it proves, throughout this final pamphlet. He contends to Partridge's face that he is mistaken in supposing himself to be alive. And dealing with the poor astrologer's asseveration that the prediction of his death has not come true, Swift rejoins—with delightful effrontery—that Partridge himself is the only person to maintain this!

He has been indeed so wise as to make no objection against the truth of my predictions, except in one single point, relating to himself. And to demonstrate how much men are blinded by their own partiality, I do solemnly assure the reader, that he is the only person from whom I ever heard that objection offered! which consideration alone, I think, will take off its weight.

With my utmost endeavours, I have not been able to trace above two objections ever made against the truth of my last year's Predictions. The first was of a Frenchman, who was pleased to publish to the world, that the Cardinal de Noailles was still alive, notwithstanding the pretended prophecy of Monsieur Bickerstaffe. But how far a Frenchman, a Papist, and an enemy, is to be believed, in his own cause, against an English Protestant, who is true to the Government, I shall leave to the candid and impartial reader.

The other objection is the unhappy occasion of this discourse, and relateth to an article in my Predictions, which foretold the death of Mr. Partridge to happen on March 29th, 1708. This, he is pleased to contradict absolutely, in the Almanack he has published for the present year. . . . In that work, he very roundly asserts that he is not only now alive, but was likewise alive upon that very 29th of March, when I had foretold he should die. This is the subject of the present controversy between us, which I design to handle with all brevity, perspicuity, and calmness. In this dispute I am sensible the eyes, not only of England, but of all Europe will be upon us: and the Learned in every country will, I doubt not, take part on that side where they find most appearance of truth and reason. Without entering into criticisms of Chronology about the hour of his death, I shall only prove that Mr. Partridge is not alive.

Even at this distance of time, one must lay down the book and laugh. Swift then proceeds gravely to advance arguments worthy of the dispute:—

My first argument is thus. Above a thousand Gentlemen having bought his Almanack for this year, merely to find what he said against me: at every line they read, they would lift up their eyes, and cry out, between rage and laughter, They were sure, no man alive ever wrote such stuff as this! Neither did I ever hear that opinion disputed. So that Mr. Partridge lieth under a dilemma, either of disowning his Almanack, or allowing himself to be no man alive.

Death is defined by all philosophers a separation of the soul and body. Now it is certain that the poor woman [Mrs. Partridge], who has best reason to know, has gone about for some time to every alley in the neighbourhood, and swore to her gossips that her husband had neither life nor soul in him. Therefore, if an uninformed carcass walks still about, and is pleased to call itself Partridge, Mr. Bickerstaff doth not think himself any way answerable for that! Neither had the said carcass any right to beat the poor boy who happened to pass by in the street, crying, A full and true account of Dr. Partridge's death, &c.

Secondly, Mr. Partridge pretendeth to tell fortunes and recover stolen goods, which all the parish says he must do by conversing with the Devil and other evil spirits: and no wise man will ever allow, he could converse personally with either, until after he was dead.

Thirdly, I will plainly prove him to be dead out of his own Almanack for this year; and from the very passage which he produceth to make us think him alive. He there sayeth, He is not only now alive, but was also alive upon that very 29th of March, which I foretold he should die on. By this, he declareth his opinion a man may be alive now, who was not alive a twelvemonth ago. And indeed, here lies the sophistry of his argument. He dareth not assert, he was alive ever since the 29th of March! but that he is now alive, and was so on that day. I grant the latter, for he did not die until night, as appeareth in a printed account of his death, in a Letter to a Lord; and whether he be since revived, I leave the world to judge! This indeed is perfect cavilling, and I am ashamed to dwell any longer upon it.

There is one objection against Mr. Partridge's death, which I have sometimes met with . . . that he continueth to write Almanacks. But this is no more than what is common to all of that profession. Gadbury, Poor Robin, Dove, Wing, and several others, do yearly publish their Almanacks, though several of them have been dead since before the Revolution.

It is the talent of our age and nation to turn things of the greatest importance into ridicule. When the end of the year had verified all my Predictions, out cometh Mr. Partridge's Almanack, disputing the point of his death. So that I am employed, like the General who was forced to kill his enemies twice over, whom a necromancer had raised to life.

All this is in Swift's true vein of profound seriousness in setting forth and sustaining the absurdest contentions, which yet have a perverse ingenuity irresistibly comic. Partridge's helpless rage, and the growing mirth of the town as the malicious effrontery of the plot unfolded, can readily be imagined, and are an integral part of the humour of the thing. Another effort in the ironic vein is Bishop Copleston's "Advice to a Young Reviewer." It is still in large measure applicable to our own day; for though the proportion of honest and intelligent reviewing has happily increased, the ignorant and dull reviewer, confident in the direct ratio of his ignorance, is always with us. But though clever, Copleston is not brilliant, and reads tamely after Swift. The best part of his skit is the mock-review of Milton's "L'Allegro"—a satire on the cheap word-catching criticism that still crops up at times. But further we may not be tempted to follow a book full of curious by-ways in literature.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

M. PIERRE LOTI's new book "L'Inde" is a superb tour de force. Here is an entire volume of description without a single incident, without wit or humour to brighten it, without even a lively page from first to last, and which is beautiful in its monotonous way. Do not try to read it at a sitting, and for this reason it gained by its fortnightly appearance in the "Revue des Deux Mondes," when each part, read separately, left the impression of a masterpiece. Loti's exquisite style in gaining maturity has added solidity to its charm. There are less lovely passages to quote, but a rarer harmony, and it is astonishing that a writer who has so abundantly abused description should continue it ever with an inexhaustible witchery of expression, an unwearied observation of nature, with all the reverie and delicate delight of youth. Whatever else may happen to M. Loti, it is evident he cannot grow old. To-day he writes: "The intimate charm of a new zone, into which I penetrate at the fall of day, resides for me in its delicate soil, somewhat dry, somewhat sandy, covered with a short, fine herbage as was the soil of the woods familiar to me in childhood. And as if to strengthen the illusion of my native country scenes, see the pathways traced by shepherds and their flocks; see these trees of slender sombre foliage, of grey fibres, like the green oaks of home; but for the big red lilies which afar, and further still, surprise my eye, it is quite homelike, the same pastoral calm, and the same melancholy of evening."

M. Loti's originality lies in the way exterior and audible things around him affect him. It is purely a question of temperament, for his imagination is slight, and he has not a grain of wit. His books of travel are nothing of a precise or instructive account of the lands and races he has known. They are records of the state of soul of M. Loti, of the particular bent of his sentimental attitude while voyaging in those far-off mysterious Eastern lands of his predilection. The state of his soul is varied in its monotony, for he is lastingly plunged in melancholy, and in contemplating nature, which is his chief mission in life, he can never disentangle his own individuality from the immense and eternal objects around him. But what surprising limpidity of vision! What an exquisite sense of atmosphere! Coming across the Indian Ocean outside the coast of Travancore, he writes charmingly: "I found myself in a solitude of sand amidst downs over which lingered the wavering rays of an enormous blood-hued sun ready to drop behind the horizon. A few scant palms, dishevelled and weather-stained, bent here and there in the same sense, having yielded as the trees of our coast do to the continued effort of the marine breeze. All this sand heaped up for centuries and centuries, all this prodigious crumbling of stones, madrepore, shells, all this pulverisation of myriad existences, went to announce the terrible neighbourhood. And then the great eternal voice made itself heard. And suddenly, at a bend of the road in those sandhills the moving infinite appeared."

Elsewhere the life of men is instinctively carried to the sea, here on the contrary they turn from it as from the void and from death. Here the sea is but the insuperable abyss, which serves for nought and terrifies. The sea is almost inaccessible, and no one ventures upon it. Along the unending line of breakers, along the unending line of sand, I see scarce other human trace than an old granite temple, rough and heavy, with defaced columns, half eaten away with spray and salt; it is there to conjure and quiet the devouring nothingness that imprisons Travancore and which, this evening calm, will, in a little while, as soon as the summer monsoon begins, break out in a season's fury."

The most impressive part of the book is that devoted to "Famished India." The sentiment of pity is almost as strong in Loti as the sentiment of nature. It is hardly an exaggeration to say that he revels in the one quite as much as in the other; but in the last part, "Towards Benares," he leads us out of almost immitigable misery into what he calls the "glory of morning" into the matchless magic and mystery of the East, and these pages are impregnated with all its enchantment and its charm. Dissatisfied with worn-out Christianity, Loti has gone to refresh his jaded spirit at the fount of mysticism and soothe his unquiet soul in the cradle of all religions. "From the depths of the plains where flows the old Ganges, from the depths of the miasmatic plain of mire and herbage misted still with the vapours of night, the eternal sun rises and encounters day after day for the past three thousand years, arresting its first rosy ray, the granite of Benares, the red pyramids, the golden points, the entire sacred town raised in amphitheatre as if to seize avidly the initial light and array itself in the glory of morning." Here he meets Mrs. Besant, who initiates him in the mysteries of Oriental wisdom, and he sits with the sages in the House of Silence, seeking to reach complete detachment from all earthly things. "I know this renouncement will pass, and that little by little, escaped from this sphere of influence, I shall return to life, but never as before. The new germ which has been deposited in my soul is destined to invade it, and will guide me back to Benares. And how pitiable and vain is revealed to me what was till now my life in this world: wild as I was about form and colour, passionately enamoured of terrestrial life, ravenous to seize all that is ephemeral, to retain all that passes!" "L'Inde" is a book full of pages of an indescribable beauty. H. L.

Impressions.

XXXII.—The Sage.

HE was Retired Leisure; and he, like the superannuated man, was to be met with in a trim garden. A low, white fencing, overgrown by a green creeper, divided his garden from the road, and I never saw him elsewhere than in his garden. I passed down the road twice a day, on my way to and from the station, and when he was not there, which was rarely, the savour of the walk went. Always was he either working with spade and trowel, or sitting in the porch gazing blandly at his vegetables and herbaceous borders. Fresh-complexioned, grey but hearty, this was a man at one with the world, and in harmony with his environment. Youth had gone, leaving no regrets. The future had no terror; by virtue of some interior wisdom, inherited or acquired, he was able to live happily in the present. Here, I said to myself, quoting Maeterlinck, has he built his refuge, "being a little weary; not disgusted, for the large aversions are unknown to the sage, but a little weary of interrogating men, whose answers to the only interesting questions one can put concerning nature and her veritable laws are far less simple than those that are given by animals and plants."

I reflected on the answers that this sage might win from his companions—from the row of symmetrical rose trees, each with its name inscribed on a flapping tag; the asparagus and beans; the lilac tree; the somnolent collie; the cat, black and ear-bitten; or the blackbird, wicker-caged. I contrasted the satisfactory answers he might receive with those I vainly tried to distill from books, "but evermore came out from the same door as in I went." Would it help him, as it had helped me for a morning, to believe in the truth of that maxim of Indian wisdom which affirms that "a man is born into the world which he has made"? The four walls of my chamber could not contain my thought; yet the air that blew above his rose trees, the rain that washed his creeper, did not tempt his thought from that tilled plot where flowers and vegetables groped into sentient life. What to this gardener, to this sage who had discovered the secret of living, profited such wisdom as this: "To be happy is only to have freed one's soul from the unrest of happiness"; or this: "To the soul that is slowly awakening all appears sacrifice"; or this: "To have known how to change the past into a few saddened smiles—is this not to master the future?"; or this: "Our thoughts and emotions are often but spray flung up from hidden tides that follow a moon no eye can see." He had his answer to all the riddles, present, past, and future.

This sage, who never gave me good-morning or good-night, seemed, in his calm detachment from the world, to be the tutelary genius of that grass-green valley. Often I thought of him through the vicissitudes and vexations of the day, and the thought brought peace. To him had come that wisdom of the world which is the wisdom of the ages. Shocks and chances passed him by: he had his garden.

One evening, when hardly a tree but had its small brown thrush filling the rain-washed air with melody, I came down the hill towards his garden, where from afar off I had spied his figure seated in the porch. It was a quiet evening: there were cloud mountains in the sky: the poplars stood straight and still, and from the monastery on the adjoining ridge floated the choric voices of the monks. It was the hour when we may have communications with each other without the intermediary of speech, and so when I came to his garden I leaned upon his gate and looked comprehendingly on his share in God's handiwork. Our eyes pursued the same direction, and presently he spoke, saying with gusto: "I do like to smell the beans cooking. I always leave the kitchen-door open."

Drama.

Dramatic Hedging.

"THE LITTLE COUNTESS" at the Avenue, although in itself by no means unentertaining, thanks mainly to the mimicry of Miss Annie Hughes, is perhaps of most interest as an object-lesson in the construction of a dramatic plot. It is a case of dramatic hedging. The whole intention hangs upon the last act. In this an irate husband pursues his wife to the chambers of the man whom he knows to have been her lover; and the fun comes from the ingenuity with which he is persuaded into the belief that she is not there, while as a matter of fact she is lying rolled up in a carpet in a corner of the room. There are hairbreadth 'scapes. A rosette, fallen from the fancy dress which the lady is wearing, nearly gives away the show. But by good fortune a precisely similar dress worn by her in earlier days is sentimentally preserved in a chest, and this is hastily mutilated and triumphantly produced in evidence. The position is further complicated by the fact that not only the wife but also the sister of the irate husband is in the chambers, and she also has to be manœuvred away without a recognition. The theme, you will observe, is a very ancient one. It recalls the fabliaux, Boccaccio, Chaucer. The capital example is of course Falstaff in his buck-basket. The joke lies in the blinding and befooling of the silly husband. This is precisely in the spirit of the fabliaux. To the unsophisticated audiences of the middle ages, it was not a matter of concern that the husband should be wronged. Such, indeed, was rather the preferable solution. But Mr. Bancroft had to present his play before an audience that was neither mediæval nor unsophisticated, and that, in particular, was wholly unable to disentangle its dramatic from its ethical sympathies. His problem was to preserve the ingenuity of the intrigue, and at the same time to keep the audience on the side of the lady in the carpet. To this end—and also to that of building up a four-act play upon a one-act motive—dramatic hedging became imperative. Otherwise Mr. Wakley might not, without some justice, have described the play as that unmentionable thing, a comédie rose. For the matter of that, even Shakespeare had to hedge. Falstaff must be fooled just as much as Ford, and Ford's own unreasonable jealousy must excuse his discomfiture. Three of Mr. Bancroft's four acts are devoted to proving that after all, in spite of the compromising situation in which she escapes being discovered, the Countess of Budleigh is a woman more sinned against than sinning. As Sadie Woodbine, Lady Budleigh had been a well-known singer and the mistress of Jack Scarlett. He had pensioned her off, but in Act I. she has heard of his wife's death, and is expecting him to return and propose to marry her. He does return, and proposes—something short of marriage. Passionate and piqued, Miss Woodbine accepts the coronet laid at her feet the same afternoon by Lord Budleigh. In Act II. Lady Budleigh is found in the somewhat uncongenial surroundings of Franklyn Hall. She has learnt to love her husband, but her frank and natural manners—in the first scene she throws a potato at a waiter—expose her to the snubbing and petty spite of her husband's aristocratic female relatives. Moreover, she is still persecuted by Mr. Jack Scarlett, who has succeeded in installing himself in the house in Lord Budleigh's absence. Fortunately Mr. Scarlett is comprehensive in his attachments, and is at the same time carrying on a subsidiary intrigue with the insolent and immaculate Lady Hermione Browne. Herein Lady Budleigh discerns an excellent opportunity for paying off old scores against her sister-in-law. She very ingeniously succeeds in ascertaining that an appointment has been made at Mr. Scarlett's flat at an unreasonably late hour after a fancy-dress ball, and determines to follow Lady Hermione there and expose her. This was indiscreet, for in the meantime Lord Budleigh returns home, hears such gossip as his family have collected about his wife, and learns accidentally for the first time that she has been Scarlett's mistress. Previously he had only known, from her own lips, that she had been somebody's mistress. He also sets off for Scarlett's flat, intending to break off the friendship between them, and arrives just as the ladies are engaged in a row royal, while Scarlett has discreetly retired to smoke a cigarette in the courtyard. Thus the famous scene is introduced.

This arrangement appears fully to satisfy the susceptibilities of the audience. Lady Budleigh means her husband no wrong, and therefore we are glad that she is not discovered in the carpet. It is true that she has come to the flat with the somewhat spiteful intention of bringing another woman, whose correspondence she has surreptitiously opened, to her knees. But this does not offend our susceptibilities. Everything, dramatically speaking, is permitted to the woman who intends her husband no wrong, and the audience cleave to her through thick and thin. I must admit that my own sympathies were rather doubtful, but this was less because she had opened the letter than because of the extremely hideous scarlet Pierrot costume in which she had gone to the fancy dress ball. The merit of such a play naturally depends mainly upon its handling by author and actors. Miss Annie Hughes is extremely well worth seeing in a rosse part. Mr. Bancroft contributes some effective situations, of which the best is that in the first act, when Jack Scarlett fails to make his former mistress precisely the proposal which she expects from him. But Mr. Bancroft's conceptions of humour and of epigram are not mine, and he does not attain the verbal felicity that is essential to my private enjoyment of a modern comedy. It is natural that Lady Budleigh should talk slang; but why should she talk the chastened and, in fact, obsolete slang which you hear from proper little shop-girls in the Twopenny Tube? I do not believe that even her mother-in-law would have been shocked by it.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

The Royal Academy Re-Visited.

HAVING made a choice among the pictures at the Royal Academy last week, it may be as well to reassert that this heterogeneous collection is not representative of the best art of the country. One could mention the names of twenty painters, intriguing themselves quietly with art, but not pursuing her into the market-place, whose names on the beadroll of Burlington House are worthy to be filed. Most have ceased to submit pictures; some have never made the hazard; a few offer their works furtively; but nobody now, like Mr. Sickert in merrier days, announces by advertisement that he has had the honour of having a picture declined. Probably no corporate body has been so riddled with criticism as the Royal Academy, criticism which has culminated this year in Mr. MacColl's trenchant exposure of the administration of the Chantrey Bequest; and no corporate body is so popular with the public. Other picture exhibitions have their dwindling share of visitors: the Academy is always crowded. It is one of the few annual sights of London that the British public insists on seeing. Every morning for three months in the year the suburban trains shoot Royal Academy sightseers into London. The women always wear their brightest dresses: you cannot mistake them, and you can verify your opinion by the gleam of the blue catalogue they carry on their return journey. Art, in the form of the summer exhibition at Burlington House, is as popular as a football match. Its popularity increases every year, and shows no sign of waning. The exhibition, like musical comedies, newspaper competitions, and "Home Chat" suits the public: it is always in fashion, and the Royal Academy is the very worst place in London to look at pictures. Last Saturday afternoon you could not see the stairs for the people: they passed up at snail's pace, and in the rooms themselves the bright dresses of the women fought with the brighter colours of the pictures; the individual was pushed here and there, and could only approach a picture after a rude and dishevelled scrimmage. Such are the conditions under which we study an art which demands isolated repose and calm contemplation. What would be the feelings of a party of grave Dutchmen, of a past day, set down in this hurly-burly on a May afternoon? They painted life, direct and simple, low in key and grey in tone as life is for most of us—pictures on which the imagination can play. The majority of the Academy pictures stultify the imagination. Orgies of colour, wildly invented historical or mythical scenes, packed frame to frame, do not stimulate: they tire.

And yet the Royal Academy is an interesting place in which to spend an afternoon, especially with a loquacious painter as cicerone. A painter does not as a rule seek for unity in a picture (that is the province of the higher criticism), but, with roaming thumb, he will indicate pleasing passages in a picture in a rushing climax of appreciation. One such, an acquaintance, was unable, like myself, to discover any unknown painter of outstanding merit. The Academy is not the place for new reputations. The tyro is too timid to be himself: he paints something that will suit, something that will stand the rivalry of the typical, vivid summer exhibition picture. How the younger reputations start up and disappear! There was a time not long ago when the name of Mr. Somerscales was in everybody's mouth. He still exhibits. Mr. Dudley Hardy also still exhibits. Humourously philosophical, he shows two tiny pictures in the manner of Monticelli. Mr. Bramley has one portrait. Mr. Brangwyn, like a score of other artists whose names are honoured in the studios, and on the Continent, shows nothing.

In spite of such abstentions, and the modesty of certain painters, the critic is each year face to face with an enormous collection of pictures. How shall he treat them? Most of the works show capacity and intelligence, but almost all have been painted for exhibition, and the only way, apparently, to treat an exhibition picture is to describe it, enlarging upon the sentimental, emotional, or didactic "message" that it conveys to the imagination of the critic. Thus, in one journal, apropos of Mr. Collier's "The Prodigal Daughter," I read: "This Magda may return once again, worn, marred, in rags like the prodigal, her prototype—all her pride, all her rebellion beaten down, all her love of life trampled out. What then?" Another critic finds Mr. Goodwin's "The Gate of the Inferno" so "inexpressibly impressive," that he regrets it was not bought by the Chantrey trustees. "What next?" I can hear Mr. MacColl saying. A third has had the happy idea of forming an inner Academy from the larger one. These critics are all attached to the daily papers which, following their traditions, describe the pictures in detail, usually ending with a sigh, intended to be regretful, that they have not space to notice the water-colours and sculpture. The weekly journals apparently vie with each other as to which can mention the fewest number of pictures. One of them passes over all the established reputations and selects three small, obscure canvases for commendation. The numbers of these I pencilled on my shirt-cuff, and made a special discipleship journey to the exhibition on their account, but without the anticipated thrills. The critic of another weekly journal devotes his first article to trying to find out "the real cause which makes each annual exhibition so disappointing." I, having already discussed the collection as a whole, proposed to consider in this article the drawings, etchings, and sculpture. But there is not much to be said about the water-colours and etchings. Here, owing partly to the exigences of space, we are at a great disadvantage compared with the Salon, where one wanders through endless, twilight rooms on the ground floor, spending a day before colour-prints, lithographs, drawings, etchings, and engravings instinct with originality and vitality. At the Academy the patchwork quilt look of the walls given up to water-colours and black and white, the feeling of circumscription, and the humid odour of tea are against connoisseurship. One water-colour stands out from the rest—Mr. H. R. Oddy's brilliant study of "A Shearing: Duddon Dale."

The sculpture also suffers from want of space. You could drop our show into a corner of the enormous glass-roofed caravansary where the French sculptors scatter their white ingenuities. If Mr. Colton's pretty, finished "Springtide of Life," which has been purchased by the Chantrey Bequest, is typical of the style of work that the Council admire, the Selecting Committee showed their catholicity by admitting Miss Pownall's vigorous, horrible "The Harpy Celeno." The way her talons dig into her breast is powerful, to say the least. Mr. Frampton's work is always accomplished. His bust of "Chaucer," the eyes in his shrewd, wise, kindly face momentarily raised from the book he holds, is realistically detailed without being finical. Good, and well-planned, is Mr. Frampton's bust of "Sir Walter Besant," but the signification of his "Part of a Memorial to a Hero" in low relief, is too obscure. It promised well at first glance, but on closer examination is confused and troublesome to the eye. The highest type of the memorial effigy is the recumbent figure, and I submit that all memorials should suggest the simplicity and quietude of death, or some attitude of introspective solitariness like Michaelangelo's immortal monuments to the Medici. Mr. Alexander Fisher's "Commemorative Gift to C. E. Schwann, Esq.," in silver and enamel, although it bears every sign of ingenuity and continuous labour, is the antithesis of simplicity. It would take an hour to explain the meaning of this example of "the new art" in silversmithy. Perhaps that was the intention of the donors. If so, all is well.

I pass to the case of beautiful caskets, &c., in silver, wrought steel, translucent and champlevé enamels by Mr. Nelson Dawson and Mrs. Dawson at the New Gallery. There are fourteen specimens. I was examining these gifts to kings, princes and warriors with growing pleasure when an elderly, overdressed woman approached. Her eyes swept over the caskets: then turning to her companion she said, "Ow much are they?" That is the English way.

C. L. H.

Science.

The Source of Life.

THAT there was, as there will be, a time when our earth was uninhabited by living things, everyone must needs admit. She was then too hot, as one day she will be too cold, for life to be supportable. It is also recognised that only a relatively brief period in the history of a world fulfils the conditions necessary for the presence of living forms, a fact which has recently been used by Sir Oliver Lodge to support the contention that our planet is probably at the present time the only inhabited member of the solar system, despite the apparent though very doubtful evidence from Mars. And, knowing as we now do, that other worlds are such stuff as ours is made of, here is no further value in the speculation that life might exist in other planets under conditions which would be inadequate for its support upon ours.

As to our "rotatory island, crowded with predatory life and more drenched with blood than was ever mutinied ship," we have long inquired when and under what conditions life began. And physiologists assert that the temperature of the surface of the earth must have been "somewhat above the freezing point, and somewhat less than halfway to the boiling point of water." Omitting for the moment the question of Creative Design which Lord Kelvin, the greatest living scientist, has just again brought before us, we may follow Buffon and argue that life probably began in the polar area, which would be the earliest to cool, and probably, also, in the sea, where liquid water would first be present. Lord Kelvin himself was the foremost worker in the prolonged and somewhat controversial inquiry as to the time when such conditions were first established. Taking into account the rate at which the earth parts with her store of heat, the increase in the length of the day—due to the tides, mainly under lunar influence, acting as a brake upon the globe's rotation—and the probable age of the sun, "some such period of time as one hundred million years ago" was given by Lord Kelvin as an approximate estimate. The matter is very doubtful, and afforded Lord Salisbury the opportunity for many gibes in his presidential address to the British Association in 1894. Not seeing that geological time was mainly speculative, and was always alterable if the physicists made such alterations necessary, he said that "the jellyfish would have been dissipated in steam long before he had had a chance of displaying that advantageous variation which was to make him the ancestor of the human race." He therefore returned a verdict of "not proven" upon Darwinism: and this only nine years ago! Prof. Perry, agreeing with everyone else that it was "hopeless to expect that Lord Kelvin had made an error in calculation," challenged some of his data and thereby set back the geological clock. Recently, however, the age of the earth's crust has been calculated by estimating the salt in the ocean and calculating the rate of its carriage there by rivers, and something like ninety millions of years, I believe, was arrived at. There we may let the matter rest for the nonce. Already there are definite, though wide, limits with which we may be content.

Having answered, as well as we may, the question, when? we ask the further question, how? This is infinitely more difficult, but child's play compared with the ultimate question, why? First, then, can we manufacture life now? Is there spontaneous generation? If we bring the necessary elements and compounds together at the necessary temperature, can we manufacture protoplasm? Is the living cell less distinct than formerly from inorganic matter? Do tales of cells of gelatine all but alive bear any criticism? The answer to all these questions is as emphatic a negative as language will convey. I confess, for myself, that I can scarcely believe it will always be so. That the gap would some day be bridged by chemistry was Darwin's opinion, expressed in a letter dated 1882. Last week there was opened at Liverpool the first laboratory in this country for the study of bio-chemistry. This subject, the chemistry of life, lies at the root of all these problems, and we are only at the beginning of it. As to the present time, however, we all follow Harvey and Virchow, and maintain the dogma, "Omnis cellula e cellula"; every living unit, in this epoch, at least, is from a pre-existent living unit. Whence, then, the first speck of protoplasm? Lord Kelvin, whom the problem has always fascinated, ventured the guess that life had been brought to our planet by a meteorite or a comet from one of our neighbours. That merely transferred the site of the problem, and was, even then, untenable. The only other theory, not invoking supernatural aid, with which I am acquainted, is the so-called carbon-theory of Haeckel, a distinguished zoologist. Proposed because it would not suit his purpose to confess ignorance, and formulated without special physiological or chemical knowledge, that theory only obtains amongst those amateur followers of Haeckel who boast a scientific pantheism, who desire a scientific basis for their belief, and who, being ignorant of scientific facts or methods, are not in a position to criticise unscientific dogmas. Suffice it that that theory makes carbon God, accredits it with the power of gathering to itself three other elements—oxygen, hydrogen, and nitrogen—and therewith forming protoplasm. There is no foundation for the theory. Phosphorus, not to mention sulphur, is an essential constituent of the most central and complex substance in protoplasm. Of the importance of these two elements Haeckel was not aware. If any element be more characteristic of protoplasm than another it is not carbon but nitrogen, upon which are built the essential components of living matter. Omit all these difficulties; postulate any compounds you please, even including the phosphorus-holding proteids of the cell-nucleus, and you are not one whit nearer living structure. The carbon theory is not heard of outside popular "rationalist" publications. It has, of course, been ignored by the distinguished correspondents of "The Times." In a word, biology at this hour knows nothing of the source of life.

Lord Kelvin, then, has recently asserted that biology demands and demonstrates Creative Design. Some few biologists are with him in this assertion: the great majority are not. Certainly there is no violation of the old dramatic axiom, "nec Deus interit, nisi dignus vindice nodus," but I believe such a "worthy occasion" to have been present far further back. Nor do I support the ill-conditioned letters of a distinguished botanist to "The Times." His latest letter, still unrepentant, goes far to prove him unqualified for argument with Lord Kelvin; and while writing I await with interest the great man's reply. But surely Lord Kelvin's position is intelligible. Here you have a man of intellect probably unequalled at this hour, who for sixty years has dealt with and solved problems the mere formulation of which would paralyse thought in you or me. He will measure for you the curvature and weight of a drop of water under any conditions you care to name, the breadth of an atom, or the age of a world.

But before an amoeba or a sprig of moss he, like us, is helpless. We are so accustomed to riddles that we take them for granted. He has only once been beaten, and that when he faced living matter. We have been content, all along, with guesses and approximations and hazardous results. He has dealt with page-long formulæ and found the value of x each time; but he questions the secret of a spore of yeast, and his formulæ are unformulable. Is it surprising, therefore, that he should call in Creative Design; even "here, where men sit and hear each other groan"?

One more thing must I add. The assumption of Almighty interposition as the immediate source of life may be unnecessary. Some day it will probably be proved to have been unnecessary. But Creative Design "before all worlds" will not thereby be disproved. And even if it be admitted in our present dilemma, it does not—as Sir W. T. Thiselton-Dyer asserts—"wipe out the whole position won for us by Darwin." Indeed, I cannot imagine where Lord Kelvin's antagonist got his ideas as to what Darwin accomplished or as to what he thought on these matters. That erroneous assertion, however, has been several times refuted elsewhere. Nor, obviously, is it more than a mere defacement of good paper to assert that, for the consideration of these questions, Lord Kelvin is "not better equipped than any person of average intelligence." But, since these words were written, Prof. Burdon-Sanderson and "The Times" itself, in a wholly admirable leading article, has taken up the cudgels on behalf of Lord Kelvin's "transcendent ability," and I need say no more. Probably the discussion will still be raging when these words are in print. I merely wish to insist that, though Lord Kelvin is in all probability wrong in invoking special Divine aid for the production of the first speck of protoplasm, yet the biologists can furnish no other explanation at present, and neither argument nor discourtesy, neither the discovery of the secret in days to come, nor any other possibility, can, in the nature of the case, disprove the belief that the Almighty did consciously interpose for the origin of life. And if not, have the atheists or pantheists yet told us whence came the atoms of which that primordial speck was formed? With only one sentence of "The Times" editorial do I disagree: "At all events the phenomena of the origin of life are even more perplexing than those of the origin of atoms." Not at all, for living matter is made of atoms. The greater problem, that of the origin of all atoms, includes the less, that of the origin of organised and living atoms. And for the origin of atoms—these "manufactured articles" as Sir John Herschel put it—the atheists may refer us to the solar nebula, or the nebula before, or any farthest nebula they care to conceive; they cannot escape a First Cause. And if a Cause of your intelligence, why not Intelligent?

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

Totemism.

SIR,—The reviewer of my "Social Origins" writes, as to my guess at the Origin of Totemism:—

He has begged the question of the period at which totemism arose. If he can demonstrate that there was a stage when women ruled, and that totemism arose so early as that, then well and good. On the contrary, he expressly says, "We are presuming that the jealousy of the elder males drove the younger males out of the group, or at least compelled them to bring in females from other groups, which would mean war." This seems to us practically to invalidate the author's arguments against such scientific writers as Mr. Spencer and Lord Avebury.

I have nothing to do with "a stage when women ruled," if ever there was such a stage. That the reckoning of descent through females is prior to the reckoning through males is as much the opinion of Lord Avebury as of Mr. E. B. Taylor, and of the late Mr. J. F. McLennan. I have cited these authors, and adopted their view. If they are right, as Totemism exists, in its strict and typical form, where reckoning through females prevails, how can the totem have been there derived and inherited from male ancestors? Mr. J. F. McLennan pointed out this objection to me many years ago. Why the question of "a stage when women ruled" is introduced I am unable to imagine. The reviewer "can scarcely understand for what class of readers" Mr. Atkinson's "essay is intended." It was intended for specialists.—Yours, &c.,

1, Marloes Road, W.

A. LANG.

[Our reviewer—as he indicated—was much interested in Mr. Atkinson's essay; but he cannot understand why a somewhat unsavoury and purely scientific essay, of value only to "specialists," should have been bound up with "Social Origins"—the more so as Mr. Atkinson's postulates seemed to him incompatible with those of Mr. Lang in his "Theory of the Origin of Totemism." This led him to suppose that possibly Mr. Lang had had in his mind an hypothetical, but nevertheless not improbable, gynocratic stage of society.]

Irish Plays and Players.

SIR,—Your sympathetic notice of our Irish plays and players has it that they were produced under my direction. They were produced under the direction of Mr. W. Fay our stage manager, and Mr. F. Fay our teacher of speech, and by the committee of our dramatic society. Mr. W. Fay is the founder of the society, and from the outset he and I were so agreed about first principles that no written or spoken word of mine is likely to have influenced him much. I, on the other hand, have learned much from him and from his brother, who knows more than any man I have ever known about the history of speech upon the stage.—Yours, &c.,
W. B. YEATS.

Bulwer Lytton.

SIR,—Your very well-informed contributor, "The Bookworm," in your issue of 9 May, is struck with wonder that Bulwer Lytton's "The New Timon," "St. Stephen's," and "Quarterly Essays" have not been reprinted for twenty years. The reason is very simple. Our editions have never been out of print. The first two works, together with his "Lost Tales of Miletus," are on sale with us in one volume at 2s., at which price we also publish his "Quarterly Essays."—Yours, &c.,
GEORGE ROUTLEDGE & SONS, LIMITED.

Broadway House, Ludgate Hill, E.C.

Mrs. Wharton's Works.

SIR,—In your issue of May 9, in the column signed by "The Bookworm," you mention Mrs. Wharton's works.

We shall be obliged if you will add her translation of Sudermann's "Es Lebe das Leben" under the title of "The Joy of Living," which we published a short time ago.—Yours, &c.,
DUCKWORTH & Co.

3, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden, W.C.

"Mediocre Stuff."

SIR,—I do not agree with Mr. Vincent O'Sullivan as to the alleged poem of Poe's being "mediocre stuff"—as far as it was quoted, that is to say. I have the whole poem at home, which I can send to your correspondent on my return, if he cares to see it. Some of it is very striking and bizarre, and very like Poe's style.

I have the original cutting with the poem from some American paper (I think) about the year 1870. The editor certainly believed it to be Poe's, and stated that it was found among his papers, signed by him, after his death.—Yours, &c.,
Chagford, Devon.

F. B. DOVETON.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 190 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best appreciation of "My Favourite Poem." Thirty-seven replies have been received. We award the prize to Mr. Godwin Bulger, 21, Roxburgh Avenue Liverpool, S., for the following:—

"THE HOUND OF HEAVEN."

If comparisons be odious the most odious surely are comparisons with each other of things we love. Each beloved should stand alone. Only the pain which would come from placing another higher tells me that Mr. Francis Thompson's "The Hound of Heaven" is my favourite poem. How wonderful and beautiful it is! But one may not tell in a few words the appreciation which is wonder, fear, worship, consolation, and sheer delight. To one who has or ever has had, Faith, the poem is surely an epitome of all things. Weak, warm, human nature, "sore adread, lest having Him it must have naught beside," flying from the claims of Divine Love; the subject is personal to most of us; but the treatment is the poet's. The magnificence of the flight, the splendour of the pursuit, leave one breathless or force one to his knees, while the recurring line "Fear wist not to evade as Love wist to pursue," leaves him with a new light before his eyes and a new gladness bubbling up in his heart. To fly through time and space, across worlds, through the gold gateways of the stars, to the homes of men and the hearts of children; to find fellowship in everything yet be alien from all, until the gloom which lies so often over life is rightly seen as but the shade of a Hand outstretched caressingly: this it is to read "The Hound of Heaven." And apart from the lesson and the upliftingness of the poem, how delightful to share by appreciation the poet's power, in linked fantasies, blossomy twist, "to swing the earth a trinket at one's wrist," to hear "the red throb of the sunset-heart," to rise or droop with all that's born or dies; or at least to thrill at wonderful images and conceptions, and the lordly lines which hold them for us.

Other replies follow:—

"LOVE IN THE VALLEY."

I think I must name as my favourite poem George Meredith's "Love in the Valley," a piece of lyrical work richer in emotional value than anything else he has written. Sometimes when I feel out of love with life, I take up that poem, and instantly the lilting rhythm works its magic; one is a boy again, thrilled in every vein by the mystery of an almost transcendent passion. One cannot write a really critical appreciation, for the emotions aroused seem to defy expression. It is a poem of the heart, and only a man with the heart of a boy could have written it.

Other poems of Mr. Meredith's might be named that evolve a deeper philosophy—"Modern Love," for instance—but in "Love in the Valley" thought and feeling are perfectly wedded. The poet sang because he was inspired and impelled to sing, and had the story of boyish love to unfold. Radiant humanity glows through the lines, and yet everywhere the emotion is ideal; his passion dreams of the closest intimacy, but is always reverent. To enter into the soul of the verses is to feel morally and spiritually cleansed.

I am almost inclined to think it also Mr. Meredith's finest nature-poem. No eyes interpret nature like the eyes of a lover, and this pure-hearted boy sees things "hidden from the wise and prudent." Her beauty and the beauty of the world are one, and can only be thought of together—

"When from bed she rises clothed from neck to ankle
In her long nightgown sweet as boughs of May,
Beautiful she looks, like a tall garden lily,
Pure from the night and splendid for the day."

Surely passion of that peculiarly sanctified quality has never been expressed in lovelier verse!

[H. J., Hadley Wood.]

"SAUL."

My favourite poem? How many "Cynthias of the minute," pet odes, cherished elegies, treasured sonnets have been displaced in the course of years, either by the ruthless paw of the parodist, or by the discovery of that "better" which is the traditional foe of "the good"! I recall a friendly competition years ago among poetry-loving readers as to the favourite poem of each. The preponderance of votes given (without collusion) to Browning's "Saul" was remarkable. And why not? Think of the romantic yet reverent atmosphere in which the trite scriptural record is steeped; of the pliant and appropriate metre, the unflagging speed, the bright vistas, the horizon of the larger hope, the tranquillising scenery of its close, those eleven marvellous lines beginning—

"Anon at the dawn all that trouble had withered from earth."

Browning in composing "Saul" must have been haunted by Smart's "Song of David," which he often recited to friends. Yet how distinctly original is his David's utterance! "Saul" can be read through leisurely in half an hour, but its charm is inexhaustible, whether we read it in its comparative brevity of 1849, or in its expansion. What an eloquent critic has written of another great poem, is surely true of "Saul." "Here is not the elaborate finish which shows everywhere the fresh rasp of the file on its smooth and spruce excellence; this is faultless after the fashion of a flower or tree. Thus it has grown; not thus has it been carved."

[R. F. Mc., Whitby.]

"APT TUGLER."

For those of us who are not literary critics, it is hard, indeed, to temper admiration with discretion in the appreciation of a favourite poem. It is such a dear friend—a silent comforter, a beautiful memory, something that can never be lost, never grow wearisome to us.

Such a poem as this to many of us is Browning's "Abt Vogler." The ardent worshippers of the poet repeat the lines again and again with bated breath, quote and misquote on every possible occasion, but cannot spoil their beauty, cannot render even one line "backneyed."

Browning has been called "unmusical," yet nowhere is the spirit of music more evident than in this poem. We see the soul of the musician striving for expression; he is maddened, intoxicated, as it were, with the glory of the structure of melody which his keys have helped to raise. The musician is in the world of his own music—for a moment he seems to see his ideal clearly, he beholds—

"... in the glare and glow Presences plain in the place..."

He stands upon the heights of genius; it is the hour of his life's triumph.... And then the wondrous palace of music is gone, never to be again, and the musician turns to Him who changes not—"builder and maker, Thou, of houses not made with hands!" He turns to Him because he has penetrated one of the greatest of life's secrets; he realises that good and not evil shall endure, and this is the keystone of the temple of Faith.

"There shall never be one lost good! What was, shall live as before;
The evil is null, is nought, is silence implying sound...
On the earth the broken arcs, in the heaven a perfect round."

The genius that has reached the pinnacle of success has gone down at times into the depths of failure, and understands in part why sorrow comes to us.

"Why rushed the discords in, but that harmony should be prized?"

And what earth sees not, Heaven beholds and appreciates—this is the lesson "Abt Vogler" would teach to those who have ears to hear. We find in the poem not the ethereal loveliness of Shelley, not the exuberance of Keats, nor the music of Tennyson; but, which is surely greater, an attempt at the solution of the problems of success and failure in the life of man.

[V. I. L., London.]

SHAKESPEARE'S 146TH SONNET.

"Poor soul the centre of my sinful earth."

This sonnet sums up the world-without-end conflict between body and spirit; the last quatrain contains the germ of all religious and philosophical systems of life, while the final couplet (echoing St. Paul's triumphant "O Grave, where is thy victory?") slays once and for all the terror of death. There are other sonnets of Shakespeare which are more "sugred" and have more beauty of poetic thought, but there is none (except only the immortal 116th) which so becomes part of a man's life: and literature, except it help a man to live, is but dust and ashes.

[E. W. H., W. Didsbury.]

"PIPPA PASSES."

If you were placed in a garden—a garden blooming with the most beautiful flowers, gathered together from every part of the world, and there told to choose from amongst the bewildering mass the flower which appealed to you most, the flower which to your eyes seemed the sweetest and fairest, would you not hesitate a little before the final decision? Would not all appeal to you in their several ways? Some by their subtle perfume, some by their perfection of form and colour, and some by the undefinable, irresistible charm of association, and when at last the choice was made (since it was inevitable) would there not lie hidden in your heart a secret regret for the almost equal beauty of the discarded ones? So it is with me—who am bidden to choose—proclaim to the world my favourite poem. Well? I have chosen and am listening with all the old wonder, with all the old joy and ecstasy, to Pippa as she passes on her way, singing, as unconscious as any bird of the beauty of her song or of the deep impression it makes on the hearts and lives of those who hear. Blessing she brings to her fellow creatures in the poem: I like to think of the greater blessing she brings to her fellow creatures in the world. I like to think of her always passing through the world, making for good: bearing with her the spirit of faith and hope.

Out of Browning's great mind, wedded to Browning's great love, Pippa was born, and the children of such a marriage live eternally.

[L.J.C., Jersey, C.I.]

Competition No. 191 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best paragraph, not exceeding 200 words, on any topical literary subject.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 20 May, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Orr (James), Ritschlianism. Expository and Critical Essays (Hodder and Stoughton) 6/0
Taylor (Rev. C.), The Shepherd of Hermas. Vol. I. (S.P.O.K.) 2/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Ré (Aleph), New Lays of Ind (Burleigh) net 2/6
Henley (W. E.), A Song of Speed (Nutt) 1/0
Bell (Mrs. Hugh), The Dean of St. Patrick's: A Play in Four Acts (Arnold) net 2/6
Hayman (Henry), "The Passing of Arthur," in Greek Heroic Verse (Spottiswoode) net 1/0
Newell (William Wells), The Legend of the Holy Grail (Sever)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Osborne (Charles E.), The Life of Father Dolling (Arnold) net 12/6
Garnett (Richard), English Literature. An Illustrated Record. From the Beginnings to the Age of Henry VIII. Vol. I. (Heinemann) net 16/0
Gosse (Edmund), English Literature. An Illustrated Record. From Milton to Johnson. Vol. III. (Heinemann) net 16/0
Whiteway (R. S.), Translated and Edited by, The Portuguese Expedition to Abyssinia in 1541-1543. (Hakluyt Society)
Pittis (Robert Scott), Romantic Narratives from Scottish History and Tradition (Gardner) 6/0
Munro (Robert), Schleiermacher (Gardner) net 4/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Darroch (Alexander), Herbart and the Herbartian Theory of Education (Longmans) net 3/6
Villa (Guido), Contemporary Psychology (Sonnenschein) net 10/6
Yeats (W. B.), Ideas of Good and Evil (Bullen) 6/0
Olenow (Frank G.), The Geography of Disease. (Cambridge University Press) 15/0
Moulton (James Hope), Two Lectures on the Science of Language (Cambridge University Press) net 1/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

John, Bishop of Norwich, My Life in Mongolia and Siberia (S.P.O.K.) 2/6

EDUCATIONAL.

A. E. C. Kinderfreunden, A Simple German Reading-Book (Frowde) 1/6
Scott (Sir Walter), The Legend of Montrose (School Edition) (Black) 2/0
Hartog (W. G.), Petits Contes de Fées () 0/6
Kirkman (F. B.), Voltaire's Zadig () 0/6
Barbier (Paul), and Keen (Thomas), Premier Cours de Grammaire Française (Southall)
Wilkins (A. S.), Cicero: Rhetorica II. (Clarendon Press) 3/6
Broome (Florence), Decorative Brush Work for Schools (Chapman and Hall) net 7/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

Westell (W. Percival), Country Rambles (Drane) 10/6
Hudson (W. H.), Hampshire Days (Longmans) net 10/6
Wilson (A. M.), Friends of Yesterday (Bullen)
The Paris Salon (Illustrated Catalogue) 1903 (Chatto and Windus) 3/0
Tremayne (Harold), The A.B.C. of the Dog (Drane) 1/0
Abbott (G. F.), Macedonian Folklore (Cambridge University Press) net 9/0
Catalogue of Engraved Portraits of Noted Personages (Myers) net 7/6
E. F. D., compiled by, Hints to Girls (S.P.O.K.) 1/0
How Department Stores are Carried on in America (Richards) 2/6
Niven (The late G. W.), Edited by, Selections from the British Apollo (Gardner)
By Belinda's Husband, Plain Papers on Subjects Light and Grave (Gardner) net 2/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Gill (Harry), The Village Church in the Olden Time (Saxton)
Kemp-Welch (Alice), Done into English by, The Chatelaine of Vergi (Nutt) net 2/0
Pascoe (Charles Eyre), London of To-Day (Jarrold) 6/0
Lee-Hamilton (Eugene), Dramatic Sonnets, Poems and Ballads (Scott) 1/0
Goodman (E. J.), The Best Tour in Norway (Low) net 2/0
Clough (Blanche Athena), A Memoir of Anne Jemima Clough (Arnold) 6/0
Poe (Edgar Allen), The Murders in the Rue Morgue (Ward Lock) 0/6
Pain (Barry), De Omnibus and Another Englishwoman's Love Letters (Unwin) 0/6
White (Percy), The West End (Everett) 0/6
Munro (A. C.), Practical Guide to Genoa and the Rivas (Simpkin) 2/0
Trollope (Anthony), Framley Parsonage (Lane) net 1/6
Stuttaford (Charles), Translated by, The Story of Cupid and Psyche (Nutt) net 10/6
Don Juan XVIIIth and XVIIIth Cantos (Andrews) 1/0
Stalen (Douglas), The Admiral (Nash) 0/6
Eliot (George), Romola (Blackwood) 0/6
Munro (Neil), John Splendid () 0/6
Wister (Owen), Philosophy 4 (Macmillan) net 2/0
Church (Rev. A. J.), Stories from English History (Secley) 3/6

SEELEY & Co.'s LIST.

JOSIAH WEDGWOOD: Master Potter. By A. H. CHURCH, F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry in the Royal Academy of Arts. Being a Revised and Enlarged Edition of No. 3 of the Portfolio Monographs. With 4 Photogravures, 10 Coloured Plates, and many other Illustrations. super royal 8vo, sewed, 5s. net; or in cloth, 7s. net. "Beautifully illustrated. . . . The book is quite worthy of a conspicuous place in the 'Portfolio' series, of which it is one of the most excellent volumes."—Pall Mall Gazette.

BY THE SAME AUTHOR.

THE CHEMISTRY OF PAINTS AND PAINTING. By A. H. CHURCH, F.R.S., Professor of Chemistry in the Royal Academy of Arts. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged, crown 8vo, 6s. "In all respects a model of what such a work should be."—Athenaeum.

OLD ST. PAUL'S CATHEDRAL. By the Rev. Canon BENHAM, D.D., F.S.A. With a Frontispiece in Photogravure, 5 Reproductions in Colour, and many other Illustrations, super royal 8vo, sewed, 5s. net; or in cloth, gilt top, 7s. net. "A book in every way worthy of its subject."—Spectator.

STORIES FROM ENGLISH HISTORY. By the Rev. A. J. CHURCH, M.A., Author of "Stories from Homer," &c. With many Illustrations, Cheaper Edition, Revised, 3s. 6d. "These stories are written in the strong nervous English of which Mr. Church is a master. . . . Boys brought up on Mr. Church's pages will at all events have nothing to unlearn."—Academy.

WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY POPULARLY EXPLAINED. By R. KERR, F.G.S. With Preface by Sir W. H. PREECE, K.O.B., F.R.S., and many Illustrations. Sixth Edition, Revised, sewed, 1s.; cloth, 1s. 6d. "The author has achieved conspicuous success. . . . Capably illustrated."—Athenaeum.

SUN, MOON, AND STARS. Astronomy for Beginners. By AGNES GIBBERNE. With Illustrations, Twenty-sixth Thousand, 5s. POPULAR EDITION, SIXPENNY NET.

EDINBURGH. Picturesque Notes, with Illustrations. By ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. "The very model of what a sixpenny edition ought to be."—Liverpool Post.

London: SEELEY & Co., Ltd., 38, Great Russell Street.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready, Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE 1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 260,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED, 30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.; 241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., London; and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

The ACADEMY and LITERATURE

FOR JUNE 13th next will be a Double Number, and will include A TOURIST SUPPLEMENT, dealing with the current Literature of Topography and Travel (Home and Foreign), and directing attention to the scope and special feature of each work reviewed.

J. NISBET & Co.'s BOOKS.

LIFE OF JAMES MARTINEAU. By the Rev. JAMES DRUMMOND and the Rev. C. B. UPTON. With Portraits and Illustrations. In two large vols. Demy 8vo, 30s. net.

"The two volumes of 'The Life and Letters of James Martineau' will be prized by all who knew or admired one of the great ethical teachers and one of the purest and noblest figures of our time."—Times.

LETTERS OF E. R. GURNEY (Mrs. Russell Gurney). Edited by HER NIECE. With Portraits in Photogravure. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d.

"The most delightful reading. . . . It is impossible to speak too highly of these letters, or of the beautiful life and character which they display."—Speaker.

By WALTER SICHEL.
BOLINGBROKE AND HIS TIMES.

In two volumes, with Portraits in Photogravure. Demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net each.

"We may say without hesitation that Mr. Sichel's two volumes are an admirable contribution to history, fresh, entertaining, and full of new and carefully gathered information."—Outlook.

By MARTIN A. S. HUME.

TREASON AND PLOT. Struggles for Catholic Supremacy in the Last Years of Queen Elizabeth. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

"A brilliant and interesting book."—Mr. W. L. COURTNEY, in the Daily Telegraph.

THE GREAT LORD BURGHLEY.

With Portrait in Photogravure. Demy 8vo, 5s. net.

"This life of Elizabeth's most illustrious statesman is the best piece of work that Mr. Hume has yet produced."—Daily News.

THE NEW NOVEL SERIES.

Containing Works from the pen of some of the most Eminent Novelists.

Handsomely bound in cloth, with gold design on back. Large Crown 8vo, 3/6 each.

AMERICAN WIVES AND ENGLISH HUSBANDS	By GERTRUDE ATHERTON.
A DAUGHTER OF THE VINE	By ANDREW BALFOUR.
CASHIERED; AND OTHER WAR TALES	By JANE H. FINDLATER.
THE STORY OF A MOTHER	By KATHERINE TYSAN.
A UNION OF HEARTS	By PERCY WHITE.
THE JOURNAL OF A JEALOUS WOMAN	By EVA JAMESON.
WHEN THE DREAM IS PAST

JAMES' NISBET & Co., Ltd., 21, BERNERS STREET, W.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK.

500 Places to sell MSS., Photos and Drawings.

It is a Commercial Directory, giving Address, Rates, Time of Payment and Conditions of Contributorship of all Magazines, Papers, Syndicates and Agencies Purchasing MSS., Photos, or Drawings, List of American Magazines and of Publishers.

Price, 1s. 6d. net. Post Free, 1s. 8d.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK COMPANY,

Granville House, Arundel Street, Strand.

ROYAL INSTITUTION OF GREAT BRITAIN,

ALBEMARLE STREET, PICCADILLY, W.

TUESDAY NEXT (MAY 26th) at 5 o'clock. Professor E. J. GARWOOD, M.A. FIRST of TWO LECTURES on "THE WORK OF ICE AS A GEOLOGICAL AGENT." Half-a-Guinea the course.

THURSDAY (MAY 28th) at 5 o'clock. Professor J. A. FLEMING, M.A., D.Sc., F.R.S. FIRST of TWO LECTURES on "ELECTRIC RESONANCE AND WIRELESS TELEGRAPHY." Half-a-Guinea.

SATURDAY (MAY 30th) at 3 o'clock. Professor SYLVANUS P. THOMPSON, B.A., D.Sc., F.R.S. FIRST of TWO LECTURES on "THE 'DE MAGNETE' AND ITS AUTHOR.—1. THE BOOK. 2. THE MAN." Half-a-Guinea.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE of LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN BUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.O.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

(LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR.)

(LLANFAIRFROHAN, ANGLESEY, and OARNARVON.)

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINIOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, ORICCIETH, and PWLLHELLI.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide-book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes?"—The Times.

"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.

"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 6s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.,
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BURETANO'S.

Mr. Fisher Unwin's List.THE FIRST NOVEL LIBRARY.

New Volume Just Ready.

"Mr. Fisher Unwin has made a genuine and important discovery."THE FLAME AND THE FLOOD.

By Rosamond Langbridge. 6s.

"It is singularly poignant and compelling. . . . Rarely does one meet, in woman's work, such pitiless understanding of motive, such cool dissection of character; still more rarely does one meet these things in the work of a beginner."—East Anglian Daily Times.

A fascinating series of biographies written with candour and insight from intimate personal knowledge.

BRITISH POLITICAL LEADERS.

By Justin McCarthy.

Illustrated from Photographs. Large crown 8vo, cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

The men written about in this volume are: ARTHUR JAMES BALFOUR, LORD SALISBURY, LORD ROSEBURY, JOSEPH CHAMBERLAIN, JOHN MORLEY, SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, LORD ABERDEEN, SIR HENRY CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN, JOHN BURNS, JOHN E. REDMOND, SIR MICHAEL HICKS BEACH, JAMES BRYCE, and HENRY LABOUCHERE.

"Of absorbing interest."—Tu-Day.

THE UNTILLED FIELD.

By George Moore.

Unwin's Red Cloth Library, 6s.

"There can be no doubt about the moving pathos, the vivid and absorbing interest of Mr. Moore's story."—Glasgow Herald.

"Mr. Moore's narrative has touches of genius worthy of Swift, and a delicacy and daintiness which in the great dean were usually lacking."—Liverpool Post.

A NEW WORK ON ECONOMICS.

ANOTHER VIEW OF INDUSTRIALISM.

By William Mitchell Bowack.

Large crown 8vo, 6s. net.

THE TEMPLE.

By George Herbert.

Facsimile Reprint of the First Edition. With an Introduction by J. H. SHORTHOUSE, Author of "John Inglesant." Fcap. 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

THE NEW PSEUDONYM.

A NE'ER DO WELL.

By Valentine Caryll. Cloth 2s., Paper 1s. 6d.

THIRTEENTH IMPRESSION.

STOPS; OR, HOW TO PUNCTUATE.

A Practical Handbook for Writers and Students.

By Paul Allardye. New Edition. Cloth 1s.

TWO NEW SIXPENNIES.THE LETTERS OF HER MOTHER TO ELIZABETH.

By W. R. H. Trowbridge. 63rd Thousand.

DE OMNIBUS AND ANOTHER ENGLISHWOMAN'S LOVE LETTERS.

In one volume. By Barry Pain. 98th thousand.

London: T. FISHER UNWIN, Paternoster Sq., E.C.

IMPORTANT NEW NOVELS.THE HOUSE ON THE HUDSON.

By FRANCES POWELL

Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Ready May 26.]

This is a first novel of most unusual interest. It has the characteristics of a detective story, together with those of a passionate and forceful drama of love, and will undoubtedly attract very considerable attention. Its original plot is not the least of its merits, and is alone sufficient to stamp it as a work of conspicuous merit.

BY THE AUTHOR OF "LET NOT MAN PUT ASUNDER."

IN THE GARDEN OF CHARITY.

By BASIL KING.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Second Impression.]

Spectator, May 2nd.—"We have no doubt as to the charm which this homely idyll of Nova Scotia will exert on minds wearied by novels of society, slum life, and sensation. The Acadians are long since scattered, but their spirit is recalled by this charming romance of a coast already celebrated in the graceful hexameters of 'Evangeline'."

Daily Telegraph.—"There is hardly a chord of the simple emotion of a woman's heart which Mr. King does not touch; his book is in every respect a beautiful and true study, and while it moves us deeply, at the same time it charms with its delightful humour, fresh and unhackneyed."

New Novel by the Author of "Abner Daniel."

THE SUBSTITUTE.

By WILL N. HARBEN,

Author of "Westerfelt." Crown 8vo, 6s.

[Just Published.]

Glasgow Herald.—"Mr. Harben's latest novel ought to be a prime favourite. Mr. Harben is an American writer, and has evidently studied his countrymen with care. He has a sharp eye and a ready pen, and is as ready to expose their foibles as he is to exalt their virtues, and he has an epigrammatic style of expression which is particularly effective. The novel is trenchantly written, and its humour is at all times pleasant."

THE HOUSE OF THE COMBRAYS.

By G. LE NOTRE.

With an Introduction by VICTORIEN SARDOU. Crown 8vo, 6s.

Times.—"A close and graphic study of a tragic and picturesque by-way of history—the later period of the Norman 'Chouannerie.' M. Victorien Sardou contributes an interesting preface, recounting a personal experience, told by his father-in-law, of the Royalist Madame de Combray (heroine of Balzac's 'Madame de la Chanterle') and the Château Tournebut."

MARY E. WILKINS' NEW VOLUME OF STORIES.

SIX TREES.

By the Author of "The Portion of Labour."

Illustrated, 3s. 6d.

[Third Impression.]

W. L. COURTNEY in the Daily Telegraph.—"An author whose genius lies especially in the realm of the short story. The artist of low tones, of quiet, simple, innocent effects, infinitely scrupulous over the details of her picture. Her last book, 'Six Trees,' is redolent of her peculiar charm. Here is the wonted graceful fancy, the accomplished skill, the suggestiveness of idea. Over and over again in this book we have the same delightful, impalpable, airy treatment, always with a touch of interesting psychology."

SIR ANTHONY and the EWE LAMB.

By the Author of "Lady Beatrix and the Forbidden Man."

Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d.

[Ready May 26.]

A New Work by the Author of "Lady Beatrix" is assured of a warm welcome. Here the Author repeats the success of the first book, and gives a character in every way as charming and ingenious as Lady Beatrix, with a story fresh and bright, and wholly amusing.

HARPER and BROTHERS, Publishers, 45, ALBEMARLE STREET, LONDON, W.

READY MAY 25th. WITH AN INTRODUCTION BY J. ST. LOE STRACHEY.

Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

GERMAN AMBITIONS AS THEY AFFECT BRITAIN AND THE UNITED STATES.

Reprinted with Additions and Notes from the "Spectator."

By VIGILANS sed ÆQUUS.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

A RECORD OF SECRET SERVICE RECENTLY ACHIEVED.

ON MAY 27th. With Two Maps and Two Charts. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS.

Edited by ERSKINE CHILDERS,

Author of "In the Ranks of the C.I.V."

An account of the Cruise of Yacht "Dulcibella," being a page hitherto unwritten, but of vital interest to all Englishmen, in the recent history of our relations with Germany.

LONDON: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1620. Established 1869. London: 23 May 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 499

REVIEWS.

Life and Labour of the People in London	503
Letters to M. G. and H. G.	504
A Girl among the Anarchists	505
A Few of Hamilton's Letters: including his Description of the Great West Indian Hurricane of 1772	506
Isabella D'Este Marchioness of Mantua, 1474-1539	507
The Dean of St. Patrick's	507

SHORT NOTICES:

The Diary of a Year—The Natural History of Animals: The Animal Life of the World in its Various Aspects and Relations—British Political Leaders	508
---	-----

FICTION:

The Wind in the Rose Bush—Pigs in Clover—The Pagan at the Shrine—The Bonnet Conspirators	509
--	-----

Notes on the Week's Novels	510
------------------------------------	-----

ARTICLES.

HEREABOUTS	511
A Colonial Poet	512
The Ethics of Parody	513
Impressions—XXXIII. A Frenchman	514

DRAMA:

The Ideal Spectator. E. K. Chambers	514
---	-----

ART:

Some Dutchmen and An American. C. L. H.	515
---	-----

SCIENCE:

One—yet divisible. C. W. Saleeby	516
--	-----

CORRESPONDENCE:

Metre	517
"The Impassable Barrier"	518
"The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman"	518
Limericks? or Learics?	518

WEEKLY COMPETITION:

Any Topical Literary Subject	518
--------------------------------------	-----

The Literary Week.

THE books published during the week have been very varied in character. They range from such solid works as a history of Local Government in England to sixpenny reprints of popular novelists. Of réissues, perhaps the most interesting are four volumes in the "Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books," consisting of such well-known books as Dr. Syntax's "Tour" and Nimrod's "Memoirs of the Life of John Mytton." There continues to be a steady flow of minor biography. The following volumes are of particular interest:—

FIFTEENTH CENTURY PROSE AND VERSE.

An English Garner volume, with an introduction by Mr. A. W. Pollard. About half of the contents now appear in the English Garner for the first time. The additions consist of some Christmas Carols, a Miracle Play, a Morality, and a number of William Caxton's prologues and epilogues; there are also two extracts on the art of translation, and some depositions in a theatrical lawsuit. Mr. Pollard writes: "As these pieces are included for their matter, not for their style, I hope they will not be considered intrusions in a volume essentially devoted to the fifteenth century."

ROBERT BROWNING. By G. K. Chesterton.

An addition to the "English Men of Letters" series. Mr. Chesterton divides his study into eight chapters, the three last of which deal with Browning as a literary artist, "The Ring and the Book," and the philosophy of Browning. Concerning "The Ring and the Book," Mr. Chesterton says: "It is the great epic of the age, because it is the expression of the belief, it might almost be said of the discovery, that no man ever lived upon this earth without possessing a point of view." An individual piece of work.

THE DESCENT OF THE SUN.

A Cycle of Birth, translated from the original manuscript by F. W. Bain. "Here is a fairy tale," says the translator, "which I found in an old Hindoo manuscript." The story is a solar myth; its title, literally translated, would run: "The Glory of the Going Down of the Sun." In form and spirit the story is absolutely Hindoo, and is full of scraps of philosophical mythology familiar to the West. Prof. Bain's rendering has glamour and clarity.

THERE are as many morals to be got out of a sale-room as out of a volume of "meditations." The trifles of one generation are the things for which succeeding generations gamble, and things which once seemed great, as often as not, go for an old song. The other day in New York two scraps of Poe's writing were sold for a sum that would have kept their writer for a year; one was an acrostic—not a particularly good acrostic, either—the other the original draft of "For Annie," of which Poe himself had so high an opinion. Yet Poe died hardly more than fifty years ago.

LORD ROSEBERY gave some advice to millionaires about to make their wills, on Wednesday, at Burnley, where he was opening Towneley Hall as a municipal art gallery and museum. The ardent collector, remembering his Horace and the death duties, must often look forward with apprehension to the improvident heir who prefers hard cash to the carefully garnered treasures. Well, Lord Rosebery hinted at a course for those who fear that their collections "may be dispersed at their death, and may go to countries of whose wealth and enterprise we are sometimes jealous." Let them bequeath these to public museums and galleries.

THE June number of the "Pall Mall Magazine" contains the opening chapters of two notable serials; the one is John Oliver Hobbes's "The Vineyard," the other is Mr. Maurice Hewlett's "The Queen's Quair." A quair, as is explained in an author's prologue, "is a cashier, a quire, a little book. In one such a certain king wrote fairly the tale of his love-business; and here, in this other, I pretend to show you all the tragic error, all the pain, known only to her that moved it, of that child of his children's children, Mary of Scotland." The illustrations to this intimate presentment of the heart of Mary are particularly interesting, for they are drawn from old paintings and prints.

IN the "Burlington Magazine" this month are five hitherto unpublished drawings by Dante Gabriel Rossetti of his wife, and therewith an article by W. M. Rossetti under the title "Dante Rossetti and Elizabeth Siddal." The article is particularly interesting as throwing curious sidelights on the poet-painter's character. Elizabeth Siddal was the daughter of a Sheffield cutler, and was born in 1834. The writer describes her as truly a beautiful girl; tall, with a stately throat and fine carriage, pink and white complexion, and massive straight coppery-golden hair. Her large greenish-blue eyes, large-lidded, were peculiarly noticeable. She was an assistant in a bonnet-shop near Leicester Square when Deverell, a young painter, found her and induced her to sit as his model. It was in his studio that Rossetti first met his wife. Probably before the end of 1851 they were engaged. The name Elizabeth was never on Dante's lips, writes his brother, but Lizzie or Liz; or fully as often Guggums, Guggum, or Gug. Mrs. Hueffer, the younger daughter of Ford Madox Brown, tells an amusing anecdote how, when she was a small child in 1854, she saw Rossetti at his easel in her father's house, uttering momentarily, in the absence of the beloved one, "Guggum, Guggum."

IN 1860 they were married. To his mother, Dante Rossetti wrote: "I write you this word to say that Lizzie and I are going to be married at last, in as few days as possible. Like all the important things I ever meant to do—to fulfil duty or secure happiness—this one has been deferred almost beyond possibility." Miss Siddal's health had long been extremely delicate—at times woefully bad—and she did not attain to anything like good health during her married life. On February 10, 1862, Rossetti found her unconscious; she had accidentally taken an overdose of laudanum. She died next morning.

A NEW sixpenny issue of Tolstoy's "Sevastopol and Other Stories" contains a preface by the author, not included in any previous edition. Concerning this preface Mr. Aylmer Maude writes:—

It was written under the following circumstances: An officer, A. I. Ershóf (pronounced Yershóf), who had served in the war, wrote a book of "Sevastopol Recollections," and asked Tolstoy to supply a Preface. The Preface Tolstoy produced was (like so much else that he has written) not such as could pass the press censor; its publication in Ershóf's book was, therefore, out of the question, and Tolstoy laid it aside without polishing the rough draft. Expressing as it does his mature feeling on the subject of war, it is well worth preserving and (having ascertained from Tolstoy that he has no objection) I here utilise it as Preface to his own stories of "Sevastopol."

The preface is really a summary of Tolstoy's often-expressed views on the hideousness and uselessness of war. It concludes with this characteristic passage:—

I was finishing this Preface when a cadet from the Military College came to me. He told me that he was troubled by religious doubts. He has read Dostoyévsky's "The Great Inquisitor," and is troubled by doubts why Jesus should have preached a doctrine so hard to carry out. He had read nothing of mine. I spoke cautiously to him of how to read the Gospels so as to find in them the answers to life's problems. He listened and agreed. Towards the end of our conversation I mentioned wine, and advised him not to drink. He replied: "But in military service it is sometimes necessary." I thought he meant necessary for health and strength, and I intended triumphantly to overthrow him by proofs from experience and science, but he continued: "Why at Geok-Tepe, for instance, when Skóbelef had to massacre the inhabitants, the soldiers did not wish to do it, but he had drink served out and then . . ." Here are all the horrors of war—they are in this lad with his fresh young face, his little shoulder-straps (under which the ends of his bashlik are so neatly tucked), his well-cleaned boots, his naive eyes, and his conception of life so perverted.

This is the real horror of war!
What millions of Red Cross workers could heal the wounds that swarm in that remark—the result of a whole education!

THE New York "American" has discovered that Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Lady Rose's Daughter" is "flagrantly and repulsively immoral." We are told that it is "a dangerous book for idle and foolish women as well as for girls"; also that its author "will deserve all the punishment that is sure to come upon her for her performance." We do not think that Mrs. Humphry Ward need feel in the least perturbed.

ONE of our own contributors tried a short while ago to tell the truth about an author. These confessions have stirred the spirit of candour in a journalist who this week begins confessing in "To-Day." This particular journalist, who signs himself "Inconnu," discovered that "the art of success in journalism is to tack oneself to a great man's shadow." It would seem difficult to tack oneself to anything so unsubstantial; but "Inconnu" selected Mr. Gladstone as his first victim, and managed to worm correspondence out of him by consulting him as to whether Dante was ever in England. The journalist was not at all interested in Dante—only in the great man's shadow. He had hit upon the idea "which I have endeavoured to put into practice ever since; and the fruits thereof can be seen in these Confessions—to lay in a stock of interesting associations with great men, and then give them to the world when the great men were not." It is not a very pleasing view of the journalist's trade.

HOWEVER, "Inconnu" tells one interesting little story of Mr. Gladstone, who loved to rummage in the bookshops of the Quartier Latin. As Gladstone entered a bookshop near the Odéon, he found the bookseller engaged in conversation with an extraordinary individual, who held in his hands an old edition of Villon's poems. "His dress was ragged and dirty, his face was matted with hair, and he had the eyes of an archangel, with the mouth and jaw of a baboon. Nevertheless, the respectful attitude of the bookseller showed that the man was a personality. Gladstone entered into conversation with him about Villon, and for an hour they talked about early French poetry. Then the stranger shuffled out of the shop. 'Who is that gentleman?' asked Gladstone. 'He has an extraordinary knowledge of French poetry.' 'Monsieur, he himself is our greatest poet. C'est Paul Verlaine!' This anecdote was repeated to me by the bookseller himself, who also informed me that Verlaine never knew that he had been in conversation with Gladstone."

No definite date has yet been fixed for General Maurice to take over the work of preparing the official history of the South African War. Negotiations have been in progress for the creation of an adequate staff. The late Colonel Henderson recognised that the staff he had was numerically altogether insufficient. In the case of the official history of the Franco-German War practically the whole Prussian General Staff was employed. We hope that the official history of the South African War may be as reliable and complete.

"THE HOMER OF MODERN TIMES" bursts this week upon our view. The writer who thus modestly describes himself on the title page of "The Human Epic" (Gay and Bird) is otherwise known as John Frederick Rowbotham. His poem, in forty cantos, he announces as "The Twelfth Epic Poem of the World" (we remember that the World's Fifth Epic appeared with equal modesty from another author about eighteen months ago). Mr. Rowbotham considerably gives the titles of the other eleven, and includes Virgil's "Georgics," which we had not hitherto regarded as an epic. "It takes a long time to write an epic poem" says the author in an introduction. "It has taken me twenty-six years to write 'The Human Epic.' I was a boy when I began it. At the end of this time I may be permitted to believe that I know something about Epic Poetry, and that having written thousands of epic lines I am able to write it." Similarly the man who has sung thousands of notes may claim that he can sing.

MR. ROWBOTHAM takes as his theme the "Life History of the Earth." "The whole of my early life was devoted to laborious studies, so that I might make myself perfectly familiar with all that Science in all its various branches and through all its various investigators had, during the last two centuries, said and discovered in reference thereto. That task completed, which was the arduous task of many years, it next remained to write the poem. This was the task of many years more. At last the poem was completed and now lies before you. Peruse it. Its influence upon you will be mighty and far-reaching; it will insinuate itself into your most cherished meditations, and open a new world to your profoundest thoughts." We have not yet perused it, for the influence of the preface upon us has been "mighty and far-reaching."

THE informal court of enquiry of whose proceedings accounts appear in the New York "Reader," recently dealt with "The Apollo-naris Poets." The proceedings were opened by Mark Twain, who said:—

"We have hit upon a novel plan and one, I am certain, which will meet with your approval—we are going to let you try yourselves, or rather, each other. I am sure that is generous enough. Therefore, I invite any of you who may have charges to bring against one of your co-defendants to rise now and state them, in order that"—

At this point the speaker was interrupted by a general rising of the "Melodious Nine," each of whom had serious charges to make against his fellows. The procedure was changed instantly: the nine were set to write verses to time, and the result was decided by the votes of the competitors. Said the presiding judge:—

"I take great pleasure, gentlemen, in informing you that you are all condemned to the guillotine by the overwhelming vote of seven to one in each case."

Without a word of protest, the eight guilty poets rose and filed out of the room with their keepers. Indeed, their faces showed the delight which they experienced at the downfall of their rivals, a feeling which completely swallowed up grief at their own fate.

There is still, it seems, jealousy amongst poets—in America.

MR. J. A. HAMMERTON, we learn from the "Sketch's" "Literary Lounger," has put together a book entitled "Stevensoniana." This appears to be a collection of such odds and ends as have been missed from the authorised biography and the volumes of letters. It will deal, among other things, with the criticisms of Stevenson's books, and the unpleasant Henley-Stevenson controversy is likely to be revived before the equally unpleasant Froude-Carlyle controversy has been for the second time buried.

INITIAL titles are spreading like an epidemic among the bookstalls, and now we find the first number of "T.A.T.," a sort of weekly magazine of novel shape, for it is about ten inches long and four inches broad. For a penny you are offered the usual inducements of an accident insurance and free photogravures, as well as stories by Eden Phillpotts, Barry Pain, Pett Ridge, W. L. Alden, and William Le Queux. It may be well to add that "T.A.T.," which might stand for "two and two," or "tea and tattle," or "tare and tret," or "tweedledum and tweedledee," really stands for "tales and talk."

THE "English Illustrated Magazine" is gradually assuming a literary tone, and with the present issue we have the second series of portraits wherewith the editor commemorates the literary birthdays of the month. The subjects are all to be living ones. This month Mr. Clement Shorter writes on Prof. Dowden, Mr. J. H. Barron on Mr. J. M. Barrie, and Dr. Richard Garnett on the Right Hon. James Bryce. A useful feature is the appended bibliography. But this would gain in usefulness if the compiler added the name of the publishing firm to the book's title, and the date of publication.

THE hundredth anniversary of the birthday of Emerson falls on May 24, and the year is to be marked by a special celebration of the day in Boston. It is proposed to raise a monument to Emerson within Harvard University grounds. A programme, too, is being drawn up for the Emerson Memorial School, which is to gather in Boston and Concord in the second week of July. The session of the School will last for three weeks, and there will be thirty lectures dealing with the various aspects of Emerson's life and work. Among the speakers will be President Schurman of Cornell University, Kuno Francke, and Mrs. Julia Ward Howe. The anniversary will also be celebrated by the publication—by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.—of the first volumes of the new and complete "Centenary Edition" of Emerson's writings. The edition runs to twelve volumes, and is edited by his son Edward Waldo Emerson.

THE latest of Mr. J. T. Trowbridge's literary reminiscences, now appearing in the "Atlantic Monthly," revolves round Oliver Wendell Holmes and Longfellow. Concerning Longfellow Mr. Trowbridge writes:—

His conversation was simple and easy, and often enlivened by a genial pleasantry, to me more welcome than the wit that keeps the listener too much alert. I never heard him make a pun. And never, in my presence, did there fall from his lips an expression that had in it any flavour of slang, except on one occasion. At the time when the "Nineteenth Century" magazine was launched, we were discussing Tennyson's sonnet, which appeared, a proud figure-head, on the prow of the first number. I remarked that it had one particularly expressive line:—

"Now in this roaring moon

Of daffodil and crocus."

Longfellow's face lighted up, as he took a stride across his hearth, repeated the words, and stopping before me, exclaimed, "It is a fine thing to have one strong line go ripping through a sonnet!"

Longfellow cannot be convicted of slang on that count. Mr. Trowbridge's ideas about slang seem rather hazy, or do different rules apply in America? If Longfellow had said it was a "ripping sonnet" the matter would have been different.

AN interesting venture is being made by a lover of literature at Warwick. In the "Avon Booklet," Mr. J. Thomson will, month by month, gather forgotten works of our foremost modern writers. Much of the work of Browning, Stevenson, Morris, Tennyson, Borrow, William Black, and O. W. Holmes has not been rescued from the periodicals in which it appeared, probably because the authors did not think it worth salvage. But there is always a considerable public ready to welcome even the indiscretions of Genius.

ONE would hardly imagine that a child could get much harm from reading "Uncle Tom's Cabin." But the New York public school superintendents have decided to exclude it from the school libraries on the ground that the book is calculated to keep alive sectional feeling. The New York "Tribune" thus seeks to justify the decision:—

The argument brought in favour of the action was that the book treated of the days of slavery in the South, and, inasmuch as slavery existed no longer, the book should be barred from circulation among the children. The men who voted to exclude the book probably had in mind also the fact that "Uncle Tom's Cabin" contained much pertaining to the South as it was before the war which was exaggerated and distorted, and they saw no reason why these misrepresentations should be handed down to the rising generation.

The argument if rigidly applied would end in the prohibition for children of all stories which deal with times different from their own.

FATHER TABB writes to us from Ellicott City, Maryland, U.S.A.: "A critic finds my Matin Song 'more than an echo' of a poem by Davenant. In looking up the name—which I had never heard of—I find he was supposed to be the natural son of Shakespeare. Hence—

"If Davenant was Shakespeare's son,
Unless I am mistaken,
Some Connelly in what I've done
Will find a streak of Bacon."

Bibliographical

I AM glad to have elicited from Messrs. Routledge the fact that their editions of Bulwer Lytton's "New Timon," "St. Stephen's," and "Quarterly Essays" are still on sale. I am just a little surprised that, in view of the special interest lately taken in the writings of Bulwer, Messrs. Routledge have not more widely advertised their wares in this particular. It is very difficult for the average book-lover to know or to find out what books are or are not "in print." In London and a few provincial cities he can generally hope to get the information he desires at one of the larger book-shops. On the other hand, dwellers in the smaller country towns and in the rural districts have much more restricted opportunities. I cannot help thinking that every firm would find it to its advantage to issue complete catalogues of its stock, frequently and in large numbers. Copies of such catalogues should be on the counter of every bookseller in the kingdom; thousands of them might be sent out by post to persons in chosen localities. Full catalogues at the end of published books are by no means sightly, but they are eminently useful, and should be circulated in that way whenever possible.

In the preface which Mr. Alfred W. Pollard has written for a new volume of the "English Garner," there is a passage which has some bibliographical interest, inasmuch as it refers to the extent to which Mr. A. W. Pollard is liable to be mistaken for his contemporary, Mr. A. F. Pollard—and vice versa. Both are writers, and both, curiously enough, have contributed to the "Garner." Says Mr. A. W. P. concerning Mr. A. F. P.: "I have recently been more congratulated as the author of his 'Henry VIII.' than I have ever been on any book of my own. So far from being identical, I regret to say that we are not even related." Mr. A. W. Pollard was first in the literary field with his "Odes from the Greek Dramatist," and his "English Miracle Plays, Moralities and Interludes," in 1890. Two years later Mr. A. F. Pollard published his maiden effort—the Lothian Essay on "The Jesuits of Poland." Then came Mr. A. W. Pollard with his "Early Illustrated Books," and his little book on Chaucer, in 1893. This was followed by Mr. A. F. Pollard's "England Under Protector Somerset," in 1900, and then, last year, we had from Mr. A. F. Pollard his "Henry VIII.," and from Mr. A. W. Pollard his "Old Picture Books, and other Essays on Bookish Subjects." Is it any wonder that the general public got a wee bit puzzled?

Welcome enough is Miss Lee's "La Bruyère and Vauvenargues"; it will help to popularise those writers in this country. What is now wanted is a similar volume on Rivarol and De Bonald. Something (not much) was done for Chamfort last year in the shape of a booklet called "The Cynic's Breviary," but De Bonald is practically unknown in this country, and Rivarol has been represented here by only a few of his witticisms. Some of these were included by Henry S. Leigh in his pleasant little collection of "Jeux d'Esprit" (1877), notably Rivarol's remark that Buffon's very ordinary son was the weakest chapter in his father's "Natural History," and his assertion that Mirabeau was capable of anything for money, even of committing a good action. By the way, the head-lines of the pages in Miss Lee's book are so arranged that one cannot readily tell where the selections from La Bruyère end and those from Vauvenargues begin. That matter of head-lines should receive more attention from printers and publishers; it has a very great deal to do with the acceptability or non-acceptability of a book. The passion for repeating ad nauseam the title of a book within the book itself should certainly be curbed.

Of the four reprints (in small form) just issued by Messrs. Methuen in their new "Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books," the least known to the general public is "The History of Johnny Quae Genus, the Little Foundling of the late Dr. Syntax"—Coombe's continuation of his "Dr. Syntax"—which, I believe, has not till now been reprinted since it was first published in 1822. Next in quasi-novelty comes Blake's "Illustrations of the Book of Job," which were, however, reproduced last year in facsimile at 12s. 6d. Copies of an edition of "The Life and Death of John Mytton," with the illustrations reproduced in their original size, can be obtained from Kegan Paul & Co. for two guineas. Messrs. Methuen's reduced reproduction costs 3s. 6d.

Dr. Aldis Wright's new edition of the poems of Milton will have features which will give it reasons for existing. It can, however, scarcely be said of it that it will "fill a void." We are pretty well off in this matter. There was Mr. Beeching's edition in 1900, Mr. John Bradshaw's in 1878 (reproduced in 1885, 1887, and 1892), the "Globe" edition in 1877, Professor Masson's (in three and two volumes) in 1874, and R. C. Browne's in 1870 (reprinted in 1894). These, I suppose, are all "in print." Many, indeed, have been the editors of Milton, from Patrick Hume in 1695 to T. Keightley in 1859, with E. Fenton, T. Newton, W. Hayley, H. J. Todd, J. Aikin, E. Hawkins, E. Phillips, J. Mitford, Egerton Brydges, H. Stebbing, H. F. Cary, and George Gilfillan bridging over the interval.

There cannot be too many editions of "The Autocrat of the Breakfast Table," which has now been added to the "Golden Treasury" series. Notable, however, are the number of reprints of the "Autocrat" which have been issued in England during the last ten years only—in 1893, two by Messrs. Routledge (one edited by G. A. Sala) and one (illustrated by Howard Pyle) by Messrs. Gay & Bird; in 1896 one (prefaced by Mr. Andrew Lang) in the "Nineteenth Century Classics"; and last year no fewer than four—one by Messrs. Macmillan, one by Messrs. Dent (illustrated by H. M. Brock), one by Messrs. Blackie, and one in the Unit Library.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

"Religion" in London.

LIFE AND LABOUR OF THE PEOPLE IN LONDON. By Charles Booth. Third Series: Religious Influences. Seven volumes. (Macmillan. 30s.)

THE last stage but one of Mr. Booth's great inquiry into the "Life and Labour of the People in London" has been reached, and its results are embodied in the seven volumes which have been recently published with the sub-title of "Religious Influences." "Poverty" in four volumes, "Industry" in five, and now "Religion" in seven—such are the three great divisions of this famous inquiry, while a seventeenth volume, dealing with various omitted social questions and containing certain final conclusions, is already announced and will wind up the whole.

As when, from 1886 to 1889, Mr. Booth's special attempt was to measure the extent and depth of the poverty of London; and from 1890 to 1897, when the problems of industry were uppermost in his mind; so during the last five years, when "Religion" has been the subject of investigation, the collection, analysis and systematization of facts has been the dominant aim. Abstract theorizing has not been indulged in. A picture, as true of London as might be, was hoped for. Knowledge, as scientific and complete as the complicated character and the vastness of the subject made possible, was the quest. But the underlying motive of this prolonged task was essentially practical, for the hope throughout has clearly been that London, mirrored to itself as no city has ever been before, alike in its strength and in its weakness, should be enabled through all its forms of corporate life and through its private citizens to move with greater certainty and speed towards a healthier, a happier and a nobler life.

Although the ultimate aim has been the same throughout, the methods of investigation followed have necessarily differed, and an inquiry, the foundations of which are statistical, is found ending in these new volumes, from the stress of the new subject-matter, in something of the nature of a mental and moral diagnosis. The scene is shifted, but the actualities of life still permeate the inquiry in this as in the earlier stages, and, combined with the severe impartiality of its treatment, still constitute one of the most engrossing sources of its interest. But, in dealing with poverty and industry, the test of the validity of most of the conclusions reached was ultimately a numerical one. In studying the religious influences of London, this test is found to take a much more subordinate place. More subtle questions have been under review, for the aim has been to investigate the nature and extent of the effective response made to the organized forces of religion, and, as the introduction truly says "the subject is one in which figures may easily be pressed too far, and if trusted too much are likely to be more than usually dangerous." Up to this point, therefore, Mr. Booth and his fellow-workers have been dealing, as it were, with the life that London wears on its sleeve (although to find much of it, they have often had to dive into workshop and slum), but now in these last volumes, they deal rather with its inner and more hidden life. Formerly, with the physical and the concrete; now with the more subtle phenomena of spiritual and moral experiences.

In another way, the point of view seems rather to have changed. In the two earlier stages of the inquiry, the questions first put have been: What are the facts? What are the nature and extent of the social and industrial problems of London? In the third stage it has rather been: What is being done to meet these problems? Although, in considering more especially what the religious bodies are attempting as remedial agencies, the general scope and efficiency of their work has been also examined.

The limitations of such an attempt are most obvious, and many of them are mentioned by Mr. Booth. Not only is no effort made to take up the position of "critic of religious truth," but the wide field covered by religious influences beyond such as is identified with the churches is recognised and avowedly left uncovered. "The most religious may be these whose professions are fewest; who may give no sign to the world of their inner spiritual life. The form of reserve that hates to display feeling is a national quality," and in no way is this quality more apt to show itself than in matters of religion, perhaps as the deepest stream shows fewest ripples. "Men are often more religious than is known," or, as many are quoted as having said: "There is more latent religion than is imagined." Many may have no central shrine, and be the poorer for the loss of it. Others may find it, it may be, in the home or in the open fields; in the crowded street or in the workshop; in the council chamber or the study. We cannot tell. But we do know that "public worship" is not the measure of the religious life of London, nor are religious organizations the measure of its scope. The researches of Mr. Booth are, however, admittedly confined to the manifestations of religious activity: to the extent of the avowed adherence; to the congregations; to the allied associations of every kind; to the social and charitable offshoots; to the relation of the various religious bodies to each other; and to the response with which they meet when they endeavour to spread their influence beyond the ranks of their immediate following.

In the pursuit of this investigation a threefold inductive method has been followed of interview, of observation, and of the study of authoritative and representative printed matter. The results of all these sources of information have been carefully used, and checked one against the other. The first six volumes give a detailed survey of London, based primarily on observation and interview, and in the process side-lights are thrown on many questions—on local government, on intemperance, on the administration of charity, on marriage, on housing, on thrift, on vice, on habits and on amusements. Mr. Booth's wonderful map of London has been revised and enlarged, and its graphic presentation of the social characteristics of the metropolis is divided up among these volumes in convenient sections. In the seventh volume more general aspects of the questions raised are considered, and for some readers it is probable that these chapters will have the greatest interest. But the scheme of the whole seven volumes ought clearly to be taken into account in judging of any single part. The field covered is so extensive that at least minor inaccuracies are almost certain to be discovered; while many individuals will doubtless not be best pleased, it may be by the criticisms on, or it may be with the little space allowed to, their own particular field of work. In some cases it must have required courage to say the word that seemed true, and for an honest attempt to give the truth all men should be grateful, although by some the personal application of the following remark has doubtless to be learnt, that "in so far as denominations appear to regard themselves as of intrinsic individual importance, they are apt to lose moral status in the public view."

It is the restrained and impartial character of the book that should carry conviction to the mind of its readers. As we turn over the pages much passes before the eye: the manifold variety of the religious organizations of London; their differences in matters of belief or observance, fitting themselves thus to the diverse demands of the human soul; their differences in constitution and government; their wonderful army of workers, professional and volunteer; their zeal; their innumerable and beneficent enterprises; but also their frequent lack of social insight, and of the spirit of tolerance. We can watch the play of conscience, but look almost in vain for any sign of ecclesiastical authority. In almost every church, we see the inner band of convinced adherents; in most the conventional or self-interested following; but always there are the multitudes outside, beyond the pale.

The volumes are thus very far from containing anything of the nature of an indictment of the religious agencies of London, but they nevertheless emphasize with an almost terrible force the limitations alike of their power, of their largeness of view, and of their wisdom. Vigour, however, is shown to be rarely wanting, and even the rivalries and jealousies that are not infrequently revealed are admittedly preferable to stagnation, for out of movement may come fusion, and even a great revival of moral and spiritual force.

If, however, we ask: is the result "success" or "failure"? and give the answer in one term or the other, we seem to miss the real significance of these volumes. Both elements are constantly intermingled. Moreover, the sphere of influence, be it good or bad, is difficult to trace. Source and extent are alike hard to determine. If, however, as the evidence of these volumes certainly seems to point, objective authority in religious matters is waning; if the disciplinary, or formal, observances of religion are being neglected, this will, perhaps, after all, be a matter of no great moment, if consciences are not being at the same time dulled. And there is reason to think that, although religious beliefs can never, and observances can rarely be enforced, the impress of the characters of good men knows no weakening. As a Wesleyan, who is quoted, says, "In London, the best man wins, irrespective of dogma," and as Mr. Booth himself writes: "The saintly, self-sacrificing life is that which strikes the imagination of the poor as nothing else does."

But even the best men have difficulty in maintaining the just equipoise between end and means, and in being willing to let the latter go, if without it and in other ways the former is being attained. "For God's work," says a clergyman of the English Church, "there is too much of the feeling 'this is grist for my mill.'" And the difficulty must be a very real one even for the least self-centred of men, of seeing their own barque going down, and another under full sail, even though this be the better equipped and be making more surely for the haven that both desire. Hence, jealousies are apt to spring up, even from the competition of agencies that are in themselves admirable and even desirable, and for many individual men, struggling, innovating, evangelizing, giving, as well as for those devout women whose anxious spirits wear them out, the healing message is perhaps the same: "Be still, and know that I am God;" and the thought may be applicable to some corporations, no less than to individuals.

This reflection suggests that some even of the larger facts and conclusions revealed in these volumes possess an importance that is not only essentially relative, but perhaps also temporary. Among the former, for instance, the numerical insignificance of the Roman Catholics, or the practical failure of the Salvation Army as an evangelizing agency; among the latter, the strong and the weak points in the various denominations as these are indicated by Mr. Booth: as, for instance, the "self-satisfaction" that is apt to temper the social vigour of the Congregationalists; or the "too obtrusive piety" which is apt to diminish the spiritual force of the Baptists; or the "exaggeration" which is to be set against the enthusiasm of the missions. Such points will attract, and are attracting, great attention, and will excite much controversy, but, from the point of view of London as a whole, such individual points, be they good or bad, are among the minutiae of its religious life. They may even be evanescent phenomena. Their significance at the moment may be profound, but none can be of permanent and vital importance unless churches and denominations as at present constituted are destined to be necessary factors in the religious life of the future. And of this there is no certainty. In themselves the religious bodies are but elements in a stage of development, playing no mean part, but themselves changing, carried on by the same stream of life and thought on the broad bosom of which rest, let us say, the theatres and the concert halls, no less than the churches and chapels.

We differentiate and analyse, and consider some parts of the stream pure and some impure; some wholesome and some unwholesome; but the matter of importance is not sectional virtue or strength; or even sectional vice or weakness, but the nature and relative strength of the emanation of opposing qualities. Is the whole stream becoming more limpid or more turbid? Is the common life becoming more spiritual or more gross? Are poor men being made more free or more dependent? Is vision widening or narrowing? Is the love of truth deepening, or the spirit of cynicism spreading, with its offspring of bitterness or indifference? Are ambitions becoming nobler or more sordid? Is the spirit of righteousness dwelling more and more in the hearts of men, or the demon of base desires? It is the answers to such questions that are of essential importance. In comparison with them, the strength or the weakness of the particular churches or denominations, however splendid their traditions or great their position, do not count. This or that form of external authority or church government can hardly ever be paramount again in spiritual matters; conscience may be everything. As Vinet has written: "It is not by institutions, however perfect they may be, but by saintly individualities that the Gospel is propagated and the Kingdom of God founded here below." It is because the unessential appears to have been rightly appraised in these remarkable volumes; the relative value of every religious phase frankly recognized; and intolerant or absolute pretensions gently but firmly brushed on one side, that they are destined to make their mark, both now and in the future. They themselves will become a new "influence" in the life of London, and one, to those who will read with open minds, not less of hope than of warning.

New Ruskin.

LETTERS TO M. G. AND H. G. By John Ruskin. (Privately Printed.)

ONE comes to feel more and more that everything which Ruskin wrote had a value beyond the mere personal value. His was a mind so curiously and vividly alive, so delicately sensitive to the concerns both of the flesh and spirit, that he never set pen to paper without hints, shadowings, interpretations of the things which matter. He combined a certain aloofness from ordinary life with an astonishing grip of certain primary elements of ordinary life; to him the world was infinitely beautiful and infinitely misunderstood, so that he was at once a prophet of its possibilities and a profound pessimist concerning its modern tendencies. Yet, even in his most perverse moods, he is to be taken seriously, for each mood was a reflex of a multiform personality which always strove after the highest. He was often illogical, not seldom unjust, and sometimes strangely undiscerning; but always he was sincere and always beautifully lucid in expression.

The letters in the volume before us were addressed to two daughters of the late Mr. Gladstone. It seems at first sight curious that a strong friendship should have existed between Ruskin and a man so involved in active politics as Gladstone. At a hundred points they were temperamentally antagonistic; the one was a born optimist, the other, though a prophet of hope, was a kind of servant of despair. Certainly in his later years Ruskin was as one crying to those whom he considered to be children of the prison-house; Gladstone, on the other hand, never lost faith in the people or in himself. The immediate cause of the meeting between the two was an article by Ruskin in the "Nineteenth Century," an article which had deeply moved Gladstone. Ruskin accepted an invitation to Hawarden with unconcealed misgivings; Canon Scott Holland tells us that in order, if necessary, to cover his retreat, he had secured a telegram summoning him home. But the misgivings vanished; Ruskin came to see that although he and Gladstone could never agree, his host was as convinced and sincere as himself. Accordingly Ruskin, with characteristic frankness, recanted all he had thought or said against Gladstone, and though he afterwards, in print, deplored his policy and described him as a "wind-bag," his political attitude never affected his admiration for the man.

From this visit to Hawarden sprang the friendships which these letters record, friendships of the kind which Ruskin so loved to cultivate, ranging in their expression from childish gaiety to searching comments upon character and life. The volume is prefaced by an introduction by Mr. George Wyndham, which is followed by some extracts from a diary whose writer is not named. From this, before proceeding to the letters, we will take a couple of extracts. Ruskin maintained that museums were conducted on entirely wrong lines; he would have eliminated all ugliness and deformity on the ground that true knowledge only came from beauty: "In museums we ought to have specimens—the loveliest, most perfect that are to be found—of Nature's handiwork. Birds in all their feathers, animals in their skins. I don't even desire to see a Dodo in its skeleton state; I never saw one in its plumage, and why should I wish to see one without?" There we have a true Ruskinian perversity. Again: "The man who has failed in any subject has no right whatsoever to say one word respecting the subject in which he has failed." To which he added pathetically that he spoke as one who had entirely failed.

The letters range between the nine years 1878-1887. Those written to "M. G." soon become intimately affectionate; his love went out to "sibyls and children and vestals" with an almost pathetic strength. There was, indeed, much of the woman in John Ruskin; he learned in the intuitive woman's way, and though he was mentally self-centred he was continually casting about for support. He found in Miss Gladstone's music a source of the solace which so keenly appealed to him—half personal and half spiritual. After an illness which preceded a second visit to Hawarden he wrote:—

But I'm still afraid of myself, whether I shall be able to draw at all. I am not, yet; that is to say it tires me more than anything, when it's the least difficult. It is but too likely I shall just want you to play to me all day long.

A little later, referring to the sudden death of the Duchess of Argyll, he wrote:—

It shocks me to have written as I did, not knowing of the Duchess's death, but you know I never know anything that happens in these days, unless I am specially told by some one. For my own part, I have so much to do with death, that I am far better in the house of mourning than of feasting, when the mourning is noble and not selfish.

In the same letter, concerning the illness of another friend, he said: " . . . I would I could make her well again—and bring the years back again, and move the shadow from the dial evermore."

Of Browning Ruskin had not always a great opinion: "He knows much of music, does he not? but I think he must like it mostly for its discords." Yet he was pleased when Miss Gladstone called him "Aprile." "I would have written—somehow, anyhow—only I wanted to read Paracelsus first, but always felt disinclined to begin, but I'm dying to know what it is you call me. I do so like to be called names." We must quote, for its singular aptness, Paracelsus on Aprile:—

How he stands
With eve's last sunbeam staying on his hair
Which turns to it as if they were akin;
And those clear smiling eyes of saddest blue
Nearly set free, so far they rise above
The painful fruitless striving of the brow,
And enforced knowledge of the lips, firm set
In slow despondency's Eternal sigh!
Has he too missed life's end, and learned the cause?

We cannot follow these letters in connected sequence; we must content ourselves with quoting a few passages which serve to illustrate Ruskin's character and general attitude:—

The death of Carlyle is no sorrow to me. It is, I believe, not an end—but a beginning to his real life. Nay, perhaps, also of mine. My remorse, every day he lived, for having not enough loved him in the days gone by, is not greater now, but less, in the hope that he knows what I am feeling about him at this—and all other—moments.

Bless you? Blest if I do; I'll give you absolution, if you come and ask it very meekly, but don't you know how I hate girls marrying curates? You must come directly and play me some lovely tunes—it's the last chance you'll have of doing anything to please me, for I don't like married women.

If a great illness like that is quite conquered, the return to the lovely world is well worth having left it for the painful time; one never knew what beauty was before (unless in happy love which I had about two hours and three quarters of once in my life).

Those who possess the land must live on it, not by taxing it.

Stars and seas and rocks must pass away before that Word of God shall pass away, "The Land is Mine."

This delightful volume will be very welcome to all lovers of Ruskin, and who that has the old desire for beauty and sincerity and a true regard for the noble and lucid English tongue does not love him? Ruskin, indeed, is one of the few writers with whom, on certain points and even important points, we may entirely disagree without losing affection and inspiration. There was about him something of the strayed angel, combined with a sincere and poignant humanity; he sowed lavishly of his best, and reaped affection and, in a sort, despair. But the affection kept him sweet, and the despair was not without possibilities of divine hope.

Only a small edition of the volume we have been considering was issued, but we understand that a few copies remain. These may be obtained, at a cost of one guinea, from the University Press, Oxford.

Anarchism's Social Side.

A GIRL AMONG THE ANARCHISTS. By Isabel Meredith. (Duckworth. 6s.)

This is, in some respects, rather a remarkable book. People who happen to be interested in the Anarchist movement can procure Anarchist literature, and as a rule pretty sorry stuff it is, but it is not often that an intelligent person writes of the movement's active propagandists from the inside. This Isabel Meredith has done. The volume has a preface by Mr. Morley Roberts, in which he says:—

Isabel Meredith, whom I had the pleasure of knowing when she was a more humble member of the staff of the "Tocsin" than the editor, occupies, to my knowledge, a very curious and unique position in the history of English Anarchism. There is nothing whatever in "A Girl among the Anarchists" which is invented, the whole thing is an experience told very simply, but I think convincingly.

Mr. Roberts thinks that "such a human document must appear incredible to the ordinary reader"; we do not see why it should appear incredible at all. Indeed, the author's experiences were just such as we should have expected, and her narrative merely confirms our own impressions. Fortunately the violent Anarchist school has not made much practical progress in England, though the theoretical Anarchist is not uncommon even at most respectable suburban dinner tables. We have heard the Anarchist creed propounded with more force in a law-loving London club than on any of its accepted platforms. But the writer of the present volume does not concern herself to much purpose with the Anarchist position; she was confessedly an enthusiast, and enthusiasts have no time for close thought. It was the squalid fun of many of the proceedings and the people which began to shake her allegiance. "I fancy people," she writes, "with a keen sense of humour are rarely enthusiasts; certainly when I began to see the ludicrous side of much of what I had taken to be the hard earnest of life, my revolutionary ardour cooled." Humour is a fine sedative for the world's fevers.

The Anarchists with whom the author was associated were, in the main, a queer set: wastrels ready to accept any creed which might give them occasional free quarters, faddists who must always attain to the abnormal, theoretic peddlers to whom revolutionary talk in a back-room is the breath of life. A girl who had leisure and money was certain to be welcomed by such a crowd, and she was welcomed. But leavening this unpromising lump of unattached humanity were certain almost heroic figures, men of profound and passionate belief. Armitage, Nekrovitch, Kosinski, and Giannoli had faith and faith's faculty for sacrifice, but of these only one appears to have been mentally quite sound. Two became practically monomaniacs, and even Kosinski, the most impressive of the band, strikes us as a man moving rather in a world of arbitrary imaginings than in a world adaptable by ordinary means to ordinary and human ends. Occasionally we are brought face to face with the futile and brutal appeal of dynamite, but for the most part the book is concerned with the production of the "Tocsin" and the extraordinary crowd of cosmopolitan individuals who drifted in and out of the office, slept on the floor, or sang revolutionary songs to the accompaniment of a mandolin. Nothing could suggest more strongly the folly of most of the proceedings than the chapter entitled "An Abortive Group-Meeting." It suggests chaos, petty intrigue, bad faith, and a kind of hilarious imbecility. "The loafer type," we read, "was perhaps in the ascendant," and the performance was justified of its children. But behind all this turmoil in little there is a real power: not the power of unity, of co-ordinate action, of steady progress; but the power of the individual who is obsessed with the idea of violence as the only means of overthrowing established society. And the danger of Anarchism lies in that. No one seriously supposes that the mine and the bomb are going to revolutionise society, but the mine and the bomb are active forces with death behind them. It is clear that society has to protect itself; the pity is that there should be need for such protection. The volume before us contributes nothing to any solution of the problem; it merely sketches for us the doings and the personalities of certain individuals either foolish, or bitter, or heroically one-sided. "Anarchism," says Mr. Morley Roberts, "is a creed and a philosophy, but neither as creed nor philosophy does it advocate violence. It only justifies resistance to violence. So much, I think, will be discovered in this book even by a leader-writer." It depends what Mr. Roberts means by "resistance to violence." If ordinary necessary and humane law is "violence" to be resisted Mr. Roberts may be right. We can only say that we entirely disagree with him.

Alexander Hamilton.

A FEW OF HAMILTON'S LETTERS: INCLUDING HIS DESCRIPTION OF THE GREAT WEST INDIAN HURRICANE OF 1772. Edited by Gertrude Atherton. (Macmillan. 6s. net.)

THE desk claimed the youth of Alexander Hamilton, as it claimed the youth of Clive. "I condemn the grovelling condition of a clerk, or the like," he wrote, "to which my fortune condemns me, and would willingly risk my life, though not my character, to exalt my station." It was a noble ambition, and it was nobly realised. The boy who at sixteen years of age managed a large store at St. Croix, with grown men under him, lived to be a leading spirit among those who shaped the constitution of the United States. And there is every reason to think that his influence would have been continuously exercised in stemming the tide of extreme democracy, had he not perished in the flower of his age by the hand of that unscrupulous adventurer, Aaron Burr. Even before the surrender of Cornwallis, divisions were manifest in the political camp of the Americans, men were soon calling themselves "Federalists" and "Democrats," and Hamilton was a pronounced Federalist. In a letter which is probably his last—it is dated July 10, 1804, the day before the duel with Burr—"Democracy," he wrote, "is our real disease."

Was he right? The reader of this volume will hardly find in it enough material to resolve his doubts on a question so remote and so technical. The problem is one that requires an extensive study of American history, if it is to be solved, nor have we space here for its discussion. Suffice it to say that Hamilton's death and Burr's discredit left a clear field for the ascendancy of Thomas Jefferson, in whom the democratic idea was triumphantly embodied. And it is probably Jefferson's popularity that has done most to eclipse the fame of Hamilton—in this country, at any rate. For though Hamilton is one of whom Englishmen as well as Americans may be proud, since his parents were born and died British subjects, it is safe to say that most of us do not know very much about him.

Or—if now we do, if this reproach has been done away and the renown of Hamilton has emerged from the dusty bookshelves where we had left it to slumber, we have certainly Mrs. Atherton to thank for it. "The Conqueror," her romance of last year, brought back the personality of Alexander Hamilton to this generation in a remarkably vivid manner. All who read that book will welcome the selection of his letters which Mrs. Atherton has now published. They are few: but they are numerous enough to show how faithfully Mrs. Atherton depicted her hero in "The Conqueror." They are a running commentary on his life. We see him in his public and private relations: as soldier, as politician, as minister: as husband, as brother, as friend. There are two portraits of him in this volume. The face is that of one who lived a full life both of brain and heart, not starving either at the expense of the other. Looking on it, one understands the fascination that he exercised.

Large was his soul: as large a soul as ere Submitted to inform a body here.

Few men have crowded so much varied and strenuous living into fifty years as he did, and apparently without effort. It was all one to him whether he was storming a breach or framing a constitution: and he would turn from either to frolic with his children by the hour. And if the cause of his unvarying success be asked, we shall probably be correct in assigning it to his unwavering belief in the justness of his own ideas and to his absolute fearlessness in putting them in practice. In short, he was a man of genius, who had the courage of his opinions.

Faults he had, as readers of "The Conqueror" know. And here we do not find ourselves quite in accord with Mrs. Atherton. We think Hamilton may have been less proud of those deviations of his than she appears to be. A man who wrote such a letter to his wife, after twenty years of married life, as he did—it may be read on page 229 of this volume—was surely one who must have looked back upon his lapses from conjugal loyalty with remorse rather than with satisfaction. Mrs. Atherton opines that “his annual receipts”—in the matter of amatory letters—“must have been heavy.” This is rather a back-handed compliment to her own sex. But if it was so, we can fancy Hamilton, except in those two known infatuations of his, putting “his annual receipts,” unread, into the fire, with a contemptuous smile. We could also wish that Mrs. Atherton had given a few more notes in elucidation of obscure points in the letters. As it is, the English reader who is confronted with “General Lee’s infamous publication” (page 48) and the affair of one Duer (page 151), with no word of explanation vouchsafed, may be pardoned if he finds himself out of his bearings.

Mrs. Atherton has unearthed Hamilton’s description of the great hurricane which visited the West Indies in 1772. It is rather a disappointing production. The sentiments of the writer on the occasion are depicted in far fuller detail than the actual incidents. We prefer the version given in “The Conqueror”: but then, how should a boy’s narrative, however bright the boy, compete with that of an accomplished and vivid writer?

A Lady of the Renaissance.

ISABELLA D’ESTE MARCHIONESS OF MANTUA, 1474–1539. A STUDY OF THE RENAISSANCE. By Julia Cartwright (Mrs. Ady). (Murray. 25s. net.)

IN the middle of the fifteenth century when the new ideas that the Renaissance had brought were everywhere in Italy, and when people had already begun to look back on the preceding centuries as “the dark ages,” Isabella D’Este was born in Ferrara. Exquisitely beautiful, she was from her birth fortunate, alike in the education she received from Jacopo Gallino and in the opportunities she found for the expression of her passion for art, beautiful pictures and antiques at her husband’s city of Mantua, then certainly one of the most delicately lovely cities of Italy; now forlorn upon her silent lakes. It is of an age that delighted in passion of any sort that we read in Mrs. Ady’s admirable pages; of passion often brutal, that finds its most typical example perhaps in the feats of the Baglioni and Oddi of Perugia, or the triumphs of Cesare Borgia, and of passion profound and lovely as we see it expressed in the work of Mantegna or Giorgione:—

A quarrel arose [says Mrs. Ady] between Cardinal Ippolito D’Este and his half brother Giulio, an illegitimate son of the late Duke, who were both in love with their sister-in-law, Lucrezia’s fair maid of honour, Angela Borgia. One day Angela laughingly told the Cardinal that his brother Giulio’s eyes were worth more than his whole person, upon which Ippolito in a fit of jealous rage, hired a band of assassins to attack Don Giulio on his return from a hunting expedition.

The ruffians tried to put out his eyes and partially blinded him. Don Alphonso reprimanded the Cardinal severely, and when Don Giulio had recovered his sight Niccolo de Correggio succeeded in effecting an apparent reconciliation between the brothers. But a few months afterwards Giulio entered into a conspiracy with his younger brother, Ferrante, to murder both the Duke and Cardinal and seize the duchy.

That is the sort of thing that happens constantly in an age so full of vitality, so full of life after the long sleep of the Middle Age, as was the age of the Renaissance. It was, we read, to Isabella that Giulio fled, and she not unwillingly gave him shelter when the plot was discovered and Ferrante, his co-conspirator, thrown into prison. Giulio, however, had to be given up: he spent fifty-three years in prison, regaining his liberty only as an old man of eighty-three, coming out of his cell in the same “clothes which had been in fashion when he was first imprisoned, half a century before.” We read much of Isabella’s beauty, and if we are to believe Titian, who painted her portrait, now in Vienna, she must have been one of the loveliest women of that age. Her eyes are black, her hair golden, her skin of dazzling fairness. Trissino, the humourist, tells us of her rippling golden hair, her dignity of carriage, her exquisite grace. And her gifts of mind were equal to her beauty. She was the friend of Lionardo and Titian, who both drew her portrait; she delighted in Virgil, whom she read in the edition of Aldus. She possessed a museum and gallery in which she placed some of the loveliest things of her own and past ages. Cesare Borgia, whose triumph and fall she witnessed, appears to have been devoted to her. Macchiavelli counselled her and talked over his philosophy with her, so at least it would appear. Andrea Mantegna was her friend and servant, and was willing to do anything for her. A personality which would delight these great men cannot have been mediocre, and this impression is strengthened by her letters, very many of which Mrs. Ady prints for the first time in English. Though not of the first importance, the book will be extremely valuable to English students of the Renaissance. It is, moreover, very delightful, and will surely appeal to an audience as wide as that which enjoyed the author’s “Beatrice D’Este.” On page 163, vol. i., there is a miss-print of “Austrian” for “Umbrian” and it is difficult to pass over in silence the carelessness of much of the writing. This sentence for instance, on page 278, volume i., is particularly bad:—

It was the first and so far as we know the only visit that she paid to the town where were living so many friends and which must have had many attractions for her.

But apart from the “mere writing,” as we say in England, the book is very charming and of real value, well illustrated and full of curious information.

Swift in Drama.

THE DEAN OF ST. PATRICK’S. A Play in Four Acts. By Mrs. Hugh Bell. (Arnold. 2s. 6d. net.)

IN the romance of a man’s life it is commonly the woman nearest his heart that must play the part of heroine. In Swift’s life, Esther Johnson was that woman. Well did he name her Stella, for she was the star to which his thoughts and hopes never failed to return, however far afield they might have wandered. The mystery of the relations of this pair has never been cleared up. But, whatever her position, Stella possessed such sweet patience and gentleness that she accepted it without complaint.

Of very different clay was Vanessa (Esther Vanhomrigh), who disclosed her love to Swift, “a gown of forty-four” though he was, and whose violent and embarrassing passion for him ended only with her life. And so it is not surprising to find Vanessa the most prominent feminine figure in Mrs. Hugh Bell’s play. The drama terminates with her death; and certainly there can have been few more dramatic incidents in Swift’s stirring life than his final rejection of her. It will be remembered that Vanessa on her death-bed wrote to Stella, asking if the latter were indeed his wife. According to the generally received account, Stella wrote that she was, and handed Vanessa’s letter to Swift, who, in bitter resentment, rode straight to Vanessa’s house, threw down the letter on the table at her side, and left her without a word. This is a poignant situation enough, but the drama cannot get along with such paucity of speech, so Mrs. Bell gives a rather different version. She makes Stella come to visit Vanessa, after receiving her question, and refuse to answer it. Then Swift appears, dashes the letter on the table, and tells Vanessa she will never see his face again. But on her telling him that she is dying, he relents, and a dialogue ensues in which he at last admits the marriage. "You have dared to ask," he says, "you must dare to know. She is my wife." The knowledge kills Vanessa. Thus Mrs. Bell gets her dramatic finish, but at the cost, it appears to us, of lessening the actuality of her portrait of Swift. For who that has studied the records of that great and unhappy man's life can believe that he would disclose, even to a dying woman, the secret which he kept with such morbid and persistent tenacity?

In general, however, "The Dean of St. Patrick's" is a careful and interesting piece of work. Mrs. Bell has wisely chosen prose as her medium, and her prose is terse and pointed, as befits the period and the persons. To Vanessa, more prolixity is allowed, and that is as it should be. Several of Swift's recorded utterances are introduced, and Mrs. Bell's phraseology never jars. Here is a pretty and tender passage between Swift and Stella, in the Moor Park days:—

ESTHER: How I wish that Lady Giffard would go to Ireland, that I might be near you sometimes! Do you think she will?

SWIFT: Lady Giffard? In truth, Esther, I would rather her ladyship did not come too. But look you, how fine it would be if you could come with someone else! Let us build a castle in the air, little Esther, and pretend that you go and live with somebody else—not a capricious fine lady, but some worthy soul who would do your bidding and mine.

ESTHER: Oh, how good it would be! Someone like Mistress Dingley, my mother's cousin, who would have had me to live with her last year, but Lady Giffard would not consent.

SWIFT: Upon my soul, I believe that would be the very thing. Now listen, little Esther; I vow that when I have a kingdom of my own, I will look out for a cottage in it.

ESTHER (smiling): A cottage in the air, then?

And so the graceful trifling goes on.

Other New Books.

THE DIARY OF A YEAR. Edited by Mrs. Charles Brookfield. (Nash. 6s.)

THIS volume has for sub-title "Passages in the Life of a Woman of the World." That strikes a note with which we are already too familiar, and the book is made up of the kind of thing which we have learned to expect in such "diaries." We have, on several occasions, expressed our particular and general opinion of such work, and it only remains to express it again—it is unpleasant and wholly unnecessary. We have read more unpleasant and more unnecessary books than this "Diary of a Year"—we will accord it so much negative distinction; also, it is written with considerable verve, and without any grossly bad taste. But that being said, we have stated the case for the defence.

The story turns upon an intrigue between a dissatisfied married woman—her of the diary—and a man. He calls her a "wild winged daughter of the Sabine snows," and she wonders where he got it from. Incidentally he makes violent love to the lady, and she agrees to the usual flight. She keeps the appointment and he does not. Need we say more? Of course there was another woman in the case, and, equally of course, the particularly caddish Paul, apparently, had not expected the situation to develop. We may add that in the end soiled virtue is triumphant. The lady of the diary falls in love with her husband, and Paul dies. But that highly satisfactory conclusion does not take the unpleasant taste of the whole affair out of our mouth; the book has really no standpoint either of ethics or art; it merely plays with externals, and glosses indifferent situations. It is time, we must repeat, that the woman's diary business was quietly put out of sight.

THE NATURAL HISTORY OF ANIMALS: THE ANIMAL LIFE OF THE WORLD IN ITS VARIOUS ASPECTS AND RELATIONS. By J. R. Ainsworth Davis. Half-Vols. 1 and 2. (The Gresham Publishing Company. 7s. each.)

PROF. AINSWORTH DAVIS will have earned a respite from his labours when the other six "half-volumes" of this work are out. This is of the very best order of popular books on science. It is without any charlatanry, and its claims on the score of illustrations and so forth are not meretricious, but legitimate. We welcome all sincere attempts to broaden the appeal of science—even though Great Britain seems irretrievably to have lost her start in this regard—and the work before us comes up to our conception of the form which such attempts should take. Good paper and type, most excellent photographs and plates in colour, sound arrangement, and intelligible language—these are its merits. In the initial volumes the writer has presented the entire range of animal life, giving an epitome of the inter-relations of the various groups into which may be resolved the million kinds of extant animals known. Structure and physiology being thus disposed of, the habits—the "natural history"—of our far ancestors and of our cousins so many times removed will fall to be studied, and the work will end with a formal discussion of that theory of evolution which is the only key to its every page.

After all, the question with a work like this is not "Is it well done?" but "Is it well?" Objective truth is such in our despite, but we can never be sure that its presentation will make a true concept for us. As to this little cyclopaedia, however, the answer may be definitely affirmative. The time is ripe; it is well that biology, whereof each of us is an illustration, should be "understood of the people." And lucid exposition, plus abundant illustration, graphic and other, is here to be had. It would perhaps have been better to note that the running together into roulettes of the red blood corpuscles in the admirably reproduced micro-photograph on p. 39 is due to defective technique in making the preparation, and fortunately does not represent the true state of affairs.

BRITISH POLITICAL LEADERS. By Justin McCarthy. (Unwin. 7s. 6d. net.)

SKETCHES of a baker's dozen of politicians, with a baker's dozen of portraits. Mr. McCarthy appears to use the word "leaders" with a cheerful, but perhaps pardonable, looseness. We had no idea that Mr. Labouchere or Mr. James Bryce were "political leaders," and Mr. McCarthy's pages do not convince us. However, the label is not of much account, and Mr. McCarthy's book is pleasant enough. Pleasant, we think, is the word that best describes it; the author is urbane, easy, and superficial; he lets us know that he has his preferences, of course, but mainly by omissions. Only one Conservative politician, for instance, is included, with the exception of Mr. Chamberlain. It is evident that Mr. McCarthy cannot forget that he was once leader of the Irish Parliamentary Party, just as it is evident that he takes no particular account of the matters of the hour.

Mr. McCarthy writes lucidly and with a certain quiet effectiveness; the qualities which made his "History of Our Own Times" so readable are to be found in the present volume, but on the whole the level of the work is not so high. Mr. McCarthy strikes us as a born journalist, with a more than ordinary tincture of letters; he has a considerable command of words, but no true perception of their vitality. Here is a fair example of the manner of the present volume:—

Balfour is a man of many and varied tastes and pursuits. He is an advocate of athleticism and is specially distinguished for his devotion to the game of golf. . . . He was for a while a leading member, if not the actual inventor, of a certain order of psychical research whose members were described as The Souls.

We like best the studies of Mr. Balfour, Mr. Morley, and Lord Aberdeen. It cannot be said that Mr. McCarthy's volume is either a contribution to literature or to our intimate understanding of the men with whom he deals; but it is a pleasant, chatty book, for which we are mildly grateful.

Messrs. Chapman and Hall have completed their excellent "Biographical Edition" of Dickens by the issue of "Our Mutual Friend," "Edwin Drood," and "Collected Papers." In the last volume have been brought together a number of Dickens's scattered writings, all the editorial addresses which can definitely be referred to him, and a complete collection of the Prefaces. Concerning the prefaces Mr. Waugh writes: "The present editor owes the idea of their inclusion to the kind and valued suggestion of Mr. Swinburne, who, while expressing a generous encouragement of the present edition, added that it seemed to him highly desirable that all the prefaces contributed to all editions of the works should be reprinted in the final volume." The volume appropriately concludes with the generous appreciation of Thackeray, which appeared in "Cornhill" after Thackeray's death.

Fiction.

Supernatural.

THE WIND IN THE ROSE BUSH. By Mary E. Wilkins. (Murray. 6s.)

THIS volume contains six stories, all dealing with the supernatural. One only have we read with any pleasure, one only has given us the thrill which we take to be the inevitable tribute to the success of such work. Miss Wilkins approaches her subject in too trivial a spirit; to deal adequately with the unknown possibilities which comprise what we call, broadly, the supernatural, requires a certain acuteness of spiritual insight, the faculty of relating the manifestations described with some reasonable human quality. Merely to invent occult manifestations is to treat the whole subject too lightly; we no longer care for ingenuities of invention in such matters; the old ghost story is happily almost dead, and we are sorry to see a writer like Miss Wilkins employing her talent upon such tales as these. Such merit as they possess, with the one exception indicated, lies in the characterization; but it strikes us as curious that an author whose grasp of character is so considerable should fail to impress us when she turns to what is, after all, of no value whatever, save it can be related to human experience or touched with human reason.

Take the story called "The Southwest Chamber." This room was the death-chamber of a selfish and bad-tempered old lady. The house which contained it passed to two nieces, who, being poor, took in boarders. When the story opens the disused room is prepared for the reception of a schoolmistress. At once the mysteries begin: a gown which had been safely packed away is discovered swaying about in a wardrobe; a girl carries up a jug of water and discovers it to be empty, dry, and dusty; the schoolmistress is nearly strangled in bed by an old-fashioned lace cap, which floats about the room like a conjuror's property; the furniture covers are suddenly and mysteriously changed, and finally one of the nieces, attempting to solve the mystery, sees the dead aunt's face in the glass instead of her own. We cannot conjecture to what end all this pother is directed. A poor writer might sit down and evolve such meaningless incidents by the ream; but Miss Wilkins is not a poor writer, and we are left wondering why on earth she set her hand to such uninspiring and solemn foolery.

"Luella Miller" is the one story which appears to us to have any justification. It has a certain spiritual significance and suggestion, and rises, in all respects, far above the level of its companions in the volume. The beautiful, helpless, and mysteriously attractive Luella, under whose influence all those with whom she comes into close contact die, is a personality which is almost credible. The idea, of course, is old—as old as legend itself, but Miss Wilkins has reset it in a convincing and every-day atmosphere. The conclusion, too, is well in the plane of the narrative, and has a kind of inevitable justice. "The Lost Ghost" has a touch of pathos, though it is particularly and gratuitously unpleasant.

The fact seems to be that not one story writer in a thousand can touch the supernatural either with effect or discretion—we may add, perhaps, with reverence. For ourselves, we can derive no pleasure from the gyrations of silk gowns and night-caps; if the supernatural is to be dealt with, and we do not at all imply that it should not be dealt with, we look for deeper understanding, or at any rate, some grip of essentials. Miss Wilkins appears to us to have made an unfortunate experiment.

PIGS IN CLOVER. By Frank Danby. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THERE are two ways of pessimism in art; one traces the cruelty of circumstance, the other of humanity. From this passionate novel, which we have seen miscalled "smart," we cull a sentence that shows Frank Danby's way of pessimism. "The bright elusive womanhood which had bewitched Karl, Louis saw shy and wild, and he wanted it, as men always want to bring down wild things." It is then a woman whom we see piloted into tragedy in reading these pages; and, in fact, they reveal two women whom Charon could hardly have conducted to shores gloomier than those they reached. One is a politician's neglected daughter, whose Quixotic generosity entraps her into a foul marriage whence she emerges a creature who "always did what she was told." The other is an author famous for a novel of South Africa, and she is the bright elusive lady in our quotation. The man whom she thought might inspire a chapter wheedles her into adultery, snubs her pen into silence, finally lays his mean and faithless spirit bare before her, yet never calls to the loving animal in her nature without shaking her with a frenzy of obedience. For he is essentially Bel-Ami, a creature with genius in his flesh like the debauched journalist who prowls through De Maupassant's immortal pigstye. There is no escape from his evil allurements save by death or flight.

Imagine these women moving in the highest circles about the time of the Jameson Raid. Imagine finance in hundreds of thousands, and controlling them a great soft-hearted Jew who bawls that when the Jew is honoured as a Jew he will shout in his synagogue "I believe in Christ; thank the great God I can say it now." There is indeed plenty of bustle and chatter and "actuality" to persuade us that Joan and Aline are women of an unremote yesterday. The vulgar references to Gladstone are to be regretted, and it must be confessed that the identification of fictitious persons with public events is managed rather unadroitly. One suspects a roman à clef, but there is neither lock nor key. The strength and intensity of the novel, however, are beyond dispute.

THE PAGAN AT THE SHRINE. By Paul Gwynne. (Constable. 6s.)

MR. GWYNNE'S first book contained sufficient promise to lead us to expect something above the average in his second. We cannot say that our expectations have been altogether fulfilled. In some ways "The Pagan at the "Shrine" is an advance upon "Marta." There is greater distinction of style, for one thing, and the story is better constructed and less melodramatic, with the exception of the rather surprising climax, which is neither good melodrama nor good realism. But, as so often happens with second books, the qualities that are born of experience have succeeded to a certain extent in stifling the freshness of the author's earlier work; and the whole book is spoiled by a straining after effect and a tendency to exaggerate what was already good enough in "Marta." The local colour is an instance of this. Mr. Gwynne knows his Spain, and when he is not feeling self-conscious about it, he can make it into very vivid pictures for us. But in "The Pagan at the Shrine" he seems bent on showing us how much he does know about Spain, and his local colour becomes a series of minute descriptions that never make a picture at all. His characters, too, lack the lightness of touch that would make them live; and in spite of his laboured analysis of them, they remain to the last a set of lay figures in whom we find it difficult to feel any ordinary human interest. The Jesuit father, who is the principal character in the book, is the only one who seems to us a real person at all; and even he fails to inspire us with the interest that should leave us affected by his tragic fate. As a matter of fact, the horrible ending to the book leaves us comparatively indifferent, so little is it led up to, and so unaffected are we by what happens to the people concerned. It seems to us unnecessary and gratuitous that the innocent hero should die unavenged and the innocent heroine go out of her mind, because of the mistaken zeal of a Jesuit priest; but that is all. As we have said, it is neither good melodrama nor good realism; and until Mr. Gwynne makes up his mind to choose between the two we do not think his work will be convincing work. The pity is the greater, because we feel that he has something in him that is not to be found in the average novelist.

THE BONNET CONSPIRATORS. By Violet Simpson. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE era of romance, in England at least, seems to close in the year of Waterloo, when Napoleon was still the Bogey man and there were smugglers with their luggers on the South coast. Doubtless in time the era of romance will creep forward behind the age of progress. But Miss Simpson has made a pretty story of Marie and the bonnet she was trimming for her aunt, Lady Hepzibah, for the tale is deftly woven round the bit of lace that was required for its perfection. Lady Hepzibah's bit of lace had been given to Marie, and by Marie given to her brother Jacques. But Jacques had put it in pledge for £50. Nevertheless, being a young gentleman with a turn for adventure, he arrives in the nick of time with a bundle of contraband lace, and as Marie cannot confess to her aunt, or to the revenue officer who turns up with Mr. Devignes (a mysterious person with a pseudonym), she has to sit quietly pinching a bloodstained bit of lace into her aunt's bonnet. Marie, we may say, is a very delightful heroine of the Georgian epoch, and in all the swirl of events that follow upon the appearance of that bundle of lace she keeps her head above water and never goes back on her brother. In telling the story Miss Simpson has forgotten that England was not apprehensive of French invasion in 1815. Nelson had seen to that before he fell on the "Victory" ten years before. But Marie made the bonnet, and neither the Commandant nor Mr. Devignes could stop her. At the end "Lady Hepzibah, leaning on the Commandant's arm, wore the Bonnet at Marie's wedding."

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

IN THE GUARDIANSHIP OF GOD. By FLORA ANNIE STEEL.

A volume containing seventeen short stories dealing with India in Mrs. Steel's individual way. Some of the titles are: "The Most Nailing Bad Shot in Creation"; "The Squaring of the Gods"; "The Keeper of the Pass"; "On the Old Salt Road." The opening story tells of two brothers, one of whom was the Overseer of a gaol in which his brother had to work out a ten years' sentence. How Shureef, the criminal, got square with Shurruf the Overseer, is told with Mrs. Steel's accustomed ease and force. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH. By SAMUEL BUTLER.

A posthumous work by the author of "Erewhon." A note tells us that it was begun in 1872, and that the author was engaged upon it intermittently until 1884. "It is therefore, to a great extent, contemporaneous with 'Life and Habit,' and may be taken as a practical illustration of the theory of heredity embodied in that book." The story deals with an English family which had risen from obscurity, and extends over about two-thirds of the nineteenth century. It is deliberate, philosophical, and thoroughly characteristic of its author. (Richards. 6s.)

BONDMAN FREE. By JOHN OXENHAM.

The story opens in a court of law. The hero is condemned to a year's imprisonment for embezzling money from his employer in order to take his dying wife to a warmer climate, to which she had been ordered by her doctor. The book is occupied with the struggles of a man who had committed a crime punishable by law, but justified on broad ethical grounds, to regain his position in the world. In this he at last succeeds, by the help of the judge who had convicted him. (Hurst and Blackett. 6s.)

A NE'ER DO WELL. By VALENTINE CARYL.

The fifty-fourth volume of "The Pseudonym Library." The hero was the son of a deaf-and-dumb Italian peasant who, after her lover's tragic end, fled into "absolute solitude amongst the forest-covered hills. . . . Thus the boy grew up without ever seeing the face of any other than Anastasia, or ever hearing human speech." His father's violin is the first voice to him, and his career as a musician makes a pathetic, if somewhat fantastic, study. From the "hideous applause" of his great success he fled away once more from the "intolerable smiling faces . . . out into the wide world." (Unwin. 1s. 6d.)

THE DAY OF PROSPERITY. By PAUL DEVINNE.

"A Vision of the Century to Come." In the first chapter the hero strolls into the "summer garden" of an American café, where he meets the old Doctor who has found "the potent elixir that shall lengthen man's days and mingle life with death." Before long we are in the year 2000, with opportunities of observing its customs, laws, governments, airships, and its "realm of woman." But on the last page the hero is still in the New York café. A book has been written while he dozed over his stein of beer. (Greening. 6s.)

We have also received; "A Rustic Dreamer," by Wilkinson Sherren (Chapman); "Old Squire," by B. K. Benson (Macmillan); "Mr. Incoul's Misadventure," by Edgar Saltus (Greening); "Cap'n Simeon's Store," by George S. Wasson (Houghton, Mifflin); "Love and a Cottage," by Keble Howard (Richards); "Up To-morrow," by W. Carter Platts (Long); "All the Winners," by Nathaniel Gubbins (Long); "In Happy Hollow," by Max Adeler (Ward, Lock); "Twixt God and Mammon," by W. E. Tirebuck (Heinemann); "Knitters in the Sun," by Algernon Gissing (Chatto).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/8
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue	1/5

Hereabouts.

LONDON round about the ACADEMY office is so full of memories that whenever we are drawn to this subject we are fain to seize upon the first trifle rather than lose ourselves in contemplation of the whole. Here are two books: "The Fascination of London: Holborn" (Black), the joint work of the late Sir Walter Besant and Mr. Mitton, and "Staple Inn: its History" (Bumpus), by Mr. T. Cato Worsfold; they would lead us into reverie and inconsequence if we turned their pages too long. As it happens, they conspire to break their own spell by repeating—both of them—the venerably dubious story that Dr. Johnson wrote "Rasselas" in Staple Inn. Here we are within the dimensions of a theme; here is a bone on which we can fall.

The longevity of a loose statement in topography is marvellous. Let some amiably unscrupulous scribe attach a story to a building, and his scrupulously amiable successors will go on repeating it to the children of men. Mr. Mitton, co-worker with Sir Walter Besant, says of Staple Inn,

Dr. Johnson wrote parts of "Rasselas" here.

Mr. Worsfold in his handsome history of the Inn tells us:

The little story book referred to [in a letter we shall quote] was "Rasselas," the greater part of which, if not the whole, was written in Staple Inn.

These are but the last voices. Mr. Hare wrote in his "Walks in London,"

It was to Staple Inn that Dr. Johnson removed from Gough Square (March 23, 1759) and here that—to pay the expenses of his mother's funeral and fulfil the few debts she left behind her—he wrote in the evenings of one week what he describes to Miss Porter as a little story book, i.e., his "Rasselas," for which he received £100.

Thornbury, in "Old and New London," after quoting this letter to Miss Porter, says:

The little story book was "Rasselas," which he seems to have written here, at least, in part.

In Darlington's "London and Environs" we read:

Here Dr. Johnson lived for a while, and here, to defray the expenses of his mother's funeral, he wrote in the evenings of one week, his "Rasselas."

Now what are the facts? On March 23, 1859, Dr. Johnson wrote the following letter to his step-daughter, Miss Lucy Porter, who in January had nursed his mother in her last illness at Lichfield. The italics are ours:

Dear Madam,—I beg your pardon for having so long omitted to write. One thing or other has put me off. I have this day moved my things and you are now to direct to me at Staple Inn, London. I hope, my dear, you are well, and Kitty mends. I wish her success in her trade. I am going to publish a little story book which I will send you when it is out. Write to me, my dearest girl, for I am always glad to hear from you. I am, my dear, your humble servant,

SAM. JOHNSON.

"Rasselas," we know, was published "in March or April" of this year (Boswell). If it was published in March there is an end to the controversy, because after the date of Johnson's entry into Staple Inn (March 23), there remained only eight days in this month for the completion of the story by himself and its issue by the publishers—an obvious impossibility. Is that impossibility seriously diminished if we grant that publication might have taken place at the end of April? We think not, for this is to allow only five weeks at the most for the completion of the story by Johnson, his negotiations with the three booksellers who joined to buy it, and the printing and production of the book. That this unanimous haste was used is incredible.

But why discuss it, when other and more patent difficulties abound? We know, by Johnson's own statement to Sir Joshua Reynolds, that "Rasselas" was written in the evenings of one week, and that it went to press in portions as it was written. Thus, our topographers condemn themselves by the very moderation of their statements. They nearly all suggest that parts of "Rasselas" were written in Staple Inn; not perceiving that this implies that Johnson wrote his beautiful story in the six evenings of the very week in which he removed from Gough Square (after ten years' residence) to his chambers in Staple Inn; wrote that is to say, some of its chapters in the turmoil of his departure from Fleet Street and the rest in the turmoil of his arrival in Holborn. Unwilling as we are to put any limit to his powers, we decline to believe that "Rasselas" was written under these conditions. But again we spend argument, for what were Johnson's own words on the day of his arrival at Staple Inn? He wrote to his step-daughter—

I am going to publish a little story book, which I will send you when it is out.

If words have any meaning (and Johnson had spent many years on his "Dictionary") this shows that the story was already in the publishers' hands. It is not conceivable that he would write "I am going to publish" and "when it is out," if this, his first essay in fiction, were not finished. On all these grounds it appears to us the height of improbability that Johnson wrote either the whole or a part of "Rasselas" in Staple Inn. Yet we know of no other evidence for the story than this letter to Miss Porter, which Mr. Worsfold calmly quotes as if it supported the legend instead of demolishing it. The truth is that topographers know their readers to be hungry for anecdote and athirst for sentiment; and, like good fellows, they do their best for them. Whyspoil a pleasant tale? Because Staple Inn is secluded, because its pavement is cobbled, and its plane trees green and murmurous, therefore Johnson wrote "Rasselas" within its walls. After all, he was within an ace of doing it: so—tush!—he did it.

For our part, we think that the truth is just as picturesque. It is as good to think that the grim old house which still stands in Gough Square was the scene of that six-nights' toil. Here from night to night the pilgrimage progressed; here Imlac grew eloquent and Pequah timid; here the Pyramids were measured, and the Astronomer rescued from the mists of a distraught imagination; and here, at some dead hours of the night, when the boom of St. Paul's put its own melancholy accent on a theme as old as man and elusive as his breath, Johnson penned that quiet "Conclusion in which nothing is concluded," save only that when the Nile fell the little band of frustrate souls returned to Abyssinia.

Let us, then, hear no more about "Rasselas" in Staple Inn. If we have seemed to labour the point it is because we think that these reach-me-down trimmings of topography, which are passed from writer to writer—each resolute, perhaps, to be thorough in one direction, but willing to be led in others—ought to be relegated to limbo. Indeed, such a statement as the one we have discussed seems less pardonable, because more dangerous than an honest "howler" such, for instance, as rears its head on page 45 of Sir Walter Besant's and Mr. Mitton's Holborn booklet.

Here we find Southampton House, at the head of Chancery Lane, identified as the residence of Lord William Russell, and as an incident in his journey from Newgate to the scaffold in Lincoln's Inn Fields. The writers have made the extraordinary mistake of confusing this Southampton House with the Southampton House which occupied the north side of Bloomsbury Square, of which Southampton Street, Holborn, is a name-relic. The Chancery Lane Southampton House was taken down about the year 1652, thirty-one years before Lord William Russell paid the penalty of his participation in the Rye House Plot. The point of a pathetic story disappears under this error. As the procession to the scaffold turned into Little Queen Street to reach Lincoln's Inn Fields, Lord William Russell looked towards his home in Bloomsbury and remarked to Bishop Burnet, "I have often turned to the other hand with great comfort, but now I turn to this with greater." Yet a tear dimmed his eye as he looked towards his home. Unfortunately, in ascribing to the Chancery Lane mansion a history that does not belong to it, our topographers have omitted all mention of its sovereign interest as the home of the Earl who befriended Shakespeare, and to whom he may have written the Sonnets, and, as a corollary, all mention of Hazlitt, who, on this very spot, two centuries later, pursued his Shakespearian studies. We have before now expressed our inability to see a happy relation between the "Fascination of London" booklets, and the great Besantine "Survey" of which they are proclaimed to be "disjecta membra." We should have supposed that this great topographical banquet would have cut up into many substantial meals; but, with the exception of one lordly dish, "London in the Eighteenth Century," it has emerged as a series of topographical custards—pretty, palatable, and unimportant. Is the issue of these cates altogether just to the memory of Sir Walter Besant, who, however he failed as a scientific historian, was as true a lover of London as ever walked her streets?

A Colonial Poet.

THOMAS PRINGLE, the poet of "Ephemerides" and "African Sketches," was born at Blaiklaw, in pleasant Tivvydale, in the year 1789. He adopted literature as a profession, at a time little favourable to poets, under the auspices of Sir Walter Scott, to whom, a decade later, his chief work was dedicated. The history of his life may be told in a few words: he married, edited "Blackwood," emigrated to the Cape, returned to England, became secretary of the Anti-Slavery Society, lived forty-five years, died in town, and was buried in Bunhill Fields. His "African Sketches" supply, as it were, the coloured illustrations to the above dusty tale.

Coming just when he did, into surroundings such as those of the Edinburgh literary coteries of the early nineteenth century, it is difficult to see how Pringle could have made anything else of his genius. Burns had come and gone, leaving behind him a bright track in the literary heavens, but Scott had followed close upon him, and the younger men followed Scott. It was too true that and we find in Scotch poetry of the time a rambling, ambling looseness, a pleasant ease in trotting, due partly to the fondness of the Scotch intellect for the folk ballad, but due chiefly to the Shirra's successful pandering to that fondness. Pringle's verse is Abbotsfordian, though in one or two places he would seem to have had in mind that gentler model Allan Ramsay. Abbotsfordian verse is eminently the verse of a man hurried, or lightly moved, or careless of crushing out the last grain of gold from the ore in hand. Never to care for the perfect expression of the white supreme emotion—never to cultivate the white supreme emotion while man's general food remained mere oatmeal—these were the tenets of the Abbotsfordian school, to preach which they wasted much good paper.

A body kens the Shirra,

Often in Pringle one comes across lines which are fine, and which haunt the imagination; but still oftener we meet the uncompleted line, the line which a sensitive ear rejects and which anyone with a feeling for verse could turn to something different and, indeed, better.

Here are two lines from a "Noon Day Dream":—

Was formed but of vile and crumbling dust,
Unfit to withstand the Avenger's thrust.

One reads them hurriedly, accenting four syllables as one reads: "vile," "dust," "stand," and "thrust." Nothing is gained by the gallop of the metre save some rest for those tired of the heroic couplet. The very rush and hurry of the lines point to an author careless of precise and precious finish. The same poem has a line which shows very curiously how slight an alteration renders a bad verse good:—

Sailing supreme 'mid his solitudes.

Nothing is gained by the hurry of the rhythm. The accent is thrown carelessly upon the relatively unimportant "his" and the utterly unimportant "tudes." The verse jars one as it comes from the tongue. It is more fitting for the eagle checking on a deer than for the eagle going gradually, solemnly, over wide tracts of blue air. Suppose one wrote:—

Sailing supreme a-mid his solitudes.

With all Pringle's looseness and lack of finish, there is, in his poetry, a note of instinctive selection which flashes out curiously in his choice of words. He has a way of getting in adjectives of minute propriety; words simple in themselves, but when used in certain ways strangely effective as colour, or space, or even landscape. One instance of this curious verbal felicity occurs in his best known poem:—

Afar in the Desert I love to ride
With the silent Bush-boy alone by my side.

The use of the word "silent" has always seemed to me a master stroke. A word was wanted to qualify the Bush-boy; "silent" alone expressed that happy compound of smell and savagery, but the word went further. It gave one the feeling of the wide brown space, lying in a great hush, in a still awe, under a merciless sun. It alone gives the Desert and the picture of its mute tribes. The other words might with perfect taste be applied to some jaunt in a motor car.

Like all, or very nearly all, of our Colonial poets, Pringle is at his best when in the pleased sadness of reminiscence. Like Gordon, he sets himself out to prove the truth of a certain line in Horace, and proves it. He views the Colony, as Gordon viewed Australia, as something outside of, and about him. He is always a poet in a landscape, generally a poet on horseback in a landscape. He is never quite in touch with the landscape. It is something alien, a something to which he was not born, to which he cannot respond. It tells him nothing. All that he had to tell he brought with him from over sea. It lies there solemn and vast, mysterious as a sphinx, magical, "silent," under the sun and the stars. Pringle reins in and looks at it a little sadly from his pony. At its best it is but a setting to his notion of the patriarchs. It is not his land. It is not home to him. Home, home is a holier place than this barren veldt. Home is away by Tivvydale, where there are gowans to pu' and rowans to rhyme to them—where there are birks and braes and bonny dun deer. Then he begins to be a poet:—

O, bonny grows the broom on Blaiklaw knowes,
And the birk in Clifton dale;
And green are the hills o' the milk-white ewes,
By the briary banks o' Cayle.

It is curious that in "The Rock of Reconciliation," the only poem in which Pringle takes an evident sensuous joy in the consideration of South African landscape, he introduces a Scotch missionary, "grave, but not gloomy," merely (the reader feels) to keep him from the waefu' sin of idolatry in strange places. The luscious passage quoted below has a feeling for beauty in it that is strange in a Scotchman, and doubly strange in a Scotchman probably ignorant of Keats:—

And thatched with leaves,
The sweet wild jasmine clustering to its eaves,
It stood, with its small casement gleaming through Between two ancient cedars. Round it grew
Clumps of acacias and young orange bowers,
Pomegranate hedges, gay with scarlet flowers,
And pale-stemmed fig-trees with their fruit yet green.

All musical it seemed with humming bees;
And bright-plumed sugar-birds among the trees
Fluttered like living blossoms.

His poems have still a slight sale in Edinburgh. He was hardly the man to strike a deep note upon any sort of lyre, and his appeal is limited, and not very importunate. One puts him with the others who have sung songs (not necessarily polemical) in strange lands—with Gordon, and Patteson, and that greater than these, D. C. Scott. One thinks of him a little sadly—he was a man of fine fibre—sitting over the camp fire under the stars, thinking of Blaiklaw, the green hills of Bonny Scotland, of the lost days, and

The birks of Clifton dale.

The Ethics of Parody.

How far is the parodist justified? And what are the limits of his legitimate dealings with literature? The question arises before us as we lay down Mr. H. W. Boynton's "The Golfer's Rubáiyat" (Grant Richards). For we are conscious that there are some parodies which have brought with them both amusement and instruction—it has often been pointed out that parody at its best is a valuable form of criticism. There are others that hurt the literary sense like the dentist's touch upon an exposed nerve. This little volume is a parody of FitzGerald. It hurts the literary sense. We ask ourselves why? And the investigation into the cause of our suffering leads to certain conclusions as to the ethics of parody.

Mr. Boynton has taken FitzGerald's rendering of Omar Khayyam stanza by stanza with the remorselessness of an auctioneer's catalogue, and with the alteration of a word there and there has brought the philosophy of Omar down to the golf links. The task, being done, looks easy of accomplishment, and each quatrain, staring from its own page, is the obvious degradation of the corresponding quatrain of FitzGerald. We will quote the twelfth and he thirteenth:—

A Bag of Clubs, a Silvertown or two,
A Flask of Scotch, a Pipe of Shag—and Thou
Beside me caddying in the Wilderness—
Ah, Wilderness were Paradise enow.

Some for the weekly Handicap; and some Sigh for a greater Championship to come;
Ah, play the Match, and let the Medal go,
Nor heed old Bogey with his wretched Sum.

We will quote no more, but implore the reader straightway to forget these stanzas when they have served their purpose of illustrating what a parody ought not to be. For a parody should certainly be an addition to literature, if it is to be welcomed, not a subtraction from it. If it is designed to spoil our enjoyment of a great work by suggesting undertones of triviality it is an outrage which should be strenuously resented. For our own part we are furiously resentful, since we have to make a fierce effort to forget the travesty before we can return to the original with the usual zest.

What then are the limits of legitimate parody? Shall we not say that the first rule of the game is that no masterpiece shall be turned into verbal triviality? A travesty of the Lord's Prayer or the Sermon on the Mount would offend the most unemotional agnostic. Shakespeare seems to be immune, for no one has ever even tried to travesty his style—he is above style—and the innumerable travesties of "To be or not to be" have left the great monologue serenely uninjured. But for the rest, criticism or suggestion marks the limit; and the warning-bell should ring when the parody passes from the spirit of the author to the letter, when the parodist deliberately takes a masterpiece and degrades it, so that the infernal tinkle of the parody rings in our ears as we strain to listen to the music of the spheres.

Many instances of the legitimate parody occur as the pen runs. The late Bret Harte's "condensed novels" never took a moment of pleasure from the reader of the stories he burlesqued. His was not verbal parody, not of the letter which kills. He took the method and produced it in a straight line till it met absurdity. Nor did anyone find "Lothair" spoiled by the reading of "Lothaw." The same may be said of Sir F. Burnand's "Strapmore," and the man who laughed over the burlesque could go back to "Strathmore" with unimpaired emotion. Calverley, with his acute literary sense and his amazing power of rhyme, was one of the finest parodists who ever wrote. Yet he worked entirely by suggestion—and criticism of the method. Take the "Ode to Tobacco," which is cast in the metre of Longfellow's "Skeleton in Armour." There is just one hint of the original:—

I have a liking old
For thee, though manifold
Stories, I know, are told,
Not to thy credit.

"I was a Viking old." It is a mere allusion that would despoil no one of any enjoyment he could get from the "Skeleton in Armour." And was there ever a better parody of a great poet—and a more innocuous one—than Calverley's "The Cock and the Bull":—

You see this pebble stone? It's a thing I bought
Of a bit of a chit of a boy i' the mid o' the day—
I like to dock the smaller parts o' speech,
As we curtail the already curtail'd cur.
(You catch the paronomasia, play 'po' words?)
Well, to my muttons. I purchased the concern,
And clapt it i' my poke, having given for same
By way o' chop, swap, barter or exchange—and so on. But though you recognise Browning instantly you will find this merely a humorous criticism of Browning—Browning's method produced to absurdity, and no single poem is dragged in the mud of travesty. You return to Browning with a sane consciousness of the spots on your sun. Coming to contemporaries we find Mr. Owen Seaman following the same course in the "Battle of the Bays":—

Washed white from the stain of Astarte
My verse any virgin may buy.

Do we need to quote further to indicate the sensuous swing of Swinburnian verse? Yet the parody is not verbal, it fastens parasitically on no masterpiece; it is critical; it adds to our insight and does not subtract from our literary enjoyment. Here, perhaps, we find the touchstone of legitimate parody. It is easy enough to turn Wagner on the piano organ, to hurl Raphael through a magic lantern, and to take Omar for a round of golf. But by so doing we are depreciating an intellectual security. These are the things that help, console, inspire. Is it worth while to barter them for a laugh at three and sixpence (net)?

Impressions.

XXXIII.—A Frenchman.

HE was a noticeable man, and yet at first I hardly noticed him; but by the end of the week, the regularity of his habits, and his way of always idling at a fixed hour drew him into the spectacle of my life. I looked for him when the clock struck ten, waited to see the tall, grey-clad figure emerge from beneath the trees at the end of the Quai D'Orsay, cross the bridge, and stroll down the Quai Voltaire. At the statue he would turn: then began the purpose of his walk. On the outward journey he paced in the middle of the pavement, sniffing the air, glancing at the river, frowning at the horrid din of the electric cars: he was then the man of affairs; but on the homeward journey he became the bibliophile. I do not believe that there was a single box of old books on the quai wall that he did not investigate each morning. He treated the thumbed paper volumes reverently, and sometimes he bought a book. His face, small and well-shaped, was pale with that seasoned pallor that sun or wind cannot mark, and little lines puckered from the eyes and mouth. He wore a small iron-grey imperial beard and moustache, and from behind his pince-nez a pair of shrewd, observant eyes peered out upon the world. Neat and methodical in his habits, clear and logical in his mind, he seemed a type of the best kind of Frenchman, enjoying the pageant of life, never excited, never morbid, taking things at their true worth, not offended by views he could not accept, merely acknowledging urbanely that they were different from his own.

I proposed to make his acquaintance—and succeeded. There was a block of vehicles on the Pont Royal and, it not being his way to dodge under the horses' heads, he waited patiently on the kerb till he could cross, and I stood by his side. Then happened one of those small incidents that photograph themselves on the mind. Darting across the road (he did not wait) was a student from the South—a picturesque figure. A sombrero hat was perched on his rich black hair: he had pale, aquiline features and dark eyes, and he was dressed in a suit of corded velvet, open at the front, showing an unstarched linen shirt, surmounted by a flowing black tie. A party of English travellers—three women and a man—caught sight of him, and all turned to stare, not rudely, but certainly inquisitively. The student observed their glances, and—raised his hat.

My Frenchman smiled with pleasure, our eyes met, and we talked of courtesy: then of England. He was conversant with our literature, our art, our social life, and our newspapers. He had been reading in a London journal of a proposal to start a School of the Humanities at the London University, and for an hour that sunny morning we paced up and down the Tuileries gardens, he advocating, with gentle insistence, that the need of our time was for the teaching of the Humanities. The day, the surroundings, were in accord with his plea. Under the trees where we walked there was a hawk of photographs who had paused in his work to feed the sparrows. Numbers of birds collected around him: he knew them all, and when he called one by the name he had given to it, saying, "Gabrielle come," it would perch on his finger and eat from his hand.

We paced to and fro while this quiet Frenchman, ripe, and not in the least desirous to be plucked from the life he had learned to understand so well, dreamed aloud to a stranger of a wider outlook on life, of a larger self for the individual. The sun shone, the pedlar fed the sparrows, around us outstretched the most stimulating city in the world: then, having met for a little while, we parted. My eyes followed that erect, wise figure, till I lost it behind Fremiet's shining Joan of Arc.

Drama.

The Ideal Spectator.

THERE have been some new plays during the last ten days, and of these I suppose that something or other will have to be said, ultimately. But I confess that, for the moment, I am more interested in the exposition of the faith of a dramatic critic which my eminent confrère, Mr. A. B. Walkley, has put forth in three lectures delivered at the London Institution and since published, under the title of "Dramatic Criticism," by Mr. Murray. I need hardly say that these lectures display all the fundamental seriousness, the ready wit, and the range of allusion wherewith Mr. Walkley is wont to adorn the startled pages of a contemporary. What is more, they bristle with points of controversy, and points on which I, for one, shall always be ready to break a lance. Full as they are of sound sense, humour, and psychological insight, the main impression which they leave upon me is of what has before now been given as the definition of tragedy—the good man struggling with adversity. Mr. Walkley's principal object would appear to be to reconcile the irreconcilables, to persuade himself and others that it is possible at one and the same time to practice "impressionist" criticism and to be a disciple, in aesthetics, of Aristotle. The discrepancy is veiled by a discreet arrangement of topics, but it is at the root of the book all the same.

Mr. Walkley is concerned, partly to define, and partly to apologise for, the critic. He starts with an assumption, that the critic may be identified with the "ideal spectator"—ὁ χαρπύς—of Aristotle, the man of taste and cultivation, whose judgment is the final court of appeal on aesthetic questions, just as the judgment of the man with an enlightened experience of life—ὁ φρόνιμος or ὁ σκορδαίος—is the final court of appeal on questions of ethics. And then he sets off on a hunt for this ideal spectator amongst the various inhabitants of the boxes, stalls, pit, and gallery. He declines to identify him with "the man in the pit," because "the man in the pit," being one of a crowd, is subject to the laws of collective psychology "and his mind approximates to the mind of primitive man." He declines to identify him with Tolstoy's "respected, wise, educated, country labourer," apparently because the labourer also, cannot dissociate himself from the crowd of which he forms part. He declines to identify him with the cultivated man, the "amateur" of the arts as opposed to the "expert," because he considers that the worst sort of amateur is only a reed in the wind of fashion, and that the best sort of amateur, the brain worker, prefers a Gaiety burlesque to any "high-class" entertainment. And he declines to identify him with the producer of literature, because "the excellent, the invaluable Aristotle," said that "a pilot is a better judge of a helm than a carpenter, or one of the company of a dinner than the cook." And so he is driven back upon the "expert," the professional critic, whose business it is not only, like the rest of the audience, to enjoy a play, but also to "appraise and justify" his enjoyment, to produce his criticism, to be, in his way, an artist, as well as a consumer of art. It is his function to be "the one man in the theatre, whose business it is to react against the crowd, to 'sit tight,' as the phrase is, and to preserve the independence of his personal judgment, the captaincy of his soul." I am bound to say that, whether as interpretation of Aristotle or as analysis of the psychology of criticism, all this appears to me to be very largely wrong. In the first place I think it is clear that when Aristotle was talking about ἡ χάρις, he had not the professional critic in his mind at all. There were no journals in Greece and therefore, let it be hoped, no professional critics. And surely the "ideal playgoer" whom Aristotle had in his mind was precisely one of those persons with whom Mr. Walkley refused to identify him, namely, the man of general cultivation, who was rather unkindly put down as declining to interest himself in anything except a Gaiety burlesque after business hours. Just as the standard of ethical conduct is in the man who has had an experience of life which enables him to judge it in its practical aspects, so the standard of art is in the man—probably the same man—who has had an experience of life which enables him to judge it in that imitation, criticism or transvaluation of its practical aspects in which, precisely, art consists. One is not, of course, bound to accept the implicit view of Aristotle that ἡ χάρις, the man of culture, is the only such standard. There is still Tolstoy's "respected, wise, educated country labourer" to be reckoned with. Mr. W. B. Yeats, whose activities, revolutionary and aesthetic, are becoming quite bewildering, was lecturing at Westminster the other day upon "The Ideal Theatre," and I thought he put this matter rather well. Art, he said, or words to this effect, is a transference of ideas and emotions from mind to mind. Its possibility lies in a certain simplicity of receptiveness in the mind of the receiver. And this may be found either in the peasant, unsophisticated by books or civilisation, or in the man of culture who has won through these to a new simplicity of his own. You may have a drama which will appeal to the peasant, or you may have a drama which will appeal to the man of culture; but you cannot have a drama which will appeal to the man of cities, who has put off the one simplicity without putting on the other. But, of course, Aristotle's thought is essentially urban and aristocratic, and does not contemplate a folk-art any more than it contemplates a folk-morality.

A second point which I think may be made against Mr. Walkley's theory is this. It is not the business of the critic to react against the crowd, provided that it is the right sort of crowd. React against the crowd of the pit or the stalls; that, no doubt, he must. But a crowd of quite simple people, whether peasants or men of culture, is still a crowd, and subject, as such, to the laws of collective psychology, which are permanent conditions that neither the dramatist nor the critic will be wise in trying to escape. As I conceive the Aristotelian critic, he is, or should be, only one of a group of ideal spectators, but one who, by temperament or training, has acquired a power of double consciousness, which enables him, on the one hand to become, like his neighbours, a receiver for the ideas and emotions which the dramatist is seeking to convey to him, on the other to stand aloof and scrutinise and record those ideas and emotions without any disturbance to the simplicity and sincerity of their presentment.

After all, I have not yet made my point about the inconsistency between Mr. Walkley's Aristotelianism and his impressionism. In his third lecture he adopts and expounds M. Anatole France's definition of criticism as "the adventures of a soul among masterpieces." That seems to me a very much better idea of criticism than anything you can found upon Aristotle. It represents the critic, not merely as the perfect recipient of the artist's ideas and emotions, but as transforming them by the reaction of his own personality. His utterance becomes not merely the rendering of another, but the expression of himself. As Mr. Walkley very truly points out, the distinction between criticism and creation breaks down. But from this standpoint, the more of individual temperament goes into a critical judgment the more interesting that becomes; and at the same time the less it represents Aristotle's conception of ἡ χάρις, of whose admirable constitution it is just the defect to be the least little bit too typical.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Some Dutchmen and An American.

THE contrast between the pictures at the Royal Academy, and the works by early and modern Dutch painters at the Guildhall, may be likened to the difference between a bull fight and a Sunday in an English rectory. The one is all coloured movement and din, the other quietly harmonious and still. The Dutch pictures are simple-hearted and persuasive: in the words quoted by Mr. Zangwill at the Maccabæans' dinner, "a perpetual grace to God for the beauty of common things." I had seen many of them before, but the charm of a fine Dutch picture is this: you can return to it again sure that acquaintance can never stale its quiet and unobtrusive beauty. Why this should be so I have often tried to explain, as Wordsworthians are always trying to explain the sempiternal appeal of Wordsworth. The Dutchmen, like Wordsworth, saw the beauty in common things, and looking at them, but not in the common way, made them rare. Consider such subjects as a cook asleep over her work, and a boy musical prodigy—subjects offering open arms to vulgarity and sentimentality: then visit the Guildhall and stand silently before "The Cook Asleep," by Vermeer of Delft, and "The Violinist," by Jacob Maris. The dark greys and tender blues of the latter with the player's young figure merged in its atmosphere, caressed by the twilight, suggest an artist's vision, not a painter's model. How refined is the painting of the cook's head, the white linen on her shoulders, and the depth of that inner room made credible by Vermeer's intense observation of the ways of light. Atmosphere relates all the details, and it is only after a while that you realise the full effect of that gleaming line of light on the upright of the door. Keen observation, or inspiration, which you like. A great painter, this Vermeer of Delft, who died in 1675.

Mr. W. B. Yeats has said finely in one of his essays that our thoughts and emotions are often but spray flung up from hidden tides that follow a moon no eye can see. To those hidden tides in us certain poets, painters and writers, at certain times, unforeseen, unexpected, penetrate. For me, when I visited the Guildhall exhibition it was Anton Mauve's day. He made me conscious of the movement of the hidden tide. Almost the first picture I looked at was his "Hay Cart," a little pastoral, just a hay-wagon and an attendant woman under a large grey sky flecked with blue, but how right and alluring it is. Why right? the casual reader may ask. Because it has unity and atmosphere, and because Mauve did not paint it for effect. He felt that unemphatic episode: some hidden tide within him surged responsive to its humanity. Many can achieve this lyrical note, but the test of their capacity must be sought in the large constructed landscape. There Mauve is equally the master. His large landscape, "On the Heath, Laren," has all the qualities—unity, atmosphere, soft blending of unobtrusive colours—that distinguish his hay-cart. It is infantilely simple compared with some of the pictorial-at-any-price landscapes of Mr. Alfred East and Mr. David Murray: merely a flock of sheep wandering over grass-patched sand-dunes towards a clump of trees. Like all true Dutchmen, Mauve was never happy away from his low-lying, haze-softened Holland. The Rhine scenery he hated, called it "the toy-box of Nature." This silvery-visioned painter died fifteen years ago in his native land, consoled by the presence of Israels and Lhermitte. No fewer than twenty-one of his pictures may be seen at the Guildhall, and if you wish to know how he could paint the sun, look at it piercing through the chinks of the wooden shed in his picture of "A Young Bull," and the shimmering light on the backs of his "Sheep in the Forest." I hold no brief for the foreigner, but these Dutch canvases were very restorative after the Royal Academy. There, how many pictures of weddings—the ceremony and the feast—have I not passed with a sigh: here, "A Jewish Wedding" by Israels held me for five minutes by the clock. Let me speak of it negatively: it is not vulgar, not pretentious, not new, not conspicuous, not creaseless like a garment fresh from the shop. Into it has passed from the painter's temperament that something of mystical illusion, beyond paint, beyond words, which partakes of the essence of immortality.

Probably no idea of earthly immortality, nor of the other, ever entered the jolly head of Frans Hals, but, as long as painters paint their contemporaries, his portrait of "Admiral de Ruyter" will be a joy to those who know. This burly, jovial, efficient sailor is painted just as he looked with all Hals's sure, undeviating instinct for the actual. The admiral held his gloves carelessly in his broad hand: thus Hals painted him, not adopting the tactics of a certain eminent painter of our day who fidgetted his sitter into contorting her hands into what he called an artistic position. It needed a master to indicate, with broad dashes of paint, the balloons of white linen that bunch out from the Admiral's black dress; a fine portrait; a typical example of Hals's imperial gift of enveloping the commonplace in the unconsidered garment of beauty. Having taken your fill of satisfaction from the Admiral, make a half-turn to the left where Rembrandt's portrait of his son, Titus, hangs. This is idealism, a father's undisguised pleasure in his son's comeliness. The gentle, almost tremulous handling is very different from the broad sweep of Hals's brush; but the glowing flesh-tints, the lace-trimmed shirt, the chestnut curls are not niggled. It is idealism kept within stern limits. The Corporation of London has manifold duties; when it adds to them this of showing two such fine portraits to the citizens, long, I say, may it flourish!

This remarkable exhibition also contains twenty Matthew Maris's. Never again, I imagine, will the public have an opportunity of seeing so many pictures by this gifted man who still lives and paints—in retirement. You must take Matthew Maris leisurely. He makes no appeal to the citizen in a hurry, and his drawing is not always impeccable—e.g., the primrose-yellow gowned lady with the goats, and the feet of the child in the "Butterflies" picture. But how lovely are the harmonies of his colour in "L'Enfant Couchée"—pale flesh, pale yellow hair, pale coverlet on which this watching child, in her simple blue garment, lies; what quality the accessories have in his picture of "The Spinster," and how Maeterlinckian is the atmosphere in his vision of "The Outskirts of a Town." Also will you find here his "Four Mills" and his "Ram's Head" of which Mesdag said: "That splendid head, in which everything is said that can be said—colour, line, tone, expression."

Having exhausted my powers of appreciation, I half hoped that the sketches and studies by Mr. Sargent at the Carfax Gallery would not stimulate me. But they did. Nothing could be further removed from the grey joy of Mauve's landscapes, or Maris's delicate colour harmonies, than Mr. Sargent's swagger water-colours of Venice. On one of the white walls six of them hang together, broad, splashy studies that vivified my memories of Venice in a way that I should have thought impossible. "A Palace Wall," rising brown and glowing above one of the side canals, is the very place. Then there are two water-colours of men resting on beds (one with his boots on), the extremity of clever draughtsmanship; a dashing oil-sketch of a Venetian tavern (note the touch of white paint that makes the glass held by one of the company); a haunting drawing of "The Perseus of Cellini" bronze-green on a blue ground, and a "David Visits the Camp." This charcoal drawing has all the illusion of looking through a window on to a real night scene where you perceive faint-grey figures asleep on the faint-grey ground, and two living men moving stealthily among them. It is a leap from his Venetian gaieties to such a study of repose; but this small exhibition is Mr. Sargent in holiday experimental mood, joying in work for its own sake, and with a lively understanding of his power to carry to brilliant accomplishment whatever he undertakes.

C. L. H.

Science.

One—yet divisible.

It is just a century ago that John Dalton began the setting down of his "New System of Chemistry." With that great work began the reign of the atom, one and indivisible, which has lasted for a few months less than a hundred years, and which has yielded to its successor, the atom that is yet one, indeed, but many times divided within itself. Never was Unity in multiplicity better illustrated.

What might appear to be the fundamental conception of Dalton, therefore, the belief, that is, in atoms as the ultimate particles of matter, is now obsolete, and one might say in his haste that the Manchester Literary and Philosophical Society, which has been celebrating the centenary of the atom this week, was holding high festival at its funeral and ironically commemorating the work of that great genius who was for so many years its active secretary and afterwards its president. If the smallest, simplest and lightest atom known, that of hydrogen, consists of at least one thousand parts, and is in reality a microcosm wellnigh as complex as the solar system, it might be thought that we should drop Dalton and 1803, and begin again de novo in this year of grace. And this idea has gained much credence. Those critics who answer to the familiar Disraelian adaptation of a bitter French definition are avenging themselves for their constructive failure by telling the public that atoms are a myth, that they were never more than a "working hypothesis" (phrase beloved of such critics), that the kinetic theory of gases, "the whole structure of modern chemistry," the conservation of energy and (why should they not add) the objective reality of the Universe, are "swept away at a blow." Such critics have always been, from Ionian days until ours, and it would be beside the purpose to notice them but that their attitude embodies an exceedingly common fallacy. They think that facts cease to be facts directly the accepted details of their explanation fail. So let us have it clearly set down, that if there be such a thing as an objective fact, if there be such an entity as truth, it is so absolutely; the interpretation or theory cannot condition the validity of the thing interpreted. No one by taking thought can affect facts; but only his relation to them. And before going on to what Dalton achieved let me quote from the "System of Logic" what Mill pointed out when Daltonism was young:—

If one link of an argument breaks, the whole drops to the ground; but one step towards an analysis holds good, and has an independent value, though we should never be able to make a second. The results of analytical chemistry are not the less valuable, though it should be discovered that all which we now call simple substances are really compounds. All other things are at any rate compounded of those elements: whether the elements themselves admit of decomposition is an important inquiry, but does not affect the certainty of the science up to that point.

This is closely parallel to the present case, which is that the divided, the microcosmic atom is as certain a basis of modern chemistry as the indivisible atom was a year or two ago.

What then did Dalton accomplish? The Greeks had had long before the obvious conception that matter consisted of small particles. That would occur to anyone who saw a crystal ground to powder in a mortar. Newton believed in the particulate nature of matter. But Dalton went further and showed that these atoms are of a fixed weight in any given element; and that all chemical actions proceed according to the laws thus determined. He says: "An inquiry into the relative weights of the ultimate particles of bodies is a subject, as far as I know, entirely new; I have been lately prosecuting this inquiry with remarkable success." He then gives his first crude table of atomic weights. No one before had ever ventured to weigh, even relatively, these particles, which were indeed regarded in a quasi-metaphysical light.

Following Dalton, then, we have weighed, relatively to one another, all the known elements, from hydrogen, the atomic weight of which, being the least, we call one, to radium, weighed the other day, the atom of which is more than two hundred and fifty times as heavy. Take water as a simple application of our knowledge. Its formula is H_2O . Now the oxygen atom is sixteen times as heavy as that of hydrogen; the atomic weight of oxygen is sixteen. But two atoms of hydrogen combine with one of oxygen to form water. If, therefore, the chemist mixes an ounce of hydrogen with eight ounces of oxygen and passes an electric spark through the mixture, it ignites; the hydrogen is burnt or oxidised, and water is formed. And the point is, that no residue of either gas is left. They unite exactly because they have been mixed in the proper proportions, based on their relative atomic weights. Now mix one ounce of hydrogen with sixteen of oxygen; if they unite altogether, the atomic theory says that two atoms of oxygen will unite with two of hydrogen; and so they do. The result is H_2O_2 , peroxide of hydrogen, the antiseptic basis of "Sanitas," and the body which bleaches dark hair to a certain fashionable yellow, known as "peroxide hair." All other chemical actions proceed similarly. Take the formula of any molecule you please; that of sulphuric acid, H_2SO_4 , for example. And the atomic theory says that two atoms of hydrogen and one of sulphur and four of oxygen go together to form a molecule of sulphuric acid. Combine these elements in their "atomic proportions" (in proportion to the weight of their atoms, that is) and sulphuric acid will result, without excess or deficit of any of them. But one would need pages to show the value of this theory, especially in organic chemistry, where "rings" and "chains" of atoms are combined to form molecules that may contain hundreds of them. Suffice it that Dalton is an immortal name.

And yet the atom is a microcosm. Take the simplest, and permit me to use precise figures where details cannot yet, if ever, be precise. The atom of hydrogen is now believed to consist of a central core or "ion," surrounded by a thousand mobile particles called "electrons." The mercury atom has 100,000 electrons. Those of radium are not yet estimated, I believe, but are, of course, more numerous still. Nor do we know whether an atom of mercury differs from one of hydrogen in the number of its electrons only, or in their movement, or in the nature of the ion, or in what. At any rate, the "periodic law" of Mendeleef places the elements in groups and series, and shows that there is a relation between the atoms of different elements: so that "the real is one," as the Rig-Veda has it.

Space fails me, but let us consider the size of an atom. Lord Kelvin has studied the thickness of the film of a soap bubble as shown by the changes in its colour, and, using the wave-lengths of light of differing colours, has mathematically demonstrated that if a drop of water were magnified to the size of the earth its atoms would be between the size of small shot and of cricket balls. Now conceive such an atom and magnify it to the size of St. Paul's Cathedral. How large the ion then would be, I know not, but the electrons would be about the size of this full stop. And so roomy, in relation to the size of the electrons, is the atom, that they are relatively as far from one another as the planets in the solar system. Consider, then, the inconceivably minute atom of hydrogen as a copy in miniature of a solar system, wherein the ion is the sun, and the electrons his thousand satellites; nor need the electrons ever approach nearer one another's orbits than our Earth and Mars, whose mean distance from us is sixty millions of miles. Lastly, take the molecule of haemoglobin, the red colouring matter of the blood, which is supposed to have the biggest molecule known, containing some hundreds of atoms. I think we might compare it to a star-cluster. If each sun in that cluster had some thousands of satellites, the whole would resemble the haemoglobin molecule, consisting of many "inly linked" atoms, each comparable to a solar system.

Whilst star-clusters and the atoms of which they and you and I are composed are alike subject to a common law.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

Metre.

SIR,—A friend of mine has just pointed out to me your notice of Mr. Omond's "Study of Metre."

Eleven years ago (on March 26 and April 9, 1892) I began to read to the Société de Linguistique a long essay in which I showed that an English "metrical line," as you put it, "is built up not from a certain number of syllables, nor even a number of accents, but from a certain number of units, which are themselves time-units." Unfortunately there happened to be nobody in the audience who was sufficiently well acquainted with English metre, or indeed with any branch of Germanic metrology. When, after a criticism of other theories, I stated that English verse could be divided into feet of equal temporal length, the chairman stopped me by saying that such an assertion was not "de la science," but "du sentiment." My essay, therefore, did not appear in the "Mémoires" of that learned society. Consequently, there is no record of my paper, except a most irrelevant note by the secretary in the "Bulletin," which note I have just discovered when looking for the above dates.

More pressing duties have as yet prevented me from publishing a complete account of my theory of English verse. But it was pretty clearly indicated, as early as 1895, in my "Aperçus de métrique comparée," and my review of M. Guirand's "English Reciter," both of which (signed L. R.) appeared at that time in the second number of the "Revue de Métrique." Moreover, a sketch of it is to be found in the last two numbers of the "Revue de l'enseignement des langues vivantes" (March 1 and May 1, 1903).

But neither Mr. Omond nor I can claim the priority of our common theory. My first inquiries into the nature of English metre leading me to the study of Phonetics, I soon found that Prof. Henry Sweet, in his "History of English Sounds" (Oxford, 1888, § 356), and Prof. Johan Storm, in his "Englische Philologie" (2nd ed., Leipzig, 1892, p. 447), put forth the same views as my own with regard to the division of English verse into time units.

Now, though the principle itself was stated so long ago, the most difficult part of the work still remained to be done, namely, to prove, explain, illustrate, and apply it. This I hope to have done, and, as far as I can see from your notice, so has Mr. Omond.—Yours, &c.,

Paris.

PAUL VERRIER.

Professeur au Lycée Carnot.

"The Impassable Barrier."

SIR,—Mr. C. W. Saleeby may be correct in his conclusions as set forth in the ACADEMY of 9 May, that so-called scientific facts and philosophical truths, even as theological dogma, are mere matter of "faith"—outside the limits of the Knowable: yet surely he seems curiously illogical and inconsistent in assuming the absolute truth of Locke's famous postulate, and basing his entire argument thereon—claiming that Locke proved the non-existence of "innate ideas," and defined the impassable barrier!

Emerson, in his Lecture on the Transcendentalist, asserts that Kant "replied to the sceptical philosophy of Locke, by showing that there was a very important class of ideas, or imperative forms, which did not come by experience, but through which experience was acquired: that these were intuitions of the mind itself: and he denominated them Transcendental forms."

G. H. Lewes concludes his "Biographical History of Philosophy" with these pregnant words: "If any one remain unshaken by the accumulated proofs this History affords of the impossibility of philosophy, let him distinctly bear in mind that the first problem he must solve is, Have we ideas independent of experience? Let him solve that ere he begins to speculate."

Does Mr. Saleeby claim to have solved that problem in the negative; or, is it merely on personal "faith" in Locke's postulate that he arbitrarily disposes of Haeckel therewith?

More light on the subject would probably be welcome to others of Mr. Saleeby's readers beside—Yours, &c.,

A. J. E.

"The Loving Ballad of Lord Bateman."

SIR,—I write from memory, being away from my books, but feel sure that you will find in a book of Cruikshank drawings, published a few years ago by Mr. W. P. Spencer, and entitled "Twiddle-Twaddle," a picture of the great George himself listening to the Ballad of Lord Bateman being sung in a tavern. It was, if my memory serves, one of a series with which the artist had intended to illustrate a projected autobiography. This substantiates the statement of Mr. Lang's correspondent quoted by "The Bookworm" last week.—Yours, &c.,

G. S. LATARD.

Limericks? or Learics

SIR,—In your issue for July 29, 1899, appeared No. 42 of your Competitions. It turned upon "Literary Learics," for which you were good enough to mention that you took name and example from "Idyls of Killowen," a book of verses I had just published. The Puzzle Editor of "Truth" proposed a similar competition soon afterwards. In one of the references to the subject I remember noticing the word "Limerick," which I supposed to be a misprint for "Learic"—a word that I formed from the name of the author of "The Book of Nonsense," which consists of stanzas of this "Kate Kearney" pattern. But in the current May number of "Pearson's Magazine" there is a collection of these whimsical little poems under the title of "Limericks," of which Miss Carolyn Wells discusses the origin. Has the name really been employed in this sense?—Yours, &c.

MATTHEW RUSSELL, S.J.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 191 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best paragraph, not exceeding 200 words, on any topical literary subject. We award the prize to Mr. Frank W. Hacquoll, 16, Victoria Square, Penarth, for the following:—

HADES ON THE STAGE.

It is a noteworthy phenomenon that the twentieth century should have been ushered in not only by battle and sudden death afar off, but also in England by repeated representations of the World of Death at the play. The study of folk-lore and human beliefs, Celtic glamour, psychical research, have done their work well, evidently; for dramatists and actor-managers are acuter than the fiction writers to divine any awakened curiosity of the public. So, with much stage-carpentering, Mr. Phillips became the Virgil of our age, duly followed by a French Dante. But a greyer pessimism than the ancient is made visible in these mechanically reconstructed myths. In the great poems beside the horrible Pit of Shadows into which all men are flung is the alternative picture, known to every folk-lore student, of the Happy Other-World, and there is mention of splendid divinities and an emergence to behold the stars. The stage is incapable of dealing with the serenity and great joy of these conceptions. The "Midsummer Night's Dream" even is usually considered an unrepresentable thing. The ideal in its brilliance and purity passes out of reach of the player's art and returns towards the poet.

Other replies follow:—

"WEE MACGREGGOR."

The remarks of the correspondent of the ACADEMY, quoted on page 477 of the issue for May 16, 1903, are worthy of one of the ignoble army of cultured (!) Glasgow people, who speak neither English nor Scots, but the suburban tongue known as the "Kelvin-side dialect," in which a "still morning" is a "kèem dye," and a "pleasant acquaintance" a "nice mèn." There are many dialects, and those of Suburbia and Mayfair are not the least objectionable. What is of vital import is not the manner but the matter of speech.

Plain, simple-hearted John, whose every act is instinct with good feeling and tact, and homely, natural Lizzie, devoid of "genteel" airs and graces, are not good enough company for this superior being "who felt inclined to open the window." However, we can understand the necessity for an open window for a writer who makes refined allusion to "Truth wielding a dung-fork." There is a story of a Scotsman who prayed needlessly for a good conceit of himself. Such a prayer is frequently unnecessary, "even outside Scotland."

[T. McE., Belfast.]

A NEW WORD.

Just in time for the issue of the later volumes of Dr. Murray's great English Dictionary comes the latest coinage by the enterprise of "The Times"—whenwhat. The penetrating influence of the originators will surely be strong enough to secure its entrance into the language, and it will open the way to numbers of similar words. The how-why and the so-too might supply the labouring scribe with a needed symbol; and the hazier became his ideas the more easy would it be to compile similar expressive compounds. After all, what-not had a beginning at some time, and its place is secure indeed.

[S. C., Hove.]

WILL DRAMATIC FORM ENHANCE THE REAL SIGNIFICANCE OF DANTE?

In the fourteenth century they lectured upon the Divina Commedia in churches. In the twentieth it furnishes a play for Drury Lane. Inversely, truths expressed themselves then in miracle-plays, which now furnish sermons.

Does this imply a law by which they must, sometimes, condescend to assume shapes, as thought seeks words? The constant and serious appreciation of the Ober-Ammergau Passion Play seems to enforce this idea.

But it would be interesting if we could, statistically, prove who form the majority of the audiences at "Dante"—the usual theatre-lovers or the students of the poet; and which of these classes will be best satisfied thereby.

Possibly it is an alternative between width and depth of interest. The interest in Dante will increase, in point of numbers, but decrease in quality. Wagner is thus offered to the million. But is not his message, necessarily, of an audible and visible nature, while Dante will always be, pre-eminently, the poet of the soul?

"The spiritual life around the earthly life:
The law of that is known to him as this,
His heart and brain move there, his feet stay here."

[C. M. W., Reigate.]

THE MEMOIR CRAZE.

It seems time that a protest should be uttered, on behalf of an overburdened reading public, against the incessant multiplication of ill-considered personal books. Two questions greet every man who meditates issuing a memoir—is the subject of sufficient interest to deserve a memoir? and, is the time ripe for it? These questions are rarely considered by the majority of biographers. Some youth of promise dies, and a zealous friend rushes hot-foot into print with a memoir of superlatives, from which we gather that life never lost so marvellous a boy!

Or some one man rises suddenly to eminence, and straightway appears "A. B.: the Man and His Work," all neatly cut and dried, so that the victim may read his own career, crimes, character, and tendencies summed up for public consumption. Besides the obvious faults of taste in these hurried publications, there is the lack of true perspective, and of impartial appreciation to be considered, for no man writes impartially of the living celebrity or the lately dead friend. These could be remedied by a legal "close season" for victims of biography—say, till ten years after death—when some sense of moderation and proportion will have arisen.

[M. I. E., Lampeter.]

CRITICS.

Though it is so common a thing to gird at the Critic—to account him all and more than Borrow has called him—his functions, would he but discharge them aright, are both useful and elevated. His (sadly neglected) task is to point out to us such literature as shall best benefit our minds. As we seek the advice of another before we engage a cook, or subject a beer to the tests of the analyst before potation, so we turn to the Critic for his opinion and guidance with regard to a prospective literary purchase.

The fault of the Critic herein lies: That he will not recognise that criticism is not literature. What he is paid for is his advice in plain terms—that and no more—and would he but give it so, instead of importuning us to hear him quote Maeterlinck, or listen to his information on the subject of the Greek drama, there would be few to quarrel with him. But subject a book to his criticism and straightway it becomes, not a compound to be analysed, a piece of metal to be tested, but an opportunity for him to show his wit—a chance for brilliant epigram or polished style.

This striving after literary excellence and ostentation of knowledge are the undoing of what should be useful and good in criticism; and, personally, I think it is due to the fact that a Critic is usually one whose wide reading has discouraged him from attempting to write anything really great. He recognises that nothing he might write could ever excel. But he cannot keep from trying to be witty.

[A. O., Scarborough.]

"A MERE INTERLUDE."

Through a popular magazine Mr. Hardy ventures the following plot in his latest short story:—

Young lady, tired of school-keeping drudgery, is on her way to marry an old and unattractive suitor at her island home in the Channel. Misses Friday's steamer at Penzance. Next sails on Tuesday. Wedding fixed for Wednesday. Old lover, who is young school-master, turns up unexpectedly, learns her errand, and proposes marriage. They are married at Redruth on Tuesday, leaving straight away for the island to inform them there. Two hours' wait at Penzance. Young husband bathes and is drowned. Young wife takes steamer and goes on with original programme. Honeymoon on mainland. Stay at Penzance. Accidental discovery that body of drowned stranger has been moved out of their very room to make room for them and is now divided only by a partition. Wife secretly attends first husband's funeral at Redruth. Back to island. Blackmail by Redruthian tramp who shares secret. Position unbearable. Confession to husband. Whereupon he, old and unattractive, also pleads a secret which takes the form of three growing daughters on the mainland!

It is a most amusing tragedy; hilariously gruesome. One can almost imagine Mr. Hardy wondering what to do with it, and his disappointment upon deciding that it would not do for his usual readers.

[R. P., Sheffield.]

LITERATURE AND NATURE IN THE XXTH CENTURY.

If it be true that the spirit of an age is portrayed in its literature, then the people who deplore the declining state of our English villages and the strange fascination which draws men to the teeming city have at last reason to rejoice, for in the literary output of the last few years there are signs not to be mistaken of a growing love of nature and a growing dissatisfaction with the restless life of town. Not a month passes but we see some new book published of the stamp of Canon Rawnsley's "Rambler's Note-Book"—some book which calls men from the city to the fields and tells them, with Shakespeare's banished duke, what a thing it is to live in Arden. The publishers' lists are full of books which offer to lead us from the crowded street to "haunts of coot and tern"—to woods and fields and "pastures new." It seems indeed as if the spirit of the age were changing—as if men were weary of the din and dust and turmoil of the town and were at length about to turn to the country and seek peace by the side of lake and stream.

[R. V. L., Banbury.]

THE DESTRUCTION OF LITERARY LANDMARKS.

Very often contemporary regret is more demonstrative at the demolition of a literary landmark than at the death of the associated author. Now, one of Goldsmith's houses is threatened, and the thought is pain. That material work should decay is inevitable, but I consider that even unto the down-pulling of homes may be applied an emotional defence. Some admirers might buy the house and make it a receptacle for relics—with a visitors' book for Americans. Again, the sooner the destruction is wrought the smaller the circle of the sorry. We may look on such a house and say that here our pleasure was conceived and written, but, rather, we are reminded of historic gossip, with tales of domestic quarrels, of over-drinking, and of the gaming-table. The best monument to a writer is raised in his works. A subconscious vision is granted as we read say, of the man, Carlyle, frenziedly hewing his in a grey mist of granite fragments: or of the youth, Keats, in the sunshine, cutting cameos of word-witchery to deck his unfinished marble column. We can dispense with sordid brick and mortar. For Goldsmith "The country blooms—a garden and a grave."

[D. S. M., Glasgow.]

Competition No. 192 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best School Recollection, to be in the form of a single incident. Length not to exceed 300 words.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 27 May, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Lacey (Rev. T. A.), A Handbook of Church Law.....(Richards) net 3/6
Bax (E. Belfort), Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists.....(Sonnenschein) 6/0
Wilson (Von James M.), Six Lectures on Pastoral Theology... (Macmillan) net 3/6
Cheyne (Rev. T. K.), and Black (J. Sutherland), Encyclopedia Biblica. Vol. IV.
(Black) net 20/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Shapcote (Emily Mary), Mary: The Perfect Woman.....(Griffin)
Wright (Thomas), The Ivory Coffin and Other Poems.....(Wright)
Victory (Louis H.), Imaginations in the Dust. 2 Vols.....(Gay and Bird)
Polypolitan, The Modern Trivia or London of To-day.....(Gay and Bird) net 1/0
Rowbotham (John Frederick), The Human Epic.....(") net 10/0
Coehrane (Alfred), Collected Verses.....(Longmans) net 5/0
Pinck (Bert), Plays.....(Morton)
Cooke (George Willis), Edited by, The Poets of Transcendentalism: An Anthology.....(Gay and Bird) net 9/0
Trowbridge (W. B. H.), Jezabel.....(" La Plume ") 2fr.

A REVOLUTION IN PUBLISHING.

In the field of modern competition every monopoly has disappeared but one—the monopoly that intelligence enjoys. If a man has risen to the first rank in his own branch of industry or art, it is because he has the most complete knowledge of its principles, because a thorough grasp of the work his contemporaries are doing has enabled him to steal a march on his fellows. There is but one book that provides information of all the latest discoveries and inventions in all trades and arts, one book to which a man can turn with absolute confidence for the most reliable and most recent information in all the subjects that most nearly concern him—the Encyclopædia Britannica. Journalists have long looked on it as an essential tool of their trade, but it is a necessary tool for everyone who wants to succeed, whatever his trade or profession may be.

A Tool of Trade

The Encyclopædia Britannica puts this qualification of specialised knowledge within the reach of everybody, and, more than that, it may just now be regarded as an extraordinarily good bargain from the commercial point of view. A serious book is usually published at so high a price as to be beyond the means of the ordinary man, and when the price is reduced the book, in many cases, is no longer so useful. The prompt buyer pays a high price, the man who waits pays a low one. But here is a case in which it is all the other way. THE TIMES has made an innovation in the publishing trade. Those who buy the Encyclopædia this week, within a month of the publication of the last volume, buy it at the lowest price. The prompt man pays the low price, the dilatory man will pay the high price.

This most important innovation in publishing, which brings so great an advantage to the man of moderate means, is not the result of any charitable endowment or philanthropic enterprise, it is merely an application to the publishing business of a principle which has long been acted upon in other trades. Every buyer who subscribes while a book is still being printed, before the presses have stopped, assists the publishers to fix the number which they should print. Every hundred copies included in the first large order for printing cost less to produce than a hundred copies which form part of a subsequent and smaller impression. The manufacturing of books is, in this respect, like the manufacturing of any other articles; one large lot can be more economically produced than can a series of small lots. This is the theory which underlies the startling change which THE TIMES has made in the publishing business. For the moment the Tenth Edition of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" may be secured at less than one-half of the catalogue price. All the subscriber needs to do is promptly to make use of the form which appears at the foot of this advertisement. The price will soon be increased, and those who do not promptly order the "Encyclopædia Britannica" will lose the advantage of this preliminary offer, and be compelled to pay more money for the book when they do order it.

The Innovation Explained

The Stock Market is thronged every day with men who are buying Shares because they believe it to be probable that the price of those Shares will increase. But they cannot be sure. Here, in the Book Market, Buy Before the Rise.

there is the opportunity to buy something with regard to the future price of which there is no room for conjecture. It is absolutely certain that the price of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" will increase, and those who buy it to-day not only effect a material saving in price, but they also secure the use of the book now when THE TIMES Competition makes the possession of it a double benefit. The list of entries will soon

No Time to be Lost

close, and those who postpone booking their orders will in this way lose the advantages of the competition and of the bargain offer which THE TIMES is now making. No further argument is needed, each reader can draw his own conclusion from these plain facts, and any man who reasons upon them at all will use the Inquiry Form at once.

WRITE TO-DAY

TO: The Manager,

"THE TIMES," Publication Department,
125, High Holborn, London, W.C.

Please send me 220-page illustrated book containing specimen pages of the "Encyclopædia Britannica"; and please also send me full particulars of "THE TIMES" Competition.

Name.....
(Please write clearly.)

Address.....

AC 60

Rank or Occupation

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF
SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B.,
Formerly Director of the Royal College
of Music.

By CHARLES L. GRAVES.
With Photogravure Portraits, &c. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Series.
ROBERT BROWNING.

By G. K. CHESTERTON.
Crown 8vo, gilt top, flat back, 2s. net.

MACMILLAN'S
GUIDE TO SWITZERLAND.

With 31 Maps and 6 Plans. Globe 8vo, 5s. net.
Daily News.—"A useful guide-book, clearly arranged and well supplied with maps."

NORWEGIAN BY-WAYS.

By CHARLES W. WOOD.
With 9 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Vol.

THE AUTOCRAT OF THE BREAKFAST-TABLE.

By OLIVER WENDELL HOLMES.
With an Introduction by Sir LESLIE STEPHEN, K.C.B.
Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

A Collection of Short Papers. Extra crown 8vo,
2s. 6d. net.

ALFRED HODDER'S NEW NOVEL.
A FIGHT FOR THE CITY.

By the Author of "The New Americans."
Crown 8vo, 6s. net.

PEOPLE OF THE WHIRLPOOL,

From the Experience Book of a Commuter's Wife.
With 8 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

NEW UNIFORM EDITION OF

THE WORKS OF
WILLIAM M. THACKERAY.

Reprinted from the First Editions, with all the Original Illustrations, Facsimiles of Wrappers, &c.
In crown 8vo, cloth extra, 3s. 6d. per volume.

LATEST ADDITION:

CHRISTMAS BOOKS.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s

CONTENTS FOR JUNE:—
JOHN MAXWELL'S MARRIAGE. By STEPHEN
GWYNN. Chapters XIII.—XVI.
THE COLONIES AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE. By the Editor of the "United Service Magazine."
A FLEDGELING REPUBLIC. By W. S. BARCLAY.
THE GOLDEN VALE. By ERNEST ENSOR.
THE GIPSY MAID. By W. H. OGLIVIE.
SOME PRINCIPLES OF POETIC CRITICISM. By
H. H. DODSWELL.
VENUS. By ED. VINCENT HEWARD.
A MIDDLE-AGED MEDITATION. By POSTUMUS.
THE NINE PENGUIN'S EGGS.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

ILLUSTRATED.
Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The JUNE Number contains:—
THE SULTAN OF MOROCCO JOURNEY
TOWARDS FEZ. By ARTHUR SCHNEIDER.
THE YELLOW VAN.—VIII. By RICHARD WHITEING.
A LAND OF DESERTED CITIES. By H. C.
BUTLER.
STRANDED IN A SPANISH HILL TOWN. By
T. R. DAWLEY, Jr.

And numerous other stories and Articles of General Interest.

ILLUSTRATED MAGAZINE FOR CHILDREN.

ST. NICHOLAS.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

The JUNE Number contains:—
THE SCHOOL-ROOM DOG. Story. By MARY E.
FITZGERALD.
WHEN STACIE'S CLASS WAS GRADUATED.
Story. By LAURA ALTON PAYNE.
THE STORY OF KING ARTHUR AND HIS
KNIGHTS. A Serial Story. By HOWARD PYLE.
NATURE AND SCIENCE FOR YOUNG FOLKS.
And numerous other Stories for the Young.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

FROM
Mr. MELROSE'S LIST.

At 2s. 6d. Net.

By CUTHBERT LENNOX.

THIRD EDITION.

JAMES CHALMERS OF NEW
GUINEA. Missionary, Pioneer, and Martyr.
By CUTHBERT LENNOX. Author of "Henry Drummond." Large Crown 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. net.
Two Maps and Eight Illustrations, including a Fine Portrait.

At 2s. 6d. Net.

FOURTH (ENLARGED) EDITION.

HENRY DRUMMOND, A Biographical Sketch (with Bibliography). By CUTH-
BERT LENNOX. With Photographs and a special
Wash Drawing by SCOTT RANKIN. Large Crown
8vo, cloth boards. Price 2s. 6d. net.

At 2s. 6d.

"BOOKS FOR THE HEART" SERIES.

Edited by ALEXANDER SMELLIE, M.A. Foolscap
8vo, cloth boards, gilt top, 2s. 6d. NEW VOLUMES.

THE DIARY AND JOURNAL OF DAVID BRAINERD. With an Introduction by the EDITOR. Two Volumes, 6s.

At 3s. 6d. Net.

By Dr. R. A. TORREY.

FOURTH EDITION.

HOW TO PROMOTE AND CON-DUCT A SUCCESSFUL REVIVAL.
By R. A. TORREY, D.D. Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, gilt top, price 3s. 6d. net.

The Christian says:—"A book which many workers may find of service. . . . Mr. Torrey aims to direct us in these activities, and we trust his very practical papers will find many sympathetic readers."

By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A.

NEW WORK.

By the Author of "THE CROWN OF SCIENCE."

At 6s.

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.
Study of our Lord's Trial in the Wilderness. By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART,
M.A. Large Imp. 16mo, cloth boards.

The Daily News says:—"A very careful study of the wonderful story of the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness. Contains striking and original thought."

THIRD EDITION.

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE:

The Incarnation of God in Mankind.
By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A. 224 pages.
Crown 8vo, cloth boards, price 3s. 6d. net.

The Examiner says:—" . . . Fresh and wonderfully convincing. . . . The subject is a fascinating one, and is treated here by one who has bestowed much thought upon it."

At 3s. 6d.

By Dr. J. R. MILLER.

SECOND EDITION.

SHINING AND SERVING:

Six Addresses on the Christian Life.
By J. R. MILLER, D.D. White fancy back, cloth boards, gilt top, 3s. 6d.

At 5s.

By Rev. ALEX. SMELLIE, M.A.

SECOND EDITION.

IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.

Brief Daily Meditations for a Year. By ALEX.
SMELLIE, M.A. Imp., cloth boards, gilt edges.

The Expository Times says:—"All is original and all of choicest quality. . . . The thought is never abstruse, but in touch with the simple realities of our spiritual life; yet it is always fresh. . . . We have not had a book of daily meditations so near to what it ought to be as this is, though many have tried to furnish one."

At 5s.

THE MAKING OF THE EMPIRE:

The Story of our Colonies. By ARTHUR
TEMPLE, Author of "Our Living Generals," &c.
With New Portraits and Illustrations. Fifth Edition, re-written, extended, and brought up to June, 1902. Cloth boards, 5s.

16, PILGRIM STREET, E.C.

GAY & BIRD'S LIST.

Ready June 4. Crown 8vo, attractive cover, 6s.

MY LADY OF THE BASS.
MY LADY OF THE BASS.
MY LADY OF THE BASS.

By SYDNEY HERBERT BURCHELL,
Author of "Daniel Herrick," "The Duke's Servants,"
"In the Days of King James."

That the fate of a London apothecary's daughter should be associated with the fortunes of a daring Jacobite garrison on the island of the Bass Rock in the Firth of Forth would suggest adventures of no ordinary kind, wherein love-making would play a part.
They are to be found in this novel. This story cannot fail to strike the reader for its originality of plot and subject. Old London Bridge of the late seventeenth century, its busy life over and under its arches, the ancient houses that lined its street, give place in turn to a rocky, sea-girt island near the metropolis of Scotland. A daughter's rare devotion to a cause, described in the first portion of the book, leads her to leave her father's home on the Bridge on a quest, it might be thought, as visionary as that which Joan of Arc undertook. Its difficulties and dangers, introduce the reader to the Bass Rock, the romantic story of which, it is believed, is here given in fiction for the first time.

Ready in a few days. Crown 8vo, price 4s. 6d. net.
REMEMBRANCES OF EMERSON.
By JOHN ALBEE. With Portrait.

Now Ready. Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, gilt top, uncut,
price 4s. 6d. net.

MYRTLE AND OAK. By Sir RENNELL
RODD, C.B., K.C.M.G.

A New Volume of Poems with a charming Portrait from a Drawing by the Marchioness of Granby.

NEW EDITION, crown 8vo, pp. 396, cloth gilt, gilt top, 5s. net.

KOKORO. By LAFOADIO HEARN.

* * This is Mr. Hearn's most interesting book.

Now Ready. Crown 8vo, pp. 270, cloth, gilt top,
5s. net.

LITERARY VALUES, and other Papers. By JOHN BURROUGHS.

Times.—"John Burroughs appears as a critic, and especially as a critic of criticism. To criticise a critic of criticism would be to weave the winds; and since his writing is as pure, as lucid, as interesting as before; since he is eminently wide and sane in his views, an impressionist with a profound respect for 'the rules,' a lover of the warmth of life with a sensitive appreciation of the finest niceties of the literary art, there is little criticism, in the sense of adverse judgment, that could be offered. Every one of these papers will appeal to the student of literature; every one will set his mind at work."

Just Published. Size 5 in. by 2½ in., pp. 160, with Photogravure Portrait, leather, gilt edges,
2s. 6d. net.

EARLY BRITISH BALLADS.

Edited with Introduction by J. POTTER BRISCOE.

EARLY BRITISH BALLADS. Being
Volume XVIII. of "The Babelots."

Spectator.—"We have nothing but commendation for the series."

Daily Telegraph.—"One of the prettiest sets of booklets which have recently exhibited the taste and skill of modern publishers."

Punch.—"These daintily bound volumes, a library in themselves, precious to the lover of books."

Fresh Supply Shortly. Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s. net.

A STUDY OF PROSE FICTION.

By BLISS PERRY.

Athenaeum.—See page notice in issue of May 9 ult.

Size 4½ in. by 2½ in., Imp cloth gilt, gilt top, 1s. net.

BIBLE CLASSICS.

I. THE BOOK OF JOB. II. THE BOOK OF PROVERBS.

III. ECCLESIASTES AND THE SONG OF SOLOMON.

Athenaeum.—"It is the nearest thing of its kind we have seen for many a day. . . . The print is excellent."

London: GAY & BIRD, 22, Bedford St., Strand, W.O.
Special Agents for HOUGHTON, MIFFLIN & CO., and General Agents for American Books.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1621. Established 1869. London: 30 May 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK	523
REVIEWS.
Hampshire Days	527
The Life of Father Dolling	527
The Journal of Arthur Stirling	528
Signs of Literature: On the Literary Theories of Taine and Herbert Spencer	529
Dramatic Sonnets, Poems and Ballads: Selections from the Poems of Eugene Leo-Hamilton	529
Experiments on Animals	530
Exmoor Streams. Notes and Jottings, with Practical Hints for Anglers	531
Mazarin	531
Jean Goujon: His Life and Work	532
SHORT NOTICES:
The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson—Lovely Woman—Recollections of a Town Boy at Westminster, 1849-1866	532
FICTION:
Catherine Sterling—The Pinch of Prosperity	533
Notes on the Week's Novels	534

ARTICLES.
FIRSTLINESS	535
FitzGerald and Calderon	536
Hans Andersen's Raw Material	537
Impressions—XXXIV. Extremes	539
DRAMA:
A Portrait Play. E. K. Chambers	539
ART:
The Salons. C. L. H.	540
SCIENCE:
Science and Philosophy. C. W. Saleeby	541
CORRESPONDENCE:
Metre	542
"A Fabrication of Mr. Gissing's"	543
Cahier	543
The Society of Psychical Research	543
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
School Recollection	543

The Literary Week.

Few books of any importance have been published during the past week; even the novels, which include a new volume by "Zack," have dropped to half a dozen. Mr. Arthur Morrison has published another volume of his Martin Hewitt detective tales. We deal below with an attempt, which has now reached the prospectus stage, to reorganise the system of book-distribution in this country. Among the books issued during the week we note the following:—

A HISTORY OF ARABIC LITERATURE. By Clément Huart.

The eleventh volume in the "Short Histories of the Literatures of the World" series. Prof. Huart is one of the most distinguished of living Orientalists; he has investigated Arabian, Persian, Turkish and Romaine literatures in succession. The volume is divided into twelve sections, five of which deal with the 'Abbāsids. Prof. Huart brings his history down to the nineteenth century and the periodical press. The translation from the author's original has been made by Lady Mary Loyd.

THE POPISH PLOT. By John Pollock.

The sub-title reads: "A Study in the History of the Reign of Charles II." On his title page Mr. Pollock has set three quotations: one from Dryden, one from Mr. Meredith, and one from Mabillon. The volume is inscribed to the memory of Lord Acton, who wrote to the author: "There are three quite unravelled mysteries:—what was going on between Coleman and Père la Chaise; how Oates got hold of the wrong story; and who killed Godfrey." The object of the book is to answer these questions, and to elucidate points of obscurity in connection with them. The volume is prefixed by a Table of Events occurring in the history of the Plot—a wise and helpful innovation for which Mr. Pollock should be thanked.

THE POETS OF TRANSCENDENTALISM. Edited by George Willis Cooke.

An anthology of New England transcendental verse. The Editor says: "It seemed to me that a representative collection of the poetry influenced by transcendentalism would serve to indicate how largely that movement had affected American literature, and also to make accessible those poems that had been neglected." The selection does not claim to include only the best; it aims at being broadly representative. The names of many of the writers whose work is included are unfamiliar to us, and a good deal of the verse is poor; but the volume has distinct interest as the expression of a movement. Emerson, naturally, takes the first place. The editor has added some biographical and bibliographical notes.

THERE lies before us the prospectus of The Bookshops, Limited. It seems extraordinary that at this time of day so few good bookshops exist out of London and two or three large provincial towns. The difficulties of book-buying are always with us, and these are increased by the uninterested attitude of the ordinary bookseller; he does not make it his business to know anything about his wares. The Bookshops, Limited, proposes to start the new crusade. A few pioneer shops are to be opened under the management of men who really do know something about books; it is intended, we are told, that each shop shall be made a literary centre for its district. That would be a pleasant reversion to older methods, and we see no reason why it should not succeed. Writing to the managing director of the new company, Mr. H. G. Wells said: "My warmest good wishes for your admirably planned scheme. The troubles of book-buying are one of the chief woes in my essentially querulous life. At the present moment I am just giving up the hope of being able to buy a pleasant edition of an English version of the 'Utopia'—and there are no doubt at least three publishers in London trying to sell me what I want to buy! I can't find out about them." We have all had similar experiences, and if booksellers find this new rival taking away what trade they have it will simply be a case of the whirligig of time. We notice that amongst the seven first subscribers there are four who take only one share each. Of these one is described as a journalist, one as a widow, one as a man of letters, and the last as an author. The Bookshops, Limited, is making a modest beginning, and we wish it success.

MR. HALL CAINE's memoir of Mr. W. E. Tirebuck, prefixed to the posthumous novel, "Twixt God and Mammon," is a simple and sympathetic piece of work. Tirebuck was never really successful as a novelist, and we think that Mr. Hall Caine has too great an opinion of his friend's achievement, but in such circumstances we cannot quarrel with his frank appreciation. Tirebuck worked his way through various commercial offices and journalism to his great end of literature, and he accepted the difficulties and uncertainties of the literary life cheerfully. Mr. Hall Caine writes:—

My friend found journalism irksome after a few years, and, taking a cottage in Scotland, he set himself, without much means or great prospects, to write other novels. . . . I remember the deepening sense that came to him that, notwithstanding favourable reviews, and other and similar superficial and often delusive indications of success, he was producing no real effect upon the public. I fear he was also earning next to no money; but his needs were small in his Lowland cottage, and the devotion of his sister was absolute. On oatmeal porridge and barley bread, as his principal diet, he toiled on, early hours and late, and no more conscientious craftsman ever lived by his pen. He had much to learn, much to unlearn, and many grievous disadvantages of early education and training to overcome, but his energy never flagged, and his ambition never wavered. His hope was to write his name among the names of the English novelists, and if I am any judge of the art he has certainly done so.

That, at any rate, was the right spirit in which to work—a spirit not so common to-day that we should allow it to go unrecorded.

Of publications dealing with art and artistic decoration there appears to be no end. This week we have received the first issues of three such publications—"Art," "The Craftsman," and "The House Beautiful." The first-named opens with a well-illustrated article on Constantin Meunier which is followed by "An Introduction to the Art of Rubens." "The Craftsman" is a monthly portfolio of arts and crafts, and "The House Beautiful" contains architectural designs in colour. We observe that the latter are printed in Stuttgart. When will colour-printing be really seriously treated in England?

A CORRESPONDENT of the "New York Times Saturday Review" has been falling foul of that journal for calling Mr. W. D. Howells the greatest writer of the day. The incensed one says:—

If a test of being widely read is applied to Mr. Howells he must fall far short of the standard fixed by you; if his use of good English and his good fortune in being well advertised be taken into consideration Mr. Howells is widely known. But, as a matter of fact, very few of the masses have read any of his works except those occasionally seen in the magazines. One more often sees Mr. Howells in some position suggestive of posing, but when it comes to any real hold upon all classes, which is practically the test of a great author, Mr. Howells has not reached this position.

The writer proceeds to say that the ordinary business man in America, though he probably knows Mr. Howells' name, is not acquainted with the title of one of his books. But that, after all, does not go for much in the estimation of literary value. We suspect that the "ordinary business man" in England does not know a great deal about Mr. Meredith.

AFTER the voluminous and wearisome biographies and appreciations which appear just after an author's death, or long before it, it is pleasant to come across so modest a little volume as Mr. G. A. Payne's "Edna Lyall." Mr. Payne has the enthusiasm of a friend, and we cannot agree with many of his conclusions, but at least his book is sincere and inoffensive.

IN connection with the Emerson centenary the correspondence between Emerson and Herman Grimm should not be overlooked. This correspondence, which first appeared in the "Atlantic Monthly" this year, has been published in volume form by Messrs Houghton, Mifflin, of Boston, under the editorship of Mr. F. W. Holls. Herman Grimm was the son of the younger of the brothers Grimm of the fairy tales. He studied law, then took to literature, married Gisela von Arnim, the daughter of Goethe's Bettina, and was for many years Professor of the History of Art in the University of Berlin. He resigned the chair in 1893, and it was after that that Mr. Holls met him and received permission to print these letters, the originals of which were presented by Grimm to the Goethe-Schiller archives in Weimar. The letters which passed between Emerson, Grimm, and Gisela von Arnim are printed in this interesting volume. We make a couple of characteristic extracts from Emerson's letters:—

A few friends I have here, who are well worth knowing, if you will stay long enough to let the affinities play. I have found that this personality is the daintiest ware with which we deal, and almost no ability is any guarantee of sympathy, unless fortune also aid in the lack of counterparts.

Let me say that I rejoice in the union which allows me to address this letter to you, whilst I have my friend Gisela in my thoughts. To her, also, be this sheet inscribed; and let me entreat, meantime, that she, on the other hand, will not quite believe that she writes to me by the hand of her husband, but will out of her singular goodness, use to me that frankness with which she already indulged me with autograph letters. My only confidante in this relation is my daughter Ellen, who reads Gisela's letters and yours to me, with entire devotion, and whose letter to your wife (sent through Rev. Mr. Longfellow) I hope you have long since received. Ellen has facility—and inclination to front and surmount the barriers of language and script. My little book, "Conduct of Life," I tried in vain to send you by post.

THE question of free access to the shelves of public libraries has been discussed for years. On the whole, free access does not work satisfactorily, nor do we see how it could be expected to, except in the case of the reference departments of libraries. The fact has to be faced that many users of libraries are not to be trusted. In particular instances, of course, the system works well enough, as in such libraries as that of the Patent Office. But when it comes to free access to all books we think wisdom lies with the objectors.

WE should have supposed that ingenuity in the way of cheap re-issues was exhausted, but there is always an idea left. A new series of "Standard Biographies" has just been started by Messrs. Hutchinson, which leads off with F. de Bourrienne's "Memoirs of Napoleon Bonaparte," in which the original ten volumes have been condensed into something over five hundred pages. There is certainly no lack of cheap reading nowadays. There has just reached us the thirty-fourth volume of the "World's Classics," where you have close on six hundred pages of Burns for a shilling.

IN an estimate of Turner which Mr. Stopford Brooke has been writing for "The Pilot," there occurs this suggestive passage:—

There are few problems more interesting than this continuity of power in men of great genius. The sword of the genius of the second rank wears out its scabbard. The sword of the imperial genius vitalises the scabbard to the end. But the problem, in the case of Turner, is still more interesting. These Venetians [Tintoret and Titian and Bellini] were men of fine education, noble manners, personal charm, and dignity. They moved in a cultivated and varied society, full of impulse and beauty. Turner had no personal charm or dignity, little education, rough manners, and common-place habits. His eyes alone betrayed the inward fire; yet, within this rude husk, there lived a soul which hungered and thirsted for beauty as a saint for righteousness; and such power to grasp and express it in his special form of art as no man of his time in England possessed in any of the arts. The splendour, loveliness, sublimity, and vastness of Nature, her creative energy, lived within him, and lived at ease. And his hand told the world all that she revealed to him. There is nothing more interesting than that in psychology, nor more pathetic in reality.

The pathos of the reality, we think, was mainly objective. Turner lived for art, and that supreme mistress never failed him. In such a case it is not our business to pity. When Mr. Brooke says: "The sword of the imperial genius vitalizes the scabbard to the end," we should like to agree with him, but cannot. In the case of Wordsworth, for instance, the sword seems to have worn out the scabbard.

NOVELISTS continue to look towards the stage as a kind of possible El Dorado. Next week there is to be produced at Worthing a play called "The Scarlet Flower," by Frederick Fenn and Richard Pryce. Mr. Pryce has written several excellent novels, and the sketches which appear occasionally in a contemporary over his initials always have humour and snap.

MR. W. B. YEATS dedicates his play, "Where there is Nothing," to Lady Gregory. Mr. Yeats says: "When I was a boy I used to wander about at Rosses Point and Ballisodare listening to old songs and stories." He wrote down what he heard, and then went to London to make a living. But he began to forget "the true countenance of country life":—

The old tales were still alive for me indeed, but with a new, strange, half unreal life, as if in a wizard's glass, until at last, when I had finished "The Secret Rose" and was half-way through "The Wind Among the Reeds," a wise woman in her trance told me that my inspiration was from the moon, and that I should always live close to water, for my work was getting too full of those little jewelled thoughts that come from the sun and have no nation.

We envy Mr. Yeats his "wise woman in her trance."

THERE is a sketch in the current number of "Chambers's Journal," called "How Mary McGillivray's Cow ate the Piper." "This is the story," we read, "as it is told round the peat fires of Strathnairn and Stratherrick, and as it was told to me." The same story was told by Carleton in his "Traits and Stories of the Irish Peasantry": there are a few slight differences, but the incidents are essentially the same. It would be interesting to know whether Carleton transferred the scene to Ireland or whether he heard it there as a native growth.

MR. LAIDLAW PURVES has, in the "Athenæum," been trying to prove that "Robinson Crusoe" was not written by Defoe, but by Lord Oxford. There will soon come a time when writers will have to save posterity from these fruitless enquiries by depositing their MSS., duly attested, in some public repository.

To the slim volume called "German Ambitions as they affect Britain and the United States," Mr. St. Loe Strachey contributes an introduction in which he says:—

It is with great pleasure that I respond to the invitation of "Vigilans sed Equus" to write a few words of introduction to his Letters, originally published in the "Spectator."

I am proud that those Letters should have appeared first in my paper, and I feel it no small honour to be associated with them on the occasion of their publication in book form.

THE June "Cornhill" opens with a poem called "The Fir Planters," by Mr. Thomas Hardy. The verses are characteristic of Mr. Hardy's later work—they have the note of weariness and dejection. A "sad-faced woman holds the tree upright, and meditates," while the man fills in the earth. We quote the concluding stanzas:—

It will sigh in the morning,
Will sigh at noon,
At the winter's warning,
In wafts of June;
Grieving that never
Kind Fate decreed
It could not ever
Remain a seed,
And shun the welter
Of things without,
Unneeding shelter
From storm and drought.

Thus, all unknowing
For whom or what
We set it growing
In this bleak spot,
It still will grieve here
Throughout its time,
Unable to leave here
Or change its clime;
Or tell the story
Of us to-day
When, halt and hoary,
We've passed away.

MAX O'RELL's genial personality will be missed, and particularly on the lecture platform. His books were popular, but though they were often amusing enough one soon grew tired of their superficial observation and scrappiness. His lectures were largely extracts from his books, but in that form the matter did not appear so thin, and Max O'Rell always had a persuasive manner. He saw a good deal of various phases of life before settling down to literature. He served in the war of 1870, was captured at Sedan, and later was severely wounded in the second siege of Paris. Then he came to England as a newspaper correspondent, and afterwards was appointed French master at St. Paul's School. The success of his first book, "John Bull et son Ile," turned him from teaching to letters, and he continued to write and lecture till the end. Max O'Rell was an excellent story-teller, and did not in the least mind the point going against himself.

MR. LANG in "Longman's" writes: "I myself would offer a copy of this magazine to the gentleman or lady who first detects the incomparable 'howler' in the first page of the account of Sir Walter Scott in the Dictionary of National Biography. Oh, Sir Leslie Stephen! We do all err, but this error is 'an imperial crowner.' Yet perhaps only a Borderer (among persons not professional historians or genealogists) would have found it out." Does not that give the clue?

THE Stage Society will give their last production of this, their fourth season, at the Imperial Theatre on Sunday, June 7th, and Monday afternoon, June 8th. The programme will consist of "The Golden Rose," by Ian Robertson; "The Waters of Bitterness," by S. M. Fox; and "The Admirable Bashville; or, Constancy Unrewarded," by George Bernard Shaw.

THE volume of "Stevensoniana," edited by Mr. J. A. Hammerton, is to be issued uniform with Mr. Colvin's "Letters of R. L. Stevenson," and in outward format it is to be like the "Edinburgh Stevenson." In this form only one thousand copies will be issued for England and America. We do not much like this digging out of work which the writer was content to leave buried; still less do we like the idea, which seems to be the base of this volume, of gathering together references to Stevenson by writers who may or may not have been good critics. If this kind of book is to be encouraged we see no end to such superfluous compilations.

NEXT week M. Rostand is to be received into the bosom of the Académie Française. M. Rostand has recently returned from Cambo to Paris in order to prepare his speech; we suppose that only in the air of Paris could the right tone be acquired. Literary Paris is wondering what M. Rostand is going to talk about. Literary Paris, indeed, has an idea that M. Rostand is as likely to say something silly as to embark upon poetical rhetoric. The Paris correspondent of the "Pall Mall Gazette" reports that a celebrated dramatic author said to him: "Rostand on an important occasion either proves himself to be a genius or loses his head; and when anything not particularly long is required from him he generally does the latter." But as this occasion seems to be important, and as length seems to be demanded, we look to M. Rostand to prove his genius.

THE romance of publishing is not yet dead. Some weeks ago a well-known London publisher received the manuscript of a novel carefully packed in a red cloth case. There was no name on the manuscript and no name on the case. The book was read, and turned out to be, in the opinion of the publisher's reader, a fine seventeenth century historical romance. Now the publisher is anxious to find the writer of the story and the owner of the red cloth case.

Bibliographical.

DR. ROBERTSON NICOLL's promised book on "R. H. Hutton: Critic and Theologian" cannot fail to be interesting, for Dr. Nicoll is master of the subject. It is, however, only fair to recall the fact that very tolerable justice to Hutton was rendered in the little anonymous volume called "Richard Holt Hutton of 'The Spectator'" which appeared in 1899. Therein, in deference to Hutton's expressed wish that no biography of him should be written, the personal details given were only such as Hutton had himself made public on various occasions. In the Supplement to the "Dictionary of National Biography" much less reticence, very properly, was shown, and the memoir enshrined therein is, one may say, quite sufficient for the purpose. More than with most literary men, Hutton's permanent life lies in his books. To these add the monograph of 1899, the "Dictionary" article (1901), and the tributes by Mr. William Watson and Miss Julia Wedgwood; and you have pretty much all that you need know about R. H. Hutton.

There are at least two announced reprints which can be welcomed heartily in advance. One is of Sir Henry Wotton's "Elements of Architecture collected from the best authors and examples," which, first printed in 1624, seems not to have printed again until it was included in the Somers "Collection of Scarce and Useful Tracts" (1809 edition?). It is of course virtually inaccessible. Wholly inaccessible, one may say, is the other work to which I refer—John Parkinson's "Paradise in Sole, Paradisus Terrestris," or a "Garden of all sorts of pleasant flowers which our English ayre will permit to be nursed up," printed first in 1629 and again in 1656, but not since then, apparently. This, of course, is one of the classics of gardening, as is also that other work from the same master hand—"Theatrum Botanicum: the Theatre of Plants" (1640)—which may perhaps be reprinted also. It was after John Parkinson, it will be remembered, that Mrs. Ewing named her Parkinson Society, now non-existent.

With reference to one of my paragraphs last week, Colonel W. F. Prideaux reminds me that Mr. A. W. Pollard entered the literary field before 1890—namely, in 1888, when he published an edition of Sidney's "Astrophel and Stella," reproduced from the folio of 1598. I ought to say that I did not profess to give a complete list of Mr. Pollard's publications, which include several besides those I mentioned—notably his editions of Herrick and Chaucer. In the same way I did not mention Mr. A. F. Pollard's collection of "Political Pamphlets" (1897). It has been suggested to me, by the way, that the confusion between the Messrs. Pollard would probably be avoided altogether if Mr. A. F. P. would print on his title-pages his first Christian name—"Albert." Mr. A. W. P., I think, invariably uses his first Christian name, which is "Alfred."

Mr. Albert Pollard will soon have an opportunity of adopting this suggestion, for announcement is made that he is to contribute to the "Heroes of the Reformation" series a volume on Cranmer. The great archbishop has had, of course, many biographers already—Strype, Sargant, Le Bas, Todd, and Dean Hook being the standard ones. Of late years we have had a book on Cranmer's "Life, Times, and Writings" by Mr. C. H. Collette (1887); more recently, two handy monographs—one by A. J. Mason in the "Leaders of Religion" series (1898) and the other by A. D. Innes in the "World's Epoch Makers" (1900).

The book on Charles James Fox which Mr. J. L. Hammond is to give us is to be a political study, not a biography. We are all still hoping that Sir George Trevelyan will yet see his way to produce the much-to-be-desired sequel to his "Early History" of Fox, of which a cheap edition appeared so recently as 1899. At present the only concise, yet comprehensive, memoir of Fox now available is that by Mr. H. O. Wakeman, which saw the light in 1890.

The late Rev. Hugh Macmillan had so many admiring readers that a list of his successive publications may not be without utility at this moment. The following are at least the most important:—"Footnotes from the Page of Nature" (1861 and 1874), "Bible Teaching in Nature" (1867), "The Ministry of Nature" (1871), "The Sabbath of the Fields," sequel to "Bible Teachings" (1876), "The Marriage in Cana of Galilee" (1882), "The Riviera" (1885, 1892, and 1902), "The Olive Leaf" (1886), "The Gate Beautiful" (1891), "My Comfort in Sorrow" (1891), "The Mystery of Grace" (1893), "The Daisies of Nazareth" (1894 and 1901), "The Clock of Nature" (1896), "Lessons from Life" (1897), "The Spring of the Day" (1898), "Gleanings in Holy Fields" (1899), "The Corn of Heaven" (1901), "The Christmas Rose and other Thoughts in Verse" (1901), and "The Poetry of Plants" (1902).

The old controversy about the authorship of the lines on "The Letter H" has cropped up in Mr. O'Connor's literary weekly, where it is dealt with sensibly. I doubt, however, whether the stanzas on the letter I, quoted by the writer, can be ascribed to Miss Fanshawe. They were, no doubt, suggested by her "riddle." It may be remembered that Miss Fanshawe did write quite a long and sprightly "poem" on the letter K, addressed to Earl Harcourt, who desired to substitute K for C in the word Catherine. I wonder, by the way, if the lady's "Literary Remains," published in 1876, are still "in print."

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Poet in the Forest.

HAMPSHIRE DAYS. By W. H. Hudson. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

A NEW book by Mr. Hudson is an event. Other men may as closely observe birds and beasts in their haunts, and record as faithfully the result of their observations; but none other brings so interesting a personality into the page or commands such harmonious and fortunate prose. Every line of this writer is his own, saturated with his peculiar melancholy, his sweet, grave humour, his sense of fatality, or, at least, of destiny. No one now writing accepts so uncomplainingly the facts of life; no one so simply and naturally recognises the laws of flux and reflux, growth, decay, and growth again. Mr. Hudson has an outlook upon life, part sadness, part joy, and wholly understanding, which we can describe only as Shakespearean. He sees it steadily and whole, while his eyes light now and then with a pitying irony.

This new book of his might indeed be called a monument of ironical aloofness: a rebuke; or at least a whispered intimation to most of us that the lords of creation are by no means also the most interesting fauna. It is pleasant to think that while affairs have been pushed with such energy during the past three years: while Boer and Briton struggled, while the Coronation passed through its rigours, while the Education clauses were being wrangled over, and bye-elections contested; while composers were striving and engineers panting; so fine an intellect as Mr. Hudson's has been occupied in loitering in the New Forest watching spiders at play, cuckoos evicting their foster-brothers, hornets sipping the ivy blossoms, and adders at bask in the sun.

Mr. Hudson has not, of course, been alone in these detached pursuits; other naturalists have been similarly employed. But other naturalists are not Mr. Hudson, have not his power of visualising all things at once—the ant and the man—or his sensitive, wistful temperament and gift of style. In a word, other naturalists have not written "The Purple Land" and "El Ombu." The result is that where their books might be just the records of their scientific observations, Mr. Hudson's is a delicate, sombre, and suggestive monologue on life, filled with the tenderest appreciation of the beauty of all wild things, and imparting many rare secrets.

Bit by bit Mr. Hudson is revealing to us our own country. It was he who first taught the Londoner that the great City's birds repay study. It was he who wrote the best book on Sussex that has yet been published, and he now yields up in this serene volume some of Hampshire's treasure. It is a charming task for England's returned truants—to bring to her loveliness eyes trained in foreign lands and eloquence matured in exile. Mr. Hudson has spent the greater part of his life in South America: settling down again in the Island he now shows us how to see. We, who have had these scenes always within reach, miss so much that he, a stranger, detects—just as a husband is often the last to perceive that his wife looks particularly handsome. Familiarity dulls the perception: one takes things for granted. A passage wherein Mr. Hudson refers to his South American home may be quoted as an example of his intensely personal manner—a style that is often almost electrically charged with himself. He has been watching some spiders at their curious antics, and, as he watched, a gipsy boy joined him:—

But when I looked back, and when, regaining the road, I went on my way, and indeed for long hours after, I saw the boy vaguely, almost like a boy of mist, and was hardly able to recall his features, so faintly had he impressed me; while the spider on her flower, the small male that wooed and won her many times yet never ventured to take her, were stamped so vividly on my brain that even if I had wished it I could not have got rid of that persistent image. It made me miserable to think that I had left, thousands of miles away, a world of spiders exceeding in size, variety of shape, and beauty and richness of colouring, those I found here—surpassing them, too, in the marvellousness of their habits and that ferocity of disposition which is without a parallel in nature. I wished I could drop this burden of years so as to go back to them, to spend half a lifetime in finding out some of their fascinating secrets. Finally, I envied those who in future years will grow up in that green continent, with this passage in their hearts, and have the happiness which I had missed.

The book abounds in passages of great beauty; but we find ourselves turning more often to those in which Mr. Hudson tells something directly of himself than where he is more objectively descriptive. Who else is there now writing that could or would so express himself on a Hampshire heath?—

This miserable sensation soon passed away, and, with quieted heart, I began to grow more and more attracted by the thought of resting on so blessed a spot. To have always about me that wildness which I best loved—the rude incult heath, the beautiful desolation; to have harsh furze and ling and bramble and bracken to grow on me, and only wild creatures for visitors and company. The little stonechat, the tinkling meadow pipit, the excited white-throat to sing to me in summer; the deep-burrowing rabbit to bring down his warmth and familiar smell among my bones; the heat-loving adder, rich in colour, to find when summer is gone a dry safe shelter and hibernaculum in my empty skull.

Another man, did he write in that way, might not be believed; but it is a characteristic of Mr. Hudson, as of Jefferies, that one must accept his every word of himself without question. If poetry truly be emotion recollected in tranquillity this volume is fine poetry. Jefferies's exultation or almost intoxication under the influence of the visible world's loveliness is not here: rather a quiet pride to be a part of so immensely interesting a cosmos, shot through with regret at the thought that man, with all his advantages, is still in so many ways lower than his "earth-born companions" (as Burns calls them), and is still so lacking in imagination as to destroy them in wantonness.

But there are no other writers with whom to liken Mr. Hudson, except fitfully. Wordsworth he recalls in reverence, but he has more of iron mingled with his love. Thoreau he resembles in his independence, his aloofness; Jefferies in his passionate wish to understand Nature, to be nearer her heart. Gilbert White was of a simpler day; Mr. Hudson is peculiarly modern. If there is any writer at this moment whom Mr. Hudson suggests to us it is Mr. Hardy, in certain of the descriptive interludes in his novels—particularly perhaps in "The Woodlanders," and also his poems. They are far from being alike in all points, but both men look upon Nature, not as a separate collection of phenomena for study on fine days, but as impregnating, enveloping, and influencing all. Both are equally in love with the green earth and yet equally prepared to be merged in it. Both smile sadly.

A Spiritual Genius.

THE LIFE OF FATHER DOLLING. By Charles E. Osborn. (Arnold. 12s. 6d.)

IN an age of theory and ever-varying experimental philanthropy, nothing is more valuable than the biography of such a man as Father Dolling. Here was neither theorist nor man of letters—for he was professedly "an ignoramus" in book-learning—but a spiritual genius, an intensely human saint, who knew God's secret and lived it. It is not as the exponent of certain dogmas, nor as the leader of any particular cause, that we are interested in this man, but because of his strong vital personality, and his far-reaching influence upon men and women of widely different type and class.

Few could be better equipped to tell the tale of Father Dolling's life than Mr. Osborne, who for seven years lived and worked with him at Landport, and for twenty years loved him as a friend: and he has told us the story fittingly, with an understanding sympathy that only one who "felt his purpose and rejoiced in his joy" could do. Some might reasonably wish that the details of all the petty misunderstandings and hindrances put in his way, by men of less spiritual insight, had been omitted from the book, but the life would have been less true and less instructive; and we pass hastily over these pages—to those which tell of Father's Dolling's own attitude towards these constant persecutions—with the relief of one who breathes again the clear air after the atmosphere of a close room. It is to the credit of the biographer that this healthful, bracing atmosphere, which was a characteristic part of Dolling's personality, is felt throughout the book. Mr. Osborne writes:—

To be near him was to feel alive, to be again buoyant, young in heart. Dullness, conventionality, hardness of mind and of feeling could not exist within the range of his potent influence: he was as a "breeze from places strong for life."

Robert Dolling's name is most often associated with his power of organisation—by which in a few months he would convert a neglected and squalid district into a centre of spiritual and educational effort, and by the contagion of his own enthusiasm succeed in raising the necessary money to carry on the work. The testimony of one of the most successful business men of the day was that Dolling was among the very best men of business he had ever met. But his peculiar power was more than this. He attracted and inspired men of all classes, more especially those outside the ordinary religious influence. To be an outcast of any kind was a title to his regard. His own home was the headquarters of his work, first at the Parsonage at Landport, later at the Clergy-house at Poplar. Never were houses more elastic, nor inmates more heterogeneous. Professional men and ladies of fashion sat at the same table with the "human odds and ends," the poor, the unfortunate, and the hopeless failures of society; and to all he gave discriminating help and loving sympathy. Whether as preacher or missionary, Father Dolling was above all things human, natural to the verge of eccentricity. He always spoke and wrote in the simplest words he could find, and his similes and stories were alternately humorous and pathetic, as the smiles and tears on a child's face. A friend wrote of him:—

I suppose one can hardly conceive of a person who could with greater ease, and less jar, turn from jocularity to gravity, and who could at one moment be holding you in helpless laughter, and at the next be touching straight home to your conscience. I suppose it was because the secular and religious were not nearly such distinct spheres as with most people.

Of this characteristic Mr. Osborne says: "To have known him was to have known the essential harmony of his character. This double aspect of his, made on the one hand human-hearted people religious, and religiously-minded people human."

There was no trace of cant, nor stereotyped formula in his teaching, and perhaps this and his unfailing sense of humour made him specially beloved by the Winchester boys and all his young friends. He grew old with the heart of a child.

Father Dolling's methods of work were by no means always shared by his friends and helpers, and his frequent attacks upon the laxity of clergy and laity made him an enemy to the hidebound formalist of whatever school. He was always loyal at heart to the Church of England, and tenaciously adhered to those catholic practices which he felt to have most effect upon the minds and lives of the people; and in justification of their use he appealed always to their value to the soul, and never to their historical age or accuracy. It was his character more than his dogma that won him so many and such varied friends—a character in which nature was not curbed, but developed by the freedom of divine service. Soldier, schoolboy, and artisan, each found in him his particular English ideal—a fearless love of truth, a hatred of meanness and cowardice, and a scorn of cant and hypocrisy. At one of his West End meetings, when, as usual, he was pleading for funds to carry on his work, he prefaced his demand with: "I do not wish to mislead you; I should like you all to know that I am High Church."

Robert Dolling lived the religious life in the racket of the world. His presence brought comfort and joy; and where he went dark places were illuminated by his spiritual genius.

Neurotic.

THE JOURNAL OF ARTHUR STIRLING. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THERE is an air of mystery about the production of this book which we do not particularly like. Why has the editor, who claims to have been Stirling's most intimate friend, not signed his introduction? If the Journal be an actual record of fact the less mystification there is about it the better; if it is not a record of fact we regard the whole thing as without justification. But we must accept it as genuine, and treat it with what seriousness it deserves.

Arthur Stirling, then, was a youth who believed himself to be a great poet. We read in the introduction: "He was the author of one book, a tragedy in blank verse, called 'The Captive'; that drama forms the chief theme of this journal. For the rest, it seems to me enough to quote this notice, which appeared in the 'New York Times' for June 9, 1902:—

'STIRLING. By suicide in the Hudson River, poet and man of genius, in the 22nd year of his age, only son of Richard T. and Grace Stirling, deceased, of Chicago.'

The Journal describes how the tragedy of "The Captive" was written, how it was refused by publisher after publisher, and how finally its author committed suicide. The editor says: "Extraordinary pages they are to me. That a man who was about to take his life should have written them is one of the strangest cases of artistic absorption I know of in literature. But Arthur Stirling was a man lost in his art just so—so full of it, so drunk with it, that nothing in life had other meaning to him. . . . So he lived, and so he worked; the world had no use for his work, and so he died."

Let us now proceed to the Journal itself. We have read it with some interest, a little pity, and much disgust. It is a book of ravings, of neuroticism, of colossal egoism. We do not find in it the firm striving of the artist—we have no proof that Stirling was an artist at all. What we have is a series of hysterical outpourings which make us ashamed for the writer as we read. "The Captive" may be a great poem—it will no doubt be published in due course—but we do not gather from the Journal very much hope for it. Stirling had no idea how to treat the world; it does not appear, however, that the world treated him badly. When he wanted employment he got it; it is not obvious, however, that he need have found it as a plate-washer and a car conductor. His plan was to work till he had saved a few dollars and then to wait for inspiration or the replies of publishers. The publishers, on the whole, treated him extremely well. Two or three, at any rate, gave him encouragement, which, seeing how he badgered them, is all to the credit of the publishers. The man who is convinced that he is a heaven-sent genius very seldom is one; there was no doubt at all in the mind of Arthur Stirling. We must illustrate by extracts the extraordinary perversity, hysteria, and wrong-headedness of the Journal:—

I have not one beautiful memory in my life. I have nothing in my life that, when I think of it, does not make me writhe.

... Fighting—fighting—all the time fighting! Sometimes I run—sometimes I don't know what to do. Last night I know that it grew dark, and that I was lying flat on the dead leaves, striking my hands, that were numb with excitement. I was too weak to move—but I remember panting out, "There is nothing like that in 'King Lear!'"

Will you imagine me to-day, kneeling by the bedside, shuddering; my face hidden, the tears streaming down my cheeks—and I cry aloud: "I will—oh, I will!"

I cannot tell any more.

To-day I had a spiritual experience—a revelation; to-day, in a flash of insight, I understood an age—whole centuries of time, whole nations of men.

We need quote no more to indicate the manner and outlook, if it may be called an outlook, of this Journal. The whole thing is a persistent railing against fate, a perpetual exaltation of the ego. We have every sympathy with genius struggling against adversity—but we like to see the struggle honestly maintained, we look for some manliness, some real grip of the heart of life. We look in vain for manliness and real grip in these pages. Many readers, no doubt, will take a different point of view; they will see one man against the world, and the man going under. But our experience of the world does not lead us to wholesale condemnations, and we cannot see that this Journal condemns the world with justice. It is time, indeed, to make a protest against such publications; they minister to the vanity and useless declamations of ill-balanced youth, while they contribute nothing to the quiet sanity which is at the back of the truest and most vital art. This is a volume rather for the student of pathology than the general reader, and even if "The Captive" be a fine poem we should hold to our opinion concerning its author's Journal. Our impression is, though we cannot support it by proof, that the story of the suicide is a mere advertising device, and that the Journal was written by some ingenious man of letters.

The Genesis of Authorship.

SCIENCE OF LITERATURE: ON THE LITERARY THEORIES OF TAINE AND HERBERT SPENCER. Two Lectures by A. T. W. Borsdorf. (David Nutt. 1s. net.)

AN author, of course, is not an isolated and unrelated phenomenon. He is, like Tennyson's Ulysses, a part of all that he has met. But to assert this platitude is not to explain the genesis of authorship, nor to predicate a Shakespeare or a Burns from their respective environments. Prof. Borsdorf has set himself, in these lectures, the easy task of criticising, in the destructive sense, the two outstanding theories that have been advanced as the basis for a science of literature: but he may be accompanied to some purpose.

Many are the methods of literary critics. Some judge literature by an ideal standard of perfection; others make a complete study of the psychology of an author; others compare and contrast authors of different races and ages; others, first of whom was Taine, regard literary products as manifestations of national genius:—

What are the relations, first, between the work and its author; and, secondly, between the author and his surroundings? Can we from a given work draw conclusions with regard to its author, and thence to his race, age, and general surroundings, or, from a consideration of these general causes, arrive at a complete determination of an author's genius, and, too, at a complete understanding of his work?

Taine set out to answer this socio-psychological question on the principle (derived from Comte) of mutual dependence—or correlation, as a biologist would say. According to this, all parts of civilisation mutually affect one another in their changes. And Taine asserted that it was possible to reconstruct the author from his work—to perceive through it every characteristic, every trait of the mind that produced it. Applying this assertion to the differing cases of the "realist" and the idealist, Prof. Borsdorf shows its extremely limited truth. As to the so-called "realist," we may agree with him in admitting Taine's thesis; has not Stevenson flatly told us of the realist "laying on the indecency with the ungrudging hand of love"? In such work, at any rate, the author's psychology is naked and unashamed. But in the case of the others the slightest consideration is enough to show that Taine's claim cannot be admitted.

Nor does the great Frenchman's theory hold more firmly in its more important clause, which would find in the author an answer to a nice mathematical problem, whereof the factors are the society, the century, the climate, and so forth, in which he moved. Deny the influence of the milieu and the habitat we cannot; but precisely to estimate it is yet beyond our powers. In Prof. Borsdorf's excellent words:—

Taine has failed to create a science of literature in the naturalistic sense of the word "science," because the auxiliary sciences, psychology and ethology especially, were not advanced enough to allow of the real foundation of such a new science.

To Taine at least we owe it that the first attempt, perhaps, since Aristotle was made, and that the problems yet awaiting solution were well and clearly formulated.

Mr. Spencer has attacked a question which Taine never touched: that of the development of literature. He applies to it the law of evolution, and it is the most obvious criticism, though necessary, as we admit, to urge, as Prof. Borsdorf does, that, in the psychic sphere with so many unknown and incomputable factors at work, no precision of results can be expected. Literature, Mr. Spencer has taught us, like art and language and science, is "an objective register of subjective changes"; and this register is subject to the law of evolution. Prof. Borsdorf's treatment of Mr. Spencer's position, though, as we conceive, unsound, is most luminous and interesting. We earnestly commend it to everyone interested in a fascinating problem, but we would warn the reader that the digression concerning the law of evolution in biology must be read with all reserve. The value of the subsequent part of the paper is almost annulled by the wholly inaccurate statement—gathered from what vain source we cannot conceive—of the accepted biological belief. These few pages we regret, as needless and strangely misrepresentative of the facts; and the remainder of the argument, whilst extremely interesting in certain details of comment upon Mr. Spencer's theory, does not appear to us in any valid manner to assail the necessary belief that, as elsewhere, the principle of evolution, however obscure be our tracing of it, must prevail, and that most fortunately, in the domain of literature.

A Distinguished Limitation.

DRAMATIC SONNETS, POEMS, AND BALLADS: SELECTIONS FROM THE POEMS OF EUGENE LEE-HAMILTON. With an Introduction by William Sharp. (Walter Scott Publishing Co., London. 1s.)

MR. LEE-HAMILTON has a certain eclectic reputation among cultivated lovers of poetry, though to the great indifferent public, ruffled into attention only by the loudest winds of rumour, he is unknown. Nor, though we welcome this selection from his work, made (we are told) by the author himself, can we complain that his fate is undeserved. For his is a singularly limited, quiet, and slow-ripening gift. Practically, it is confined to the sonnet. We would not say that the lyrics in various kinds, which compose a small final proportion of this little volume, are without their merit. But it is an artistic merit, lacking spontaneity or any marked original quality. The longer and more ambitious lyrics, such as those in the ode form, or tending that way, are apt to have a very plain Swinburnian stamp as regards style. One comes back to the sonnet as the form in which alone—or so chiefly as alone to be worth considering—Mr. Lee-Hamilton attains his measure of personal power, puts forth what is recognisably an individuality. And these sonnets predominate in and dominate the book with an exclusiveness quite unusual. This engrossment with a single form is very peculiar among English poets of our day; and that a form which, despite the modern favour, remains something of an exotic in English verse. Yet in this self-imposed limitation Mr. Lee-Hamilton is manifestly justified. The sonnet fits his studious and artful gift. It needed not Mr. Sharp to tell us what his poems tell, that (like Mrs. Browning) he is a lifelong invalid. Unlike her, his suffering has depressed his vitality. There is a lack of central ardour which handicaps his poetry in sheer motive-power, so that the shorter the demand on his energy the more like he is to sustain it. Even the brief burthen of the sonnet he does not attain to uplift all at once. His strength slowly and by practice grows equal to it—that is noticeable in this volume. From the outset there is delicacy of art, there is refinement of feeling and of reflection, there is pictorial—almost too painter-like—perception. But the emotion is a little thin, the emotional thought (and the poet must “think in his heart,” or his poetry is made desolate) not deep and red enough. In these early sonnets the imagery, while it shows the poetic mind, is often somewhat trivial, ingenious, artificial, touched with the associations of a petty modernity. The ball-room and the band (for instance) yield imagery to one sonnet; and an extreme case perhaps best examples our meaning. Of the higher work in these earlier sonnets let us quote “Eagles of Tiberius” :—

They say at Capua that Tiberius bound
His slaves to eagles, ere he had them flung
In the abysses, from the rocks that hung
Beetling above the sea and the sea's sound.

Slowly the eagle, struggling round and round
With the gagged slave that from his talons swung.
Sank through the air, to which he fiercely clung.
Until the sea caught both, and both were drowned.

O Eagle of the Spirit, hold thy own;
Work thy great wings, and grapple to the sky; •
Let not this shackled body drag thee down

Into that stagnant sea where, by-and-by,
The ethereal and the clayey both must drown,
Bound by a link that neither can untie.

This is good; but the later “Sonnets of Life and Fate” and “Imaginary Sonnets” are still better. Here at length the poet has reached a fulness of emotional thought which gives his best sonnets a true distinction. They have passed the subtle bound which divides poetic verse from absolute poems. Mr. Lee-Hamilton's favourite method is to expound in the sestet an image set forth in the octave. This is done with extreme skill, so that the application strikes home with an effect of almost dramatic and sometimes solemn surprise. It may not be the highest and austere form of the sonnet; but the effect is fine and self-justifying. One is tempted to quote example on example, such as the “Ring of Faustus”—a very striking sonnet. But, forced to choose, we elect one of the “Imaginary Sonnets,” which does not belong to this type at all, but is remarkable for sheer descriptive strength—

“Leonardo da Vinci to his Snakes,” a sonnet on the picture of Medusa which inspired Shelley's poem :—

I love to watch them, trickling on the floor,
Like Evil's very ooings running free;
Now livid blue, now green as green can be,
Now almost white, though black an hour before.

Their undulation, trammelled by no shore,
Might be a ripple upon Horror's sea,
The live meander moves so soundlessly,
Inscrutable as Magic's very core.

What if I painted a Medusa's head,
Fresh severed, lying on its back, with brow
Convulsed in death, and wan as moonlit lead;

And made the snakes, still writhing in a slow
Death struggle round the temples that are dead,
Striving to quit them in a ceaseless flow?

Every word of this tells (note, for instance, the “wan as moonlit lead”). An equal power, allied with imagination and emotional reflection, makes the best of this poet's sonnets distinctive and distinguished work, on which you can always open with pleasure. He has worked his single vein with a concentration slowly issuing in wise success.

The Value of Vivisection.

EXPERIMENTS ON ANIMALS. By Stephen Paget. With an Introduction by Lord Lister. New and revised edition. Progressive Science Series. (Murray. 6s.)

THIS volume does not concern itself with the principle of vivisection. If human life has an absolute value, the principle is justified; if its value be only relative, then the supporters of vivisection must demonstrate how many rabbits it takes to save a baby's life, and must submit their equation to those who shall weigh the result. Mr. Paget's object is merely, however, to prove that vivisection has been of value to man, and this object he amply attains on each and every page. There is an entire absence of the polemic usually associated with this matter. The facts have simply been stated, with detailed references for every individual assertion. Excepting a reference to the “chorda tympani”—which no lay reader could guess to be a nerve connected with the drum of the ear—Mr. Paget has succeeded in making himself intelligible to the general reader, for whom the book is intended. The volume is practically a verifiable history of physiology, biology, pathology, bacteriology and therapeutics. In a temperate introduction, Lord Lister—who, as the founder of modern surgery, has saved more lives and averted more suffering than any other man in history—points out how difficult the present Act makes various branches of modern work in therapeutics, such as the production of the various anti-toxins which mark the scientific era in pure medicine.

The value of vivisection to physiology is familiar to most of us. We know that by it the arteries were found not to contain air (as their name signifies), that by it Harvey discovered the circulation of the blood, and so forth. Physiology is, of course, fundamental, but it has not the instant interest of the other branches of knowledge to which vivisection has contributed since the Act of 1876. Darwin, at that time, could write that he knew “what a pity it would be to stop all progress in such a grand science as physiology,” but subsequent work has been of even more importance. We may note the antiseptic system of Lister, which has since then been perfected; the introduction of anti-toxins, and the discovery of the cause of consumption and its allies, which now appears to be on the verge of consummation by the introduction of an efficient curative serum, rendered possible, of course, only by vivisection. Vaccination against anthrax saves France about seven million francs a year in cattle and sheep, so that animals also gain by vivisection. The number of children's lives saved by the new treatment of diphtheria is quite beyond reckoning, even if the future be ignored. The results in hydrophobia and plague are an old story, but malaria and yellow fever add a recent interest. Since the work, depending on vivisection, of Manson and Major Ross, which resulted in the latter bringing the Nobel prize in medicine to this country, everyone knows that malaria is dependent upon a certain mosquito. It is now merely a matter of draining the pools in which the mosquito breeds, and not only will malaria disappear—the process has already begun—but thousands of square miles of the richest parts of the surface of this shrinking planet will become available for the swelling race of mankind. We cannot do much with a supposed "miasm," but an Anopheles is within our powers. By the dispensable means of vivisection it has similarly been shown that the mosquito conveys yellow fever, and Havana last year supplied the astonishing result that there was not one death in the city from a disease which had been endemic for two centuries and killed every fourth inhabitant. Thus an indirect result of the Spanish-American war was to save about fifteen thousand lives in one city in one year. There has not been a single case of yellow fever in Havana since September. The disease (or rather the Culex mosquito) is there extinct. As to drugs, we range from chloroform, introduced as a result of dangerous experiments carried out on himself for months, in Edinburgh, by Sir James Simpson, to thyroid treatment, which now cures myxoedema, cretinism, and many forms of insanity all the world over. We may conclude by quoting the only paragraph in which Mr. Paget has let himself go:—

Myxoedema is but one instance how the treatment of disease must have the help of experiments on animals. Those who oppose all such experiments, now that they have faced or outfaced the facts about myxoedema, must face the facts about cancer. What do they wish to see done? They are absolutely ignorant of the elementary facts about the disease: Will they advise the experts what line to follow?

A Pleasing Chronicle of Sport.

EXMOOR STREAMS. NOTES AND JOTTINGS, WITH PRACTICAL HINTS FOR ANGLERS. By Claude F. Wade. With Illustrations. (Chatto and Windus.)

MR. WADE's little book is more to our mind than most of the works on Angling which have been published within recent years. These, as a rule, are marred by one of two faults. In some cases the writers make their outings with rod and line the excuse for rather tiresome raptures on the beauties of rural nature as seen by men habituated to the bustle of cities; in others the writers discuss the sport as a whole, which is a large subject, from a narrowly limited experience. Mr. Wade's plan is much better. It is really about Angling that he writes, and he writes of the art only in so far as he is acquainted with it. His style is so slack that it would not pass an elementary examination in syntax; but one does not dip far into his pages before perceiving that his negligence is that of a sprightly man of experience so keenly interested in his subject that he discourses with no thought other than a natural disposition towards candour and lucidity. Since 1861, whenever he could quit the Temple for a holiday, Mr. Wade has been casting angle in the streams of Exmoor. The brown trout to be caught in these waters are not large: indeed, "the average," we are informed, "is no better than twelve to the pound!" Still, even if bigger game had never come in his way, Mr. Wade, we are sure, would have attracted us by his account of the days he has spent on the Lyn and the Barle.

When large fish are far away, surprising enjoyment is to be found in the capture of small ones. These twelve-to-the-pound trout have their moods, which one must study. Sometimes they seek a particular fly, scorning all others; sometimes they scorn all flies, not disdaining a worm. About that emergency Mr. Wade tells the truth very pleasingly. "In clear low water," he writes, "I consider worm-fishing more difficult than, or at all events as difficult as, fly-fishing. Don't you believe that it is quite an inferior kind of sport and hardly to be named amongst fly fishermen. This is all utter nonsense, and is only put forward by those who fancy themselves at fly-fishing and know more or less about it, but who are utterly ignorant of the art of worm-fishing, which they pretend to despise simply because they don't understand it. . . . There is a great fascination in not knowing what sort of a fish you may get hold of, from a fifteen-pound salmon down to a one-ounce troutlet, or, where there are no salmon or peal, from a giant trout down to a pigmy." This is nearly true. We know that fascination; but surely it is the experience only of those who, habitually fishing with flies, try the worm as an occasional change? There are surprises in fly-fishing too, as when the fingers that hold this very pen thrilled to the discovery, a few days ago, that a large salmon had taken a trout fly, a teal-and-red; but what Mr. Wade says is true in the main. Especially in a time of flood, the problem about what manner of fish may be looking at the sunken lure is wrapped in expectant and agreeable mystery.

From the passage which has been quoted, it will be perceived that there are fish other than small trout in the streams of Exmoor. Some days Mr. Wade caught thirty or forty half-pound brown trout; at certain times of the year sea-trout, varying between half-a-pound and four pounds, run up the streams; often too, if the floods are seasonable and sufficient, salmon are plentiful, and eager for lob worms or minnows. Mr. Wade, it is clear, knows the right way with all these fish. His prattle about them is genial, convincing, racy. Here and there he speaks a little despitely of Lorna Doone. He dwells fondly on the times when she was "practically unknown." "Even 'Gurt John Ridd,'" he says, "had not arrived on the scene, as he did later on (at least I read it was so in a London newspaper), in the shape of a worthy and gigantic mender of roads, who afterwards, poor man, died blazoned out as the hero of Blackmore's excellent novel in a London hospital." The truth about this can now be revealed without impropriety. It was given to us over the walnuts and the wine at Teddington by Mr. Blackmore himself. "Was there really a John Ridd?" "O, yes," said our distinguished host, as picturesque an Englishman as we have ever known. "And was he—was he like Lorna's John?" "Well, no: not exactly. He was rather a gross brute; but I thought he had possibilities."

"Very Near a Great Man."

MAZARIN. By Arthur Hassall. Foreign Statesmen Series. (Macmillan. 2s. 6d.)

THIS volume (as was required by the plan of the series) is small, and Mazarin's career was large—it almost merges into European history; but Mr. Hassall has, on the whole, achieved the very difficult task of selection and compression with skill and discretion, while he possesses a clear and agreeable narrative touch. Mazarin is a somewhat neglected and generally misunderstood statesman. He had the ill-fortune to follow a man greater than himself; and that is a fatal misfortune. Thus he is regarded as playing Napoleon the Little to Richelieu's Napoleon the Great. The popular notion of him is that of Dumas: a weak, cunning, shifty, avaricious adventurer, succeeding in the end by undeserved good fortune. But this was, in truth, a man of very great talents, who would have been notable in any age or country. He came into power under the most difficult conditions. Richelieu's death had set all men on expecting a change, many on hoping for it, a large and powerful combination on working for it. A Queen (Anne of Austria) who had been Richelieu's bitter enemy was Regent. Her friends, whom the great Cardinal had exiled, flocked back to France, clamorous for places, pensions, and the reversal of the dead man's policy. All Richelieu's enemies, which meant most of the French nobility and hosts of powerful intriguers besides, were determined to reverse his policy and regain their power. The Parliament of Paris, which Richelieu had made a nonentity, retook its power and determined on the reversal of his policy. All these strong factions, all the petticoat intriguers who then played such a part in politics, and were many of them the Queen's friends, had all one voice for the undoing of everything which Richelieu had done. It was the new Cardinal's legacy to maintain, consolidate, and complete the dead Cardinal's work. And against this hostile coalition he had but one basic support—the Queen to whom everyone looked as his most formidable enemy. His secret marriage with her was his salvation. But Anne was easy-going and anxious to please everybody; no safe support for a policy of blood-and-iron; moreover, her own friends were Mazarin's enemies and active opponents. It speaks volumes for his ability that against such odds he carried out the dead man's foreign policy with an unflinching and dexterous hand, making France the chief power in Europe, and guiding her arms to victory. True, he neglected home affairs, and let the forces of disorder gather till the Fronde obliged him to suppress them drastically. But was that his fault? Could he have played the Richelieu? No doubt he was by nature courteous and forbearing. No doubt he was of all things a diplomat, a "wily Italian," preferring smooth and subtle ways. But that is not all. His was not Richelieu's position, though he sat in Richelieu's seat. He was no French noble, came of no ancient French house, was not even a Frenchman at all. He was an Italian—adventurer, his enemies added. A French noble might send French nobles to the axe, as Richelieu sent them; it was lion preying on lion: if a foreigner should do the like, the nation would turn and rend him. This, with the Queen's easy temper, sufficiently excuses Mazarin's long-suffering. He could not strike till the nation was behind him: to have the nation behind him, the nobles must make it evident that they would ruin France unless they were suppressed. In the affair of the Duc de Bouillon Mazarin showed he could act when he was secure of public opinion. And when the Fronde had shown the impossibility of nobles and Parliament, he acted with firmness and entire success. When he died, he had completed Richelieu's legacy to the letter. He had finished the crushing of the nobles, he had finished the crushing of Austrian and Spanish supremacy, he had left France at the head of Europe. He who had done all this, against such obstacles, with nothing to rely on but a good-natured woman, was something very near a great man.

"The Correggio of Sculpture."

JEAN GOUJON: HIS LIFE AND WORK. By Reginald Lister. With an Introduction by S. Arthur Strong. (Duckworth. 42s.)

ONE of those French artists of the Renaissance who are now receiving their due recognition, it needs but a glance at the reproductions which adorn this book to impress the beholder with the beauty and power as a sculptor of Jean Goujon. He had the artistic good fortune to live during the palmy days of Francis the First and Henri the Second, under the patronage of that extraordinary woman, Diane de Poitiers. She was the inspiration and the model of his loveliest sculptures. Unlike most royal mistresses, her habits assimilated her to the goddess whose name she bore. She hunted constantly in the forest, she bathed, not in scented waters, but in the cold and living spring. Though her connection with the King, Henri the Second, was illegitimate, she assumed all the airs of the virtuous matron; prescribed medicine—and morals—for the royal children, advised the Queen (who loved her as little as might be expected), mixed in affairs of state, and—when Henri died—lived the life of a mourning widow. Cold, prudent, and of brilliant accomplishments, she patronised religion and the fine arts. Let it be set to her credit that she patronised Goujon. He, in his turn, has patronised her; and her beauty looks out from many of these pages. Witness, for instance, that splendid fountain of Diana which forms the frontispiece; in which, by the way, the stag is almost more beautiful than the goddess. Such proud and gentle animal loveliness was surely never expressed in sculpture.

As Mr. Lister says, the influence, and the beneficent influence, of Goujon on French art at large is impossible to overrate. That art was servilely under the foreign domination of the Italian school of Fontainebleau when he appeared. He rescued it, taught it independence and nationality, and set the type of French decorative art even down to the time of the Empire. He was the first to introduce the nude figure into French decorative sculpture—how exquisitely, let these pages show. Fortunate was it for him that he had a Diane de Poitiers as his model. Comparing the misfortune of the English renaissance, which had Elizabeth for its inspiration, Mr. Lister grimly remarks that a nude statue of the Virgin Queen is a horror unthinkable. Even the pictorial tendency of his sculpture, which has been made a reproach to him, was (Mr. Lister observes) of incalculable benefit in its effect on French painting of the future; coming, as he did, at a time when there were few French painters. His conceptions often resemble those of Correggio, whence he has been called the Correggio of sculpture; but his chisel has a severity which preserves austerity in his nude figures. Nay, in such figures as the bas-reliefs of St. Germain L'Auxerrois, which are represented here, the resemblance to Michael Angelo is unmistakable. There is a kindred majesty and masculinity. Nevertheless, Mr. Lister considers it difficult to believe that Goujon could have been acquainted with the great Italian's work. Mr. Lister gives a detailed account of what is known concerning his life and the sequence of his works; and this excellent monograph should be in the hands of all who love sculpture.

Other New Books.

THE FAITH OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON. By John Kelman, Junr. (Oliphant. 5s. net.)

TO Stevenson's readers any summary or interpretation of his religious faith is surely unnecessary, and those who have not read him are not likely to trouble their heads about it. Mr. Kelman appears to have recognised this difficulty, yet he did not on that account refrain from writing this book. "No apology is needed," he says, "for another book concerning Robert Louis Stevenson. It would be impossible to have too much of him; and while his faith has been touched upon in passing by most of those who have written about him, it has never yet been selected for special and detailed study." We agree with Mr. Kelman that it would be impossible to have too much of Stevenson's own work; but it is easy to have too much written round it; indeed, we have had too much already. We cannot, therefore, give any cordial welcome to this volume, although it is far above the average of such work. Mr. Kelman writes well, draws sane conclusions, and is enthusiastic without being foolish. His point of view is certainly that which Stevenson would have held himself:—

There is around us much unconscious Christianity. There are strong men whom God has girded, though they have not known Him, and quiet men who do not seem to be following Christ, and yet unquestionably are casting out devils. These are the men who will best appreciate Stevenson's faith.

Mr. Kelman well says that "the distinguishing mark of this most dogmatic of men is the absence of dogma in the theological sense." Stevenson's faith was entirely undogmatic; to attempt to tie him to a formula was at once to make him kick. Yet he was always preaching; as he himself said: "I would rise from the dead to preach." After all, we have the best of his faith and philosophy stated in his own incomparable way in "A Christmas Sermon." If there are people who wish to have Stevenson's belief expounded to them they cannot do better than go to Mr. Kelman's pages.

LOVELY WOMAN. By T. W. H. Crosland. (Grant Richards. 5s.)

MR. CROSLAND has followed up his indictment of a nation with an indictment of a sex, and having been rude to the Unspeakable Scot he goes on to be even more rude to woman. Indeed, the only notable feature of this hysterical, ill-spelled, and uninformed work is its blatant rudeness, and the man who shouts rude remarks in a crowd is certain of a hearing—though not of respect. Woman, he maintains, has neither good looks nor efficiency; she is a failure as maid, wife, and widow. She ought to be kept in a hutch at the bottom of the garden. "Of Miss Ellen Thorneycroft Fowler I will only say that I wish she had never been born." That is a specimen of what Mr. Crosland thinks a gentleman should write, print, and publish. Of "the sinner" he writes, "Most women are more or less bad"—a statement which would apply to all men. "Many of them drink. Some of them are kleptomaniacs and shoplifters." Of course; they are as human as their husbands and fathers. "A man can carry a skinful of liquor like a gentleman. A woman never gets drunk like a lady." Well—there the women who are also ladies may find an unintended compliment. Naturally Mr. Crosland is infuriated by the success of women "in obtaining what they conceive to be their rights." With Scotsmen and women "it is a case of Maud at the prow and Donald at the helm, and it means ruin of the bluest sort." We have been unable to find anything in the sentiment or the style of this work to justify it. It is simply rude.

RECOLLECTIONS OF A TOWN BOY AT WESTMINSTER, 1849-1855. By Captain F. Markham. (Arnold. 10s. 6d.)

A VOLUME of pleasant and virile reminiscences—the kind of book to please youngsters and make old men feel that youth is not, after all, so very far behind. Captain Markham was taken up to town from Yorkshire by his father and installed "up Grant's"; then, being left to end for himself, the fun—and also, no doubt, the education—began. The fagging does not seem to have been heavy, and when young Markham had to work for a boy he disliked he took pains to square things up. He did not like Whitaker, so when he packed for Whitaker he put tooth-powder all over his evening clothes. Later he had an adventure with the Bishop of Gloucester's door trimmings:—

The door was painted a beautiful olive green; the knocker, door-bell, name-plate, and letter-box were of brass—all beautifully polished. Slade said, "Now, then, here you are; you take the bell, and I will take the knocker. When I say 'Go!' pull the bell out to full stretch, and give it a good whack with your stick!"

These instructions being carefully followed, both bell and knocker were secured. Says Captain Markham complacently: "I have the bell-handle on my mantel-piece."

Captain Markham writes of "In Bounds" and "Out of Bounds," "Green," "Water," "Fields," and other familiar matters, and always with a robust cheerfulness which is exhilarating. But he is best at the telling of scrapes and the usual school-boy pranks. There is a story of the attempted purchase of a ferret in Great Pie Street which will appeal to a good many old boys. "I think that the want of a gymnasium in those days was a great incentive to mischief," says the author, and no doubt it was. Looking back upon the old Westminster life, and comparing it with the school-life to-day, Captain Markham sees much to approve and something to deplore. Above all he regrets the abolition of "water," which, he says, was the very keystone of his school-life. But there is more joyful retasting of the past than regret for the old order in this invigorating and simple book.

There reaches us from the "Punch" office Mr. L. Raven-Hill's "An Indian Sketch-Book"—a volume containing over a hundred pencil drawings of scenes, incidents, and impressions taken during the artist's visit to the Durbar. In a dedication to E. A., Mr. Raven-Hill says: "Some of these 'leaves from a sketch-book' may recall to you scenes we saw together; the others, many of them roughly noted at odd moments snatched from the tedium of railway journeys, will, I hope, give you some impression of the things that struck me as curious during a hurried visit to the Shining East. . . ." The drawings have Mr. Raven-Hill's customary alertness and facility.

"The House Beautiful" (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin), by Mr. C. M. Weed, is a volume dealing with flower decoration. The author treats the subject practically, and gives valuable hints as to harmonies in the colour and form of flowers as well the harmony which should exist between the flowers and their receptacles and surroundings. As a rule Mr. Weed has adopted Japanese methods, but they have been adapted to Western conditions. The volume is fully and suggestively illustrated.

NEW EDITIONS: The latest addition to Messrs. Macmillan's three-and-sixpenny issue of Mr. Thomas Hardy's stories is "Wessex Tales."—The same publishers have added to their Illustrated Pocket Classics Maria Edgeworth's "Ormond," with an introduction by Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie. The illustrations, which were originally published in 1895, are by Mr. Carl Schloesser.—Messrs. Methuen have just issued a delightful little leather-bound reprint of Edward Fitzgerald's "Euphranor." This "Dialogue on Youth" deserves more readers than it probably has nowadays. The text is founded on the first edition of 1851.

Fiction.

CATHERINE STERLING. By Norma Lorimer. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THIS is a story of a woman with a past—though Catherine Sterling is still in the first flush of beauty when we leave her. As a girl she finds herself friendless in Japan—except for the man who offers her marriage "without benefit of clergy"; it was the most he could do, since he had already a wife in a lunatic asylum. A year or two later Catherine is in London, a "widow in all but name," with a moderate fortune, the requisite chaperonage, and the inevitable lovers. There is one man who knows her secret, a big, bony, passionate man who goes straight for what he wants without recking of moral fences. And Hugh Dowling is the surprise of the story, a surprise which Miss Lorimer has concealed and displayed with skill. Is this brawny Philistine going to use his knowledge of Catherine's past, when Catherine spurns him and meets Carnac, an insufferable prig, in picture galleries? Miss Lorimer leads her heroine a pretty dance through the lovers whom she is afraid to tell (for she is an honest woman and will not marry under false colours) and the one lover who does not need to be told. The story is well told, with interludes of somewhat acrid epigram:—

Women only believe in the proposals their friends accept, not in those they have refused.

Confidences from women are generally given to hide secrets.

And here is a nice feminine discrimination between the masculine attitudes towards governesses and dancing girls:—

A man thinks twice before he will marry the woman whom he considers suitable and desirable to be the daily and hourly companion and instructress to his children, but he often risks everything to make a ballet-girl their mother.

Miss Lorimer has risen well above the average in the writing of stories, and in flashes she is really good.

THE PINCH OF PROSPERITY. By Horace Annesley Vachell. (Murray. 6s.)

MR. VACHELL takes himself seriously, at least, which is something to be grateful for. He writes a prefatory note, to explain his attitude towards prosperity, in which he says: "In this book prosperity and poverty are presented side by side, as they may be found in the book of Life. To many readers the transition from one to the other may seem abrupt. Is it therefore inartistic? The writer confesses that he doesn't know." Well, a good many artistic books have been written in which such sudden transitions have been made, and we do not complain of Mr. Vachell's work on that score. What we do complain of is that the plot of the story turns not upon life but upon improbability and coincidence, so that from the outset we find ourselves in an atmosphere of unreality. It is incredible to us that twins should be so alike as to deceive their lovers and their husbands, yet the whole book is built round a deliberate deception by which the girl twins exchange names. That is not the kind of material from which good fiction springs. Coincidence, too, is rampant in the story. Coincidence, of course, may be made perfectly convincing, but Mr. Vachell has not the knack of it.

The manner of the book is better than its matter. Mr. Vachell writes with some distinction, though he has a rather irritating tendency to sententiousness. One of the characters is natural and well observed—the girl Pretty Parslow. She is far and away the best piece of work in "The Pinch of Prosperity." The four principal people—the twins and their husbands—do not much interest us; Mr. Vachell's psychology is hardly equal to the task which he has set himself. As for the artist who is half brother to the twins, we find him dull and ineffective; indeed, he never lives for us. Yet Mr. Vachell's book is one which may be read with considerable pleasure, so after all it was well worth paper and print.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE ROMAN ROAD.

By ZACK.

Three stories by the author of "On Trial." The scene of the first, which occupies half the book, is laid at a country house in the village through which ran the Roman road. Passing among the dilapidated cottages it "seemed to image forth life triumphant over disease and failure." The story opens with a conversation in which the owner of Groot Hall, by his mother's confession, finds that he is not the rightful heir. But, like the Roman road, his life emerged from failure. The symbolism of the story is insistent throughout. (Constable. 6s.)

THE WAY BACK.

By ALBERT KINROSS.

A study of yellow journalism. The story deals with the last episode in the life of a man whose literary career began with high ideals, and who found disenchantment as a purveyor of "literature" to the reading public nurtured by the Board Schools. In the opening chapter he sells his partnership—"I'm tired, I'm rich, and I want to live"—and seeks to retrace his steps to the period of his life at which he was the author of a book of poems. "The Way Back" is brief, tragical, and cynical. (Constable. 6s.)

M.R.C.S.

By BURFORD DELANNOY.

A sensational detective story. The doctor had poisoned his patient because of her determination to make a confession which would ruin him. The nurse discovers the crime, and offers to withhold her evidence at the inquest on condition that he will marry her to conceal her shame. The dead woman's husband who, at the moment, was contemplating suicide, appears opportunely with a revolver just as the doctor is about to conceal the circumstances of his patient's death by killing the nurse. The book is illustrated. (Ward, Lock. 6s.)

THE NEW EDEN.

A sentimental story about "a beautiful girl, with large dreamy eyes." It opens in Ireland in the springtime. "The spring maiden, in a robe of young green, her head crowned with blossoms, had come to ratify the vows of Nature." Much of the narrative is like this, and the dialogue abounds in aphorisms. The rejected hero made a play out of his troubles, and when Sylvia witnessed it from the stalls she understood—"her white lips swept apart into a wonderful smile." Part of the action takes place in Italy. (Dublin: Hodges & Co. 6s.)

SANDFORD OF MERTON.

By BELINDA BLINDERS.

"A Story of Oxford Life, edited by Desmond F. T. Coke." It contains pictures of "The Union Debate," "The Cocoa Party," "The Eights," "The Cambridge Football Match," and so on, from the point of view of a maiden lady who spent "a whole week" in the University collecting her material. Some of the papers have appeared in "The Isis," and the book is altogether reminiscent of University journalism. (Simpkin, Marshall. 3s. 6d.)

VIRGINIA OF THE RHODESIANS.

By CYNTHIA STOCKLEY.

A volume of South African love stories. Virginia, the narrator, is a light-hearted, unconventional young woman, with a distaste for "chaperone nonsense," a fund of humour, and an easy, swinging style. The scene of the stories is Mashonaland, at a period before the Matabele war. There are seven in all, with the connecting link of Virginia's personality. In a quotation from Mr. Kipling on the title page she invites her readers to "learn about women from me." (Hutchinson. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
" Quarterly	5/0
" Price for one issue	/5

Firstliness.

It may well be that the creation of the word that heads this article is an impudence, but it offers the advantage of adaptability; we can fit any meaning to it we please. At present it shall stand for qualities characteristic of beginnings in art. For instance, it shall stand for the purple insincerity of this passage:—

Red Moselle! fierce is the swell of thy spreading course—but why do thy broad waters blush when they meet the Rhine?

It shall stand for the pathetic attempt to transmute tautology into power in this:—

There were sobs from among the group, and sounds of grief and mourning. For she was dead. There upon her little bed she lay at rest. The solemn stillness was no marvel now. She was dead. No sleep so beautiful and calm . . .

It matters little that "Vivian Grey" is a first novel and that "The Old Curiosity Shop" is not: the hallmark of firstliness is on both quotations. Not merely in the badness of them do we recognise it; firstliness is not a disease. But we recognise firstliness in the lyric impulse which flogged both writers into articulation. Disraeli's impulse was something like that which makes a man pace a platform while waiting for the train; in the case of Dickens the image may be changed to that of the same man looking about him, a little dazed, after arrival at his destination. The one is fatuously energetic; the other is creditably moved; both have said or exclaimed too much. The resulting fruit in each case properly belongs to literary museums.

Let it be repeated that firstliness is not a disease. A masterpiece may breathe it on every page; howbeit it implies a need for precipitate utterance, and a consequent disregard of form. Vivian Grey is firstliness to the marrow, for he represents Disraeli fondling himself in the "Empire of the Intellect," and revelling in spangled speech and operatic catastrophes. All the affectation of the novel has been enjoyed by the author so much that one looks at it rather as a lusus naturæ than a clever offence against art. Such a novel had to be, thanks to firstliness, so apt at dictating something at once truthful and grotesque.

Turn we now to a modern instance—"The Flame and the Flood." It comes to us in Mr. Fisher Unwin's First Novel Library and deserves sympathetic attention. We have not read many pages before we discover that Miss Langbridge has been fortunate enough to get her matter out of her delighted and alarmed consciousness of early womanhood and all the threat and promise of the future it faces and implores. "I will—BLAZE," says Susette, whose mouth, according to the mood of her lover, is like the Sonata Appassionata or "a slice of bread and strawberry jam bitten into by a schoolboy." Susette was seen by her creator—and we see her. She comes to us out of a fresh imagination. One remembers a prototype—coarser, less drawn—in the gallery of Miss Helen Mathers, but she is no less individual for that than anyone is for having had a grandmother. Her pathos is that of a wild, almost libertine spirit, tied to a feeble and parasitical one. Fiction has perhaps seldom given us the blind man so repellantly as he exists in Susette's husband, and we may therefore accept the idea that youth's instinctive hostility towards infirmity and weakness is documented in "The Flame and the Flood." The following passage well illustrates the author's power of transmuting that hostility into realism:—

She led Maurice into the little dining-room, placed him beside her . . . in a chair . . . She fastened a napkin round his chin, smoothing away the soft indefinite hair that was tied in with it, bent over and asked him if it were too tight . . . She rose and gravely wiped his mouth for him.

It is overdone, for that is the way of firstliness, which is afraid it may not be heard unless it bawls; but the effect aimed at is gained. We do dislike this blind man who fumbles incessantly for love, like a belated drunkard for the keyhole.

And yet (there are always "and yet" with firstliness!) this is not the man to whom we were first introduced. That man was straighter and had a good deal of heroism. The fact is that Miss Langbridge could not forgive him for marrying the heroine, and emasculated him in revenge: hence another illustration of the naïveté of firstliness.

That naïveté demands the substantiation of pet dreams as a matter of course, and nothing is more curious than the union of biased realism with gushing idealism in such a book as this. Consider in this connection the link between music and firstliness. It seems to take a writer of the learning and self-control of a Samuel Butler to make music a value instead of a fault in fiction. Even Turgenev forgot his Slavonic sincerity when a musician was, for the nonce, his hero.

Miss Langbridge is engulfed in absurdity when she opens the piano for her puppets. The notes become as explicit as words; hers is a world where she may reasonably hope to obtain the vocal score of the astral septet. Yet even here her faculty of realism does not wholly desert her. The musician to whom her Irish heroine loses her heart is, as mere man, entirely alive; his child-like selfishness, his perfect self-consciousness which anticipates every criticism to defeat it, are admirably portrayed.

Eulogy, however, is tiresome, except to the praised, and we return to the quality of firstliness. Assuredly it is the precipitate discharge of a personality, and that is why it is seldom the thing called art. To bristle with all one's cleverness like a tame porcupine is a desire which the scepticism of the market encourages and consummates. Miss Langbridge displays an armoury of wit and metaphor, some of which is exceedingly good and some tiresome. When we read that a lady's inner consciousness "replied with evasive pettishness that there was no use in nailing upon the door of her natural impulse a numbered programme" we smell a far-off odour of midnight kerosene. On the other hand, the image of the grandfather's clock "gulping down each stroke as a dog gulps meat" is irresistibly droll, and indeed Miss Langbridge's novel has a piquancy of phrase and dialogue which qualify her for frequent quotation.

Firstliness has inveigled her into only one distinct fault beyond what we have mentioned—the fault of a narrative which is at once indeterminate and timid. Is Susette's "common kinship with the Opalescence of the world" reconcilable with a pious acquiescence with a stultifying domesticity? It is moral, but is it truth?

There we leave Miss Langbridge, for we have another phase of firstliness to consider in which she has no part. It is that which does not so much seek self-expression as self-subordination to a popular taste. That way lies imitation, and this is why we should not seek the firstliness of a man of many works in his first work. Still if there be only one work to seek it in, one must make the best of it. "Nine Points of the Law," by Mr. W. S. Jackson, and recently published by Mr. Lane, is a case to cite. The author imagines that a holidaying clerk discovers a quantity of thieves' loot. He immediately develops a buccaneering spirit and annexes what afterwards becomes an embarrassing and dangerous white elephant. "To be detective, thief, and informer, 'three single gentlemen rolled into one,'" is the part he seems called upon to play, and he does his best with it in a volume that is instantly recognisable as made on the Anstey model with the model's fault, namely, that it gets a little too near tragedy to be consistent with one's idea of wholly genial humour. The stamp of individuality is noticeable in the marginal notes, which have occasionally a droll flavour of an ill-regulated library, as thus: "her saponaceous lavement catalambanized the pavement." Mr. Jackson enters with gusto into the feelings of impecuniosity, and his clerk's make-belief shopping is an excellent jeu d'esprit.

Yet we would fain have found in his pages more signs of firstliness than are there. Perhaps they will appear in a work less neatly humorous, less obedient to the fictional convention for bringing together impecunious young men and pretty heiresses.

Firstliness, as found in "The Flame and the Flood," and in novels too famous to be named at present in the same breath thrills, the word-weary critic with a pathos that is nearly a pang. For it is the outcome of a joyous volubility that writes because it must, because the pen is alive and even the blank side of a handbill an inspiration, and because it believes sooner in a drought of ink than a famine of ideas.

FitzGerald and Calderon.

THE actor-manager of the present day is at a loss for a good play, ancient or modern—apparently he is so hard-driven that he does not much care which. One has lately revived an eighteenth-century comedy which would be thought very far from brilliant were it produced by a modern dramatist. Another not so long ago fell back on a Spanish play of little merit. Even the society expressly devoted to remedying the regular theatre's want of enterprise seems itself to suffer under a deficiency of actable material. Or is it, in both cases, a contracted view that ails the searcher for plays actable yet unacted? Surely there are masterpieces begging to be acted. Why, for instance, should any manager risk his fortunes on a mediocre Spanish play when the whole theatre of Calderon lies before him? That is the question brought home to us by the issue of FitzGerald's—"Omar" FitzGerald's—"Six Dramas of Calderon" (the De La More Press, Regent Street), edited by Dr. H. Oelsner. Allowing that the great Spaniard, as he stands, presents difficulties on the English stage, here are those difficulties removed. FitzGerald seems, indeed, to have had even an excessive eye on our own stage in the making of these versions; so that it would need little stage-editing of FitzGerald to place them bodily on the London boards. And such a play as "The Mayor of Zalamea" cries on the actor-manager, "Come, act me!" Were it sent in to him as a new piece, he must see the "fat" on every page. The situations (to maintain theatrical parlance) leap to the eye as we read. "How that would act!" we exclaim involuntarily. But it is only a masterpiece written in Spain, quite two centuries or more ago; and—what would you? we do not act such things. Is there not farce still in Paris? yea, and musical comedy is much in the land. Vex us not with your Calderons.

It can scarce be accident, indeed, that FitzGerald's selection hardly at all displays the famed poetical quality of Calderon's drama. Manifestly (we think) he desired to commend the great Spaniard's fitness for the English stage; and therefore he chose pieces with the maximum of stage-quality, the minimum of that poetry which the modern theatre hates as the gates of Hades. This preoccupation with acting-possibilities is shown in more than one note. It is a pity, because his selection gives no complete suggestion of Calderon, does not even (from a literary standpoint) present the Spaniard at his highest. The more is our regret that the editor has not included the two plays which FitzGerald translated, but did not publish. What we have seen from one of them ("The Mighty Magician") may stand beside Shelley's fragment of the same drama; and they would have represented precisely that high poetic side of Calderon which is here lacking.

But we must take Calderon as FitzGerald has chosen to give him us, and be glad to get him. FitzGerald's Omar was more FitzGerald than Omar; and in a less degree, his Calderon suffers a FitzGeraldine change. If the Omar was FitzGerald-Omar, the Calderon is Calderon-FitzGerald. It was part of FitzGerald's strong personality to impose it on the authors he translated; and precisely from this process springs the vitality of his translations. Shelley's Goethe has the stamp of Shelley, Rossetti's Dante the stamp of Rossetti, Chapman's Homer the stamp of Chapman; and thereby they become English poems, and alive. Yet they have somewhat of the original, in so far as there was sympathy between translator and translated. By this dual process of re-creation metrical versions live or not at all. FitzGerald's Calderon is less changed from the original than his Omar. It is also less miraculous. But not because of the less freedom; rather because he had to do with a far greater master, on whom he could work no artistic improvement. He attempts such improvement—it was in the man; but it is countervailed by the inevitable loss of translation from a great genius. He attempts too much improvement, takes too much liberty; as when a Frenchman docks Shakespeare of all which—justly or unjustly—rasps a Gallic taste. Yet, with all that may rightly be brought against it, the translation remains a work of genius, vital as scrupulously respectful versions of Calderon are not vital. These are breathing English plays—and to compass that is a feat.

Calderon as revealed to us in these six plays (and we shall not go beyond them) is essentially a rhetorical dramatist. He does not come into competition with Shakespeare; he stands frankly on a lower plane—lower in kind. There is (with exceptions hereafter to be noticed) no attempt at realism of character—hardly at character at all, save in a generic and typical sort. The plot does not evolve (as in Shakespeare) through the interaction between fate or circumstance (which is a mode of fate) and character. It is a drama of skilful construction and striking "situation." Now "situation" is the proper instrument of rhetorical drama; for indeed situation is rhetoric in action. (We use "rhetoric" in its modern, not its true and ancient sense.) These plays are midway between the rhetorical French drama and the poetic naturalism of Elizabethan drama. In structure they are rhetorical and French, depending on unexpected and startling situation. In dialogue, they mingle a certain judicious element of rhetoric with a large proportion of naturalism. They are a mean between the two extreme kinds—English and French; though of course the Spanish theatre was earlier than either. And if in kind we must rank them below Shakespeare, they are above the French. The gay glitter of intrigue throughout these plays is admirably contrived and maintained. Gay it is in such excellent comedy as "Keep your own Secret," or part of the "Mayor of Zalamea." In other plays it is tragic and absorbing. For the devisal of sombrely terrible situation

Victor Hugo does not surpass Calderon; only Calderon uses the device more sparingly. He confirms it chiefly to the climax of his plays. In these dramas it turns invariably upon the famous "Point of Honour"—the right of the injured husband to take personal vengeance for his honour; nay, his duty to do so. "The Painter of his own Dishonour" is a well-known instance. The wife, carried off by her former lover, is confined unwillingly in a castle. The husband, an amateur painter, takes service as an artist with the Prince who is Governor of Naples, that he may search for her. The Prince, also in love with her, learns her presence in the castle, and commissions the disguised husband to paint her portrait for him. He bribes a servant to shut the painter in a grated room, whence he may see her. She enters, and falls asleep. Her abductor appears just as she wakes from a dream of her husband's vengeance; and, still under the influence of the dream, she flies to his arms, imploring him to save her from her husband. The husband, thus mistakenly convinced of her guilty complicity, unable to force the door, fires on them through the grating. They both fall, dying. The wife's father, the abductor's father (who is also the bosom friend of the avenging husband), and the Prince rush in at the report. "Open the door," cries the Prince; "but what is this?" "A picture," answers the emerging husband:—

Done by the Painter of his own Dishonour
In blood.
I am Don Juan Roca. Such revenge
As each would have of me, now let him take,
As far as one life holds. Don Pedro, who Gave me this lovely creature for a bride,
And I return to him a bloody corpse:
Don Luis, who beholds his bosom's son
Slain by his bosom friend: and you, my lord,
Who, for your favours, might expect a piece
In some far other style of art than this:
Deal with me as you list; 'twill be a mercy
To swell this complement of death with mine:
For all I had to do is done, and life
Is worse than nothing now.

The Prince bids him fly; but the murdered man's father, Don Luis, asks "From whom?" He would himself have helped his friend to vengeance on his own son. According to the fierce Spanish code, Don Juan has done only what the fetish, Honour, compelled him to do. The girl's father, Don Pedro, bows to the Prince's justice. "Be it so," says the Prince; "meanwhile"—but Don Juan interrupts him:—

Meanwhile, my lord, let me depart;
Free, if you will, or not. But let me go,
Nor wound these fathers with the sight of one
Who has cut off the blossom of their age:
Yea, and his own, more miserable than all,
They know me; that I am a gentleman,
Not cruel, nor without what seem'd due cause
Put on this bloody business of my honour;
Which having done, I will be answerable
Here and elsewhere, to all for all.

"Depart," says the Prince, "in peace." "In peace!" groans the wretched husband. "Come, Leonelo"; and the curtain falls. The fine rhetorical point of all this, combined yet with a certain dignified truth to nature—Spanish nature; the reticent simplicity (quite Shakespearean) of that last despairing echo, "In peace!" and the impressive effect of the whole situation, are too evident that we should enlarge on them. Excellent, too, is FitzGerald's rendering. A more grimly terrible situation still is that which closes "Three Judgments at a Blow." Something kindred is the close of "The Mayor of Zalamea"; and this play summarises in itself all the Calderonian qualities displayed in FitzGerald's selections, both comic and tragic. Its one and cardinal error, indeed, is that it breaks at the last, abruptly and without preparation or transition, from jovial comedy into the most harrowing tragedy. The farmer's daughter, hitherto the faintest figure of rural comedy, is suddenly revealed to us in a wood, mourning her violation by the Spanish captain. FitzGerald has transposed her speech from verse to prose, and even sought to de-poetize her language, though he avows it one of the finest poetic outbursts in Calderon. That is a mistake: since the poet chose to make this sudden change he did right to strike the altered keynote boldly at the outset. FitzGerald only spoils good poetry into vicious prose; still too raised for prose, while it misses the absolute heights of poetry. He does not remove the incongruity he desires to remove. But, for all this, the play is a masterpiece. The farmer (in the last scenes Mayor) and the old general, Don Lope de Figuerroa, are individual portraits of a distinctness unwonted in Calderon. Don Lope, in fact, is a portrait: Calderon personally served under him. The peppery obstinacy of Don Lope, the sturdy obstinacy of Pedro Crespo, the farmer, are admirably distinguished and contrasted: the scenes in which they alternately fraternise and clash are gems of comedy and deft stage effect. One can see an English audience in applauding laughter over them. No less splendidly written for stage effect are the tragic scenes; where Crespo, become Mayor, after vainly imploring the Captain, on his knees, to marry his outraged daughter, rises, grasps his official wand, and orders him to gaol. Standing before the prison, he refuses to surrender him, though Don Lope turns out his regiment and vows to burn down gaol and town. The King enters, Crespo presents the depositions; and—told that, though his sentence is just, he must give up the man to the military authorities—replies it is impossible. "What do you mean?" asks the astonished King; and the undaunted Crespo answers, "You will see." The prison gates unclose, revealing the Captain garrotted in a chair. Crespo is made perpetual Mayor of Zalamea; and, with a characteristic sturdy passage of arms between him and the choleric but good-natured Don Lope, this little masterpiece ends. But no description or extract could do justice to it: it must be read entire. It is not in bravura-passages, or anything quotable, that the power of these plays resides. It is in the gradually cumulative effect of the perfectly woven intrigue, the natural language, the masterly structure of the whole. And these are rendered in the freshest vernacular English, and blank-verse handled with the skill of a poet. Let us, we say again, have the two unpublished plays.

Hans Andersen's Raw Material.

THE reissue of Sir George Webbe Dasent's "Popular Tales from the Norse" (Edinburgh: David Douglas) puts before old and young alike one of the most delightful collections of fairy-tales in existence, rendered into admirable and clean-bred vernacular English. Here, one may say, is the raw material of Hans Andersen; and with such models before him (or the like of such) he had an unsurpassed foundation for his exquisite art. Indeed, some of these tales are equal to all but the most inspired of the great Andersen's work. Here, as surely as in any epic or drama, you have the mind of a people, simple, shrewd, homely, and in the truest sense poetical—for Nature is their gossip and next-neighbour, and her children their familiar play-fellows. For what might be called the elemental fairy-tale, as distinguished from the tale of opulent or graceful fancy, they seem fitted beyond all nations. Nowhere but here do beasts become articulate with such convincing inevitableness. The tales swarm with beasts, the most delightful and natural that ever fraternised with man. The charming imaginative humour of Andersen has but carried the realisation a step further. Some of them, in their naïf quaintness, directly recall him; such as that of the three Billy-goats Gruff, who went up a hill to make themselves fat. There the story has its tongue in its cheek; and the same delicious quality, as of an ironic child, is in the tale of the cock and hen who started off to go up the Dovrefell, because the hen had dreamed that unless she went up the Dovrefell the world would come to an end. Others are the general tale of beast intrigue, in which the fox is the cunning sharper. Such is that of the Bear who demands that the peasant shall bring him his horse, on penalty of his flock being torn to pieces. The Fox offers aid, and tells the peasant what to do. So, when the man meets the Bear, there is a noise among a heap of stones at a distance (made by the Fox), and the man replies to the Bear's inquiry as to who is there, that it is Peter the Marksman. Immediately the Fox bawls from the neighbouring wood:—

"Have you seen any bears about here, Eric?"

"Say No!" said the Bear.

"No, I haven't seen any," said Eric.

"What's that, then, that stands alongside your sledge?" bawled out the voice in the wood.

"Say it's an old fir-stump," said the Bear.

"Oh, it's only an old fir-stump," said the man.

"Such fir-stumps we take in our country and roll them on our sledges," bawled out the voice. "If you can't do it yourself, I'll come and help you."

"Say you can help yourself, and roll me up on your sledge," said the Bear.

"No, thank ye, I can help myself well enough," said the man, and rolled the bear on to the sledge.

"Such fir-stumps we always bind fast on our sledges in our part of the world," bawled out the voice; "shall I come and help you?"

"Say you can help yourself, and bind me fast, do," said the Bear.

"No, thanks, I can help myself well enough," said the man, who set to binding Bruin . . . so that at last the bear couldn't stir a paw.

"Such fir-stumps we always drive our axes into in our part of the world," bawled the voice.

"Pretend to drive your axe into me, do now," said the Bear.

Then the man took his axe, and at one blow split the bear's skull, so that Bruin lay dead in a trice.

Sad to say when the Fox goes home with the man to receive his promised reward, a fine wether, the man (by his wife's counsel) brings his dog in the bag instead, and looses it on the injured Fox. Yet the Bear, though often outwitted by the Fox, is to the Norseman the King of Beasts; and—especially as a White Bear—mysterious powers and supremacy are assigned him in some of the stories. So is it with the Red Indian, to whom the Bear is not only the chief of the beasts, but the Initiator, the patron and trainer of "medicine-men":—

Sdoaks was the son of Yelth the wise,

Chief of the raven clan:

Itswot the Bear had him in care

To make him a medicine-man.

He was quick and quicker to learn,

Bold and bolder to dare;

He danced the dread Kloo-Kwallie dance

To tickle Itswot the Bear!

So sings Mr. Kipling, in a snatch that deserves completion. But the curious feature, which young sympathisers with Red Ridinghood may find it hard to pardon, is the good character which Norway gives the wolf, who is drawn as a gentle beast and of a good conscience.

Like all true fairy-tales, these Norse stories are delightfully unmoral. All children natively hate to find a moral secreted about a story, and joy to find in their fairy-tales a land where no crude moral reigns. They take no harm from it; for children have a healthy unpracticality in regard to tales of fancy, drawing a strict dividing-line between the world of faëry and the world of good behaviour and clean pinafores. The Norse tales are not immoral: they are cheerfully ready to give you pretty morality if it comes in their way, and equally ready to set morality scampering if it doesn't. "Buttercup," for instance, if it teach anything (but does it?) teaches small boys to be greedy, and foolish, and cunning, and cruel. Buttercup's mother sends him out to see why the dog barks:—

"Oh, heaven help us! here comes a great big witch, with her head under her arm, and a bag at her back."

"Jump under the kneading-trough and hide yourself," said his mother.

So in came the old hag. "Good day," said she.

"God bless you!" said Buttercup's mother.

"Isn't your Buttercup at home to-day?" asked the hag.

"No, that he isn't. He's out in the wood with his father, shooting ptarmigan."

"Plague take it!" said the hag, "for I had such a nice little silver knife I wanted to give him."

"Pip! pip! here I am," said Buttercup, under the kneading-trough, and out he came.

"I'm so old and stiff in the back," said the hag, "you must creep into the bag and fetch it out for yourself."

But when Buttercup was well into the bag, the hag threw it over her back and strode off. . . . The old hag got tired and asked: "How far is it off to Snoring?"

"Half a mile," answered Buttercup. So the hag put down the sack . . . and lay down to sleep. Meantime Buttercup set to work and cut a hole in the sack with his knife; then he crept out and put a great root of a fir-tree into the sack, and ran home to his mother.

He is dull and greedy enough to fall into a like trap twice more; and the third time is carried to the witch's house, who leaves her daughter to chop off his head and boil him while she goes out. The daughter does not know how to set about her task, so the boy tells her to put her head on the block, and he will show her—a Punch-and-Judy trick:—

So the poor silly thing laid her head down, and Buttercup took an axe and chopped her head off, just as if she had been a chicken. Then he laid her head in the bed, and popped her body into the pot, and boiled it so nicely.

He gets up the chimney, taking a stone and the block with him. The hag returns with her husband, sees her daughter in bed, apparently, and sniffs at the broth.

"Good, by my troth,

Buttercup-broth!"

said the old hag.

"Good, by my troth,

Daughter-broth!"

said Buttercup down the chimney, but no one heeded him.

At a second repetition they go to the door to find where the voice comes from; and Buttercup pushes down stone and block on them, kills them, and makes off home with their gold and silver.

Some of the tales suggest, to our mind, an originally mythologic origin. One in particular, "East o' the Sun and West o' the Moon," while on one side it approaches "Beauty and the Beast," on the other has singularly interesting resemblance to Apuleius' lovely fable of Cupid and Psyche. A poor girl is married to a White Bear; and nightly in his palace a man lies by her side. Her mother (whom the marriage enriched) gives her a candle-end, and persuades her to inspect her husband, lest he be a Troll. She obeys, against the Bear's warning:—

There came a man and lay down beside her; but at dead of night, when she heard he slept, she got up and struck a light, lit the candle, and let the light shine on him, and so she saw that he was the loveliest Prince one ever set eyes on, and she fell so deep in love with him on the spot, that she thought she couldn't live if she didn't give him a kiss there and then. And so she did, but as she kissed him, she dropped three hot drops of tallow on his shirt, and he woke up.

"What have you done?" he cried; "now you have made us both unlucky, for had you held out only this one year, I had been freed. For I have a stepmother who has bewitched me, so that I am a White Bear by day, and a Man by night. But now all ties are snapt between us, now I must set off from you to her. She lives in a castle which stands East o' the Sun and West o' the Moon, and there, too, is a Princess with a nose three ells long, and she's the wife I must have now."

Strange is it to find, among these homely, often beautiful, always charming Northern tales, so close a likeness to the—

Latest-born and loveliest vision far
Of all Olympus' faded hierarchy.

Impressions.

XXXIV.—Extremes.

THE sunshine flooded Paris, the bright streets were crowded, and all through that hot morning the motors clodged and darted between the traffic to the Tuileries gardens, where they were to be weighed, preparatory to the great race. The keen, trembling beasts passed one by one through the gates, and the air was full of the shouts of chauffeurs, the odour of petrol, and the cries of dogs; for in the gardens a dog show was also being held. It was Paris at its hottest and noisiest moment, and when a friend found me staring at a panting Mercedes car that refused to ascend the slight incline to the gardens, and said, "I've seen a dog so tiny that you could slip it into a tea-cup," I felt that trees and glades held more attractions than Paris that day. So I departed by steamer up the Seine, passed under a stone bridge blazoned with a great N, and disembarked at a village where there were trees, a sunny road, and a café, with tables, on which white cloths were spread beneath an awning. At the table nearest to the road sat a Frenchman drinking absinthe, and under his eyes, and under mine, scenes from the pageant of life passed along that village road.

The absinthe drinker dozed and dreamed in the sunshine, looking at nothing in particular, sipping the yellow, clouded liquid, contentedly bemused; but inside the café the company of villagers were alert, cheerful, and watchful. They sang over their meal, and when two priests passed by they rose to their feet and hooted. Then the soldiers, preceded by a band playing a rousing march, swung down the hill, bronzed, dusty, and the villagers thumped the tables, ran to the door, and cheered; but the absinthe drinker gazed dully at the men in red and blue, as uninterested in them as he had been in the priests.

After that nothing happened for quite a long time. It was enough to sit and gaze idly at the sunny road, and to watch two women across the way carding wool. But no French village is long free from the motor-car, and soon it came—a racer, of steel, shaped like a torpedo, one man huddled in the seat, the other crouched on the step. Dust-powdered, hooded, goggled, with heads bent forward, every line of their figures rigid with the tension of that awful rush across the land, this anarchical beast under their sway leapt up the hill, gleamed for a moment before our eyes, and was gone, while the absinthe drinker sat in the sun, staring vacantly at the white table-cloth.

Here were the two extremes: those men in the racing motor peering on death lurking at every corner—the extremity of action and excitement; and that bemused absinthe drinker sitting in the sun—the extremity of sloth. France in 1903!

Or to change the picture—that great stone N blazoned on the bridge across the Seine, and the toy dog in the Tuileries "so tiny that you could slip it into a tea-cup."

Drama.

A Portrait Play.

I BELIEVE that I have an extraordinary dislike to the use of historical characters for the purposes of a novel or a play. You are almost certain to fall between two stools. Either you elaborately get up all the documents, and apply all the resources of your historic consciousness to the task of portraying the man in his habit as he lived, only to discover in the end how infinitely less vivid and convincing he has become in your work of art than he was in the unstudied photography of the letters and memoirs from which you got him; or else you give your imagination the reins, and reconstruct your hero as the wind of the spirit bids you, only to discover in the end that the historic consciousness (yours, or more probably that of your critics) has not been appeased, and is rising up against you like an accusing ghost. I ought, perhaps, to make an exception for Shakespeare, whose historical plays have met with a considerable measure of acceptance. But in the first place Shakespeare's historical plays always seem to me quite his worst plays, and only really interesting when he turns aside from kings and captains to paint, in Falstaff, some gross disreputable riff-raff who has hiccoughed out his soul to him across the burnt sack in an Elizabethan tavern. And in the second place Shakespeare wrote before the historic consciousness had made its appearance, and his Henry the Fifth or his Richard the Third are apt to have, as a matter of fact, very little more than an accidental relation to the Henry the Fifth or the Richard the Third of the documents. If, however, you will turn to modern writers, to whom, after all, many things which Shakespeare assumed are not permitted, you will find that, as a rule, the criticism of the kind of piece which I have in mind proceeds upon lines which have remarkably little to do with its merit from the abstract point of view of literature. Take the Drury Lane "Dante." All that the critics really troubled themselves much about was the question how far the incidents of the play were such as could possibly find a place in even the most conjectural biography of the poet. I think they were quite right. The importance of Dante, as a human being, is a hundred times greater than that of the doubtful histrionics of Sir Henry Irving or the obvious dramatic incompetence of M. Sardou. The same point arises with regard to a play called "The Exile," written by Messrs. Lloyd Osbourne and Strong and produced by Mr. Martin Harvey at the Royalty. The piece is by no means without literary merit. Mr. Lloyd Osbourne, at least, has collaborated with no less a master than Robert Louis Stevenson, and has subsequently shown, by an independent volume of South Sea stories, the name of which I am unfortunately unable to recall, that he is not unmindful of the lessons which he then learnt. With the aid of Mr. Strong he has produced a slight pretty play, full of sentiment and not without pathos. It deals with the fortunes of a king in exile, a picturesque, generously-minded person, who bears his sorrows with dignity, and amuses himself with the ceremonial of a toy court, with the inspection of a toy army, and with the writing of his memoirs. The charming loyalty of the ladies of his entourage, the chivalry of one of his goalers and the brutality of others, and the fortunes of a toy conspiracy for his release, which is ultimately put a stop to under the advice of the court doctor, provide a sufficient plot. All this is admirably adapted to Mr. Martin Harvey's romantic and sympathetic, rather than robust, personality and methods. Unfortunately, the authors have chosen, for some quite inscrutable reason, to place their scene upon St. Helena, and to give their exiled monarch the environment and name of none other than Napoleon Bonaparte. The effect is ruinous. At once the critic asks himself no longer, "Is this an entertaining and mildly touching little drama?" but "Can I for one moment imagine that this mime looks like Napoleon, or that things passed thus upon St. Helena when Napoleon was eating his heart out there?" Of course he cannot. The character of Napoleon is as ineffaceably engraved upon the historic consciousness as are his personal lineaments upon the canvas of Meissonier. Messrs. Lloyd Osbourne and Strong can no more persuade us to accept their interpretation of the one than Mr. Martin Harvey his mimicry of the other. Their delicate and washy prettiness is scorched into nothing at the first contact with the flaming legend of the Titan. Their art does not even get a chance of being judged in itself and for itself.

I do not suppose that it will be expected that I should say very much about "The Gordian Knot" at Her Majesty's Theatre. The chief remark which it suggests to my mind is the paronomasia that Mr. Tree does not seem to be Mr. Alexander. The author, although old enough to be entrusted with a share in the superintendence of some of our most important national affairs at Westminster, is apparently young enough to be still a believer in the tradition of the courtesan and of her power to wreck the lives of strong men. The play opens with one of those elaborate salon scenes, with their parade of irrelevant social types and their impossibly significant conversations, which are beginning to be de rigueur at Her Majesty's. It ends somewhat abruptly, with a bit of melodrama, wilder than the wildest inventions of Mr. Walter Melville, in which the courtesan is strangled by the crippled friend of the hero with a rope made out of the strands of her own hair. The performance on the first night met with an ambiguous reception, and Mr. Tree could only undertake to convey to the author the congratulations of "the vast majority of the audience." The form of first night criticism which is now coming once more into vogue, although crudely expressed, can only be of interest to a brother critic. I sometimes wish that I could put things as briefly. But it seems to be applied at present, without much discrimination, to pieces of very different artistic merit. Perhaps this does not altogether differentiate it from some other forms of criticism.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

The Salons.

AMAZING! This is the only epithet that describes the seven thousand five hundred and odd works of art in the French Salons. Not that the present exhibitions are different from, or better than, those of past years: it is the amazing fertility of invention and technical accomplishment that strikes one afresh each year. In this article I am concerned only with the pictures. At the Old Salon there are seventeen hundred and eighty-six oil paintings; at the New Salon, where the work is supposed to be more experimental and individual, less bound by academic traditions, there are thirteen hundred and fifty-six oil paintings. The impeccable M. Bouguereau may be regarded as the tutelary genius of the parent body, the brilliant M. Besnard as the protagonist of the Secessionists; but although the New Salon remains the fresher and the livelier of the two, the line of demarcation is no longer deeply marked. The Secessionists are growing older.

I find the Salons extremely entertaining. One starts with the intention of discovering the few fine works that such a collection must contain; but the riot of effort, the clamour of the various schools and nationalities, the cleverness of hand and eye, the daring and bewildering choice of subjects confuse the judgment, and dispose one to treat the collection as a Fair rather than as an assemblage of works of art. How can one appreciate Lhermitte's sober landscapes, or Le Sidaner's misty moonlights, when the eye is charged with the blaze of colour by pointillists who out-Sisley Sisley, or rainbow-river painters who out-Thaulow Thaulow. Yet if these ingenious French painters only knew it, among these acres of strident colour it is often the small dark picture that tells with the perspicuity of a black sheep among a white flock. The strongest impression left on my mind after my first morning at the Old Salon was a little black "Portrait of Madame B.," and a pre-Raphaelite picture (the pendulum is swinging now in that direction) by M. Maxence. The painter who screams loudest; he who chooses such a subject as Amazons wrestling, or a female searcher at a police-station extracting stolen watches from the petticoats of a blowsy demi-mondaine, or a ball at the "Quat'z'arts," or one of the many hideous nudes, does so wittingly. He is making a bid for notoriety, and he knows his business. His clever fingers follow his volatile brain, and if his picture does not sell, he paints another over it for the next exhibition. I do not think this heterogeneous mixture of melodrama and sensation, masquerading under the cloak of art, bamboozles the intelligent Frenchman. Even the bath-chairmen who wheel elderly ladies through the rooms, criticising the pictures on the way, give a shrug of the shoulders, expressive and inimitable, before the notoriety-hunting canvases. The smile of amused protest, such as a parent might throw at a wilful child, with which one of these bath-chairmen greeted a wild presentment of the Martinique disaster, was worth going to Paris to see. The painters themselves certainly know. I exploited the rooms one afternoon in the company of three distinguished artists who, for reasons of their own, were winnowing the seed from the chaff. They went through the galleries like flying foxes, ignoring seven-eighths of the pictures, looking and disregarding in the same instant, pouncing on the few fine pictures, some of which, I, the day before, with infinite labour, had disentangled from the rest. They took one hour and twenty minutes to examine nearly two thousand pictures, and the result justified the method. Very weary they seemed as we sat together afterwards on a seat in the Champs Elysées, but I do not think they had overlooked one good picture.

French art of to-day, as exemplified in the Salons, does not show any signs of progression. There is technical skill in abundance, but one has only to visit the Luxembourg Gallery, or the Panthéon, to recognise that this is not the Golden Year of French art. The State and provincial towns are still showering their commissions for the decoration of town halls and public buildings, and M. Paul Laurens is ready with his enormous triptych of scenes from the life of Joan of Arc, and M. Georges-Bertrand with his photographic Funeral of President Carnot. There are others, too; but on the walls of the Panthéon rests the work of that great master, Puvis de Chavannes, showing France, once and for all, how wall decoration should be treated; or, to go further back, there is David's wonderful "Sacre de Napoleon 1st," in the Louvre. Few painters can handle a crowd of figures, and so focus the chief incident that the central motive leaps to the eye at first glance. M. Laurens should study Puvis de Chavannes's solitary figure of Sainte Geneviève watching over Paris, at the Panthéon, and M. Georges-Bertrand might take a walk through one of the bright corridors that connect the sections of the New Salon and pause before M. Casas's "Barcelone, 1902." The foreground of this clever picture is empty, but on the outskirts you see a huddled crowd, half-moon shaped, fleeing before the mounted soldiers. One incident, typical of all the horrid scene, is happening in the open space. A soldier spurs forward, just reining in his horse to avoid trampling over a man who has fallen. That single incident in the empty space takes the eye at once. This is much more effective than if he had shown twenty horsemen riding over twenty fallen agitators. It would be useless to ask M. Henri Martin to spend an hour with Puvion de Chavannes at the Luxembourg. He has introduced that kind of Impressionism called Pissarroism into decorative painting. His gigantic decorative panel nearly fills one wall of Room XX. at the Old Salon, and the paint is laid on so lavishly that the perfume of it is quite perceptible on entering the room. Unconsciously I half closed my eyes, so vivid is the sunshine radiating from this landscape where men are cutting grass, girls dancing, sheep wandering beneath the trees that stand up straight against the sun-flooded hills. It is a new experiment, interesting, but no more. Nearer to my taste is M. Verhaert's curious and careful panel for the town-hall of Antwerp. This delightful picture of the magistrates receiving the captains, just back from the Canary Isles, is another example of that last expression of French modernity—the return to pre-Raphaelitism, with an added note of gaiety shown in the flying banners, and the bright ingenuity of the costumes.

It would need a dozen articles to do any sort of justice to the Salons; but would it be worth while? What is there to be said about Harpignies, Aman-Jean, Besnard, and La Touche that has not been said before; or Carolus-Duran, or Veber, who devotes himself year after year to painting eccentricities and monstrosities. They are amusing, the kind of subjects that a clever painter might produce once in a lustrum, and be a little ashamed of showing them to friends whose opinion he respected. M. Besnard continues to please the moderns. I read in a French paper that he has sobered his marvellous gifts as a colourist, and that M. La Touche has at last begun to give up yellow. That may be; but nothing that M. La Touche here shows is equal to his exquisite little picture in the Luxembourg, and the same may be said of M. Thaulow. One of the painters of established reputation who continues to give pleasure is M. Henner. His secret is his own. The other nudes in the Salons are clever, brutal, ingenious—what you will, but M. Henner's are always touched with something of the beauty and mystery of twilight. He is not realistic like Degas, who achieves beauty of another kind, but it is always a relief to enter a room where there is a Henner nude or a Harpignies landscape.

Dexterity, not beauty, is the note of the modern French picture. Nothing is too bizarre for the Salon painter to attempt, and his vitality and technical skill are so great that he makes a success of a scheme which an English painter would not dream of attempting. The English pictures look quite sedate among all these examples of exuberant youth. The Salons are the painting Fair of the world, and the two nations that have most bestirred themselves to provide wares are America and Spain. There is astonishing cleverness in Signor Zuloaga's three piquant pictures of Spanish joy in life, and—well, the last picture I looked at was another picture of joy in life by a Frenchman. How does he treat the subject? He paints a poulterer's shop stocked with succulent trussed fowls. It is a sunny day, and the jolly old poulterer, plump as his stock, stands in the shop door with his wife, laughing, to which the opulent lady responds. This picture of food and mirth is called "La joie de Vivre." C. L. H.

Science.

Science and Philosophy.

VERY clear it is that, if I am accused of being "inconsistent," "illogical," and "arbitrary," it behoves me either to vindicate myself, and that right well and early, or, while stones remain unbroken and roads unmade, to don goggles, seize hammer, and hie me to the highway forthwith, there more adequately to fill another "sphere of usefulness" than this. For the stone-breaker serves his day and generation, whilst the illogical soi-disant scientist does not; unless we entirely accept the dictum of Bacon, that truth is more easily extricated from error than from confusion. As Wundt, one of the greatest of modern psychologists, has put it, we would do better, if we cannot turn psychological research to practical account, to devote ourselves to the improvement of sewing machines.

I wrote the paper in question—"The Impassable Barrier"—in order to delimit the aims and possibilities of science. In no sense does that paper embody "my conclusions." They are the conclusions of more than two thousand years of thought, and had taken final form long before I was born. I set them forth, not as having the smallest title to originality, but as part of my scientific faith or belief—or, as my critic would rather that I said—knowledge.

If A. J. E. will turn again to Locke's "Essay concerning the Human Understanding," he will therein find it demonstrated, as certainly as any other truth of positive science is demonstrated, that we have no "innate ideas." Further, if he has any recollections of his childhood, he may remember how his own ideas of God or infinity have been evolved from childish conceptions formed upon experience. Locke's great discovery constitutes him the father of modern psychology, a branch of positive science unconnected with metaphysics or with any philosophical system. That anyone can even appear seriously to call this in question to-day is surprising and disappointing.

A. J. E. quotes Emerson's exposition of Kant. For his nebular hypothesis—formed in his younger days—the great German metaphysician demands our homage, but the belief that there was a class of ideas or imperative forms, intuitions of the mind itself, which did not come by experience, but through which experience was acquired, had been directly and indirectly exploded times without number before Kant formulated it, and possesses to-day only the pathetic interest which belongs to the "arbitrary" and unfounded dogmas upon which have been built all the systems of philosophy and metaphysics. It would be an endless and futile task to go into the philosophy of Kant. At the present hour it has, as a whole, as little value, other than historical, for human thought or happiness, as the philosophy of Berkeley or Hegel; but I must quote one little passage from the "Critique of Pure Reason," which A. J. E. might try to reconcile with the doctrine of the existence of innate ideas: "If we could probe all the phenomena of volition to the bottom there would not be a single human action which we could not predict and recognise as necessary from its antecedent conditions." So that Transcendental ideas would not appear to count for much, even to Kant's own mind. There is a saying that good German philosophies, when they die, go to Oxford; and now that the wonderful German mind has left word-jugglery and metaphysics for positive science, in which it leads the world, it is surely high time that the sterile and empty subtleties which have made no one better or wiser or happier, have averted no moment of agony, have illumined to none the valley of the shadow of death, have slain no tyrant, have abolished no abuse, have added no iota to the world's air or light or beauty or life or love, should be left aside until the Welt-schmerz is no more.

Not only does my critic quote Kant, however, but he actually goes on to quote G. H. Lewes, the philosopher who tried all systems, discovered their futility, and wrote a book to demonstrate it; a book in which he disposes of Kant (Part ii., Chap. 3, "Kant's Psychology"), hails Locke—in the phrase I have already borrowed from him—as the father of modern psychology, and having accomplished the task which he announces in his preface—the task, namely, of proving that philosophy is impracticable—concludes with what A. J. E. calls "these pregnant words"—an encomium which I most heartily endorse: "If anyone remains unshaken by the accumulated proofs this history affords of the impossibility of philosophy, let him distinctly bear in mind that the first problem he must solve is: have we ideas independent of experience? Let him solve that ere he begins to speculate." Whereafter my critic asks whether I claim to have solved that problem in the negative! I do not; but I grant, with G. H. Lewes himself, and every other student of psychology, that (to name only one instance) in 1689, John Locke did. If A. J. E. reads Lewes' excellent book, he will find that all the ideas in my paper are therein to be found. Indeed, that book was my first source of enlightenment on the matter.

Positive science, which Lewes supported and admired, is only a science of phenomena—of appearances, that is to say. Philosophy, or a science of "noumena," to use Lewes' phrase, is impossible, for the very simple and obvious reason that we can never transcend the sphere of our own consciousness; and, since we are born without ideas, and since our consciousness informs us only of appearances or properties or phenomena, then further than positive science—further than "phenomenal" knowledge—the human intellect can never go. My objector accuses me of arbitrarily disposing of Haeckel on personal "faith" in Locke's postulate. That all knowledge is a matter of faith or belief—whether in causation or objective reality or what not—is a self-evident proposition which I will not wait to discuss. In the "Essay," A. J. E. will find that Locke gave reasons for the faith that was in him; those reasons are my reasons for faith in Locke's faith. As to Haeckel, he, of course, follows Locke, as do all students of science, in denying the existence of innate ideas. Not having learnt Lewes' lesson, however—that this denial is also a denial of the possibility of philosophy—Haeckel goes on to construct a philosophical system, which he calls "Monism"; scoffs at every other philosophy (naturally enough), though upholding his own; whilst, as I showed the other day, he is utterly unable to disprove the assertion of idealism that the universe and "substance," which is his God, is but the "content of consciousness," and has no objective reality. That assertion cannot be disproved, however absurd it may appear to the "philosophy of common-sense." Berkeley, therefore, from his stand-point, proved the impossibility of philosophy as Locke did from his; as all philosophers, indeed, have done, not to mention students of positive science. The history of metaphysics and philosophy is a history of consistent failure. It has added nothing whatever to human happiness; and to human knowledge, only a very few facts in psychology. I am not wholly prepared, however, to deny that the human mind has been aided in its development by the centuries of otherwise wasted thought; though Weissmanism, denying the transmissibility of acquired characteristics, certainly denies that the son's mind can benefit by years of metaphysical or other thought on the part of the father.

Only positive science remains, and its empire is daily increasing. I could not admire it more than I do for its indisputable and crescent value to the race of men—the weary Titans who are born in others' pain and perish in their own. As a critic and criterion of supposed philosophies, positive science is invaluable; as a basis for philosophy, science is worthless. How can phenomenal knowledge ever transcend phenomena? And how can a philosophy be based upon a mere seeming?

A man must have a philosophy of some sort, of course, and its character will depend upon his amount of positive knowledge (which his philosophy must at any rate not too patently contradict) and upon all that we adumbrate in the word "temperament." For Haeckel his philosophy; for Sir Oliver Lodge his; for you yours; for me mine. But since positive science has proved—notably by the mouth of John Locke—that there is only phenomenal knowledge; since the multiplication by infinity of our infinitesimal knowledge of phenomena would bring us no whit nearer the underlying "substance," the thing-in-itself, the existence of which we all assume; since man can never know more than changes in his own consciousness; since, in a word, there is an impassable barrier, we may laud science, or organised knowledge, and sing pæans to her, and believe in our hearts as we see with our eyes, that she is truth and will prevail against unethical physical forces, as also against much that we call evil; but as to the power of science to solve ultimate questions, we would do well to preserve a decent humility withal.

C. W. SALESBY.

Correspondence.

Metre.

SIR,—I have read with great interest and pleasure M. Paul Verrier's letter in your last issue, and can bear witness that his theory of metre is clearly indicated in the periodical publications there mentioned, copies of which he has been good enough to send me.

It is most noteworthy that this French student of our verse should have so well appreciated a truth too often hidden from the wise and prudent among our critics, though revealed (as I maintain) to babes and sucklings who delight in the cadence of metre.

For this truth—preached by M. Verrier and myself, and powerfully supported in your recent review of my book—does not by any means present itself to me in the light of a new discovery. Rather I hold that it is the common property of all who read English verse by ear, familiar in practice to every reciter, and ignored only by critics who shut their eyes to the major part of the phenomena under review. In conversation with friends I with difficulty persuade them that this truth is not wholly a truism; they are incredulous when told that our common prosody takes no account of temporal units, and contents itself with registering greater or less degrees of stress-value in syllables.

My own "Study" aimed, not at claiming this truth as my special preserve, but at enforcing and explaining and illustrating it, so furnishing the English reader with a reasoned account of facts obvious to his own consciousness, on which he might build a surer system of prosody than that offered by our grammars. This undoubtedly forms, in M. Verrier's words, "the most difficult part of the work" incumbent on metrists, and there is ample room for any number of co-workers.

I will confess that when I first formulated my own view—more years ago than I care to count—I was unaware that any of the ground had been travelled by previous explorers. Later reading has shown that many have proceeded less or greater distances in this direction, and the wonder is only that ere now a broad and beaten path has not been made, along which pilgrims may journey in comfort. I hope that by united effort, at this time of apparently revived interest in metrical questions, we may not merely establish a right of way—that has been already done—but engineer and macadamize a safe driving road. To drop metaphor, I trust that further analysis—in the prosecution of which we shall expect and welcome M. Verrier's assistance—will make manifest the actual structure of our verse, and induce English prosodists to abandon their surely unwarranted neglect of that time-basis which seems to me the most important and fundamental element of our metre.

May I be permitted to end by congratulating M. Verrier on the admirable English of his letter.—Yours, &c.,

T. S. OMOND.

"A Fabrication of Mr. Gissing's."

SIR,—I am one of those who, meeting in the "Fortnightly Review" with articles entitled "An Author at Grass: Extracts from the Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft. Edited by George Gissing," straightway fell in love with the writer. Mr. Gissing, in a few admirably-toned pages of preface, told us that Ryecroft was a hardly-known struggling writer who had been his friend; who, after a hard life, had been enabled to end his days in the peace of a country cottage; then, dying, had left diaries containing his ripest, saddest, most private thoughts, to be dealt with as seemed best.

The topics were of the gravest, the writing had the beauty and pathos of a late autumn day, one's most intimate hopes and fears were echoed by one who knew them all. Then, after Henry Ryecroft, the man, had entered most completely into our thoughts, we learn that he never existed at all; that the whole—man, preface, books, diaries—is a fabrication of Mr. Gissing's; that we have been the victims of a literary trick. Such truth-semblance is permissible to a Poe or Defoe upon their less solemn subjects, but it seems to me that Mr. George Gissing, whom we trusted, should have refrained from mocking us upon matters of life, death, and sorrow.—Yours, &c.,

JOHN BLAND.

[We cannot share our correspondent's indignation. It is the privilege of the writer to choose whatever form he likes to express his thoughts on life, death, and sorrow. They are his own thoughts, whether he writes them under his own name or puts his personal criticism of life into the mouth of a fictitious character. And certainly in Mr. Gissing's book personal experience and revelation counted for much.]

Cahier.

SIR,—I hope you will allow me to point out, with reference to a paragraph in your issue of the 23rd, that I did not assert a quair to be a "cashier," but a cahier, which is a very different thing.—Yours, &c.,

London.

MAURICE HEWLETT.

The Society of Psychical Research.

SIR,—I am surprised to see that your current issue does not contain a letter from an official member of the Society for Psychical Research in reference to your review of Mr. Bennett's book on the work of the Society. Your reviewer makes the strange mistake of holding the Society responsible for the conclusions of one of its members. If he had read the very first page of its constitution he would have seen the following caution: "NOTE.—To prevent misconception, it is here expressly stated that membership of this Society does not imply the acceptance of any particular explanation of the phenomena investigated, nor any belief as to the operation, in the physical world, of forces other than those recognised by Physical Science." As a Fellow of the Geological Society, I should be delighted if I could believe that the Geological Society had accepted all the conclusions which they have published under my name; but I need scarcely point out to scientific men that no learned society accepts responsibility for the work of its members. Furthermore, Mr. Bennett's conclusions did not even appear in the Proceedings of the S.P.R. They were embodied in a book published by himself some time after he had retired from the post of Assistant Secretary. The Society is engaged in a scientific research on scientific principles, and has already done good work. What it will ultimately achieve it would be rash to predict; but to suggest that we are not competent to conduct the investigation is to wield a weapon rare in scientific controversy, and reminiscent of the boomerang.—Yours, &c.,

CHARLES CALLAWAY.

Cheltenham.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 192 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best School Recollection. Thirty-two replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss B. C. Hardy, 41, Barkston Gardens, S.W., for the following:—

Incident: well, more than that. Say epoch, rather. I have wondered often on what lines my life would have run had I never come into contact with that other soul.

I was only one year of my life at school—in Dresden—and just fifteen when sent there. Frankly, I did not very much enjoy it. Brought up in the most retired content any girl ever knew, never speaking to others of my age except my sister, the ways of girls astonished and did not please me. I became morose, unsocial, bearish. Accustomed to courtesy and almost equality from my elders, I could not brook being relegated to a herd of thirty others as childish and ignorant, bitterly knowing myself the while the most ignorant of all. Those days were dark.

Upon them flashed the light of my first literature class. Many who have known Dresden during the last decade or so of the nineteenth century will remember John Sherwood—he died a few years since—and I like to think mine but one of a multitude of souls in which he awoke and kindled the divine fire. I have heard many sermons, great and moving; none moved me like the words of my dear old literature master. Far from the dear familiarities of home, he gave me the golden key, opened to me the gates of a fair and boundless realm where I might wander at my will, "never alone while accompanied with noble thoughts." It is mine till I die. That was a turning point: dimly I saw it then, passionately now: and through it all his unconsciousness! Some gifts are so rich they cannot be repaid, even with thanks: and he hated thanks. Ugly old schoolroom, gilt mirror, barren screen, high German windows! to me you frame a day when more than life was born.

Other replies follow:—

He always sat astride of his little chair, with his chest leaning on his crossed arms on the back of it and his mild face turned to us. His mortar-board he would lay on the desk of the boy in front of him, where it became the recipient for paper balls, blots of ink, and broken nibs.

The sergeant brought him a letter, and he held it till he had finished his sentence, without opening it. Then he cut the envelope, and read. We waited, silently at first, for him to resume the lesson. But when he had finished reading the letter, he sat silently gazing out of the window. Whispering and shuffling failed to rouse him. Sundry catables were produced; paper missiles traversed the classroom: cautious sniggering broke out, still with no effect. Boys began to vie with each other in daring acts. Finally, the upsetting of a row of books awoke him, and he rose amidst apprehensive silence. But he punished no one. He walked out of the room, and did not return. In the afternoon, another master taught us; and we speculated whether he had left.

He came back in the morning, wearing a black coat and tie. "Might have known he'd have a wife somewhere," said one. "P'raps it was his pater," ventured another. "Rot; a chap that age would have a pater."

In school his manner was exactly the same. When we hinted at a holiday—we had had one when the Head's son died—he merely refused, in a surprised kind of way, so we concluded it was no relation. [A. O., Scarborough.]

Six of us sat on the stone steps of the terrace—overlooking the tennis courts. It was the end of the hottest day of my first Summer Term, and we were watching the "finals" of a tennis tournament. At the close of the game, the winner came up and joined us. She was a delightful girl, with a fair laughing face, and the very frankest eyes I ever saw. And I remember how, at that moment, the thought burst in upon me—what a delightful life this school life was, with all its contests and its promise—its friendliness and safety. And I said as much to the girl who had won the tournament.

"You will feel that more and more," she told me; "I am leaving school this term. It will be jolly to get back to dear old Dad—and have a good fling—and all that. But, oh! I shall be sorry to leave."

As she finished speaking, one of the mistresses called her away.

And, half an hour later, we heard that her father was dead.

That night we all sat round the big school-room in silence, and let the darkness grow. No one cared to ask for a light. Only those who were sisters sought each other, as if the nearness made a link with home.

And from that night there was a shadow over all my school days—a shadow that neither happiness nor success could ever wholly lift—the shadow of the distance that lay between me and home.

[E. A., London.]

Competition No. 193 (New Series).

Writing the other day of Emerson, Mr. William Archer said: "One cannot read many pages of Emerson without coming upon one of those supreme felicities of utterance that seem to go tingling through our very blood." As an instance of Emerson's felicity Mr. Archer quoted the sentence: "We think our civilisation near its meridian, but we are yet only at the cock-crowing and the morning star." This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the three most pregnant and felicitous sentences selected from any authors. Each sentence must not exceed 100 words, and the source of each must be given.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 3 June, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Critical Questions: Being a Course of Sermons.....(Brown) 5/0
Weymouth (The late Richard Francis), The New Testament in Modern Speech (Clarke) net 2/6
Paterson (W. P.), The Apostles' Teaching. Part I. The Pauline Theology (Black) net 0/6
Jackson (F. J. Foakes), Christian Difficulties in the Second and Twentieth Centuries.....(Arnold) net 3/6
Brooks (Rt. Rev. Phillips), The Life with God.....(Allenson) net 1/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

- Yeats (W. B.), Where there is Nothing: Being Volume One of Plays for an Irish Theatre.....(Bullen) net 3/6
Childe-Pemberton (Harriet L.), Carmela: A Poetic Drama.....(Mathews) net 3/6
Fleming (W. K.), By a Northern Sea.....(Brimley Johnson) net 2/6
Transactions of the Royal Society of Literature. Vol. XXIV. Part II.....(Asher) 3/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- Kelman, Junr. (John), The Faith of Robert Louis Stevenson... (Oliphant) net 6/0
Graves (Charles L.), The Life and Letters of Sir George Grove, C.B. (Macmillan) net 12/6
Davies (T. Witton), Heinrich Ewald.....(Unwin) net 3/6
Holls (Frederick William), edited by, Correspondence between Ralph Waldo Emerson and Herman Grimm.....(Houghton) net 11/0
Pigott (C. A.), Steadfast unto Death, or Martyred for China (Religious Tract Society) 2/6
Pollock (John), The Popish Plot.....(Duckworth) net 10/0
Baxter (Dudley), England's Cardinals.....(Burns and Oates) 2/6
Payne (Rev. George A.), "Edna Lyall": An Appreciation.....(Heywood) net 1/6
Clarke (W. Newton), Huxley and Phillips Brooks.....(Allenson) net 1/0
Heron (Alexander), The Rise and Progress of the Company of Merchants of the City of Edinburgh, 1681-1902.....(T. and T. Clark) net 10/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- Atkinson (William Walker), The Law of the New Thought (Psychic Research Company)
Memory Culture.....(" ")
Wilcox (Ella Wheeler), The Heart of the New Thought (Psychic Research Company)
Hird (Dennis), An Easy Outline of Evolution.....(Watts) 2/6
United States Geological Survey: Report, 1900-1901. 4 vols. (Government Printing Office, Washington)

NOW READY.

LOVELY WOMAN

BY

T. W. H. CROSLAND,

Author of "The Unspenkable Scot."

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, with Silk Marker, 5/-

"Mr. Crosland's utterance regarding the sex... would have pleased Juvenal and delighted the soul of Jonathan Swift."—SUNDAY SPECIAL.

NOW READY.

DON JUAN.

CANTOS 17 AND 18.

74 pages 1st. In Pictorial Wrapper. Sent post free for 12 Penny Stamps.

LONDON:

ARLISS ANDREWS, LTD., 31, MUSEUM STREET.

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- Cockerell (Samuel Pepys), edited by, Travels in Southern Europe and the Levant, 1810-1817. The Journal of C. R. Cockerell, R.A. (Longmans) net 10/6
Wood (Charles W.), Norwegian By-Ways.....(Macmillan) 6/0

EDUCATIONAL.

- Gould (F. J.), The Children's Book of Moral Lessons.....(Watts) 2/0
Simonsen (Gustave), A Greek Grammar Accidence.....(Sonnenschein) 6/6
Lewis (Edwin Herbert), A Text-Book of Applied English Grammar (Macmillan) 3/6
Hayes (B. J.), edited by, Xenophon: Memorabilia. Book I.....(Olive) 3/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

- May (Lieut.-Col. Edward S.), Principles and Problems of Imperial Defence (Sonnenschein) net 7/6
Old Age Pensions.....(Macmillan) net 2/6
Phillips' Clear Print Half-Inch Cycling Map of England and Wales. Sheet 34. London.....(Phillip) 1/0
Raven-Hill (L.), An Indian Sketch Book.....("Punch" Office) net 6/0
Rowntree (Joseph) and Sherwell (Arthur), Public Control of the Liquor Traffic (Richards) net 2/6
Davis (Arthur H.), On Our Selection!.....(Bulletin Newspaper Company)
Phillips' Clear Print Popular Map of London.....(Phillip) 1/0
Rawles (William A.), Centralising Tendencies in the Administration of India (King) net 10/0
Atkinson (Robert T.), The Via Indo Telegraphic Social Code (Hutchinson) net 5/0
Penny (A. G.), 'Neath Palm and Pine.....(Religious Tract Society) 0/6
"Vigilans sed Equus" German Ambitions as they Affect Britain and the United States of America.....(Smith, Elder) net 2/6
Peel (Mrs. C. S.), The New Home.....(Constable) 3/6
Frere (Walter Howard), The Relation of Church and Parliament in regard to Ecclesiastical Discipline.....(Mowbray)

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The first volume "Miscellaneous Prose" in Messrs. Methuen's new edition of "The Writings and Letters of Charles and Mary Lamb," under the editorship of Mr. E. V. Lucas, is ready for publication. The first five volumes containing the Lambs' writings will be followed by Volumes VI. and VII., the Letters of Charles and Mary Lamb. Owing to the anomalies of the law of copyright, no edition of the Lambs' correspondence can be complete until many years have passed by, but Mr. Lucas's edition will be unique in several points, and it will print in full, for the first time, between 50 and 100 new letters. Messrs. Methuen also have in preparation "The Life of Charles and Mary Lamb." In this biography Mr. Lucas has attempted to reconstruct the Lamb circle.

Messrs. Macmillan & Co., in co-operation with Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co., have arranged to publish an edition of the complete works of Matthew Arnold, uniform with the editions de luxe of Tennyson, Lamb, Kingsley, FitzGerald, Pater, and Kipling which they have issued within the last few years. This edition will be comprised in fifteen monthly volumes, the first of which will appear in June 1903. The concluding volume of the series will contain a complete bibliography of Matthew Arnold compiled by Mr. Thomas Burnett Smart.

CONTENTS OF

THE NINETEENTH CENTURY AND AFTER For June.

Imperial Reciprocity:

- (1) By the Right Hon. Sir HERBERT MAXWELL, Bart., M.P.
(2) By Sir GILBERT PARKER, M.P.
(3) By BENJAMIN TAYLOR.

Home Rule without Separation. By the Right Hon. Sir HENRY DRUMMOND WOLFF, G.O.B., G.C.M.G.

The Bond-Hay Treaty. By P. T. McGRATH.

Conquest by Bank and Railways. By ALFRED STEAD.

"The Way of Dreams." By Lady CURRIE.

Free Libraries. By J. CHURTON COLLINS.

Marriage with a Deceased Wife's Sister. By the Hon. Mrs. CHAPMAN.

An Unpopular Industry. By Miss CATHERINE WEBB.

Stonehenge and the Midsummer Sunrise. By ARTHUR R. HINKS (of the Cambridge Observatory).

Wessex Witches, Witchery, and Witchcraft. By HERMANN LEA.

The Increase of Cancer. By Dr. ALFRED WOLFF.

The Taj and its Designers. By E. B. HAVELL.

Industries for the Blind in Egypt. By the Countess of MEATH.

Last Month. By Sir WEMYSS REID.

Lord Kelvin on Science and Theism.

London: SAMPSON LOW, MARSTON & Co., LTD.

OLIPHANT, ANDERSON & FERRIER beg to announce the publication, in Demy 8vo, price 6s. net, of

THE FAITH OF ROBERT LOUIS STEVENSON.

By JOHN KELMAN, Junr., M.A.

The CONTENTS include: Religion and the Man—Subjectivity—Actor and Preacher—The Child—The Man of Books—Revolts and Originality—The Gift of Vision—The Instinct of Travel—Sympathy and Appreciation—Manliness and Health—"The Great Task of Happiness"—Stevenson in Relation to his times.

In response to applications, the Publishers have reserved a limited number of the First Edition for binding uniform with the "EDINBURGH EDITION" of STEVENSON'S WORKS. The price is 7s. net, and immediate application to the Booksellers is necessary in order to procure a copy.

FIRST NOTICE.

"The author in analysing the Faith of Stevenson from every point of view, as an actor and preacher, as a child, as a man of books, as a rebel, as an adventurer, as a lover of manliness and health, has almost unconsciously given a masterly study of the man in all his moods. . . . Such a book as this which Mr. Kelman has written was new writing, and is truly worth reading."—To-Day.

THE CHURCH AND SOCIAL PROBLEMS.

By A. SCOTT MATHESON. Price 3s. 6d. New and Cheaper Edition.

Among the "Problems" discussed are: Better Housing—Landlordism—The Labour Question—The Liquor Traffic—Poverty—The Sweating System—Child Rescue—The Co-operative Movement—Commonwealths, Ideal and Actual.

FAMOUS SCOTTS—Fortieth Volume.

PRINCIPAL CAIRNS.

By his Nephew, JOHN CAIRNS, M.A. Art Canvas, 1s. 6d. net; Gilt Top, 2s. net.

The 40 Volumes of the Series may now be had in a handsome Book-case, price £3 3s. and £4, including Case. Complete List on application.

FIRE AND SWORD IN SHANSI.

By E. H. EDWARDS, M.B., O.M. (Edin.). Price 6s. With 48 Illustrations.

The Story of the Martyrdom of Foreigners and Chinese Christians. With an Introduction by Dr. ALEXANDER MACLAREN, of Manchester.

London: 21, PATERNOSTER SQUARE, E.C.; and EDINBURGH.

THE ARCHITECTURE OF GREECE AND ROME; CEMENT

Testing; Cockerell's Diaries—1810-1817; Letter from Paris; Sewer Ventilation; LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL—section and detailed elevation of selected design; Cape University Competition—second premiated design; Details of Ancient Woodwork, Thorpe Hall; Memorial Pulpit, Portsea; &c.—See The Builder of June 6th (4d., by post 4d.). Through any newsagent, or direct from The Publisher of THE BUILDER, Catherine Street, London, W.C.

READINGS ON THE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION.

By Mrs. F. HAY-NEWTON.

Crown 8vo, 5s.

"These Readings are admirably written."—Guardian. "Mrs. Hay-Newton's Readings on the Evolution of Religion form an interesting and attractive introduction for any thoughtful person who wishes to get an insight into some of the cardinal positions in philosophy and the light they throw on religion."—Saturday Review.

"As a contribution to Christian evidences they are decidedly valuable."—Manchester Courier.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK.

500 Places to sell MSS., Photos and Drawings.

It is a Commercial Directory, giving Address, Rates, Time of Payment and Conditions of Contributorship of all Magazines, Papers, Syndicates and Agencies Purchasing MSS., Photos, or Drawings, List of American Magazines and of Publishers.

Price, 1s. 6d. net. Post Free, 1s. 8d.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK COMPANY, Granville House, Arundel Street, Strand.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

(LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON.)

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLEOH, CRICCIETH, and PWLLHILL.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and CHELTENHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

15.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers. Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

J. NISBET AND CO.'S BOOKS.

LETTERS OF E. R. GURNEY (Mrs. Russell Gurney).

Edited by HER NIECE. With Portraits in Photogravure, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. "The most delightful reading. . . . It is impossible to speak too highly of these letters, or of the beautiful life and character which they display."—Speaker.

By WALTER SICHEL.

BOLINGBROKE AND HIS TIMES.

In two volumes, with Portraits in Photogravure, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net each. "We may say without hesitation that Mr. Sichel's two volumes are an admirable contribution to history, fresh, entertaining, and full of new and carefully gathered information."—Outlook.

By BOLTON KING, M.A.

A HISTORY OF ITALIAN UNITY, 1814-1871.

In two volumes, with Maps and Plans, demy 8vo, 24s. net. "We must pronounce the work of Mr. Bolton King to be the history of the Italian movement . . . faithful, sound, and just."—Spectator.

By BOLTON KING and THOMAS OKEY.

ITALY TO-DAY.

A Study of her Position, her Politics, her Society, and her Letters. With Maps, demy 8vo, 12s. net. "Will undoubtedly become one of the most widely read and highly valued volumes on Italian life and prospects."—World.

By J. A. HOBSON.

IMPERIALISM.

A Study. With Maps and Diagrams. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. "The great merit of Mr. Hobson's book is that it fortifies the results of philosophic thought upon a great political issue with a large and well-ordered body of historical and statistical facts."—Manchester Guardian.

By HILAIRE BELLOC.

ROBESPIERRE: A Study and Biography.

Demy 8vo, 5s. net. "A signal testimony to Mr. Belloc's literary gift, his insight into character, and the thoroughness of his knowledge of France."—Daily News.

By VIOLET BROOKE-HUNT.

THE STORY OF WESTMINSTER ABBEY.

Told for Boys and Girls. By the Author of "Prisoners of the Tower," "Lord Roberts," &c. With 32 large Pictures and Portraits, and beautifully bound, extra crown 8vo, 6s.

"A most delightful companion."—Pall Mall Gazette.

JAMES NISBET & Co., Ltd., 21, Berners St., W.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready.

Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE

1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 260,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.; 241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., London; and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery Lane.

Chatto & Windus's New 6s. Novels

KNITTERS IN THE SUN. By ALGERNON GISSING, Author of "A Secret of the North Sea."

"The characters are exceedingly well drawn, and the book is written in a pleasant, leisurely style, which makes its reading most enjoyable."—To-day.

"The fragrant breath of English meadows is in this book. It is full of the atmosphere of a pleasant countryside. . . . He writes with ease and refinement, and handles with undeniable talent the psychological problems which such a story involves."—Scotsman.

"Shows a more powerful grip on human nature than he had hitherto attained."—Daily Express.

"A story which will certainly please Mr. Gissing's numerous readers."—Times.

OVERDUE. By W. CLARK RUSSELL.

"Fascinating."—Punch.

"Admirable."—Great Thoughts.

SEMI-SOCIETY. By FRANK RICHARDSON, Author of "The King's Counsel."

"An amusing and absorbing novel. . . . His epigrams are a delight."—Spectator.

"Mr. Richardson is a prose Juvenal."—Athenæum.

HAYLAND'S CHUM. By BERT RAM MITTFORD, Author of "The Gun-Runner."

"A well-told tale."—Times.

"Full of vivid excitement first and last."—Fall Mall Gazette.

RAMBLES IN WOMANLAND.

By MAX O'RELL, Author of "H.R.H. Woman," "Between Ourselves," &c. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

"Entertaining and delightful."—St. James's Gazette.

"We hardly know whether to recommend the book to our readers or not. They will not put it down once begun—that is certain."—Spectator.

"With a pretty wit and a turn for epigram, this writer can scarcely be dull, and no one will turn to one or other of these chatty chapters without being pleasantly entertained."—Scotsman.

Shortly. A NEW EDITION. Crown 8vo, buckram, 4s. 6d.

BRET HARTE'S COMPLETE POETICAL WORKS, including "SOME LATER VERSES."

THE STELLAR HEAVENS: An

Introduction to the Study of the Stars and Nebulae. By J. ELLARD GORE, F.R.A.S. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. net.

NEAR THE TSAR, NEAR DEATH.

By FRED. WHISHAW, Author of "Mazeppa." Crown 8vo, cloth, gilt top, 6s.

TRUTH. By ÉMILE ZOLA. Translated by ERNEST A. VIZETELLY. With a Portrait of the Author. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

HER LADYSHIP'S SECRET. By

WILLIAM WESTALL. CHEAPER EDITION. Crown 8vo, cloth, 3s. 6d.

NEW TWO-SHILLING NOVELS.

Crown 8vo, picture cloth, flat backs.

Ainslie's Ju-Ju. By HAROLD BINDLOSS.

The Luck of Roaring Camp; and Sensation Novels Condensed. By BRET HARTE.

Cavalry Life; and Regimental Legends.

By JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

The Queen against Owen. By ALLEN UPWARD.

The Young Master of Hyson Hall. By

FRANK STOCKTON. With 36 illustrations.

Pott 8vo, cloth, gilt cloth, 2s. net each; leather, gilt edges, with Marker, 3s. net each.

THE ST. MARTIN'S LIBRARY.

All Sorts and Conditions of Men. By SIR

WALTER BENANT.

Walton and Cotton's Complete Angler.

Sketches. By MARK TWAIN.

The Deemster. By HALL CAINE.

The Woman in White. By WILKIE COLLINS.

Under the Greenwood Tree. By THOMAS

HARDY.

The Cloister and the Hearth. By C. READE.

"It is Never too Late to Mend." By

C. READE.

The Life of the Fields. By R. JEFFERIES.

Men and Books. By ROBERT L. STEVENSON.

New Arabian Nights. By R. L. STEVENSON.

The Pocket R. L. S.: Favourite Passages from

STEVENSON'S WORKS.

Condensed Novels. By BRET HARTE. (The

Two Series in One.)

NEW AND POPULAR SIXPENNY BOOKS.

The Dram-Shop. By ÉMILE ZOLA.

Strathmore. By OUIDA.

The Tents of Shem. By GRANT ALLEN.

Griffith Gaunt. By CHARLES READE.

Armada. By WILKIE COLLINS.

Diana Barrington. By B. M. CROKER.

Joseph's Coat. By D. CHRISTIE MURRAY.

The Shadow of the Sword. By ROBERT

BUCHANAN.

Children of Gibeon. By SIR W. BESANT.

London: CHATTO & WINDUS, 111, St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

By Dr. J. AGAR BEET.

A Key to Unlock the Bible.

Fourth Edition,
Small Crown
8vo, cloth gilt. 1/6

Spectator.—"An excellent summary of Biblical knowledge."

Methodist Times.—"No man who had not given a lifetime to the study of this theme could have put so much into so small a compass."

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
LONDON.

A NEW BOOK BY BISHOP WELLDON.

Youth .. and .. 3/6 Duty:

Sermons to Harrow School Boys.

By the Right Rev. J. E. C. WELLDON, D.D., Canon of Westminster, sometime Bishop of Calcutta, and formerly Head Master of Harrow School. With a photographic portrait. Crown 8vo, 250 pages, cloth gilt, 3s. 6d.

The Times.—"There is nothing of which a school-boy in chapel is more critical than of the form and the verbiage of a sermon. But we doubt if either of his two great predecessors at Harrow School has appealed so directly and so earnestly to the individual boy as Dr. Weldon does in these sermons. It is a great gift in a preacher, this combination of strength and simplicity; and the book is full of it."

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
LONDON.

A New Book on the Higher Criticism.

Ready in a few days.

Are the Critics Right?

AN IMPORTANT NEW WORK ON THE HIGHER CRITICISM OF THE
OLD TESTAMENT.

By W. MÖLLER.

Translated from the German by
C. H. IRWIN, M.A.

Crown 8vo, cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

THE RELIGIOUS TRACT SOCIETY,
LONDON.

CASSELL & COMPANY'S ANNOUNCEMENTS.

NOW READY, Complete in One Volume,
price 7s. 6d.,

Cassell's Unique Fine Art Work,

ROYAL ACADEMY PICTURES, 1903.

This year's volume contains Four Beautiful
Rembrandt Photogravures of notable Pictures.

The work is also issued in Four Parts, price 1s. net each.

"The most perfect representation of the Academy ever placed within reach of the public."—Westminster Gazette.

Important New Novels.

THE ADVENTURES OF HARRY REVEL.

By A. T. QUILLER-COUCH,

Author of "Dead Man's Rock," &c. 6s.

FIRST LARGE IMPRESSION EXHAUSTED IN A FEW DAYS.

SECOND IMPRESSION NOW ON SALE.

Punch says:—"A decidedly interesting story. . . . The Baron warrants you that, be you mystified ever so much, yet will you not put down the book until, in company with little Master Revel, you have assisted at the storming of Ciudad Rodrigo."

THE DUKE DECIDES.

By HEADON HILL. 6s.

"An excellent melodrama with all the most modern improvements. . . . It is all most thrilling."—Morning Post.

AN APRIL PRINCESS.

By CONSTANCE SMEDLEY. 6s.

Truth says:—"The humour is sparkling, spontaneous, and abundant. It is a very pleasant phantasy."

JOHN GAYTHER'S GARDEN.

By FRANK STOCKTON. 6s.

The Morning Post says:—"Full of his peculiar charm. The book may be commended to all who admire a delicate art."

THE LITTLE MINISTER.

By J. M. BARRIE

Reset in new type, and containing 8 full-page illustrations by W. HOLE, R.S.A.

Popular Edition, 3s. 6d.

The Speaker says:—"The Little Minister" has been published in a "popular" edition, with Mr. Hole's illustrations, by Messrs. Cassell & Co. This is no doubt what many people have been waiting for before adding this delightful romance to their library."

CASSELL & COMPANY, Ltd., London,
and all Booksellers.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1622. Established 1869. London: 6 June 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 547

REVIEWS.

Robert Browning	551
Wesley and his Preachers: Their Conquest of Britain	552
Studies in Theology	553
Home Life under the Stuarts	554
The Pipes of Pan	555
Out of the Past	556

SHORT NOTICES:

The Tour of Doctor Syntax—The History of Johnny Quas Genus—The Life of John Mytton—Illustrations of the Book of Job—An Ivory Trader in North Kenya—The New Nation	556
---	-----

FICTION:

The Roman Road—Knitters in the Sun	557
--	-----

Notes on the Week's Novels	558
------------------------------------	-----

ARTICLES.

THE DETACHMENT OF MAURICE MAETERLINCK	559
The Violin in Climax	560
Paris Letter	561
Impressions—XXXV. The Time of Buttercups	562

DRAMA:

Benedick and Beatrice. E. K. Chambers	563
---	-----

ART:

France and Her Sculptors. C. L. H.	563
--	-----

SCIENCE:

The Evolution of Sense. C. W. Saleeby	564
---	-----

CORRESPONDENCE:

"Science and Philosophy"	565
A Forgotten Philosophy	565
The "Marriage" of Mazarin	566

WEEKLY COMPETITION:

Pregnant and felicitous sentences selected from any authors	566
---	-----

The Literary Week.

WE congratulate the publishers of the Jewish Encyclopædia on the solicitude they show for the welfare of their books. A small slip of paper dropped from the fourth volume of that learned work, which bore the heading "How to Open a Book." The instructions are concise and simple: "The book should be held with its back on a smooth table, then the front board cover should be let down, the leaves being held in one hand. Next, the other board cover should be let down. Following this operation, a few leaves should be opened at the back, then a few at the front, and so on, alternately opening back and front, gently pressing open the sections till the centre of the volume is reached." Reader and publisher might strike a bargain, the reader promising always to open a book in this way, if the leaves are always cut. Among the publications of the week we note the following:—

THE WORKS OF CHARLES AND MARY LAMB. Edited by E. V. Lucas.

The first volume of the complete edition of the Lambs' works upon which Mr. Lucas has been engaged for some years. This volume contains all Lamb's prose, with the exception of his work for children, his notes in the "Dramatic Specimens" and "Garrick Extracts," his prose plays, and the Elia essays. Mr. Lucas has gathered together a considerable quantity of new matter—the present volume contains nearly forty pages now collected for the first time. The great feature of this exhaustive edition consists in the editor's notes; many disputed points have been settled and allusions traced. The notes to this first volume occupy over one hundred and fifty pages.

A HISTORY OF FRENCH VERSIFICATION. By L. E. Kastner.

Mr. Kastner has endeavoured to apply the historical and scientific methods of Tobler's "Versbau" to his study, though he has not confined himself, as Tobler did, to certain phases of the subject. The period most fully dealt with by the author extends from Marot to the present day, though he has included a succinct account of Old and Middle French versification. In the quotations from old French Mr. Kastner has wisely attempted no normalization of the orthography; only a few necessary modifications have been made. The volume is prefixed by a full and valuable bibliography.

NATURE'S LAWS AND THE MAKING OF PICTURES. By W. L. Wyllie, A.R.A.

A rather curious and interesting book. Mr. Wyllie believes in the study of perspective as an exact science, and has no sympathy with the many artists who, because they have never taken the trouble to learn the rules, call it a "one-eyed science." Mr. Wyllie says: "In the present book I have tried to show how the rules can be used in the construction of pictures and drawings. I have begun with very easy lessons, and the words I have used are the simplest I could find." The volume is very fully illustrated, mainly by the author.

THE superfluous biographies of living people increase and multiply. This week sees the publication of a volume called "Marie Corelli: the Writer and the Woman." We have, however, glanced through the book with amusement, and for amusement we are always grateful. What we like are the illustrations; some of them are joyful. There is a picture of Miss Corelli's pet Yorkshire terrier tearing up press cuttings, in which we suspect a kind of symbolism. Some of the other illustrations are labelled as follows: "Killiecrankie Cottage, where 'Ziska' was finished"; "Avon Croft, where 'The Master Christian' was finished, 1900"; "Miss Corelli's Boatman and Punt." There are also illustrations of other houses and of scraps of scenery on the Avon. The volume concludes with these words, which, we are told, "fell from the lips of Mr. Gladstone": "It is a wonderful gift you have, and I do not think you will abuse it. There is a magnetism in your pen which will influence many. Take care always to do your best. As a woman, you are pretty and good; as a writer, be brave and true. God bless you, my dear child! Be brave! You've got a great future before you. Don't lose heart on the way!"

"TEMPLE BAR" this month prints an interesting article containing certain personal recollections of the late Mr. Shorthouse. The writer once asked him how long "John Inglesant" had been in his mind, to which he replied: "I don't think I can remember the time when it was not." He defined his religious position in the words, "I am a strong Sacramentalist." The writer says, "Never have I known a more deeply-reverent and unquestioning realisation of what sacramental grace is to the spirit of man." He had a passion for music, though he was without any technical knowledge of it, and loved particularly the "Messiah" and the "Elijah." Above all things he rejoiced in the life of contemplation. Although he was in business, and was a successful man, he took no interest in ordinary political or municipal questions, nor did theories concerning the relation between capital and labour, employer and employed, interest him. "The Excursion" he read again and again. The writer of these recollections says:—

That was thoroughly characteristic of the man; he used the resources of life with a certain thriftiness, getting far more out of a little than most of us get out of a great deal. He had a fine sense of detail, and derived the keenest enjoyment from the small things of daily life, which less gifted minds pass unnoticed; here he was in sympathy with Wordsworth; walking round his small, but beautifully-designed, garden was a revelation as to what a loving and reverent observation of Nature could discover; truly, to him "the meanest flower" could bring "thoughts that do lie too deep for tears." And so it was all through life; a look, a word, a gesture, a kindly greeting, a sunbeam, a delicate scent, a rich colour, a sweet sound, would thrill him with a deep thankful enjoyment.

Here is a pleasant personal touch:—

He was the most genial of hosts, and as ready to listen as he was to give out of the stores of his own mind. The terrible stammer, almost a convulsion, which must have tried sorely one so full of thoughts and so ready to give them to others, was, he used to say, a blessing in disguise, having led him to use the pen as his great instrument of expression; but there were times when the stammer almost ceased, and he could talk on uninterruptedly. One very striking and touching habit grew up out of the stammer. At "family prayers" he and his wife read all the prayers together; because, if an attack of stammering came on, her gentle voice would carry on the thread till he recovered, and the knowledge of this prevented all nervousness on his part.

Mr. Shorthouse's writing was done with the restraint and moderation which characterised his life; one day a week he stayed at home and wrote.

A CORRESPONDENT of "The Times," enraged against the flying motor, proposed that it should be made legal for incensed householders and pedestrians to shoot the motorist; concerning which proposal Mr. W. S. Gilbert writes:—

I am delighted with the suggestion made by your spirited correspondent, Sir Ralph Payne-Gallwey, that all pedestrians shall be legally empowered to discharge shot-guns (the size of the shot to be humanely restricted to No. 8 or No. 9) at all motorists who may appear to them to be driving to the common danger. The only difficulty that occurs to me is as to who shall undertake the rather delicate job of stopping the motor (tearing along at perhaps 35 or 40 miles) after the motorist has been killed or disabled. But, without doubt, Sir R. Payne-Gallwey has considered this point, and will supply a practical suggestion as to how it is to be dealt with.

We shall soon be having songs at the music halls all about "the mad motor and the dead chaffeur."

THERE reaches us from America a pamphlet by the democratic Mr. Ernest Crosby, on "Shakespeare's Attitude toward the Working Classes." Mr. Crosby is very angry with Shakespeare because he "was unable to conceive of any situation rising to the dignity of tragedy in other than royal and ducal circles." Mr. Crosby argues that because Shakespeare made the Duke of York accost Horner, the armourer, as "base dunghill villain and mechanical," therefore Shakespeare had no idea of the dignity of labour and the value of simple employments. All of which strikes us as merely futile. There are passages in Shakespeare which are full of the dignity of labour. To prove his sympathy it was not necessary to pack his plays with ploughmen.

THE "Collector's Circular," a new weekly publication, estimates that at least five per cent. of the cultured public are collectors of something or other. But why confine it to the cultured public? The rich uncultured public collects more assiduously than the cultured. Dealers in antiquities know this, and rejoice exceedingly thereat. The "Collector's Circular," however, is a useful publication, particularly for people of comparatively small means. The first of the "Collector's Circular's" notes suggests the old possibility which is always new:—

A second-hand dealer at Lampeter bought a sack-full of old books from a yokel for half-a-sovereign. He parted with two of them to a customer for the cost of the sack. Of these two, one was again re-sold to a Manchester book dealer for £4, who immediately passed it on to a metropolitan confrère for £400—an addition of two oughts to his purchase price. Its present owner has it listed at £1,000. This much-travelled volume is a copy of the very scarce Latin Prayer Book of 1516.

We can see a score of ardent searchers looking up the return fare to Lampeter.

MR. ROBERT BRIDGES has always been something of an innovator in matters of prosody, and in a "Peace Ode," printed in the current "Monthly Review," he strikes the same note. In a brief introduction the author says:—

The system on which the following verses are written claims that, if the English were spelt as it is or should be pronounced, then the syllables would scan according to the laws of Greek prosody. The adaptation of the Greek rules was made by William Stone, in an essay now published with my "Milton's Prosody" at the Oxford University Press. In that book, and in my hexameter poem "Now in Wintry Delights," published this year at the Daniel Press, the curious reader may find the whole literature of this experiment; and in the latter book there is a page of phonetic writing, in a new manner, which exhibits the scansion to the eye.

Mr. Bridges further says, "The writer's object is, of course, to delight readers, whether they are familiar or not with the model." Well, Mr. Bridges may use what prosody he likes so long as he delights us, but in these verses he seems to be so intent on prosody that he has forgotten to be a poet. The four concluding stanzas are the best, and those we quote:—

Thee, France, love I, fair lawgiver and scholar,
Thy lively grace, thy temper illustrious;
And thee, in all wisdom Diviner,
Germany, deep melodist immortal;

Not less have envied soft Italy's spirit,
In marble unveil'd and eloquent colour;
But best love I England, wer' I not Born to her eyrie should envy also.

Wherefore to-day one gift above ev'ry gift
Let us beseech, that God will accord to her
Always a right judgment in all things,
Ev'n to celestial excellencies:

And grant us in long peace to accumulate
Joy, and to stablish friendliness and commerce,
And barter in markets for unpriced
Beauty, the pearl of unending empire.

If Mr. Bridges counts this real poetry we can only direct him to much of his own earlier work for refutation.

THE "Isis" the other day referred to the "Varsity" dramatic critiques as "Dramatic Eccentricities." Upon which the "Varsity" says: "We were very much hurt at the time and quite disheartened, to say nothing of having since passed several sleepless nights, for this rebuff coming as it did from the 'Isis' was really more terrible than it would first appear. We were therefore agreeably surprised, nay, even flattered, in the sincerest form to find the 'Isis' report on the O.U.D.S. actually almost identical with ours!" The evidence of parallel columns would seem to prove this, but as the incriminating phrases are the usual stock-in-trade of perfunctory critics of plays the similarity hardly implies plagiarism. The moral is that both the "Isis" and the "Varsity" should avoid commonplace stodginess.

EVERYTHING about Ruskin had a touch of originality and quaintness; even his cashbook, of which Mr. W. G. Collingwood writes in "Good Woods," was not a cashbook at all. It had the prosaic word on its back, but within, though there were a few accounts, it was mainly filled with the diary of a continental tour undertaken with Mr. Collingwood in 1882. At that time Ruskin's health was uncertain; "he was exceedingly and unfailingly kind," writes Mr. Collingwood, "but exacting; it would have needed great self-confidence to be sure of his good opinion." Returning one day to Sallenches he was greatly attracted by the Hôtel du Mont Blanc at St. Martin, and the place and its memories so moved him that he asked whether it was for sale, and formed the idea of buying it and living there. But that, perhaps unfortunately, was not to be. One very characteristic entry in the diary is quoted by Mr. Collingwood:—

Perfect light on the Dorons, and the Varens a miracle of aerial majesty. I—happy in a more solemn way than of old. Read a bit of Ezra and referred to Haggai ii. 9—"In this place will I give peace."

WOONSOCKET, R.I., U.S.A., has discovered an "original poet and philosopher"—so his publishers describe Mr. Simon Durst. We have glanced through Mr. Durst's curiously named book, "Bub and Sis," and, frankly, we rather like it. There is not much poetry in it, but there is freshness and a kind of practical joy in life which justifies the pleasant "Prescript":—

Once upon a time, needing rest and recreation, and desiring a snug retreat with some canny country folk in the mountains among the maple, birch and pine trees, I inserted, in a few "hill-country" papers, a rimed Ad. susceptible of two readings—one for the reader who runs, and one for the stroller, of my fashion, who feels that life is too short for hurry, and riches worthless on current terms—and received a rimed reply, also charged with two meanings, the ability to read the hidden one of which won me a prize of board and bed at Apple Meadow Farm for the rest of my life—gratis—with the gentle folk, about whom this little book gossips.

THE "Morning Leader" has been complaining of "the style of magniloquence and subtle allusion" employed by sporting writers. As an example, it quoted the following passages from an account of Derby Day:—

It was with evil forebodings that the lattice was drawn this morning . . . at the town famous for its salts.

Happily the change came soon after six o'clock, and ere the matutinal meal was reached the sun had got up.

Magniloquence there may be in those sentences, but we see no "subtle allusion." The sporting papers are by no means the only sinners in this roundabout and foolish manner. Only the other day a great daily allowed one of its contributors to refer to walking as "pedestrian exercise."

THE last thing one would have expected in Turkey is a literary movement, but, according to a writer in the Paris "La Revue," such a movement exists, and Halid Zia is its prophet. One does not quite gather in what respect the movement is national, for according to the writer of the article, himself a Turk, Halid Zia has devoted himself alternately to such models as de Musset and Théophile Gautier. We are assured, however, that Halid Zia and his followers have renewed the life of Turkish literature and rejuvenated the written language.

LECTURING the other day on Emerson, Mr. Augustin Birrell said:—

Just now there was a super-sensitive spirit in the States, very apt to resent foreign criticism of native products. Hawthorne was said to have suffered in popularity there because he was beloved in England. But Englishmen could not help understanding the language in which Americans wrote their books. Anything more alien to Emerson's serene cosmopolitanism than this distortion of patriotism could hardly be discovered.

Just so; but is Mr. Birrell really right about Hawthorne?

THE writer to whom, more than to any other, our competitors have gone this week for their pregnant and felicitous sentences is Robert Louis Stevenson. It is a case, indeed, of Stevenson first and the rest nowhere. Milton comes in a bad second, and Shakespeare is only quoted three times.

PROF. HENRI GAIDOUZ recently put forth a plea in pamphlet form for the official sanctioning and preserving of local dialects in France. His main plea, of course, was for the preservation of the Breton tongue. The question, as treated by Prof. Gaidouz, touches upon matters of policy which are very disputable. Here in England we have no objection to the revival, for instance, of Celtic speech; the question of politics or utility does not come in. It would, indeed, be impossible to preserve dialects officially in England: the force of circumstance is slowly killing them. Any one who has known intimately the country round London within, say, a radius of fifty miles, during the past twenty years cannot fail to have observed the decay of dialect, and even the remoter counties are beginning to feel the touch of modernity. This has long been a cause for regret to all lovers and students of racy English.

A LARGE London bookseller now has on his list the titles of seven hundred and fifty novels published at sixpence; last year only five hundred were on the list. This proves that readers at fourpence-halfpenny net are on the increase. But why should not more solid books be published at that alluring price? There must be plenty of people who would be glad to take home popular scientific works, say, by the evening train.

THE material for the recent newspaper articles suggested by the bi-centenary of the death of John Pepys has naturally been drawn from the Diary. But most of the writers who have been discussing Pepys have considered him too much in the light of his more frivolous self-revelations. He was not always frivolous. Light liver he was, a man in certain respects rather unmoral than immoral, but at the base of his character there was much of real sterling value. He lived in a time when jobbery was rampant, yet he kept his hands comparatively clean; when he thanked God, as he did at the end of most of the years recorded in his Diary, that he was worth so much in goods and money, we know that he came by his possessions honestly. If a dishonest man had held that post of his, things might have been different in England to-day. Pepys was a genuine servant of the State, a fact which should be remembered with gratitude.

THE title of Mr. R. C. Lehmann's new volume of humorous verse runs thus: "Crumbs of Pity and other verses; to which are added Six Lives of Great Men." The fun of the title is a little remote, not to say misleading, but your laughter-maker must have his joke.

A MARRIAGE has been arranged, and will shortly take place, between Mr. Anthony Hope Hawkins and Elizabeth, second daughter of Mr. Charles Sheldon, of New York.

Bibliographical.

It is just a little disquieting to hear that we are to have yet another collection of war poetry. Much, of course, depends upon the treatment accorded to the subject; it is always possible for one anthologist to improve upon the work of another. But apart from the question whether we have not had enough of war, in literature as in life, for some time to come, there is the fact that the last dozen years or so have brought with them a good many collections of verse about fighting and fighters. To go no farther back than 1901, we had in that year Mr. A. Eagar's "Songs of the Sword and the Soldier," which had been preceded in 1900 (there is no date on the title-page, by the way) by Mr. J. Macleay's "War Songs, and Songs and Ballads of Martial Life." To 1900, also, belong the new and enlarged editions of J. E. Carpenter's "Soldier Songs" and "Sailor Songs," with their inevitable element of the bellicose. Before these there had come, in 1898, Mr. C. Williams's "Soldiers' Songs, for the March, the Camp, and the Barracks," and, to go still further back, we had in 1891 the "Real Sailor Songs" of Mr. John Ashton. In addition to these, there have been such collections as Mr. Henley's "Lyra Heroica" (1891), and sundry anthologies of patriotic verse—such as Mr. and Miss Wedmore's "Poems of the Love and Pride of England" (1897), Mr. A. Stanley's "Patriotic Song" (1901), and "Songs of England's Glory" (1902), in which the martial flavour is considerable. Altogether, one doubts whether the present is precisely the time for another accumulation of war verses.

In my correspondence there are still echoes of the Bulwer-Lytton birth-centenary. In one communication I am asked to note (as I readily do) the fairness of the estimate of Bulwer contributed to the "British Weekly" last week by "Claudius Clear." In another I am bidden to remark the singularly large extent to which Bulwer indulged, when publishing, in anonymity. All of the following were published originally without any name or initials on the title page: "Delmour" (1823), "Weeds and Wild Flowers" (1825), "O'Neill" (1827), "Falkland" (1867), "Pelham" (1828), "The Disowned" (1829), "Eugene Aram" (1832), "Asmodeus at Large" (1833), "Godolphin" (1833), "The Pilgrims of the Rhine" (1834), "The Last Days of Pompeii" (1834), "Ernest Maltravers" (1837), "Alice" (1838), "Calderon the Courtier" (1838), "Richelieu" (1838), "The Sea Captain" (1839), "Money" (1840), "Night and Morning" (1841), "Zanoni" (1842), "The Crisis" (1845), "The New Timon" (1846), "Lucretia" (1846), "A Word to the Public" (1847), "Harold" (1848), "Clytemnestra" (1855), "St. Stephen's" (1860), "A Strange Story" (1862), "The Rightful Heir" (1868), "The Coming Race" (1871), "Kenelm Chillingly" (1873), and "The Parisians" (1873)—a notably long list. "My Novel" (1853), "What Will He Do With It?"

(1859), "Caxtoniana" (1863), and "The Boatman" (1864) were all published as by "Pisistratus Caxton." "Paul Clifford" (1830), "The Duchess de la Vallière" (1836), and "The Lady of Lyons" (1838) appeared with the initials "E. B. L."

The announcement of Mr. Edgar Fawcett's forthcoming volume of verse reminds one that it is long since this writer was represented over here by a book of that sort. In England Mr. Fawcett, where known at all, is known mainly as a producer of fiction. During the last two decades nearly thirty novels from his pen have been published in this country—one so recently as in 1901 ("New York"). Prior to that, we had had no story from him since 1895. His latest book of verse, so far as England is concerned, dates still further back, namely, to 1889, when "Blooms and Brambles" appeared. His "Romance and Reverie" (1886) had not, I think, an English publisher, though it was circulated here. "Blooms and Brambles" appears to have been intended to exhibit to the English public the best achieved by Mr. Fawcett in verse up to that time. It was dedicated to the late Gleeson White, and had a rhythmic preface, beginning—

The blooms and the brambles I bring you
Are those I have gathered and garnered
In roamings of memory's woodlands,
In pauses by passion's rough hillsides,
In broodings near cold pools of sorrow,
In strolls among fantasy's gardens, and so forth.

The promised "Life and Last Leaves of Robert Wallace" will be welcomed especially by those who were contemporary at Edinburgh with Dr. Wallace when he was leader-writer and afterwards editor of the "Scotsman," and when his caustic comments upon Scottish ecclesiastical affairs were the delight of the readers of that paper. The use of the phrase "Last Leaves" in the title of the coming book recalls the literary remains of another Edinburgh man—the "Last Leaves" of Alexander Smith, poet and essayist, edited by P. P. Alexander in 1868. One may also note in this connection the "Later Leaves" of Montagu Williams, Q.C., which followed his "Leaves of a Life" (1890) in 1891.

An interesting feature of Mr. Ingpen's new edition of Leigh Hunt's Autobiography is the appended Bibliography, or, rather, chronological list of Hunt's successive publications. This list is the fullest that has yet appeared, being rich in those minute details in which many bibliographers delight. It will not, however, wholly supersede the Bibliography which Mr. J. P. Anderson compiled for Mr. Monkhouse's memoir of Hunt in the "Great Writers" series (1893), for therein are very many particulars which do not come within Mr. Ingpen's plan. It is to be wished, however, that Mr. Ingpen gave more information about the successive editions of Hunt's separate works. For instance, he does not mention the one-volume edition of the Autobiography, in limp green cloth, which was published by Messrs. Smith and Elder, and, for all I know, may still be in their catalogue. Very many people first made acquaintance with the Autobiography in this edition.

I see that a Bibliography of Matthew Arnold, by Mr. Burnett Smart, will be included in the fifteenth and last volume (due in August 1904) of the "edition de luxe" of the Works announced by Messrs. Macmillan. This, presumably, will be Mr. Smart's existing Bibliography of Arnold, brought down to date. In any case, I hope Mr. Smart and the publishers will arrange for the separate issue of this part of Vol. XV. Many would like to acquire the Bibliography who have no particular fondness for "editions de luxe."

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

A Sporting Event.

ROBERT BROWNING. By G. K. Chesterton. English Men of Letters Series. (Macmillan. 2s.)

MR. CHESTERTON'S achievements have been such that one comes to this book with a keen initial curiosity to know how he has wrestled with his theme. It is a sporting event. Will the new pedagogism lower its voice and hide its electric ferule in the presence of greatness? Hitherto Mr. Chesterton has dealt with great reputations only in the essay, where the dialectical somersaults for which he is famous have formed part of an al fresco entertainment, and have therefore scarcely been challenged. But now he enters the field of critical biography under the prestige of a fine "series"; and many will ask with what success.

Certainly with the success of youth, eagerness, and cleverness. Certainly with the success of a rollicking dogmatism, which after all leaves you whole; and a pyrotechnical sapience which after all returns the rocket-stick of the commonplace to your feet. Mr. Chesterton is endlessly new and audacious in detail. In the mass, and in a summary, he is a comfortable person enough. Reading him is like playing a sub-conscious game of noughts and crosses: you wait to cancel, and meanwhile you are kept atrociously alert.

It seems to us that the necessity under which Mr. Chesterton has just placed himself of following one man's career, of developing one man's philosophy, has brought into greater clearness both the merits and drawbacks of his method of writing. It has given substance and memorableness to his good things. One might find oneself recalling twenty years hence this characterisation of the age of Browning's youth—when Ruskin, Dickens, Carlyle and Keats were in their seed-time:—

On all sides there was the first beginning of the æsthetic stir in the middle classes which expressed itself in the combination of so many poetic lives with so many prosaic livelihoods. It was the age of inspired office boys.

Or this:—

Charity was Browning's basic philosophy; but it was, as it were, a fierce charity, a charity that went man-hunting. He was a kind of cosmic detective who walked into the foulest of thieves' kitchens and accused men publicly of virtue.

Again:—

The "Ring and the Book" is the great epic of the age, because it is the expression of the belief, it might almost be said of the discovery, that no man ever lived upon this earth without possessing a point of view. No one ever lived who had not a little more to say for himself than any formal system of justice was likely to say for him.

Again:—

If a man had gone up to Browning and asked him with all the solemnity of the eccentric, "Do you think life is worth living?" it is interesting to conjecture what his answer might have been. If he had been for the moment under the influence of the orthodox rationalistic deism of the theologian he would have said, "Existence is justified by its manifest design, its manifest adaptation of means to ends," or, in other words, "Existence is justified by its completeness." If, on the other hand, he had been influenced by his own serious intellectual theories he would have said, "Existence is justified by its air of growth and doubtfulness," or, in other words, "Existence is justified by its incompleteness." But if he had not been influenced in his answer either by the accepted opinions, or by his own opinions, but had simply answered the question "Is life worth living?" with the real, vital answer that awaited it in his own soul, he would have said as likely as not, "Crimson toadstools in Hampshire." Some plain, glowing picture of this sort left on his mind would be his real verdict on what the universe had meant to him.

These passages strike us as entertainingly helpful; they have the daylight of thinking in them. Unfortunately they and their like are but the shafts of sunshine piercing the blinds of a room in which the midnight lamp is still burning. Too often it is the lamp-light and the writhing brow and the dialectical sham-fight that oppress us with a sense of superfluity and unreality.

Mr. Chesterton's determination to be always the top dog, whether in agreement or opposition, is his undoing. He is for ever straining to prove that the critics who differ from him do so on grounds which ought to make them his adorers, and that the critics who agree with him do so on grounds of which even his antagonists would be utterly ashamed. The latter fate is the rarer, but it is Mr. Santayana's. Mr. Santayana is singled out by Mr. Chesterton as the most fruitful of all Browning's critics: he is "one of the very few who seem to have got near to the actual secret of Browning's optimism." Note the splendid assurance of the word actual. Mr. Santayana, then, is in luck. Mr. Santayana has nearly belled the cat. Mr. Santayana, "in contradistinction to the vast mass of Browning's admirers, had discovered what was the real root of Browning's poetry; and"—the suave injury of this conjunctive "and" instead of the decently disjunctive "but"!—"the curious thing is, that having discovered that root virtue, he thinks it a vice." That is the way with these hopeful fellows: they flourish mightily until Mr. Chesterton comes along and praises them. Mr. Santayana had said that Mr. Browning's poetry is the poetry of barbarism because "the barbarian is the man who regards his passions as their own excuse for being, who does not domesticate them either by understanding their cause, or by conceiving their ideal goal." That is all the substantive quotation from Mr. Santayana that we are given, and, as is frequently the case with Mr. Chesterton, we do not see enough of the issue to judge it. What we do see at all times is Mr. Chesterton's dexterous hard-hitting or his dexterous soft-hitting. In this case it is soft-hitting:—

Thus, Mr. Santayana is, perhaps, the most valuable of all the Browning critics. He has gone out of his way to endeavour to realise what it is that repels him in Browning, and he has discovered the fault which none of Browning's opponents have discovered. And in this he has discovered the merit which none of Browning's admirers have discovered. Whether the quality be a good or a bad quality, Mr. Santayana is perfectly right. The whole of Browning's poetry does rest upon primitive feeling; and the only comment to be added is that so does the whole of every one else's poetry.

It would appear, therefore, that Mr. Santayana excelled all other Browning critics by starting a proposition which to Mr. Chesterton is the apotheosis of the obvious!

Of such dialectical evolutions and tragedies the book is full. The blood of the misled righteous is shed without stint. How very wrong you can be when you feel most harmless may appear in the following passage:—

Any one will make the deepest and blackest and most incurable mistake about Browning who imagines that his optimism was founded on any arguments for optimism. Because he had a strong intellect, because he had a strong power of conviction, he conceived and developed and asserted these doctrines of the incompleteness of Man and the sacrifice of Omnipotence. But these doctrines were the symptoms of his optimism, they were not its origin. It is surely obvious that no one can be argued into optimism since no one can be argued into happiness. Browning's optimism was not founded on opinions which were the work of Browning, but on life which was the work of God. . . . He is a great poet of human joy for precisely the reason of which Mr. Santayana complains: that his happiness is primal, and beyond the reach of philosophy. He is something far more convincing, far more comforting, far more religiously significant than an optimist: he is a happy man.

This is a typical specimen of Mr. Chesterton's "made" arguments. We should say that the vital distinction between optimism and happiness (of which Mr. Chesterton himself seems fully conscious in the last of the two sentences we have italicised) is precisely this: that optimism is the happiness into which a man can and does argue himself and other people; that happiness is the native bliss which is from within, but which, unless qualified, may be the happiness of a fool or an idiot. Surely Browning's native happiness was just that part of him with which we have really nothing to do: it was there, but we know of it through its intellectual expression, that is to say his optimism. That he was an inwardly happy man, as happy men go, who doubts, who has disputed? Who has suggested that his optimism was a life-long piece of acting? Who, in a word, requires these elaborate distinctions, and this appearance of approval or disapproval of Mr. Santayana, which is, in fact, neither the one nor the other?

Let it be admitted that no other young writer of to-day could lead us through these morrice-dances of logic and paradox. Mr. Chesterton does make his readers think, and he does often think brilliantly himself. But page after page of his present monograph convinces us that he is in all things too curiously pugnacious, and too intricately simple. Lack of space forbids us to give other examples of his legerdemain. We are also restrained by the feeling, begotten of many a page, that Mr. Chesterton cannot be cornered. He could always fall back on such dexterities as the following:—

A man who has missed the fact that "Tristram Shandy" is a game of digressions, that the whole book is a kind of practical joke to cheat the reader out of a story, simply has not read "Tristram Shandy" at all. The man who objects to the Rossetti pictures because they depict a sad and sensuous day-dream, objects to their existing at all. And any one who objects to Browning writing his huge epic round a trumpery and sordid police-case has in reality missed the whole length and breadth of the poet's meaning.

To which we can only reply that Mr. Chesterton is right. A man who objects to the Rossetti pictures because they depict a sad and sensuous day-dream does, so far, object to their existing. He may be right or he may be wrong in his initial objection. But surely all criticism is a denial of the right to exist—in respect of the qualities objected to. In respect of what appear to us (rightly or wrongly) to be the faults of Mr. Chesterton's "Browning" we do deny the right of that book to exist; but in respect of its excellences, which are many, we are proud to assist at its accouchement.

We must add a word on Mr. Chesterton's tone as apart from what has been already implied. Here and there he uses the freedom of journalism in a way that jars. We do not think it well that he should let fall a remark like this:—

No one ever found Miss Marie Corelli obscure, because she believes only in words.

Or—

Poetry alone, with the first throb of its metre, can tell us whether the depression is the kind of depression that drives a man to suicide, or the kind of depression that drives him to the Tivoli.

Nor do we like such interpolations as this:—

For while an Englishman may be enthusiastic about England, or indignant against England, it never occurred to any living Englishman to be interested in England.

Again, the lackadaisical superiority of the following is to be regretfully smiled at:—

It is the utterance of that bitter and heartrending period of youth which comes before we realise the one grand and logical basis of all optimism—the doctrine of original sin. The boy at this stage being an ignorant and inhuman idealist, regards all his faults as frightful secret malformations, and it is only later that he becomes conscious of that large and beautiful and benignant explanation that the heart of man is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked.

But there! we have enjoyed Mr. Chesterton's book in parts. More power—and less facility—to his pen.

"Manifest Hard Work."

WESLEY AND HIS PREACHERS: THEIR CONQUEST OF BRITAIN.
By G. Holden Pike. (T. Fisher Unwin. 7s. 6d.)

MR. HOLDEN PIKE has taken a large subject, and attempted to deal with it in the most comprehensive fashion, covering a wide and varied field. But we cannot congratulate him on his success. He has written with manifest zeal, manifest diligence and conscientiousness; one sees it has been a labour of love, in which he has spared no pains. But it is among the sore lessons which are borne home upon the reviewer, in the course of long experience, that love and the most single-minded fervour are alone insufficient for literary success. It would be pleasant to think otherwise, and there is a very common belief that no more but these qualities is needed. Mr. Pike is a plain example to the contrary. He arranges his book logically under headings which cover the several sections of his subject; under each heading he sedulously, with evident study and resolve to impart all the information he can, brings together a serried multitude of facts relevant to that heading—and the outcome is null, from sheer absence of the literary sense. It is a mere chain of facts, set down with the heavy industry of a reporter, but without even the reporter's attempt to give them literary effectiveness. The more laborious his determination to accumulate details, the more jejune packed and dry-bone-like they become. Save this conscientious assembling and statement of facts, Mr. Pike has not a notion of the book-maker's art. They are put down with the most arid brevity, because the fewer the words, the more room for other facts. The "sets" in the Strand are not more monotonously laid down and mechanically adjusted; it is the right paviour's rank to book-making (if we may adapt Touchstone a little). Mr. Pike's outlook upon things in general and Wesley in particular is marked by a correspondingly narrow and prosaic certitude. It is the attitude of the good Wesleyan, middle-class, solid Britisher without a suspicion of any standpoint but his own sharply cut small peep-hole. That Wesley should be written of by a good Wesleyan is an excellent thing—the best, because the most sympathetic thing. But the narrowness, the Britannic insularity, the prosaic hard-and-fastness, the middle-classness—these are not so well. By way of some partial hint as to what we mean, we might instance that Mr. Pike (in regard to the rapid spread of Wesleyanism; and its numerous conversions en bloc) complacently echoes Wesley's own very pardonable assertion that "God had not so wrought in any other nation." This, though parallels leap readily to the historic remembrance in the careers of reformers Continental and Asiatic, Christian and heathen, Francis Xavier and Francis of Assisi, Gautama and others a many. That is a small instance; but we might pursue it further and into various matters, had we stomach for the ungracious task of blame, where we would rather accord the author, following our natural wishes, the praise deserved by his manifest hard work, enthusiasm, and good intentions. In fine, he has brought together many materials for a book on Wesley and the rise of Wesleyanism; he has not produced the book.

Wesley was the very man for an apostolate among Englishmen of the middle and lower classes—the backbone of the nation. He was the typical John Bull in his strength and his limitations—raised just a little above the people he had to do with, but not too much. Sufficiently their superior to lead, sufficiently of themselves to influence; flesh of their flesh, thinking as they thought, and even (outside his special religious teaching) what they thought. He had no "cultured" mind—hence his lack of appeal to the upper classes—but that very fact made him of one mental substance with the nation at large. A plain, solid, narrowly rational man is John Bull; and such was Wesley. His comments on books and men, though Mr. Pike quotes them with admiration, are essentially mediocre and conformed to his strong contracted personal prejudices. But that is precisely how John Bull reads books and judges men. When Wesley comes right in such pronouncements it is through good homely sense; and what attracts him in books (to set aside the more complex question of men) is homely rationality. Nor can he ever forget the element of moral effect. Here again he represents the average Anglo-Saxon intelligence. In regard to matters of the aesthetic sense, he confessed that "a tune at first hearing, a poem at first reading, a picture at first seeing, did not afford pleasure, as was the case afterwards when the merits were more fully realised"; while, on the other hand, "when I am too much acquainted, it is no longer pleasing."

In other words, he had no real delight in them at all, nothing of the sensuous pleasure which is the very medium of artistic appeal; but painfully taught himself a sort of rational discernment of their qualities, which presently faded together with the novelty of its acquirement, never having possessed any true root in his nature. And in this also, he is the Anglo-Saxon all over, when he is confronted with that aesthetic appeal which to him has no appeal, yet which his dogged rationality will try to "master." Reversing the true process, he endeavours to excite the emotions through the reason; not comprehending that the appeal is to the reason through the emotions.

So equipped by his very limitations, educated though not cultured, he was the right man for the masses. He had sense, balance, and manhood—the English qualities which the English love. As might be expected from our description of his literary character, he had none of his great colleague, Whitefield's, emotional appeal to the multitude. It is eminently significant that he did not dream of open-air preaching, and was drawn into it by Whitefield with reluctant doubt. Yet it became the very Jericho-trumpet of Methodism, and he a most potent street-preacher. A preacher to the English needs not emotionality. One remembers that Newman had no passion or graces of delivery; yet his silver monotony thrilled men's souls. And this Newman of the plebs and the market-place haled men's hearts out of them. His sense, his directness, his practicality went home to them; his conviction was itself a mode of passion; while animating and animated by that conviction was mastery—magnetism. That is the final secret, with him as with Newman, the mysterious power which is as often found apart from as with passion, and which we call magnetism, unknowing what it is. Says Nelson, who became one of his assistant-preachers after his own conversion:—

As soon as he got upon the stand, he stroked back his hair, and turned his face towards where I stood, and methought fixed his eyes upon me. His countenance struck such an awful dread upon me, before I heard him speak, that it made my heart beat like the pendulum of a clock; and when he did speak I thought his whole discourse was aimed at me. When he had done I said: "This man can tell the secrets of my heart; he hath not left me there; for he hath showed the remedy, even the blood of Jesus."

Speaking with reverence, it is not likely that Nelson, who had tried sect after sect in vain, had not heard that remedy declared before. What did shake him, and bring it personally home to him, the whole passage shows to have been Wesley's magnetic force. Before the preacher opens his lips, the man is moved and in his grip, as happens with an actor of genius, though Wesley's method had nought of Whitefield's occasional theatricality. The sheer manhood of the Methodist founder was a powerful and cognate force in his favour. He came on a day of appalling religious dissolution; when the high had laughed religion out of countenance, while to the low it meant the parson's tithe-pig. A careless clergy had lost all hold of the people, and were themselves parasites of a dissolute nobility and drunken squirearchy. The educated assailed Wesleyanism with the whole power of contempt. "Methodist" was itself a nickname flung at Wesley's followers in derision. To all argument "Methodist" was a final and sufficient answer; and if any man defended Wesley, he was put out of court by classing him with those he defended. The lower classes were incited to riot by the parson and the magistrate. But amidst cultured scorn or bludgeons and brickbats Wesley stood impassive. At Falmouth the mob surprised him in a private house, and the outer door was forced. "But, sir, is it not better for you to hide yourself—to get into a closet?" asked the maid. "No, it is best for me to stand just where I am," answered Wesley. That undaunted demeanour subdued more than one rabble who seemed on the point of taking his life. The Englishman has a supreme respect for "pluck." And in an age when the people were in the most barbarous state of neglect, he initiated the work of personal charity, and taught the poor to respect themselves. It is no wonder that this man who cared for them made conquest of the poor. The most interesting chapter in the book is that which deals with his work among them. It contains many instructive glimpses of their worse than savage state. Into all this Wesley came as a light among dark places. He went where none had cared or dared to go, he re-established religion among whole populations living like the beasts, and his deserved reward was the spread of Methodism from end to end of England. And not the least, perhaps, of his advantages was that in an age of rhetorical verbiage he preached plain good English, which all men might understand.

For God and the World.

STUDIES IN THEOLOGY. By J. Estlin Carpenter and P. H. Wicksteed. (Dent. 5s. net.)

THERE are three schools of thought that claim our following to-day: the teachers of one or another form of religion, the exponents of science as opposed to religion, which in their vocabulary is a synonym for superstition, and a small intermediate camp, which holds that religion is indeed superstition, but that its aid must nevertheless be invoked in aid of human morality as a means to the end of human happiness. Our authors are on the side of religion as an exposition of absolute truth and as the supreme means to supreme ends. Their religion is a theology, nor would they admit the occurrence of a distinction between the terms. "Natural religion" they incorporate with their theism. Approaching the consideration of much controversial matter with rare scholarship, instant eloquence and liberal charity, they indeed take the existence of Deity for granted. They therefore claim the title of theologians, nor does this term, the dignity of which has been so often compromised, lose in their use any of its original breadth of meaning. Like every considerable theologian of our age, in whatever land, they are monotheists. And, to be precise and final, they are Unitarians.

But he will greatly err who fancies that this is a sectarian volume, though its authors' position may appear to have been narrowed down within the compass of a modern phrase. These writers belong to no narrow school. They "will not be heard amongst the dogmatists." Take this, from the essay on "The History of Religion in Theological Study":—

And thus, by common links of thought, a mighty chain of sympathy is spread round the globe. In a new sense we are realising the unity of the race. A fresh light is thrown on its long history; we understand the significance of its struggles, the meaning of the thoughts which it has striven dimly to articulate through symbol and rite, when words proved all too weak to give them form; the whole scope of our conceptions is widened, the sense of human brotherhood made strong and deep, and the student learns the first article of a world-wide faith;—

Homo sum : humani nihil a me alienum puto.

In the light of this quotation, read the three essays entitled, "Sociology in the Circle of Theological Studies," "The Study of Theology and the Service of Man," and "Religion and Society." Take one more excerpt and the book is shown to be on a "general plan"; and the good of the race, the modern conception of the function of religion, to be that plan; for "the life that now is and the life which is to come have been too often regarded as de facto under separate governments." This, then, is the key to the thought and purpose of the volume:—

Augustine recognised one vast propelling power, guiding the entire destinies of the race. It was the divine design, working out the eruditio, the education of humanity. Here, then, is one of those immense contributions to thought, for which we are indebted specially to Christianity—the doctrine which science has recently seized for its own purposes and transfigured into a larger scope, till it has ventured to claim it as all its own—the doctrine of the gradual evolution of human progress.

And this is why we have been so happy whilst reading this book. For the abominable antithesis of science and religion wearies us past endurance. Here is science, marching irresistibly forwards, and daily proving her value to mankind. Here, also, is religion, demonstrably subject to the law of progress, the "continuous revelation," growing with the growing race, palpably neither obsolete nor obsolescent. And the majority of people will tell us that they are going different ways; that their paths are divergent, and that in a few more decades or centuries only the younger traveller will survive. Some few may say that the paths are parallel: that science is for material progress, religion for ethical and spiritual. They know the significance of neither, but they have judged less hastily than the many. For ourselves, we have a thousand reasons for believing, and we welcome this printed and permanent bulwark to our creed, that religion and science are travelling, of necessity, and because there are not more gods than One, on paths that are convergent, paths more acutely inclined and more rapidly trod in each succeeding hour of time. A thousand reasons; great and small, philosophical and practical. For "eternal justice rules the world." Print it, as did Carlyle, in capitals, if it please you; deify it, implicitly and explicitly; it has not waited until our late day for its apotheosis. And eternal Justice grinds slowly, and in many mills—in many systems of religion and philosophy and science—but it grinds exceedingly small. Its processes are multifarious but assuredly assured. Newton, Goethe, Gotama, Socrates, Isaiah, Christ—we write in all reverence—had not these one common cause? And do they not therefore serve one common cause—the cause of God and the world? We "will not ask whether Augustine or Dr. Jenner was the greater benefactor of humanity; whether it was better to have discovered chloroform or to have written the 'Imitatio Christi,' to have described the 'Pilgrim's Progress' or to have first founded penny banks." For there shall never be one lost good. Let us clear our minds of antithesis and cant. It is wasting the world's time to balance, with fictitious nicety, the deeds of the living dead. This is no time for any but large views. Not much longer, on this little earth, covered already with sixteen hundred millions of men and hourly with more, can there be room for the laboratory that scoffs at the church, or the church that condemns the laboratory. The science that is nothing but the exercise of passionless intellect on an impassioned earth is only for the egoist and the misanthropist. Science must either serve mankind or go to some other planet; she is out of place on ours, where are death and agony of soul. The theology that is nothing but a detached metaphysic, the church that is a thing apart, "in the world but not of it," is only for the word-juggler and the selfish would-be saviour of his own small soul. Theology must either serve God and the world, and teach us to fall in love with this incomprehensible universe, or foregather with the Creator alone, and leave creation to groan and travail unmocked. Or, as Mr. Wicksteed puts it:—

Sociology, then, bereft of religion, is without a goal, and the blight of perpetual sterility is upon it. Theology, bereft of Sociology, is remote from the actual life of men, and is smitten with unreality. On the union of these two depends the future of humanity, the coming of the day when "the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters cover the sea," when there shall be no tyrant and no slave:

Nor shall any lack his share

In the toil and the gain of living, in the days when the world grows fair.

Tid-Bits History.

HOME LIFE UNDER THE STUARTS. By Elizabeth Godfrey. Illustrated. (Grant Richards. 12s. 6d. net.)

Mrs. EARLE, we fear, has unwittingly founded a school that is to be regarded with misgiving. Ever since the triumphant publication of her first book, written under the awnings in a Surrey garden, other persons have been industriously putting forth works that seem to be, though they are not, of a similar kind. "Let me just chatter at large, avoiding all serious subjects, particularly politics," each of these persons said, "and the volume will run into thousands." The plan was promising; but there were difficulties in the way of its accomplishment. The first, the greatest, was met on the very threshold of the project. Mrs. Earle has a faculty for the criticism and the interpretation of life; and all her thoughts on it, even her thoughts on its trivialities, are originally conceived and originally expressed. Her imitators also have seen life; but either they have viewed it with the rustic's somnolent eye, or they have experienced it, through reading and hearsay, with no more than the intelligence of the scandal-loving gossip. Thus, at the very outset, the literati of the new school found that they must adopt a modification of Mrs. Earle's plan. They said to themselves, "We can't make modern home life so interesting as that pot-pourri lady makes it, and we can't write as she does; but we can choose periods in the past, and hunt up memoirs and biographies, and makes books as racy—the whole of them, from the first page to the last—as a volume of select divorce cases would be." Hence the histories of "periods" from the social point of view with which our tables have recently been bestrewn. It is time to admit that they have been a weary trial. It is time, also, to state an important discovery. Histories in which the loves and other private adventures of eminent persons are separated from their public careers, the books about the past in which literature is detached from life, are a complete failure from any rational point of view. Of the "periods" with which they deal they do not convey any true impression whatever. Controversies in religion and in politics, it may be, are "too much with us, late and soon"; but one has only to read the tid-bits books alluded to in order to realize that these controversies are the very atmosphere of living history. Apart from them, an exhibition of the "home life" of any period is as clearly inanimate as a punch-and-judy show, and much less entertaining.

The contents-table of Miss Godfrey's volume might have been a warning to go into her pages no farther. After "The Nursery," "Children's Games," "Some Lesson Books," "Public Schools," "The Private Tutor," and "The University," we come upon a division of the matter into what may be called expanding subsections. We have "Girlhood," "Giving in Marriage," "Some Who Chose for Themselves," "Romance," "The Love Story of Anne Murray," "Married Life," and "Some Letters from Husbands and Wives." After that the work goes off into chapters on such themes as Needlework, Dress and Fashion, and Gardens. Like the chapters in the earlier third of the book, these are perfunctory and brief. Obviously Miss Godfrey as an historian relies, in her hope of success, on the middle third. Now, what manner of work is that? In the whole of it there is not a single original word or thought. All the stories are copied from old books. All the reflections are trite. Let us quote a few specimen passages:—

The girls of the seventeenth century enjoyed but a brief spring-time. With dawning womanhood, while they were yet in the school-room, in some cases even in the nursery, careful parents were already considering the choice of a husband. To our modern English notions of absolute freedom of choice and the paramount claims of falling in love which the modern novel has erected into a new gospel, such a course seems almost shocking; yet unquestionably the custom had its advantages. Amongst our neighbours across the Channel—&c.

As Dorothy Osborne observed, it was not always the love-matches that turned out the best. The one she was commenting on, that of Lady Strangford, Lord Leicester's wilful daughter Isabella, was a conspicuous instance to the contrary, and Dorothy seems to have several such in her mind. To turn to one in quite a different circle, Milton, from whose lofty and serious tone of mind higher things might have been looked for, followed the promptings of a passing fancy for a pretty—&c.

The reader will perhaps not have forgotten the pretty, childish love-makings between the small Kenelm Digby and his little play-fellow. As sometimes happens with such seedling loves, the roots continued to live and grow in the hearts of both through the darkness of separation, till at length when they met again, after the lapse of several years, it shot up into a full-blown romance, which has been related at length by the pen of one of the lovers; and if it is not possible always to take every detail quite literally, remembering that both were of that order that sees its own adventures and experiences in "the light that never was on sea or land," yet—&c.

Such are the moralisings with which our latest historian of "social life" embroiders her narratives. What of the narratives themselves? What are they like? Here is an example. There was some difference of opinion about the disposal of one of Lord Cork's many children; but "the marriage took place, and Lord Cork records in his diary that the King himself gave the bride away, led her out to dance, and conducted her to the bedchamber, 'where the Queen with her own hand did help to undress her.' And his Majesty and the Queen both stayed in the bedchamber till they saw my son and his wife in bed together, and they both kissed the bride and blessed them as I did." The "prettiness" with which that incident is told does not redeem the telling. It only adds to it a touch of hypocrisy. Even as recent "social histories" by popular authors who are male have been appeals to the shallow-pated prurience of the loafers in club smoking-rooms, the work before us is an appeal to green-sick girls. Indeed, as we have indicated, we are rather ashamed of having spent any time over it; but the thing is a portent, and has to be dealt with somehow. People who can read these books with interest cannot possibly have strength of mind enough to study real and serviceable literature, and thus the new literati may be doing much harm indirectly. The middle classes being the greater part of the nation, may not their debauched taste to some extent account for the decline of literature which recently we have had occasion to note? Men and women capable of producing works of literature are not encouraged to write when the majority of the people are in a mood for twaddle.

A Canadian Hellene.

THE PIPES OF PAN. By Bliss Carman. (Murray. 2s. 6d. net.)

MR. CARMAN is one of the most satisfactory of our secondary poets: he writes seldom, his books are small, his books are good. Also he has the joy of life, and the poet without the joy of life is not fully furnished.

The little book that has just come from Mr. Carman is an illustration of the difficulty of being a great poet. It is exquisitely done. We never remember reading the octosyllabic couplet more flexibly or charmingly handled, and there are other measures which Mr. Carman has in equally dexterous control. The imagery is fresh and warm; the pictorial quality of the verse is vivid; the book has beautiful thoughts. And yet it remains merely a contribution to delightful secondary poetry. One has only to turn from Mr. Carman to Keats, or even to Matthew Arnold, to see the difference.

Fortunately, however, the taste for good secondary poetry has been growing for some years, until there are many readers who prefer it to the real thing—who can, in sporting phrase, "negotiate" it better. For them Mr. Carman will be a most acceptable singer, as he should be (with certain reservations) for all lovers of literature. We quote certain stanzas from what is, perhaps, the most perfect lyric in the volume, "Daphne":—

Dear, shy, soft face,
With just the elfin trace
That lends thy human beauty the last touch
Of wild, elusive grace!

° ° ° ° °
But I to thee
More gently fond would be,
Nor less a lover woo thee with soft words
And woodland melody;

Take pipe and play
Each forest fear away;
Win thee to idle in the leafy shade
All the long summer day;

Tell thee old tales
Of love, that still avails
More than all mighty things in this great world,
Still wonder works nor fails;

Teach thee new lore,
How to love more and more,
And find the magical delirium
In joys unguessed before.

I would try over
And over to discover
Some wild, sweet, foolish, irresistible
New way to be thy lover—

New, wondrous ways
To fill thy golden days,
Thy lovely pagan body with delight,
Thy loving heart with praise.

For I would learn,
Deep in the brookside fern,
The magic of the syrinx whispering low
With bubbly fall and turn;

Mock every note
Of the green woodbird's throat,
Till some wild strain, impassioned yet serene,
Should form and float

Far through the hills,
Where mellow sunlight fills
The world with joy, and from the purple vines
The brew of life distils.

Ah, then indeed
Thy heart should have no need
To tremble at a footfall on the brake,
And bid thy bright limbs speed.

But night would come,
And I should make thy home
In the deep pines, lit by a yellow star
Hung in the dark blue dome—

A fragrant house
Of woven balsam boughs,
Where the great Cyprian mother should receive
Our warm unsullied vows.

Not a few of the first order of poets might have been glad to write so fragrant a poem as that.

A Brilliant Assembly.

OUT OF THE PAST. By the Right Hon. Sir Mountstuart E. Grant Duff. 2 vols. (Murray. 18s.)

CABINETED in these volumes, whose garb of silver and black suggests the chastest mourning, is a veritable assembly of the great dead. Chesterfield, Thiers, Matthew Arnold, Disraeli, Dean Stanley, the Duke of Argyll (if one may say "the" of so illustrious a family), and many others—not forgetting the Count de Hübner, transplanted from the ACADEMY of April 11, 1891—fortify their immortality by means of a pen which has too much to say to let its leisureliness create a wish for its haste. Sir Mountstuart Grant Duff is the ideal reviewer for those spacious periodicals which seem to justify the appellation of "book" invariably bestowed by domestics on our flimsiest ephemera. Here is an excellent specimen of his manner; it is apropos of Manning and Newman:—

A story is told that when that eminent man [Newman] dedicated his "Grammar of Assent" to Serjeant Bellasis—"in remembrance of a long, equable, sunny friendship"—the printer sent back the words transformed into "a long squabble and funny friendship." That may be true or false, but no phrase could better have described the relations of the great Oratorian and the Archbishop of Westminster, as detailed in Mr. Purcell's by no means edifying fourteenth chapter. A highly disagreeable correspondence ended in the pair promising to say Masses for each other. Is this, perhaps, the proper formula in the highest ecclesiastical circles for conveying the sentiments which are more bluntly set forth in the first lines of Browning's "Soliloquy [of the] Spanish Cloister"?

"The great Oratorian!" There we have just a touch of the elegant periphrasis which in mid-Victorian days made the difference between blurting and writing. But it is only a touch. Sir Mountstuart avoids the error which drew upon Mr. Escott some years ago an impudently witty article consisting almost wholly of a selection of his periphrastic contrivances for avoiding the mention of places, persons, and dates. And not only does Sir Mountstuart avoid; in the passage we have quoted he creates a state of mind for appreciating a wonderful poetic monologue; he shows that power to relate which is in essence the gift of interpretation. Brother Lawrence, as Newman, lures unpoetical thousands to listen to the soliloquist; and he who so prettily assists towards this public meeting serves the ends of Imperialism by a similarly clever device. In the case we are to cite, the known and familiar item is Australia. The shape of a vast island is plain on the map, and definite on the mind's eye. Australia, then, is known and familiar. But the North American Dominions of the Crown bulk amorphously to the untrained eye; they belong (in strict privacy) to the Unintelligibles. Then says our essayist, striving in 1880 ("being then at the Colonial Office") to bore into the intelligence of Peterhead, in these North-American Colonies Australia "could stand, colossal as it is, like a cup upon a saucer."

Having accidentally reminded ourselves that our author is a statesman, we may say that he yields some very agreeable refreshment as a political anecdotist. One of his anecdotes ought really to be the property of Mr. Anthony Hope. We refer to that of Baron Bunsen's call on the Queen of Prussia, mother of Frederick "the Noble." The baron, while waiting for Her Majesty, saw a photograph of the late Princess Royal and another of the then Crown Prince of Prussia, lying on a table. These he moved so that side by side they covered all but the footline of another photograph, the footline being "La Belle Alliance." The excellent Dizzy anecdotes can hardly be claimed by any novelist except perhaps the author of "Robert Orange." As Prime Minister he avowed to a friend of the essayist that he was reading "Tancred" "not for amusement but for instruction." It is well known that the cynic is abroad quite as often as the schoolmaster, but what shall we say of the Conservative M.P. who "closed a discussion with some Liberals . . . by the characteristic words, 'Well, well, I prefer our scoundrel to your lunatic'?" Yet the day was to come when Lord Derby should say to Sir Mountstuart at the foot of Primrose Hill, "It's God's mercy that they haven't rechristened it Mount Beaconsfield."

Very interesting are our author's recollections of Oxford, its Union, its select Johnson Club. His Oxford was classic-mad. "A man who 'otiosely imbibed modern literature,' to use the phrase of a well-known tutor of those times, instead of working for the regular examination," would have been looked at contemptuously at Balliol. Sir Mountstuart's first speech in the Union was in reply to the author of "Hajji Baba"; but here a brave name merely flits across the page. His literary acquaintances included Clough, and as we read of the extraordinary reputation that the living Clough made for himself it is sad to think that now his popularity chiefly consists in some smoothly sweet but otherwise undistinguished lines designed to encourage persons who believe themselves to be struggling unavailingly. To Arnold's poetry he pays the tribute that seems inevitable in these days, though he prefers the critical method of Sainte-Beuve to that of his English contemporary. He thinks that Arnold might have improved his critical papers by devoting more time to their preparation. Sainte-Beuve, it seems, gave to his "continuous and all-engrossing toil"; so, too, it appears, did Mr. Abraham Hayward.

But it is time to retire from Sir Mountstuart E. Grant Duff's assembly. Here and there a character departs prematurely, of whom we would fain have seen more—Faber, for instance, saint and poet. Unquestionably, however, we have enjoyed society that has offered far more than the mere good breeding of wall-flowers. Of a book of mixed essays and speeches this is much to say.

Other New Books.

THE TOUR OF DOCTOR SYNTAX. THE HISTORY OF JOHNNY QUÆ GENUS. THE LIFE OF JOHN MYTTON. ILLUSTRATIONS OF THE BOOK OF JOB. The Illustrated Pocket Library of Plain and Coloured Books. (Methuen. 3s. 6d. to 4s. 6d. net, each volume.)

SUCH a series as is inaugurated by these four volumes may be welcomed without reserve. The books are all well known, were all famous in their day, but in their original forms are now, in most cases at any rate, hardly procurable by the collector of small means. The first two have reproductions of the coloured plates by Rowlandson, the third reproductions of the coloured plates by Henry Alken and J. T. Rawlins, and the last photogravure reproductions of William Blake's inimitable designs. The "Syntax" books are practically all that is remembered of the work of William Combe, and that remembrance is due rather to Rowlandson than to the value of the literary material. Combe suffered from an ineradicable fluency; he rhymed with a wearisome ease. During his life of some eighty years he published eighty-six "works," and of that life forty-three years were passed within the "rules" of the King's Bench debtors' prison. Combe was an adventurer of talent; at one time he kept gorgeous establishments going at popular watering places, then he became a cook, and served as a common soldier. In reading the "Syntax" series it is well to remember these facts. "Nimrod" (Charles James Apperley) is more generally remembered; he hunted, lost money, and had to retire to France. These volumes are faithfully reprinted from the first or best editions, without introductions or notes. We are not sure that the briefest summaries of the lives of the authors and illustrators might not have added value to the series, but as they stand the little volumes are excellent, and the reproductions have been carefully and successfully made.

Nothing further need be said concerning Blake's "Illustrations of the Book of Job." These extraordinary interpretations have already taken their place amongst the finest work of their producer. The reproductions here given are necessarily small, and something is lost in consequence, but it is a good thing to have them available in so handy a form at so low a price.

AN IVORY TRADER IN NORTH KENIA. By A. Arkell-Hardwick. (Longmans. 12s. 6d. net.)

MR. ARKELL-HARDWICK sneers at the florid style of another traveller in East Africa; but we should have been glad had he contrived to make his own method of expression a little more attractive. He pleads the "First Offenders' Act" in extenuation of "the crime of adding to the World's literature"; when he and a companion were bathing, leeches nibbled at "portions of our anatomy"; on another occasion he "vehemently consigned our indiscreet followers to the hottest possible place known to theology." In short, the decorations of Mr. Arkell-Hardwick's style are those of bombastic boyishness. Still, that is a fault forgivable in a man so young as the picture of the author, the frontispiece, shows him to be. The narrative is that of an expedition through Kikuyu to Gallaland. With his two white companions and a company of about a hundred others, Mr. Arkell-Hardwick had many adventures in sport and in battle with native tribes; and the telling of these, although never very vivid, rings invariably true. Two of the tribes with whom the expedition came into contact, the Rendili and the Burkeneji, are almost wholly unknown to Europeans, and the news of them published in this work will be read with interest. The volume contains twenty-three illustrations and a map.

THE NEW NATION. By Percy F. Rowland. (Smith, Elder. 7s. 6d.)

MR. ROWLAND has produced a brisk up-to-date work on Australia from its convict period to Confederation. The general reader who is familiar with the early convict days of the colony, and the political and economic conditions, will turn to the "aspects" of Australian social life, which offer a handle to criticism and a spice to the book. These "aspects" are of class distinction—the Australian artisan, the woman worker, early closing, climate and culture, &c., &c., &c. There is just a little want of humour displayed and sense of proportion in those "aspects"; and the author has described the colony as a sort of Margate—vast and at its worst. In the matter of literature, the Australian imports £500,000 worth of books and magazines, but the terrible indictment is made that the Australian is as ignorant of Shakespeare "as of the works of Ibsen, Maeterlinck, or Brieux."

Mr. Rowland takes up with precision the case for Imperialism and the case for Separation; he would have none of the titled nonentities hitherto thought worthy of the pro-consulship; he would have no Royal family on a Cook's excursion; but he would have Huxleys, John Morleys, Roseberys in the place of "gilded flunkeys." On the other hand, dealing with the case of Separation, he says: "You offer commissions in the Army to colonials, but only to socially ostracize us if we accept; as an independent nation we might rely on a dozen nations; as a part of the British Empire we share Britain's universal unpopularity, and are in danger of being drawn into all her quarrels." The curious view is advanced that climate must for ever remain a foe to Australian culture, so far as culture is dependent upon reading. The true facts of the case are rather that young nations never do develop on artistic lines, but postpone such luxuries to the period which philosophers describe as their decadence.

NEW EDITIONS: The anxiety of certain modern householders to make their surroundings reasonably pleasant is proved by the fact that Messrs. Constable have just issued a second edition, revised and enlarged, of Mrs. C. S. Peel's "The New Home." Mrs. Peel says in a new preface: "It is satisfactory to find that even in the light of the increased experience gained during the last five years, in which time I have rebuilt and redecorated a house of my own, I still feel that with a few exceptions I can approve the suggestions offered in the first edition." Mrs. Peel is, on the whole, a safe guide, though she hardly insists enough upon the simplicity which is the essential of true decoration.—Messrs. Macmillan have added to their "Illustrated Pocket Classics" Maria Edgeworth's "Popular Tales," with an introduction by Mrs. Thackeray Ritchie. The illustrations are by Chris Hammond.—The latest volume in the same firm's three and sixpenny edition of Mr. Thomas Hardy is "Life's Little Ironies."—Messrs. Warne have issued Carey's translation of Dante in a handy form, with paper covers, at the price of one shilling.

Fiction.

Shadowy Psychology.

THE ROMAN ROAD. By Zack. (Constable. 6s.)

THERE WAS a time when Zack seemed set upon a kind of hard realism; in two of the three stories which make up this volume she has abandoned realism for psychology. It is a curious and rather unsatisfactory psychology, neither objective nor subjective, but mingling both to make an impression strong, indeed, but without much real human appeal. Only one character in "The Roman Road" is alive, and that is a minor character. The others stand for types, evolved rather than studied, detached from, rather than linked to, life. We do feel the actuality of the miserable village which makes a sinister background to the story, but we can get no grip of the mother and the two sons who hold its destiny, nor of the girl who is so mechanically employed for the purposes of contrast and a reasonably happy ending. The mother, with her scruples of conscience and her angina pectoris, does not move us, neither does the favourite son who at first elects to keep his brother out of his own. These people are good enough ideas,—they have been used in fiction scores of times and will be used scores of times again,—but the author does not carry us with her. Her comments are on too high a note. When Roland is considering his position we read:—

He looked across the wall towards the rotting village and wished that the foul thing would get swallowed up by the foul marsh into which it gaped. It imaged forth a very smallpox of dishonour, and contact with it set the soul itching to scratch out her own beauty.

That is overdone, almost strident, and certainly strained in expression. The passage might have fallen into place if the man Roland lived for us, but he does not: he exists, indeed, merely as a stalking-horse for clever and often bitter comment. Much of the work in the story is technically excellent, and it is charged with the writer's personality, but as art related to life it fails.

The second story, called "The Balance," is even more remote: frankly treated as allegory it would have been more effective. Richard East—one of the unhappy, stained, victorious writer types dear to fiction—is, again, merely an idea. Once he touches us (in his nursing of the dying child), but even there the borders of true sentiment are almost overpassed; the child is as unreal as Dickens's sick children in his worst moods. And just where some touch of realism might have saved Richard from being a shadow we find only generalisations. The lurid evil which overhangs the man like a cloud is too phantasmal to stir the emotions, and as a consequence his relations with the woman of the story leave us unmoved. The dialogue in both these stories draws nothing from nature; it is rhetorical, hard, bitter, clever, but never instinct with human modulations.

Yet "The Roman Road" is a book that dwells in the memory by reason of its unquestionable cleverness and moral earnestness. The writer's attitude towards life would be difficult to define—perhaps it is mainly rebellious, with a reaching out after beauty and an acute, though rather narrow, understanding of it. There is no broad outlook, no appreciation of the human comedy, no quiet contemplation of a world which, after all, is not without exquisite compensations and strengthening silences. The concluding story, which deals with children, seems to us to suffer from the same faults; it has imagination and strength, but neither joy nor tenderness. At the same time we believe that Miss Keats is a real and a sincere artist. Let her cease to evolve and begin to observe, let her cease to worry and begin to contemplate, and we have faith that an actual book would result. The author's equipment is far beyond the average; it only needs direction and a careful pruning.

KNITTERS IN THE SUN. By Algernon Gissing. (Chatto and Windus. 6s.)

MR. GISSING has undoubtedly written more successful books. "Knitters in the Sun" suggests a story of which the author himself had rather an ineffectual weakly hold. The entire intention of the subject seems to slither insecurely out of grasp. The plot may be in some measure responsible for this, as it is both slight and a little fantastic. But the principal cause of the general vagueness certainly lies in the character drawing. None of the people in Mr. Gissing's book clearly demonstrate why attention should be drawn to them. They offer no excuse either in themselves or in their actions for taking up so many pages. Even their dullness suggests rather uncertainty of handling than any actual quality of temperament.

In the beginning of the book a young squire, Mr. Osborne, said to be of an idealistic disposition, is deeply in love with a labourer's daughter. The father of the girl has just been killed by the fall of a hayrick, but the latter refuses absolutely to marry the young squire. She takes a poacher's daughter to live with her, and the man shortly afterwards becomes infatuated with this other village beauty. They run away to get married, and the rest of the book is taken up with the unexplained and mysterious hysteria of the wife. She dies in the end of an accident, and when the husband has once more been refused by the woman he first wanted, the book terminates. To put vitality into so slender a subject required characters drawn from the very quick of actual life. But the two girls round whom everything revolves are purely fanciful conceptions. Neither for a moment suggests the peasant class, while the unhappiness of Zillah, the wife, through its total want of any comprehensible cause, has no effect upon the reader except that of bewilderment.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE SHADOW ON THE QUARTERDECK. By W. P. DEURY.

A naval story by the author of "Bearer of the Burden." The plot turns upon a murder which is witnessed by a schoolboy who is preparing for Sandhurst. When, as Major Warrender, he is unjustly court-martialed by his commanding officer for insubordination, he recognises the murderer in his accuser. The story contains both love and active service. It is long and somewhat deliberate. (Chapman and Hall. 3s. 6d.)

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS. By ERSKINE CHILDERS.

"A record of secret service recently achieved, with two maps and two charts," by the author of "In the Ranks of the C.I.V." The maps are unexpectedly authentic, presenting merely the Dutch and German coasts of the North Sea. The story deals with the discovery, by two young men on a summer holiday, of a German scheme for invading England, and the moral of the book is the need for increased national defence. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

THE RED TRIANGLE. By ARTHUR MORRISON.

"Some further chronicles of Martin Hewitt: Investigator." The volume contains six characteristic detective stories linked together by their connection with the "mysterious symbol" of the red triangle. The first story is entitled "The Affair of Samuel's Diamonds," and the last "The Adventure of Channel Marsh." (Nash. 6s.)

SIR ANTHONY AND THE EWE LAMB.

By the anonymous author of "Lady Beatrix and the Forbidden Man," and like its predecessor, a vivacious story of modern society. It opens in a ball-room, where Sir Anthony, "settling his eyeglass more firmly into his eye," inquired who was the little girl in the blue frock. The scene changes to a country house and then to London. The story is told in brightly-written dialogue. (Harpers. 3s. 6d.)

PEOPLE OF THE WHIRLPOOL.

"From the experience book of a Commuter's Wife." A journal of American social and domestic life, written by a lady who is the mother of twins, and whose husband's trade, "though pretty, is too open and above-board to be a well-paying one." The title comes from the word Manhattans—literally "people of the whirlpool"—by which the aboriginal inhabitants of New Amsterdam and York were described by their Long Island neighbours. There are eight illustrations. (Macmillan. 6s.)

THE SPORT OF CHANCE. By T. W. SPEIGHT.

This story deals with the adventures of three young women whom we first meet on the deck of an Australian liner bound for London; and two of whom, before landing, agree upon an exchange of identity. The millionaire's daughter takes a room in Camden Town and attempts to earn her own living and to gain a knowledge of the lives of the poor, while her impecunious friend impersonates the heiress among her English relatives. Their subsequent adventures extend over a year and culminate in weddings. (Digby, Long. 6s.)

We have also received: "The House on the Hudson," by Francis Powell (Harpers); "From Crown to Cross," by Lucas Cleeve (Hurst and Blackett); "The Spy Company," by Archibald Gunter (Ward, Lock); "The Strange Adventures of a Magistrate," by T. R. Threlfall (Everett); "Clerical Love Stories," by A. B. Cooper (Isbister); "His Eligible Grace The Duke," by Arabella Kenealy (Digby, Long); "A Commonplace Story," by Clark Stephens (Drane); "Doctor John," by M. Portsmouth (Drane); "The Pride of Nancy Terry," by Kitty Jackson (Drane).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
Quarterly	5/0
Price for one issue	/5

The Detachment of Maurice Maeterlinck.

A FEW years ago an excrescence of individual criticism became in this island, as usual, a catchword. This catchword was "The Belgian Shakespeare." Very soon, however, the phrase passed into a sneer. The articulate medium of English thought—the man in the omnibus—had found time to glance through two or three of the earlier plays of Maurice Maeterlinck. The old catchword could not be applied to the creator of these shadowy, haunting figures, menaced perpetually by death even in the twilight of life. Still a phrase, a label, was obviously necessary, and it was soon found in the word "marionettes." Of course that was it—marionettes. To think of the foreign audacity of comparing this puppet-puller with our Shakespeare! The man in the omnibus having put Maeterlinck in his place decided to leave him there.

A little later his first cousin across the Atlantic, more articulate, more truculent even than himself, found another weak spot in this extraordinary dramatist and laughed the old robust laughter of our race which, incidentally, is not at all the Homeric laughter of the elder gods. The cause of this ridicule was Maeterlinck's habit of repeating very simple phrases over and over again. It is worth while mentioning these two little points because Maeterlinck himself has dwelt upon them in his later work. But before attempting to gauge the Belgian's actual significance in modern Europe, it is necessary to glance back at two or three other phases of artistic development, particularly at the more recent development of the drama. For it is in the gradual evolution of the drama that the very essence of Maeterlinck's philosophy will probably find its ultimate expression.

The first night of "Hernani" did not mean very much for the people who had abandoned the traditions of Shakespeare, but the appearance of Dumas fils had a certain obvious emphasis that it was impossible for us to miss. Dumas fils meant for us modernity, meant for us the breaking away from the robust school of Dumas père, and the substitution for the pseudo-heroic pictures, of Parisian cameos, dazzling in the clean-cut hardness of their workmanship.

Another obvious influence—we are speaking here only of those who are acknowledged by the man in the omnibus—was that of Ibsen. Here, again, the inexorable label was found necessary and the masterpieces of Ibsen were termed "problem-plays." Now, in one of the most mordantly personal open letters that was ever penned by a human being, Dumas fils has categorically laid down the precise motives by which he is actuated as a dramatist. For him the stage is a tribunal of appeal from the common verdict that had done so much to warp his own life. Dumas says: These definite, concrete evils exist, let public opinion put them right; it is possible because the evil is mainly in the wrong-headedness of society. Ibsen at no time of his life held any such brief as this. Far from having developed the genuine "problem-play" of Dumas, he seems to us to be the very antithesis of the French dramatist both in treatment and in conception of life. Dumas has his roots in Rousseauism and aims at redemption. Ibsen reverts to the old fatality under a new name—heredity, from which there is no redemption possible. Dumas leads up to a decision, Ibsen closes with a question. Compare, for example, "La Femme de Claude" with "A Doll's House." The Frenchman's verdict rings out like a pistol-shot in one word—work. But the enigma of the Norwegian is solved by no formula whatever. The fact is, Dumas commenced a phase of work which is being continued with national gaiety by the author of "Les Deux Écoles," and with deadly earnestness by Brieux. But Ibsen has nothing whatever to do with any of them. He has no message for the London County Council, he is not dealing with their problems, he is dealing with life. And because he is dealing with life he is a groper after the dim, half-divined truth, and not an expounder of facile riddles. He does not lead up to any author, and yet after a fashion he suggests a turning-point in the evolution of the drama at which Maeterlinck aims. Ibsen has this much in common with Dumas, he wishes to clear the air of lies. Maeterlinck has this much in common with Ibsen, his supreme aim is to explore the recesses of the human soul. But if Ibsen is considered the mere reviver of the old problem-play, this similarity will hardly explain the infinitely more shadowy and elusive Belgian poet. A rational attempt at explanation is to be found in a little volume, "Thoughts from Maeterlinck," admirably chosen and arranged by E. S. S. (Allen). This book gives us a series of extracts from his works interpreting his thoughts upon the deepest issues of life and destiny, and from its perusal it becomes clear that it is impossible to classify Maeterlinck, or to restrict him by a label to any niche or corner of human criticism.

We commenced by alluding to his dramatic work, and we shall revert to it in spite of the fact that the selections from the plays are in the minority in this volume. To begin with, Maeterlinck rebels against the idea of external fatality as a motif in drama, even the fatality of heredity, so terrible in Ibsen, even the menacing shadow of death which hovered ever about his own early creations. "Real fatality," he says in "Wisdom and Destiny," "exists only in certain external disasters—as disease, accident, the sudden death of those we love; but inner fatality there is none." And in this differentiation, not only of the external from the inner life, but even of the external from the inner fatality, we find the clue to much that has roused the prejudice of Anglo-Saxon readers. It explains those shadowy, evasive beings who, although no longer oppressed by the awe of impending doom, yet are most articulate in their silence, and whom action, in the ordinary sense, disturbs rather than reveals. It explains the haunting repetition of simple phrases, the habit of peasants, which, for that very reason, Maeterlinck adopts as the simplest and most natural form of expression. It explains why it is that the Princess Maleine has in her veins a vitality none the less real because it is not of the circle from which Maeterlinck would lure us. It explains how it is that there is a subtle wisdom in the words of Aglavaine which passes beyond the barriers of our calculating morality. It is, perhaps, the very starting point in the new art, the art of detachment from the common violence of life, the art of interpreting the soul through the soul's language of silence.

The old motifs, the pride and lust of kings, are meaningless for Maeterlinck. The practical problem of sociology, the dénouement of which is to establish or refute a previous verdict, has no place in this new art. It is an art neither of violence nor rhetoric. "For, in truth," as he says in "The Modern Drama," "the farther we go into the consciousness of man, the less struggle do we find." And again, in "The Treasure of the Humble," "And indeed the only words that count in the play are those that at first seemed useless, for it is therein that the essence lies."

Much has been said about the symbolism of Maeterlinck, and there has been much more or less rabid invective against symbolism, as though words themselves are not symbols, and painfully inadequate ones, as most of us at one time discover. This is what he says himself on the subject: "Je ne crois pas que l'œuvre puisse naître viablement du symbole, mais le symbole naît toujours de l'œuvre, si celle-ci est viable." Again, "Pour lui," writes M. Georges Leneveu in his study of Maeterlinck, "le symbole est la fleur de vitalité du poème. Si le symbole est très haut, c'est que l'œuvre est humaine." But perhaps the following little extract will best suggest to the general reader the very core of Maeterlinck's philosophy, the actual pivot upon the truth or falsehood of which depends the scientific value of his theory of dramatic art as opposed to the glamour of his dreams:—

Savez-vous bien—et c'est une vérité inquiétante et étrange—savez-vous bien que si vous n'êtes pas bon, il est plus que probable que votre présence le proclame aujourd'hui cent fois plus clairement qu'elle ne l'eût fait il y a deux ou trois siècles?

In this passage from "The Treasure of the Humble," we read the secret of an art which is one of divination rather than narration, of reflection rather than action, of slow growth rather than swift development. Live your external life, Maeterlinck would say to us, but remain master of your inner life through which alone the soul speaks. And because violence disturbs the inner life by causing every faculty to be concentrated upon some external object, drama in the old sense, the drama, that is to say, of the intellect, can never interpret the hidden message which, he would tell us, is waiting for all. So much we may learn from him explicitly, but there is much in Maurice Maeterlinck that will not pass into the formulæ of sentences, much that can only be half divined, for, as he has said: "Des que nous exprimons quelque chose, nous le diminuons étrangement."

It is strange how the whisper of this poet penetrates through the roar of alien voices. Strange how this haunting suggestion of an art which seeks to interpret the nuances of the soul persists in the very teeth of M. Rostand's gospel of the panache. Strange that the "Treasure of the Humble" should endure beside the distorted Nietzscheism of Maxim Gorky. Strange that the shadow of "Monna Vanna" should challenge the flame of "La Gioconda." Detached from the common view of life, remote from the common pursuits of men, Maurice Maeterlinck is yet no mere visionary, but rather one who would call us to the recognition of a higher reality, of which each has some dim foreboding, a half fear even, as of something caught and lost in a dream. For the author of "The Treasure of the Humble" aims at nothing which is to be exclusive or exotic. His very detachment from ordinary opinion is caused by his being nearer to the great central truth from which an inquisitive intelligence would lead men astray to side issues:—

It happens somewhat with the thoughts of men as with a fountain; for it is only because the water has been imprisoned and escapes through a narrow opening that it soars so proudly into the air. As it issues from the opening and hurls itself towards the sky, it would seem to despise the great, illimitable, motionless lake that stretches out far beneath it. And yet, say what one will, it is the lake that is right. For all its apparent motionlessness, for all its silence, it is tranquilly accomplishing the immense and normal task of the most important element of our globe; and the jet of water is merely a curious incident, which soon returns into the universal scheme.

For Maeterlinck the lake is the species, and it is from the species and not from any abnormal individuality that he seeks to learn the mysterious and yet simple secret of the soul. Heedless of praise or blame, he, too, is tranquilly accomplishing his task of interpreting those higher degrees of consciousness through which the race may yet arrive at an ampler field of perception, a deeper and truer reading of the mystery of being.

The Violin in Climax.

AMATI, Stradivarius, and Guarnerius should have lived to see this day. They made instruments of "wailful sweetness" which the age of science cannot approach, but we have their reward. It must be accepted that never, in the history of the violin, have there been so many great wielders of the bow as to-day. The claim is easily justified. A century ago, when Beethoven was alive—and it seems almost a myth that men like us could claim that giant as a contemporary—such works as the "Kreutzer" sonata might be well enough rendered at a concert; but the solo violinist would thereafter proceed to show what he could do on one string or with two fingers, or, for aught we know, his toes; whereat our great grandfathers applauded. Time was when Paganini was a hero; to his ashes peace. Then, indeed, rose Joachim, the master who played sixty years ago in London. And to his side there came a woman, Madame Norman-Neruda, known to our generation as Lady Hallé. These remained; and to them was added a Belgian professor called Ysaye. These three remained, and to them came a young German called Kreisler; and to these four, the other day, an English girl called Marie Hall. And within the last few months and days all these five great artists have been heard in London; Dr. Joachim and Lady Hallé of the older generation, Mons. Ysaye intermediate, Herr Kreisler and Miss Hall with who knows what possibilities before them. From our list we omit—not through a mnemonic failure—the names of Kubelik and Sarasate. Add them, if you will, and make the sacred number. We hardly place them with the five first-named. Señor Sarasate has a power and tone at the top of the finger-board which we never heard equalled. Herr Kubelik is more, we must suppose, than even a Paganini redivivus. We believe that no one else has ever double-stopped on harmonics as he has; sounded simultaneously, that is to say, on two strings, two overtones produced by so gently bowing them that they vibrate only in segments of their length. We grant the astounding technique of these players, yet we would adhere to the five who have recently been amongst us as artists of a higher order, who constitute, in their number, a justification for our belief that the violin is in climax; that those old Italian artificers have yet their "wages of going on and not to die."

And here a word in defence. We would not appear to glorify the executive and interpretative artist beyond the creator. We believe that we go to hear Bach played by Kreisler rather than to hear Kreisler play Bach. Now that three unequalled performances of Wagner's trilogy have been succeeded by our first Beethoven festival, it would be effrontery to write of the executant as if he were the composer, of the means as if it were the cause. And our adherence to these five players is not finally determined by their skill: else we would make them seven. We laud them because they scorn the gallery and, with rare and doubtful exceptions, ever regard themselves as guardians of a trust, and their neuro-muscular skill as no end in itself. It is because they play Beethoven and not Paganini, Bach and not themselves, that we would further consider them. One beautiful work of Dr. Joachim's we indeed know, and some work of Mons. Ysaye, but, generally speaking, these artists know that the creation has been already done; that for them remains interpretation. Glory enough, listening we feel.

So it may be asked whether the violin is in climax—whether violin-playing too comes within the scope of evolution—in that Miss Hall reaches higher than Lady Hallé, or Kreisler than Joachim. We do not find this so. Their common presence to-day is proof of progress, were progress not a priori postulated. But amongst themselves we do not see it proved. The time is too short, or the older artists are consummate, or we are wrong; but we believe Dr. Joachim and Lady Hallé equalled only, not surpassed. You may answer that the younger players are young; that in thirty years Miss Hall may reach a higher height. That her acme is not yet we admit; that we may be there when it comes we hope; but that she will ever exceed the power of her Austrian senior we deny. One must not judge by tone. Mere power in this regard is a matter not so much of art as of muscle. The other week, in the last concert of the Joachim Quartet, when the great executant played the greater creator Brahms, his tone was not as it was once. Similarly Miss Hall, a slight girl, has not the tone of Herr Kreisler. The circumference of his biceps is greater than hers. Other things—skill and the violin used—being equal, that is practically the only factor of difference. If comparison there must be—and comparison is not odious if it be for the elucidation of a principle such as that of the upward trend of aesthetics—it must be based not on quantity of muscle, but on quality of art.

But nothing, in the case of these five, is to be gained by comparison—unless, indeed, it were to demonstrate how fatuous and irrelevant is the attempt to put great artists in a string, as who should say, Bradley runs a hundred yards in 9½ seconds, Downer in 10, and Smith or Jones in 10½. You may number “sprinters,” but you can no more number spirit than you can photograph it: nor in either case would it be worth doing; the magic would have fled.

Suffice it to record that the young are true to the ideals of the old. Take Joachim, the senior, and Miss Hall, the junior, of our quintet. Two years ago, at a memorable musical festival in Leeds, “where the choirs come from,” we heard Dr. Joachim play Mozart’s Sonata in A major. Anyone could play the notes: technique is at a discount. Hence only a consummate artist, world-honoured, would dare to play Mozart nowadays; for the public wants something wonderful, and there is nothing wonderful, is there, in a simple thing like that? But Dr. Joachim did play it, to our reverent wonder. And Miss Hall, a modern of the moderns, born since the death of Wagner, and with Paganini cadenzas at her mercy, played it a few days ago. We hope Mozart heard.

Paris Letter.

(From our French Correspondent.)

It is not often that a scientific book may be read with ease, profit, and pleasure by the general reader, and hence the agreeable surprise of M. Metchinkoff’s “Etude sur la Nature Humaine.” It is as easy and pleasant as the illustrious savant’s conversation, with a refreshing naïvete and a large simplicity which are so characteristically Russian. With the help of perfected hygiene, M. Metchinkoff promises us an existence so prolonged that at seventy we may be said to be cutting our wisdom teeth, and fit only then to undertake the solemn responsibilities of public life. After a hundred we shall drop into the quietude of age without any sign of senile degeneration, and somewhere in the middle of the second hundred the instinct of natural death will develop, and, like the patriarchs, we shall gladly accept the rest of death. Such will be the consequences of scientific rectification of the “disharmonies of the nature of man.” Disease will be banished along with inherited blemishes, nobody will eat or drink too much, reason helping to diminish the part our evil qualities have hitherto played. M. Metchinkoff is not at all exclusive in his sources of information, as is proved by his varied selection of quotations. All sorts and conditions of men jostle in these instructive and delightful pages: Byron, Heine, Schopenhauer, Max Nordau, Baudelaire, Plato, Confucius, Lao-Tsen, Buddha, Sanscrit and Hebrew litterateurs, Tolstoy and St. Paul. When we contemplate the general mess of politics it is something to look forward to the advancement of social science which he promises us, when only the aged, who have acquired a large experience and have preserved all their faculties, thanks to the integrity of their physiological condition, will rule in public affairs, and the young, that is all who have not reached seventy or eighty, will be exclusively engaged in finding their feet and learning slowly the ultimate value of common-sense.

I cannot class myself amongst the admirers of Anatole France’s new book, “Histoire Comique.” It has the grace, the wit, and irony which never forsake M. France even when he drops into obscenity. I own I see no justification for such a curious book. When it is gross it is very gross indeed, and the main subject is unpalatable. Of course nothing could leave M. France’s hands without the distinctive qualities that are his—the softened brilliance, the exquisite clarity and precision of touch; the wit, the delicate revelation of his incomparable erudition, the quaint and unapproachable charm; who, for instance, but Anatole France, the matchless charmer, could write such pages as the doctor’s dissertation on Time in the actress’s dressing-room? It is a masterpiece intercalated in a book which in itself is far from being a masterpiece. Here we have our France of that gathering of gems, “Le Jardin d’Epicure.” “We say of a thing that it is in the present when we perceive it precisely. We say that it is in the past when we only retain of it an indistinct image. A thing, were it accomplished millions of years ago, if we have received as strong an impression as possible of it, will not be for us a thing past; it will be present to us. The order in which things roll into the abysses of the universe is unknown to us. We only know the order of our perceptions. To believe that the future is not because we do not know it, is to believe that a book is unfinished because we have not finished reading it. . . . We are allowed to say that for us the future is not much more obscure than the past. We know that generations succeed generations in travail, joy, and suffering. I glance beyond the duration of the human race. I see the constellations that seemed immutable slowly change their form in the heavens; I watch the Chariot remove its ancient team, the belt of Orion break, Sirius faint out of view. We know that the sun will rise to-morrow, and that for long still, through heavy clouds or light mist, it will rise every morning. . . . Our knowledge of facts is our unique reason for believing in their reality. We are aware of certain facts to come. We needs then must hold them as real. And if they are real they are realised. Thus your play was played a thousand years ago or half-an-hour ago,” he adds, turning to the playwright on the first representation of his play, “which comes absolutely to the same thing. It is believable that we are all dead this long while past. Think so and you will be tranquil.” This is not precisely the kind of reflections one expects to hear in the green-room, but it is quite conceivable that when M. France is the visitor such things may be said.

When we have taken exception to the trial and condemnation of the heroine of M. Rod’s book, “L’Inutile Effort,” we have exhausted our measure of blame. A Frenchwoman was lately hanged in England for the murder of her child. M. Rod is indignant and cherishes the conviction that she was innocent, and so he writes a novel that, but for the absurdity of the dénouement, is a sober and mournful study written with all M. Rod’s literary rectitude and perfect sincerity. But he hangs his little milliner without a ghost of evidence, and believes this is English law. Besides, there is no reason on earth why she should have killed her child, even supposing evidence against her. M. Rod's argument is that the British jury is a single concrete animal full of Puritanical prejudices. He allows it no reasoning qualities, no average intelligence. Because an unmarried woman is the mother of a child she is, naturally, in its estimation guilty of the worst. Now the British jury does not expect to find a Lucretia in every milliner. And when it is confronted on all sides with evidence of perfect motherhood, of maternal sacrifice and adoration, of no concealment of the child's illegitimate existence, and sees an honest man ready to adopt it and marry the mother, it does not accept infanticide on no evidence.

H. L.

Impressions.

XXXV.—The Time of Buttercups.

THE roses were out on the cottage walls. They rambled over the warm bricks: and the high box hedge that secluded one of the gardens from the road could not hide the giant poppies that gleamed red behind the green screen. As I passed they flashed back the sunshine in a trail of light. But the roses and poppies were incidental. It was the time of buttercups, meadows of them, stretching from dyke to dyke along the marsh. All the land was yellow, and where it was not yellow it was green, and white—such dazzling whites they were in the sunshine. White were the sails of the toy boats on the river that wound through the marsh; white were the backs of the geese that walked gravely in single file through the buttercups; white was the hawthorn that still lingered; white the garments of the boy cricketers on that first day of June.

The village dozed, and when the treble of the boys' voices was momentarily hushed I heard the lark, and intermittently the decadent cuckoo. But as the day wore on to afternoon, the figures of little girls white-shod, with white stockings encasing their little legs, and dresses yellow like the buttercups, or red like the poppies, began to trail through the hot lanes. They carried garlands, but around the hems of their dresses were buttercups, and strings of buttercups were fastened in their hair. Buttercups, too, powdered the field behind the windmill where the maypole stood, not as high as the mast of a vessel of one hundred tons as in the old days, but quite a proper maypole with coloured ribbons fluttering in the wind. England had not quite forgotten the old days when her heart was merry, and with horn and tabor she brought the hawthorn home at sunrise. The first of June was a little late in the year to gather the hawthorn, and to dance round the maypole, but this was the children's festival, and what is a month in the life of a child? May Monday or Whit Monday, who could not dance to such a tune as "Come, Lasses and Lads," in the time of buttercups and roses, with never a cloud in the sky, all the trees clothed in green, and birds singing. A circle of little boys in smock coats, red beribboned, stood around while the little girls in buttercup yellow and poppy red frocks danced their sun-bonnets off their heads and twined the coloured ribbons about the maypole.

Near by the lightning of yesterday had made a long, clean cut from top to root in an oak tree that had seen centuries of June days, saying as it seared, "Your time has come: another June shall see you leafless"; near by three brisk revivalists had drawn their van covered with warning texts into a field and were even now pitching their tent for the evening service; but such finger-points and hints of the ways of the external world must wait for the passing of the May Queen, chosen just because she was beautiful, and for no other reason. Borne shoulder-high came this garlanded child, buttercups round the hem of her dress, roses in her hair—emblematic of the old world's homage to beauty.

To-morrow we will revert to the grey ways of the world and approve the custom of prizes for good conduct and intellectual industry, but for this day it is different: just beauty and young vigour—each honoured, each borne shoulder high, the prettiest girl and the best boy cricketer on the first of June in the time of buttercups.

Drama.

Benedick and Beatrice.

MISS ELLEN TERRY, weary of being a Viking, has returned, in "Much Ado About Nothing," to one of those great Shakespearean parts in which she long ago established her secure reputation. But that she has not forgotten the renascence of this stage is shown by the fact that in the present revival Mr. Gordon Craig gets, so far as I know, his first opportunity of mounting Shakespeare. To Mr. Craig I will return; when Shakespeare is in the case, it is only decent that the play and the acting should have the first consideration. I will not pretend that, for all her spirit and charm, Miss Terry is quite my ideal Beatrice. I am quite certain that Mr. Oscar Asche is not my ideal Benedick. I cannot conceive of a burly Benedick; and there is more brawn than airiness in Mr. Asche's interpretation of the man. But will any of us ever see our ideal Beatrice and our ideal Benedick? These are parts to tax the most subtle artists under the most perfect conditions. The amazing comedy of the duel of sex, which is "Much Ado About Nothing," is in its essence a duologue. The pair of lovers, whose passion slowly dawns upon us and themselves through their wit, whose souls we overhear while we hear their jesting, should claim our whole attention. When they are on the stage, not a significant gesture, not a revealing intonation, should be missed. The rest of the company should be as silent as the arras in the background, while they stand there, saying what they do not think. Such a suggestion needs only to be made to be refuted. It is not in the English tradition; and the swords of man and woman must continue to be crossed, as best they may, in the rough and tumble of a trivial picture. And could Shakespeare himself, then, get anything better from his mimes? Who was the marvellous boy for whom he wrote Portia and Desdemona and Beatrice, Helena and Cressida, Lady Macbeth and Cleopatra, and then wrote no more? Was it Salathiel Pavy, who played for three years, and for whom "Death's self was sorry"? Literary history will not, I fear, have it so. Was it Mary Fitton, masquing once more, as when she would "tucke vpp her clothes" and slip out "as though she had bene a man" to meet her lover, the Earl of Pembroke? The notion may be commended to the fantastic theorizers about the Sonnets.

"Much Ado About Nothing" is the one of all Shakespeare's comedies which can least of all stand being played the fool with by the actors. It is an extremely difficult play, and unless carefully handled may readily seem at certain points impossible. Shakespeare was attempting the very hazardous technical problem of introducing a subordinate element of tragedy into a comedy. This is, of course, quite different from the opposite device, which he frequently uses, of relieving and enhancing tragedy by scenes of comedy. It carries with it alternative dangers.

If the players are not on their guard, the effect of the contrast may be either that the comedy appears unreal and impertinent, or that the tragedy appears unreal and melodramatic. In "Much Ado About Nothing," however, I do not think that Shakespeare had any choice. He had, somehow, to show the emotional depths that lay behind the brilliant and slightly hard exterior of Beatrice, and to do this is, dramatically, the object of the whole plot against Hero, leading to the tragic repudiation of her in the church by Claudio. It is all in order that Beatrice may be able to say to Benedict, "Kill Claudio!" and, "O God! that I were a man! I would eat his heart in the market-place." And the tragedy of Hero is quite subordinate to the comedy of Beatrice. The critics have exhausted themselves in fruitless efforts to find in the Hero story an end in itself and an illustration of the title of the play. Shakespeare's titles are hardly ever significant, and the proper one for the play is that, which it has in a contemporary account-book, of "Benedicte and Betteris." The way in which the Hero story is kept in subordination is rather interesting. It is only allowed to become vital just at the point where it touches Beatrice and her relations to Benedick. During the rest of the play it is strenuously belittled. The audience are let early into the whole secret. Don John and Borachio are made the most conventional villains possible. Their plot is outwitted by the most foolish of clowns. The rehabilitation of Hero is deliberately artificial. The tragic element has served its limited purpose, and the audience are not to dwell upon it. The difficulty is of course Claudio, whom, frankly, Shakespeare has not succeeded in rendering sympathetic. I cannot imagine why the scene underneath Margaret's window was not brought into the play, instead of being merely narrated. It might easily have been used to apologise for, or at least to explain, Claudio. But probably Shakespeare did not wish to apologise for Claudio, who, like Bertram in "All's Well that Ends Well," belongs to a type for which he had a great contempt. On the other hand, Shakespeare did introduce one scene which is very unjustifiably omitted at the Imperial Theatre. It is the scene in which Hero is robbed for her wedding, and it is important because it brings the two cousins together, and mediates between the Beatrice of the wit-combats and the Beatrice of the church.

What I feel about Mr. Gordon Craig is that he is moving very fast in the direction of compromise. He gives us foot-lights now! and an elaborate trellis-work in the garden-scene, which is a great deal more like the normal pseudo-realistic representation of foliage than I quite like to see. The masked dance in the first act is pretty enough; but it is inevitable to wonder where Leonato got his lime-light effects from. The most successful scene is that in the church. Here the grouping and all the accessories are well designed; and the effect of height is admirably attained by means of long hangings draped in circular folds and painted to suggest pillars.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

France and Her Sculptors.

FRANCE encourages her sculptors: in Paris, and in towns throughout that pleasant land, they are bidden to spur their imaginations, and to mature their skill that France may be glorified, and her splendid past made to minister to her present. Wherever you walk in Paris, the eye is again and again delighted by a vista that opens through wide streets revealing some monument of heroic size, some impression of prancing horses, outstretched wings, and flying figures sounding trumpets in the clear air. France's genius for the architectural prevision sense that relates sweeping topographical improvements one to another, never fails her. When she threw the Alexandre III. bridge across the Seine, and placed dazzling gilt groups on high stone pillars at either end, she knew they would allure the roving eye, and conduct it onward to the sombrous gilt of the Invalides dome: when she built the two Palaces of Art amid the chestnuts of the Champs Elysées on either side of the approach road to the bridge, and placed on them great symbolical groups of stone figures that lean out over Paris proclaiming with flamboyant gestures that here is the art centre of the world, she knew that those heroic stone groups would encourage her sculptors to dare, to penurise themselves in producing year after year those monuments to La Gloire that France loves. And she can do so without fearing that the passion for the Titanesque, for the monument that gives wings to a street, will spoil the taste of her sons. For in the Louvre, in their quiet cool places, stand through all the changes of taste and the wounds of time, those two matchless examples of eternal beauty—the Winged Victory, and the Venus of Milo. With her intense modernity and love of novelty, France keeps her reverence for the old. The gilt figures on the Alexandre III. bridge flash readily at the spectator; but the Winged Victory must be sought, not without trouble, in the interminable corridors of the Louvre. You meet her suddenly, flying through the air on that archaic boat—on a staircase—and you know that before you is the most beautiful thing the world has produced.

The French sculptor dares, and his daring is encouraged. Those who have not visited the sculpture garden of the Old Salon can hardly realise the effect of the eight hundred shining white figures and groups when first seen from one of the galleries. The sunshine pours through the great arch of the glass roof, the exhibits stand out proudly in the open, or lurk behind shrubs and trees, and in this large sunny place birds fly and sing. Leaning over the gallery I delight myself with the bright contrast of white marble and green trees, and pick out from the avenues and glades, where the visitors wander, typical examples of the art of sculpture in France in the present year. For daring, for the Frenchman's delight in constructing dithyrambic mementoes, the size of a gasometer, to La Gloire, let me instance M. Ducuing's "La Toulousaine." A peasant woman, quietly knitting, was so filled with patriotic ardour when she heard some passers-by singing "O moun pays! O Touloso!" that she threw down her work, and rushing out joined in the chorus. Such was the incident that fired the imagination of the sculptor. On the top of the erection he has placed a life-size figure of the peasant woman still grasping her knitting while she shouts the chorus to the skies, and beneath her—well, not being learned in the history of Toulouse, I transcribe the sculptor's explanation of the jubilant figures that support this plump, patriotic peasant woman: "Le piedestal synthétise le passé glorieux de Toulouse dans la Guerre, la Paix, la Poésie, les Sciences et les Arts." There you have exemplified the spirit, and the leaping ambition of one of the schools of modern French sculpture. Such a monument could not be shown at Burlington House: the doors are not high enough to admit it. The vehement action of "La Toulousaine" is characteristic of much of the sculpture at the Salons. Repose is not the note; even the limbs of the recumbent nudes are turned and twisted into attitudes that recall the writhing arms and legs of the Laocöon group. M. Mengue has certainly given a kind of repose to his "Messaline," but to compensate for this sobriety, he has committed the atrocity of placing her on a carved wooden bed. Among the groups of action I must certainly include the two specimens where lions are the chief performers. In one of them, M. Carvin's "Martyr," the lion, with his claws dug deep into his victim's body, is in the act of making a meal: in the other, a group called "La Fiancée du Lion," we are presented to the lion in love, and the sculptor has been good enough to write a description of the incident on a sheet of carboard, which is propped up against the lion's paws. But one can safely neglect groups of sculpture that require half a page of letterpress to explain them. M. Lambeau gives no explanation of his "Le Faune Mordu." This huddle of limbs is no doubt well devised, and well executed, as is M. Marin's "Danaïdes," a subject that Rodin, one of the few who know, treated as a lyric; but what pleasure is to be derived from a group so ingeniously involved that it takes five minutes to trace the owners of the various limbs? It was quite a relief after this puzzle exercise to sit in a chair and look placidly at M. Hettner's simple figure of a man drawing a bow, and by way of change to gaze upon the rugged head of M. Aronson's "Tolstoy."

M. Houssin's "Le Bateau de Sauvetage" has at least the merit of being plain to the eye at the first glance. Five sailors are running the lifeboat down the beach, and in the distance you see the ship in distress. Where this mammoth wall decoration will find a home, I cannot hazard a guess: nor can I suggest offhand a suitable habitation for M. Noé's "Le Trône des Césars" with a headless body as the main support of the throne; nor for "The Retreat from Moscow" (wolves and all); nor for a representation in relief of a Spanish Bull-fight; nor for a Lourdes paralytic suddenly restored to health; nor for the mouth of a hippopotamus yawning so vigorously that the head of the paralytic could be dropped with ease into the cavity; nor for the miner and the agricultural labourer who have fallen dead by their work. M. Frémiet's colossal statue of Lesseps for Port Said is journalism. The knowledge that he had a market for it must have helped him in his pedestrian task; but M. Frémiet, who is, of course, hors concours, has been so kind as to send only the head of Lesseps to the Salon. At a guess I should say it is about a yard high.

As with the pictures, the good work in the sculpture building must be sought; but it is there. I liked the severity of M. Houdain's group of three navvies bearing on a lever, the pathos of M. Breton's "Eurydice," and M. Guilloux's "Baiser Mortel," one of those piteous groups that gain in emotion from the very hardness and whiteness of the marble—ideas that the Teuton makes hopelessly sentimental, but to which the Gaul gives that sense of tears in human things that quite disturbs the Teuton's equanimity.

There is no Rodin in the little garden of the New Salon where last year his Shades gave distinction to the few picked monuments that stand in the open air. But I could not pass Madame Warrick's realistic Impenitent Thief—and, for the rest, I remember a little statuette, extraordinary clever, of Frémiet in a silk hat and carrying an umbrella; and the figure of a young girl, slim, very modern, lying dead, saying, I think, "I am at peace."

Although Rodin does not exhibit, his influence persists, and at that moment he was in London sending those who care for such things to the Burlington Fine Arts Club, where a remarkable loan collection of Greek sculpture and antiquities has been gathered together. It was the head of Aphrodite by Praxiteles lent by Lord Leconfield that was arousing M. Rodin's enthusiasm, and he was saying: "It is life itself. It embodies all that is beautiful. It is beauty itself. Those parted lips!" C. L. H.

Science.

The Evolution of Sense.

THE curious sense of internal sinking which followed my perception of the fact that the printer had credited me last week with the use of the word "unethical," set me a-thinking of the Evolution of Sense. The amoeba is a relation of mine and is endowed with sensation; but, were he to crawl over that horrid hybrid, the substitution of one initial vowel for another would cause him little or no perturbation. His sensory powers would possibly acquaint him of the nutritious iron in the ink wherewith the word is printed, but that would be all. Similarly the amoeba may well be dimly aware of the aerial vibration which we term sound, but he is appreciably removed from the opera-goer who thrills at the ecstatic agony of Isolde's "Liebested," and still further from the sensory development of the genius who conceived that deathless song. Sensation, indeed, has travelled far in its development from the mere reaction to external stimuli, exhibited by the amoeba or the microbe, up to the literary sense, or the "sense of the fitness of things," or the "moral sense," or any of those precious potentialities of the true sense of beauty which constitute the subject-matter of the science of Aesthetics.

Goethe has told us—if I remember aright—that there is no essential distinction between two lovers who rush into one another's arms and an atom of carbon that grapples to itself with the hooks of chemical affinity an atom of oxygen wherewith to form carbonic oxide. But we may leave this analogy or possible identity for the nonce, and consider sensation, or the power of appreciating external forces, as we find it in the lowest forms of life. I will take, instead of an amoeba, a white blood-cell or leucocyte, which is hardly distinguishable from an amoeba. If, under the microscope, you watch a leucocyte in a drop of blood making play with a microbe, you have an opportunity of studying the simplest form of sensation. It is partly physical, partly chemical; and therefore may be compared to a sort of compound of touch and smell. The force which determines what will happen in such a duel has been called chemotaxis. If immunity has been established by some method or another; if, for instance, the patient from whom your drop of blood has been obtained is recovering, the leucocyte's sensation is described as a state of "positive chemotaxis." Not only is he aware of the presence of the microbe, but he responds by attacking, enveloping, digesting and thus disposing of it. If, on the other hand, the patient is having the worst of the battle, the leucocyte is aware of the microbe indeed, but is repelled rather than attracted; the condition being known as one of "negative chemotaxis." In other cases a leucocyte may approach a microbe, having become conscious of its presence by this rudimentary physico-chemical sense, but may then discover that its foeman is more than worthy of its steel, and will retire—with inaudible apologies. It is said that, in such a case, the leucocyte may return later, with a couple of friends, and engineer a tripartite attack—but this I have not seen.

Now, the leucocyte or the amoeba being unicellular is complete in himself. He is all sensory, as he is all motor and all digestive and all reproductive. But in multi-cellular organisms, such as we become, a division of labour is effected. Certain cells become segregated for the sensory functions of the organism; and these are naturally the superficial or external cells. Very low in the animal scale we find a definite division of the body cells into external and internal. The former are known as the epiblast, the latter as the hypoblast. Between the two there appears, in slightly higher forms, a collection of cells called the mesoblast, from which our bones and muscles, for instance, are developed. But I want especially to consider the epiblast, which is by far the most interesting of the three. Being external, it is, of course, the layer that assumes sensory functions. Its powers are very limited in the simple animals, being hardly more differentiated, indeed, than are those of the amoeba or the white cell of the blood of higher animals. But if we pass to such an animal—and we may consider man himself—we are not surprised to find that the epiblast or external layer of cells of the human embryo forms, amongst other things, the skin. The cells of the skin are, of course, the most external, and could not be developed from either of the other two primitive layers. And, of course, the skin, like the epiblast from which it is developed, and like the epiblastic layer of the adult forms of simpler animals, is a sensitive structure. The sense of touch, the sense of pain, the sense of temperature all find in the skin their means of receiving external stimuli. Than this chapter in the embryology and evolution of sense nothing could be more natural.

But if we observe the embryo at a very early stage of its development, we find upon its surface a longitudinal ridge where the epiblastic cells become especially numerous. This ridge becomes a groove, and by a process of infolding of this groove—which two simple diagrams would make obvious, but which it is difficult to describe in words—certain of the cells of the epiblast lose their original external position and sink into the substance of the embryo, so that some of the cells of the mesoblast or middle layer come to separate these particular epiblastic cells from their fellows which remain on the surface. These buried cells, for whom is an incomparable destiny, are called the neural or nerve-epiblast, for from them are formed the brain and the entire nervous system of man, from them is developed the grey matter of the surface of that brain, and in it is manifested consciousness, which makes possible all other phenomena, religion, science, history, art and thought.

Now the significant thing is this: that the entire nervous system is developed, so to speak, from the skin. Its cells are originally superficial and external, but are withdrawn from the surface to the centre of the organism. In the case of an animal that has no nervous system proper, the external surface—its “skin”—is the sensitive portion; is, indeed, its nervous system. The higher animal, very early in its history, withdraws part of its primitive skin, encloses and protects this part in the skull and spinal column (developed from the mesoblast), and is enabled to develop it to a degree previously unattainable and barely—even by its possessors—conceivable.

Now we have gone so far as to consider the original epiblast divided into two portions, the cutaneous epiblast which remains external, and the nerve-epiblast which has passed inwards. This nerve epiblast is essentially sensory, as is the cutaneous epiblast from which it has parted company. But if it is sensory it must needs re-establish communication with the surface of the body, where stimuli are received. A vision-centre in the brain is of no value unless there be eyes at the surface. So by an extremely complex series of processes the neural epiblast contrives to send back emissaries or nerves to the surface whence it came; and upon the ends of these nerves, which are in themselves useless, are formed “end-organs.” Such end-organs are the eye, the ear, the olfactory mucous membrane in the nose, the taste-bulbs on the tongue, and the touch-bulbs in the skin. The entire apparatus is formed of nothing but epiblast—of nothing but the original external layer of the embryo. I cannot insist too much upon this fact, for its significance is extreme. The manner in which the reunion between the nerve-epiblast and the cutaneous epiblast is effected varies within wide limits. In the case of the eye, for instance, the systematic zoologist will tell you that one of the features which distinguish the vertebrates from the invertebrates is that in the latter the essential parts of the eye are formed from the skin, to which the brain—or developing nerve-epiblast—merely sends forth the optic nerve; whereas, in the vertebrates, whose eye is a much more highly developed organ, the cutaneous epiblast contributes hardly more than the covering of the eyelids, whilst the brain itself develops a special bulb-like portion which it advances upon a stalk—the bulb becoming the eye, and the stalk the optic nerve.

The entire nervous system is thus primarily a receiving apparatus, a means of sensation; developed, indeed, from the very surface of the body. As it exists in the developed human frame it constitutes the supreme object of scientific study. The tendency to glorify one branch of science at the expense of another is on the high way to specialism in the worst sense of the term, and ends in unenlightened fanaticism; but it is permissible to assert that the study of the human nervous system—call it neurology, psychology, “cerebral biology” with Comte, or by whatever name you please—has a fascination and a value that are transcendent. For in consciousness, the root-problem of psychology, and in the nervous apparatus of which consciousness is the chief function, are the possibility of any knowledge whatsoever, are the roots of the science of logic, which is our indispensable instrument of thought, and are the foundations of the two highest sciences of all, those twins of so deep a mutual indebtedness, Aesthetics and Ethics. The sun is indeed the glory of the heavens, and the source of all life upon our globe, yet psychology studies that which is even greater; for when the Beautiful and the Good are met in a heroic soul, there, in Emerson’s inspired phrase, is “a man to make the Sun forgotten.”

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

“Science and Philosophy.”

SIR,—To have been the occasion of Mr. Saleeby’s deeply interesting and illuminative dissertation on “Science and Philosophy” should sufficiently excuse whatsoever presumption be laid to my charge therein. Yet I would ask your further indulgence, in order to assure Mr. Saleeby that he has been misled by my inept quotation from Emerson—an unlucky interpolation which I need not stop to explain, but for which I humbly apologise: that, thus, nothing was or could be further from my intent, than to “call in question Locke’s famous discovery,” and title to “father of modern psychology”: that, indeed, I only share Mr. Saleeby’s allegiance to the “sanest of philosophers”—even as to “the boundaries between faith and reason,” but likewise his avowed obligations to Lewes: and, lastly, that the main purpose of my letter was but to point out the apparent illogicality—in adducing any one man’s philosophy in refutation of another’s while at the same time proclaiming all knowledge to be mere matter of personal faith—that “Each of us has his own philosophy, therefore: nor do we question your right to yours”!

As a sincere and grateful admirer of Mr. Saleeby’s lucidity in the obscure pathways of Science, I ventured to solicit, and hoped to receive, his philosophical assistance in this, to me, metaphysical “cul-de-sac”—he will recognise the helpful distinction of terms, which he does not, however, himself appear to have adopted from Lewes; but alas! in this particular predicament Mr. Saleeby would seem to pass by—declining the office of good Samaritan to the lame and halting intelligence of—Yours, &c.,

A. J. E.

A Forgotten Philosophy.

SIR,—In the latest of his astute and engaging essays your contributor, Mr. Saleeby, makes out a case for G. H. Lewes’s dogma that philosophy is impracticable. I quite understand what this means: merely that there is no system of philosophy absolutely convincing in the exact sense in which, for example, the Multiplication Table is. Well, I should much like to know whether Mr. Saleeby, who, it is obvious, is equipped by scholarship as well as by natural aptitude to treat the subject, has included in his study a work called “The A Priori Argument for the Necessary Existence of God,” by William Honeyman Gillespie? This book, published early in last century, seems to be almost wholly unknown. It came into my own hands quite accidentally in a remote part of Scotland some years ago. If Mr. Saleeby has seen it, might not he devote a paper to its examination? Mr. Gillespie attempted the task which is nowadays generally declared impossible of achievement, and his argument had extraordinary ingenuity.—Yours, &c., J. M. S. M.

The "Marriage" of Mazarin.

SIR,—The myth of the Mazarin marriage dies hard. Mr. Hassall is its latest sponsor in the attractive sketch of the Cardinal's career with which he has enriched the "Foreign Statesmen" series, commented upon in the ACADEMY of 30 May; and your reviewer accepts the story, as, indeed, did Mr. Hilaire Belloc when writing on the same volume a short time ago.

The basis of the myth is an indubitable mistake. "Being only in deacon's orders," says Mr. Hassall, "Mazarin, although a cardinal, could lawfully marry." Possible unfamiliarity with Catholic practice has here certainly misled the author. Inability as to the contraction of wedlock commences for the Catholic ecclesiastic, not even with the diaconate, but with its preceding step—the subdiaconate. But there is very strong evidence that Mazarin was more than a deacon. He was a priest. This is clear from the statement in the well-known folio of Ciacconius, a work whose authority is accepted, I believe, by every scholar. The entry respecting Richelieu's successor runs thus:—

"Tot divitiis Regum Galliarum munificencia collectis, ex hac vita abiit Julius Mazarinus, qui renuntiatus Cardinalis Gallie, ac Regis amatissimus nunquam Urbem invisit, quare licet Presbyteris Cardinalibus adscriptus, titulum non habuit."
—Vitæ et Res Gestæ Pontificum Romanorum et S.R.E. Cardinalium, t. iv. 615 D. Romæ, MDCLXXVII.

Even more conclusive is Mazarin's own deed. He administered the Sacrament of Extreme Unction to his dying niece, the Duchesse de Mercœur, the lady of whom we read in the pages of Madame de Motteville. This he could not have done had he not been a priest. Now, the testimony of the Abbé de Cosnac, afterwards Archbishop of Aix, who also visited the dying girl, is distinct. In his memoirs he writes:—

"Le soir, les médecins commencerent à changer de ton, ils dirent qu'il falloir lui donner l'extrême onction. M. le Cardinal lui vint donner ce sacrement."—Mémoires de Daniel de Cosnac, i, 254. Paris: Société de l'Histoire de France.

Surely the time has come when this useless and baseless myth might, in the phrase of Carlyle, have "wise oblivion"—earth and a quiet burial.—Yours, &c.,

St. Charles's College, WALTER SYLVESTER.
St. Charles's Square, London, W.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 193 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the three most pregnant and felicitous sentences selected from any authors. Our competitors have not been very happy in their selections, and the range is curiously limited. We award the prize to Mrs. Arthur Lloyd Sturge, Dolobran, Chislehurst, for the following set:—

Fancy plays like a squirrel in its circular prison, and is happy; but imagination is a pilgrim on the earth—and her home is in heaven. —Ruskin.

Discouragement is but disenchanted egotism. —Mazzini.

The true wisdom is to be always seasonable, and to change with a good grace in changing circumstances. To love playthings well as a child, to lead an adventurous and honourable youth, and to settle when the time arrives into a green and smiling age, is to be a good artist in life and deserve well of yourself and your neighbour. —R. L. Stevenson.

Other replies follow:—

The principle of the Gothic architecture is infinity made imaginable.

—Coleridge.

On the one hand, all aristocracy is wrong which is inconsistent with numbers; and, on the other, all numbers are wrong which are inconsistent with breeding.

—Ruskin.

Take my word for this, reader, and say a fool told it you, if you please, that he who hath not a dram of folly in his mixture, hath pounds of much worse matter in his composition.

—Charles Lamb.

[G. W. L., Great Grimsby.]

The men appeal to the auditors, whether the arguments are not such that none but an idiot or an hireling could resist, is an effective substitute for any argument at all. For mobs have no memories. The passions, like a fused metal, fill up the wide interstices of thought and supply the defective links; and thus incompatible assertions are harmonised by the sensation, without the sense of connection.

—S. T. Coleridge.

There are no fields of Amaranth on this side of the grave; there are no voices, O Rhodopé, that are not soon mute, however tuneful; there is no name with whatever emphasis of passionate love repeated, of which the echo is not faint at last.

—W. S. Landor.

Every man has a religious belief peculiar to himself. Smith is always a Smithite. He takes in exactly Smith's-worth of knowledge, Smith's-worth of truth, of beauty, of divinity. And Brown has from time immemorial been trying to burn him, to excommunicate him, to anonymous-article him, because he did not take in Brown's-worth of knowledge, truth, beauty, divinity. He cannot do it. Iron is essentially the same everywhere and always; but sulphate of iron is never the same as carbonate of iron. Truth is invariable; but the Smithate of truth must always differ from the Brownate of truth.

—O. W. Holmes.

[R. F. McC., Whitby.]

Give me leave, therefore, without offence, always to live and die in this mind: that he is not worthy to live at all that, for fear or danger of death, shunneth his country's service and his own honour, seeing that death is inevitable and the fame of virtue immortal, wherefore in this behalf mutare vel timere Spero.

—Sir Humfrey Gilbert.

To be honest, to be kind—to earn a little and to spend a little less, to make upon the whole a family happier for his presence, to renounce when that shall be necessary and not be embittered, to keep a few friends, but these without capitulation—above all—on the same grim condition to keep friends with himself—here is a task for all that a man has of fortitude and delicacy.

—R. L. Stevenson.

I learned this, at least, by my experiment, that if one advances confidently in the direction of his dreams, and endeavours to live the life which he has imagined, he will meet with a success unexpected in common hours.

—H. D. Thoreau.

[A. R., Knock, Co. Down.]

Better is an handful with quietness, than two handfuls with labour and striving after wind.

—Ecclesiastes.

L'or est confondu avec la boue pendant la vie des artistes, et la mort les sépare.

—Voltaire.

Overmastering pain—the most deadly and tragical element in life—alas! pain has its way with all of us; it breaks in, a rude visitant, upon the fairy garden where the child wanders in a dream, no less surely than it rules upon the field of battle, or sends the immortal war-god whimpering to his father; and innocence, no more than philosophy, can protect us from its sting.

—R. L. Stevenson.

[P. L. B., Tonbridge.]

A BUYING=MACHINE

It is a law deducible from certain very interesting observations, which are described in this column, that physical action is always the most effective when it is most natural and most simple. So it is also with action other than physical, with economic action. Yet in the process of buying, for instance, our ordinary methods of purchase are very far indeed from being the most natural and the most simple.

The first buying of primitive man was done with labour. But whatever form of labour was his currency, he bought from hand to mouth. If you had told him to save up his labour for months and to bank it in a reservoir of force before he bought his food, he would have answered you that he would starve in the meantime. To-day we do not starve if we hoard shilling by shilling, but we are not following the line of least resistance, we are not economising effort. We are not gaining the use of the product at the moment when we begin to exert our energy and to incur friction by saving the money for its purchase.

Every effort of self-denial or self-control is, economically, a waste. The effort of living for to-morrow which moralists commend is a restraint upon natural forces. And "The Times" system of serial payments, by which the purchaser receives his copy of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" as soon as he begins to pay for it, and has the use of it while he is paying for it, is in accordance with natural law. It is the process which would be followed by a man who was a perfect buying-machine, an engine operating with the utmost efficiency and the least friction.

An Economic Immorality

To-day is the time when the buying-machine can most effectively and economically be set in motion for the purpose of buying the "Encyclopædia Britannica." The price is less to-day than it will be if the purchase is delayed. It is economically immoral, then, not to seize the opportunity, not to use to-day the inquiry form printed on this page, in order to procure the "Encyclopædia Britannica" on easy terms and at half the catalogue price.

The Motor-Power of a Man

Without too great modesty a man may admit to himself that it is possible for him to find valuable examples of conduct outside the human race, and that even so unimaginative a thing as a machine may afford him a hint. And although the palpable purpose of this advertisement is to prove no more than that he should buy the "Encyclopædia Britannica" upon the instant, the argument from mechanics, which is presented in that connection, may not be without its usefulness in respect to other things he has to do. He may place himself, for the moment, upon the level of a machine, without dissatisfaction, when he reflects that he is the best of all machines.

A man of ordinary size and strength, as he paces a path of a hundred feet long, is exerting a power sufficient, if he but sticks at his task, to transport a weight of no less than 1,012,500 tons for that distance.

In not more than three days he would, without undue effort, if his walking were translated into carrying, have conveyed the Edinburgh express train, weighing three hundred tons, from one end to the other of his stretch of path.

Or again, if all the motor-power a man can expect to use were concentrated upon a cricket ball, that cricket ball would travel some hundred and twenty-five million miles—as far as if it reached the Sun and, bounding off it, flew to Mercury.

The reader may be surprised at these statements, for it is only natural that he should forget how wonderful an engine his own skin encases. Habit has dulled his appreciation of commonplace appliances, and it is not surprising that he ceased, when he was short-coated, to wonder at the motion of his hands and feet. Yet if he will turn to a source of information that is certainly accessible enough, the article "Mechanics," in the fifteenth volume of the "Encyclopædia Britannica," he will find on p. 773 an analysis of a man as a machine that not only supports these statements, but is as interesting as any novel he may have laid aside in order to learn something about himself. And as it is probable that he is glancing at this advertisement for the very reason that he does not possess the "Encyclopædia Britannica," he may be glad to find the facts very briefly set forth here.

The Natural Law of the Eight-hour Day

The purely mechanical nature of a man's activity is illustrated by his inability to free himself from the formula that indicates how much time he should spend in receiving, and how much in employing, energy; for he cannot with economy depart to any great extent from the ratio of two hours' intake for one hour's production—in other words, the rule of using one-third of his time in action, the eight-hour day. And, as in the case of any other machine, his efficiency must be gauged, not only by the sum of energy employed but also by the completeness with which the power is transmitted and applied to the work in hand. A man then, as is shown by a table on the page already cited, is at his best, his efficiency is greatest, when he uses his strength without the interposition of any appliance.

Simplest Motions most Effective

And just as his arms and legs show a greater product in proportion to the energy expended than he can develop by using any tool of any sort, so will the most elementary of his motions, walking, transmit more force than any other form of action. If he wants to transport his millions ton weight in a lifetime, the way for him to do it is to walk at a natural pace, some four miles an hour, three hundred days a year for five-and-twenty years—or thirty years, if he is wise enough to work only eight hours a day instead of ten.

The Mechanics of Buying

How is this same law of the economics of force to regulate his course of action when he regards himself as a buying-machine?

Obviously, by his discarding all artifices, going back to nature, as when he walks along the level. What then is the economically mechanical way for a man to buy?

As the opening lines of this advertisement show, the best way is to buy upon the plan arranged by "The Times" for the sale of the "Encyclopædia Britannica"; making serial payments, paying at the effective moment when the price is lowest—in a word, behaving like an absolutely perfect buying-machine. The way to do this is to make use to-day of the inquiry form which appears on this page, and thus to procure without delay full details of the easy payment system and the bargain price which are two salient characteristics of the offer made by "The Times."

The one essential point is that the buying-machine should begin to operate to-day, while the resistance is at its minimum.

WRITE TO-DAY

TO: THE MANAGER, "THE TIMES" Publication Department,
125, High Holborn, London, W.C.

Please send me 220-page illustrated book containing specimen pages of the "Encyclopædia Britannica."

Name _____
(Please write clearly.)

To post this to-day is the mechanically expedient course of action. Address _____
A.C. 61 _____

Rank or Occupation _____

Ah, but a man's reach should exceed his grasp,
Or what's a heaven for?

—R. Browning.

Love, fortune, a venture, wonder—the four winds of desire!
—W. B. Yeats.

I shall know even as also I am known.

—St. Paul.

[M. I. E., Lampeter.]

Idea: do not govern or overthrow the world: the world is governed or overthrown by feelings, to which ideas serve only as guides.

—Herbert Spencer.

I blame equally those who take sides for praising man, those who are for blaming him and those who amuse themselves with him; the only wise part is search for truth—search with many sighs.

—Pascal.

Great thoughts come from the heart

—Vauvenargues.

[C. O. V., Norwood.]

It is good we return unto the ancient bounds of unity in the church of God; which was, one faith, one baptism; and not one hierarchy, one discipline; and that we observe the league of Christians, as it is penned by our Saviour; which is in substance of doctrine this: "He that is not with us, is against us"; but in things indifferent, and but of circumstance, this:
"He that is not against us, is with us."

—Bacon.

We carry with us the wonders we seek without us: there is all Africa and her prodigies in us; we are that bold and adventurous piece of Nature, which he that studies wisely learns in a compendium what others labour at in a divided piece and endless volume.

—Sir Thomas Browne.

Nothing but the infinite pity is sufficient for the infinite pathos of human life.

—J. H. Shorthouse.

[W. A. L., Blackheath.]

When a man has lived to a fair age, he bears his marks of service. He may have never been remarked upon the breach at the head of the army; at least he shall have lost his teeth on the camp bread.

—Stevenson.

They also serve who only stand and wait.

—Milton.

C'est la force et le droit qui règlent toutes choses dans le monde; la force en attendant le droit.

—Joubert.

[R. W., Sutton.]

There are many matters in which one may waylay Destiny, and bid him stand and deliver.

—R. L. Stevenson.

The service of philosophy, and of religion and culture as well, to the human spirit, is to startle it into a sharp and eager observation.

—Walter Pater.

If there is an angel who records the sorrows of men as well as their sins, he knows how many and deep are the sorrows which spring from false ideas, for which no man is culpable.

—George Eliot.

[A. M. B., London.]

Competition No. 194 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best set of verses on June. Not to exceed twenty lines.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY,
43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 10 June, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered.
Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Winbolt (Frederick J.), Messalina: A Tragedy.....(Drane) 3/6
Dunst (Simon), Bub and Sis.....(Woonsocket Publishing Co.) net $1.00
Byse (Fanny), Milton on the Continent.....(Stock) 3/6
Alab and other Poems.....(Chiswick Press) net 5/0
Kastner (L. E.), A History of French Versification.....(Clarendon Press) net 5/6
Lehmann (R. C.), Crumbs of Pity and other Verses.....(Blackwood) net 5/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Davidson (James W.), The Island of Formosa, Past and Present
(Macmillan) net 25/0
Fitzpatrick (Thomas), The Bloody Bridge.....(Scaly) 10/0
Byrne (Matthew J.), Ireland under Elizabeth.....() 7/6
Carpenter (Edmund J.), The American Advance.....(Lane) net 14/6
Benson (Eugene), Sordello and Cunizza.....(Dent) net 2/6
Helmolt (Dr. H. F.), Edited by, The World's History. Vol. III.
(Heinemann) net 15/0
Black (Charles Drummond), The Marquess of Dufferin and Ava
(Hutchinson) net 16/0
Fischer (Th. A.), The Scots in Eastern and Western Prussia.....(Schulze)
Sauborn (F. B.), The Personality of Emerson.....(Goodspeed) net $3.00
Escott (T. H. S.), King Edward and His Court.....(Unwin) 16/0
The Jewish Encyclopedia. Vol. IV.....(Funk & Wagnalls)
Gilbey (Sir Walter), Early Carriages and Roads.....(Vinton) net 2/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Macdonald (Greville), The Religious Sense in its Scientific Aspect
(Hodder & Stoughton) 3/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Fitzgerald (Percy), Lightning Tours.....(Everett) 2/6
Partsch (Joseph), The Regions of the World: Central Europe.....(Heinemann)
Browning (Oscar), Impressions of Indian Travel.....(Hodder & Stoughton) net 2/6
Brückner (Jessie), Danish Life in Town and Country.....(Newnes) net 2/6

ART.

The Work of Botticelli.....(Newnes) net 2/6
Ward (H. Snowden), The Masterpieces in the National Gallery, London.....(Hanfsaengl)
Die Meisterwerke des Rijks-Museum zu Amsterdam.....()
Wyllie (W. L.), Nature's Laws and the Making of Pictures.....(Arnold) net 15/0

EDUCATIONAL.

Hassall (Arthur), Temple Primers: The History of France.....(Dent) net 1/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Descamps (E.), New Africa.....(Low)
Ward (H. Snowden), Profitable Hobbies.....(Dawbarn) net 0/6
Protheroe (Charles), Life in the Mercantile Marine.....(Lane) net 3/6
Jessop (Gilbert L.), Cricket Notes.....(Arrowsmith) 1/0
Brownfield (C. D.), The Coming of the Colonist.....(Dent) net 4/6

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

In consequence of the publication of the "New Letters and Memorials of Jane Welsh Carlyle," with the introduction by Sir James Crichton-Browne, the executors of the late Mr. Froude have determined to publish a statement written by Mr. Froude himself, entitled "My Relations with Carlyle." With the statement will be published a letter from the late Sir James Stephen dealing with the same subject which was printed for private circulation in 1886.
The pamphlet will be issued by Messrs. Longmans and Co.
early this month.

Mr. Murray will shortly publish the third edition of "The Book of Ser Marco Polo, the Venetian: Concerning the Kingdoms and the Marvels of the East," translated and edited, with notes, by the late Colonel Sir Henry Yule. This new edition has been revised throughout in the light of recent discoveries by M. Henri Cordier.

Sir John Strachey's work, "India: Its Administration and Progress," originating out of a series of lectures delivered at Cambridge in 1884, was first published in 1888; a second and revised edition appeared in 1894. A third edition is about to be issued by Messrs. Macmillan and Co.

Mr. John Lane announces "The Poet's Charter," by Mr. F. B. Money-Coutts, author of "The Revelation of St. Love the Divine," "The Mystery of Godliness," &c.
The present volume is a prose work on poetry, "showing its value, dignity, and divine authority," as exemplified in
"The Book of Job."

NOW 16/-: HEREAFTER 32/7

FOR THE SAME VOLUME.

THE buying public have, in some cases, themselves to blame for the high prices of which they complain. The Encyclopedia Britannica is, perhaps, the only article offered for sale of which the price may safely be made as low as possible without the danger of creating a false impression. For its reputation is so firmly established that it does not depend upon any circumstantial support. Yet the process by which the present price of the 35 volumes is for a short time made possible is in itself so interesting a story that it may well be told. How can "The Times" afford to sell this newly-completed book, the fruit of an outlay of more than £300,000, of which the final volume was published only a few weeks ago, for a first payment of a guinea, to send the whole 35 volumes to the subscriber as soon as that first payment has been received, to accept thereafter monthly payments of only one guinea—at the rate, indeed, of only 4s. 10d. a week—when the total of these payments is less than half the catalogue price?

The answer to these questions is that the cost of printing a book is so greatly reduced when the volumes are produced in vast quantities that each one of an edition of 5,000 copies costs 50 per cent. more than each one of an edition of 15,000 copies. In the case of an edition of 1,000 copies the disparity is even greater. And the demand for the Encyclopedia Britannica is so great that it was quite safe for "The Times" to prepare a number of copies great enough to reduce the printing cost per copy to a figure incomparably smaller than that at which any other important book has ever been manufactured. The Encyclopedia Britannica may to-day be had for £28. That means 16s. a volume, instead of 32s. 7d. a volume, which is the catalogue price—a moderate price, too, for a large quarto volume, written by men of the highest authority, containing 1,142,857 words and hundreds of elaborate illustrations. Only a certain number of copies, only the first lot printed of the completed work, can be supplied at this 16s. price. When a further printing on a smaller scale becomes necessary in order to supply these orders, the cost of production may well be more than doubled.

There is, then, ample reason for immediate action if you propose purchasing at all, and the question whether it is advisable to purchase at all is one upon which you can bring to bear the most convincing evidence. More than £100,000 (the total being, as nearly as can be determined from the accounts already audited, between £115,000 and £117,000) has been expended upon the task of bringing the Encyclopedia Britannica up to date. Here then is

PROOF NUMBER 1.

This large expenditure would not have been incurred if the Encyclopedia Britannica was not the best library reference in the world, a thoroughly practical and useful book, a book for which the demand is absolutely assured, a book which in the purchaser's own interest cannot be too strongly recommended to him.

PROOF NUMBER 2.

A thousand contributors chosen by editors who had themselves been selected by "The Times" have been, during the past three or four years, engaged in this task of completing and bringing up to date the Encyclopedia Britannica. Among the names are those of Lord Rayleigh, Sir William Crookes, Mr. Swinburne, Sir Archibald Geikie, Lord Brassey, Sir Richard Jebb, Sir Francis Jeune, Sir Frederick Lugard, Lord Davey, Dr. Fridtjof Nansen, Sir Leslie Stephen, the Bishop of Winchester, Count Gleichen, Cardinal Vaughan, Field-Marshal Sir Evelyn Wood.

ORDER FORM.

THESE ARE TEMPORARY PRICES, AND "THE TIMES" DOES NOT UNDERTAKE TO ACCEPT UPON THESE TERMS ORDERS NOT PROMPTLY SENT.

MONTHLY PAYMENTS.

(All cheques, Postal Orders, &c., must be made payable to H. E. HOOPER, and crossed "and Co.")

THE MANAGER, "THE TIMES," PRINTING HOUSE SQUARE, LONDON, E.C.

I enclose One Guinea. Please send me the completed "Encyclopedia Britannica" in 35 volumes.

Strike out all but one of these paragraphs.

- ☐ Bound in Cloth, for which I agree to make to you, or any one you appoint, 27 further monthly payments of ONE GUINEA.
- ☐ In Half Morocco, for which I agree to make to you, or any one you appoint, 33 further monthly payments of ONE GUINEA.
- ☐ In THREE-QUARTER LEVANT, for which I agree to make to you, or any one you appoint, 36 further monthly payments of ONE GUINEA.

[This Binding is especially recommended on account of its great beauty and durability, and also in view of the very moderate price at which it is offered.]

☐ In Full Morocco, for which I agree to make to you, or any one you appoint, 47 further monthly payments of ONE GUINEA.

The first of these monthly payments to be made upon delivery of the volumes and the succeeding payments on the corresponding day of each month following. Until such payments are complete I engage that the volumes, not being my property, shall not be disposed of by sale or otherwise. I further agree that if, owing to unforeseen circumstances of which you shall be the judge, the volumes cannot be delivered, the return of the deposit of ONE GUINEA to me shall cancel this agreement.

[Strike out if Bookcase not desired.]

Please also send a REVOLVING BOOKCASE, for which I agree to make five further monthly payments of ONE GUINEA each after the payments for the books are completed.

Signed _____

(Please write clearly.)

Rank or Occupation _____

Residence _____

AC 61.

Address to which Books are to be sent _____

Name of nearest Railway Station _____

CASH PAYMENT.

If in business, add Business Address _____

If the Subscriber desires to secure, in addition to the special discount at which the completed work is for the present supplied, a further saving by making one payment in full, and also save himself the trouble of repeated remittances, he should enclose a cheque—if he selects the Cloth Binding, for £25; if he selects the Half-Morocco Binding, for £34; if he selects the THREE-QUARTER LEVANT Binding, for £37; if he selects the Full Morocco Binding, for £43; and for £5 more if he desires the Revolving Bookcase.

PROOF NUMBER 3.

For the columns of "The Times," where for obvious reasons it would have been indecorous for the staff of "The Times" to pass judgment upon the manner in which this task of completing the Encyclopedia Britannica had been executed, reviews have been written by the Lord Chancellor, the Speaker, Lord Avebury, Mr. James Bryce, the Bishop of Ripon, Sir Michael Foster, Henry Cabot Lodge, of the United States Senate, Professor Case, of Oxford, Lord Davey, and Mr. Henry Tedder.

PROOF NUMBER 4.

Enthusiastic reviews have been published by the most authoritative newspapers, including the Standard, Manchester Guardian, Spectator, Pall Mall Gazette, Daily Telegraph, Scotsman, Academy, Morning Post, Kölnische Zeitung, Athenaeum, Yorkshire Post, Globe, Daily Chronicle, Observer, Glasgow Herald, Westminster Gazette, Liverpool Post, Le Temps, Daily Mail, Church Times, Bristol Mercury, Truth, Guardian, Daily Graphic, Irish Times, and Neues Wiener Tageblatt.

PROOF NUMBER 5.

Over 6,300 letters of congratulation upon the manner in which the Encyclopedia Britannica has been brought up to date have been received from those who, having purchased the work, cannot but be severe critics, for it is not in human nature that the scrutiny of a purchaser should be over-indulgent. Among these letters are to be found such expressions as "I fervently thank God that I have every evening by my armchair information on every subject it is possible to conceive." "I have found the completeness and thoroughness of the articles to exceed my expectations." "Every man who can possibly afford it ought to possess the complete work." "A very valuable work, and cheap withal." "I consider the 35 volumes of the Encyclopedia Britannica the best investment I ever made." "I value the volumes as one of the greatest of my treasures, and would not part with them for any consideration."

In these proofs you have a body of opinion which is altogether conclusive. The judgment of "The Times" is that the Encyclopedia Britannica before it was completed was the best book in the world. If that had not been the opinion of "The Times," the ninth edition would not have been reprinted by "The Times" and subsequently completed by "The Times." It is the judgment of "The Times" that the Encyclopedia Britannica has been brought up to date in a thoroughly satisfactory manner. If this had not been the judgment of "The Times" the completed work would not have been sent forth by "The Times."

Bearing all this in mind, being fully warned that if you do not avail yourself at once of this opportunity to procure the Encyclopedia Britannica at half-price, you will never again be able to buy it on these extraordinary terms, knowing as you do that the present price of 16s. a volume will soon be changed to 32s. 7d. a volume, knowing that those who have bought the book at this half-price consider it more than worth the full-price; knowing, as you also know, that a man whose income is only £65 a year could afford to pay at the rate of 4s. 10d. a week for the Encyclopedia Britannica—with all these considerations in your mind, can you avoid the conclusion that you should at once file your subscription?

MACMILLAN'S LIST.

MACMILLAN'S
GUIDE TO SWITZERLAND.

With 31 Maps and 6 Plans. Globe 8vo, 5s. net.
Daily News.—"A useful guide-book, clearly arranged
and well supplied with maps."

NORWEGIAN BY-WAYS.

By CHARLES W. WOOD.

With 9 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.
Sheffield Telegraph.—"A work which it is a delight to read."

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF
SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B.,
Formerly Director of the Royal College
of Music.

By CHARLES L. GRAVES.

With Photogravure Portraits, &c. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Series.

ROBERT BROWNING.

By G. K. CHESTERTON.

Crown 8vo, gilt top, flat back, 2s. net.

REPRESENTATIVE ENGLISH
COMEDIES.

With Introductory Essays and Notes.

An Historical View of our Earlier Comedy, and other Monographs by Various Writers, under the General
Editorship of CHARLES MILLS GAYLEY, Litt.D.,
LL.D., Professor of the English Language and Literature in the University of California.

FROM THE BEGINNINGS TO SHAKESPEARE.

Extra crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. net.

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Vol.

THE
GOLDEN SAYINGS OF EPICTETUS,

With the Hymn of Cleanthes.

Translated and Arranged by HASTINGS CROSSLEY,
M.A. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN'S POCKET NOVELS BY FAVOURITE AUTHORS.

Illustrated. Pott 8vo, 2s. net each.

LATEST ADDITIONS:

By F. MARION CRAWFORD.
MAN OVERBOARD!By WINSTON CHURCHILL.
MR. KEEGAN'S ELOPEMENT.MACMILLAN'S ILLUSTRATED POCKET
CLASSICS.—New Volume.

Fcap. 8vo, cloth, 2s. net; or in leather limp, 3s. net.

HELEN.

By MARIA EDGEWORTH.

With Introduction by ANNE THACKERAY RITCHIE and Illustrations by CHRIS HAMMOND.

POPULAR UNIFORM EDITION OF

THOMAS HARDY'S WORKS.

In Fortnightly Volumes.

With a Map of Wessex in each. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. each.

LATEST ADDITION:

A GROUP OF NOBLE DAMES.

PEOPLE OF THE WHIRLPOOL,

FROM THE EXPERIENCE BOOK OF A COMMUTER'S WIFE.

With 8 Full-page Illustrations. Crown 8vo, 6s.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

Swan Sonnenschein & Co.

IMPERIAL DEFENCE: PRINCIPLES AND PROBLEMS OF. By Lieut.-Col. E. S. MAY, C.M.G., Royal Artillery, Professor of Military Art and History at the Staff College. 8vo, 7s. 6d. net.

THE ANGEVIN EMPIRE (Henry II., Richard I., and John). By Sir J. H. RAMSAY, Bart., M.A. Maps and Illustrations, 12s. "Sir James Ramsay's learned and careful narrative will earn him the gratitude of all students of the Angevin period."—Times.

CONTEMPORARY PSYCHOLOGY By Prof. G. VILLA. Forming the New Volume of the "Library of Philosophy." Large 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. "The book takes a broad general survey of the new psychology, which it furthers by giving a comprehensive view of the theories of its founders and of the processes of evolution in the history of ideas by which they have arrived at them. The processes and results of this growth are well set forth in this clear and compendious treatise, a book well worthy of its place in the valuable series it now enriches."—Scotsman.

THE RISE AND FALL OF THE ANABAPTISTS. By E. BELFORD BAX. 8vo, 6s. "This volume completes a set of three volumes, in which the author has considered the social side of the Reformation in Germany. He regards the Anabaptists as the forerunners of modern Socialism, and he shows that the movement was an upheaval at the close of the Middle Ages of the disinherited classes, who were drawn by their poverty into enthusiastic acceptance of a doctrine of making worldly goods common property as the fulfilment of the teaching of Christ."—Notts Guardian. "A brilliant sketch of the movement."—Dundee Advertiser.

TRADITIONAL ASPECTS OF HELL (ANCIENT AND MODERN). By JAMES MEW. With 79 Facsimiles from Ancient and Oriental Drawings, 464 pp., 6s. "Mr. Mew has collected a store of valuable historical material dealing with the literature of hell as it has presented itself to the minds of preceding ages, and his book is enriched by a series of exceedingly weird and grotesque illustrations."—Spectator. "Full of curious learning."—Spectator.

DESCRIPTIVE GUIDE TO THE BEST FICTION, BRITISH AND AMERICAN, including Translations. By E. A. BAKER, M.A. 618 pp., 8vo, 8s. 6d. net. About 4,500 NOVELS are CLASSIFIED AND CHARACTERISED. To each book are added the best available editions; the publisher's name; the American publisher's name; the price; the date of first publication. "A valuable book of reference."—Standard. "An admirably compiled list of all the best novels in the language. It includes almost every novel of established worth between Chaucer and the present day."—Liverpool Post.

ANNALS OF HOLLYFONT: a Novel. By FELIX LACLAND. 6s. "There is certainly a charm about the writing, with its echoes of Sterne and Goldsmith, its pictures of Provincial society and its old-fashioned manner."—Times. "The author has successfully caught the peculiar mental modes and social tendencies of the period, and his pictures of Church, clergy, and Dissent may be singled out as lively, accurate, and humorous."—Glasgow Herald.

NEW GOLFING RHYMES.

HORACE ON THE LINKS. By C. J. B. and P. S. W. With a Foreword by HORACE HUTCHINSON. 2s. 6d. "Surprising in their aptness and whimsicality."—Outlook. "A very pleasant little volume consisting of free renderings of some of the best known Odes, wrested from their true environment and taken out boldly on to the links."—Daily Telegraph. "After you have read this book you will either take to golf or read Horace, as the case may be."—Sovereign.

A NEW SCHOPENHAUER BOOK.

THE BASIS OF MORALITY. By A. SCHOPENHAUER. 4s. 6d. "Will be widely welcomed among students and general readers."—Scotsman. "His work is good, and while he cannot reproduce all the charm of the style, the version is worthy of congratulation."—Pall Mall Gazette.

THE FIRST CHRISTIAN GENERATION. By JAMES THOMAS, Author of "Our Records of the Nativity." 6s. "The concluding section of the book, dealing with the evolution of dogmas and church organisation, is extremely interesting, and the subject is handled in a spirit that commands respect."—Notts Guardian.

SWAN SONNENSCHN & Co., Ltd., LONDON.

T. FISHER UNWIN'S LIST.

FOR TOURISTS.

Mr. Unwin has just issued Tourist Editions of the Histories of

FLORENCE, SWITZERLAND, and VENICE.

Illustrated Nation Series, 5s. each.

GUIDE TO SIENA: History and Art.
By WILLIAM HEYWOOD and LUCY OLCOTT.
Cloth, 5s.

TRUE TALES OF MOUNTAIN ADVENTURE for Non-Climbers, Young and Old. By Mrs. AUBREY LE BLOND (Mrs. Ma n). Profusely illustrated. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net. Third Impression.

"The tales told are far more thrilling than the most sensational of novels."—Westminster Gazette.

MOUNTAINEERING IN THE SIERRA NEVADA. By CLARENCE KING. Crown 8vo, cloth, 6s. net.

IN THE ICE WORLD OF HIMALAYA. By FANNY BULLOCK WORKMAN and WILLIAM HUNTER WORKMAN. With four large Maps and nearly 100 Illustrations. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s. Also a 6s. Edition.

CONWAY AND COOLIDGE'S CLIMBER'S GUIDES. Edited by Sir WILLIAM M. CONWAY and Rev. W. A. B. COOLIDGE. 32mo, limp cloth, gilt lettered, with pocket, flat and pencil. Price 10s. each. List of volumes free on application. Also A SERIES OF SIX COLOURED MAPS of the Alps of the Dauphiny, mounted on linen, and strongly bound in cloth case. Price 4s. 6d. the set.

THE ANNALS OF MONTBLANC: A Monograph. By C. E. MATHEWS, sometime President of the Alpine Club. With Map, six Swan-types and other Illustrations, and Facsimiles. Demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 21s. net.

A FRENCH TRANSLATION OF A RARE ENGLISH MOUNTAINEERING BOOK.
MES ESCALADES DANS LES ALPES ET LE CAUCASE. Par A. F. MUMMER. Traduit de l'Anglais par MAURICE PAILLON. With a New Preface and a Notice on Mummery as a Climber. Illustrated by a Portrait of the Author in Colotype, 24 full-page Plates, and four Maps. Cloth, 9s. net.

KING EDWARD AND HIS COURT. By T. H. S. ESCOTT. Demy 8vo, cloth, 16s.

FIRST REVIEW:—"Mr. Escott has compiled a most interesting and valuable volume of personalities, anecdotes, and observations on the men and manners of the time. . . . A more copious fund of interesting personal sketches has rarely been produced."—Vanity Fair.

THE FIRST NOVEL LIBRARY.

THE FLAME AND THE FLOOD. By ROSAMOND LANGBRIDGE. Cloth, 6s. Second Impression.

The Manchester Guardian says:—"Read on breathlessly to the end we must. This new author is a born story-teller. . . . In many places we are reminded of Miss Rhoda Broughton (at her best) and of the Sisters Brontë."

THE MISCHIEF OF A GLOVE.

A Novel. By Mrs. PHILIP CHAMPION DE CRESPIGNY. Author of "From Behind the Arras." Crown 8vo, Red Cloth Library, 6s.

RAILWAY REFORMS.

OUR DECREPIT RAILWAY SYSTEM. A word to the Stockholder and the Passenger. By PERCY WILLIAMS. Crown 8vo, 1s. net. Post free, 1s. 2d.

LIBRARY OF LITERARY HISTORY. NEW VOL.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. By J. H. MILLAR, Balliol College, Oxford; Lecturer in International Private Law in the University of Edinburgh. With photogravure frontispiece, demy 8vo, cloth gilt, 16s. Also a fine edition, limited to 25 copies, on hand-made paper, £2 2s. net.

London: T. Fisher Unwin, E.C.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1623. Established 1869. London: 13 June 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 571

REVIEWS.

The Works of Charles and Mary Lamb 575
Rise and Fall of the Anabaptists 576

FICTION:

The Way of All Flesh—The Shadow on the Quarter-deck—All the Winners £77.
Notes on Novels 578

TOURIST AND GUIDE BOOK SUPPLEMENT:

Books about Places. A Retrospect 581
A Book of Exmoor—Lake Country Sketches—Central Europe—Travels in Southern Europe and the Levant, 1810-1817—Norwegian By-Ways—Service and Sport on the Tropical Nile—Switzerland—Handbook for Lincolnshire—Impressions of Indian Travel—The Island of Formosa,
Past and Present—Danish Life in Town and Country—Hammersmith, Fulham, and Putney—Country Rambles, being a Field Naturalist's and Country Lover's Note Book for a Year—Early Carriages and Roads—Walks in New England 582-587

ARTICLES.

THE STATE CALLED REVERIE 589
A Multiform Appeal 590
Impressions—XXXVI. The Author as Father 591

DRAMA:

A Triple Bill. E. K. Chambers 592

ART:

Pictures for a Room. C. L. H. 593

SCIENCE:

The World is Young. C. W. Saleeby 593

CORRESPONDENCE:

Masterlinck and Robert Browning 594

WEEKLY COMPETITION:

Verses on June 595

The Literary Week.

THE production of the Poet Laureate's "Flodden Field" at His Majesty's Theatre, for one night, has been followed by the publication of the tragedy. It makes a volume of one hundred and fifty pages and ends thus:—

Help! Help! What use of help, when hope is none?
Thus do I baffle help, and bid farewell
To life, love, everything!

[Stabs herself, and dies.]

Among the books published during the week we note the following:—

A LITERARY HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. By J. H. Millar.

Mr. Millar's volume of seven hundred pages is designed to supply an account of the English-speaking Scots from the beginning of the fourteenth century down to the present day. It includes literature written in the vernacular, as well as that written in ordinary literary English. Mr. Millar, as a "true Scot," does not claim to have altogether avoided a touch of partiality, but he hopes "that no constitutional prejudice or bias has led him to the unconscious and unintentional misrepresentation of the views of men with whose temperament and habits of thought he may chance to find himself in imperfect sympathy." Some of the chapter headings read: "The Golden Age of Scottish Poetry"; "Sir Walter Scott"; "The Rise of Periodical Literature"; "The Victorian Era: 1848-1880."

THE ORRERY PAPERS. Edited by the Countess of Cork and Orrery. Two volumes.

The collection of papers from which the contents of these volumes have been mainly selected were chiefly made by John, fifth Earl of Orrery, who ultimately became also fifth Earl of Cork, though some of the earlier papers were evidently compiled by his father, the fourth Earl of Orrery. The correspondence includes letters written to and received from such men as Dr. Barry and Swift. A letter dated from "Corke, April 3rd, 1737," opens thus:

"Dear Sir,—I am very glad there are twelve thousand Pounds worth of Half-pence arrived. They are twelve thousand Arguments for your quitting Ireland. I look upon you in the same State of the unfortunate Achaeminides amidst Gyants and Monsters: Do you not remember the Description of Polypheme and his Den?" The volumes are full of valuable historical and social material, and are excellently illustrated by portraits in photogravure.

MASTERS OF ENGLISH LANDSCAPE PAINTING. J. S. Cotman. David Cox. Peter De Wint.

The summer number of the "Studio." The editor claims that this is the first serious effort to do justice to the work of these three English masters. Hitherto in books and articles they have been represented only by black and white illustrations: the present volume contains many plates in colour. The essay on John Sell Cotman is written by Mr. Laurence Binyon, that on David Cox by Mr. A. L. Baldry, and that on Peter De Wint by Mr. W. S. Sparrow. The coloured reproductions have evidently been made with great care, and the whole volume is interesting and valuable.

ALL who have the best interests of literature and literary ethics at heart cannot fail to be pained by the present aspect of the Froude-Carlyle question. The matter has practically left the region of decent controversy, and is resolving itself into a series of wrangles over the graves of people who might surely have been left to rest in peace. Personally, we do not care whether Carlyle or his wife was the more to blame, nor do we much care whether Froude made certain errors of judgment and fact. What we are certain of is that no good cause is served by all this raising of unsavoury dust. Sir James Crichton-Browne has heralded the fact in the daily press that the "Contemporary Review" is next month to publish a "conclusive answer" by him to Froude's "My Relations with Carlyle," recently published by Messrs. Longman, which Sir James Crichton-Browne calls fresh "Froudacities." We suppose the thing will drag on until it dies of inanition.

B

THE welcoming of M. Rostand to his seat in the French Academy was an event of more than ordinary interest. The youth and astonishing success of the new member accounted partly, no doubt, for the enthusiasm of his admirers; but beyond that was the feeling that M. Rostand stood for the spirit of reaction against the sordidness and unhealthy realism of much of the modern French drama. Such a scene would have been impossible in England, but in Paris nothing could have been more delightful and natural. "The Times'" brief extracts from M. Rostand's and the Vicomte de Vogüé's speeches occupied over a column of close type. From M. Rostand's speech we give a characteristic passage:—

Il faut réhabiliter la passion. Et même l'émotion, qui n'est pas ridicule. Il est temps de rappeler à ces Français timides qui ont toujours peur de ne pas avoir l'air d'être nés assez malins, qu'il peut y avoir toute la finesse moderne dans un œil résolu; qu'un certain genre d'ironie ne fait plus désormais partie que des élégances de bons élèves; et que la blague, impertinence dont croient se rajeunir les plus bourgeois sagesse, n'est que le monnaie par quoi Joseph Prudhomme essaie de remplacer ses lunettes! Rien de plus lourd que les désinvolures. Pirouetter, c'est se visser au sol. Le véritable esprit est celui qui donne des ailes à l'enthousiasme. L'éclat de rire est une gamme montante. Ce qui est léger, c'est l'âme. Et voilà pourquoi il faut un théâtre où, exaltant avec du lyrisme, moralisant avec de la beauté, consolant avec de la grâce, les poètes, sans le faire exprès, donnent des leçons d'âme! Voilà pourquoi il faut un théâtre poétique, et même héroïque! Et je songe,—oh, vous m'en excuserez tout à l'heure!—je songe à ces correspondants qui me faisaient sortir quand j'étais au collège. La plupart, n'admettant pas les joies inutiles, me menaient visiter des monuments et des musées, au ronron d'une causerie instructive, et, après cette bonne petite fête didactique, me reconduisaient un peu las, et n'en sachant pas davantage. Mais il y en avait un qui arrivait brusque, pimpant, la moustache ébouriffée, l'œil bleu: je le vois encore. Il m'enlevait gaiement, me transportait dans des paysages bien choisis, et me contait de belles histoires de guerre et d'amour. Parfois un de ses mots avait l'amertume saine d'une feuille de laurier qu'on mâche; il était jusqu'au soir étincelant sans y tâcher, ou profond comme par mégarde; il me ramenait ébloui et reposé; il m'avait appris de tout sans avoir l'air de rien; j'entends encore sa voix charmante; il s'appelait Villebois-Mareuil. Eh bien, les personnages de théâtre sont les correspondants chargés de nous faire sortir de cet éternel collège qu'est la Vie—sortir pour nous donner le courage de rentrer! et sans médire de ceux qui, dans notre intérêt, nous gâtent un peu nos dimanches, celui qui nous fait encore le mieux sortir, c'est un héros!

In an article called "Firstliness," printed in our issue of May 8, we said, concerning a character in Miss Langbridge's "The Flame and the Flood": "One remembers a prototype—coarser, less drawn—in the gallery of Miss Helen Mathers . . ." Miss Mathers writes to us: "Like many other obscure, humble persons, I sit meekly at the feet of my critics—but I really haven't time to puzzle out slipshod English—so write to ask you if enclosed means 'well-drawn.'" It is a curious meekness which, sitting at a critic's feet, announces the imperfection of his shoes! The answer to Miss Mathers' question is so simple that it is scarcely an adequate return for her confiding letter. "Less drawn" means with less drawing. A face drawn in outline is less drawn than the same face drawn with wrinkles.

MR. PERCY WHITE has sent to the "Author" an extract from a letter received by him from a friend who has been reading "Evan Harrington" in the original 1861 edition. The writer comments on the fact that in the final edition "many admirable passages have been cut out and a good deal of fun and broad humour has been lost." He adds that an interesting little paper might be made out of a comparison of the two editions. The suggestion is belated. A good many little papers were written on the subject some years ago when the complete revised edition was being issued.

ON Sunday last there was held in Rome, in the Church of San Marcello, an expiatory service to atone to Our Lady of Sorrows for certain verses in Gabriele d'Annunzio's latest volume of poetry, "Laus Vitæ." The church was packed with a devout audience, and when a rumour was passed round that d'Annunzio was present, a cry was raised "Bring the heretic out." As a matter of fact the offending poet was in Florence, from which stronghold he is said to speak with great cynicism of the way in which Roman Catholic circles have received his verses.

THE Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest cannot, we imagine, be feeling particularly happy. Any reasonable minded person who has followed the discussion which has been slowly developing during the past weeks must be convinced that the Trustees have failed in their duty to the nation. It is all very well for Sir L. Alma Tadema to refer to the Trustees' critics as "foolish persons"; that does the critics no harm and certainly it does the Trustees no good. Last week the "Saturday Review" returned to the attack with unanswerable effect. To the plea advanced by certain Academicians that works by such men as Rossetti, Burne-Jones, and Whistler were not for sale "in the ordinary way" the "Saturday Review" replies by taking the year 1892. In that year the Chantrey purchases were as follows:—

- "Between Two Fires" (F. D. Millet), £350.
- "June in the Austrian Tyrol" (J. MacWhirter, A.R.A.), £800.
- "The Annunciation" (A. Hacker), £840.
- "Solitude" (G. Cockram), £150.
- "Stormy Weather" (L. Rivers), £40.
- "Life in the Street" (W. Osborne), £26 5s.
- "Indian Rhinoceros" (R. Stark), £65.

Upon which the "Saturday" comments:—

Now we will not discuss the exact class of mediocrity into which all these works fall; we will only ask whether no works of the distinction required by Sir F. Chantrey and otherwise eligible were obtainable at the time of purchase. The answer is easy. In that same summer, at a single sale, first-rate works by Rossetti and Burne-Jones, the "Eve of St. Agnes" by Millais, and the "Princesses du Pays de la Porcelaine" by Mr. Whistler were disposed of. This last picture, if we remember aright, was purchased for between £400 and £500. Is anyone going to assert that Mr. Hacker's "Annunciation" was a picture to be bought in preference at double the money? Will Sir L. A. Tadema and Mr. Frampton put their names to that? Or do they consider that the English nation made a better bargain when they obtained a water-colour by Mr. Cockram (whoever he may be) at £150, than the French when Mr. Whistler let them have his Mother's portrait for £120?

It is pretty clear that if the Trustees do not take their duties more seriously, the interference by Parliament, provided for by Chantrey's will, will have to be invoked.

A WRITER in the New York "Critic" has been discovering that there are certain resemblances between Mr. Meredith's "Diana of the Crossways" and Mrs. Humphry Ward's "Lady Rose's Daughter." The resemblances strike us as much more superficial than actual. Indeed, they were hardly worth pointing out. But we suppose that so long as novelists write novels there will be found ingenious pursuers of parallels lying in wait.

In the same magazine we find a "Defence of Fine Writing." The writer of the article seems to misunderstand our modern use of the phrase. By "fine writing" we nowadays mean writing deliberately forced beyond the just use of words, or writing on a note too high for its theme. The writer to whom we refer seems to suppose that Maeterlinck indulges in fine writing; she adds "and probably [he] would not apologise though he were caught in the very act of passionately and eloquently uttering a lovely truth." But to Maeterlinck the derogatory phrase "fine writing" could hardly ever be applied. Indeed, the writer misses the whole point. We read:—

The question is, How is the Anglo-Saxon to accustom himself to beauty? Could he, by the wearing of smoked glasses, mitigate the glare till his eyes became strengthened sufficiently for him to look at loveliness without blinking? Since he is an idealist in the matter of morals, may we not hope that he will presently cease to be a literalist in matters of art?

The Anglo-Saxon has no need to accustom himself to beauty in matters of literature; he has the most beautiful literature in the world from which to draw. No one objects to writing which is fine, but the "fine writing" of certain strenuous strivers after effect has nothing to do with the sanity and beauty of true literature.

ONE of the authors, whose birthdays fall in June, dealt with in the current "English Illustrated Magazine," is Mr. Thomas Hardy. Mr. H. W. Nevinson's brief summary of Mr. Hardy's outlook and work is quite admirable. He writes:—

To compare the man who has created such poignant scenes of pity and terror as the meeting of Troy and Bathsheba over Fanny's coffin, or the discovery of Tess at Stonehenge, or Knight clinging to the sea-pinks upon the cliff without a name, or Jude and Sue turning back unmarried from the altar—to compare such a writer with so undramatic a poet as Wordsworth may seem strange, but the comparison is inevitable. The resemblance has little to do with the obvious love of both for the face of external nature, and their intimate knowledge of all her aspects in beneficence or desolation. It is not here their secret lies. In spite of their country life and country themes, neither of them has any connection with idyllic art. To them nature is not the home of prettiness and rustic peace, and their men and women have nothing whatever in common with nymphs and swains. Both love the mankind that lies close to the breast of earth, and is as truly sprung from her as the grass and trees. In speaking of mankind, they never lose sight of this ancient world, so full of strange history, so full of unconscious influences and associations, which for generations have nurtured the children of men and form the setting of their lives.

The analogy is certainly interesting, though the difference in temperament between the two writers resulted in very different final conclusions.

THE "Vanity Fair" cartoon last week represented Mr. Arthur Christopher Benson. Mr. Benson is an Eton master who writes, but he has the faculty of writing without any suggestion of the pedagogue—a rare thing in men who combine teaching with letters. "Vanity Fair" says that Mr. Benson has been accused of having written "Dodo." The confounding of Mr. Benson's name with his younger brother's, Mr. E. F. Benson, is natural enough, though there is small affinity between their work. Mr. A. C. Benson is primarily a poet, and his best prose has the quality which perhaps only the practice of verse can give.

THERE reaches us from Aberdeen a cheap little book called "Knock-about Yarns." Is the success of "Wee MacGreegor" to result in an inundation of fiction from Scottish provincial cities? We are inclined to hope not. These "Yarns" are not very brilliant, and there are a great many of them. The first opens thus:—

Sir, I am regularly riled. One of your writers in "To-Day" says: "The only man of whom there is any record of having visited the Island of Lewis is Dr. Johnson."

Who is Dr. Johnson, I should like to know?

I suspect "J. F. F." takes advantage of your large circulation and his position on your staff to advertise his friend Johnson.

Why should his friend Johnson be the only man to visit the Lewis?

We cannot feel particularly amused.

THE summer assembly of the National Home Reading Union is this year to be held at Ross. A circular which we have received says: "Of the charms of the Wye Valley it is unnecessary to speak. Herefordshire hospitality is hardly less famous. The prospects of a successful picnic are therefore amply promising." We cannot commend the style of this communication, but as the Dean of Westminster, Mr. Owen Seaman, and Mr. P. H. Wicksteed are to lecture to the members, no doubt the "intellectual feast" promised will be a pleasant aid to the picnic.

WE are shortly to have, from a firm of Edinburgh publishers, a series to be known as the "Lighthouse Library of Great Thinkers." We do not much care for the general title, but the first three volumes are well enough. These are to be Pascal's "Thoughts on Religion and Philosophy," Marcus Aurelius's "Meditations," and "Essays," by Schopenhauer. The volumes are to be printed on Dutch hand-made paper.

A BOOK which has recently aroused a good deal of interest in America is Helen Keller's autobiography, "The Story of My Life." Both Mr. W. D. Howells and Mr. Carl Snyder have written about it. A good many books reach us from America which we could well spare. Such a personal narrative as this we should be glad to have. Helen Keller is a woman of many accomplishments, though she has neither sight nor hearing.

IN the "Weekly Critical Review" Mr. W. B. Yeats has some haunting verses entitled "The Happy Townland." We quote the two opening stanzas:—

There is many a strong farmer
Whose heart would break in two
If he could see the townland
That we are riding to;
Boughs have their fruit and blossom,
At all times of the year,
Rivers are running over
With red beer and brown beer.
An old man plays the bagpipes
In a golden and silver wood,
Queens their eyes blue like the ice
Are dancing in a crowd.

The little fox he murmured,
"O what of the world's bane,"
The sun was laughing sweetly,
The moon plucked at my rein;
But the little red fox murmured
"I do not pluck at his rein,
He is riding to the townland,
That is the world's bane."

M. MARCEL PRÉVOST, M. Alfred Capus, and M. Gangat, agent-general of the Société des Auteurs Dramatiques, have been in Russia on a special mission, that mission being to try to arrange for the protection of literary and dramatic copyright. They have, says the Paris correspondent of the "Morning Advertiser," been going quietly about visiting their play-writing colleagues, "and as a result are amusing the boulevards with 'Russia is the very best country in the world,' messages which read something like good advertisements. M. Capus says, 'As a result of our mission I shall produce "La Chatelaine" in St. Petersburg in October.' M. Prévost adds, 'And I shall bring out my new book "Le Roman des Deux Mondes,"' while poor M. Gangat chimes in, 'And I shall write a full report of our journey'—and many of us are irreverently smiling."

THE annual report of the Committee of the London Library contains some interesting facts. The total cost of the admirable catalogue issued not long ago was £4,250, but the gross charge to the special catalogue account has been only £3,488 7s. 11d. The sales up to the end of April amounted to £1,361 1s. 10d., and there remain in stock 1,700 copies. The total membership of the library is now 2,912.

Bibliographical.

MR. G. K. CHESTERTON having quoted in his book on Robert Browning Mr. Swinburne's playful lines on "the weary and wearisome laureate of Oxonicules"—

There was a bad poet named Clough,
Whom his friends all united to puff, &c., a correspondent has been led to ask me when and where the little jeu d'esprit first appeared. It was introduced by Mr. Swinburne (with a variation in the second line) into a very interesting essay on "Social Verse" which he contributed to one of the magazines in 1891, and afterwards reproduced in his volume entitled "Studies in Prose and Verse" (1894). In this essay (it is worth recalling) Mr. Swinburne described Clough as "Mr. Lowell's realised ideal and chosen representative of English poetry at its highest in the generation of Tennyson and Browning." Mr. Lowell, of course, never said anything of the kind. Turn to his essay on "Swinburne's Tragedies" (in his "My Study Windows"), and you will find that what he really wrote was this: "We have a foreboding that Clough, imperfect as he was in many respects, and dying before he had subdued his sensitive temperament to the sterner requirements of his art, will be thought a hundred years hence to have been the truest expression in verse of the moral and intellectual tendencies, the doubt and struggle towards settled convictions, of the period in which he lived." I am sure Mr. Swinburne did not deliberately misrepresent Lowell; and yet reference to Lowell's actual words should have been easy.

Mr. Austin's "Flodden Field" made its appearance in book form on the morning after the performance of the play at His Majesty's Theatre. There has been some wonder that Mr. Tree did not prefer to stage the Laureate's "England's Darling" (published in 1895) which might have proved, dramatically, stronger. (It suggested, by the way, the title of a brochure, published in 1898, called "Alfred the Great, or England's Darling on the Egyptian Campaign.") Mr. Austin has always shown a penchant for the dramatic form in verse. He described his "Tower of Babel" (1874) as "a poetical drama"; his "Savonarola" (1881) and his "Prince Lucifer" (1887) were announced as "dramas in verse."

Reference has been made in the daily press to his old verse-satire, "The Season." This found a critic in the "Seasoning for a Seasoner" of B. B. Stevens (1861), and, indeed, the adverse comments were so numerous that Mr. Austin was led to reply in his "My Satire and its Censors." Has anybody ever read his first book, "Randolph," published just half a century ago? or his "Five Years of It," which came out five years later?

While grateful to Mr. A. H. Bullen for now giving publicity to the collection of Campion's Poems which he printed privately in 1889, we must not forget to acknowledge the labours of his predecessors in the popularisation of the old poet-musician. First of these may be named J. C. Collier, who, in his "Illustrations of Early English Popular Literature" (1863), included some "lyrics of old lutenists," among whom was Campion. Then came Mr. Arber in 1880 with "Lyrics, Elegies, &c.," of Campion's, included in "An English Garner." In 1896 the poet-musician was especially honoured, for while Mr. Ernest Rhys brought out a collection of his "Lyric Poems" in small but dainty form, Mr. J. Gray selected "Fifty Songs," for which Mr. C. Ricketts designed the "borders and decorations." It should be noted that Mr. Bullen includes in his book Campion's "Observations in the Art of English Poesie" (1602).

It may be news to some that the late Mr. George Bentley was among the literary publishers. It is well known that he did not accept without question the verdict of his "readers," and that he took special interest in the editing of "Temple Bar." More than this, it appears from a passage in Messrs. Coates and Bell's "Marie Corelli" that, just twenty years ago, Mr. Bentley printed for private circulation a little green-covered volume of prose essays—seven in all—on such subjects as "An Evening with Erasmus," "An Afternoon with Odd Volumes," "How the World Wags," and so forth. To this booklet he gave the title of "After Business"—which reminds me that "After Business Hours" was the title of a comedy by the late Augustin Daly.

Could not Messrs. Newnes have found some other translation of Goethe's "Faust" than Anster's with which to start their "Pocket Classics" series? Surely good old Anster has had his day? He figured in Henry Morley's "Universal Library" (1883), in Messrs. Routledge's "World Library" (1886), in Sir John Lubbock's "Hundred Best Books" (1893), and in last year's issues of the "Unit Library." Four reprints in twenty years are not so bad. Messrs. Newnes are more happily inspired in their selection, as their second "classic," of the memoirs of the first Duke and Duchess of Newcastle, though it is only ten years since Mr. Jenkins edited those memoirs for the "Golden Treasury" series under the title of "The Cavalier and his Lady."

The two latest additions to Messrs. Routledge's "Half-Forgotten Books" are G. H. Rodwell's "Old London Bridge" and Albert Smith's "Pottleton Legacy." The latter may pass; but surely "Old London Bridge" is more than "half" forgotten? I do not forget that Messrs. Routledge themselves revived the book, in two volumes, so recently as 1888. The edition of 1848-9 was published with illustrations. In 1861 the story was issued in an abridged form. Rodwell wrote, also, "The Memoirs of an Umbrella" (1845), and "Woman's Love" (1846). He is, however, likely to be best remembered, in the long run, by his books on musical science, and by his contributions to the stage (such as "My Wife's Out," "Teddy the Tiler," "I'll be your Friend," and so on). A poor farce lives longer than a poor novel.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

Mr. Lucas's "Lamb."

THE WORKS OF CHARLES AND MARY LAMB. Edited by E. V. Lucas. Vol. I. Miscellaneous Prose, 1798-1834. (Methuen. 7s. 6d. net.)

We suppose that a reviewer, strictly speaking, has nothing to do with the human side of modern authorship, with its patience and sacrifice, its hopes and trepidations. He is concerned with the result. Yet if imaginative sympathy is a necessary part of his equipment, how can he limit it to the result? Will he have no vision of his author's long labours of correspondence, transcription, and arrangement? May he not realise that a man must be older when he writes his "Finis" to a long work than when he made his first note, and that he may have lived in almost monastic submission to his task and ideal? For our part we think it proper to remember these things, and after careful study of this volume our first impulse is to congratulate Mr. Lucas on his approaching release, with honours, from a task of much toilsomeness and complexity. Literary endurance is not a thing to be taken as a matter of course, and he has shown that he possesses it in no ordinary degree. In this case, moreover, it has been the endurance of the winning runner. We wish to weigh our words, but we have no hesitation in saying that this volume indicates that the edition to which it belongs will for many years be the indispensable one to all students of Lamb.

Its note is its abundance and vigilance of help. Mr. Lucas has suppressed all impulse to sententious comment, and has consecrated his space to discovery and elucidation. It may be that some readers will miss that touch of the fugleman which most editors of Lamb have shown in their notes, but they will at once perceive that if Mr. Lucas does not play the tabor of appreciation unceasingly, he is unceasing in his attention to more practical matters. He gives more information than any other editor has dreamed of giving, and therefore has rightly refrained from adding one kind of abundance to another. Thus he will give us no critical introductions, a denial for which we are thankful in an age when most editors insist that we should formally shake hands with our oldest friends at their every appearance in the marketplace. What Mr. Lucas does give us is a body of notes of unexampled fulness. This volume alone contains about 160 pages of them, and many a page contains a dozen entries. The personal history, bibliography, allusions, and intellectual pedigree (so to speak) of every essay or article are studied with a scholar's passionate interest in detail. This, of course, and not the song and incense of appreciation, is the true work of the annotator. The result is an edition that is pre-eminently an Elian museum, to which the professed student and the ordinary reader whose interest has been quickened into inquiry must alike come. It was inevitable, as it was to be desired, that sooner or later Lamb should receive the tribute of unstinted supplementation. For it must be remembered that his immaterial charm, his Ariel allusiveness, were built not on air but on earth, not on passing fancy but on human experience as he found it in himself, his friends, and the complex age in which he lived. This tribute he has now received, and it is the concern as much of the general reader as of the specialist.

The present volume disposes of Lamb's miscellaneous prose, that is to say of all his prose except his work for children, his extended notes in the "Dramatic Specimens" and Garrick Extracts, his prose plays, and his Elia essays. Beginning with Rosamund Gray, these Miscellaneous writings are arranged chronologically from 1798 to 1834, the year of Lamb's death.

Eighteen compositions are here publicly identified as Lamb's for the first time. In some cases it does not appear that Mr. Lucas had to delve the oblivious earth very deeply in order to bring them into sight. Eight papers in the "Examiner," contributed to a feature called "Table Talk," can have escaped identification only because earlier editors shared the indolence of their reviewers. Thus a little piece called "A Sylvan Surprise" is proved to be Lamb's by an outlying remark of Hunt's in his essay on the "Suburbs of Genoa," where he says: "C. L. could not have been more startled when he saw the chimney-sweeper reclining in Richmond meadows." This obviously referred to something of Lamb's in print, and Mr. Lucas has found it in the "Examiner" paper that we have just named. Again, the conclusion of some "Playhouse Memoranda" has only to be read to be recognised as a sketch of the familiar Elia essay, "My First Play." So, also, in "A Town Residence" we find Lamb's unmistakable touch, and a quotation which he introduced eight years later into "The Old Benchers of the Inner Temple," the "bricky towers" lines of Spenser.

Just as surprising in its ease (after the event) is Mr. Lucas's discovery of Lamb's hand in a series of papers signed "Lepus" in the "New Times" in 1825. These have never before been identified as Lamb's, yet only search and an ordinary memory were needed to bring them to light. For example, there has long reposed in Canon Ainger's edition of the "Letters" a letter of 1831, written to Landor, in which Lamb complains humorously of a family of bores. In this he says:—

Next, I forgot to tell you I knew all your Welsh annoyances, the measureless B.'s. I knew a quarter of a mile of them. Seventeen brothers and sixteen sisters, as they appear to me in memory. There was one of them that used to fix his long legs on my fender, and tell a tale of a shark every night, endless, immortal. How have I grudged the salt-sea ravenor not having had his gorge of him! The shortest of the daughters measured five foot eleven without her shoes. Well, some day we may confer about them. But they were tall. Truly, I have discover'd the longitude.

It is hardly credible that this letter never before linked itself in the mind of an editor with the following passage in a "Lepus" paper called "Many Friends" in the "New Times" of 1825 (seven years earlier than the letter to Landor) and now presented by Mr. Lucas:—

There was my old friend Captain Beacham—he died some six years since, bequeathing to my friendship three stout young men, his sons, and seven girls, the tallest in the land. Pleasant, excellent young women they were, and for their sakes I did, and could endure much. But they were too tall. I am superstitious in that respect, and think that to a just friendship, something like proportion in stature as well as mind is desirable. Now I am five feet and a trifle more. Each of these young women rose to six, and one exceeded by two inches. The brothers are proportionately taller. I have sometimes taken the altitude of this friendship; and on a modest computation I may be said to have known at one time a whole furlong of Beachams. But the young women are married off, and dispersed among the provinces. The brothers are left. Nothing is more distasteful than these relics and parings of past friendships—unmeaning records of agreeable hours flown. There are three of them. If they hunted in triples, or even couples, it were something; but by a refinement of persecution, they contrive to come singly; and so spread themselves out into three evenings' molestation in a week. Nothing is so distasteful as a sight of their long legs, couched for continuance upon my fender. They have been mates of Indianmen; and one of them in particular has a story of a shark swallowing a boy in the bay of Calcutta. I wish the shark had swallowed him.

An heroic feature of Mr. Lucas's notes is his attempt to trace all Lamb's quotations to their sources. This is one of exceptional difficulty, both because of Lamb's wide and curious reading and because he will often quote only a couple of words, which might be from prose or verse.

One only regret we have in connection with the notes, and it is that the Hogarth pictures inserted in them for reference were not reproduced, as they might easily have been, from original Hogarth prints, instead of from T. Cook's re-engraved and sometimes reversed prints. The fascination of Hogarth depends so largely on his niceties, and these must have been so keenly enjoyed by Lamb, that we could have wished that originals had been employed. The reproduction of Gin Lane in Mr. Lucas's pages does not compare well with the one achieved by the same process in Mr. Dobson's "Hogarth." The most familiar picture in "Marriage à la Mode" is reversed, and the preference given to Cook's "March to Finchley" over Luke Sullivan's masterly print results in an illustration that might have been better. The worst instance is the boat scene in "Industry and Idleness," with its weird Thames banks, and gibbets. What with Cook's difficulty in getting an unreversed print, the different character of his line, and the omission of Hogarth's border and the text from Proverbs, this illustration is really not worthy of an Elia banquet.

One of Mr. Lucas's oddest discoveries is that Lamb was once placed in the stocks on a Sunday morning, for brawling during church hours, at Barnet. This fact bears directly on a paper entitled "The Confessions of H. V. H. Delamore, Esq.," in which this gentleman is made to confess with every humorous circumstance of reluctance and self-defence this long-past episode. To Mr. Bertram Dobell, whose "Side Lights on Charles Lamb" very recently appeared, belongs the credit of discovering by search and from internal evidence, that this paper is by Lamb. And now Mr. Lucas has supplied proof of the fact, which he had already permitted Mr. Dobell to publish, that the exquisite Delamore's experience was Lamb's own. His note says:—

Our evidence, which, fortified by this little article (a discovery of Mr. Bertram Dobell's), is very strong, is to be found on the fly-leaf on the annotated copy of Wither (see page 453) now in the possession of Mr. Swinburne, and originally given by Lamb to his friend, John Brook Pulham of the East India House, the author of the etched caricature of Elia. On this fly-leaf Pulham has recorded that during a country walk on a certain Sunday Lamb was set in the stocks for brawling while service was in progress. According to Mr. Delamore, the indignity was suffered at Barnet, and it was probably, if what he says about the short duration of the punishment be true, nearly as much a joke on the part of the authorities as on the part of Lamb. I cannot find any record of the incident in the Barnet archives, but the stocks are still standing, on the outskirts of Barnet, on Hadley Green.

It would be pleasant to pick out more nuggets of annotation from Mr. Lucas's pages, more especially one or two of his longer disquisitions. Never, we think, have all the questions arising out of Lamb's "Confessions of a Drunkard" been so thoroughly and judiciously considered. It would be impossible to quote in full a note which fills four and a half pages, but we are in agreement with Mr. Lucas in his gently expressed dissent from Mr. Thomas Hutchinson's theory that Lamb wrote this paper of 1813 as a joke at the expense of the Quaker editor (William Allen) of the "Philanthropist," where it first appeared. As he says: "Lamb's jokes were always jokes, and it is difficult, sitting down to these 'Confessions' with what anticipation we will of humour or whimsicality, to rise from them in anything but sadness. They are too real for a 'flam.'"

We have left undescribed many of the editor's careful anticipations of his reader's wants. It must be added that Messrs. Methuen have produced an excellent format. The page is large and generous, the type admirably clear, and the paper has, we think, been chosen with special skill. The second of Mr. Lucas's seven volumes will contain the Elia essays, and we understand that the issue of all the remaining volumes will be rapid.

"The Family of Love."

RISE AND FALL OF THE ANABAPTISTS. By E. Belfort Bax. (Swan Sonnenschein. 6s.)

IN closing the third and final volume in his interesting study of the Reformation, Mr. Belfort Bax makes an ingenuous disclosure. It is evident that the religious movements of the middle ages would not have concerned him much if it were not for their association with things secular. Thomas Münzer, Jan of Leyden, Jan Mattheys, and the rest of those who "sought the revindication of social justice in the early sixteenth century," are admitted to have had follies and shortcomings; "but," says Mr. Bax, "they were, in a sense, the forerunners of Modern Socialism, and, as such, let us spare them a passing tribute of recognition." They certainly deserve recognition; but it is surprising to find Mr. Bax making it in a spirit scarcely to be distinguished from gratitude. Though they were eminent in their way, one would hardly expect socialism, or any other ism, to regard them as creditable ancestry. Their principles, it is true, were not dissimilar from those of certain Protestant communions to-day. It may be said that they were merely a particularly earnest faction in the revolt from Rome. They held that each human being had the right of literally interpreting the Scriptures according to his "inner light"; that any man conscious of a "call" was entitled to preach; that "they were the true Church of Christ, well pleasing to God"; and that, as Christians resist no evil, they "needed no law courts, nor should ever make use of the tribunals." The Anabaptists of nigh four hundred years ago, that is to say, were uncommonly like the United Presbyterians of Scotland early in the nineteenth century. Apart from the students who include the phenomena of humanity in the purview of natural history, not much is known about the "U. P.'s." About them, therefore, an explanatory word may be considered relevant. In "Lothair," Disraeli makes one of his characters, a cardinal, announce, as a colossal secret, that the new "church" in Scotland was in reality a means taken by Rome to bring back the Northmen, and consequently the English, to the bosom of the Church; but that must have been a mistake. At any rate, the United Presbyterians, who at the beginning avowed themselves a purely spiritual body, having nothing to do with politics and nothing to say to the law, speedily became the bitterest sect of worldlings beyond the Tweed. Having spent more than half a century in attempting to abolish Church and State, two years ago, in despair, they sought and obtained union with the Free Church, an organization which promotes progress by methods of a Fabian kind.

Like the Voluntaries of later day, the Anabaptists were impelled towards departure from their original tenets. That was inevitable. Political developments came naturally from their creed.—

Behind the meetings for Bible reading and mutual exhortation, behind the breaking of bread, the "Sacrament," were duties and obligations and a general regulation of life on the basis of common principles, a regulation enforced by the moral influence of the members of the community upon each member. The rules relating to property, which always involved at least the duty of assisting the community alike individually and collectively, were obligatory upon every member. These rules ranged, as we have seen, from a kind of compulsory almsgiving to complete communism.

The Anabaptists declared all who were not within the fold to be an abomination to God; objected to every governmental function; and recognised no relation to the State. In short, soon they were as much in the hum of secular commotion as any modern man what time the floods of demonstration are out upon Hyde Park. They came into constant collision with the forces of law and order. That, however, is far from being the most instructive incident in their history. As theologians generally are, they were aggressive in logic, and were not afraid of the results to which some of their tenets led.—

Their special distinction consisted in the dogma that the elect could not sin. They carried this point so far as to strike out of the Paternoster the words "Forgive us our trespasses." They appear to have held a kind of antinomian doctrine, which has often appeared in the history of theologico-ethical speculation, to the effect that the baptised believer might do what he liked, since, if he sinned, it affected the body alone, with which his soul had no more to do than with any of the other things of this world.

Their otherworldliness had issues which convince us, somewhat shockingly, that a certain Tory philosopher was not so far out in his reckoning as he seemed to be when, some years ago, in what was considered a most scurrilous article, he declared that Socialism would lead to the nationalisation of human love as well as to the nationalisation of the land. This seems actually to have happened. It was one of the first fruits of the Anabaptist evangelical Communism. "The question of property-holding was, as may be imagined, a great bone of contention. That of the right or duty of cohabitation with a husband or wife (as the case might be) who was outside the fold was hotly debated." Indeed, after a process of reasoning which is detailed by Mr. Bax, the original Evangelical Socialists held that Heaven plainly meant women "to become harlots."

The antinomian doctrine of course came in here, according to which, for the re-baptised, sin was impossible, as no bodily act could affect the soul of the believer. "For the women did sin in having intercourse with their husbands, but they did not sin when having intercourse with brethren, because in that case there was a spiritual bond between them."

These happenings were in Germany; but our own country was not altogether without similar cantrips. Anabaptism crossed the sea to England, and in the reign of Elizabeth it "took definite shape in the form of a sect or party calling themselves the Family of Love." As the subjects of good Queen Bess were unsympathetic, the revival had to be conducted mainly in secret. At any rate, Mr. Bax's account of what went on in England is meagre. "The meetings," it was written, "were first of all held in Shoemaker's Alley, in London, beginning at four o'clock in the afternoon and sometimes continuing till nine o'clock the next morning, which time was spent in drunkenness, uncleanness, blasphemous words, filthy songs, and mixed dancing of men and women stark naked." It was not a friendly historian who published these words; but a document purporting to be a summons to one of the meetings for the promotion of the Cause of Progress, which was picked up in a tavern, lends weight to the historian's dark misgivings. It ran as followeth: "Dear Sister and Fellow Creature, whose sweetness we reverence and whose person we adore, whose witty conceits we admire and whose subtlety we wonder at, we do by this our handwriting enjoin that you personally appear, at the place where we last had some infernal conference, half an hour past four in the afternoon of the present day." On the Continent, we learn from Mr. Bax's vivid narrative, the Anabaptists formed not a few industrious and highly prosperous communities. That is remarkable. A marvel of the same sort came about in the United States, where in respect of their successful enterprises the Mormons were, and are, a cause of envy to the orthodox among the neighbouring citizens. England also has witnessed a similar thing. It is noteworthy, Mr. Bax writes, that the parts of England where the Anabaptists chiefly flourished "became the most fruitful seed-ground of Quaker principles. By their contemporaries the Friends were uniformly regarded as a sect of Anabaptists, as may be seen from the theological literature of the period." The Quakers are notoriously a wealthy people. Unhappily for Mr. Bax, they do not show much practical favour to the aspirations of Socialism. It is to his credit that he deals so gently with what must seem to him their errors. Indeed, our chief critical feeling after reading this book is that, though a zealot, Mr. Bax is a capable and sprightly historian.

Fiction.

THE WAY OF ALL FLESH. By Samuel Butler. (Grant Richards.)

THIS posthumous tale by the author of "Erewhon" is not really the latest of his works. A prefatory note by Mr. R. A. Streatfield tells us that it was written between 1872 and 1884 and then laid aside with the intention that some day it should be rewritten. It is extremely characteristic of Mr. Samuel Butler's individual temperament and outlook upon life, whimsical and discursive in method, racy in expression, and full of satire which is often genial and occasionally, to our taste at least, a little acrid. According to Mr. Streatfield, the work was largely contemporaneous with "Life and Habit," and may be regarded as "a practical illustration of the theory of heredity embodied in that book." We regret that we do not recall what Mr. Butler's precise theory of heredity is. What "The Way of All Flesh" chiefly illustrates is the antagonism of the generations, and its satire is mainly levelled at certain more or less unconscious views of parental responsibility which the author detects lurking beneath the moral pretensions of the British bourgeoisie. They may be summed up as "will-breaking":—

At that time it was universally admitted that to spare the rod was to spoil the child, and St. Paul had placed disobedience to parents in very ugly company. If his children did anything which Mr. Pontifex disliked they were clearly disobedient to their father. In that case there was obviously only one course for a sensible man to take. It consisted in checking the first signs of self-will while his children were still too young to offer serious resistance. If their wills were "well broken" in childhood, to use an expression then much in vogue, they would acquire habits of obedience which they would not venture to break through till they were over twenty-one years old. Then they might please themselves: he should know how to protect himself: till then he and his money were more at their mercy than he liked.

The narrative, for Mr. Butler is nothing if not biographical, carries us through the history of several generations of Pontifexes. It is upon the head of the Rev. Theobald Pontifex, who has the misfortune to be a priest as well as a parent, that the vials of the author's scorn are most liberally poured. And the story culminates in the career of the Rev. Theobald's son Ernest. The will of Ernest Pontifex is broken in youth. He grows up with an extreme ignorance of the world, which lands him first in prison and subsequently in a most undesirable marriage. Finally he touches earth, like Antaeus, in the bitterness of experience, and rises up to be a man and hate his father. A philosophical doctrine as to the formation of character by personal experience seems to be at the bottom of the book, but it must be observed that Ernest Pontifex was much helped in the task of recovering his balance in life by the receipt of an unexpected legacy of £70,000.

THE SHADOW ON THE QUARTER-DECK. By Major W. P. Drury. (Chapman and Hall. 3s. 6d.)

OUR habit of specialization has the trick of limiting the individual outlook to a particular province, so that a modern writer, as a rule, is bright only in a special focus, and lacks the universality of the ancients. Major Drury's "province" is the Marine, that unfamiliar amphibian with the ribald nicknames, and out of this province Major

Drury has brought us much that is amusing with a good deal that is new. "The Shadow on the Quarter-deck" is somewhat violent in its manner, and a shade flamboyant in its humour, but both violence and flamboyance are of the sort due to an excess of good animal spirits upon an uncritical mind. The action is emphasized into melodrama: the humour is, as it were, placarded, but both go to make a very boisterous and merry story. It seems that Major Drury has had in mind a desire to acquit his service from the charges brought against it these many years by the men of the Navy proper. He has made his hero a bold Major of Marines. He has made his villain (a most healthy scoundrel, by the way) a post-captain R.N., and the action takes place aboard the latter's command, H.M.S. "Belligerent." Without any seeking after effect, and in a few suggestive words here and there, Major Drury gives a strangely vital picture of the life aboard a battleship, both in the wardroom and on the lower-deck. The chapter dealing with gun-practice, and the chapter telling of a furious gale in the Atlantic, are both admirable. Two phrases will show the reader Major Drury's effective power of narrative:—

Overhead the trucks of the two military topmasts were sweeping great ellipses on the night.

And

A little crowd of bare-footed seamen in oilskins came skidding along the poop (dodging the charging projectiles with cat-like agility).

Major Drury is more at ease when writing of the rank and file than when describing the wardroom mess. His book is eminently readable, though we think his talent would give us better things if it flowed in deeper channels.

ALL THE WINNERS. By Nathaniel Gubbins. (John Long. 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a volume of sketches, stories and reminiscences, and belongs to a class of "literature" which owes much of its popularity to the "Sporting Times." It deals with an odd world—with odd ideals; a world in which the backing of horses is known as "the great game," in which "dear little women" put their money on with the "metallicians," in which "the eminent bookmaker" is not Mr. Percy Fitzgerald of Dickens-land, but one Mr. Henry Steel, of Newmarket Heath; a world in which a heath suggests nothing but the odds and champagne or curses to follow, a world of dull rowdies in which there is nothing but a previous conviction to distinguish a "sportsman" from "one of the boys," nothing but dress to distinguish a duchess from a drab. Treated by an artist, or even by a mere humorist, this world of squalid ideals might blossom with meaning or sparkle with fun. But Nathaniel Gubbins does not stand—in the literary sense—far enough away from these intolerable cads to get their proper focus.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

THE KING OF FOLLY ISLAND. By SARAH ORNE JEWETT.

A volume of eight stories, some of which have already appeared in "Harper's," "Scribner's," and "The Atlantic." The title story describes a holiday which an American man of business spent on a small island near the coast of Maine, and of which a fisherman recluse to whom it belonged was "King." The fisherman's daughter, in her enforced isolation, is a pathetic figure, and the story suggests that at her death she was able to impart to her new friend "a legacy of all her unsatisfied hopes and dreams." (Duckworth. 3s. 6d.)

JUICY JOE.

By JAMES BLYTH.

Mr. James Blyth believes that the people of the Norfolk Marshlands are the most brutalized and degraded inhabitants of these islands, and he has written this book to prove it. "In the tragedy of the marshes," he says, "I have not inserted a brutal action, not a coarse word, which has not been actually done or said to my personal knowledge, or been within the sphere of probability," and he admits that the purpose of the story is to impel others to find a remedy for the state of things which he describes. He calls the book a romance, and dedicates it to Mr. Max Pemberton. (Richards. 6s.)

THE LOVE OF MONSIEUR.

By GEORGE GIBBS.

A spirited romance of Stuart times. Monsieur Mornay was of the Embassy of France, and when the story opens he pays his addresses to the Vicomtesse de Bresac, who hates him as a "lady killer" and despises him as a foundling. But by a confession of the lady's guardian, who is killed by the hero in a duel, it is revealed that she has no right to the title and that the real Vicomte is none other than Monsieur himself. The story moves rapidly through a series of exciting adventures, and the love of Monsieur is at length returned. (Harper. 6s.)

THREE GLASS EYES.

By WILLIAM LE QUEUX.

One of Mr. Le Queux's characteristic sensational stories. This time the villain is a millionaire who, in the accomplishment of his crimes, makes use, among other ingenious devices, of Eastern leprosy imparted by an Abyssinian ring. The book opens with a murder and closes with a marriage, and the action passes in England. (Treherne. 6s.)

THE MISCHIEF OF A GLOVE.

By MRS. PHILIP CHAMPION DE CRESPIGNY.

A Tudor romance by the author of "From Behind the Arras," which appeared in the First Novel Library. The story opens in the reign of Queen Mary at a feudal castle with its courtyard and keep, and "a modern wing." The narrator is the daughter of the lord, a fierce baron of the olden time, and the man she loved had nearly fallen a victim to the Spaniard, when, in the last chapter, we hear the news that "the Queen is dead and the Princess Elizabeth has come to the throne." (Unwin. 6s.)

HIS DAUGHTER FIRST.

By ARTHUR SHERBURNE HARDY.

An American story of domestic life. The widow at whose house the book opens had received an offer of marriage from a friend, whose daughter had views on second marriages. "I think it perfectly horrid for a woman to marry a second time, don't you? If anyone should ever think of marrying my papa, how I should hate her." This was in a letter to the widow, and forms the problem of the story, which suffers somewhat from padding. (Harper. 6s.)

THE MANNERINGS.

By ALICE BROWN.

Another American domestic story written in a very serious vein and involving a criticism of the bases of domesticity. When Katherine told her friend that she was about to leave her husband the latter asked whether she had been in love with him. "In love with him! What does that mean? I met him in the spring. There's a kind of madness in the spring. We share it with the birds," and so on. There are other problems in the book, but they are treated with elaborate and painstaking analysis. (Nash. 6s.)

Tourist Supplement.

DAVID NUTT,

57-59, LONG ACRE.

Books for Continental Travel and for the Holiday Season.

THE CYCLIST'S CONTINENTAL COMPANION. Giving a choice of Routes throughout the best Cycling Districts of France, Belgium, and the Ardennes District, Holland, Germany, Switzerland, and Italy, indicating Distances from place to place, marking Hotels and Pensions, &c. Compiled from personal experience and the best authorities by VIATORES. 16mo, printed at the Constable Press, with special type, on the finest opaque paper, so as to bring the very considerable amount of information furnished within the compass of a waistcoat pocket volume. Limp cover, 1s. 1s. 1d. post free.

NUTT'S CONVERSATION DICTIONARIES.

By R. JASCHKE.

1. English-French. 2. English-German. 3. English-Italian. Each with Revised Vocabulary at the end. 32mo. Upwards of 450 pages. Printed by Constable, on the finest Opaque Paper. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

4. English-Spanish. 3s. 6d.

In the short space during which this admirable series of Traveller's Pocket Dictionaries has been before the public many thousands of copies have been sold. They combine all the qualities of a Dictionary and a conversational guide book. The Publisher has received hundreds of unsolicited testimonials.

THE POCKET INTERPRETER. Dialogues for Travellers in English, French, German, and Norwegian-Danish. By V. CULMSEE. Square 32mo, flexible cloth, 1s.

.. The only Pocket Conversation Book for Denmark and Norway.

PHONETIC SERIES.

By H. SWAN.

PRACTICAL HANDBOOKS FOR ENGLISH-SPEAKING TRAVELLERS AND STUDENTS. With the Exact Pronunciation indicated phonetically upon a new Series.

1. Colloquial French. Sixth Edition, with Appendix for Cyclists and Amateur Photographers. 1s.
2. Colloquial German. Third Edition, with Appendices for Cyclists and Photographers. 1s. 6d.
3. Colloquial Italian. Second Edition. 1s. 6d.
4. Colloquial Spanish. [In the press.]

A SIMPLIFIED FRENCH CONVERSATIONAL MANUAL: or, How to Converse in French whilst Travelling, at the Hotel, Restaurant, Shopping, with the Principal Routes to Paris and Places of Interest. By LOUISE LITTA. 12mo, 160 pp. Limp cloth, 1s. 6d.

.. Equally suited for the Traveller, or for use in the Class Room.

GREMLI'S FLORA OF SWITZERLAND FOR TOURISTS AND FIELD BOTANISTS. Translated by L. W. PATTERSON. Crown 8vo, xxiv, 454 pp. Limp cloth, 7s. 6d. net.

.. The Standard Alpine Flora for Advanced Botanists.

SCHROTER (L. and C.). Coloured Vademecum to the Alpine Flora, for the use of Tourists in Switzerland. 202 Coloured and Ten Plain Alpine Flowers. Text in English, French, and German. Eighth Edition, 1903. Crown 8vo, cloth, net 6s.

.. The best elementary introduction to the study of Alpine Botany.

VAN DYKE (H.). Little Rivers. Essays in profitable idleness. Square crown 8vo, 291 pp. Thirty-one Illustrations. Fancy cloth, 6s.

.. A Charming Series of Angling Sketches in New and Old England, Canada, Scotland, Norway, and the Tyrol.

FIELD AND FOLK LORE. An Attempt to help the Beginner in the Studies of our Wild Mammals, Birds, Snails, Trees, Flowers, Grasses, Ferns, Fossils, Flint Implements, and Gothic Architecture, together with Chapters on the Nature Diary, Field and School Rambling Clubs, and a London Park. By HARRY LOWERISON, Author of "In England Now" and "Sweet-Briar Sprays." With a Chapter on FOLK LORE by ALFRED NUTT. Crown 8vo, 96 pp., stiff wrapper, 6d. net. 7d. post free.

EDWARD STANFORD'S LIST

MURRAY'S HANDBOOKS FOR TRAVELLERS.

"The pioneers in their own particular class."—Westminster Gazette.
"The old Murrys . . . still keep to the front as accurate and trustworthy companions as well as comely and charming books."—Pall Mall Gazette.

FOREIGN HANDBOOKS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

SYRIA AND PALESTINE (The Holy Land). A Revised Edition, largely Rewritten. Edited by MARY BRODRICK, Ph.D. 26 Maps and Plans, 18s.

FRANCE, Part II. Central France, Auvergne, The Cevennes, Burgundy, the Rhône and Saône, Provence, Nîmes, Arles, the French Alps, Alsace, Lorraine, Champagne, &c. 23 Maps and Plans. 18th Edition, 7s. 6d.

PARIS AND ENVIRONS. Maps and Plans, crown 8vo, 2s. 6d.

DENMARK AND ICELAND. 6 Maps and Plans. 6th Edition, 7s. 6d.

NORWAY. 13 Maps and Plans. 8th Edition, 7s. 6d.

SOUTH GERMANY AND AUSTRIA, Part I. Würtemberg, Bavaria, Austria, Hungary, Istria, &c. With 34 Maps and Plans. 16th Edition, 7s. 6d.

SOUTH GERMANY AND AUSTRIA, Part II. The Tirol, Salzburg, Styria, and the Eastern Alps. 7 Maps and Plans. 15th Edition, 6s.

SWITZERLAND, Part I. Switzerland without the Pennine Alps. With 16 Maps and Plans. 18th Edition, 6s.

SWITZERLAND, Part II. The Pennine Alps, portions of the French and Piedmontese Alps, and the Italian Lakes. With 12 Maps and Plans, 6s.

SPAIN. In 2 Parts. 8th Edition, 20s.

PORTUGAL, with Madeira, the Azores, and Canaries. Maps and Plans, 12s.

NORTH ITALY AND VENICE. 34 Maps and Plans. 16th Edition, 10s.

CENTRAL ITALY AND FLORENCE. 23 Maps and Plans. 12th Edition, 9s.

ROME AND ITS ENVIRONS. 94 Maps and Plans. 16th Edition, 10s.

SOUTH ITALY, Part I. 10 Maps and Plans. 9th Edition, 6s.

SOUTH ITALY, Part II. Sicily. 9 Maps and Plans. 9th Edition, 6s.

GREECE. 7th Edition. 38 Maps and Plans, 20s.

ALGERIA AND TUNIS. 18 Maps and Plans. 5th Edition, 10s. 6d.

CONSTANTINOPLE. 12 Maps and Plans, 7s. 6d.

EGYPT. 34 Maps and Plans. 10th Edition, 15s.

ASIA MINOR: Transcaucasia, Persia, &c. 23 Maps, 18s.

NEW ZEALAND. 18 Maps and Plans, 7s. 6d.

ENGLISH HANDBOOKS.

JUST PUBLISHED.

LINCOLNSHIRE.—Grantham, Lincoln, Crowland, Stamford, Bourne, Boston, Grimsby, The Wolds, Skegness, Gainsborough, &c. 2nd Edition, Revised and largely Rewritten. Map and 3 Plans, 7s. 6d.

"We can conceive nothing better than the discretion which has been displayed, and the knowledge which has been brought to bear with respect to the information included—whether historical, antiquarian, architectural, or general. Very valuable features are the architectural and technical glossary and the detailed index."—Lincolnshire Chronicle.

BERKS. Entirely Rewritten. With 5 Maps and Plans, 6s.

CORNWALL. 7 Maps and Plans. 11th Edition, 6s.

DERBY, NOTTS, LEICESTER, AND STAFFORD. 12 Maps and Plans. 3rd Edition, 9s.

DEVON. 12 Maps and Plans. 11th Edition, 7s. 6d.

DURHAM AND NORTHUMBERLAND. 5 Maps and Plans, 10s.

EASTERN COUNTIES. 7 Maps and Plans. 3rd Edition, 12s.

GLOUCESTERSHIRE. 3 Maps and Plans. 4th Edition, 6s.

HAMPSHIRE. 8 Maps and Plans. 5th Edition, 6s.

HERTS, HUNTINGDON, AND BEDS. 10 Maps and Plans, 7s. 6d.

ISLE OF WIGHT. Map. 5th Edition, 2s. 6d.

KENT. 7 Maps. 5th Edition, 7s. 6d.

THE LAKES (WESTMORLAND & CUMBERLAND). 5 Maps, 8s.

LANCASHIRE. Map, 6s.

NORTHAMPTON AND RUTLAND. 4 Maps and Plans, 2nd Edition, 7s. 6d.

OXFORDSHIRE. 13 Maps and Plans, 6s.

SHROPSHIRE AND CHESHIRE. 8 Maps and Plans. 3rd Edition, 6s.

SOMERSET. 8 Maps and Plans. 5th Edition, 6s.

SURREY. 6 Maps. 5th Edition, 6s.

SUSSEX. 7 Maps. 5th Edition, 6s.

NORTH WALES. 5 Maps. 5th Edition, 6s.

SOUTH WALES. Map. 4th Edition, 6s.

WARWICKSHIRE. 10 Maps and Plans, 6s.

WILTS AND DORSET. 9 Maps and Plans. 5th Edition, 6s.

WORCESTER AND HEREFORD. 5 Maps. 4th Edition, 5s.

YORKSHIRE. 12 Maps and Plans. 3rd Edition, 12s.

IRELAND. 43 Maps and Plans. 6th Edition, 9s.

SCOTLAND. 53 Maps and Plans. 7th Edition, 9s.

ENGLAND AND WALES. Alphabetically Arranged. 2nd Edition. Map, 12s.

ENVIRONS OF LONDON. 20 Miles Round the Metropolis. 2 Parts, 21s.

TOURISTS' CATALOGUE.

Stanford's Catalogue of Maps and Books for Tourists post-free on application.

London: EDWARD STANFORD, 12, 13, & 14, Long Acre, W.C., Geographer to His Majesty the King.

J. M. DENT & Co.
Write for Prospectus of Dent's New LAMB.
New Complete Catalogue Post Free.

"THE CULT OF ST. FRANCOIS."
SONS OF FRANCIS. By ANNE MAC-
DONELL. With Illustrations from Italian Paintings, 12s. 6d. net.
Spectator.—"A book of singular fascination."
Times.—"Miss Macdonell has made fine and distinguished use of her opportunity.... This book can hardly fail to become a standard authority on its own subject."
* See the "Temple Classics" Edition of the Franciscan Trilogy—MIRROR OF PERFECTION, LEGEND OF ST. FRANCIS, and LITTLE FLOWERS OF ST. FRANCIS (Sixth Edition). Each 1s. 6d. net, cloth; 2s. net, lambskin.

THE LARGER MEDIEVAL TOWN SERIES.
SIENA and SAN GIMIGNANO. By
EDMUND G. GARDNER. Very fully Illustrated with Reproductions and Topographical Drawings by HELEN M. JAMES. Demy 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.
Pall Mall Gazette.—"A most charming and scholarly account.... Those who know Mr. Gardner's former work—for example his book on Florence—will not need to be told that he tells his story with a charm and vividness of style that are good to meet with."

FLORENCE. By E. G. GARDNER. Very fully Illustrated, 10s. 6d. net. Second Edition thus—fourth in smaller form.

COMPANIONS FOR THE TOURIST.
Full particulars free.

DENT'S COUNTY GUIDES. Edited by G. A. B. DEWAR. Each volume with Special Articles by Experts, and numerous Sketches and Maps, 4s. 6d. net.
LAKE COUNTIES—SURREY—NORFOLK—HAMPSHIRE and I.W.

The CATHEDRALS of GREAT BRITAIN
By P. H. DITCHFIELD, M.A., F.S.A., F.R.Hist.S. With 75 Illustrations by H. RAILTON and others, 7s. 6d. net; roan, 9s. net.
The Spectator says:—"Few tour-ers are more interesting than one to the cathedrals.... For such a journey this volume would be an excellent companion."

The MEDIAEVAL TOWN SERIES. Each volume with numerous Drawings, Reproductions and Maps, 3s. 6d. net, and 4s. 6d. net each; also in roan 1s. extra.
ASSIST—BRUGES—CAIRO—CHARTRES—CONSTANTINOPLE—
FLORENCE—MOSCOW—NUREMBERG—PERUGIA—PRAGUE—ROME—
ROUEN—TOLEDO—VERONA.

J. M. DENT & Co., 29 & 30, BEDFORD STREET, LONDON.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.
Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.
Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo. ONE SHILLING EACH. Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING, A. W.
KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.C.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.
THE CHANNEL ISLANDS.
THE NORFOLK BROADS.
THE ISLE OF WIGHT.
BRECON and its BEAONS.
THE WYE VALLEY.
ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.
THE SEVERN VALLEY.
BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.
BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.
{ LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR. }
{ LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CARNARVON. }
ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLETH, and ABERDOVEY.
CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, & FESTINIOG.
BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLECH, CRICCIETH, and PwLLHELL.
MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, & CHELTENHAM.
LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

1s.—THE HOTELS of the WORLD. A Handbook to the leading hotels throughout the world.

"What would not the intelligent tourist in Paris or Rome give for such a guide book as this, which teaches so much that is outside the usual scope of such volumes!"—The Times.
"It very emphatically tops them all."—Daily Graphic.
"The best Handbook to London ever issued."—Liverpool Daily Post.
THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.
By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.
With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.
London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd.,
The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers. Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

ISBISTER.

Astronomy for Everybody
A Popular Exposition of the Wonders of the Heavens.
By PROFESSOR SIMON NEWCOMB, LL.D.
With an introduction by Sir Robert S. Ball.
Illustrated. Demy 8vo. 7/6

The Persian Problem
An Examination into the Rival Positions of Russia and Great Britain in Persia, with some account of the Persian Gulf and Bagdad Railway.
By H. J. WHIGHAM. 12/6
With Illustrations and Maps. Demy 8vo.

The Memories of Sir Llewelyn Turner
An Important Volume of Recollections.
Edited by J. E. VINCENT. 16/-
With many Illustrations. Medium 8vo.

2nd EDITION NOW READY.
The Hill of Trouble
Stories Mystical, Mediaeval and Supernatural.
By ARTHUR C. BENSON. 6/-
Crown 8vo.

Clerical Love Stories
By ALFRED B. COOPER. 3/6
With Nine Full-page Illustrations.

A Lad of the O'Friel's
By SEUMAS MACMANUS (The "Irish Barrie"). 6/-
Author of "Donegal Fairy Stories." Crown 8vo.

The Light Invisible
Tales of a Visionary.
By ROBERT BENSON. 3/6
Crown 8vo.

Wolfville Days
Tales of a Western Cattle Town.
By ALFRED HENRY LEWIS. 3/6
Crown 8vo.

My Nature Notebook
A Year's Observations of British Wild Life.
By E. KAY ROBINSON. 2/6
Crown 8vo.

A New Edition of "THE ETRICK SHEPHERD."
The Poems of James Hogg
Edited by WILLIAM WALLACE, M.A.
With a Photograph of the Poet. 5/-
Crown 8vo.

The Impregnable Rock of Holy Scripture
By the late RIGHT HON. W. E. GLADSTONE.
A New and Cheaper Edition. Cloth, Crown 8vo. 2/-

The Life of Dante
By DEAN PLUMPTRE.
Illustrated with a Reproduction of Mr. Holliday's famous picture of "Dante and Beatrice." 1/6 net.
A Cheaper Edition. Cloth, Gilt-lettered.

Wisdom While You Wait
1/- net. 50th Thousand. 1/- net.

Wisdom on the Hire System
6d. net. 25th Thousand. 6d. net.

Gulliver Joe
1/- net. 17th Thousand. 1/- net.

Ready Shortly, Another Funny Book,
The Log of the Folly
By ALLEN UPWARD.
With a Cover Design by Hassall.
Illustrated by Thos. Downey. 1/- net.

ISBISTER & Co., Ltd.,
15 & 16, TAVISTOCK STREET, LONDON, W.C.

Tourist Supplement.

SATURDAY: 13 JUNE, 1903.

Books about Places.

A Retrospect.

DURING the past year many topographical and travel books have been published, but few have been of outstanding interest; in the main they lack personality. No novelist has set down his impressions, as Mr. Gissing did in "By the Ionian Sea," nor has such a writer as Mr. Hilaire Belloc tramped it to Rome or elsewhere. Of plain and unadorned guide-books there is no end, and it is pleasant to record that these improve as time goes on; but the topographical books that make any claim as literature are rare. This is the more to be regretted in an age in which most people are more or less travellers—travellers, but not loiterers by the way. It is for the loiterer by the way that the true book of place or travel should be written; it is the loiterer by the way who has time to consider what he sees in relation to his own individuality, and who likes also to compare his conclusions with those of men who have grown contentedly weary on the same road. There is an infinite human sympathy in that contented weariness, whether it be of mind or body, and from it, on the rebound, springs the best kind of appreciation. Why do not a few of the many writers who travel, and who address letters to the newspapers on indifferent topics from places whose mere names are an allurements, tell us of what they have seen and rejoiced in? Perhaps it is because they do not see, and have no faculty for simple joy.

The most individual book of the kind to which we refer is Mr. W. H. Hudson's "Hampshire Days" (Longmans), noticed by us only a fortnight ago. Mr. Hudson's book is topographical, which is well, but it is also human and steeped in personality, which is much better. Such a book reconciles us to life in conditions not wholly natural by reason of its outlook upon those natural things to which we may yet attain. Other naturalists, as we said, have been employed in work similar to Mr. Hudson's, but other naturalists are mostly content just to record their scientific observations. Mr. Hudson brings those observations into touch with human things, so that his book is "a delicate, sombre, and suggestive monologue on life."

The most important London book is, of course, the late Sir Walter Besant's "London in the Eighteenth Century" (Black). It was at first supposed that Sir Walter's great scheme would include a modern "survey" of London, giving an orderly and particular account of its streets and houses; we were, indeed, to have a perambulation. But such a task was too great for his years, and to such a temperament as his the side-issues raised would have been too alluring. The finely produced "London in the Eighteenth Century" proved to be a larger and more highly organised work of the type of the author's "London," "Westminster," and kindred books. Sir Walter's natural and inevitable point of view as a novelist, leading him to search for picturesque episode, rather injured his work as an historian, but both to the general reader and the student his magnum opus is full of matter. It is a compendium of fact, anecdote, statistics and description. He was not a writer who took much count of the philosophy of history, and he was not over exact as to his authorities; indeed, he specifically warned his readers not to ask him for authorities. There we have the way of the novelist, and not the way of the writer of exact history; but when all is said, Sir Walter's work remains a worthy literary monument to the London which he knew and loved so well, and for which he worked, in many directions, with such generous and consistent devotion.

Amongst other London books we have had the usual guides, and several volumes in the "Fascination of London" series (Black), notably those on Chelsea, the Strand District, and Kensington. A volume of more than usual interest to many Londoners is Mr. C. G. Harper's "Cycle Rides round London" (Chapman and Hall). Mr. Harper not only writes with simple zest of the country which he covers, but he is full of local associations, which he sets forth with personal interest and an evident pleasure in such gossip.

The year has perhaps been richer in books of travel and description outside England than within its borders. A volume of great interest and importance is the Duke of the Abruzzi's "On 'The Polar Star' in the Arctic Sea." The ship was arrested in Teplitz Bay, where she had to be abandoned. There the hardships began. The crew and provisions were transferred to a hut on shore, and soon afterwards the Duke lost two fingers by frostbite; whereupon the command of the sledge expedition was bestowed upon Captain Cagni. The expedition pushed as far as 86° 34' N. latitude, and so eclipsed previous pilgrimages.

Three other books of travel in distant lands worthy of particular mention are Mr. Sarat Chandra Das's "Journey to Lhasa and Central Tibet" (Murray), the Earl of Ronaldshay's "Sport and Politics under an Eastern Sky" (Blackwood), and Sir Martin Conway's "Aconcagua and Tierra del Fuego" (Cassell). Mr. Das's record had rested for twenty years in the pigeon-holes of the India Office; but the difficulties of travel in Tibet do not decrease, so that even to-day his account remains the most authentic now extant. The Earl of Ronaldshay's book is unassuming and stamped with veracity; with small literary skill he yet succeeds in conveying to us the alluring spell of the East. Sir Martin Conway's "Aconcagua and Tierra del Fuego" is a book of a different class. All lovers of travel and the virile spirit are debtors to Sir Martin for a great deal, and not least for this last volume. We are to have no more records of exploration from this most kindly and human of travellers.

Before passing to books dealing with the British Isles, there are two or three histories of places to which particular reference must be made. First of these, perhaps, comes Mr. Langton Douglas's "History of Siena" (Murray). Many cities have been vulgarised, but Siena yet retains something of an incommunicable dignity and reticence, and it is the city's dignity and reticence which Mr. Douglas has expressed. His personal feeling for the Tuscan city is visible on every page. He frankly holds a brief for Siena, and the curious irony of history has compelled him to hold it against Florence. In this light Mr. Douglas sees the city of Dante as Siena's hereditary enemy. The chapter on Siennese painting is naturally of the first importance, and is worthy of the rest of Mr. Douglas's admirable book. It seems a far cry from Siena to the Holy Land, but Lady Butler's "Letters from the Holy Land" (Black) have something of the same personal charm and point of view. Perhaps no spot of earth has been so much written about, and much of that writing has been charged with perfunctory sentiment. Lady Butler avoids such sentiment; she writes in a spirit of true reverence, individually expressed, and the illustrations with which she enriches her text are admirable. Although Dr. George Brandes' "Poland" (Heinemann) is more a study of nationality than of place, it may be mentioned here as a piece of work instinct with true insight and a finely liberal spirit. We may also name Mrs. Churchill's "Samoa 'Uma'" (Sampson Low), which, though it lacks real appreciation of the people whom Stevenson grew to love so well, yet is suggestive and pleasantly written.

We now turn to books dealing with matter nearer home. Miss Goodrich-Freer's "Outer Isles" is, perhaps, too one-sided in point of view, but where strong personal feeling is concerned we can condone such a fault, always provided that it is not carried too far. Miss Goodrich-Freer, we consider, did not carry it too far. In writing of such a region of romance and desolate beauty the personal point of view is almost everything, and certainly the author has a natural sympathy which cannot fail of its appeal. The chapters dealing with the Ceilidh, that gossiping or visiting custom growing spontaneously from the islands' environment, are particularly valuable. Some of the Ceilidh stories are curious comments upon superstitious revivals tempered by Christian faith.

Much has been written about the Lake Country (we notice a book on the subject written by Canon Rawnsley in this issue), but few Lake Country books have been so observant and pleasant as Mr. W. T. Palmer's "Lake Country Rambles" (Chatto). Mr. Palmer's unambitious volume has simplicity and real appreciation; he knows what he is writing about, and he gives sound advice. The chapter on "Crag Climbing" should be read by everyone before he risks his neck on attempts which look easy, but are extremely difficult. In addition to its practical utility Mr. Palmer's book has a sense of the quietness and solitude of the Lakes which is unknown to, and unrecognised by, the ordinary rushing tourist.

Three other volumes which seem to call for special mention are "Dovedale Revisited" (Sampson Low), by "The Amateur Angler"; "The Sea-Board of Mendip," by Mr. Francis A. Knight (Dent); and "Tramps of 'The Walking Parson'" (Scott), by the Rev. A. N. Cooper. To these must be added Miss M^{rs} Muriel Dowie's "Things about our Neighbourhood," a book delightfully fresh, practical, and humorous. In the abundance of so-called country books, and the dearth of those having knowledge and actuality, Miss Dowie's work came as a surprise and a recreation.

In looking back over the year's topographical books, and particularly English topographical books, what we find lacking is individuality. Things, men, scenery, all these to be of value to the reader (we do not, of course, include purely technical work), should be seen through an individual medium. In that respect literature is inevitably at one with the other arts. Merely to catalogue is weariness, and it must be confessed that this is too much an age of catalogues. As a rule we have to go to our novelists for true interpretations of scenery and place—potably to Mr. Meredith, Mr. Hardy, and Mr. Quiller-Couch. Why does not Mr. Quiller-Couch write a book about Cornwall, not forgetting that he is a novelist, which would be impossible, but putting his heart, for the time, into the more restricted medium?

The Doone Country.

A BOOK OF EXMOOR. By F. J. Snell. (Methuen. 6s.)

THERE was room for such a general account of Exmoor as this, and Mr. Snell has done his work well. The book is full of information, a good deal of it gleaned at first hand, and from first to last it is pleasant and readable. The author begins with an account of Exmoor through the many changes which affected it in the times of Britons, Saxons and Danes, and proceeds to summarize, very succinctly, matters of forest law and forest life. Exmoor, from Saxon times to 1818, ranked as a royal forest, though nowadays it is difficult to believe that those great, bare, sweeping uplands ever carried trees. There is an Exford tradition that the timber was felled to supply the mines there, a tradition the truth of which is not improbable. But a forest did not necessarily imply a region entirely wooded, and it may safely be admitted that at one time Exmoor had a right to the noble name.

We have found the most attractive chapters in the volume those dealing with the Doones, Dialect, and Folklore. Certain writers, among whom was Mr. E. J. Rawle, denied that the Doone tradition had any satisfactory historical foundation; Mr. Rawle, indeed, doubted the existence of the Doone legend. But Mr. Snell will by no means have the general accuracy of Blackmore's beautiful romance so lightly impugned. He shows conclusively that Blackmore's reference to the nurse-tales of his childhood was perfectly correct, and that he confirmed those memories when he stayed on Exmoor. We read:—

When Blackmore was not writing, how did he employ his time? . . . He went about . . . talking to the villagers, and seeking to pick up scraps of information—especially, perhaps, the "nurse-tales" of which he speaks. For ourselves, we were rather fortunate in our quest, lighting on a Mr. Huxtable . . . who was able to furnish us with some typical "nurse-tales." Huxtable's mother was a native of Challacombe, and when he was a child she used to regale him with startling narratives . . . about the Doones. For fear of the Doones, she told him, farm buildings were arranged in a square, with communications between the different parts, so that it was possible to pass from kitchen to barn, and from stable to shippen, without going out after dark.

The Doones at last fell upon evil times. Another writer on Exmoor says: ". . . it must have been in 1800, or about that time, when the last male Doone, emaciated and old, went out with his poor little granddaughter to sing Christmas carols and gather a few pence. They were found together in the snow, quite dead, on the road between Simonsbath and Challacombe, or so I have been informed." There is a kind of dramatic propriety in the last of a lawless race turned carol singer.

The dialect of Exmoor does not differ widely from that of the rest of Devon, though experts can distinguish sub-varieties. There is certainly a difference between the dialects of North and South Devon, as anyone with a quick ear may readily discover. But these differences are likely to become less and less marked; dialect, indeed, as we noted the other day, is going the way of so many other old and characteristic things. People are becoming ashamed of the distinctive home speech. Concerning folklore Mr. Snell has an interesting section—interesting rather for its survivals to-day than for particular local instances. We have ourselves known cases of the active force of curious superstitions in Devon which would seem incredible to people steeped in the practicality of towns.

We have been able to do no more than touch upon certain points in Mr. Snell's very interesting book. All lovers of Exmoor should possess it, and who that knows Exmoor does not love its wide spaces, its exquisite villages, and its pure air?

The Wordsworth Country.

LAKE COUNTRY SKETCHES. By the Rev. H. D. Rawnsley. (MacLehose.)

WHAT do they know of England who do not know the noble English country? The surest ground for a healthy patriotism is a close and loving knowledge of a single corner, perhaps, of a single county. It is such knowledge that Canon Rawnsley brings, together with the necessary enthusiasm, to the making of his books about the English Lake Country. With the closest study of the local history and character he combines something of the larger view. He is no writer of guide-books, yet the true tourist will do well to supplement his Black or Collingwood with such a volume as this. He will meet in its pages with real worthies of the country he is visiting, and learn something of its best human products while he wanders about its fells.

Who ever heard of William Pearson of Borderside, naturalist, poet, and friend of Wordsworth? Who knows the name of Joseph Hawell, the Skiddaw shepherd? Or of John Crozier, Master of the Blencathra Hunt, "who never bet a penny in his life"? These were men, true natives of those heart-winning valleys, whose lives had in them that sincerity and bigness which makes them worth knowing, and of an almost epic value. The Keswick parson saw them in their true light, and has done well to present us with these finished studies of them.

Who loves the Lake Country must love Wordsworth too. Canon Rawnsley is never tired of Wordsworth, and never more entertaining than when he writes about him. How much of their popularity, it might be asked, do the Lakes owe to Wordsworth? And how much to their beauty is the poet's fame indebted? No doubt there is action and re-action of this kind, and many a man who, travelling from lake to lake, from valley to valley, finds in his guide-book the name of Wordsworth linked with scenes which charm him most, and stands, perhaps, by the simple graves in Grasmere churchyard, hearing the much-loved Rothay ripple by, feels truly something of the influence of a poetry he has never cared to read. It is thus that poetry acquires that cumulative value which is seemingly so out of all proportion to its practical importance in every-day affairs.

The truth has often been questioned of the peasant characters in Wordsworth's poems. It happily occurred to Canon Rawnsley more than twenty years ago to inquire among the poet's peasant neighbours then surviving what character they could give of him. The results of that research are embodied here in his first chapter, and cannot be ignored by any serious student of Wordsworth. It would not be fair to the author to quote all his best anecdotes, but the old man may be taken as typical, who said: "A Jem Crow and an auld blue cloak was his rig, and as for his habits, he had noan, niver knew him with a pot i' his hand, or a pipe i' his mouth." After that it is pleasant to learn that "Wudsworth was a man as was fond of a good dinner at times, if you could get him ti it, that was t' job." His alcohness is much insisted on. He did not hob-nob with his neighbours, did not seem to notice much, but was for ever pacing the roads or his own garden walks (never, it seems, the mountain tracks) and always composing poetry. "He was ter'ble thrang with visitors and folks, you mun kna, at times, but if he could git awa fra them for a spell, he was out upon his gres walk; and then he would set his heid a bit forrad, and put his hands behint his back. And then he would start a bumming, and it was bum, bum, bum, stop; then bum, bum, bum reet down till t'other end, and then he'd set down and git a bit o' paper out and write a bit; and then he git up, and bum, bum, bum, and go on bumming for long enough right down and back agean. I suppose, ye kna, the bumming helped him out a bit."

In spite of his austerity, the poet was "a kind man." His goodness to the sick is mentioned by many witnesses, and those who knew him best were those who loved him most.

Hartley Coleridge, "l'il'e Hartley," was a prime favourite with the folk; there are several stories about him, and a good one of Prof. Wilson. But there is sport as well as poetry in Canon Rawnsley's books. Indeed, the two things go together in that country, as witness this from a song by John Richardson of St. John's-in-the-Vale:—

The hunt is up, the hunt is up;
Auld Tally's in the drag;
Hark to him, beauties, git away,
He's gone for Skiddaw Crag.
Rise fra ye'r beds, ye sleepy-heads,
If ye wad plesser know;
Ye'r hearts 'twill cheer, if ye bit hear
John Crozier's Tally-ho!

It will be remembered that on the other side of Skiddaw lived the veritable John Peel, and Graves who gave him to the world in a song.

In the German Manner.

CENTRAL EUROPE. By Joseph Partsch. The Regions of the World, edited by H. J. Mackinder. (Heinemann.)

DR. PARTSCH is Professor of Geography in the University of Breslau. We do not recall any Chair of Geography in the Universities—soon to number fifteen—of these islands: perhaps it would seem absurd to have a Professor of so small and slight a subject as geography sounds to many worthy persons. But the word means a writing about the earth, and Dr. Partsch has written about the very large and important part of the earth called Central Europe: and has done so in the German manner of doing such things. He has told us whence Central Europe came and whither it is going. He has told us what manner of men live there; whence they came and whither they tend. He has told us how they spend their time, and why, and with what results to themselves and their neighbours. In a word, this admirable volume contains all that is known about Central Europe—its geological past, and present, and future; its "history" in the ordinary sense; its ethnology and its politics; its religion and its outlook upon things; its value to its neighbours and their value to it; its economics and its physiography; its nomenclature and the etymology thereof; the mutual relations, in every possible sense, of its parts; its rainfall and its hours of sunshine; its wheat and its rye; its tunnels and its fortresses; its fauna and flora; and its every other feature, abstract or concrete, absolute or relative.

The book took several years to write: we wonder it did not take several lives. The German manuscript was too long for English readers and the present translation is much abridged. The text is as complete as even a modern scientific work of German origin could be; but its value is further enhanced by numerous original maps and plates and diagrams, illustrating (we select at random) the distribution of the mineral wealth of Central Europe, the number and position of its principal fortresses, the areas that produce brandy, the geological formation of the site of Buda Pesth, the position and direction of the Simplon tunnel, and so forth.

In one place alone we have been able—with much labour—to discover a few words which have become out-of-date within the last few months. Dr. Partsch remarks that the acquisition by Germany of Heligoland is "of ambiguous value. While this rocky islet remained in the hands of England, Germany might at any time have had the annoyance of seeing a hostile fleet collect there, but now that it is protected by German batteries it makes it an outlying point open to the first attack." Elsewhere we are told that the "rocky islet" is made of Triassic sandstone; and recently it has been found that the island is fast disappearing. Whether Lord Salisbury had obtained expert advice when he exchanged a vanishing island for a stable slice of Africa, will probably never be known. Undoubtedly Bismarck would not be allowed to ignore the German geologists in such a matter were he alive to-day, and it is certainly a contribution to the irony of things that Germany, of all places, should have been taken in by us, of all people, on a simple matter of applied science. We believe a last desperate attempt is being made to shore up the island and protect it from wind and wave and weather. But such last desperate attempts have seldom been successful in the world's history. It is already "protected by German batteries," but from foes infinitely less powerful and insidious. The odds seem to be that when Dr. Partsch comes to prepare a second edition of this monumental and wholly admirable book he will have to speak of Heligoland in the past tense alone.

Three Travel Books.

TRAVELS IN SOUTHERN EUROPE AND THE LEVANT, 1810-1817. From the Journal of C. R. Cockerell. Edited by his Son, S. P. Cockerell. (Longmans. 10s. 6d.)

NORWEGIAN BY-WAYS. By Charles W. Wood. (Macmillan. 6s.)

SERVICE AND SPORT ON THE TROPICAL NILE. By Captain C. A. Sykes. (John Murray. 12s. net.)

HERE are three very different books of travel. One represents the early nineteenth century style of the amateur. The last represents the style of the amateur in our twentieth century. And the middle book may be said to show the skilled and literary amateur of the present day. Mr. Cockerell's travels in Turkey and the Levant are judiciously selected and strung together by his son. They are, as his son frankly says, nowise vivid or skilful. Yet as mere plain, unvarnished records of a state of things no longer existing, they have their value. Mr. Cockerell, together with colleagues two of whom were Germans, discovered (among other things) the Aegina marbles; which, partly by bad management and the cock-sure supineness of the British Museum agent, partly (it would almost seem) by German sharp practice, were suffered to pass to Bavaria. But these things have been told elsewhere. The real interest lies in Greece, and to a certain extent Turkey, as they were seen by an Englishman before Greece was free, and Sultan Mahmoud had made an end of the Janizzaries and begun the Europeanising of the Turkish army. Mr. Cockerell reached Constantinople just as the Sultan was setting out against the Russian invaders. Every Turk then wore a turban, instead of the modern fez. The head-dress of the Janizzaries was a cap, "from the centre of which sprang a tree of feathers which, rising to a certain height, fell again like a weeping willow and occupied an enormous space." He thus describes the Turkish troops :—

The number of troops passing to Adrianople is incredible, and such barbarousness and total absence of discipline could, one would think, never have been known even in the Crusades; but they are unbelievably picturesque. A warrior disposed to defend his country (for none are compelled; only, happily for the Empire, the Turks are naturally inclined that way) goes to the Government and demands whatever he thinks will fit him out for the purpose. He gets 200 or 300 piastres, which is to find him in arms and ammunition. These will consist of a brace of pistols, a broadsword, and a musket, more often chosen for its silver inlay than for its efficiency. He is confined to no particular dress. He wears what he likes, and goes when and how he likes. The Government finds him in provisions. . . . They commit the most wanton cruelties and robberies in their march. . . .

As you meet these independent ruffians in the street they look at you with the most supercilious contempt and always expect you to make way for them.

The Turkish rule in Greece, as shown in these pages, was atrocious. The Cadi at one place attempting some villainy against their servant, they gave him their minds freely. He revenged himself on the Greek "Papa" with whom they lodged, by laying accusations against him at Athens. An Athenian policeman came down, entered the house, and bullied everyone royally, eating and drinking at the "Papa's" expense, singing, swearing, and threatening with his weapons anyone who retorted. Next day he carried off the "Papa." Another of these ruffians, arriving at the place, pretended to have lost on the road a purse of eighty piastres. All the inhabitants must turn out to search for it, and when they could not find what probably was never lost, he claimed and got the money from the town. The book is full of the miseries — and contemptibleness — of the Greek in those days.

Very different is Mr. C. W. Wood's book on Norway. It is written with a bright narrative skill, a good descriptive touch, and in the modern fashion which throws aside the dignity of travel. Its peculiar feature is that Mr. Wood reports at length the conversations with his fellow-traveller and the various people they met, giving the book the look of a story rather than a sober record of travel. The method appears perilous, but is so well handled as to give the book a lightness and attraction which surprise one by their novelty. These verbatim and suspiciously trim conversations certainly try our faith; Mr. Wood's memory, or invention, must be unusual. But the artifice succeeds, and that is everything. Norway never showed more fascinatingly than in Mr. Wood's pages. Either he was peculiarly fortunate, or the Norwegian inn-land-lady is a most unwontedly superior person; for his talks with these ladies are enough in themselves to send men a-touring to Norway. At Egge, otherwise a forbidding place enough, his friend and he were met on the hotel-steps by a woman who was "almost fashionably dressed, was young and good-looking, with a striking appearance and a mass of golden hair." She spoke excellent English with an American accent; and when they were writing letters by lamp-light—

She came into the sitting-room, having changed her dress for some light, gauzy, and very becoming material, sat down upon the sofa as though to the manner born, and took up some light fancy-work. She really looked very lady-like and handsome, with dignity and sang-froid sufficient for an arch-duchess.

Elsewhere she is described, on this same occasion, as "all frills and flounces and fairy gossamer, carried off with an air and a grace, and fitting like a glove." Her talk was on a level with her looks. She proved the daughter of a Norwegian farmer; had lived in America, and was shortly going to Christiania to marry a rich merchant she had met in America. Mr. Wood is careful to warn us that such apparitions are not within his experience of the Norway farmer's household; or there might be an exodus to Norway of wife-seeking youth. Nor did he ever encounter anything so gorgeous at other hotels; but ladies come down in the world: polite and well-to-do widows, and the like, flit through his remembrances of the Scandinavian hostelry. These things are not what one travels for; but they are so alien to anything English that we cannot avoid emphasizing them. The country Mr. Wood describes thus-
It is by a lake at Skei :—

Blue sky and sunshine above, blue flashing water beneath: an intensely hot day; everything about us rich and luxuriant; the velvety grass gemmed with innumerable flowers. Forget-me-nots and wild pansies grew in profusion; a hundred other specimens might be found for the seeking. Vast pine-woods where the sun threw wonderful lights and shadows; where one entered into the cool shade, the solemn depth and solitude and silence of the forest; where the scarlet fungus almost dazzled one with its gorgeous splendour; where nothing stirred, nor was even the flutter of a bird on the wing heard or seen. With perpetual youth and no change in the condition of things, this might well be paradise.

But there are gloomy pictures as well, such as the road to Egge; and there is the reputed witch of Langeland station :—

A woman rose up just within the doorway, a startling and fearful apparition. She rose and rose until it seemed she must be seven feet high. Her gown was a rusty black; her face resembled a bird of prey—eagle eyes and nose, a wide mouth showing enormous, cruel-looking teeth curled like cork-screws. . . . Her unkempt hair hung down her back. It was jet-black, stiff and wiry as horse-hair, surrounding her head like a halo; but a black halo, evil, portentous.

Her manner was near as witch-like as her aspect; but probably that unlucky deformity was her sole right to her fearful reputation. A well-written and originally conceived book; though the conversations which brighten it do not lend themselves to quotation.

Colonel Sykes' Uganda book is, as we have said, modern amateur work; without skill of narrative or description, without construction; but with the modern intimacy, familiarity, and chatty confidentiality which distinguish it from Mr. Cockerell's book. It is purely a straightforward account of his own work and the big game shooting which is the Englishman's characteristic diversion in wild countries. He promises to let his Soudanese troops and the Uganda natives "speak for themselves"; but that excellent intention (perhaps from lack of literary skill) remains sadly unfulfilled. His account of his experiences is nevertheless instructive, and interesting for itself, though not for its treatment. You may learn, for example, the inexhaustible uses of the banana. You can even get drunk on the banana—or on its juice, mixed with water and fermented in the sun. You can wash with it, in the form of soap—if you do not mind your hair becoming bristly as a blacking-brush, and your clothes stiff as cardboard. These are drawbacks in a soap. Colonel Sykes' account of the Soudanese troops is enthusiastic and very attractive, though they do fail to "speak for themselves":—

They are gifted with a delightful cheerfulness under the most adverse circumstances, and are the most thoroughly professional soldiers I have ever met. When recruits are wanted, it is only necessary to walk through their village and select the most likely looking youngsters. You find them ready-made soldiers, for the children drill each other as soon as they can walk, and I have often seen a child manœuvring about several smaller children. He will first form them up, give general instructions and see them carried out, chiding his squad for slackness or inattention, all with the serious air of his father.

Their obedience and love for their white officers he praises warmly. "I knew one officer whose men loved him so much, that one of them offered all his pay as a gift if he would only return to them, and when he lay seriously ill his two native officers took it in turns to sit at his door for the purpose of keeping out death." To which precaution they ascribed his recovery. Nor are the white officers less attached to their Soudanese, says Colonel Sykes; whose book would be improved by less of the conventional traveller's humour with which we are over-familiar.

SWITZERLAND. Macmillan's Guides. (5s. net.)

This new guide book aims at affording "the traveller a readable, concise, and accurate book of reference without a superfluous amount of detail." It is not surprising that new guide books are issued. The rich redundancy of Murray, admirably adapted for the leisured and well-to-do, the full yet practical Baedeker, do not appeal strongly to the tourist who must economise in time and money and make the utmost of a rare opportunity.

Now what does the ordinary man expect to learn from a guide-book? First, he will seek to know how he may reach the country of destination most cheaply and expeditiously; next, what facilities of transit by rail, road, or steamer exist in the country itself; thirdly, what places may be visited in the time at his disposal; and lastly, how far satisfactory board and lodging can be obtained at reasonable rates.

We incline to think that the present volume is defective in its information on these important points. It fails to show how Switzerland can best be reached, and it contains no systematic general account of the Swiss railways, though there is an excellent railway map. Under the head of luggage (p. xxxvi.) the pedestrian should find some reference to the opportunities for sending comparatively heavy luggage by parcel post. Again, the inexperienced traveller is not provided in this work with a series of skeleton tours showing how varying periods of time may be most profitably spent in various centres. Lastly, the tourist needs the most careful information possible concerning hotels, for on this must largely depend the pleasure of his trip. The book before us furnishes an hotel list with prices, but we miss the guiding star of Baedeker which has almost invariably led us into comfortable quarters.

Having said so much of omissions, let us tell briefly what the book provides. Some introductory pages treat of history and politics, and these are followed by hints to travellers, miscellaneous useful notes, lists of baths and springs, and scientific dissertations on glaciers and avalanches. After the hotel list we find over 200 pages, which constitute the main section, describing in detail the routes from point to point, interspersed with accounts of the chief towns and mountain centres.

The introductory matter comprises a great deal of information in a condensed form, and should prove interesting to the tourist who remembers that Switzerland does not exist merely for holiday makers. We may point out, however, that the census figures on p. xlv are not those of the "last census," which was in 1900 and not in 1893. The correct total for 1900 appears on p. xxx. We doubt the utility of brief vocabularies in which the pronunciation is not shown. We should like to hear an average British tourist ask at Lugano for a "sciugamano." Throughout the book it would be advantageous if the pronunciation of all names could be indicated.

With regard to directions for walks and for journeys from place to place, we have tested the details here and there with favourable results. Instructions are given in clear and concise language. The compiler of the volume has done well to omit detailed accounts of how difficult peaks should be ascended. The tourist, if he wants such aid, is rightly left to the professional guides. On the other hand, a few interesting notes about famous ascents of mountains like the Matterhorn are very properly furnished. These appeal forcibly even to the non-climber. Adequate hints are given for the ascent of easier heights in which the inexperienced mountaineer can dispense with a guide, and yet obtain more magnificent views than many loftier peaks can provide.

In conclusion, we must draw attention to the numerous maps and plans, which deserve the highest praise for their combination of clearness with full and careful detail.

HANDBOOK FOR LINCOLNSHIRE. Second Edition. (Stanford. 7s. 6d.)

A NEW edition in the series of Murray's "Handbooks," now published by Mr. Edward Stanford. The first issue was prepared by the present author; he has now thoroughly revised his work and brought it up to date. In his preface Mr. Jeans points out the rather remarkable fact that Lincolnshire has nothing approaching the rank of a real County History. On the other hand, the materials for such a history exist, and are ready to the historian's hand in many excellent topographical works, such as Thompson's "History of Boston," and Bishop Trollope's "Sleaford and the Wapentakes of Flaxwell and Aswardhun."

The present volume is designed simply and clearly. After brief summaries of the county's history, geology, botany, and so forth, we come to the routes, of which there are four-and-twenty. The information is presented in the smallest possible space consistent with real usefulness, and the maps are excellent.

IMPRESSIONS OF INDIAN TRAVEL. By Oscar Browning. (Hodder. 3s. 6d. net.)

A VOLUME dedicated to Lady Curzon, with four verses of inscription, the first of which runs:—

A month I lived in high romance,
In stately porch and columned hall;
Through rout and banquet, song and dance,
You were the beautiful Queen of all.

Thus may a don be permitted gracefully to express himself in a mood inspired by unusual sights and happy recollections. And, indeed, it is rather difficult to get away from the don in these pages, pleasant though they be. There is about Mr. Browning's impressions too much of purpose, too little of contemplative loitering; he got too much into the time at his disposal, and though there is nothing of the ordinary tourist in his point of view there is a hint of the tourist in his delight in getting over the ground. However, any sensible book about India is welcome, and Mr. Browning's book is in the main sensible enough. He has, too, something of the spirit of place.

The author's journeyings took him to Calcutta, Darjeeling, Ghazipur, Benares, Delhi, and half a dozen other places. The best chapter in the volume strikes us as that on the Taj Mahal. The outward shape of the Taj is familiar to most people; Mr. Browning is careful to remind us that there is a great ivory model of it in the Fitzwilliam Museum at Cambridge. But so seen "its primness and symmetry offend you." When you come to the real thing, says the author,—

... it will fascinate you so as deprive you of all power of laudatory expression, and it will haunt you ever after to your dying day. It will float in the clear Tuscan air above the bell-tower of Giotto, and arise across the lagoon beside the Doge's palace and St. Mark's. . . . From whatever point of view you look at it, it is the same—a snowy peak of symmetrical cloud, evoked from below the horizon of your ken by some magic of the Indian air, an illusion, but most real, a temple "never built and therefore built for ever."

Mr. Browning's general attitude towards Indian questions, particularly those of purdah and caste, is sound and reasonable, though he occasionally expresses himself with a quaint superiority. Thus he writes: "If I were a collector with a native assistant under me, I should frequently consult him and give great weight to his opinion." In one place the author allows himself a foolish commonplace. Writing of the no doubt ugly promenade and so on at Aden to commemorate the name of one Briggs, he calls it the "last word of Anglo-Saxon culture," a meaningless and unjust cliché. But Mr. Browning is not often caught tripping in matters of taste.

THE ISLAND OF FORMOSA, PAST AND PRESENT. By James W. Davidson. (Macmillan. 25s. net.)

THIS large volume of seven hundred pages is the work of the United States consul for Formosa, and deals with the history, people, resources, and commercial prospects of the island. Mr. Davidson is not only qualified by his official position for the production of such a work, but he has been on the spot during the recent years which have seen Formosa pass from the stagnant rule of the Chinese into the hands of their progressive neighbours of Japan. He was one of the newspaper correspondents who early in 1895, on the outbreak of hostilities, went to Formosa, which shrewd observers had considered to be a likely point of Japanese attack, and thus he is able to tell the story of events which have come under his personal observation. This book is not, however, a mere war correspondent's record of experiences, for Mr. Davidson properly subordinates recent events to the whole story which he has to tell. He begins with a history of Formosa from its earliest appearance in Chinese myth, and devotes rather more than the first half of his big volume to the history of the island, the greater portion of it being necessarily concerned with nineteenth century events. For many readers—in these days of fierce commercial competition—the second part of the book will be the more interesting, dealing as it does with the staple tea and camphor industries, with the development of sugar growing, with the mineral and other natural products (gold "takes a lead in the island's minerals, and promises a future development which may possibly make it the leading product of Formosa"). Coal and sulphur are both important products, and there are many plants of great economic value, such as jute, hemp, and other fibre-produces, including the pine-apple. The various "groups" of natives are described, and a special appendix deals with the birds of Formosa. Mr. Davidson's closing chapter deals with the island of to-day, its imports, exports, and so on. The volume is freely illustrated with photographs (and has, for frontispiece, by way of contrast with these a really beautiful coloured sketch by a Japanese artist of Mount Morrison). When Mr. Davidson first went to Formosa eight years ago "there were no books in the English language obtainable (on this subject), and to the English-speaking people in the East generally Formosa was a land of tea, camphor, savages, and fever." Future visitors to the place will find invaluable information in this volume.

DANISH LIFE IN TOWN AND COUNTRY. By Jessie Bröchner. (Newnes. 3s. 6d.)

THE history of Denmark as a nation is a history of decline; while she has decreased we have increased, and our one time master has become the smallest kingdom in Europe. Yet the Denmark of to-day is a country by no means decadent, and for the Denmark of to-morrow, under the influence of the new democratic spirit, the prospects are bright enough. Miss Bröchner's excellent little volume contains a clear summary of the changes which have overtaken Denmark, as well as a picturesque account of the country as it is. The opening chapters deal with national characteristics, government and politics, church and religion, the universities and professions, and so forth. The author then proceeds to more intimate matters, such as art and letters and the position of women. Denmark claims to be the greatest newspaper reading country in the world; a day without its newspaper is an incomplete day to the Dane. In the Danish world of letters the name of Dr. George Brandes naturally comes first.

The chapters on Copenhagen and country life will probably have the strongest appeal for most readers. The Danes are a most hospitable people, and they love nothing better than full guest chambers. Miss Bröchner says: "After one or two visits, one seems to know the whole neighbourhood, squire and parson, and doctor and farmhands, and if one cannot always remember the names of the latter, the faces at least are familiar, and one becomes quite attached to these trusty and honest folk, who contentedly lead their uneventful and laborious life." The author regrets, as every one must, the vanishing of the national peasant costume and the decay of innumerable old customs, particularly those connected with Church and family festivals. The "Natmandsfolk" (gypsies of the Moorland) seem to have gone for good.

An admirable little book, not in any sense a guide book, but full of information for people who really want to understand something of the meaning and actuality of Danish national life.

HAMMERSMITH, FULHAM, AND PUTNEY. By G. E. Mitton and J. C. Geikie. The "Fascination of London" Series. (Black.)

PERHAPS no three London suburbs have seen more change during the past century than the three dealt with in this volume, yet a good deal of the old and dignified remains. Bradmore House still stands in Great Church Lane, and in its grounds two or three old cedars still survive the labours of many gardeners. The house has been much altered, largely by a gentleman who intended part of it for the occupation of Mrs. Oldfield, the actress; but Mrs. Oldfield never came. The best known house

'n Hammersmith is probably that on the Mall, known as Kelmscott House, where, as we read, "lived William Morris, R.A., whose influence on the artistic development of printing and in many other directions is well known." That statement is an example of the way things should not be done. It is news to us that Morris was ever an R.A., and why dismiss in three lines a man like Morris, when thirty are often given to entirely unimportant people?

In Fulham lived Richardson, and John Rocque, the map-maker. Putney has fewer literary associations. The assiduous worshipper may stand and gaze at Mr. Swinburne's modest house on Putney Hill, and here and there something remains to recall the days when Pepys and Evelyn talked of the suburban village. More space might well have been given to these three suburbs; they are not, perhaps, of first importance, but to the Londoner of to-day they represent a great deal. It seems to us that a mere catalogue is of no great value: each suburb has a character, an atmosphere, which is part of its life, and some attempt should be made to reproduce that character and that atmosphere.

COUNTRY RAMBLES, BEING A FIELD NATURALIST'S AND COUNTRY LOVER'S NOTE BOOK FOR A YEAR. By W. Percival Westell. With an Introduction by F. G. Aflalo. (Drane.)

THE Rev. Gilbert White set a fashion which has had many followers, and yet his "Selborne" stands to-day easily at the head of the class of books giving notes on local natural history. But if they cannot rival a classic such as that one dealing with wild life in the quiet Hampshire parish, no books of the kind which are the fruit of a love of nature and patient observation—and the two qualities do not always go together—can be undeserving of welcome. The latest volume of the kind, "Country Rambles," by Mr. W. Percival Westell, will by no means rank with the best of its class, yet it will prove a helpful aid in the study of field natural history to Mr. Westell's fellow lovers of birds and flowers. The notes are often of the baldest—and often most inelegantly expressed—but they may serve as a guide to other residents in the county of "pleasant Hertfordshire." The pages describing a visit to the Zoological Gardens might well have been omitted; some of its passages suggest the "Children's page" of a magazine rather than the note-book of a field naturalist:—

Of course I had to see the Polar Bear. What a tall fellow he is when he stands on his hind legs, and what a lovely set of pearly teeth he possesses.

Where he is simply recording the arrival of different species of birds, the dates of their singing, the times of the flowering of plants and so on, he is interesting, but he would have been well advised to have given the "diary" of these events by itself without the interpolation of facts which may be gathered from any of the text-books, such as: "It is interesting to note that there are about 70 British butterflies and about 180 regular British breeding birds." The volume is lavishly illustrated, and includes a series of admirable photographs of birds' nests, eggs, and young. Especially interesting are the photographs and the accompanying notes illustrating the method by which a young cuckoo evicts its companions from the nest.

EARLY CARRIAGES AND ROADS. By Sir Walter Gilbey. Illustrated. (Winton. 2s. net.)

WITH our roads crowded with the strangest miscellany of wheeled traffic from bicycles to 80-horse power motors, it is a little surprising to be confronted with the information that wheeled vehicles for passengers are only about three and a half centuries old in England. In this little summary of the development of carriages Sir Walter Gilbey is not concerned with the latest manifestations of man's ingenuity in devising easy and rapid means of conveyance along the roads. With the advent of the railway he seems to give the subject up with a sigh. What he does is to chronicle some of the earliest mentions of wheeled vehicles, first as war chariots, and then as aids to agriculture, and finally as passenger-carriers. A great novelty in Tudor times, by the days of the Stuarts the chariot had evolved into the hackney coach, and instead of the wheeled vehicle being an object at which passers-by might gape with wonder, it became a nuisance to be legislated against, and a menace to the prosperity of the watermen. Along with the development of the great mail-coach from the horse-litter, we have notes on the development of the roads from water-courses and pedlars' tracks to the well-made highways and byways which since the days of Macadam have been among the glories of England. It is amusing to find that when wheeled traffic began to cut the roads into a bad rutty condition, the first idea of improvement was to widen the wheels into small rollers instead of hardening the roads to suit the narrow wheels. Sir Walter Gilbey has gathered a wealth of details on the allied themes of carriages and roads, and though he presents his facts in a somewhat bald and unattractive fashion, his book should impress many readers anew with the wonderful revolutions of the wheel that have been made within the past century. The illustrations are capital.

WALKS IN NEW ENGLAND. By Charles Goodrich Whiting. (John Lane.)

THIS is one of those curious books which the reader may regard either in the light of a poetic exposition of nature, or merely as the undigested observations of a reflective man. But, in any case, and in whatever spirit the reader approaches the book, he will assuredly learn nothing whatever about walking, though something, no doubt, of the mechanical side of writing fanciful prose. "Come, thou song sparrow," begins chapter one; "Dumb are the fence rails he lights on, silent the bush and the brier. Oh! for the charm that delights one when the sun rises red as a fire, and the sparrow springs swift from the ground in bright unrestrainable joy, and in a sweet whirlwind of sound lets out the whole secret employ" This is a sample of the style. And chapter after chapter is the same, songs, word pictures, music, all in eulogistic, sensuous strain, and of what? Certainly not of walks in New England, or anywhere else. "When we observe the sand violets foot leaves, and the most beautiful St. John's wort, the evening primrose, the robin's plantain, the saxifrage, the golden rods, we can but feel that the perpetual truth is summer just as the perpetual truth is life."

The publishers have done well by the author, they have printed and bound and illustrated the book charmingly; the paper is excellent, the whole get-up of the book is cool and refreshing: it must be left to the reader to decide whether the title of the book is descriptive of the contents.

Mr. Charles Eyre Pascoe's; "London of To-day" (Jarrold) is now in its eighteenth year of issue. The book is not exactly a guide, but it is the kind of book to prove useful to people who come up to London with vague ideas. Account is taken of the changes of which London is now in the throes. Messrs. Ward Lock have brought "London" in their illustrated guide books series up to date; it includes an account of the new Holborn-Strand developments. In the same series we have received Paris, the Isle of Wight, and Hastings. Mr. E. J. Goodman's "Best Tour in Norway," first published in 1898, has been reissued by Messrs. Sampson Low in a cheap edition.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY

SUBSCRIPTIONS FROM ONE GUINEA PER ANNUM

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready, Post Free on Application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE, 1s. 6d. Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 260,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, Ltd., 30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.
241, Brompton Rd., S.W.; & 48, Queen Victoria St., E.C., London; and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

"The Academy" and "Literature" were incorporated last year as

The Academy and Literature

Published every Friday for 33 years.

Published by "The Times" at 6d.

And it is now Posted Free to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom prepaying 13s.

Foreign Subscribers by a Prepayment of 17s. 6d. will secure it being sent Post Free and regularly to any address throughout the World for a uniform 1d. postage, though the postage payable varies from 1d. minimum to 2½d. per copy.

READINGS ON THE EVOLUTION OF RELIGION.

By Mrs. F. HAY-NEWTON.

Crown 8vo, 5s.

"These Readings are admirably written."—Guardian.
"Mrs. Hay-Newton's Readings on the Evolution of Religion form an interesting and attractive introduction for any thoughtful person who wishes to get an insight into some of the cardinal positions in philosophy and the light they throw on religion."—Saturday Review.

"As a contribution to Christian evidences they are decidedly valuable."—Manchester Courier.

WILLIAM BLACKWOOD & SONS, EDINBURGH AND LONDON.

ARCHITECTURE OF GREECE AND ROME (II.); Italian Notes; Architecture at the Royal Academy (III.); The Guildhall Pictures; The Institute of Architects—meeting for Election of Officers; Magazines and Reviews; New Outpatients' Department, London Hospital (with plan);

LIVERPOOL CATHEDRAL—design by W. J. Tapper (plan, elevations, and sections); &c.

See The Builder of June 13th (4d., by post 4½d.).

Through any Newsagent, or direct from

The Publisher of "THE BUILDER,"

Catherine Street, London, W.C.

CRUISES AND EXCURSIONS.

PLEASURE CRUISES TO NORWAY BY THE FINE ATLANTIC LINER, LAKE SIMCOE, sailing from Newcastle-on-Tyne on the 13th June, 4th and 18th July, 8th and 22nd August.

RATES FROM 10 TO 20 GUINEAS, according to position of cabin and number of passengers occupying each room.

For plans, &c., apply to ELDER, DEMPTSTER and Co., African House, Water Street, Liverpool; 36, Neville Street, Newcastle-on-Tyne; Leadenhall Chambers, 4, St. Mary Axe, London, E.C.; 8, Commercial Buildings, Cross Street, Manchester; Canada House, Bristol; Bute Docks, Cardiff, &c., &c.

BELLE STEAMERS.

FROM FRESH WHARF, LONDON BRIDGE, DAILY (Fridays excepted), 9.15 to SOUTHEND, CLACTON, WALTON, Southwold, Lowestoft, Yarmouth, &c. 9.30 to MARGATE, RAMSGATE, and Back—COAST DEVELOPMENT Co., Ltd., 33, Walbrook, E.C.

G.S.N.CO., LTD.

SOUTHEND MARGATE RAMSGATE } DAILY Magnificent steamer "EAGLE."

From London Bridge Wharf at 9.10, Greenwich 9.30, Woolwich (South) 9.50, and Tilbury Pier at 11 a.m.

REDUCED FARES.

June 2nd to July 10th, 1903, inclusive.

	Single.	Return 10th July.
SOUTHEND (Saloon).....	1s. 6d.	2s. 6d.
MARGATE or RAMSGATE..	2s. 6d.	3s. 6d.

Special train from Fenchurch Street Station at 10.14 a.m.

Fare 6d. extra to Margate or Ramsgate.

55, Great Tower Street, E.C.

G.S.N.CO. TOURS.—1st class, all meals on steamers, and Hotel accommodation, with full table d'hôte board, &c.

Ostend, Ardennes, &c.	Week-end Tour	£1 3 0
Edinburgh and Highlands.....	5-day Tour	2 19 6
Bordeaux, Pyrenees, &c.....	11-12-day Tour	7 5 0
Algeria, via Bordeaux.....	8-19-day Tour	21 0 0
Hamburg, via Harwich.....	5-day Tour	4 16 0
Hamburg, Copenhagen, &c.....	6-day Tour	6 12 6
Scandinavia.....	Ideal 16-day Tour	7 0 0
Midnight Sun, Grand Scandinavian,	23-day Tour	24 7 0

Longer Tours at proportionately cheaper fares. Illustrated Guide, with splendid route maps, by post, 2d. G.S.N.Co., Ltd., 56, Great Tower Street, E.C.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

READY THIS DAY.

Illustrated with Portraits, Views, &c. 8vo, 10s. 6d. net.

LETTERS OF A DIPLOMAT'S WIFE.

By MARY KING WADDINGTON.

* * M. Waddington was the Ambassador Extraordinary representing France at the Coronation of the Czar, and the French Ambassador to England from 1883 to 1893. Madame Waddington's letters give a remarkably interesting series of portraits and pen pictures of the personages and incidents of her official life during that period.

READY THIS DAY.

With a Map and 40 Full-page Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.

CHOTA NAGPDR: A Little-known Province of the Empire.

By F. B. BRADLEY-BIRT, B.A. (Oxon), F.R.G.S., I.C.S.

With an Introduction by the Right Hon. the EARL OF NORTHBROOK, G.C.S.I., sometime Viceroy of India.

An attractive history of an interesting but little-known district of India, at the meeting-place of the older and newer populations of Hindustan, between Bengal and the Central Provinces.

A RECORD OF SECRET SERVICE RECENTLY ACHIEVED.

With Two Maps and Two Charts. Crown 8vo, 6s.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS.

Edited by ERSKINE CHILDERS, Author of "In the Ranks of the C.I.V."

Athenum.—"The charm of this book by Mr. Childers is that it will please readers of every class."

Manchester Guardian.—"The author has already proved himself capable of converting his experiences into a readable book, and this present handling of them is more original. . . . The secret is cleverly kept, and its discovery effective."

Miss DORA GREENWELL McCHESNEY'S NEW NOVEL.

On JUNE 15th. Crown 8vo, 6s.

LONDON ROSES: An Idyll of the British Museum.

By DORA GREENWELL McCHESNEY,

Author of "Cornet Strong of Ireton's Horse," "Rupert, by the Grace of God," &c.

London: SMITH, ELDER & Co., 15, WATERLOO PLACE, S.W.

"OUR NEIGHBOURS" SERIES.

A series of handy books dealing with the Intellectual Life of the various Peoples, their Social Divisions and Distinctions, their Manners and Customs, Wealth and Poverty, their Armies and Systems of National Defence, their Industrial Life, Rural Life, Home Life, Religious Life, Amusements, and Local Governments.

Fully Illustrated, Crown 8vo, Cloth, 3s. 6d. net each.

Edited by WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

Dutch Life in Town and Country. P. M. HOUGH, M.A.

Swiss Life in Town and Country. A. T. STORY

Russian Life in Town and Country. FRANCIS H. E. PALMER.

German Life in Town and Country. WILLIAM HARBUTT DAWSON.

French Life in Town and Country. MISS HANNAH LYNN.

Spanish Life in Town and Country. L. HIGGIN.

Italian Life in Town and Country. LUIGI VILLARI.

Danish Life in Town and Country. J. BROCHNER.

GEORGE NEWNES, Ltd., London, W.C.

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
„ Quarterly	4/0
„ Price for one issue	5

The State Called Reverie.

It is difficult for the writer who hides himself behind the garrulous we of journalism to criticise Mr. W. B. Yeats's new book. For criticism has essentially to do with the estimate or interpretation of a message or revelation in the known terms of a common language. But Mr. Yeats does not speak the common language and does not appeal to the common verdict. For the ordinary reader this work will produce the impression of a highly sensitized individuality expressing itself with the facility of long habit in terms of the most remote sub-consciousness. Even when, by reason of the narrow limits of verbal expression, such a reader will find himself in agreement with Mr. Yeats, there will be still an abyss between them. It is as though two men were to praise the same graveyard, one because of the safe quiet of the place, the other because it is here that the ghost of his lost hopes will rise up to claim him. It is as though two men were to draw closer together in a storm, one because he fears the death-gleam of the lightning, the other because the vibrations have aroused the slumbering horror of his soul. And yet, because Mr. Yeats has seen the shadowed outlines of things in themselves as opposed to mere externals, he is able to convey to us the impression of listening to one who has in some strange moment of trance or vision peered into the mysterious heart of beauty before whose terrible altar he has abandoned the petty hopes and fears of men.

The minds of most of us are as inured to inherited habit as our bodies are inured to clothes. Throw off one layer of consciousness and there comes a sense of strangeness. Throw off another and the easy safety of life seems to be slipping away from us. Throw off another and the startling horror of the realities behind phrases breaks in upon us. We are no longer measurers of time and space, but isolated atoms suffocated by the knowledge that you can deduct nothing from infinity, that "solar systems" and all the vast architecture of science are but as children's ramparts before a darkened ocean. And it is to this brink of despair that Mr. Yeats would lead us, to this brink and yet further into the serenity of the naked, awakened soul.

Verbally, these conclusions are platitudes, but to be really conscious of them, to realise the futility of objective knowledge—that is granted, mercifully, to the very few; and of these few Mr. Yeats is one.

Let us return to the banal little simile of the children building before a darkened ocean. The common verdict would still be for those who, in the face of the terrible unknown, mapped and planned and made fixtures, were it only to lull the terror of their loneliness. But one can imagine some one child turning aside from the common task, forgetful of the common danger, his face illumined by the radiance of a strange glad secret. Where had he caught it? From whence had it come? The little toilers and explainers would know nothing of it, and would look askance at their comrade as an idler and trifler. Questioned, he could explain nothing, but in his heart he would know that his joy came to him from the very source of their terror. For the joy of mystery would be his, by which he alone had caught through the sea's moan the whisper that has haunted the world before righteousness was dimly guessed at, the pervading whisper of beauty.

It is to this whisper and to no other voice that Mr. Yeats will listen, and he lures us away from the impetus towards action, and the desire of life, to watch with him the wraiths rising slowly from the abyss. And these wraiths carry to him the immortal legacies of dead songs and hidden symbols, all the sorrowful inheritance of an elder faith. For to this author a legend is the surviving soul of a lost poetry, into which are woven one knows not what despairing messages. It is in itself the universal tie linking man with man across the accidental barriers of time. For a legend is the supreme confession of a race, haunting its children until they have become dulled to all save external voices. Moreover, it is generally the confession, not of attainment but of infinite desire, not of gladness and success but rather of sorrow and despair. In the following exquisite passage the author seeks to explain this persistent melancholy:—

Life was so weighed down by the emptiness of the great forests and by the mystery of all things, and by the greatness of its own desires, and, as I think, by the loneliness of much beauty; and seemed so little and so fragile and so brief, that nothing could be more sweet in the memory than a tale that ended in death and parting, and than a wild and beautiful lamentation. Men did not mourn merely because their beloved was married to another, or because learning was bitter in the mouth, for such mourning believes that life might be happy were it different, and is, therefore, the less mourning; but because they had been born and must die with their great thirst unslaked. And so it is that all the august, sorrowful persons of literature, Cassandra and Helen and Deirdre, and Lear and Tristan, have come out of legends, and are, indeed, but the images of primitive imagination mirrored in the little looking-glass of the modern and classic imagination.

This seems to us to convey the artistic inspiration of "Ideas of Good and Evil" (Bullen). It is in harmony with the message of Maeterlinck which would bid us abandon the logical triumphs of the intelligence in order to absorb the pervading consciousness around us. For ever pervading the little external circumstances of the individual life, the petty triumphs and defeats, the transitory loves and hates, is the totality of what the world has hoped and dreamed and feared. There is the inspiration, there the common inheritance from which we turn aside avert of the immediate barter. "Those who are subject," quotes Mr. Yeats from Shelley's fragment upon life, "to the state called reverie, feel as if their nature were resolved into the surrounding universe or as if the surrounding universe were resolved into their being." It is to the reverie as opposed to the rhetoric of drama that these new poets would guide us.

It is not a revolution that they demand, but rather a reversion to the old simplicity and the submission of a more acutely sensitive consciousness to influences brooding ever near us. And the expression of this poetry will be neither optimism nor pessimism in the accepted sense. It will be the expression of one who having found joy in the mysterious beauty, is yet penetrated by the knowledge that it must remain for ever elusive. And because the source of joy is remote from external things and can be neither acknowledged nor defended by the human reason, this poetry will draw nearer and nearer to the shadowy creations of legends and further and further away from the practical bargains and contracts of life.

When one opens so urbane and amiable a volume as Lord Lubbock's "Pleasures of Life," or even a book of a negative significance, such as the powerful "Wisdom of Life" of Schopenhauer, one finds, interwoven and implied rather than explicitly stated, a certain general theory of life at which the individual, ever seeking the actual and the definite, may grasp for his soul's good. This general theory, with Anglo-Saxons at all events, is inevitably applied to conduct. It cannot be said that any such theory is either categorically stated or even implied in these "ideas of good and evil." Perhaps, if we are to insist upon an ethical formula, we may find one suggested in this quotation from William Blake: "I know of no other Christianity, and of no other gospel, than the liberty, both of body and mind, to exercise the divine arts of imagination, the real and eternal world of which this vegetable universe is but a faint shadow, and in which we shall live in our eternal or imaginative bodies when these vegetable mortal bodies are no more." Mr. Yeats's gospel of life is the gospel of art, and he looks to the more primitive peoples to save the world from the weariness of success. Perhaps some day the sociologist and the economist, nay themselves, will see that there is something in this contention which at any time may have a most intimate bearing upon practical questions. In the meantime the effortless grace and subtle glamour of this book speak for themselves in a language all may read.

Whatever may be idly urged for or against this author's conception of art as the redemption of life, he has given us in this volume the perfected expression of one who has chosen his course and whose own theories of art are for ever removed from all verbal wrangling whatever.

A Multiform Appeal.

A HIGHLY praised poem by a noteworthy man of last century, the highest achievement hitherto of the most original and scholarly of living English musicians, a yet unfinished but already majestic example of Byzantine architecture, the playing of an excellent though not perfect orchestra, and solo singing of the first order—these are the factors that were common in last Saturday's multiform appeal to each individual of the large audience that assembled in the new Roman Catholic Westminster Cathedral to hear, under the bâton of the composer, the first performance in London of Dr. Edward Elgar's setting of Cardinal Newman's "Dream of Gerontius."

This work was first produced in 1900 at the last Birmingham Festival. It has since been heard in America and various places in Germany, notably in Düsseldorf, where the part of Gerontius was sung by Dr. Ludwig Wüllner, who gave an even finer rendering of it last week. It is said that its arrival in London has been so long delayed partly because of the imperfection of metropolitan choruses. At any rate the North Staffordshire singers did very fairly well, notably in the chorus of the demons, especially as some allowance must be made for Dr. Elgar's very indifferent conducting of his masterpiece. The distinction between the supreme faculty of musical conception and the art of directing a body of executants is well illustrated here; as is the double character of that latter accomplishment. To be great, a conductor must be an interpreter, and he must be a directing machine. Now Dr. Elgar is assuredly the most competent man on earth to "interpret" that which he has himself created, but the means of communication between his will and his forces are inadequate. The conducting of this gifted composer is therefore indifferent. So, in our opinion, is Grieg's pianoforte playing—a parallel instance.

The "Dream of Gerontius" belongs, of course, to the post-Wagnerian epoch of musical evolution; and it is essentially a Wagnerian work—in its melodic characteristics, in its orchestration, in the employment of leit-motifs, and so forth. Needless to say this is to suggest no disparagement of Dr. Elgar's genius. It is the necessary consequence of the fact of Wagner. He is what Leibnitz would have called the "sufficient reason." To us the music allotted to the Angel seems throughout to be the most intimately inspired of this oratorio. It was sung by Miss Muriel Foster last week with an art and a spirituality that are rare. Her fine voice never before convinced us so entirely. Notably the final stanzas, with their musical power—certainly not derived from the words, mean alike in thought and expression—were sung to positive admiration. The jaded audience rose, almost as one woman, with what we believe was an audible sigh of relief, as the short oratorio sank into silence. Strictly speaking, we have, therefore, no idea how the work ended on the particular occasion in question. There is reason to believe that it ends—and ended—in what musicians call a "perfect cadence," but this was lost for us in the rustle of numberless silken petticoats, irritating at all times, and never more so than on Saturday. But it was a very brilliant gathering.

After hearing, within the compass of a few hours, the rendering of works by [Strauss, under his bâton, and of this oratorio of Elgar, under his, it becomes a need to set down some sort of comparison between these two composers who are, with the more than doubtful exceptions of Grieg and Dvorak, the most original and powerful of the men who are writing music at the beginning of the twentieth century. One hundred years ago, by the way, Schubert and Beethoven were alive, and Strauss's songs are vastly inferior to Schubert's, whilst the "Dream of Gerontius" or the "Coronation Ode" are not to be mentioned with Beethoven's "Mass in D"; but Strauss and Elgar are the best of our time. Both build upon Wagner; but Strauss is an innovator whose many remarkable characteristics there is no space here to discuss, whilst Elgar, if with less power, at any rate worships beauty rather than audacity.

We cannot, in common fairness, leave the special occasion of last Saturday without a tribute to the impassioned and reverent singing of Dr. Wüllner and the effective treatment, by Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, of the short passages allotted to him. But the memory of these singers' solitary voices raised in that great amplitude of the late Mr. Bentley's framing, urged the question of the acoustic properties of the Cathedral, a question which cannot but have a serious interest to lovers of music for centuries or millenia to come. St. Mark's, finest of all Byzantine churches, is far on in its second millenium, and despite the fate of the Campanile, is standing firmly still. This new cathedral in London is built without iron, constructionally is precisely right, every arch is explicit and avowed, the walls may be twenty feet thick—reasonably, therefore, we may predict that music will be heard within it more than two thousand years hence. And acoustically it is perfect. We have listened to music from almost every part of this vast building and we have never detected the suspicion of an echo. Further, there is that magic enhancement of tone which is the chance prerogative of cathedrals alone, cathedrals, most of them, built when music as we now know it was non-existent. That magic quality which causes a boy's voice in York Minster or Westminster Abbey almost to transcend all other human experience—that almost mystic power, mercifully unreduced by science to ratios and quantities, is present here. Both these older fanes have echoes, in which respect the Westminster Cathedral is superior to them. Indeed, the late Mr. Best, the "prince of organists," must needs have added its name to his dictum that "if you were to fry sausages in York Minster or Westminster Abbey it would sound magnificent." Certainly no auditory experience could well surpass, as we remember it, the great organ of York Minster playing the Dead March in "Saul" on the occasion of the death of Archbishop Thompson, or the boy chorister singing "I know that my Redeemer liveth" in the same church on Easter morning. The greatest choral work ever written, however, is Beethoven's stupendous "Mass in D." That work cannot be heard in York or in the Abbey, but in the new Cathedral it can and must be heard. Cardinal Newman has paraphrased the "Credo" in the poorest of verse in "Gerontius." Dr. Elgar could make very little of it. Some day we hope to hear the same orchestra, a larger organ, and some chorus not too far beneath the great Festival Chorus of Leeds, singing Beethoven's "Credo" in the Westminster Cathedral. There, as never in the Leeds Town Hall or any other building with which we are acquainted, might be realised the indescribable grandeur of Beethoven's genius. Who that has heard can forget? The words "et sepultus est" are sung in adagio time with a hush of shivering sorrow. There is a silence, and the tenors hurl out on a high G the "et" which never meant so much as here; another silence, and then the fugal chorus "et resurrexit." Words do not describe these things.

But from the majestic and imperishable Latin which Dr. Elgar, himself a Roman Catholic, ought some day to essay, we must return to the poem of Newman. Written in 1865, when its author was sixty-four, and six years after the "Origin of Species," it has no meaning for our century. It is conceived in the most naive materialism of the Middle Ages, a materialism which does not offend in Dante or Milton, for it was of their time, but which is an anachronism here. Newman has included several verses from the Douay perversion of that immortal Hebrew poem which is known as the ninetyeth psalm. As a former Anglican he must have known the "Authorised" version, and one would have thought that if he was unable to use that he would have refrained from employing one so manifestly inferior. Dr. Elgar has shown some judgment in omitting many of the conspicuously poor parts of the poem, and his setting is generally appropriate, with the remarkable exception of the line in which the Soul of Gerontius says, "I go before my Judge." The text explains further on that the "eager spirit has darted," and "with intemperate energy of love, flies," &c., but Dr. Elgar has set the words of the Soul in adagio time entirely opposed to any suggestion of haste.

The most important matter, however, is the future of Dr. Elgar's genius. He was forty-six last week, the age at which Schumann died. Chopin, Schubert, Mozart, and Mendelssohn had done their work and gone before the age of forty, and the powers of the Jew had already shown signs of decadence. The rule with musical genius is precocity and early decay. There are exceptions. Beethoven, though stone deaf long before his death at the age of fifty-seven, was greater then than ever. Wagner died at seventy, shortly after finishing "Parsifal," his masterpiece. Now Dr. Elgar published nothing until he was thirty-five. He has steadily developed since. At the Birmingham Festival, to be held in October of this year, his new oratorio, "The Apostles," is to be produced. In all probability it will mark an even further advance of his genius. The words, like those of the "Messiah" and "Elijah"—also written on British soil, though not by Englishmen—are taken from the Bible. And this is the point we would urge. Dr. Elgar will not do his duty to himself, or his fellows, or his art, if he reverts to the doggerel of the "Coronation Ode," or such a poem as the "Dream of Gerontius." Dr. Elgar must adhere to Biblical words if he wishes to write more oratorios. From that source he can obtain, in language of transcendent beauty, sublime ideas in endless numbers. His literary taste in the matter of lyrics, also, seems to us generally good, but not impeccable. Let him remember Schubert's settings of Goethe, Handel's "Messiah," and Beethoven's Masses, both in C and D; and, if he would seek immortality for his music, let him see to it that it be married to immortal words.

Impressions.

XXXVI.—The Author as Father.

At the book-stall I bought a new book. I bought it for three reasons: it was not a novel; it smacked of a full-blooded brain-packed joyousness laid on, in painting language, with the palette knife; and I had a "good morning, better weather at last," acquaintance with the author. Then, having quarter of an hour to spare before the train started, I entered the refreshment room. There I met the author, but he did not see me; he was reading his own volume, and it delighted him. Balancing himself on a stool that seemed hardly able to support his burly body, a bottle of stout and a plate of sandwiches by his side, the crumbs tumbling over his beard and waistcoat, his great ungainly frame rolling with laughter at his own phrases—there he was, a man unconscious of his surroundings, young in spite of his beard and girth, sparkling with vitality, and enjoying the present moment to the uttermost. He swayed as he read, biting widely into two sandwiches at a time, guffawing, with not an atom of self-consciousness about him. I fed my eyes on the rollicking sight till it was time to take the train for the country town where, that afternoon, a school in which I was interested was playing another school at cricket.

As the match had begun at noon, I alighted hurriedly from the train and hastened to the cricket field. Turning out of a lane, I came suddenly upon the players and stopped to absorb the good sight. On a grass incline at the upper boundary sat the boys on rugs spread upon the grass, huddled together, two hundred and more of them, flapping linen hats on their heads, each small face bent forward, each pair of lungs applauding everything. Trees shaded the outskirts of the field, the sun shimmered on the fresh cut turf, and out there in the glow of a June afternoon the white, lithe figures vied one with another at the unmatched game. The scene was so English, so eloquent of Home, that, as I walked round the field, I thought sadly of those Englishmen in foreign lands—sandy and parched—who struggle on from day to day in the hope of seeing once again an English cricket field.

I nearly fell over the author. He was lying at full length in the tall grass, half hidden by the roller. His book was open before him, the pages kept flat by his pipe, but he was not reading. A small boy, the tiniest cricketer I have ever seen, was just leaving the pavilion to take his place at the wicket. The author was visibly excited. He gave me a huge smile, dragged me down behind the roller, and whispered hoarsely, "That's my boy! I don't want him to see me yet. Little beggar, at the last match they thought he was a kid and bowled him lobs. He knocked them all over the field and won the match."

We watched. The son made two off the first ball. He wielded his bat like a master, added eighteen runs to the score, and was then run out. It was not his fault. His partner had forgotten the shortness of the son's legs. "Eighteen!" gurgled the author, "Good lad!" and, against all rules, he rolled and ran across the field to greet his son at the pavilion.

I caught the last train back to London. After the train was signalled I saw the author lumbering up the road to the station. "Eighteen's good!" he said to me as he wiped his brow with an ultramarine handkerchief. I looked for his book in vain. Perhaps he had presented it to his small son. He talked cricket in gusts all the way to London—mainly about his son's wrist play.

Drama.

A Triple Bill.

THE Stage Society was in its maddest merriest mood on Monday last, when it concluded its season with three short plays, no one of which could have met with any measure of acceptance on the commercial stage. So far as the first two items in the bill were concerned, this, perhaps, can hardly be matter for surprise. Mr. Ian Robertson's "The Golden Rose, or The Scarlet Woman" (why not one or the other?) and Mr. S. M. Fox's "The Waters of Bitterness" were both of them experimental to a degree which, however pardonable in the eyes of the kindly critic on the look-out for talent, the ordinary patron of the commercial stage could not be expected, after his dinner, to appreciate. He does at least desire, and not without justice, that the dramatist shall take the trouble to let him know what he is driving at. And this is an elementary point of technique which neither Mr. Robertson nor Mr. Fox had altogether succeeded in regarding. Mr. Robertson's "bas-relief in one act" was conceived in a spirit of symbolism. The Scarlet Woman sat in her sunless lane before her doorway with its inscription "Accipio blanda intrantes," holding in her hand the golden rose of poisonous lust. The young girls, with their chatter of lovers, shunned the alley. The inventor bending over his model, the artists absorbed in their art, passed by, deaf to her blandishments. Then came the student, in the innocence of his youth, and she called him, and as they talked, innocence awoke in her also, and the child Love that she thought dead came to life again, and she put off the scarlet robe, and a ray of sunlight came into the dark street and gilded her face and hair and she sat there with the child in her arms. The scheme was simple and dignified enough and the setting restrained and statuesque. But I must confess to a feeling, than which nothing is more annoying in a theatre, that I could not, throughout the long dialogue between the woman and the student, quite catch the author's drift in detail, or see how it all contributed to the main idea. Moreover, in actual representation, it seemed a little more difficult than may be apparent from the analysis to separate the physical from the spiritual, the literal from the symbolical.

The difficulty with Mr. Fox's play was something of the same character, although poetic symbolism here gave way to rather dismal tragi-comedy, the influence of "Everyman" to the influence of Ibsen. Miss Marsden is the lady of limited means and imperfect attractiveness, whom you meet in foreign hotels. Unfortunately she has the instincts of affection which do not always coincide with the coral lip or the compensating dot. She falls in love with a youth, who is not only on the point of dying from consumption, but also hopelessly, for that reason, in love elsewhere. She bores him, and all the other people in the hotel, to extinction. Ultimately, although egoistic and self-absorbed, she realises that she is only making herself ridiculous. She does the man she loves the last kindness, if it was a kindness, of persuading him to give up the pistol with which he had designed to take his life, abases herself by confessing her love for him, and uses the revolver herself. The situation is not without merit, and merit of a distinctively dramatic order, but Mr. Fox's inexperience betrays itself, partly in his failure to make any of his characters in the slightest degree interesting, except the heroine, and partly in the fact that until the very last moment the audience remain wholly uncertain as to whether they are meant, primarily, to weep with Miss Marsden or to laugh at her. Naturally, the choose the easier course, of laughing, and consequently the dénouement seems to them melodramatic and unreal. It is perhaps hardly unreasonable to expect a dramatist, so far as the main emotional colour of his piece is concerned, to put his cards on the table from the beginning.

It is not difficult to understand the dislike of the patrons of the commercial stage for Mr. Bernard Shaw. Obviously, one does not go to a theatre, after dinner, to come away with a sense of uncertainty as to whether the fun has been, all the time, made for one or at one. In "The Admirable Bashville," however, Mr. Shaw is, for once, as genial as he was irresponsible. It is a play of the highest spirits. Long ago Mr. Shaw wrote in "Cashel Byron's Profession" the story of the loves of Cashel Byron, the prize-fighter, and the beautiful heiress, Lydia Carew. This theme he now takes for the basis of a delirious burlesque, which, in the most rotund and flowing Shakespearean blank verse, throws derision upon everything on heaven and on earth, within the theatre and outside it. A "galaxy of talent," headed by that most finished of comédiennes, Miss Henrietta Watson, and including Mr. Aubrey Smith made up to represent Mr. Shaw himself in the part of an Irish policeman, plays with the utmost spirit in a piece of exquisite fooling. The golden days of burlesque, when burlesque was not yet merged in the nothingness of musical comedy, are recalled. Mr. Shaw's satire does not even spare the Elizabethan Stage Society, and the scene passes on a Shakespearean platform over which totter, during the intervals, superannuated beef-eaters, bearing placards to indicate that it represents, now "A Glade in Wiltstocken Park," now "A Room in Park Lane," now "The Agricultural Hall, Islington."

Mr. Shaw's humour does not leave one inclined to dwell very much on the farce of "Just like Callaghan," which is being played at the Criterion. This is adapted by Mr. Cosmo Gordon Lennox from the French of MM. Hennequin and Duval. I daresay it was very funny in French. In the translation, although the idea on which the piece is based, that of the invention by one Manderberry of a wholly fictitious Callaghan as the person really responsible for the peccadilloes which might otherwise be charged by his wife and his mother-in-law upon himself, is of a strictly farcical character and not wanting in ingenuity, yet the situations and the dialogue are not particularly amusing in detail, and towards the end the action degenerates into little more than horse-play. Both Miss Annie Hughes and Mr. Frederick Kerr are worthy of better things than this; nor can either of them be said to be witnessed to advantage. One scene, between Miss Hughes and Miss Fanny Brough, alone approaches the higher levels of comedy.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Pictures for a Room.

If I possessed a room barren of pictures, and was permitted to adorn it with attractive works seen for the first time this week, the task would not have presented difficulties. I should have found them included in a small collection in Brook Street, at The Dutch Gallery, where one may be always sure of seeing pictures by men of distinguished talent, who never cry their wares in the market-place, and who have chosen to stand outside the hurly-burly of competition. It is something to escape from the glare and glitter of Bond Street, and to stand face to face with a portrait by Mr. Whistler, a small work, cool in colour, reticent in expression, suggesting that this Violinist is a reflection of one's own mood, someone quietly alive, and not merely a portrait of a lady holding a violin. The painting is thin, the modelling delicate, the tones are related to and merge in one another, offering to the eye the pleasure that an old piece of faded tapestry gives. One would not tire of this enigmatic little lady. I am sure that I should acquire this picture, and I would hang it, by itself, above the mantel-piece. Then there is Mr. C. H. Shannon to consider. Those who want brilliance and vitality in painting do not seek it in him. His pictorial vision is always low in tone; you feel that he is not looking actually at life, but painting impressions of an idealised world, assisted by life, but not disturbed by it; impressions that an imagination, reflective and fastidious, calls up at twilight when the eyes are half closed. So a man seated on a balcony at an open air concert, a little removed from the promenading people, the great lighted band pagoda, and all the emotional activities that the conjunction evokes, may, looking up at the blue night sky, discern pictures that are related to the life about him, but in the allusive, shadowy way in which dreams are related to reality. Two of his pictures I should hang in this room, one facing the window, the other on the wall opposite the Whistler. Both express in paint one of those intense moments of emotion, with no hint of sentimentality, that Rodin has expressed in sculpture: both scenes are placed in that crepuscular light where forms are shadowy, outlines blurred; where white flesh and white garments are no longer white, and blues and greens have taken on their quiet night colour. One picture is called "The Mermaid"; there is no hint of the joy of life in this fantasy unseen of mortal eyes: it takes place in the desolate places of some fairy ocean. A boat is riding on the waves, heeling over, for the fisherman, one of those brown-bodied figures of the Golden Age, is crouched in the stern of the boat. He is bending over the gunwale, clasping a mermaid, whose body is half hidden by the waves that foam about her. Submissive, she yet turns her head reluctantly from his kiss; called by the world, she is still claimed by the sea. It is not in the least like a modern work: it belongs to that class of pictures that are never in the fashion or out of the fashion, that have in them the elements of greatness. More modern is Mr. Shannon's "The Music Room." A favourite subject with French painters is the effect of music on a small, neurotic audience; such a picture is now being shown in Paris, where the emotions of some of the humbler frequenters of a Lamoureux concert are italicised in the characteristic Salon way; but that is not Mr. Shannon's way. You see dimly a room in steep perspective, covered with a blue and green druggel, bare, but for the outline of a chair placed against the wall. Looking closer, you discern in the centre of the room three figures. One girl has swooned. She lies prone on the floor, her passive hand resting on her violin. A companion tends her, kneeling; a third girl bends over to replace another violin in its case. This theme is evidently a favourite of Mr. Shannon's, as he has already used it for one of his lithographs. Even those who disapprove of subjects in painting must welcome a picture like this where the subject is so unobtrusive, so subordinate to the colour scheme, and yet so subtly suggestive. I would be well content to live in a room hung with these three pictures.

Mr. Shannon from his youth upwards has painted in the Old Masters manner. He is akin to Mr. Watts, but there is no sort of relationship between his work and the work of Prof. Adolf von Menzel who, if age and honours entitle a painter to be described as an Old Master during his lifetime, certainly belongs to that hierarchy. He is eighty-seven years of age; he is very small of stature, and "Berlin adores the tiny champion of Prussia's greatness." All who follow the trend of art matters must know, from the columns of appreciation of himself and his work published in the papers this week, that a Menzel exhibition is being held in London. The place is the French Gallery in Pall Mall, where the visitor, inspired by the desire to see the productions of this painter, whose reputation "has spread through Europe"; whose brush has "contributed so much to keep alive the fame of Frederick the Great," will find a wall crowded with drawings in pencil, chalk, and water-colour, and a few oil pictures. Well, the peripatetic critic can but describe what he sees, and I have never seen the Frederick paintings that "have long since become a classic." But at the French Gallery, secluded from the other pictures by an encircling arrangement of purple cloth, hangs his "Piazza d'Erbe, Verona." A child would learn from this crowded, animated scene that Menzel is a great draughtsman. Every figure is bristling with life, and avid for your notice; but so little are the figures related to each other, that you could cut the picture into four parts, and each part would still remain a vivid presentment of animated life in the "Piazza d'Erbe, Verona." The figures are better drawn than the figures in Mr. Frith's "Railway Station"; but, if one likes Mr. Shannon's work for certain qualities, it is impossible to like Prof. Menzel's biograph of a Market-Day at Verona. His drawings and sketches are academically as perfect as such things can be; but I do not feel inspired by "Moltke's Field-Glasses" or "A Group of Hedgehogs," however perfectly they may be presented on paper. Perhaps my power of appreciation was a little affected by the manner in which "Professor Adolf von Menzel, H.F.A.: A Contemporary Sketch," which was handed to me with the catalogue, is written. On the opening page I read: "Even at the present day his small hands, unaffected by old age, obey his comprehensive vision and impart to everything an artistic shape." On another page, this: "Whenever the little man, who is hardly 1.40 metres high, in his inevitable summer and winter coat, with his obtrusive umbrella pressed close to his body, is about to pass over a much frequented road, all the cabs and perambulators stop to let him pass." On another, this: "If the waiter places a nice-looking dish before him he first sketches it and then falls to with increased appetite."

There is no introduction to the catalogue of work in enamel, gold and silver by Nelson and Edith Dawson at the Dowdeswell Galleries. The beauty of these articles of adornment and decoration is their sure recommendation. The very titles of them allure—"An Enamel and Gold Pendant, with chrysoprase and aquamarines"; "Silver Box enriched with translucent enamels"; "Gold Pendant, with translucent enamel, aquamarines, spinel rubies, and pearls." In an age of picture making it is pleasant to think of these two artists working together, and bringing to their craft such fastidious taste, and a workmanship whose aim is always perfection.

C. L. H.

Science.

The World is Young.

THE world itself, of course, our planetary prison, is not young. Rather is it old. We call this the year 1903, as some approximate indication of our distance from the most important event in human history. One other date is comparable, in interest, to that—the date of our earth's first revolution around the parent sun. If a "year" be the period of one revolution, what is the real number of this year? We cannot say. Certainly the moon, as Prof. George Darwin has shown, is at least fifty millions of years old, and she was born long after the parent earth separated from the solar patriarch. The crust of the earth has probably been solid for more than a hundred million years. How much older the earth is we cannot say, nor how long it will be before she returns, like the prodigal, to the sun. Nor can we say what proportion the years that are past bear to the years that are to come. This manner of statement is, indeed, unscientific, for the year is lengthening by about twenty-two seconds in each century, and is not a constant measure of time. At any rate, let us gain the clear conception that the life-history of the earth extends from the first second of complete detachment from the solar nebula to the inevitable though distant moment when she touches and becomes re-incorporated with the then dull and sullen mass that roams for ever, yet ever marks the immovable centre of gravity of the system that bears his name.

But if we take the world to mean the society of man—some day, perhaps, to form a new and all-embracing "Society of Friends"—if we complete the alliterative phrase and mean "the world and his wife," then the world is young. I will not wait to discuss the varying senses, observed by Tennyson, in which the words "young" and "old" may be used in this regard. We talk of the "old" times, but the moment of reading is older than the moment of writing these words. The race was never so old as it will be to-morrow. If we come to consider figures, we must clear our minds of any absurd ideas about the "first pair," the "cradle of the race," and so forth. The transition from some tailless "old-world" ape to man was a matter of many generations, displayed in the descendants of many pairs and not of one. But we may adopt as an approximate figure for the age of man a period of two hundred and fifty thousand years, which is believed to have fair claims to provisional acceptance. Furthermore, calculations based on the rate of solar shrinkage and upon other data seem to suggest a period of about three millions of years during which animal life will continue to be possible on the earth. Assuming these two figures fairly to indicate the facts, we may take it that the human race has only completed one-thirteenth part of its history. In this sense, therefore, the world is young. But it is only fair to modify these figures and endeavour to obtain some idea of the date when man became self-conscious. For from that date begins the history of the race, in perhaps the most valid of senses. The estimation of this later date is largely a matter of guesswork, but certain criteria we may find. One writer, I believe, has indicated some such period as twenty-five thousand years; a date some fifteen thousand years or more before the earliest known Babylonian records. Another theoretical method of estimating the length of time during which man has been self-conscious occurs to me, but I gravely question its worth. We know, of course, that the history of the individual is a recapitulation, in brief, of the history of the race. This is Von Baer's law, which may be stated thus, that "Ontogeny is the recapitulation of phylogeny." This concept, so far as I can judge, was known to Stevenson, as the pages of "Olalla" and the "Memoirs of Fleeming Jenkin" bear witness. Now, if we had some time-table which would indicate the correspondence between the stages in the development of a child and the history of the race we might find a key to the present question. If, for instance, a child became self-conscious at five years, and the normal period of development was twenty years, we might get some key to the date at which the race (the individuals of the race, that is) became self-conscious. This was the question I set myself; but the answer is not of my finding. It is not so easy to say, to begin with, when a child does become self-conscious. Tennyson, of course, has told us, in "In Memoriam," that "the baby new to earth and sky . . . hath never thought that this is I," but he gives us no further light. In my limited observation of children I have never been able to decide the point; and my appeal to an authority brought me many individual observations, but no definite dictum. The question, of course, is old, but I have not seen any particularly convincing answer. So with this initial difficulty the argument must cease for the time, and meanwhile let us assume that man has been a self-conscious creature for twenty-five millenia. By self-consciousness is meant, of course, consciousness of self. If we take, then, this fundamental but illusive antithesis between the Ego and the Non-Ego as our standard we may say, in round numbers, that man, the animal with a point of view, is twenty-five thousand years old and has yet three million years to go. He is, therefore, very young indeed, for the proportion between these figures is as one to forty. Man, roughly speaking, is now a semi-articulate babe—not literally an infant but very newly promoted from that state—of one year old; he will die when he is forty.

So you see that there was some reason in Tennyson's wish that, once in a century, he might revisit the glimpses of the moon, and see how the world was going on. For we are in the very dawn of time. Archimedes and Hiero's engine and Democritus have caused many to forget how young Science is. Sir William Crookes, indeed, has gone to the other extreme and forgotten the Greeks altogether in his extraordinary statement, made at Berlin last week, that Englishmen were the first to inquire into the nature of matter. The centenary of Dalton has surely dazzled him. But science as we now know it is really very young indeed—three centuries, indeed, we may say. The "De Magnete" of Dr. William Gilbert, of Colchester, Physician to Queen Elizabeth, may be said to mark the first coherent assertion—earlier even than Bacon—of the inductive method, the method of argument from facts to theories and not vice-versâ. In the final establishment of the à posteriori or inductive method of reasoning as the only weapon of science we may find the beginning of the scientific epoch. I have not forgotten Copernicus and many more, but they do not invalidate the statement that science, or "organised knowledge," as a factor of proper importance in human affairs, is only three hundred years old. I must postpone any consideration of some of the consequences which must follow in years to come, notably in the science of bacteriology. It does not seem to have occurred to any one that disease-producing bacteria will some day be extirpated altogether by the agency of man. That aspect of bacteriology will be purely historical, and the science will be developed in its industrial relations. But serious consequences will ensue. The death-rate, falling in all civilised countries, will drop to eight or seven per thousand per annum. The birth-rate is also falling in all civilized countries, but the time must come when the world becomes crowded to an unmanageable degree. Many social changes must occur; but I believe that all animals, except in so far as they contribute to man's welfare, will be made to cease. But there is plenty of room for speculation here, is there not? Man is only one year old just now: he will have other requirements and somewhat different habits when he is forty. The world is very young.

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

Maeterlinck and Robert Browning.

SIR,—In a recent issue of the ACADEMY there was a brief allusion to an article by me in the New York "Independent," in which I pointed out a surprising similarity between Maeterlinck's play, "Monna Vanna," and Browning's "Luria." The ACADEMY said that I seemed to think M. Maeterlinck had borrowed something from "Luria," and added, "We see no reason to suppose anything of the kind. Criticism by parallel is threadbare." Your readers may be interested in the following letter I received from M. Maeterlinck himself:—

"67 rue Raynouard—Paris—22 Mars 1903.

"CHER MONSIEUR :

"Je viens de lire avec intérêt, dans 'The Independent,' la note que vous avez bien voulu consacrer à 'Monna Vanna.' Vous avez parfaitement raison: il y a entre une scène épisodique de mon 2^{me} acte (celle où Prinzivalle démasque Trivulzio) et l'une des grandes scènes de 'Luria', une similitude que je m'étonne de n'avoir pas vue signaler plus tôt. Je m'en étonne d'autant plus que, loin de cacher cette similitude, j'avais tenu à l'affirmer moi-même en prenant exactement les mêmes villes ennemies, la même époque et presque les mêmes personnages: alors qu'il, eût été bien facile de transposer le tout et de rendre l'emprunt méconnaissable, si j'avais eu l'intention de le dissimuler.

"Je suis un lecteur assidu et un ardent admirateur de Browning qui est selon moi l'un des plus grands poètes que l'Angleterre ait eus. C'est pourquoi je le considère comme appartenant à la littérature classique et universelle que tout le monde est censé connaître. Il est donc licite et naturel de lui emprunter une situation ou plutôt un fragment de situation, comme on en emprunte journellement à Eschyle, à Sophocle, à Shakespeare. Ces emprunts, quand il s'agit de poètes de cet ordre se font, pour ainsi dire, coram populo, et constituent une sorte d'hommage public.

"Pour le reste, en mettant à part cet épisode, qui occupe une place si accidentelle et si accessoire qu'on pourrait le supprimer sans que mon drame en fût ébranlé, toute ma pièce s'écarte complètement de la tragédie de Browning et n'a plus rien de commun avec elle. Cette scène s'élève donc dans mon drame comme une sorte de stèle isolée que ma mémoire pieuse y a dédiée au souvenir du poète qui avait créé en mon imagination l'atmosphère ou se meut 'Monna Vanna,' au souvenir d'un maître entre tous admiré."

Upon my requesting permission to publish this letter, I received another from M. Maeterlinck, cordially giving the desired authorisation, and containing this paragraph, which should also be printed here:—

"Je ne vois nul inconvénient à ce qu'elle soit publiée telle quelle. Je crois seulement me rappeler que j'y disais que la scène entre Prinzivalle et Trivulzio avait été empruntée à Browning. Il serait plus exact de dire qu'elle m'a inspirée par la lecture de 'Luria.' C'est d'ailleurs ainsi que ma nouvelle pièce 'Jocquille,' m'a été inspirée par la 'Tempête' de Shakespeare. S'il semble naturel de chercher un point de départ et un motif d'inspiration dans Shakespeare, pourquoi s'étonnerait-on qu'on les cherche dans Browning?"

As "Monna Vanna" is one of the most notable of contemporary plays, its debt to Browning should be a matter of general interest.—Yours, &c.,

WM. LYON PHELPS.

Yale University, New-Haven, U.S.A.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 194 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best set of verses, not exceeding twenty lines, on June. Forty-one replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss Laura Stephens, Wentworth Cottage, Howth, co. Dublin, for the following:—

Och, 'tis I that's sad an' lonesome
This lovely summer's day,
For thinkin' o' the Hill o' Howth
That's north o' Dublin Bay.
Me father's cabin's on the cliff
Among the heather brown,
Where the little quare ould rabbits
Do be leppin' up an' down.
The bracken buds is just as green
The furze bloom's just as fair,
An' the same white gulls is whirlin'
An' schreechin' in the air.

I'd give the two eyes in me head
To see it all wance more:
The sunshine on Ben Edar an'
The haze along the shore.
Mavrone, mavrone, I sometime wisht
I'd never crossed the say,
For 'tis I that does be lonesome
On a fine June day.

Other replies follow:—

Darkness and wintry grief
Have gone despairing to their prison-house;
No dwelling-place have they
Among the sunny boughs.
Tranquil beneath the dawn,
The red-rose sleeps in joy, as if it knew
The fragrance of its leaves,
The glory of its hue.
As in its circle slow
The dial finger points from hour to hour,
The beech-tree shadow moves
On waves of grass and flower.
No sorrow-haunted night
Lingers and broods along the western sky,
But day links hands with day
In golden unity.

[E. H. T., Manchester.]

O! the slender sorrel spires
In the meadow-lands of June!
Roses light the hedgerow briars,
And the gleaming sorrel spires
Burn aloft like cresset-fires
All the golden afternoon.
O! the slender sorrel spires
In the meadow-lands of June!
Far from all marauding foes
Are these meadow-lands of mine:
Here the small bee-orchis grows,
Far from all marauding foes,
And the little red-stemmed rose
Lets its creamy petals shine.
Far from all marauding foes
Are these meadow-lands of mine.

[J. E. B., Ipswich.]

How all the garden faints with drowsiness!
The world seems dead: the only living thing
Is that small vehement sun which cannot bring
A sense of youth or life wherewith to bless.
Narcissus hangs his head; laburnum's dress
Lies in the dust; the birds forget to sing;
Green buds are waiting for their opening;
And I am weary of the day's hot stress.
Oh for an hour of cold December! How
The hot blood cools to think of thick white snow!
How the tired heart is braced to think of some Slow dawn coming up from the East, each bough
White with the kiss of Winter! . . . But I know
That one day frost and snow will surely come.

[C. F. K., Monton Green.]

The air is grey with dust and thick
With ceaseless clamour, brutal noise,
The sun beats on these miles of brick,
The breeze dies strangled;—who enjoys
This London June?

But somewhere, not so far away,
Deep fields of grass grow ripe for hay,
Long leagues of grass sway green and grey
Before the west wind's wand'ring way,—
West winds in June!

By waterway and waterfall
Green river reeds grow close and tall,
The dragon fly threads through them all,
While in the copse the cuckoos call
"Cuckoo!" in June.

Throughout the sunny summer land
The blackbirds whistle, swallows play,—
Loud roars the traffic down the Strand,
The pavements glare; this is, we say,
The month of June.

[Mrs. C. Y., London.]

June lies down in the meadowland
 With an aching head and with tired feet :
 Full is her bosom, her face is tanned,
 Freckled with wind, and with sun and heat ;
 Dusky her hair that the breeze has fanned,
 And her brow is flushed, but her breath is sweet.
 Down the lone hill track, through the furze aflame
 From the sun's new fire and the morning haze
 To the greenwood dells and the bowers she came,
 And the dazzling noon and the blinding ways.
 Drowsy and warm, and flushed and tanned
 June lies down in the meadowland.

And far to her ear seems the whispering breeze,
 Lark-song, and the burn's cool gush and spurt ;
 But at evenfall, when the landrail jars
 From the misty leas, she leans alert,
 Watching through tapestry of trees.
 Sleepless, night's revelry of stars.

[H. R. S., Newcastle-on-Tyne.]

"O come and view my joys anew," so whispers blue-eyed June,
 "My meadow-sweet is at your feet, my songsters are in tune ;
 The forest glade shall lend you shade when sunbeams fiercely fall.
 I've carpets spread to tempt your tread, I've blessings for you all.
 "Yon mower blithe shall swing his scythe and scent my balmy gales.
 And milkmaids pass, each sunburnt lass with treasure in her pail :
 My roses pink shall make you think that Flora's lips have pressed them ;
 If cloudless skies should tire your eyes my drowsy nights shall rest them.
 "I've healthy joys for ruddy boys, and sports on village greens ;
 I've picnic glades for laughing maids and crowns for rustic queens :
 Mount, minstrel larks, o'er glens and parks your herald anthems fling,
 Let tidings go, let mortals know what varied joys I bring !"

[J. E., Bradford.]

Competition No. 195 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best description of "The Place which has left the most vivid Impression on my Mind." The place may be either at home or abroad, and replies must not exceed 300 words.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 17 June, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon ; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Wace (Rev. Henry), Criticism Criticised.....(Bible League) net 1/0

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Various Writers, Representative English Comedies.....(Macmillan) net 6/0
 Johnson (Harold), The Roadmakers, and Other Poems.....(Watts) net 2/6
 Red Rose.....(Unicorn Press) net 2/6
 Lockwood (John), Haverhill : A Pastoral Poem.....(Sonnenschein) 2/6
 Hervey (Arthur), French Music in the XIXth Century.....(Richards) net 2/0
 Austin (Alfred), Flodden Field. A Tragedy.....(Macmillan) net 4/6
 Clifford (Ethel), Songs of Dreams.....(Lane) net 3/6
 Money-Coutts (F. B.), The Poet's Charter, or the Book of Job.....(") net 3/6
 Grafton (Walter), The Gem Reciter.....(Melrose) 2/0
 Brown (Valentine), The Olfactant and Satires.....(The Author)

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Orrery Papers, The, Edited by the Countess of Cork and Orrery. 2 Vols. (Duckworth) net 42/0
 Hammond (J. L. Le B.), Charles James Fox.....(Methuen) 10/6
 Gasquet (Abbot), A Short History of the Catholic Church in England (Catholic Truth Society) 1/0
 Millar (J. H.), A Literary History of Scotland.....(Unwin) 16/0
 Waddington (Mary King), Letters of a Diplomat's Wife, 1883-1900 (Smith, Elder) net 10/6
 Ackermann (Richard), Lord Byron.....(Winter, Heidelberg) net 2/0
 Froude (James Anthony), My Relations with Carlyle.....(Longmans) net 2/0
 Warner (P. F.), Cricket Across the Seas.....(") net 5/0
 Ireland (Arthur, J.), Stonehenge.....(Henderson) 0/6

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

The Secret of the Universe, and Other Essays.....(Mayle)
 Crump (John F.), Light and Leading. A Volume of Essays (Chapman and Hall) net 3/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Inglis (Harry, R. G.), The "Royal" Road Book of Ireland (Gall and Inglis) net 1/0
 Cook's Continental Time Tables and Tourist Handbook.....(Cook) 1/0
 Jackson (E. L.), St. Helena : The Historic Island.....(Ward, Lock) 6/0
 Melven (William), Guide to Scotland.....(Jack) 0/6
 Bradley-Birt (F. B.), Chota Nagpore.....(Smith, Elder) net 12/6

EDUCATIONAL.

Kimpster (Amy), English Composition.....(Norland Press) 2/0
 Speight (E. E.), Edited by, The Norland Readers. Book I.....(") 0/10 Schramm (Margaret), Little German Folk.....(") 2/0
 Cunningham (Susan), Edited by, Shelley's Adonais.....(") 1/6
 Thompson (John) and Watt (A. F.), Euripides : Iphigenia in Tauris.....(Clive) 3/6

MISCELLANEOUS.

Yates (Lucy), The Management of Money.....(Cox) 1/0
 Mackenzie (V. St. Clair), The Law Relating to Powers of Attorney and Proxies (Wilson) net 3/6
 Tourtel (Mary), The Three Little Foxes.....(Richards) 1/6
 Matthews (John and George), Edited by, Abstracts of Probate Acts in the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.....(Matthews) net 0/7
 Weir (Harrison), Our Poultry. Part 15.....(Hutchinson) net 0/6
 Subject List of Works on Architecture and Building Construction, in the Library of the Patent Office.....(Patent Office) 0/6
 The World's Work. Vol. I.....(Heinemann) 7/6

NEW EDITIONS.

Lever (Charles), Jack Hinton.....(Nelson) net 2/0
 Crabbe (George), Selections from the Poems of.....(Methuen) net 1/6
 Kerr (Richard), Wireless Telegraphy.....(Seeley) 1/0
 Wotton (Henry), The Elements of Architecture.....(Longmans) net 10/6
 Waller (A. R.), Translated by, The Plays of Molière.....(Richards) net 3/5
 Barlow (George), Poetical Works. Vols. VII. and VIII.....(Glasier) each net 5/0
 Wallsgrave (J. C. H.), First Steps in Photography.....(Dawbarn) net 0/6
 Smart (Hawley), Two Kisses.....(Ward, Lock) 0/6
 Boi-roby (Fortune du), The Results of a Duel.....(Treherne) 0/6
 Dalton (W.), Bridge Abridged.....(De La Rue) net 3/6
 Murray's Handbook for Lincolnshire.....(Stanford) 7/6
 Matthews' American Armoury and Blue Book.....(Matthews) 42/0
 Wesley's Journal. Vol. I.....(Kelly) 3/6
 The Temple Bible : First and Second Books of Esdras.....(Dent) net 1/0
 Kerner and Oliver, The Natural History of Plants. Part 13.....(Blackie) net 1/6
 Ballard (Frank), Sports. From the Christian Standpoint.....(Melrose) net 1/0

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The new volume of the "Cambridge Modern History," dealing with the United States, is to be published on June 24 by the Cambridge University Press.

Evidence of the organized and scientific study now devoted to English literature in America, is given by the edition of "Representative English Comedies," which is being produced under the direction of Mr. C. M. Gayley, professor in the university of California. The plan of the work is to trace the development of English comedy from its ecclesiastical origins to the point at which Sheridan left it ; and this will be done in five carefully planned volumes, each containing a selection of comedies chronologically arranged. The first volume about to be published in this country by Messrs. Macmillan covers the pre-Shakespearean period, and, after a general introductory essay on the origins, begins with two interludes by John Heywood, who wrote early in the sixteenth century, and closes with an essay by Prof. Dowden on Shakespeare as a comic dramatist, showing his relations to the earlier work, to contemporaries, and to later comedy.

The two next volumes in Messrs. Macmillan's Pocket Novels series will be "Mrs. Pendleton's Four-in-Hand," by Mrs. Atherton—the story of an enterprising widow who, receiving four proposals on the same day (six months after her bereavement), believes herself the subject of a joke, and retaliates by accepting all four, with comic consequences ; and "Mr. Keegan's Elopement," by Mr. Winston Churchill (the American, not the English author), who shows the remarkable degree of initiation possessed by warrant officers in the American Navy.

The collection of Rossetti papers, which Mr. W. M. Rossetti has arranged, will be published by Mr. Sands next week. It is a continuation of the two volumes of Rossetti's literary remains which appeared some years ago. The present volume brings the record down to 1870.

THE PLAY- 6^{D.} PICTORIAL^{NET.}

An Illustrated Monthly Journal.

EACH NUMBER DEALING WITH A SINGLE PLAY.

- No 1. "MICE AND MEN" (Sixth Edition).
 " 2. "A COUNTRY MOUSE" (Fourth Edition).
 " 3. "THE TOREADOR" (Fifth Edition).
 " 4. "QUALITY STREET" (Second Edition).
 " 5. "THREE LITTLE MAIDS."
 " 6. "MONSIEUR BEUCAIRE" (Third Edition).
 " 7. "IF I WERE KING."
 " 8. "A COUNTRY GIRL."
 " 9. "THE LIGHT THAT FAILED."
 " 10. "A PRINCESS OF KENSINGTON."
 " 11. SPECIAL SUMMER NO. "The Admirable Crichton."
 " 12. "THE CLANDESTINE MARRIAGE" (July 1st).
 " 13. "THE MEDAL AND THE MAID" (August 1st).

And on the first of each succeeding month.

The Play-Pictorial stands alone amongst illustrated journalism on the following points:—

1. Originality of Design.
2. Novelty of Purpose.
3. Number of Illustrations (80 and over in each issue).
4. The freshness of its Pictures.
(Each one being the sole Copyright of the Play-Pictorial, and taken specially for that Journal.)
5. The perfection of its Printing.
6. Unprecedented Success.

IT IS A SHILLING JOURNAL FOR SIXPENCE.

Post Free Eightpence.

PLAY-PICTORIAL POST CARDS

of each of the above Plays (in separate packets),
12 in a packet, beautifully engraved.

ONE SHILLING. (Postage rd.)

The PLAY-PICTORIAL, 35, Wellington Street, Strand, W.C.

SUMMER HOLIDAY NUMBER

THE SMART SET

A MAGAZINE

OF CLEVERNESS

JULY

NOW ON SALE

The contents are of

EXTRAORDINARY MERIT

forming by far the

MOST BRILLIANT ISSUE

Yet Published of this Successful Modern Magazine of Cleverness

Following are some of the principal items:—

The Metempsychosis of the Ogdens ...	Edward S. Van Zile
How "The Kid" went over the Range	Cyrus Townsend Brady
In the Cloister of San Juan ...	Thomas Walsh
Jane's Gentleman ...	Owen Oliver
A Summer Siren ...	Frank Roe Batchelder
Trafalgar Square ...	Martin Dana
The Fatted Calf ...	Juliet Wilbor Tompkins
In Proof of the Maxim ...	Roy Farrell Greene
When She Golfs ...	Edwin L. Sabin
The Voice o' Love ...	Theodosia Garrison
Blue Blood ...	G. B. Burgin
The Plaint of a Poetess ...	Ethel M. Kelley
A Woodland Awakening ...	Aloysius Coll
An Evening Musicale ...	Mary Isabel Fisk
At Her Word ...	Felie Carmen
Break a Heart and Make an Actor	Alfred Henry Lewis
The Beautiful Woman's Narrative	The Baroness von Hutten
The Professor's Love Story ...	Edward W. Barnard
The Lord of Creation ...	L. de V. Matthewman
Exhibit A ...	Kate Jordan
"She's All the World to Me"	Truman Roberts Andrews
La Griffe de Lion ...	Francois Coppée
The Burglar ...	Rose K. Weekes
Chanson Bretonne ...	La Duchesse De Rohan
The Old Codger's Inhumanity ...	Tom P. Morgan

ONE SHILLING EVERYWHERE

This Number contains special advertisements of unusual interest

To prevent disappointment

GET YOUR COPY NOW

The Smart Set Publishing Co.

LIMITED

90-93 FLEET STREET LONDON E.O.

SANDS & Co.

Messrs. SANDS beg to announce the publication of

ROSSETTI PAPERS, 1862-1870,

being a continuation by W. M. ROSSETTI of the record of the career of DANTE GABRIEL ROSSETTI, as shown forth in his two previous works, "Ruskin, Rossetti, Præraphælitism," and "Præraphælitic Diaries and Letters." Demy 8vo, price 10s. 6d. net.

THE REFORMATION SETTLEMENT.

An Epitome of the Statute and Canon Law thereon.

By FREDERICK MACMULLAN and GUY ELLIS.

Demy 8vo, price 1s. 6d.

London: 12, Burleigh Street, Strand.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK.

500 Places to Sell MSS., Photos and Drawings.

It is a Commercial Directory, giving Address, Rates, Time of Payment and Conditions of Contributorship of all Magazines, Papers, Syndicates and Agencies Purchasing MSS., Photos, or Drawings, List of American Magazines and of Publishers.

Price, 1s. 6d. net. Post Free, 1s. 8d.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK COMPANY,
Granville House, Arundel Street, Strand.

NOW READY.

DON JUAN.

CANTOS 17 AND 18.

74 pages 1/- In Pictorial Wrapper. Sent post free for 12 Penny Stamps.

LONDON:

ARLISS ANDREWS, LTD., 31, MUSEUM STREET.

THE TATLER

Edited by CLEMENT SHORTER.

The LIGHTEST, BRIGHTEST,

and MOST INTERESTING

Society and Dramatic Paper ever published.

THE TATLER

An Up-to-Date Society Paper.

Society and the Stage Richly Illustrated Week by Week.

The Best Printing.

The Best Paper, The Best Contents of any Paper of its kind.

Published every Wednesday. Price 6d.

Can be obtained of all Newsagents, and at all Bookstalls.

Offices: GREAT NEW STREET, E.C.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue is now ready,
Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE

1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects. A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HISTORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY, SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 260,000 vols.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED,

30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C. 1

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., London;
and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

NEW LETTERS AND MEMORIALS OF JANE WELSH CARLYLE.

Annotated by THOMAS CARLYLE. Edited by ALEXANDER CARLYLE, with an introduction by Sir JAMES CRICHTON BROWNE, M.D., F.R.S., LL.D. In two volumes, with illustrations. Demy 8vo, 26s. net.

"The publication of these volumes is not only the most important literary event of the year, it is an act of elementary justice."—The Daily News.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A NEW NOVEL ENTITLED ELIZABETH'S CHILDREN.

Crown 8vo, 6s.

NINE POINTS OF THE LAW.

A NOVEL.

By WILFRID SCARBOROUGH JACKSON. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"The portrayal of Hooper is not unworthy of Mr. Anstey."—Pall Mall Gazette.
"A most ingenious imbrolio."—Daily Telegraph.

FIFTH THOUSAND.

THE LIGHT BEHIND.

A NOVEL.

By Mrs. WILFRID WARD, Author of "One Poor Scruple." Crown 8vo, 6s.

LIFE IN THE MERCANTILE MARINE.

By CHARLES PROTHEROE. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

JUST PUBLISHED.

A New and Revised Edition of

THE TWILIGHT OF THE GODS.

By RICHARD GARNETT, LL.D. With frontispiece. Crown 8vo, 6s.

"Here is learning in plenty drawn from all ages and most languages, but of dryness or dullness not a sentence."—The Times.

THE POET'S CHARTER.

By F. B. MONEY COUTTS, Author of "The Mystery of Godliness," &c. Crown 8vo, 3s. 6d. net.

"A prose work on poetry, showing its value, dignity, and divine authority, as exemplified in the 'Book of Job'."

A NEW BOOK OF POEMS. SONGS OF DREAMS.

By ETHEL CLIFFORD. Crown 8vo, 3s. net.

"There are many of these poems in which there is a very original sense of rhythm, a very delicate musical fantasy, a wavering, plaintive mournfulness of accent."—Mr. James Douglas in "The Star."

READY JUNE 24th.

THE MOTOR BOOK.

Vol. II. of the "Country Handbooks."

By R. S. MACREDY. Fcap 8vo. Leather. 4s. net; cloth, 3s. net.

NOW READY.

THE BOOK OF THE HONEY BEE.

By C. HARRISON. Crown 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

The Illustrations to this volume are unique many of them representing the bees at work within the hive.

JOHN LANE, PUBLISHER, VICO ST. W. and NEW YORK.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1624. Established 1869. London: 20 June 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 590

REVIEWS.

Encyclopædia Biblica, Vol. IV.	603
Les Sonnets du Portugal d'Elizabeth Barrett Browning	604
My Relations with Carlyle	605
The Marquis of Dufferin and Ava, Diplomatist, Viceroy, Statesman	606
Crumbs of Pity and other Verses	607
Paris in '48. Letters from a Resident Describing the Events of the Revolution	607
The Soil: An Introduction to the Scientific Study of the Growth of Crops	607

SHORT NOTICES:

The Twilight of the Gods—King Edward and His Court—Life in the Mercantile Marine	608
--	-----

FICTION:

The Riddle of the Sands—The Way Back—The Shutters of Silence	609
--	-----

Notes on Novels	610
-------------------------	-----

ARTICLES.

THE ESSAY: ANCIENT AND MODERN	611
A Friend of Poets	612
On the Best Prose Style	613
Impressions—XXXVII. The Topiarius	614
DRAMA:
Race in Mimicry. E. K. Chambers	615
ART:
Pastels. C. L. H.	615
SCIENCE:
Saviour of Countless Lives. C. W. Saleeby	616
CORRESPONDENCE:
"The State called Reverie"	617
Anabaptists and United Presbyterians	619
Mr. Lucas's "Lamb"	619
WEEKLY COMPETITION:
"The Place which has left the most vivid Impression on my Mind"	619

The Literary Week.

THE books published during the past week have neither been numerous nor particularly interesting. In fiction Mr. W. D. Howells has broken silence with a volume containing three stories dealing with the supernatural. "Carmen Sylva" has also published a collection of short tales with an introductory poem "written in English for this volume" by, we presume, the Queen of Roumania. Mr. E. F. Benson leads off with "The Valkyries," the first of a series of romances founded on the themes of the grand operas. Among the books of the week we note the following:—

MY COLONIAL SERVICE. By Sir G. William des Vœux. Two Vols.

Sir William des Vœux' official life ended more than a decade ago, when ill-health made it necessary for him to resign the government of Hong Kong. The author says in his preface: "As it is . . . probable that even my name is hardly known to the great majority of my countrymen, I fear that this book, when judged by its outside, is likely to be regarded as the 'ponderous biography of a nobody.'" There is not, we imagine, much risk of that. Sir William des Vœux served in British Guiana, St. Lucia, Trinidad, Fiji, Australia, Newfoundland, and Hong Kong, and the main object of his book is to illustrate in detail the operation of the principles of Colonial government. The volumes have portraits and illustrations.

CALIBAN'S GUIDE TO LETTERS. By Hilaire Belloc.

Upon the cover of Mr. Belloc's little book stands the above title; on the title-page we read: "The Aftermath, or Gleanings from a Busy Life: called upon the outer cover, for Purposes of Sale, 'Caliban's Guide to Letters.'" The Guide is divided into various chapters, such as "Reviewing," "The Short Story," "The Short Lyric,"

"The Interview," "The Personal Par." The author says in his preface: "Nothing is Good save the Useful, and it would have been sheer vanity to have published so small a selection, whatever its merit, unless it could be made to do Something, to achieve a Result in this strenuous modern world." There are two pages of imaginary opinions of the press, and an index that is certainly original. The book is a very bright exercise in good fooling and honest satire.

A WRITER in the "Atlantic Monthly" gives some interesting particulars concerning Miss Helen Keller's "Story of My Life," to which we referred last week. The writer says: "Here is the narrative of a young woman who has been deaf and blind from infancy, written in idiomatic English, and indicating the possession of a culture well above that owned by the average college girl of her age. Such an achievement is a new thing in the world." The extraordinary earnestness and tenacity of purpose which resulted in this culture and appreciation are almost appalling, when we remember that they grew in darkness and silence. The secondary heroine in Miss Keller's book is the lady who taught her. She had placed in her charge, at the age of seven, a child quite undeveloped in mind or affections, having no idea of the existence of language, and approachable only through the senses of taste and smell. In two weeks the teacher had won the child's affection, and in four her pupil had grasped the conception of language. Many of Miss Keller's letters are included in the volume. The first begins thus: "helen write anna george will give helen apple simpson will shoot bird." From such pathetic fumbblings, by almost imperceptible degrees, the knowledge grows till a real perception of the beauty of words is attained. Then there occur sentences such as this: "I think only those who have escaped that death-in-life existence from which Laura Bridgman was rescued can realize how isolated, how shrouded in darkness, how cramped by its own impotence, is a soul without thought or faith or hope." Such a triumph of education and development is full of hope for the deaf-blind of the future.

In an article in the "North American Review" on Sir Alfred Lyall's "Tennyson" Mr. Frederick Harrison says:—

Like almost all our poets, except Milton, Gray, Coleridge, and Arnold, he published a great deal more than he need have done. Tennyson no doubt published far less of careless, ill-digested, and poor work than almost any of our poets. All of them, except Milton and Gray, sank at times into bathos unworthy of them. This Tennyson never did. But he published much, in his later career, which is inferior to his best. The future will no doubt be content to remember little more than a half, or even a third, of his immense output. Most of his poems would be more effective if they were only half as long as they are.

Those few sentences contain many disputable statements. Coleridge, in spite of his small poetic production, published some work which the world could very well have done without; and surely all of our poets, except Milton and Gray, did not sink into bathos. We could name a dozen who never became bathetic, though it would be difficult to name one who was not sometimes weak. And the last sentence quoted we can by no means accept; it is one of those generalisations which are so easy to make, so difficult to substantiate. Remembering the best of Tennyson's work we are convinced that it would have lost immeasurably if it had been shortened by half. There are times when Mr. Harrison seems to confound the methods proper to philosophy with the methods proper to poetry.

AN Australian Librarian, writing to us from Kalgoorlie, enters a protest against the methods of certain London publishers. He points out that Messrs. George Bell and Son have issued, under the title "The Little Red Captain," a book by Mr. Cutcliffe Hyne originally published by Messrs. Chatto and Co. in 1895, with the title "Honour of Thieves." How is the public to tell that the new title represents an old book till it has paid for its disillusionment? Again, our correspondent says: "I would also like to call attention to the practice adopted by Messrs. Ward, Lock and Co. of omitting the date of publication of their colonial editions, which I consider should be placed on all books." Our correspondent adds: "The Colonial Editions issued by Messrs. Hutchinson and Co., Messrs. Methuen and Co., and Mr. William Heinemann are, however, eminently satisfactory, especially when compared with the works issued by a few firms who profess to make a speciality of their Colonial editions."

THE treatment of animals in Italy has greatly improved during recent years. Naples, once a great sinner against its beasts, has done much to remove the reproach, as the Duke of Portland's report recently demonstrated. But Spain still lags behind. In a letter to "The Times," dated from Cordova, Mrs. Craigie said:—

It is, no doubt, hard for the uneducated Spaniard, accustomed from early childhood to the tortured beasts, again indescribable, of the bull-fight, to understand or imagine the sufferings of a cheap, worn-out horse (costly animals receive admirable treatment invariably); but yesterday I saw an Englishwoman of the well-to-do class, her children, and their governess driving complacently up a steep hill heavy with thick mud in a three-horse omnibus, the leader of which had large sores on both sides of his body and was altogether unfit to be in harness at all. The driver used his whip with nice ingenuity on the sensitive wounds of the animal; and, although I ventured to call attention to his action, the occupants of the vehicle (hired for their own use) seemed to think it a matter too sordid for refined minds bent on a happy afternoon in a beautiful garden, once reached.

The possibilities of reform, as Mrs. Craigie suggests, lie largely with the tourist. And it is the tourist's business to see to it.

IN quoting last week from Miss Mathers' letter, apropos of our article entitled "Firstliness," we appear, quite unintentionally, to have omitted certain words. Miss Mathers asked whether our "less drawn" meant "well-drawn, ill-drawn, or how-drawn." Our quotation stopped at "well-drawn," and Miss Mathers considers that our readers may suppose that she intended indirectly to praise herself. We had no intention of conveying such an impression.

THERE has reached us from Paris a volume in the series entitled "Pages choisies des Grands Écrivains" containing translations into French from Charles Dickens. Both the translation and the introduction are the work of M. B.-H. Gausseron. The introduction concludes thus:—

Je ne puis mieux résumer ma pensée qu'en une comparaison qui sera comprise de tous: Charles Dickens fut un Alexandre Dumas qui avait l'âme de Vincent de Paul.

THE production of three of Mr. W. B. Yeats's plays in New York, under the auspices of the newly-born American-Irish Literary Society, seems to have been a success. Some of the critics appeared rather doubtful about the whole business, and saved themselves by vagueness. The "World" said:—

The value of Yeats's plays lay in their polished literary finish, their definite underlying purpose clothed in symbolism, and their unerring beauty of expression.

And the "Times" critic wrote:—

Mr. Yeats, though first a poet and a literary mind, has evidently either a natural talent or an acquired power in the line of theatrical effect. Though in his more serious effort he is apparently engaged chiefly in the exposition of an idea, he succeeds in translating it in his plays into action, which serves to bring the thought into a visible picture. There lies the difference between that which is merely poetic and that which is dramatic.

WE have received the first volume of the "Works of Temple Chambers." It contains an "entirely original and largely vegetarian comic opera in two acts," called "The Family of Smith, or Milk and Eggs." This production is reprinted, we are told, from the "Granta," and its dedication runs thus:—

DEAR BILL,

Kindly accept herewith, according to promise in writing, the dedication of the first five hundred copies of this volume of my Works. But you must not expect that the succeeding editions will bear your name. They will be dedicated to others of my friends, in an order to be determined by the warmth of their praise. As an expression of esteem it is more cordial and less expensive than tie-pins.

But the first edition shall be called "Bill's" by future bibliographers. You and I have haunted the dear old Savoy together. This opera was planned in your presence. You read it before anyone. To you alone I have explained the jokes. Now it is your duty to boom it, reveal my identity to all your acquaintance, and oblige

Yours pseudonymously,

TEMPLE CHAMBERS.

There seems to be some fairly amusing matter in the little volume, but why prejudice us against it by a dedication so sadly undergraduate?

WE notice the following amusing paragraph in the "Weekly Critical Review":—

The Editor of the "Weekly Critical Review" offers his sincere apologies to John Gurdan, Esq., for the verses which were inserted at the end of the criticism of that author's poem "Erinna," and which looked very much like a sarcastic cut at the book. The mistake occurred through an error in paging, committed by a foreign compositor.

It was rather unkind to insist that the compositor was foreign.

THE Trustees of the Chantrey Bequest have lately been the objects of attack, and, in our opinion, of just attack. Now it is the turn of the National Gallery. In a leading article in the "Burlington Magazine" we read:—

In former years a London dealer who had a particularly fine picture in his possession would have offered it to the National Gallery; now that is the last thing that he thinks of doing; he knows too well that the authorities of the National Gallery would probably not take the trouble even to look at it, and that some of those who would have a voice in deciding whether it should be purchased have not the necessary qualifications for making such a decision. The evil has been increased by the insane rule now in force, that the trustees of the National Gallery must be unanimous before any picture is purchased—a rule which, as anyone with sense would have foreseen, has led to an absolute deadlock. Within the last few weeks, for instance, the chance of purchasing a superb work of Frans Hals at a very moderate price has been lost to the nation, simply because one of the trustees of the National Gallery refuses to agree to any purchase that does not suit his own preference for art of what may be called the glorified chocolate-box type.

In the meantime such museums as those of Berlin, Boston, Munich, and Amsterdam find it worth while to buy largely in London.

WE cut the following example of cheerful and jaunty journalism from an evening contemporary:—

The gentleman (Ludwig Eisenbaum) who started to cross the Atlantic in an open boat has abandoned the little pleasure trip. He got wet through in a storm and rheumatism ensued. Hence he concluded that "discretion was the better part of valour," and turned up the job.

MISS EDGEWORTH'S "Helen," just reissued in Messrs. Macmillan's Illustrated Pocket Classics, was, we are reminded by Mrs. Ritchie in her introduction, written when the author was quite an old woman. It was written, too, when sorrow had touched her nearly: it was begun long after the death of her chief critic, her father, and during the time when she was prostrated by physical weakness largely due to the loss of her young brother. When she could snatch time from the administration of an estate—an Irish estate—she sat down to "Helen." It took four years to complete the book. Mrs. Ritchie concludes her pleasant introduction by quoting Mrs. S. C. Hall's description of the brilliant little lady in her later years:—

In person she was very small,—smaller than Hannah More, and with more than Hannah More's vivacity of manners; her face was pale and thin, her features irregular, they may have been considered plain even in youth, but her expression was so benevolent, her manners so entirely well bred, partaking of English dignity and Irish frankness, that you never thought of her in reference either to plainness or beauty—she was all in all; she occupied, without fatiguing, the attention, charmed by her pleasant voice, while the earnestness and truth that beamed in her bright blue—very blue—eyes made of value every word she uttered. Her words were always well chosen, her manner of expression was graceful and natural, her sentences were frequently epigrammatical.

A RECENTLY published volume of Irish stories, entitled "The Passionate Hearts," by Anna MacManus (Ethna Carbery), has a more than ordinary and a pathetic interest. The writer's book of verse "The Four Winds of Eirinn," had a rather remarkable success—it is now in its ninth edition. The present volume comes to us after its author's death. From a preface by Mr. Seumas MacManus we extract the following:—

She who wrote these stories of our people loved them with a love that was deep and tender beyond what words of mine could convey. When she wrote of our people, when she spoke of our people—her people—her eyes went wet with fondness. Her faith in them was full, and great, and strong. Through their noble nature Mother Fire would, she knew, ere long rise triumphant.

Little dreamt she that ere the glory burst upon Erin, God should have taken her to watch for it from His footstool. Yet, now that the grass is green above her grave in Donegal, the friends who knew her—who knew her unending work for our land, and who knew the passionate love of country that consumed her—can stand by that little mound and say from their hearts: There lies one who gave her young life to Ireland.

The little volume has a cover design in colour by "A. E.," whose work is well known to all lovers of real poetry.

THE endless story in the "Review of Reviews" opens this month with a description of the massacres at Kishineff. Such a journalistic opportunity, no doubt, was not to be missed, but we cannot think that any good purpose is served by the gory realism of Chapter XXIV. The bare newspaper narratives were quite enough.

MISS JANE BARLOW has an article in the "Pilot" concerning "Business in Glen." Glen suffers from a dearth of reading matter; for many a mile round "the only reading material purchasable for love or money must be sought in the senselessly vulgar mottoes inscribed upon those plaster-of-Paris sweets, by which the youth of the neighbourhood are, to their physical and mental disadvantage, beguiled of their rare halfpence." Yet Miss Barlow says that this dearth co-exists with the keenest appetite for something to read. Practically all the younger people know how to read; they have the key, but can find no door to open with it. Occasionally, and only occasionally, a newspaper finds its way to Glen:—

On those long, empty-handed evenings, when the last word has been conned in the ill-printed columns, and when the lamp screening the window, and the fire flushing the wall, seem to light no purpose of profit or pleasure, the hours must lag leadenly. It appears quite possible that we have here one reason for the exodus of young folk so steadily proceeding from the country, if we may conjecture some of them to be scared from their parent's door not so much by dread of the grinning wolf poverty, as by disgust at the crawling slug, dulness. To banish the latter pest in remote and out-of-the-way places such as Glen, no means could be more effectual than a well-equipped travelling library van. . . . Meanwhile, however, the book trade in Glen cannot be said to thrive, and as another of the neighbours remarked: "You'd get as much reading off the clouds in the sky as off anything else you'll find in the parish."

There are times when we could gladly wish our reading to be confined to the "clouds in the sky." But then we do not live in Glen.

ONE of the pleasantest of the many recent new attempts to tickle book-buyers is Messrs. Macmillan's series of "Pocket Novels by Favourite Authors." The little books are modestly bound in green cloth and the type is clear and nicely spaced. Mr. Marion Crawford's "Man Overboard" and Mr. Winston Churchill's "Mr. Keegan's Elopement" are prefixed by portraits of the authors, and at the end there is a brief sketch of their lives and work. Perhaps the word "novel" hardly properly applies to the series; the books are rather amplified short stories. "Man Overboard" contains only about fifteen thousand words.

THE first bound volume of the "World's Work" lies before us. We have from time to time called attention to the actuality and value of this most practical of monthlies. In the matter of photographic illustration the "World's Work" has gone about as far as it is possible to go. The portraits are real character studies of living men whose influence is actively at work to-day. Mr. Henry Norman's articles on the motor are amongst the most interesting and useful in the volume. Both for the busy man and the man of leisure, this handsome volume is full of suggestion.

THE "Tabard Inn" Library, of which we gave particulars some time ago, has now got to work, and its promoters have confidence that its success in England will be as great as in America. The other day, in reponse to a single advertisement, applications were received from over fifteen hundred intending subscribers.

SOME remarkable prices were realised the other day for books once owned by Thackeray. We give some of the figures. A copy of the first edition of Charles Tennyson's "Sonnets and Fugitive Pieces," 1830, with Thackeray's signature, two sketches and an original poem of twelve lines by him, entitled "Written in Solitude," £140; "The Connoisseur," 1757-60, volumes 1 and 3 only, in the first of which there are several clever pencil sketches and notes by Thackeray, £25; "The Elements of Euclid," 1791, with the autograph, "W. M. Thackeray, Charterhouse," a pencil sketch and note in pencil, £11 10s.; M. Starke's "Information and Directions for Travellers on the Continent," 1832, with several pencil sketches by Thackeray, £61; Ainsworth's "Latin Dictionary," with the autograph "W. M. Thackeray, Charterhouse, July, 1827," and three pencil sketches by him, £24; and "Guide Indispensable du Voyageur," Brussels, no date, with seven pencil sketches by Thackeray, and the autograph of Henry Carmichael Smyth, his father-in-law, £41. All these books, it is pleasant to note, were purchased by one buyer.

Bibliographical.

THE keen appreciation with which Mr. Bernard Shaw's burlesque in verse, "The Admirable Bashville," was received at the recent performances of the Stage Society, should induce Mr. Shaw or his publishers, or both, to print and publish it separately in a cheap form. At present it is to be found only at the end of the volume, published in 1901 by Mr. Grant Richards, which is mainly devoted to the text of "Cashel Byron's Profession." Of course, Mr. Shaw's preface to the skit should be reprinted with it. It will be remembered that in the general preface to this volume Mr. Shaw told us that Mr. W. E. Henley had suggested the dramatization of the novel: Mr. Henley could hardly have anticipated that his suggestion would eventuate in "The Admirable Bashville," the best thing of its kind since the "Rosencrantz and Guildenstern" of Mr. W. S. Gilbert. "The Admirable Bashville" would be the better, no doubt, for a little judicious "cutting": there might then be some chance of its getting on to the regular boards, though there would be the danger of its falling into the hands of the gifted amateur.

As our newspapers are the real educators of "the people," it is always a pity when they mislead their pupils. Poetry, for instance, is largely known only by quotations, and it is a real evil when those quotations are inaccurate. In one journal the other day I saw these lines (on carping scribes) attributed to Tennyson:—

The only answer unto such
Is perfect silence while they brawl.

Now, what Tennyson actually wrote in the first draft, which appeared in "Punch," was—

The noblest answer unto such
Is kindly silence when they brawl.

This he afterwards altered to—

The noblest answer unto such
Is perfect stillness when they brawl.

This is the reading now given in the collected works.

For the sake of the Printers' Pension Corporation I trust that the publication called "Printer's Pie" has had a large circulation. At the same time, as a bibliographer, I anathematize such products, which are the despair of my class. Who is to keep pace with such casual and ephemeral concoctions? They are almost as difficult to capture and record as that elusive creation the "privately-printed" volume. Some of the contributors to "Printer's Pie" are so eminent that their smallest offspring must needs be noted when discovered. The brochure itself is issued from the office of a weekly paper. Should not bibliographers conspire to regard such vagrom miscellanies as non-existent, or at least negligible?

The little "Dante Treasury" just added to the "Bibelot" series has the merit of attracting attention anew to a rhythmical version of the "Divine Comedy" which is rarely mentioned nowadays—that which was produced in 1833-43 by Ichabod Charles Wright, the Nottingham banker-poet, and which was regarded by Tom Moore as "exceeding even Cary's" in excellence. The "Treasury" is edited by Mr. J. P. Briscoe, the head of the Free Library at Nottingham, to whose local sympathies we are no doubt indebted for this resuscitation (in extracts) of the Ichabod Wright translation.

I see, by the way, that among forthcoming "Bibelots" will be an anthology of "Pickwickian Wit and Humour." I should hardly have thought that had sufficient novelty; most people who care for "Pickwick" at all have got it by heart. I remember that, some time in the eighties, some one published a collection of "Wellerisms," chosen from "Pickwick" and "Master Humphrey's Clock." There has also been a collection of "Tales from Pickwick." Now Mr. Percy Fitzgerald will have to add to his "History" of that work.

There will be a public, no doubt, for the memoirs of Peter the Great which Zenside Ragozni is to contribute to one of the numerous "series." It will probably be more elaborate than the somewhat jejune monograph which Mr. Oscar Browning produced in 1898, and probably somewhat less elaborate than the "Life" by Waliszewski which was translated by Lady Mary Loyd in 1897 (one-volume edition in 1898). I suppose Waliszewski will be taken as having superseded Eugène Schuyler, whose "Life" of Peter, published here in 1884, went into a new edition in 1891.

From a bibliography in the current issue of the "English Illustrated Magazine," I gather that Mr. W. B. Yeats first appeared in print in the pages of the "Dublin University Review" (September, 1885). To that Review he contributed in the following year "Mosada," which, reprinted in book form in 1887, constituted his first separate publication. Then came "The Wanderings of Oisín" (1889), "The Countess Kathleen" (1892), and so forth. Virtually his literary career began with "The Countess Kathleen."

The promised "pocket Lamb"—800 pages on thin paper—is likely to be very popular, if the type be only sufficiently large and clear. The new India paper is a boon and a blessing in such cases as these. The only extant one-volume edition of Lamb is, I believe, that issued by Messrs. Chatto, and that is of a portly habit. The "pocket Lamb" that is to come will be, I trust, really pocketable.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

The Critics' Bible.

ENCYCLOPEDIA BIBLICA. Vol. IV., Q to Z. Edited by the Rev. T. K. Cheyne and J. Sutherland Black. (Adam and Charles Black. 20s. net.)

THE fourth and final volume of this Encyclopædia presents no very marked difference from its predecessors. If the student of the Bible, or, for that matter, the general reader, happens to turn for information to articles like those on "Sennacherib," by Mr. C. H. W. Johns, or "Siege" and "War," by Prof. Owen Whitehouse, or on "Syria," by Mr. D. G. Hogarth, Mr. A. Shipley, and Dr. Hugo Winckler, he will find within all that he can possibly want to know, put with a brevity and point that leave nothing to be desired. In the article, "Text and Versions," by Mr. F. C. Burkitt, he will also find what is in effect a treatise on the difficult subject of textual criticism, written with hardly an unnecessary word, but without the excessive compression that appears in some of the other articles, while it will cost him but a glance to convince himself of Mr. Burkitt's complete mastery of his subject, and the care and pains that he has taken to bring his remarks up to date. In Prof. W. Max Muller's articles on Egyptian subjects, such as "Rameses," "Shishak," "Tahpanhes," "Tirhakah," and others, and in those on "Shekel" and "Weights and Measures," by Mr. G. F. Hill, we feel that we are listening to the voice of experts, and can only regret that such experts should not have been allowed more elbow-room. In all these matters the Encyclopædia is excellent, and has nothing to fear by comparison with any of its rivals.

We find a different state of things when we turn to those controversial or doctrinal articles, which are, as before, written with the apparent desire of upsetting the traditional or received interpretation hitherto placed upon the more important statements of the Bible. Prof. Schmiedel leads off with an article on "Resurrection and Ascension Narratives," in which he disposes, very much to his own satisfaction, of the idea that the appearances of the Founder of Christianity after the Crucifixion had any existence elsewhere than in the over-heated brains of the supposed beholders. He admits, indeed, that "the historian who will have it that the alleged appearances are due merely to legend or invention must deny not only the genuineness of the Pauline Epistles [we have seen that this is denied by another writer in the Encyclopædia], but also the historicity of Jesus altogether." But he seeks to show that there is no evidence that the risen Jesus ever ate, or was touched, or spoke; while he declares his own conviction that no watch was ever set upon the Sepulchre, that it was never found empty, and that all the earlier appearances took place in Galilee and in Galilee alone. He then examines most of the hypotheses on which it can be supposed that the disciples believed that they saw what they say that they saw, and pronounces in favour of the visions being merely "subjective," or in other words, due to the imagination. After going through the whole argument, he concludes that "the most that can be claimed is that it proves the possibility—the probability if you will—of the explanation from subjective visions." Later, Prof. N. Schmidt, in "Son of Man," tells us that "it is extremely difficult to believe in the historical character of the trial before the Sanhedrin," and Mr. Maurice Canney in "Synædrium" that "it is impossible to gather from the New Testament really reliable details of the trial that resulted in the crucifixion of Jesus." While in "Son of God," Prof. Schmidt asserts that "there is no reason to suppose that the great darkness, the earthquake, the rending of the veil in the temple, and the rising of the dead from their tombs [at the Crucifixion] actually occurred"; that "a critical study of the synoptic material leads inevitably to the conclusion that Jesus never called himself 'the Son of God,' and was never addressed by that title"; and that "he was proclaimed as such by voices from heaven and hell is a notion consonant with the ideas of the time, but not of such a nature as to command belief at present." At the risk of anti-climax it may here be mentioned that in the article on "Romans (epistle)," Prof. Van Manen contends not only that this epistle is not by St. Paul, but that "no serious efforts to defend its genuineness have as yet ever been attempted."

Looking back, now, through the earlier volumes (which were reviewed in the ACADEMY of 2 December, 1899, 23 February, 1901, and 26 April 1902), we find it possible to reconstruct the Central Figure of Christianity as he appears to the writers in this Encyclopædia. According to Canon Cheyne and his contributors, the "historic Jesus" was a completely human being, there only existing in him such divinity as is capable of being found in a man. He was not born at Bethlehem, nor of a virgin; being the son, in the ordinary way of nature; of Joseph and Mary. No miracles were performed by him, and he was never called the Son of God by himself or by anyone else during his lifetime. The central fact that he was crucified is admitted, but all the accessories of the crucifixion, including the presence of any male disciples thereat, are later accretions to the legend. He never rose from the dead, the stories that he did so being traceable to collective hallucinations undergone by his followers in Galilee and due to religious excitement. As to how far the New Testament preserves any record of his teaching, only five sayings attributed to him are absolutely authentic. These are: "Why callest thou Me good? none is good save God only;" the statement in Matthew that blasphemy against the Son of Man may be forgiven; those in Mark that the relations of Jesus held him to be beside himself, and that even the angels of God and the Son were ignorant concerning "that day and that hour"; and the cry from the Cross of "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken Me?" Our ignorance in this respect is quite as noteworthy in the case of St. Paul, for none of the epistles attributed to him are by his hand, nor the epistle to the Romans, nor can anything be said regarding his life with certainty save that he actually existed, that his first attitude towards the followers of Jesus was one of hostility, but that he afterwards joined them and passed the rest of his life as a wandering preacher. It seems hardly worth while in this connection to speak of the Old Testament, but it may be mentioned that it is stated in the present volume that no book in it is written by the author to which it is attributed, and that the general tendency of the whole work is to refer the principal traditions therein to heathen sources.

That these assertions, if true, should be published, is one of the points on which we, at any rate, have no quarrel with the projectors of this book. But the reader cannot be too often warned that their truth or falsehood depends not upon fact, but upon conjecture. No new discoveries affecting the veracity or otherwise of, for instance, the received gospels have been made, and although our geographical and archaeological knowledge is more extensive than in the Dark Ages, the discrepancies which undoubtedly exist between the different gospel narratives are not more patent to us now than they were to writers like Tertullian, Origen, and Jerome in the early days of Christianity. These last-named persons, too, were better equipped than ourselves, both by race and proximity, for the understanding of the scene on which the opening part of the drama of Christianity was enacted, and they wrote in the presence of learned and astute opponents who would have been quick to expose any manifest flaw either in their facts or their arguments. In spite of this, they continued to assert their belief in the substantial correctness of the Bible narratives, and given their good faith, it is difficult to see why they should have done so if the inconsistencies and absurdities of these are so evident as to deprive them of all title to credit. In one word, we can hardly think that it has been reserved for a few professors in European and American universities to point out to us after a process which, although dignified by other names, is merely one of collation and comparison, the intolerable amount of chaff which surrounds the few grains of wheat that they are pleased to allow to us.

Lest it should be thought that this is merely an argument ad captandum, we venture to give one instance of the manner in which the destructive criticisms in this Encyclopædia are evolved. Very early, indeed, Canon Cheyne, after his manner, adopted the theory of Winckler (lately refuted by Dr. Budge) that the Misur or Musri of the cuneiform inscriptions did not, as had hitherto been supposed, always mean Egypt, but generally referred to a rather undefined territory in North Arabia. He did not, however, lay much stress upon the matter, and the article on "Arabia" in the first volume contained no mention of it. In a short article on "Jarha," however, Mr. Stanley Cook happened to mention that Jarha, who in the Book of Chronicles is said to be an Egyptian or Mizrite, might possibly be an inhabitant of this supposed North Arabian Musri, and that the name might perhaps be considered to be identical with the Jerahmeel who in the same chapter is said to be the first-born of Hezron, the grandson of Judah. This was followed up by another article on "Jerahmeel" by the same author, wherein it is said that the names coupled with Jerahmeel in Chronicles "betray an affinity with South Palestine." This immediately produced a "tag" appended by the chief editor in which he hazards the guess that "the Jerahmeelites were a much more important tribe or collection of tribes than we have imagined," and gives "a list, probably incomplete, of O. T. names which may have been corrupted from Jerahmeel." The appetite comes, however, in eating in such matters, and this proved to be as the letting-out of water for Canon Cheyne. From this page forward it is hardly possible to turn over the leaves of the book without the name Jerahmeel meeting the eye. Adam, Lamech, Enoch, Abraham, Amraphel (whom we have been elsewhere taught to look upon as Hammurabi of Babylon) are all of them declared to have names identical with Jerahmeel. Amalek and Elam are in like manner said to coincide with this mystic word, the garden of Eden is said to mean the garden of Jerahmeel, the cities of the Plain are the cities of Jerahmeel, and the oppressors of the Israelites in what are known as the "Servant" passages in deuterio-Isaiah are said to be Jerahmeelites. So, too, Hiram-abi, who in his proper place in the Dictionary is allowed to wear his own name, is under the word "Solomon" assumed to have been called Jerahmeel; while the "algum-wood" used by him in the building of the Temple is said to be better described as "Jerahmeelite timber." Bethlehem is in like manner said to be "an early corruption" of Beth-Jerahmeel, and it is pretty plain that these identifications are to be continued in the "Critica Biblica" that Canon Cheyne contemplates publishing. It really seems as if he attributed to the word Jerahmeel all the magical efficacy lent by the old lady to "Mesopotamia"; yet his belief in it seems to date from Mr. Cook's ingenious reference, and it is plain that it was not in his mind when the plan of the Encyclopædia was first excogitated. This is surely the very midsummer madness of criticism.

It follows from what we have said that the book has, in our opinion, entirely failed in its purpose. It cannot be recommended to the orthodox or even the unorthodox believer, both of whom will find in it much to shock, though nothing to shake their faith. Nor to the opponent of Christianity, for it demands of him belief in the inspiration of the critics instead of in the criticised documents.

Mrs. Browning in French.

LES SONNETS DU PORTUGAIS D'ELIZABETH BARRETT BROWNING.
Traduits en vers Français avec Préface, Texte Anglais en regard, et Notes, par Léon Morel. (Paris: Hachette et Cie.)

Two aims, more or less incompatible, lie before the translator: one is the precise rendering of his author's meaning; the other the production, in his own tongue, of a piece of good literature. The degree in which the one or the other of these two aims should prevail must depend largely upon the nature of the matter to be translated. In rendering a scientific treatise, a statement of fact, or an ancient record, faithfulness and clearness are all in all. To sacrifice to literary considerations one iota of exactitude would be indeed to play the part of the traitor who lurks proverbially in the skin of every translator. In such a case the path to be followed lies clear enough; it is a question, not so much of literature, as of honesty. But when we come to deal with a work of sheer beauty, a poem, for instance, the very essence of which lies in harmony, in exquisite expression, and in power to call up a particular atmosphere of emotion, then our course becomes more uncertain, and the exact balance of duties difficult to strike. To translate Euclid is plain sailing; but how shall we translate "Ueber allen Gipfeln ist Ruh," or "Les Cadets de Gascogne," or—with M. Morel—the "Sonnets from the Portuguese"? The task is beyond achievement, and therefore endlessly attractive. For we must not only follow the thought and something at least of the shape; we must at the same time so fit these things to the language and the temperament of another race as to make them evoke, in the new readers, the same kind of delight and emotion as were awakened in the old. To use Stevenson's metaphor of the juggler, we must keep up at least half a dozen oranges at once, giving an impelling touch now here, now there, and never suffering any one of the half-dozen to drop to earth. To do this, with even approximate success, demands, first, the literary sense—that gift with or without which we are as surely born as with or without the ear for music; second, not only a wide knowledge of, but also a deep feeling for, both tongues; third, a very high degree of technical equipment. It demands, in short, all the qualifications of the original writer, except (vast exception!) the creative spark, and plus a certain dose of critical insight and a considerable intimacy with an alien language.

That the flair of the translator is more or less a natural aptitude may be seen among boys at school. Every schoolmaster knows that one pupil, with perhaps no very great knowledge of Latin or Greek, will, time after time, produce Latin and Greek prose the standard of which is far above that of class-mates better instructed, more painstaking and possibly of greater general ability. There does undoubtedly exist in some persons a natural feeling for the connotations of words, a sympathy with the turns of language, and this quality, desirable in the original writer (although at least two great writers of our own day and tongue have lacked it), is essential to the translator. It is a gift apt, like most artistic gifts, to run in families. Moreover, so curious are the windings of human faculty that this sympathy may be partial; a schoolboy's Greek prose may be always good, and his Latin prose always poor; with equal knowledge of both tongues, one man will translate admirably from the French and clumsily from the German, while another, perhaps, will translate excellently from the German and awkwardly from the French. Not many translators can do equally well in every field, any more than most actors can play both Hamlet and Touchstone.

The mental processes indeed of actor and translator are much akin. In each case the thought of another man has to be first taken in and then given out again in a new medium—a form of intellectual exertion for which the average Englishman has no eye, so that the actor appears to him an idler, and the translator a copyist. The fascination, too, of the two arts is not dissimilar; translation-fever, though less conspicuous, and perhaps less acute, is as common as stage-fever, and more enduring, so that many a man carries through life the silent conviction that he alone, penetrating that Sleeping Beauty's thicket where hundreds have perished before him, is capable of adequately translating Horace or Heine. What literary man of any classical schooling has never attempted "Eheu, fugaces—" ? How many score versions (and never a good one) have been made of "Du bist wie eine Blume" ?

But although Horace and Heine remain the most baffling of individual authors, the tongues in which they write are free from certain differences of spirit which render peculiarly difficult the translation of French verse into English or of English verse into French. These difficulties are naturally enhanced when a complicated verse-form, like the sonnet, is to be reproduced; and the enterprise upon which M. Léon Morel has adventured was fraught with perils. On the whole, he has surmounted them with astonishing success. One or two of his sonnets are veritable triumphs, and succeed in rendering every shade of Mrs. Browning's meaning—sometimes more happily, and pretty often more smoothly than his original—in reproducing just the breaks and stops of the English, and in being, at the same time, charming poems in French. It would surely, for example, be impossible to better this:—

My poet, thou canst touch on all the notes
God set between His After and Before,
And strike up and strike off the general roar
Of the rushing worlds, a melody that floats
In a serene air purely. Antidotes
Of medicated music, answering for Mankind's forlornest uses, thou canst pour
From thence into their ears. God's will devotes Thine to such ends; and mine to wait on thine!
How, dearest, wilt thou have me for most use?
A hope, to sing by gladly? . . . or a fine
Sad memory, with thy songs to interfuse? . . .
A shade, in which to sing . . . of palm or pine?
A grave, on which to rest from singing? . . . Choose.

Sous tes doigts, mon poète, a vibré toute note
Que Dieu fit, du passé jusqu'au terme des âges,
Évoquant ou calmant, sur la mer sans rivages
Des tourbillons du monde, une rumeur qui flotte
Purement dans un ciel serein. C'est antidote
Qu'en toi l'humanité trouve pour ses usages
Les plus désespérés, ton magique langage
Qui guérit, vient de là. Telle est la tâche haute Que Dieu t'assigne, et t'y seconder est la mienne.
Comment, ô mon Aimé, puis-je te mieux servir?
Suis-je un espoir, gaité de tes chants? . . . ou la peine
Que mêle à ta musique un triste souvenir?
L'ombre . . . pin ou palmier, de ta muse sereine?—
La tombe et le repos? . . . C'est à toi de choisir.

Yet the effect of the French is not quite the effect of the English; the longer line slackens the tempo and imparts a tone of languor and dreaminess. Since a sonnet in lines of ten syllables would doubtless seem intolerable to French readers, the translator must accept this difference as one of the conditions of his task, and set himself to fill up as best he may the twenty-eight extra syllables in each sonnet. To some extent his language—especially with the sounded e mute of verse—fills them for him, but not completely. It is almost impossible that he should avoid amplifying, and amplification we find, accordingly: an adjective where Mrs. Browning has none, two adjectives where she has one, little clauses to which nothing answers in the English. These have, almost invariably, the true note; the thought is not distorted, it is often indeed elucidated—but it is diluted. Here is an example:—

Is it indeed so? If I lay here dead
Would'st thou miss any life in losing mine,
And would the sun for thee more coldly shine
Because of grave-damps falling round my head?
Pourrait-il être vrai? Si j'étais là sans vie,
Toute vie à tes yeux serait morte avec moi?
Le soleil désormais brillerait pâle et froid,
Si la brume entourait ma tête ensevelie?

Once or twice the amplification is a serious weakness. Thus:—

Et morte, si Dieu veut, t'aimerai mieux ailleurs, falls very far short of—

If God choose
I shall but love thee better after death, and the whole difference lies in the unhappy and enfeebling word "ailleurs." On the other hand, there are passages where M. Morel improves upon his original.

Et d'un coup, un grand cœur s'éprend jusqu' à la mort is both a finer line and a better ending than—

And great souls at one stroke may do and doat.

From some few misreadings of his author perhaps no translator can be free; and surely in Sonnet 42 M. Morel is wrong to translate "my lost saints" by "mes saintes délaissées." The lost saints are surely the loved ones taken away and rendered sacred by death, not saints outgrown and left behind. But these failings are small indeed; the whole level both of faithfulness and of poetic merit is extraordinarily high, and leaves the attentive reader wondering whether M. Morel who displays as a translator so many of the poet's endowments possesses also the one thing more, and could, if he would, give us original work of equal excellence.

The Last of It?

MY RELATIONS WITH CARLYLE. By J. A. Froude. (Longmans, Green. 2s. net.)

THESE notes, found after Froude's death, at the bottom of an old despatch-box, tear the last veil from his knowledge of the Carlyle household; and are supplemented by a letter from the late Sir James Stephen, justifying Froude's action in the conflict which arose out of the attempt to prevent the publication of the dangerous Carlyle documents. They should be the last word in a fray which can scarce be carried further without indecency. The result is to justify Froude's action in a publication which he believed to be in accordance with Carlyle's wishes, though not to acquit him of misjudgments in the manner of it; and to set his view of Carlyle's relations with his wife on what seems a solid foundation of facts. But while it adds a deeper cause for the pair's disunion, and does away with the hope that their mutual love survived the friction, it does not otherwise alter the view we expressed in noticing Sir J. Crichton-Browne's contentions.

The essential point of this last revelation is that Carlyle was unfit for marriage. It is stated on the authority of Miss Jewsbury, of references (apparently) in Mrs. Carlyle's Diary, and of common talk among the Carlyle circle. It is supported by the now disclosed fact that she constantly talked as though she were free to leave him, and more than once was within an ace of doing so. The Ashburton business receives confirmation, and Carlyle's wild temper towards his wife, which it seems once went so far as leaving bruises on her arms. Carlyle, says Mr. Froude, was egotistic, overbearing, scornful and denunciatory in a reckless fashion; his egotism combined with dyspeptic gloom made him abnormally exacting and abnormally irritable, while his temper was savage. Absorbed in his own work and affairs, he did not perceive his wife's illness, and homilised her on patience if he did: but upon his own sufferings he was eloquent. He killed her devotion; and when, alarmed by her nearly fatal illness, he tried amendment, it was too late to recover it. Nor was it long before she died. He had worn out her nerves.

It is an indictment we do most potently believe. But the old defect remains: the wife was not quite the patient martyr of devotion she appeared to the fascinated eyes of Mr. Froude.

There is a story which illustrates the aspect of the case that Mr. Froude has unconsciously eliminated. A visitor calling on the Carlyles met the philosopher going out of the door, looking dazed and depressed. Entering, the visitor found Mrs. Carlyle on the sofa, and the story came out. She had lain for days with a sick or neuralgic headache, unnoticed by her husband; and Carlyle, coming down from his work, had that moment inquired, with an air of sudden consciousness, "Aren't you well, my dear?" She expressed her feelings—with the sofa-cushion. Now Mr. Froude gives us Mrs. Carlyle, without the sofa-cushion. Nay, he writes:—

It had not been that he was consciously indifferent, but he was pre-occupied. He made little of other people's sufferings; she had rarely complained at the worst, and was a Stoic in the sternest sense of the word.

For our part, we should say: "Complain—but don't shy the sofa-cushion." It may be, of course, that Stoicism admits sofa-cushions, as a purely symbolic mode of expression. No doubt, had Carlyle been a complete philosopher, he would have remembered Xantippe, and reflected that evolution had mollified wifely missiles, if not manners. But Carlyle's philosophy always lacked completion.

And here, by the way, one cannot but reflect what an excellent good thing it was for Socrates that no one (Xenophon, for example) wrote a Memoir of Xantippe. That little incident, so curiously parallel with the case of the Chelsea sage and his wife, had probably a side much more favourable to the lady than antiquity would have us believe. But Mrs. Carlyle's tongue was keener than Xantippe's, with the added deadliness of culture. If Carlyle had an ugly temper, how often was it lashed to fury by a tongue which took the skin off you like a cat's, as himself said? Was it the invisible bruises scored by that tongue which provoked those too-visible bruises on her arms? A patient, loving woman would have found Carlyle hard to live with. This nervous woman with her tongue a-flicker like a dragonfly's sting, who had loved a man she did not marry, and was disappointed of offspring from the man she married, was not the woman to attempt it. That shipwreck in the very start of the marriage voyage was fatal to its chances. But with two such consorts, there never were any chances. She mocked at her husband to Froude. That is significant. Had she ever really loved him, it is not credible she could have mocked at him to Froude, though she hissed with mockery to the man himself.

A Brilliant Sheridan.

THE MARQUIS OF DUFFERIN AND AVA, DIPLOMATIST, VICEROY, STATESMAN. By Charles E. Drummond Black. With 25 full-page illustrations. (Hutchinson. 16s. net.)

ABOUT seven years ago Mr. Black, who had recently retired from work at the India Office, thought that it would be well if he set about writing a life of Lord Dufferin. Lord Dufferin did not ban the project; but it seems clear that he thought its accomplishment would be in the nature of love's labour lost. "He informed me," Mr. Black writes, "that the publication of his private correspondence, which he pointed out to me, and which was of a most voluminous character, occupying over a score or so of bound tomes, would be a long task devolving on others after his decease." That was a pretty plain hint; but either Mr. Black did not perceive it or he was not daunted by it. Encouraged by a publisher, whom he consulted at his eminent friend's suggestion, he resolved to write the book. Now that his task is completed, he must realise that it was an enterprise conducted under difficulties of quite an exceptional kind. When a man who has spent his life in diplomacy withholds all his private correspondence, what material has a biographer to work upon? As every public speech of the great man necessarily conceals his thoughts on all but the most unimportant of human affairs, the subject-matter is singularly scant. Such a man's oratory at complimentary banquets, howsoever graceful it may be, is a fragile basis on which to build an estimate of his character or of his services to his Sovereign and the country. There are, to be sure, the ambassador's despatches, published in the Blue Books; but as a rule all the affairs with which these dealt are past and done with long ago.

Nevertheless, we are very glad to admit that Mr. Black's work is not quite so much a matter of book-making as, on reading the preface, we feared it was bound to be. In capacities enabling him to gain knowledge from which ordinary travellers are shut off, Mr. Black himself has been abroad a good deal. Thus, in dealing with Lord Dufferin's viceroyalty in India, he is in a position to stroke a good many diplomatic t's and dot a good many diplomatic i's. We have read the chapters on that period with keen interest. The subjects on which they discourse do not come into the province of a journal that is almost purely literary; but we should be doing injustice to Mr. Black if we completely ignored them. Suffice it to say that, finding a text in the problems which confronted Lord Dufferin in India, Mr. Black, out of his own knowledge, has many important things to say about our relations with Afghanistan and Russia. Once again we have to note the peculiar fact that, whilst many home critics of international affairs are continually assuring us that in no part of the world have we any cause to suspect Russia of aggressive designs, the observer of affairs abroad is certain that we have, and frontiers and forts, and the military forces at our command, appear to him matters calling for earnest consideration. Mr. Black, by the way, thinks he has some slight cause to suspect the Amir of inconstancy in his allegiance to England.

Early in his career, Lord Dufferin, in concert with the Ambassadors from France and Russia as well as those of smaller Powers, had to enquire into troubles in Syria. The Turks, it was said, had been slaughtering the Christians. All Europe rang with rage against the Sultan. Then, as recently, when the truth came out it was surprising. "In the course of the investigations it became clear that it was the Christians who had provoked the Druses into embarking on a war of extermination. The former, agitated by the success of the anti-feudal movement, had long meditated an onslaught on the Druses, eventually to end in the overthrow of Turkish authority in the Lebanon. The Turks, perceiving what was intended, and probably afraid of using force towards the Christians, determined to chastise them through the instrumentality of the Druses." When the trouble was over and the Christians were asked "to submit the names of such people as were deserving of capital punishment," the good Bishops furnished a list of four thousand nine hundred! Mr. Black's book gives us very few glimpses of Lord Dufferin as a man of letters; but in the chapters recounting the very pleasant period in Canada, there is a snatch of poesy which, we imagine, is made public now for the first time. Towards the close of her husband's term of office, Lady Dufferin took part in theatricals at the Government House. Before the final fall of the curtain, she recited an epilogue ending in these linds:—

Oft shall yearning fancy fondly fill
This hall with guests, and conjure up at will Each dear familiar face, each kindly word
Of praise that e'er our player souls have stirred,
Till 'neath the melting spell of memory,
Our love flows back towards you like the sea;—
For know—whatever way our fortunes turn—
Upon the altar of our hearts shall burn
Those votive fires no fuel need renew—
Our prayers for blessings on your land and you.

So deft in gracefulness that it almost seems a mere exercise in fatal facility, this is in the true Sheridan spirit, which, happily, is still of joyous influence throughout the Empire.

The Perpetual Undergraduate.

CRUMBS OF PITY AND OTHER VERSES. By R. C. Lehmann. (Blackwood. 5s. net.)

OUR university system may sometimes encourage young men to be old; but it more often keeps old men young and ordinarily-aged men boys. Mr. Lehmann, we assume, is the ordinary age—forty or thereabouts—but he is still an undergraduate; and so, we imagine, he will be to the end. Those whom the Gods love they keep young; the true elixir vitæ is the water of the Cam (or the Isis).

We give the Cam the preference, because Mr. Lehmann is a Cambridge man, and this book is largely a eulogy of Cambridge life. It is all boyish. The poems at the beginning, pretty sentimental ballads of little girls and their daddies, are boyish—as though Holmes's charming wish had been granted by the angel, and the poet could be a boy again and be a father too. The poems that follow—the best in the book—on dogs and horses and wine—are boyish; the poems in praise of rowing, and flirting in Maytime, and all the old business of proctors and dons, are boyish; the "Lives of Great Men" are boyish. The boyishness differs in kind: sometimes it is boyishness in feeling, sometimes in mental limitation. For example, only a boyish critic of life could believe in the street arab who is made to say to his companion, after seeing the Queen go by:—

We wos 'ip-'urrayih'—she seed us plain
For she gave us a look—like a cup o' tea
When you're shiverin' cold with the wind and rain:
That's just 'ow 'er look went into me.
And I feel that 'appy I'll take my 'ook—
I don't want to see no more o' their fuss;
But I'm goin' 'ome to think o' the look
Wich the Queen, God bless 'er, she give to us.

Mr. Lehmann here might almost be said to be not boyish, but girlish. The thing makes one blush to read it, so untrue is it, so wilfully symmetrical. Again, in the "Lives of Great Men," Mr. Lehmann shows his boyishness in thinking them worth doing or worth reprinting. The only method for such work, short of the method of genius which goes its own gait, is intense epigrammatic compression. Mr. Lehmann has not enough wit or enough technical distinction to tarry by the way.

The best poems are those upon animals and wine. Here Mr. Lehmann leaves the conventional sentiment of Mr. Clement Scott and Mr. Sims, the conventional attitude of Praed and Calverley, and sets his mind a genuine task—to say something authentic about something he loves or is interested in; and the result is that we find him to have fancy, which is halfway to being a real poet. This, of Rufus, a spaniel, is pleasantly thought, and said as well as one could wish:—

Old dog, content you; Rufus, have no fear:
While life is yours and mine your place is here.
And when the day shall come, as come it must,
When Rufus goes to mingle with the dust,
(If Fate ordains that you shall pass before
To the abhorred and sunless Stygian shore),
I think old Charon, punting through the dark,
Will hear a sudden friendly little bark;
And on the shore he'll mark without a frown
A flap-eared doggie, bandy-legged and brown.
He'll take you in: since watermen are kind,
He'd scorn to leave my little dog behind.
He'll ask no obol but instal you there
On Styx's further bank without a fare.
There shall you sniff his cargoes as they come,
And droop your head, and turn, and still be dumb—
Till one fine day, half joyful, half in fear,
You run and prick a recognising ear,
And last, oh, rapture! leaping to this hand,
Salute your master as he steps to land.

Good also, in a less tender but not less admirable vein, is the fancy which personifies Benedictine as a typical Frenchman, in a later poem. This is where Mr. Lehmann is doing his own work and work which he does alone. The rest is derivative. We would not for a moment discourage him from writing: it is by answering every impulse that such minds find themselves; but we would advise him to get a trusted friend who is not a perpetual undergraduate to make the selections for publication.

Revolutionary Gossip.

PARIS IN '48. LETTERS FROM A RESIDENT DESCRIBING THE EVENTS OF THE REVOLUTION. By Baroness Bonde (née Robinson). Edited by C. E. Warr. (Murray. 8s. net.)

THE Baroness Bonde was an Irishwoman by birth, the daughter of Sir Richard Robinson, of Rokeby in Ireland, and of Lady Helena Moore, daughter of Lord Mountcashel. But her early years were all but continuously spent in Paris, where her parents then chiefly resided; so that she must have been almost more a French than an English girl. These letters were written to her friend, Mrs. Ashburnham, during the revolution of 1848 against Louis Philippe. When there was no Reuter, when (as she says) mails were stopped and letters opened, such letters might well be sought after by Wellington and Palmerston. Even at this day, when the events she describes are ancient history, her letters are fresh and interesting. She has an eye for character, and still more an eye for events, for description. Amidst the broils of that troublous time she seems to have moved with a freedom rare in women. While she was still a child she had her revolutionary baptism, her father (by compulsion) taking her with him into the midst of the revolt against Charles X., where she saw two men shot down in an attack on the barracks of the Rue de la Pepinière. He had stipulated that she should not cry, and she kept her promise; though a bystander dragged her into a porter's lodge, alarmed by her danger, exclaiming: "There is no sense in leaving a child in the street under a cross-fire." What she saw herself is always valuable and admirably told; her reports are often—report. Such hearsay things are sometimes introduced by "It is now publicly confessed," or the like: sometimes as flat personal statements, not therefore the more reliable. But yet many of her second-hand stories have value, since she communicated with men high in office, or otherwise able to know what passed. The estimation which such men as Palmerston set on the letters is evidence enough of this.

The Baroness gives a graphic picture of Paris after an insurrection :—

From the Rue de la Paix to Montmartre there is not a tree, not a column, not a lamp-post, nor even a railing left standing. Even the wooden shelters of the coach-inspectors are lying in the middle of the roadway, charred and smouldering ruins. Armourers' shops are the picture of desolation, and almost every man is armed! Guns, swords, pistols, are hung in wild confusion round the men in blouses, and gentlemen, too, are most ridiculous figures, with cockades on their hats, and sword-belts over wadded overcoats. The "Marseillaise," the "Parisienne," and the "Chant des Girondins" are sung in nightly chorus in every street. Small industries have sprung up as if by magic. "The national cockade, one sou"; "Les Republicanes," songs suppressed by the ex-tyrant, 15 centimes," &c. I afterwards went to the Tuileries, and there, indeed, the devastation was most melancholy; not a window left, the stone piers of the gates pulled down, and plumbers busy in many places replacing the bent and broken railings. Bands of Défenseurs de la Patrie and hideous women were found in the Salons of the Palace, and the Carrousel was full of most ludicrously armed ruffians. One, about sixteen, was mounting guard with the greatest gravity, having on his head one of Madame Adelaide's bonnets, and on his back a blanket; his pistols were fastened with curtain loops, and his sword was without a scabbard. Others were half in uniform, all grave, civil, and orderly.

Elsewhere, indeed, she again testifies to the extraordinary native soldierliness of the French. Scenes like these, gossip about the inner working of the Revolution, are mingled with bright touches of mirth and satire. Such as that, for instance, of the Orleanist lady who indignantly denied the generally attested cowardice of the King and Princes. She vowed that "the King was on horseback all the morning, and that the Princes fought like lions, but the crowd was so great that no one found it out." Altogether this is one of the cleverest and most amusing collections of a woman's letters which have been issued for a long while.

Live and Let Live.

THE SOIL: AN INTRODUCTION TO THE SCIENTIFIC STUDY OF THE GROWTH OF CROPS. By A. D. Hall. (Murray. 3s. 6d.)

THIS is a serious and practical volume which has the characters that go to make a good text-book. And consequently—since we are not farmers all—it would hardly fall for comment here, but that earth has an important bearing on the eligibility of the earth for us.

We all live at the bottom of a great ocean of air, of which, by way of breathing rather than drinking, we take copious draughts some twenty times or so each minute; day and night, year in, year out. By far the greater part of the air is a mere make-weight in this process. It passes into our blood—as Tennyson said of the "quiet night" when a maiden slept—but merely because it happens to be there. And yet this element nitrogen is, when properly combined, a necessary of all life. We may well ask whether the vast atmospheric store of this indispensable element cannot be made good to us. Of ourselves we can do nothing. The gas is in the lungs and blood of every man alive at this hour—but to no purpose. This is where the Soil steps in.

Not so very long ago it was thought that plants obtained their nitrogen from the air. This is the case only with one order, however, the leguminosae. These include clover, peas, beans, vetches and so forth. Upon the roots of the leguminosae are found certain excrescences which contain bacteria. The high and the lowly plant live together for one another's benefit. It is a case of "symbiosis." The green leaves of the higher plant avail themselves of the sun's radiant energy to form sugar, which is passed down the stem and roots to the bacteria waiting below. These consume the sugar and thereby obtain the necessary energy for their peculiar function, which is the "fixation" of the free nitrogen contained in the air of the soil. Then the bacteria hand over to the senior partner the nitrogen compounds thus formed, whereby he lives. Wherever this order of plants is to be found, some portion of the nitrogen of the air, omnipresent as is yet not of us, is thus seized for the benefit of the pea and the bean, upon which we feed; and for the benefit of the clover, and therefore of the cow, and therefore of the cow's milk; upon both of which we also feed. Wherefore unto certain humble bacteria are our thanks.

So that even if, like the present writer, you never see the country but from a flying train, and have a difficulty under those circumstances in distinguishing wheat from oats or potatoes from turnips, you may find in this book a thousand illustrations of a fundamental law that concerns us all. It is this: every living thing on our planet is bound by countless chains to all the rest. None of us will ever get out of this world alive. We are all at each other's mercy. And even a bacterium may be not so black as he is painted.

Other New Books.

THE TWILIGHT OF THE GODS. By Richard Garnett. New Edition. (John Lane. 6s.)

FOR some months life has been saddened for our friends by our inability any longer to buy remainder copies (at eighteen pence) of Dr. Garnett's "Twilight of the Gods." Now comes Mr. Lane's reprint (with additions) to remedy the defect and to make it a simple matter for all the world to be instructed in the doctrine of the book of Ad and other succulent lore. But some of the glory has for ourselves departed, because we first knew these pleasant exercises in sardonic irony in larger type and on heavier paper, and they no longer "come to hand" as once they did. We feel like the returned traveller who still loves his native place, but dislikes the new town hall. Not that Mr. Lane's edition is not good. Far from it. But the old edition has been such a joy to us that we prefer still to read in it. And the twelve new stories are not so rich and rare as to interfere with this preference. The best of the wine is in the older bottle. Here and there in the additions—notably in "The Wisdom of the Indians" and "The Rewards of Industry"—we find gleams of the sly, saturnine humour that makes "Abdallah the Adite," "Ananda the Miracle-Worker," and "The Poet of Panopolis" such precious things; but for the most part the recruits are trifles, belonging very obviously to an inferior vintage—inferior, however, only to Dr. Garnett's own products, not to those of ordinary growers of the grape. None the less, new vintage or old, how we envy those readers who now come appreciatively to "The Twilight of the Gods" for the first time!

KING EDWARD AND HIS COURT. By T. H. S. Escott. (Unwin. 16s.)

MR. ESCOTT'S book is a diligent and fairly interesting compilation. Opinions are expressed, but for the most part they are the predominant opinions of the hour; Mr. Escott does not permit himself to advance speculative theories, nor does he impart to his book much flavour of personality. Apart from innumerable court, society, diplomatic, and other details, his object seems to have been to prove that England, at any rate as officially represented, has become cosmopolitan, and that cosmopolitanism he sets down to the influence of the King:—

The coming of age of the then Prince of Wales, still more the setting-up of his establishment next year at Marlborough House, gave the signal for the fashionable recognition of eligible trans-Atlantic strangers in the social latitudes of Belgravia or Mayfair. London, as it were in a moment, from the most insular and dulllest of cities was, by royalty's immediate patronage, converted into the smart capital of the world.

Mr. Escott divides his book into thirteen chapters, dealing with such matters as the Sovereign at Home, the Diplomatic Circle, the Colonies in English Society, the Church and Society, and so forth. Into each chapter is packed a quantity of varied information, and it is to the author's credit that he has kept clear of backstairs gossip. It is a pity that more stories have not been introduced for the enlivenment of the book, but no stories are better than silly ones. The concluding chapter deals with what Mr. Escott calls the "Empire's Parliamentary Pillars," in which the names of Lord Selborne, Lord Salisbury, Mr. Balfour, Lord Rosebery, and a score of others star the pages.

LIFE IN THE MERCANTILE MARINE. By Charles Protheroe. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

MR. PROTHEROE'S narrative has the defects of its merits. It is evidently a first-hand account of certain voyages, but we could have wished to see it edited and even re-written. Some quite inexperienced writers have succeeded in writing well, but Mr. Protheroe is not one of these. Indeed, his book does not gain verisimilitude from its amateurish manner, but rather the reverse. Here and there it almost reads like the work of a man deliberately apeing the amateur. But once you can reconcile yourself to the author's manner the book is real enough. It is no landsman's narrative, carefully compiled and therefore inaccurate, but the record of genuine experiences. The experiences are not particularly exciting—a drunken captain comes as near to real excitement as anything in the volume—but nevertheless the book is one to read. It gives a clear picture of things as they are in the British Mercantile Service, from the conduct of a good ship to the misconduct of a bad. Mr. Protheroe's final conclusions are sound. In effect, he says, let the Mercantile Marine be well-managed and well-equipped, and the English boy will still show the old spirit by taking to the sea. At present he is not over-anxious to go to sea. Why? Mr. Protheroe gives some substantial and practical reasons. But surely every landsman has heard Mr. Protheroe's stories. They are old beyond belief and poor at that. Perhaps sailors are glad to hear the old crusted yarns repeated; for ourselves we have no such charity.

Fiction.

THE RIDDLE OF THE SANDS. Edited by Erskine Childers. (Smith Elder. 6s.)

THOUGH this book takes the form of the alarmist romance, a form which is sometimes suggestive but too often melodramatic, the "Editor" has been at pains to clothe it in the deceptive garments of truth. He has made it very real, very actual. He has given it a painfully stippled background. And though towards the end he has adopted conventional methods, the book rings curiously true, like a transcript of experience, and has a sharpness of outline unusual to such books. The tale tells of two young Englishmen and their adventures aboard a seven-ton yacht, the "Dulcibella," on an autumn cruise among the German (or East) Frisian Islands. Now the North Sea littoral is no good place for a yacht, and autumn is no nice time for a cruise, but it is in just these intimate details of the cruising, and of boat-management among sands, that the author writes with such strange confidence and ability. Helped by the three charts included in the volume, anyone at all skilled in boats can figure for himself the "little joy" attaching to such a cruise. There is sand on all sides, dun and dolorous. There is sand shifting at each tide, and local currents changing with the changed outcrop of the sand. Low tide exposes mud and sets the yacht ashore, and then the voyager must get into the mud and shove the boat off. It is a dreary muddy business, but has a fascination. The two young men on the "Dulcibella" go cruising through the silted Frisian sea-board, heaving the lead, marking the set of tides and currents, and watching, with the grim stealth of conspirators, the movements of a German gun-boat and a German yacht. They suspect some secret matter of the State, some hidden plot, coming to slow maturity behind the grey flats veiling the Frisian shore. Suspicion warms to certainty. The tangled threads of incipient ship canals; the strategic import of the sand-dunes and the variant channels, slowly unravel and unveil till the two comrades grasp the fact that an invasion of England is slowly in preparation. Masked by the sand-flats an army could embark upon lighters and be speedily towed by tugs or gunboats to our defenceless East Coast. We should have no North Sea Fleet. Chatham could be of no assistance; and, in fact, the results would "appal the stoutest heart."

The book is well written. The yachting portion is excellent and full of valuable things. The tale is somewhat conventional, and the ending shows a falling off and lack of plan. It is good romance, though scarcely worthy of the patient, careful study devoted to the building of its frame.

THE WAY BACK. By Albert Kinross. (Constable. 6s.)

"THE WAY BACK" is distinguished from the ordinary run of novels by the fact that Mr. Kinross set out to write it with two definite ideas in his head. Two ideas (however interesting) may not seem to afford much foundation for a book of some three hundred pages. But, when one remembers that most novelists set out without any idea at all, two in one book give it a claim upon our attention. One of Mr. Kinross's leading motives is the corrupt and debasing influence of a phase of modern journalism, which, according to him, guides public opinion because clever men are willing to prostitute their minds to gain power and circulation for their journals, not caring whether this power is for good or evil. The other motive is the enduring power of love, deep-rooted between a man and a woman, even though the two be separated and silent. Mr. Kinross points "the way back" from the mad rush for money and power, but it is a pity that his method of doing so is so strident. He seems to write in a frenzy and his readers may be excused if they sometimes find his methods hysterical and involved, almost to the point of being incomprehensible. Especially is this the case at the beginning of the book. At first it requires an effort to get a grip of the story at all. Later, the characters are straightened into the semblance of reality, and one soon begins to see them as living people. Bartol, the strong man, who forces his way to a height of unworthy power, and then finds his way back to the ideal through the love of a woman, is well done, but it is not until the middle of the book that we begin to feel that sympathy with him upon which the author clearly reckons. Hertha is not quite so clearly drawn, but as a sketch she fills the eye; and the lesser characters, especially the faithful Climself and the charming but unprincipled Peggy, are roughed in with broad effective touches.

THE SHUTTERS OF SILENCE. By G. B. Burgin. (John Long. 6s.)

THIS is Mr. Burgin's nineteenth novel, and will probably be not the least popular of the growing series. In it we are taken back to Canada and the neighbourhood of the Four Corners, where the Trappist Monastery of Mahota closes the Shutters of Silence on the lives of its inmates. Here we find Brother Colombe (the illegitimate son of Winchester and the woman who is now Lady Geste), who was taken in as a foundling seven years before. The youth—Harry Winchester is his name in the world—is about to take his vows, when his father, late repenting, seeks him out and takes him away. The situation and feelings of a youth who wears ordinary clothes for the first time, speaks to a woman for the first time, eats ham and eggs for the first time, in fact begins to live, must be interesting, and Mr. Burgin makes the most of them. Even to a hardened man of the world, the real live Countess who on the slightest steamer acquaintance "bent over his chair and suddenly pressed the audacious scarlet of her lips to his" would make a startling episode. To Harry, who had kissed nothing but the Abbot's hand—! But Mr. Burgin's women are often a little forward. For while the Countess kisses the innocent son, the barmaid at the wayside station embraces without a moment's warning the ice-cold father. Harry meets his mother in England, of course, admires her, and discovers the secret of his birth. It would be unfair to disclose more of the plot, which is by no means complicated. Mr. Burgin composes quickly, we should gather, and that may be the reason of his resort to somewhat old-fashioned methods in the drawing of his characters. There are endless soliloquies in which people explain their situation to the stars or the looking-glass. And we cannot believe that the bland passionate Countess, having slyly put some liqueur into Harry's coffee just before kissing him, would have made this remark:—

Nature is always improved by, and you will enjoy it still more when viewed with, all the comfort of material accessories.

The story ends where it began, behind the Shutters of Silence at Mahota. Incidentally Mr. Burgin gives some vivid pictures of life in a Trappist monastery.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

QUESTIONABLE SHAPES. By H. D. HOWELLS.

A volume of three stories, all dealing with the supernatural. The central figure of "His Apparition" is an observant American who, abandoning his profession, "had contributed himself to the formation of a leisure class, which he conceived was regrettably lacking in our conditions." While on a visit to a friend's house he saw an apparition, and the story is occupied with a delineation, in Mr. Howells' subtle and subjective manner, of the difficulties in which he became involved. (Harper. 6s.)

BEGGAR'S MANOR. By R. MURRAY GILCHRIST.

A country love story by the author of "The Courtesy Dame." When the book opens the owner of Beggar's Manor is in love with Annabella, but being persuaded that he has unwittingly compromised a village girl he chivalrously marries her. His wife inherited money and vulgarly triumphed over the reversal of their positions. The story tells of his release from her and of his happy engagement to Annabella. (Heinemann. 6s.)

LONDON ROSES. By DORA GREENWELL MCCHESNEY.

"An Idyll of the British Museum." The story opens in the manuscript room where Rhoda let fall a leaf from her sketch-book covered with studies of the briar-rose. It was returned to her with a pretty note "with thanks for the vagrant perfume," by the man whose "vivid hazel eyes" had caught her own. One of the characters comes under the suspicion of having stolen a valuable document, and the action is carried forward in carefully studied scenes, among the manuscripts, in the sculpture galleries and under the big dome. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

MY LADY OF THE BASS. By SIDNEY HERBERT BURCHELL.

An historical romance of the days of William and Mary by the author of "The Duke's Servants." "The seizure and the defence of the Bass Rock for three years," says Mr. Burchell, "and the final remarkable surrender of the island fortress form a romantic paragraph in the history of Scotland." The book opens with an evening encounter in the Sussex hills in which a fair lady is rescued from a perilous position by the hero of the story. (Gay and Bird. 6s.)

A SON OF THE FLEET. By MRS. E. KENNARD.

Mrs. Kennard writes of the Fleet rather from the standpoint of the people at home than of the Lieutenant in the Mediterranean Squadron. When the telegram arrived telling his parents of Bobbie's serious illness, they set out for Malta by the overland route. The rest of the book relates Bobbie's recovery in Bighi hospital, his flirtation with the Admiral's daughter, and various other matters. (White. 6s.)

THE LAKE OF GOLD. By GEORGE GRIFFITH.

"A narrative of the Anglo-American Conquest of Europe." When the millionaire was shown the plans of the airship he saw in the scheme "the means of controlling the whole commerce and communication of the globe, which, of course, meant practically being money-lord of the whole world, the controller of every market and of every line of land and sea traffic." The book relates the triumphant working out of the scheme. (White. 6s.)

THE TRIUMPH OF LIFE. By WILLIAM FARQUHAR PAYSON.

Céleste, in whose drawing-room the book opens, could not decide whether the young author had declined to meet her "because her slightly demi-mondaine appearance repelled his innocence," or because his desire to do so was so great that he subdued it for the good of his soul. There is a rich publisher in love with the heroine, from whom she demands an introduction to the author. The latter, a failure with "great ideas," began to turn out "saleable merchandise" as Dolly Cohen, and the plot turns on the complications resulting from his double personality. (Harper. 6s.)

THE HEART OF A GREAT MAN. By LUCY M. RAE.

The great man was a scientist who had invented a scheme for rendering this country impregnable to a foreign foe. The curtain rises upon "The Brethren of Darkness," a society acting on behalf of the Russian Government in detecting such schemes. One of its members, Madame Radanzi, undertakes to discover the plans of the scientist, whose love she had once inspired. The book develops along conventional lines, and closes with the words: "Before sentence was passed on Anna Radanzi, Anton Garth was dead." (White. 6s.)

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.

Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
„ Quarterly	5/0
„ Price for one issue	/5

The Essay: Ancient and Modern.

THE English Essayists! The very phrase has a delightful sound: outside fiction, it represents the most humane, the least formal, the most friendly, personal, and artlessly artistic mode of communication between writer and reader. Yet withal elastic, adjusting itself to the needs of individuality, so that in given hands it attains something of the grand style, and a more set structure: you have the négligé of Leigh Hunt, and the brilliantly elaborated balance of Macaulay, where the whole edifice is carefully proportioned, and nothing "wanders at its own sweet will." It was the last word of art's endeavour to join hands with the multitude, before art degenerated into the article, a manufactured thing like the sausage or the sandwich. You cannot manufacture the essay. A manufactured essay is an apparent failure, like a manufactured poem; but a manufactured—veritably a hand-made—article may be a quite useful and workmanlike "article" of commerce. So one handles with interest, and one knows not what remembered perfumes from the sweet and goodly past of letters, Mr. Peacock's "Selected English Essays" (Grant Richards). One's interest is increased by its bravery of range; not shrinking to confess writers of yester-year as classics, it stretches from Francis Bacon to Richard Jefferies, J. A. Symonds, and R. L. Stevenson. When you see the handy little pocket-volume in which is sealed, Arabian-wise, the genius of four centuries, you have truly your misgivings; and the editor throws himself on your mercy by professing that here is a purely personal and arbitrary selection—in fact, a selection made for practical and personal use in a private class of English Literature, and intended for students preparing to face an examination in which essay-writing is a prescribed subject. (With equally engaging confidence would your examiner set his candidates to write an Ode, did time allow it, and custom exact a knowledge of English verse.) So if past essayists are omitted who should not be omitted, blame considerations of space; if present essayists, difficulties of copyright. Has Mr. Peacock given a "liberal interpretation" to the term "essay," so as to include, e.g., Carlyle's lectures on "Hero-Worship"; and does it seem inconsistent to stretch your limits, when you confessedly are straitened to include all that lawfully comes within them? The appeal ad misericordiam disarms you. Is the editor avowedly capricious in regard to the length of the quotations by which he represents his several authors? Again the same propitiatory plea: "A poor thing, sir, but mine own."

Well, we take our text as we find it, and are glad to have it; though better, we think, might have been. There is much taste in the selections, if at times a rather exasperating caprice. But that ingenuous editorial confession of sin shall not baulk us of a relieving grumble or so by the way. Nay, finding nothing of the sixteenth and seventeenth century but Bacon and Cowley, we are constrained to ask at once, if Carlyle's lectures could be included, why not somewhat of Sir Thomas Browne? The last chapter of the "Urn-Burial," some portion of the "Garden of Cyrus," the "Letter to a Friend," or other such masterpieces, if formally they belong to the treatise, essentially are as truly essays in their artful divagation as the "Hero-Worship" selections, or indeed more so. The final chapter of the "Urn-Burial," separated from the rest of that treatise, sustains no slightest injury, and has all the form of a lengthy essay by Bacon, wanting his want of imagination. Bacon is a fine forerunner of the English essay. Yet we confess Bacon's exceeding saplessness is at variance with what constitutes our typical idea of the essay. They are pemmican, these little, juiceless papers, of matter and solid sense all compact—English sense, worldly wise and practical. The style—the mechanical style—is as the matter, tendinous and fleshless. Cowley, now, is an essayist indeed, he has the essay in the pleasant marrow of him. An egotism kindly as Bacon's is cold; a gentle wisdom; a "mazy error" like that of a garden maze, wandering yet ordered; a cultivated gossip; a structure of speech flowing, elbow-roomy, yet organic, like the matter and the general style themselves; these things make Cowley a very type of the informal essayist (and the essay, in its original conception, is essentially a thing informal).

But of course, the culmination of the light-handed, graceful essay came with the early eighteenth century—as regards manner, perhaps, rather than matter. The typical essayist of essayists, after the informal kind, is perhaps Montaigne. One associates with it a certain wisdom and pregnancy of matter, made delightful by the informal whimsy of the handling. It is wisdom in gown and slippers. But the charming masters of the eighteenth century have small pretence to wisdom—they are just at their weakest when they try to "instruct the town" with their shallow little philosophies, their pedantic little moralities, and their insufferable be-periwigged sageship generally. It is as shrewd and amusing critics of manners that they are best and wisest: they come nearest to being sages when they are only trying to amuse the town. Literary wisdom lies in doing the thing you enjoy doing. If they fell short of the ideal essay in substance, their manner was exquisite. Mr. Peacock very happily enables us to contrast Steele with Addison by separating one of Steele's papers on Sir Roger de Coverley from those of Addison on the same subject. Dear old Dick Steele does not suffer by the comparison in the eyes of any sympathetic reader. True, in the specimen chosen (Sir Roger's account of his picture-gallery) character is considerably disregarded; Sir Roger talks as pointedly and prettily as Steele himself. It has not Addison's character-drawing, it has not his delicate ridicule, it is more careless and off-hand in style. It is not Addison. But it is Steele. And Steele is an excellent good thing. There is a gay and sweet dexterity of epigrammatic style, which is yet so easy that it seems the casual rattle of social high spirits. The mere humanity of him is charming. There was somewhat about Dick Steele of R. L. S. in a periwig. His sly hits are delightful; less satire than exquisite chaff. For example, Sir Roger's ancestor, who "is said to be the first that made love by squeezing the hand"; or the other who narrowly escaped death at the battle of Worcester, "for he was sent out of the field upon a private message the day before the battle." Of Addison it is too late to speak; that urbane suavity of style, that demure malice of satire, like a very polished town cat playing with diverse mice, town and country, are well known. These are the two here included that matter: Swift or Defoe were not essayists; Pope's bit of Swiftian satire has no right of place, more than like satire of Swift and Arbuthnot which is excluded.

In the later eighteenth century Johnson and Goldsmith are the outstanding figures; and Johnson in such light essay-work as "Dick Minim" is a dancing bear. It were better to have included the passage on Iona, or some serious effort which shows his sonorous balance and mournful majesty of thought at their best. There is perhaps scarce a whole essay of his which does him justice. His touch is too heavy for the form. But for the clarity and shapeliness of Goldsmith's English, his delightful humour, the essay was a ready instrument. With him the essay of Steele and Addison sets in a mellow after-glow.

The modern essay is a new thing. It has forgotten the arm-chair attitude which is the leading trait of the essay as it was born with Montaigne. It has forgotten how to idle wisely, cultivatedly, or wittily. It has taken to be in rank earnest. It is purposeful—energetic, or critical, or what you please, but it nearly always has a purpose. Therewith comes a sense of form, and the obligation of form: it must be about something, and have beginning, middle, and end. To talk about a poker, and light upon a number of fascinating reflections, adorned with various knowledge, to the surprised contentment of your reader and yourself—this is impossible to your modern. His conscience would trouble him. Also his thoughts about a poker probably would not be worth the price of it. He could never get away from the poker. The original essay largely depended on the art of getting away from your subject. Nowadays, all a man can do with a subject is to write about it—which, after all, is what any fellow can do. The modern essay, in fact, began fatally to degenerate into the article, so that there is no real boundary-line between the two. Macaulay's essays (inadequately represented here by that on Goldsmith) are just long and brilliant articles. The same thing expanded becomes a biography, or biographical article, which in little was an essay. And in less it would be a "leader" or ordinary review. De Quincey is surely an article-writer rather than an essayist—when he is not writing those imaginative bravuras which range under no precedent at all. His famous "Murder as One of the Fine Arts" is no more an essay than some of Swift's ironic masterpieces, which Mr. Peacock has rejected for an unrepresentative essay on Style. Nor can the "Murder" be said to represent De Quincey, whose humour (unequal in this) is elsewhere weak. It would be to consider too curiously, however, were we absolutely to expunge these men from the ranks of essayists, in which they are a chief glory. The reader will not take our remarks too literally, or as more than an emphatic stressing of the change which has come over the modern essay. But there remain a band—Lamb, Hazlitt, and Hunt—who are essayists in the older sense. Hazlitt, indeed, is often of too energetic and purposeful a brilliance wholly to harmonize with the old tradition; but at times (as in essays here given) he is content to "laze," and is the very essayist—a fascinating essayist, too. As for Lamb, his delicious and sweet whimsicality is such that the essay seems born for him, not he for the essay. Hunt, with his amiable idle industry and gay flitting from sweet to sweet, keeps the secret of eighteenth century grace and lightness of touch as no man of his day kept it; and he too, in his limited, superficial, yet quite charming manner was an essayist born—nowadays, we think, too much underrated.

Of the moderns chosen by Mr. Peacock, Carlyle belongs to the strenuous order, nor do his lectures even profess to be essays. But Dr. John Brown ("Rab and his Friends"), Thackeray in the best of his "Roundabout Papers," and R. L. S., in their several ways all have the roving spirit, the lightness of handling, which makes for the typical essay. The two latter both studied in the eighteenth century school, and with what accomplished grace Stevenson mastered its secret, adding the something of his own fascinating character, needs no telling.

Addington Symonds is too deliberately accomplished, too studious of effect, to be quite the thing. But Matthew Arnold had the clarity and composed culture of the French essayists, and these four alone are sufficient to justify the essay in our day. Whether it can flourish in our twentieth century, so busied about many things, we greatly doubt. On living names we will not touch; but for the most part our best younger writers are either too prodigiously restless and eager to pack their work with effects, or frankly frivolous—which is quite another matter from the wise and airy leisure of the masters among the lighter essayists. Better the completion and purple patches of a Macaulay than dilettante frivolity. The advent of the democracy, which bodes ill for literature, bodes very ill, we fear, for the essay. The day is with the article. And the article may be made an excellent, a brilliant thing; but it is not the essay.

A Friend of Poets.

REAL autobiography—autobiography, that is, which includes the life of the soul as well as the conduct of the body—is a rare thing in literature. The tendency to set down strained conclusions, to overvalue effects, to cast a glamour across years that are not glamorous, is almost irresistible. At all times the springs of conduct are difficult to search out, and the man who is surest that he knows them is as often as not the least to be trusted. It is one of the privileges of humanity to deceive itself; the utmost honesty of intention will not save a writer from the unconscious exercise of that privilege. An autobiography, in its very nature, must be something of a vindication; its very existence asserts its author's right to live, and the right to live, after all, needs some defence. When Leigh Hunt undertook to tell the story of his life he approached the task with, perhaps, more than ordinary misgivings; he would have laid it aside again and again for other work. But his publisher wisely held that the world would be glad to read of a man so intimately concerned with certain of its doings, so devoted to simple and pure humanity; so the book was written, and it remains, and will remain, amongst the best books of its kind in English.

The edition of the Autobiography just issued, in two handsome volumes, by Messrs. Constable, under the editorship of Mr. Roger Ingpen, is in every respect worthy. The notes are not overdone, the bibliography is more than ordinarily complete, and the many portraits included really enrich the text. We are inclined to envy people who come for the first time to an intimate knowledge of Leigh Hunt in this form. Such a publication would at any rate seem to imply a revival of interest in an author whose love of letters was never obscured by any sordid considerations, who saw the best and strove after it, who delighted in beauty and sometimes expressed his sense of it in exquisite words. It would be a mistake to suppose that Leigh Hunt has ever dropped out: indeed, we were surprised the other day to find how many volumes of his are still in print; but we are sure that less than justice is often done him. As a writer, his best was often astonishingly good; as a man, the influence of his long life was all on the side of justice and honest appreciation. If he hated any man he had too much kindness to put it upon record. He came nearest to actual hate, perhaps, in his comments upon the Regent and Gifford. For his frankness concerning the Regent he paid in money and liberty, and posterity has found him guiltless; Gifford, in common honesty, he could not have treated with more consideration. As to Hazlitt, it was the lot of Hazlitt's best friends and admirers to find themselves at loggerheads with him pretty often.

"A pious, ingenious, altogether human and worthy book," wrote Carlyle to Hunt when the Autobiography was published, and it is just that. It is the book of an old man, ripe, tender, sensitive, human—an old man striving, with an honesty sometimes pathetic, always convincing and engaging, to tell the truth, to correct his first impressions, to pay a tribute of love and admiration to his friends, to do justice to those who called themselves his enemies. In his time Hunt was accused of many things—he was labelled democrat, atheist, free-liver. Democrat he was, though in a sense too aesthetic for our time; he was neither atheist nor free-liver. For a man with a keen perception of the beautiful he lived a life of singular moderation; he worked with a regularity rare enough in the history of letters, and his excesses were the excesses of a happy boy. One only fault may be laid to his charge—he was improvident. But it was not the improvidence of the wastrel; it was the simple improvidence of the man who can never come to grips with certain elementary facts; it also sprang, as his son wrote, "partly from a readiness of self-sacrifice, which was the less to be guessed by any who knew him, since he seldom alluded to it, and never, except in the vaguest and most unintelligible terms, hinted at its real nature or extent." He received as readily as he gave; certain of his critics seemed to assume that he never gave at all.

These pages are full of the most delightful self-revelations; they indicate the working of a mind fresh and always young upon the material of youth, the joy as well as the sadness of retrospect. But the earlier chapters, excellent as they are, must always give place to those dealing with Hunt's many and close friendships. No prisoner probably ever had such visitors as those who came to the decorated cage in which Hunt spent those curious months. "When I sat amidst my books," he wrote, "and saw the imaginary sky overhead, and my paper roses about me, I drank in the quiet at my ears, as if they were thirsty." There he wrote endless verses; there Hazlitt lingered on the threshold "which I had great difficulty in making him pass. I know not which kept his hat off with the greater pertinacity of deference, I to the diffident cutter-up of Tory dukes and kings, or he to the amazing prisoner and invalid who issued out of a bower of roses." There, too, came Cowden Clarke and Byron, and a score of others, and the Lambs, who found their way to Horsemonger Lane Gaol "in all weathers, hail or sunshine, in daylight and in darkness. . . ." It was there, too, that Hunt came to know Shelley intimately, whom he calls, with joyful and simple recognition, "my friend of friends."

The personal influence of Leigh Hunt upon certain of his great contemporaries was remarkable, notably upon Shelley and Keats. His literary influence on Shelley was unimportant, as Keats did not long survive, but his personal influence was entirely good. He was a generous appreciator, a man of infinite sympathy, almost womanly in his tenderness, altogether womanly in some aspects of his loyalty. Also—a rare distinction—he had no literary jealousy. The story of his connection with these two whom the gods loved is a story which can never fail of its appeal. The picture of Keats in the little Hampstead study and of Shelley sailing the paper boats on the ponds are immortal with a kind of homely and poignant immortality. And who can ever forget the passage in which he describes the fire, fragrant with wine and frankincense, which consumed Shelley and the faithful Williams:—

The beauty of the flame arising from the funeral pile was extraordinary. The weather was beautifully fine. The Mediterranean, now soft and lucid, kissed the shore as if to make peace with it. The yellow sand and blue sky were intensely contrasted with one another: marble mountains touched the air with coolness; and the flame of the fire bore away towards heaven in vigorous amplitude, waving and quivering with a brightness of inconceivable beauty.

That was a noble distribution of the mortal part of him who was all air and fire.

There is no need to dwell further upon this most delightful of books; in particular there is no need to follow Leigh Hunt's later years. They were active, placid in spirit, marred by a great sorrow, but a sorrow quietly and nobly borne. Nor do we propose in any way to attempt an estimate of Leigh Hunt's work. We have, on more than one occasion, endeavoured to draw attention to its special virtues; here we are concerned only with the man as he has given himself to us in this autobiography. And the man comes out with a sincerity and completeness wholly honest and often boyish. The book is a human book; it neither dogmatizes over life nor plays with it; it is a book for all lovers of this kindly, mistaken, generous, spinning world. We can do no better than conclude with these words of Hunt's:—

It is not possible for many persons to have had greater friends than I have. I am not aware that I have now a single enemy; and I accept the fortunes which have occurred to me, bad and good, with the same disposition to believe them the best that could have happened, whether for the correction of what was wrong in me, or the improvement of what was right.

To know of a man that he had many friends who served him and whom he served is to know that he lived not unworthily.

On the Best Prose Style.

WRITING upon the literary influence of Academies, Matthew Arnold has this remark: "The true prose is Attic prose." On the contrary, Prof. Saintsbury speaks of De Quincey as led aside to regard "all plain prose style as inferior; instead of, as it really is, in perfection the equal of the most ornate," and I suppose that we must consider the best Attic style as plain. Is this judgement, then, of Matthew Arnold a limitation of the critic? Is there an infallible standard of taste? Shall we say, with Mr. Herbert Paul, that "the greatest writer of English prose is Shakespeare"? Or is this saying of Mr. Arnold but a paradox in the proper sense of the word? I fancy that he might have defended his position in some such manner as this. Starting then with the familiar saying that "the style is the man" (which indeed has its exceptions, as—we are told—in some extent, to take an instance, is Marcus Aurelius; but these chiefly, where the author has not any adequate instrument to hand), I conceive that we may rightly regard prose style as the expression of the intellectual soul (if I may call it so) of him who writes. Let us consider, then, what is the finest intellectual spirit, the expression of which we must then, I think, be brought to maintain to be the best. And here everyone, I suppose, will agree that as poetry is the outward expression in the highest degree of the genius or inspiration of man, so is prose of his intelligence. Let no one imagine that any rigid line must needs be drawn, for was not Plato a born poet, and has not Prof. Saintsbury himself spoken of that exquisite style of Newman as "instinct with a strange quiver of religious and poetical spirit"? But the prose writer has the more to do with thought and ideas, while the poet expresses rather the universal elements of human life. I am of course all along desirous of conceiving style, not merely as a grace of the writer, but as an element in his superiority. Many critics have of late been impressing upon us the fallacy of cultivating style quâ style; but they have seemed to assume that distinction of style, as apart from fluency and a certain purity in the use of language, can ever come to a writer otherwise than as the expression of his attitude of mind. To judge aright of an author's absolute merit, it appears, I mean, that we must regard his power of mind, his intelligence, his thought in connection with the manner of his expressing them. An ancient critic spoke of great style as "the echo of a great soul," and indeed we have no other measure of the writer's power save in the words in which he has presented it to us. Now the best Attic style is assuredly felt to be the expression of this finest intellectual spirit, of which I have been speaking. The Greek was the surest, subtlest, most delicate intellect; the old Greeks (and I am so far behind our times as to regard them as wiser than our moderns; and yet, I think, in another sense before the age, for this conclusion the future will again establish as true) had many fine proverbs, such as "Nothing in excess" and "Health is the best thing for a man"; they understood so well the qualities that went to make a sound and healthy mind. Clearness and purity of thought is an element, so is amenity and sweetness of temper, as opposed to the bitter and fierce acerbity of the partisan or the sectarian; so are grace and charm, the desire of the beautiful, dignity and serenity, vivacity and felicitous banter, for indeed ridicule, when light and polite, is often the strongest foe to folly and ignorance. In like manner, a calm and fearless attitude towards the world and the future is an element, a sense of proportion, a bold acknowledgment of all that is seen to be true, a cheerful buoyancy and sense of joy. Add to these elements of culture, right reasoning, lightness of touch, searching power and depth and delicacy of thought, which are the highest fruits of the pure intellect (in so far as we can separate things ever so intangible), and who will deny that their best expression is in the Attic style? Granting this, we are brought inevitably to the conclusion that the Attic is in truth the style of best make.

Let no one imagine that I am denying any virtues to those other styles, which men have used, which may be very good, and may express, as, for example, Carlyle's, a certain fine nobility of character and temper. But to the Attic style all merits are possible. Should we not say of Carlyle that his expression is indicative of boldness of intellect rather than of a deep and delicate power—nay, is not such a power impossible of communication through a style so turbulent, so unrestrained as his? Perhaps the Attic language was superior to our own. How impossible in English are those exquisite particles, stringing the whole together with the most delicate ties! But yet our language is surely no inadequate medium. True, some have found the plainer English style colourless, attenuated; but to say that is but to say (what is indeed the truth) that it is the harder to write than the ornate. The pure severity of Attic prose is not at all incompatible with "the warm glow, blithe movement, and soft pliancy of life," which Matthew Arnold found its characteristics, as we can see, I think, in that writer's own finest passages, or in Froude's. I have seen it said that simplicity is the highest quality of a great man's soul: is not, in like manner, simplicity the highest element of style? This plain prose too is capable of vivacity and the finer kinds of irony, which yet seem to me so utterly impossible in such a manner as Burke's, for example. Delicacy of temper demands a delicate instrument to express it. Especially, what a delicate humour, what an amiable gentleness, does one find in Goldsmith! What a sanity (I am not for a moment comparing them) in Dr. Jowett! But one cannot help detecting a richness, passing the golden mean, in John Addington Symonds, or even the late Mr. Myers. And is not Macaulay's style indicative of all those defects of mind, which, in spite of his many great virtues, have (I think) been brought home to him? In fine I will only add—lest some enlightened advocatus diaboli (solicitous of my soul's health) whisper in my ear that I find nothing good in all those styles other than the Attic: if we consider them aright we shall conclude that all styles, used by the classic authors, have been a practical expression of immense penetrating virtues, but to the Attic, as I said above, all things are possible, making it supreme.

H. P. C.

Impressions.

XXXVII.—The Topiarius.

It was plain I had lost my way. That last gallop across the common had brought me out into a wooded country of sandy roads and silence. I scanned the landscape for the signs of smoke curling up in the evening air, but saw only the trees against the setting sun, saw too, a squirrel scurrying along a branch, and the gleam of a bunch of rhododendrons that the late storm had blown into the road. Michael pretended to shy at the flowers; but it was only a feint. He, like myself, was under the influence of the end of day in that corner of rural England. I threw the reins over his neck and dozed till someone should awaken me and point the homeward way. Some time later Michael stopped at a gate that admitted to a wood, and looked enviously, so it seemed to me, along the forest track of green turf that curled between the overhanging trees. "So be it," I said, unlatched the gate, and Michael pushed it open with his broad shoulders. A touch of the heel and he gathered himself for a gallop, I bending over his neck to avoid being caught up in the branches like Absalom; so we sped through the air for a mile or more till the wood gave place to a lane with trimmed hedges on either side. There Michael stopped, and I looking over the hedge saw, what I never expected to see in this world, a Topiarius, in the flesh.

He was very old, of course: his smock frock had once been white, and on his head he wore a bowler hat that, half a century ago, may also have been white. In his right hand he held a pair of huge shears, and with infinite patience he was trimming a small yew tree into the shape of a peacock. What a piece of good fortune! I, quite undeserving, had, by the merest chance, discovered a man engaged upon topiary work. I was probably the only person in all England who at that moment enjoyed an uninterrupted view of, to use Sir Walter Scott's phrase, "a topiarian artist." In that formal garden behind the hedge there were many pertinent examples of the topiarian art, or "verdant sculpture" as the schoolmen term it. Not a tree, not a shrub had been allowed to follow its natural bent. This inarticulate old gentleman with the shears, the world forgetting, by the world forgot, had trimmed and cut trees, shrubs, arbours, hedges into the similitude of animals, buildings, pyramids, columns, globes, and fish. Was this Survival content? I think so. It was love that directed his shears to clip that peacock's tail so finically. If he had a little son, he would make him a topiarius, not a chauffeur. Such as he do not move with the times.

I am one of those unfortunates whose memories retain all sorts of useless shreds of information, and forget the items that might be serviceable for advancement in the world. Gazing at the Topiarius I went back in memory to a school-room on a hot day in the early seventies. We had partaken at midday dinner of a dish called toad-in-a-hole, or toad-in-the-hole, and it was still early in the afternoon. Through the open school-room windows came the drone of bees, and the odour of tan with which the playground was strewn, and before me was a book with a picture of the Topiarius at work. Poor sleepy scholar, little did you think that a lifetime later you would be looking at him over a hedge, and remember that "the Topiarius was an ancient figure known in the Rome of the Cæsars"; that he worked in "alleys of yew and pleached arbours of hornbeam"; and that

Bacon said of "topiarian features"—"they be but toys; you may see as good sights many times in tarts."

How foolish it seemed to remember this useless knowledge, and to have such a hazy idea of Mr. Chamberlain's fiscal policy. I almost envied Michael's detachment: he was nibbling irregular patterns out of the hedge, quite oblivious of the Topiarius who was about to give the finishing touches to the peacock's tail. I made that indescribable noise in the back of my throat which a horse understands, muttered the word "sugar" and he bore me away. As we passed the last of the topiarian features, I waved to the Topiarius, but he did not raise his head.

Drama.

Race in Mimicry.

I TRUST that the promised revision of fiscal policy will not include any measure requiring London to entertain its summer troupes of travelling players from within the limits of the empire on which the sun never sets instead of from "that sweet enemy, France." The critic, in particular, who has abundant opportunities throughout the year of learning how the Anglo-Saxon genius understands things theatrical, would not with equanimity exchange, in June, the refreshing art of a Madame Bernhardt or a Madame Hading, for that of some leading lady from Canada or New Zealand. I daresay the wheat products of the Dominion may be as good as, although more expensive than, those of her foreign rivals. I am sure that nothing could be more expensive than French actresses, judging by the unanimity with which the managers of theatres at which they are engaged put up the price of stalls. But it would take a good deal of protecting to enable the home product to compete with the imported article in its yield of intellectual and artistic enjoyment. I am speaking, of course, of acting, rather than of plays. The contact of the insular mind with alien ideas and alien ideals is in itself, from the ethical point of view, an unmixed good. But I am not here, primarily, to talk about ethics, and I do not know that, merely as literature, the average French play—or, at any rate, the average French play which is brought to London—is very much better than the average English play. An exception should, perhaps, be made for "Les Deux Écoles" of M. Alfred Capus, which Madame Jeanne Granier is playing at the Garrick. M. Capus, in his own inimitable, unmoral—it is, I believe, his own epithet—way, has certainly a lighter touch than any English dramatist since the author of "The Importance of Being Earnest." Madame Bernhardt will appear in "Phèdre" and "Andromaque." I am looking forward to seeing Madame Réjane in "La Robe Rouge" of M. Brieux. But, apart from these, there is not much of French origin in the announcements, either of the Garrick, or of the Adelphi, or of the Coronet, which does not seem rather trite or otherwise unattractive. Daudet wrote the book of "Sapho," so he tells us, to be placed in the hands of his sons when they came of age. It has its merits; but, although it would be interesting to see three considerable actresses successively in the same part, I think that, on the whole, I would rather it should not be Fanny Legrand. I do not suppose that "Les Demi-Vierges" would smell any sweeter under the name of "Maud." The younger Dumas, again, has ceased to be actual, and cannot quite be said to have become a classic. And when it is observed that our visitors are producing translations of two of Mr. Pinero's plays, "The Second Mrs. Tanqueray" and "Iris," and of one of Ibsen's, "The Doll's House," it will be clear that they are hardly making a claim to be apostles of the French drama, as drama.

No! Obviously what one goes to the French play for is, in the main, to see the acting, as acting. And, having seen it, it is perhaps fortunate that the holidays intervene before one is called upon to appreciate very seriously the English make-believe. It is astonishing, the difference. Set side by side with Madame Hading, or with the clever company playing in "Les Deux Écoles," the best of English actresses are but as so many schoolgirls saying their recitations. They move, and you see precisely why they move. It is to "break up the picture" or to prepare for an exit or an entrance. They gesticulate, with the fear of the drill-master upon them. They speak, and the eyes and limbs take no part in what they say. They are silent, and either fidget restlessly in the background, or blankly drop out of the scene and contemplate the audience. When Madame Hading moves, you do not think of why she moves. She could not move otherwise. When she speaks, she speaks all over. She is, literally, an artist to the finger-tips. Behind it all there lies, no doubt, an arduous technique; a consummate tradition and a prolonged and difficult individual training. But, as a result, the mind has completely mastered the body, and made of it a perfect instrument, perfectly under control, for the expression of every desired state of fancy or emotion, in a manner from which every shade of artifice is absent. It is not natural simplicity, but the higher simplicity which is only won through knowledge and discipline.

Why is it that—apart from genius, which is a wind blowing where it listeth—Anglo-Saxons cannot act? The question should really fall to the writer of another column than this to answer. It belongs to the obscure region of surmise as to the origin and permanency of racial temperaments. Some measure of the mimetic instinct is probably found in every variety of the human species. But in none has it been so highly developed as in that which ethnologists know as Homo mediterraneus. It was amongst the highly gifted peoples of the Mediterranean shores that acting first became an art, and it is amongst their descendants, the Latin peoples, that the tradition of acting survives to-day. When the Teutonic invaders first appeared within the purview of history it is recorded of them that they knew no public entertainments except a crude kind of sword dance. And it was the indifference of the barbarians to dramatic performances, far more than the hostility of Christianity, which led to the disappearance of the theatre in the sixth century. The Teutonic body, one takes it, is too gross to serve as a medium of expression. It refuses subjection and to become the sword of the spirit. However this may be, it was not until the resurrection of the Mediterranean elements in European civilisation at the Renaissance that the serious cultivation of acting once again began amongst the peoples of the south. To the north, not excluding these islands, it had never really meant anything.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

Pastels.

THERE is an engaging freshness about the fifth exhibition of the Pastel Society, just opened at the Institute, due chiefly to its cosmopolitanism. Vivid Frenchmen jostle staid Dutchmen, and challenge comparison with English and Scotch pastelists as changeable and various as their skies. Each man's work is grouped together, a scheme advantageous to those who have something personal to express, but disastrous to the invertebrate eclectic. In painting, as in writing, there comes a time when the prodigal impulses of youth are exhausted: when the world is no longer wide and wonderful, to be studied and claimed without effort: when two courses are open to the individual—just to go on dimly remembering and perfunctorily repeating what he once saw and felt, or to tramp out of the primrose path in search of his true self, and the right food and fuel for the lean years. In a word, there comes a time when character tells. This system of grouping half a dozen examples of a man's work together is by way of being a confessional. It also divides the merely clever works of a season from those productions that have in them the something that endures. One exhibitor at this exhibition, Mr. W. L. Bruckman, whose name is new to me, emerged nearly scathless from this ordeal. He sends six pastels. Two of them, a clever, bustling sketch of a students' ball, and a view of Limehouse, might not have attracted my attention; but the feeling of the other four is so tender, the quality of the medium so persuasive, the colour so right in tone, the subjects so modest, that in them I found my chief pleasure at this exhibition. What are the subjects? Well, one has to do with a shepherdess; another with the interior of a stable; the third is called "Motherhood," a young peasant woman, a white cap on her fair hair, holding a sleeping baby. There is no hint of popular sentiment about the child: its posture has been carefully studied, and the composition, luminously brown in tone, is in quiet and simple harmony with the brown green background. The theme is as old as the world, the drawing and the colouring are neither clever nor dull: it is just sincere, the expression of a sympathetic trained temperament content to be itself. So with "An Idyll," but this is romance: indeed, these two little pastels might have been called Reality and Romance. "An Idyll" shows a glade in a wood, misty, like morning twilight, with a shimmer of light in the sky beyond the wood. And in the glade sits a shepherdess, first cousin to a Henner nymph, and at her feet lies a shepherd, and the time is youth, their youth and the world's youth, and the picture is lowly and unpretentious, and quite beautiful.

Certainly the modern school of pastelists can express the subtleties of nature, and of the face and clothing of man, in a way untried in the days when this delicate art was used almost exclusively for portraits. The east gallery is entirely filled with a loan collection of pastels of a past day, portraits of the eminent, gravely academic, and showing little more of the personality of the painter, than a camera suggests. The great masters apart, portrait painting went at jog-trot in those days, and it needed all the distinction of "A Member of the Walpole Family" to give interest to Rosalba Carriera's pastels. Turn now to the work of a Frenchman, M. R. Gilbert, and examine his portrait of M. Legay. The grasp of character, the ease of the pose, the suggestion of life and vitality in the sitter make the pastel portraits of the eighteenth century look more like lay figures than ever. There is no medium like pastel for aiding that running intensity of creative emotion that should flow from brain to fingers, losing nothing in the passage, and fixing itself on the canvas with a click. This portrait of M. Legay is a striking example. Another, in oil, is Carolus Duran's portrait, "The Old Lithographer," at the Salon des Beaux-Arts, the only picture, I notice, which the State has purchased from the new Salon. M. Bussy's portrait of Mr. W. E. Henley I cannot place in this category. It is very clever and very amusing, but the face, which is after all the essential part of a portrait, can only be described as a caricature, plus a look of rollicking humour, expressive, perhaps, of Mr. Henley's astonishment at finding that M. Bussy has decked him in a purply blue (two shades) coat and vest, that will madden the critic of the "Tailor and Cutter." But the shelves of books against which Mr. Henley is sitting are beautifully painted. They have fine quality: they are a picture in themselves.

Probably M. Bussy would reply that these purply blues are the colours he saw in the coat and vest. But the eye when once it has seen the little more than the average eye sees is apt to exaggerate. Do you remember a passage in a delightful book called "Idlehurst" containing some wise remarks on this subject of "seeing"? Margaret, who had been taught at school to mix "shadow colour," cannot see the blues and purples which a companion, fresh from Paris, tries to show her in the sunlit gardens. At this point the author speaks thus: "I arbitrate (supporting myself against the weight of Slade Schools and Newlyn studios by memories of William Hunt and David Cox) to the effect that the colours are there, but that when once the eye has learned to see them, it is, save in the case of the great, sure to see too much, and to read into nature those dread anilines which invade the proprieties of the Academy itself."

"Save in the case of the great." Perhaps no one will upbraid me if I do not include M. Besnard among the great, and suggest that the vivid colour of his lustrous study called "Matin" could only have been seen by eyes that have forced themselves, year by year, to perceive a vast deal more than really exists. Here again we have a part of a picture that is a joy to look upon, in the delicate but firm modelling of the girl's half-revealed figure.

Mr. Pennell is original. Surrounded by vistas of glowing colour, he fills his place on the wall with seven pastels as black as the midnight sky—of Venice. Why not? We see Venice at night as well as by day, and those who arrive by the last train do not forget that silent gliding through murky waterways, the clean cut across the Grand Canal, the sensation of vastness, and the glimpse of weather-beaten, water-washed piles, such as Mr. Pennell shows in his pastel of the Grand Canal. Nor do they forget those hurrying clouds overhead, furtively lighted, indicated by Mr. Pennell in "A Venetian Sky." He brings to his pastels the skill of the black and white artist who focusses his effects, who chooses the picturesque incident, and who knows when to reject. Mr. Muhrman does not seem to be able quite to make up his mind to sacrifice his subsidiary motives for the sake of the one broad effect, which alone can give unity to a drawing. His pastels, pleasant though they be, roam. They roam largely, but they roam.

There are many other groups of pastels at this show, but they do not call for particular notice. M. Le Sidaner continues his misty impressions that are still beautiful in spite of many repetitions. Mr. Byam Shaw is cheerfully and conventionally himself in "My Wife, my Bairns, and my wee dog John," and a "He hath smitten the bars of iron in sunder," that means just as much as you care it to mean, or as little, and—well, it was late in the afternoon when I fell under the spell of M. Bauer with his romantic "Bridge at Toledo," just such a bridge as Don Quixote crossed, and his sombre "Mosque at Cordova." These were good to see, and just across the room are Mr. Bruckman's forest folk ageless as their idyll.

C. L. H.

Science.

Saviour of Countless Lives.

Who, then, is this Lord Lister, whom the press discovers and paragraphs every now and again, and whom London University is to "honour" by the conferring of a degree on Wednesday? With the great men of the time, who make and break and unmake our "laws," we are, of course, being well-informed persons, familiar; but not one in a thousand of those who owe their lives or their limbs or their friends to Lord Lister has ever heard his name. Wherever modern surgery is known, there they are, from Edward VII. to the innumerate aboriginal treated at a missionary hospital in Hong Kong or Uganda. Last year there were about 15,000 operations for appendicitis alone in this country, of which ninety per cent. were successful; and that percentage is yearly rising. Thirty years ago one patient of three who submitted to a surgical operation died therefrom; now the figure is less than one in thirty, though operations are performed every day which would have been criminal three decades ago. At that time a surgical operation was a great event. The great operating theatre in the Royal Infirmary of Edinburgh, where some of the first abdominal operations were performed, will seat six or seven hundred people. The latest of the ten tiny operating theatres which replace that one to-day, will hold eight spectators at a pinch, and not one may enter without special permission from the surgeon. And yet students see far more operations than they did before, for so many more are performed. Of last year's patients in London hospitals forty-one per cent. were surgical as against thirty odd that were medical. Thirty years ago the penalty of the supreme function of maternity was that a woman had a less "expectation of life" than a man. Now, by the application of the Listerian or antiseptic method to obstetrics, the reverse is the fact. Oliver Wendell Holmes, Professor of Anatomy at Harvard, writer of the stanza beginning "Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul," and doer of many more things worth doing, was amongst the first to declare that "puerperal fever" was not a specific thing, like scarlet or typhoid fever. So did poor Semmelweis, who might have won Lister's imperishable fame had he employed, as Lister did, the scientific or experimental method. Nowadays puerperal fever means sepsis; surgical fever means sepsis; and sepsis is one common process the world over, as antisepsis or asepsis or Listerism is its one common remedy.

The law of continuity applies to great discoveries as to the rest of phenomena. Lister did not spring up and conceive antiseptic surgery ex nihilo. First came the discovery that yeast was a living thing. This proved the existence of minute forms of life: and connected fermentation with vital processes—for the grape-juice is the product of a living plant, and the change from the glucose or grape-sugar to alcohol and later to acetic acid, or vinegar, is also due to minute and living plants. Then came Pasteur. The accepted doctrine was that suppuration was due to the oxygen of the air. Public belief on scientific matters represents, roughly speaking, a distorted version of the scientific belief of half a century before, so if a child cuts its finger the maternal admonition still is to put on a bit of sticking-plaster and "keep the air away from it." Pasteur proved by experiment that "microbes" (his own excellent term), or "germs," or "micro-organisms," or "bacteria," are the cause of suppuration, which is as truly a fermentation as the processes initiated by yeast. "Thus," in Lister's own words, "was presented a new problem: not to exclude oxygen from the wounds, which was impossible, but to protect them from the living causes of decomposition. . . . To apply that principle has been my chief life-work." And one need hardly say that the application of that principle is not limited to the major operations of surgery, but is employed in every hospital and every practice all the world over, for the quick and safe healing of legions of injuries, "casualties," and minor operations.

When Lister began, he believed that the microbes were in the air, and he invented a "carbolic acid spray," which was used to disinfect the air in the neighbourhood of the wound. I well remember the theatre where—long before my time—this spray was used, and the accounts of a certain occasion when the thing broke and the carbolic acid ran along a familiar passage, and Lister made a few pertinent remarks on the unfortunate clerk in charge of it. But those were early days, and Lister's methods soon underwent modification. The microbes are not, generally speaking, in the air, but in the skin and on all other surfaces. "Imagine yourself and everything else covered with green paint," said Lister. So the spray was abandoned. Lister's solutions of carbolic acid were far too strong at first, and, as they were weakened, the results, and the arguments based upon them, became more striking; for carbolic acid and other antiseptics are deleterious to living cells generally—though in varying degree—and weaken the patient's tissues and diminish their healing power, besides destroying the germs that may be there. Hence the celebrated remark of "The Times," which must have seemed very apposite, seeing that the use of these solutions was the essence of Mr. Lister's claim: "Mr. Lister's arguments are getting stronger as his solutions get weaker"!

The weakness of the solutions has now reached vanishing point in the aseptic method, which is the final form of Listerism. Yet I have heard an anti-viviselector—who had doubtless profited in many ways himself by Listerism—infer from Lister's recent words on the aseptic method that he himself had abandoned antiseptic surgery as a myth. Let me try in a few words to indicate the technique of the new method. As Lister showed long ago, antiseptics are in themselves a danger to the patient. Everyone knows that carbolic acid is poisonous, and one of the indirect results of Listerism is that suicide by this poison has greatly increased of late years—it being indeed one of the three most often employed—since it is now so readily accessible. Aseptic surgery maintains that no atom of any antiseptic is to touch the patient. Only "salt solution" of blood-temperature, or "normal saline" (so called because it contains the exact percentage of salt which occurs in the blood, and is therefore the only absolutely non-irritant substance known)—is ever applied to the patients' tissues, except where microbes are already present; in cases of "unbroken skin" (where microbes cannot have entered)—nothing else is used. But observe where the principle comes in. Every instrument is boiled. Every towel and cloth is boiled. The whole theatre is rubbed down with carbolic acid or other antiseptic. The table is similarly treated. The patient's skin is similarly treated for forty-eight hours before operation, but when the time comes, the now unnecessary antiseptic, which has already done its work, is carefully washed away with normal saline. The surgeon's hands are subjected to a complicated series of processes—which render the skin highly unfitted for subsequent piano-playing—and the aseptic method says, in a word, that all microbes are removed before operation, and that none will be admitted during or after it. The same technique is followed in every maternity hospital. The responsibility of the surgeon is now terrible, and personally I look with astonishment upon all who face it. He has the operation itself and the risk from the anæsthetic to consider, and for three days afterwards he has the consciousness that if a single step went wrong in the technique—if an assisting nurse put a finger tip to her hair, for instance, or if he himself had inadvertently adjusted his eyeglasses or otherwise touched a non-sterilized surface—the patient may die, and the death be not a "dispensation of Providence"—which formerly killed the women in maternity hospitals—but a theoretically preventable failure in the most complicated and difficult and responsible technique under heaven—violin-playing and billiards included.

Listerism began about thirty years ago in Edinburgh; it has three million years to run. C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

"The State called Reverie."

SIR,—In the ACADEMY for June 13 there was an article on this subject provoked by Mr. W. B. Yeats's book, "Ideas of Good and Evil," the writer of which agrees with Mr. Yeats that reverie is the begetter both of wisdom and of good art. Anyone who has read Mr. Yeats's works knows that by reverie he means the surrender of the mind to the subconsciousness uncontrolled by reason or the will, and the writer shows throughout his article that he means this by it also.

Now we all know, by the experience of dreams, how the subconsciousness works when thus uncontrolled. Some condition of the body, some sound or light, will change our dreams from unreasoning delight to equally unreasoning horror, and both delight and horror are more intense than any waking sensation of the mind because all the mind's critical and inhibitive faculties are in abeyance. There is nothing to tell us that the emotions of a dream will ever come to an end, or to explain their causes, and they seem overwhelmingly strange and new, because the dream cuts them off from all sense or memory of like past experiences. Reverie then is an attempt to acquire this intensity and strangeness of mental sensation in a waking state by simulating the conditions of a dream. I quote again Mr. Yeats's quotation from Shelley: "Those who are subject to the state called reverie feel as if their nature were resolved into the surrounding universe, or as if the surrounding universe were resolved into their nature." That is to say their nature is passively surrendered to the influence of their surroundings, so that they affect the processes of the mind as imperiously as in dreams.

It is contended that the mind, by being thus thrown open to this uncontrolled influence, will acquire a mysterious wisdom beyond the reach of reason, and that it is a worthy task for a poet to describe the sensations and experiences of his subconsciousness thus uncontrolled. Now no one can deny that the subconsciousness of a poet must be richly stocked; that music and vivid images must exist in it before they can become part of his natural language. It is the subconsciousness that supplies him with the machinery of his art. The conscious exercise of the will or the reason will inspire him with the magic of words or of allusive phrases. It is certain also that a man whose subconsciousness is acutely sensitive to external influences, will be richer in experience and therefore wiser, if wise at all, than a man who takes in nothing except by conscious effort. But that is not to say that the habit of uncontrolled reverie is valuable for the practice either of life or art; or that the mere processes of a mind in uncontrolled reverie are fit subjects for poetry.

In the first place it must be remembered that in reverie as in dreams the play of the mind is at the mercy, not only of external things, but of the conditions of the body. Indigestion means nightmare to the dreamer, and deranged nerves may make a nightmare out of life to the man who has the habit of uncontrolled reverie. If you withhold your reason so that you may enjoy the pleasures of the mind the more intensely, you will not be able to employ it to mitigate the mind's pains. Nor will you be able to prevent it from reasoning perversely about those pains; for the reason will act somehow, and if not allowed to act normally, it will act abnormally. Now perverse reasoning about mental pain is the source of hypochondria, and hypochondria makes an end of both wisdom and art. The man who is blighted by it can neither live nor write well. Of course the habit of reverie will not by itself produce hypochondria. Provided the mind remain healthy, the reverie will be healthy also; but no one can ensure the health of his mind. We are all subject to slight mental disorders, and nothing is so likely to aggravate them as the habit of reverie. "Nothing is good or bad, but thinking makes it so," said the great hypochondriac of literature, and he meant the kind of thinking that reverie fosters, the thinking that is only a more explicit expression of mental sensations. If you conceive of life as a series of mental states and are so absorbed in them as to be indifferent to all external aims, when some disorder of the mind or nerves makes those states painful, life will be nothing to you but a blind pain. You will not be able to cure it with your will, for the will loses its power unless exercised upon external aims. The reason acting perversely will interfere at every turn with the exercise of what will remains to you. The native hue of resolution will be sicklied o'er with the pale cast of thought; for the hypochondriac thinks intensely though always irrationally, and his unreason is fearfully convincing to himself.

Unreasoning thought is the chief symptom of hypochondria. It is also the note of much of the poetry of Reverie, which sees an immense significance in mere mental sensations, and reasons perversely about them. For instance, beautiful things fill the poet with sadness, not because there is anything essentially sad in beauty, but by the mere reaction of delight into pain.

But the poet will not exercise his reason about that sadness. He will not see that it is a mere mental sensation. Associating it with beauty, he comes to think of it as beautiful in itself, and gives himself up to the luxury of grief about nothing. If he is able to express that grief beautifully, and in terms of beautiful things, he persuades himself and many others that there is some profound poetic significance in a process that is wholly physical. Looking to reverie for new poetic material, he gets from it what is material really only for the flattest prose.

This is not a paradox, but the plainest truth. The will and the reason, or whatever you like to call the faculties that produce consciousness out of subconsciousness, are the highest that have been evolved in us. Poetry is the highest expression of our nature, and needs therefore the exercise of our highest faculties not merely to produce it, but to put us in a fit state of mind for producing it. The great poet has mental sensations so intense by nature that he has no need to intensify them by freeing them from the control of the reason. His subconsciousness enriches itself from internal things without the help of uncontrolled reverie; and he uses its riches, not for their own sake, but to illustrate action. His mental sensations are never the subject matter of his art. He relates sorrow and delight always to definite events, and uses his intense capacity for both to express the sorrow and delight of others. Poetry in its essence deals with action, and to write great poetry a man must have lived actively, not passively. The highest poetry is dramatic or epic, and its subject the conflict of will with circumstance. A man must have experienced that conflict, and must have observed it with all the powers of his mind, before he can understand or express it. Uncontrolled reverie teaches him only to wince from it or to ignore it. It is the conflict of will with circumstance that produces the most real and so the most poetical joy and sorrow. We are more moved by the cry of Antony: "Unarm, Eros, the long day's task is done," than by the vague emotionalism of—

The stately ships go on
To their haven under the hill,
But oh for the touch of a vanished hand
And the sound of a voice that is still.

The one grief touches us to the quick because we relate it to our most real and reasonable sorrows. The other we know to be a mere blind pain, a kind of neuralgia of the mind, fastening upon the first pretext it can find for its existence and expressing itself musically only because the poet has the habit of musical expression and of thinking in beautiful terms. The one is a sorrow that only death can cure; the other can be cured by reason or distraction. It might be quickly forgotten in the prospect of a good dinner.

No art can satisfy us for long unless it satisfies our reason, and there is no element of reason in mere mental sensations. It is the very essence of tragedy and epic that they show some definite and reasonable cause for the emotions they express. Otherwise they will fail to communicate those emotions. The sorrow provoked by tragedy is wholesome because based on sympathy with others. It carries us out of ourselves. But the sorrow provoked by the poetry of mere reverie is selfish and merely an indulgence in the same luxury of woe which that poetry expresses. Both morally and aesthetically the art of aimless reverie is inferior to the art produced by all the faculties of the mind working in harmony together; and in this age of feeble art distracted by conflicting theories that is a fact that cannot be too strongly insisted on.—Yours, &c.,

A. CLUTTON-BROCK.

Anabaptists and United Presbyterians.

SIR,—In an article under the title of "The Family of Love" a writer in the ACADEMY of 13 June makes a most astounding statement, to wit, that the Anabaptists of nigh four hundred years ago were uncommonly like the United Presbyterians of Scotland early in the nineteenth century. The United Presbyterians may be little known out of Scotland, and only in literature through Disraeli's burlesque reference to them in "Lothair." But since your writer has condescended to notice them, it is only fair to point out that they never taught the doctrine of the "inner light"—that anyone who had the "call" might preach, or that Christians should never make use of law courts. Their creed was the Westminster Confession of Faith and they differed from the State Church of Scotland solely upon the question of spiritual independence. They never went to antinomian extremes, nor held that human love should be nationalised. It is surely needless to say that they never indulged in indecent or blasphemous rites, or countenanced the mixed dancing of the naked sexes. In fact they have always been a very decent middle-class denomination. To this religious body did the late Dr. John Brown, author of "Rab and his Friends," belong, and many other worthy persons less known to fame. I can myself claim no connection with it, and write only from a sense of justice.—Yours, &c., Lanark.

W. G. SCOTT-MONCRIEFF.

[Our reviewer's statement simply was that the fundamental principles of the Anabaptists and those of the United Presbyterians were alike in origin. We did not for a moment mean anyone to understand that we suspected the "U. P.'s" of countenancing "the mixed dancing of the naked sexes." Beyond all doubt, however, they did hold the doctrine of the "inner light," though, like all Protestant communicants that adopted standards of faith, they held it inconsistently. What is "spiritual independence" if not an assertion of "the inner light" ?]

Mr. Lucas's "Lamb."

SIR,—Will you permit me to point out that your reviewer in the last paragraph but one of a most able and appreciative review of the first volume of the complete works of Charles and Mary Lamb by Mr. Lucas in the ACADEMY of 13 June would appear to lead your readers to conclude that Mr. Lucas favours the view that Lamb's "Confessions of a Drunkard" have in them more truth than exaggeration, whereas Mr. Lucas, in another part of his note, states that whatever proportion of truth may have been in them at the time of publication quickly disappeared, and that "one of the best proofs of the untruth [the italics are my own] of the 'Confessions' is urged by Charles Robert Leslie, the painter," an extract from whose "Autobiographical Recollections" he then gives.—Yours, &c.,

S. BUTTERWORTH, Major,

The Castle, Carlisle.

R.A.M. Corps.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 195 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for the best description of "The Place which has left the most vivid impression on my mind." Fifty-one replies have been received. We award the prize to Miss Evelyn Underhill, 3, Campden Hill Place, W., for the following:—

VERONA.

Forked battlements of the Ghibelline and the dreamy protection of her distant hills, give to Verona her peculiar air of militant and spiritual peace. Her charm—the charm of delicate strength—springs upon you as you first stand by the Adige, flowing in swift curves between Gothic palaces; and look from the fierce bridge of the Scaligers to the serenity of the mountain tops. The towers of her four great churches stand sentinel above crinkled roofs. She has the glory of some pale, ripe thing; the whole of her has such a lucent quality, to look at her is to think of sun-lit pearls. She is restful too; consciously res'ful, as the soul of a pearl seems to be. Not mournfully inert, or deliberately dazing for the tourist's satisfaction. Quiet, but softly vivacious, is life in the streets of Verona: in her ancient and coloured market-place, where the exquisite stains that were once Liberale's frescoes look down on the gentle bustle of old women and animals beneath. To the place of the Senators, before the most delicate loggia in Italy, Dante's memory brings an austere touch. You dip from hot squares into bare, hushed churches; striped rosy and golden without, anciently frescoed within. S. Zeno, that mystical place, where twelve old saintly statues keep guard before the sanctuary. S. Anastasia, of golden bricks, Pisanello's grey S. George faint above the chancel arch. That re-arrangement of the rocks called architecture is here a very plastic art. One thinks of pure strong-armed angels moulding houses proper for the spirit of man.

But the soul of her is in that busy market-place which speaks still of the Roman and the Middle age. Therefrom, narrow streets, their tall houses balconied in lacy iron-work, run everywhere to the Adige; where their bridges, like mighty fingers, point out from the City of Dreamers to the Hills of God.

[E. U., London.]

Other replies follow:—

CAMBER CASTLE.

Camber Castle is a notable ruin, unreachd by any roaring highway, found only by pleasant meadow paths. The level land looks kind and sweet in the sun; smooth windy fields, with here and there showing through the broken turf a patch of beach; travelling brooks, with here and there a bundle of trees; no railway to hustle its poignant solitude, no chandlers in its gateway, no officious spoiler to restore its broken arches; it is good and lonely, and squats and dreams on the old marshland between Rye and Winchelsea. Once since, its Tudor builders toiled here, the sea with its cold trick of obtrusion plunged over the flat fields and reduced the labours of their hands, and having heaped the grey walls with barren beach rolled back to its pit again. Green grass at length covered these signs, and under the turf where the sheep feed, under the thin earth you will find everywhere a depth of sea-stones. From such a base this ruin rises huge and round, its strong tower roofless and without floor. A narrow stairway curves up in the thick walls, with steps so worn that it is but a steep pathway now, and you descend clinging to each wall with careful hand, and with perhaps a little questioning fancy of what gallant knights had also trod the stair, or what slender finger-tips had brushed in the self-same way its dusty wall, what sorrow here was silent. From the outer walls one can look into Rye; and on a neighbouring road the red roofs of the farmhouse with poplars and the black conical malhousers shot with sunlight draw the eye in mute familiar fashion. This were, indeed, a place of sweet and certain peace; I left with a feeling deeper than regret.

[A. E. C., Brighton.]

IONA.

Mull, as the steamer moved along the Sound, appeared a mass of dark and melancholy high lands; and looking up the valleys, the view always ended in a blackness of grey mist. But after emerging into the outer sea, and passing Staffa, the sun burnt its way out gradually until the whole western sky was open and limpid, moving with little white clouds. Broken glints of bright blue began to swim and glitter on the great, green waters, and in the sunlight lay Iona, a stony and humble island with shining white beaches. I cannot forget the disappointment on first landing. The monuments, themselves only late ecclesiastical concretions of the huge and dateless legend that quivers around this barren island like a charm of the waters and the air, have undergone a last sack at coarser hands than those of Norseman. It is great pity now, to see the poor fragments of carvings and inscribed blocks, neatly ranged and piled here and there by the final audit of archaeological duty. Three things only I saw that made me feel I was really in unseen penetralia of the dead Celtic world. There are the two last crosses, tall and thin with that strange outline of a lightless sun shaped between their arms, and the multitude of gravestones of kings and men of high estate, that now are all drawn close together on the way to the cathedral, a railled off street whereon no man walks. And around there is the granite and the roaring sea.

[F. W. H., Penarth.]

ARRAN.

We came to Arran one afternoon in August. About five o'clock we strolled up the hill and sat amid scented bracken and sturdy heather, in stillness unbroken save by the bleat of a sheep or the hum of a homing bee. Here and there on the hillside a blue scarf of smoke hung from a cottage chimney and slowly melted into the heat haze. In front of us lay the shining waters of the bay, dotted over with boats going out to the fishing. Far away to the north rose the peak of Goatfell, clothed by distance and shimmering heat with purple velvet. To the right towered the granitic mass of Holy Island, tinted here and there with wine-coloured heather; close at hand were rolling uplands, intersected by fairy glens, where the lady-birch in her silken robes and the scarlet-crowned mountain ash stood knee-deep in bracken and bog myrtle. The glorious sunlight flooded the whole scene, and the rippling waters of the bay reflected a million pin-points of silver light.

The sun sank behind the hill, and the slight breeze died utterly away. By and by the harvest-moon rose in solemn glory, and laid a golden pathway on the sea; a starry radiance shone at intervals from the lighthouse on the Holy Island, and one by one the cottage windows gleamed with pale candle-light. Slowly we went down the hill and wandered along the white road by the shore. The tongue of the tide lapped gently on the beach; the faint odour of wrack filled the soft air; the voices of returning fishers floated musically over the water, and now and then there was a rattle of oars, and a boat's keel grated on the shingle.

Thus did Arran weave her magic spell. [T. McE., Belfast.]

ATHENS.

A hot dusty road, stretching across a stony landscape; here and there a stunted olive or grey aloe adds to the dull monotony of the scene. As the drosky rattles onwards, weird faces peer in and distorted hands are thrust forward for alms. Over all, laying everything bare, beats the pitiless sun.

Gradually out of the distance a rectangular mound is seen; broken masonry on its crest earth-coloured and sad; whilst nearer at hand buildings begin to crop, new and old; here a little grey temple, there a fenced-in waste dotted with monuments appear among the mean habitations of the poor. Gradually the houses become larger, the boulevards more trim, until the great square of the town is reached. It is Athens! Crawling on foot up a winding path past houses, and open spaces littered with broken columns and stones, we come at last to the Protyleum—sternly impressive—and beyond, simple, perfect in its sovereignty stands the embodiment of earthly perfection—the Parthenon! From its steps is seen the purple sea with its sapphire islands, melting into an azure sky. The grey earth, fit accompaniment to this harmony in blue, joins in the grand psalm of praise to beauty. Athens reveals herself and the Greek spirit breathes over all.

Close at hand is a little building—"the temple to the unknown God," and the echo of an alien Jewish voice breaks in—"Whom therefore ye ignorantly worship, Him declare I unto you." The glory which was Greece, the grandeur which was Rome passes, as must all human manifestations of beauty. Happy that a few stones are left to speak of what once was; but the Christian spirit, out-scoring the Greek, and straining beyond the mortal and finite, loses itself at last in the eternal loveliness which is God.

[H. G. B., Ayr.]

AM RHEIN.

Long shadows creep down from the hills, and for a moment the trees surge softly under a caressing wind which breathes fresh evening scents over the river. Then a stillness comes into the air: hushed Nature is impendent over the couch of the day. Already the sun-rays have taken a yellowish tint and fall aslant, begetting a myriad ruddy spangles on the mirror of the Rhine, as between walls of golden-green, it wanders interminably ahead towards that mysterious opal veil drawn across the horizon.

Slowly falls the sun, flaming through the heavens, softening the purple hills, spreading a golden glory over the west. For a moment the Tower of Godesberg, painted in black against the sky, might be taken for the cone of a volcano in eruption. Comely translucent cloud bergs float majestically on emerald lakes and sapphire seas, and waves of light breaking into crimson foam beat on the sleek baby clouds as they scud across the wake of the sun.

The banks of the river with all their irregularities—their trees, their castles, their distant church spires—stand out in ragged silhouette; whilst high above all, mid darkest mystery of pine forest, the Drachenfels points its gloomy donjon. . . . And still the sun is falling, falling through the heavens; still the Rhine wanders towards the molten sky.

"Lieb Vaterland magst ruhig sein"

Fest steht und treu die Wacht, die Wacht am Rhein—" singing with hoarse voices, a party of students, arm in arm, reel towards the nearest Bier-Garten. On the river, a tiny steamer, haling with quick pants at a huge timber raft, trails a sooty strain across the fading splendour.

Competition No. 196 (New Series).

In an article on "The Essay: Ancient and Modern," printed in this issue of the ACADEMY, the following sentence occurs: "The original essay largely depended on the art of getting away from your subject." This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for a brief essay, not to exceed 300 words, which best succeeds in getting away from its subject.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 24 June, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

Wells (Prof. Amos R.), Help for the Tempted(Isbister)	2/6
Henson (H. Hensley), Sincerity and Subscription(Macmillan) net	1/0
A Churchman, The Failure of the Churches(Nash)	2/6

POETRY, CRITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

Butler (Harold E.), selected by, War Songs of Britain(Constable) net	3/6
Meyer-Pörster (Wilhelm), Old Heidelberg: A Play in Five Acts(Siegle)	5/0
Burroughs (John), Literary Values(Gay and Bird) net	5/0
Fawcett (Edgar), Voices and Visions(Nash)	5/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

Des Vœux (Sir G. William), My Colonial Service. 2 vols.(Murray) net	24/0
Cuthbert (Father), The Friars, and how they came to England(Sands)	5/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

Dopp (Katharine Elizabeth), The Place of Industries in Elementary Education (King) net	5/0
Newcomb (Prof. Simon), Astronomy for Everybody(Isbister)	7/6
Barber (Samuel), The Cloud World(Stock)	7/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

Nadkarni (G. N.), Journal of a Visit to Europe in 1896(Simpkin)	8/0
--	-----

EDUCATIONAL.

Latter (H.), Précis Writing(Blackie)	3/6
Scott (Sir Walter), A Legend of Montrose(")	1/6
Kerr (John G.) and Brown (John N.), Elementary Physics(")	2/0
Nall (G. H.), edited by, The Anabasis of Xenophon. Book IV.(")	2/0
Weekley (Ernest), Exercises on the French Subjunctive(")	2/0
Hartog (W. G.), Little French Classics(")	0/4
Wright (Alex.), " " " Balsac's Un Episode sous la Terreur (Blackie)	0/4
Ritson (Alice M.), " " " Pascal's Pensées(")	0/4
Goldberg (E. C.), " " " Montaigne's Essays(")	0/4
Kennedy (Mary O.), " " " Chénier's Select Poems(")	0/4
Wall (Arthur H.), " " " La Fontaine's Shorter Fables(")	0/4
Millis (C. T.), Technical Arithmetic and Geography(Methuen)	3/6
Lydon (Noel S.), A Junior Geometry(")	2/0
Weatherhead (T. O.), Junior Greek Examination Papers(")	1/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

Parr (Olive Katharine), The Voice of the River(Routledge)	5/0
Williams (O. F. Abdy), The Story of Notation(Scott) net	8/6
Rose (Algernon), On Choosing a Piano(Scott)	1/0
White (Beuck), Quo Vaditis(Civic Press, New York)	$1
Williams (Philip H.), The Modern Chess Problem(Routledge)	5/0
Harrison (O.), The Book of the Honey Bee(Lane) net	2/6
Elizabeth's Children.....(Lane)	6/0
Belloe (H.), Calliban's Guide to Letters(Duckworth) 1/6 net and net	2/0
Lane (Ralph), Patriotism under Three Flags(Unwin)	6/0
The Curator, A Gloucestershire Wild Garden(Stock) net	6/0
Tod (E. M.), Wet-Fly Fishing(Low)

NEW EDITIONS.

Dante's Vision of Hell, Purgatory and Paradise(Newnes) net	3/6
The Bibelots: An English Miscellany(Gay and Bird)	2/6
A Dante Treasury(")	2/6
Crowley (Hastings), The Golden Sayings of Epictetus(Macmillan) net	2/6
Strong (Thomas B.), A Manual of Theology(Black) net	7/6
The Windsor Shakespeare: Love's Labour's Lost(Jack) net	2/0
Goddard (Fannie), Newquay: The Vale of Lanherne, &c. (Homeland Association) net	0/6
Southey (Robert), The Life of John Wesley(Hutchinson) net 1/0 and net	2/0
Macdonald (William), edited by, Lamb's Essays and Last Essays. 2 vols. (Dent) each, net	3/0

Ready July 1st, royal 8vo, 216 pages, No. 4 of

THE HIBBERT JOURNAL,A quarterly Review of Religion, Theology, and Philosophy.

Price 2s. 6d. net; 10s. per annum, post free.

Principal Contents of No. 4.

The Character of Jesus Christ, by Rev. Francis G. Fos-body, D.D., Plummer Professor of Christian Morals in Harvard University.—Are Indian Missions a Failure?
by Rev. William Miller, C.I.E., D.D., LL.D., Principal of the Madras Christian College, Vice-Chancellor of the University of Madras.—The Philosophy of Authority in Religion, by Wilfred Ward.—Do we Believe in the Reformation? by Rev. W. F. Cobb, D.D., Rector of St.
Ethelburga's, London.—The Liberal Catholic Movement in England, by Philip Sydney.—The Growing Reluctance of Able Men to take Orders, by F. S.
Burrell, M.A.—Physical Law and Life, by J. H.
Poynting, Sc.D., F.R.S., Professor of Physics in the University of Birmingham.—Pressing Need of Old Testament Study, by the Rev. Canon T. K. Cheyne, D.D.—Zoroastrianism and Primitive Christianity, by Rev. James Moffatt, D.D.—The Purpose of Eusebius, by Walter R. Cassels.—Discussions, by Rev. Prof. Alan Menzies, R. Hoernle, Rev. G. Galloway, Rev. Prof.
W. B. Smith, Miss E. E. C. Jones, and G. T. Deas. A number of Signed Reviews, and also a Bibliography of Recent Books and Articles in Theological and Philosophical Periodicals.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
14, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.;
and 7, Broad Street, Oxford.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK.

500 Places to sell MSS., Photos and Drawings.
1903 EDITION NOW READY. It is a Commercial Directory, giving Address, Rates, Time of Payment and Conditions of Contributorship of all Magazines, Papers, &c., Purchasing MSS., Photos or Drawings.
Articles by AARON WATSON, J.P., F.J.L., ELIZABETH
BANKS, and GALLOWAY KYLE, F.R.S.L.

Price 1/8 net. Post free 1/8.

THE WRITERS' YEAR BOOK Co.,
Granville House, Arundel Street, Strand, W.C.

J. W. ARROWSMITH, BRISTOL.

CRICKET NOTES, 1/- By GILBERT L. JESSOP.

CONTAINS—

JESSOP ON BATTING.

JESSOP ON FIELDING.

JESSOP ON RUN-MAKING.

ASK FOR ARROWSMITH'S EDITION.

RANJITSINHJI, PRINCE OF

CRICKET. By PERCY CROSS STANDING.
Crown 8vo, cloth, 288 pp. Many illustrations from photographs not heretofore published. Price 3/6.
"Will probably prove to be the most popular cricket publication of the year."—St. James's Gazette. "Tells scores of good stories about the most popular of all cricketers."—The Weekly Dispatch.

IMPORTANT WORK ON CRICKET.

ANNALS OF LORD'S AND HISTORY

OF THE M.C.C. By ALFRED D. TAYLOR.
Will be published in July. Price 3/6. There will also be published an EDITION DE LUXE on hand-made paper, price 21/-, orders for which should be sent to J. W. Arrowsmith, Bristol. The names and addresses of subscribers will be printed in this edition, and the number printed will be limited to subscribers only.

READY IMMEDIATELY.

VICTORIA, QUEEN AND RULER. By

EMILY CRAWFORD, Paris Correspondent of Truth and The Daily News. Crown 8vo, 408 pp.
Price 6/-.

Bristol: J. W. Arrowsmith.
London: Simpkin, Marshall & Co., Ltd.

NEW WORK BY MR. LEONARD WILLIAMS.

NOW READY. Price 12s. 6d. net.

TOLEDO AND MADRID:

Their Records and Romances.

By LEONARD WILLIAMS.

Author of "The Land of the Dons," "Ballads and Songs of Spain," &c.

With 56 Full-page Illustrations.

CASSELL & Co., Ltd., London, and all Booksellers.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY.

Subscriptions from One Guinea per annum

Can be entered at any date for THREE, SIX, or TWELVE MONTHS.

ADDITIONAL COPIES of all NEW ENGLISH
and FOREIGN BOOKS of general interest are added
as the demand increases, and an ample supply is provided of the PRINCIPAL FORTHCOMING
WORKS immediately they are published.

A New Edition of Mudie's Clearance Catalogue
is now ready.
Post Free on application.

This CATALOGUE comprises the SURPLUS COPIES of MANY LEADING BOOKS of the PAST and PRESENT SEASONS at
GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.

MUDIE'S LIBRARY, LIMITED, 30 to 34, New Oxford Street, W.C.;

241, Brompton Road, S.W.; and 48, Queen Victoria Street, E.C., London; and at Barton Arcade, Manchester.

GENERAL LIBRARY CATALOGUE

1s. 6d., Post Free.

Containing the Principal English Books in circulation at the Library arranged under Subjects.
A convenient Handbook to Current Literature (560 pages), comprising many thousands of Recent and
Standard Works on POLITICAL and SOCIAL
TOPICS, the ARMY, NAVY, ART, SCIENCE, HIS-
TORY, BIOGRAPHY, PHILOSOPHY, THEOLOGY,
SPORT, TRAVEL, TOPOGRAPHY, FICTION, and
JUVENILE BOOKS. Large Numbers of Copies of the foregoing are annually added to the Library. The additions in 1902 exceeded 250,000 vols.

DARLINGTON'S HANDBOOKS.

Edited by RALPH DARLINGTON, F.R.G.S.

Maps by BARTHOLOMEW.

Fcap. 8vo.

ONE SHILLING EACH.

Illustrated.

THE VALE OF LLANGOLLEN.—With Special Contributions from His Excellency
E. J. PHELPS, late American Minister; Professor JOHN RUSKIN, LL.D.; ROBERT BROWNING,
A. W. KINGLAKE, and Sir THEODORE MARTIN, K.O.B.

BOURNEMOUTH and NEW FOREST.

THE NORFOLK BROADS.

BRECON and its BEACONS.

ROSS, TINTERN, and CHEPSTOW.

BRISTOL, BATH, WELLS, and WESTON-SUPER-MARE.

BRIGHTON, EASTBOURNE, HASTINGS, and ST. LEONARDS.

{ LLANDUDNO, RHYL, BANGOR, PENMAENMAWR, }

{ LLANFAIRFECHAN, ANGLESEY, and CAERNARVON. }

ABERYSTWYTH, BARMOUTH, MACHYNLLETH, and ABERDOVEY.

CONWAY, COLWYN BAY, BETTWS-Y-COED, SNOWDON, and FESTINOG.

BARMOUTH, DOLGELLY, HARLEOH, ORIOLETH, and Pwllheli.

MALVERN, HEREFORD, WORCESTER, GLOUCESTER, and OHELTHAM.

LLANDRINDOD WELLS and the SPAS of MID-WALES.

NORWICH, LOWESTOFT, YARMOUTH, and the NORFOLK BROADS.

THIRD EDITION, REVISED, 5s.—60 Illustrations, 24 Maps and Plans.

LONDON AND ENVIRONS.

By E. C. COOK and E. T. COOK, M.A.

With Index of 4,500 References to all Streets and Places of Interest.

Llangollen: DARLINGTON & Co.

London: SIMPKIN, MARSHALL, HAMILTON, KENT & Co., Ltd., The Railway Bookstalls, and all Booksellers.
Paris and New York: BRENTANO'S.

FROM

Mr. Andrew Melrose's LIST OF NEW BOOKS.

SECOND EDITION IN THE PRESS.

NEW WORK.

By the Author of "THE CROWN OF SOIENOE."

At 6s.

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS:

A Study of our Lord's Trial in the Wilderness. By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART,
M.A. Large Imp. 16mo, cloth boards.

The Daily News says:—"A very careful study of the wonderful story of the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness. Contains striking and original thought."

The Expository Times says:—"The reputation which Mr. Morris Stewart won by his Crown of Science he will not lose by his Temptation of Jesus. . . . This book might have come first, and made the reputation more rapidly. . . . Compels you to read over and over again an event in the Saviour's life . . . and makes you see the reality of it with the first fresh surprise upon you
again."

The Aberdeen Free Press says:—"A fresh and vigorous study of Our Lord's Temptation. . . . Mr.
Stewart speaks with thoughtfulness and felicity, and has given us a book of great worth and one which takes a place in the ranks of contemporary theology."

The Dundee Advertiser says:—. . . . Expounded by Mr. Stewart in the most helpful and impressive way.
. . . . Mr. Stewart is an exegetist of real fitness, and his equipment of knowledge is ample."

THIRD EDITION NOW READY.

At 3s. 6d. net.

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE:

The Incarnation of God in Manhood.

By Rev. A. MORRIS STEWART, M.A. Large
Crown 8vo, 324 pages, cloth boards.

PRESS REVIEWS.

THE CROWN OF SCIENCE.

The Expository Times says:—"The intensely spiritual quality of the book invests its dicta, to the receptive mind, with an impressiveness and an authority independent of the startling analogies between natural and spiritual laws which the author discovers in the latest findings of biological science. . . . Compact of thought and expression, it is absorbing in its interest; to sit down to read the first 'Study' is to be held until the last chapter has been covered, and to read the book once is to read it again."

THE CROWN OF SOIENOE.

The Outlook (U.S.A.) says:—"A keen, devout, and cultured mind here essays the exhibition of spiritual truths as the complements of physical. . . . This is one of the helpful, forward-pointing books characteristic of the present transitional period of religious thought.
It is significant both of the vitality of the fundamental Christian truths, and of the freedom exercised in the most conservative churches, to restate them in accord with larger learning."

At 2s. 6d. net.

By CUTHBERT LENNOX.

FOURTH (ENLARGED) EDITION.

HENRY DRUMMOND, A Biographical Sketch (with Bibliography). With Photographs and a special Wash Drawing by SCOTT RANKIN. Large Crown 8vo, cloth boards.
Price 2s. 6d. net.

THIRD EDITION.

JAMES CHALMERS OF NEW

GUINEA. Missionary, Pioneer, and Martyr.
Large Crown 8vo. Price 2s. 6d. net. Two Maps and Eight Illustrations, including a Fine Portrait.

At 3s. 6d. net.

By Dr. R. A. TORREY.

FOURTH EDITION.

HOW TO PROMOTE AND CON-

DUCT A SUCCESSFUL REVIVAL.
By R. A. TORREY, D.D. Imp. 16mo, cloth boards, gilt top, price 3s. 6d. net.

The Christian says:—"A book which many workers may find of service. . . . Mr. Torrey aims to direct us in these activities, and we trust his very practical papers will find many sympathetic readers."

At 5s.

By Rev. ALEX. SMELLIE, M.A.

SECOND EDITION.

IN THE HOUR OF SILENCE.

Brief Daily Meditations for a Year. By ALEX.
SMELLIE, M.A. Imp., cloth boards, gilt edges.

The Expository Times says:—"All is original and all of choicest quality. . . . The thought is never abstract, but in touch with the simple realities of our spiritual life; yet it is always fresh. . . . We have not had a book of daily meditations so near to what it ought to be as this is, though many have tried to furnish one."

16, PILGRIM STREET, E.O.

MACMILLAN & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

VOLUME I. READY THIS DAY.

EDITION DE LUXE OF THE

WORKS OF MATTHEW ARNOLD.

IN FIFTEEN MONTHLY VOLUMES.

Uniform with the Edition de Luxe of Tennyson, Lamb, Kingsley, Fitzgerald, Pater, and Kipling. The Edition will be strictly limited to 775 Copies. Price 10s. 6d. net per Volume, and orders will only be taken for complete Sets.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B., Formerly Director of the Royal College of Music.

By CHARLES L. GRAVES.
With Photogravure Portraits, &c. 8vo, 12s. 6d. net.
Punch.—"One of the very best biographies the Baron has read for many a day."

ENGLISH MEN OF LETTERS.—New Series.

ROBERT BROWNING.

By G. K. CHESTERTON.
Crown 8vo, gilt top, flat back, 2s. net.

NORWEGIAN BY-WAYS.

By CHARLES W. WOOD.
With 9 Illustrations. Extra crown 8vo, 6s.
Sheffield Telegraph.—"Mr. Wood's charming work. . . A work which it is a delight to read."

GOLDEN TREASURY SERIES.—New Vol.

GOLDEN SAYINGS OF EPICTETUS,

With the Hymn of Cleanthes.
Translated and Arranged by HASTINGS CROSSLEY,
M.A. Pott 8vo, 2s. 6d. net.

MACMILLAN'S POCKET NOVELS BY FAVOURITE AUTHORS.

Illustrated. Pott 8vo, 2s. net each.

By GERTRUDE ATHERTON, MRS. PENDLETON'S FOUR-IN-HAND.

By WINSTON CHURCHILL, MR. KEEGAN'S ELOPEMENT.

By F. MARION CRAWFORD, MAN OVERBOARD!

THE MORAL SYSTEM OF SHAKESPEARE.

A Popular Illustration of Fiction as the Experimental Side of Philosophy. By Prof. RICHARD G. MOULTON, M.A. (Camb.), Ph.D. (Penna.). Crown 8vo, gilt top, 6s. net.

MACMILLAN'S MAGAZINE.

Price 1s. Annual Subscription, post free, 12s.

CONTENTS FOR JULY:—
JOHN MAXWELL'S MARRIAGE. By STEPHEN GWYNN. Chapters XVII.—XX.
THE BATTLE OF SHREWSBURY. By A. G. BRADLEY.
THE FOUR PACKMEN.
A VILLAGE FEUD.
ALDWYCH IN LONDON. By LAURENCE GOMME.
MR. GEORGE MOORE AND IRELAND'S VOCATION. By Professor R. Y. TYRRELL.
THE COLONIES AND IMPERIAL DEFENCE: A Rejoinder. By ARTHUR E. LORING.
ARCADY. By MARCUS REED.
THE HANDICRAFTS. By Miss A. S. GALBRAITH.
THE BARONET.

THE CENTURY MAGAZINE.

ILLUSTRATED.
Price 1s. 4d. Annual Subscription, post free, 16s.

The JULY Number contains:—
UNPUBLISHED LETTERS BY SIR WALTER SCOTT. Edited by HORACE G. HUTCHINSON.
JOHN WESLEY. Part I. By Prof. C. T. WINCHESTER (Wesleyan University).
THE YELLOW VAN.—IX. By RICHARD WHITEING, Author of "No. 6, John Street."
A LOST STORY. By FRANK NORRIS, Author of "The Octopus." Picture by CHRISTIN.
And numerous other Stories and Articles of General Interest.

MACMILLAN & Co., Limited, London.

DAVID AND BATHSHUA.

A New Dramatic Poem.

BY

CHARLES WHITWORTH WYNNE.

Demy 8vo, price 5s. net.

EXTRACTS FROM SOME EARLY REVIEWS.

Westminster Review.—"The most noteworthy achievement in the domain of poetic drama that has appeared in England for some years past."

Liverpool Post.—"The passionate intensity of the central scene is portrayed with a vividness of effect, an appreciation of the subtleties of blank verse, and an insight into the potentialities of human nature. . . . The whole spirit of the stanza breathes the fire of King David's passion. . . . Mr. Wynne, in the exquisite lament of Bathshua over her dead child, gives us one of the sweetest lyrics he has yet produced. The whole work is beautifully written and conceived."

Daily Telegraph.—"David and Bathshua" is finely conceived. . . . Mr. Wynne is happiest of all in his versification of the beautiful Psalms of David. . . . The scene between Uriah and his girl-wife is written with rare tenderness, and Nathan's denunciation of David has the true prophetic fire."

Yorkshire Post.—"David and Bathshua" is a distinct advance on the poet's previous work. . . . The incidents of David's first meeting with Uriah's wife and the sequel to his overmastering passion are treated with reticence and strength. Here and there are passages of great dramatic power and beauty."

Scotsman.—"The work is conceived with a fine richness of imagination, and comes out in clear, musical, and glowing language. It is the strongest thing that has yet come from its author's pen, and cannot but noticeably enhance his reputation, while it will be read with admiration by everyone interested in withstanding the existing tendency to a divorce betwixt poetry and the drama."

Court Circular.—"This drama cannot fail to add to the already considerable reputation of Mr. Wynne."

LONDON: KEGAN PAUL, TRENCH,
TRÜBNER & Co., Limited;

Paternoster House, Charing Cross Road.

Removing on June 30th to

DRYDEN HOUSE, 43, GERRARD STREET, SOHO.

SMITH, ELDER & Co.'s NEW BOOKS.

DAILY NEWS.—"CERTAINLY ONE OF THE MOST INTERESTING BOOKS OF THE YEAR."

With Portraits and Illustrations, demy 8vo, 14/- net.

Sir HENRY WENTWORTH

ACLAND, Bart., K.C.B., F.R.S.,

Regius Professor of Medicine in the University of Oxford. A MEMOIR.

By J. B. ATLAY, Barrister-at-Law, late Scholar of Oriel College, Oxford, Author of "Lord Cochrane's Trial before Lord Ellenborough in 1814."

STANDARD.—"Mr. J. B. Atlay has avoided the needless multiplication of little details—a common failing of most biographers. In about 400 octavo pages printed in excellent type, he has told the story of a busy life without quoting commonplace correspondence or dwelling on trivial incidents, and thus has given us a graphic picture of a very interesting man."

DAILY CHRONICLE.—"A singularly genial and attractive personality, whose large spirit of tolerance and wide sympathies won him a host of friends and admirers."

AN ACCOUNT OF TRAVEL IN THE NORTHERN SAHARA.

With 41 Illustrations and a Map, demy 8vo, 12/6.

A SEARCH FOR THE MASKED TAWAREKS.

By W. J. HARDING KING, M.R.A.S., F.R.G.S.

CHOTA NAGPORE: A Little Known Province of the Empire.

By F. B. BRADLEY-BIRT, B.A. (Oxon.),
F.R.G.S., I.C.S. With an Introduction by the Right Hon. the EARL OF NORTHBROOK, G.C.S.I., sometime Viceroy of India. With a Map and 40 Full-page Illustrations, demy 8vo, 12/6 net.

ST. JAMES'S GAZETTE.—"Mr. Bradley-Birt's description of the country is one of the most fascinating stories it has been our good fortune to read for some time. The tale of the country's life is composed of all sorts of quaint ceremonies."

LETTERS OF A DIPLOMAT'S WIFE.

By MARY KING WADDINGTON. Illustrated with Portraits, Views, &c., 8vo, 10/6 net.

ATHENÆUM.—"A most interesting book of gossip, which, considered from the point of view of the general public, contains not a dull line from the first to the last. . . . A book which thoroughly deserves the success which it will undoubtedly obtain."

Miss Dora Greenwell McChesney's New Novel.

At all Libraries and Booksellers'. Crown 8vo, 6/-

LONDON ROSES: An Idyll of the British Museum.

By DORA GREENWELL MCCHESNEY, Author of "Orrnet Street of Ireton's Horse," "Rupert by the Grace of God," &c.

New Novel by Miss Susan Christian.

At all Libraries and Booksellers'. Crown 8vo, 6/-

ARDINA DORAN.

By SUSAN CHRISTIAN, Author of "An Island Ferry."

London: SMITH, ELDER and Co.,

15, Waterloo Place, S.W.

The Academy and Literature.

No. 1625. Established 1869. London: 27 June 1903.

Price Threepence.

[Registered as a Newspaper in the United Kingdom, and at the New York Post Office as Second-class Mail matter. Foreign Subscribers, 17/6 a year.]

THE LITERARY WEEK 623

REVIEWS.

English Literature: an Illustrated Record 627
A Literary History of Scotland 628
The Life and Letters of Sir George Grove, C.B. 629
The Descent of the Sun 630
Flodden Field, A Tragedy 631
Two Lectures on the Science of Language 632

SHORT NOTICES:

The Works of Sir Lewis Morris—Songs of Dreams—Elizabeth's Children .. 633

FICTION:

Questionable Shapes—The Mannerings 633

Notes on the Week's Novels 634

ARTICLES.

EXUBERANCE 625
The Ways of Criticism 636
Fun and Folly 637
Impressions—XXXVIII. The Way Home 638

DRAMA:

The Promise of Mr. Davies. E. K. Chambers 639

ART:

A Book and Some Pictures. C. L. H. 639

SCIENCE:

Racial Decay. C. W. Saleeby 641

CORRESPONDENCE:

"On the best Prose Style" 642
"The Last of It?" 642

WEEKLY COMPETITION:

Brief Essay which best succeeds in getting away from its subject .. 642

The Literary Week.

WE have received since our last issue thirty-five new works, eleven new editions, and fourteen volumes of fiction. Among the publications of the past week we note the following:—

THE CAMBRIDGE MODERN HISTORY. Volume VII.

The general subject of this seventh volume is the United States. It also narrates the history of Canada, of the French and English colonies connected with it, from their discovery down to the time when Canada passed under the British Crown; secondly, the history of the English Colonies in North America from their origin to the Declaration of Independence; and finally, the history of these colonies, after they had become the United States, from 1776 down to the present day.

HENRY ACLAND: A MEMOIR. By J. B. Atlay.

Sir Henry Acland, at his death, left a great accumulation of private correspondence relating to the subjects which had interested him during a long and active life. To these letters the author has had access. Mr. Atlay divides his biography of the late Oxford Regius Professor of Medicine into sixteen chapters. Such names as those of Owen and Huxley, Ruskin and Gladstone, appear in connection with matters which affected the many-sided subject of the memoir. The volume has six illustrations, including a reproduction of a water-colour drawing by Sir Henry Acland made on board H.M.S. "Volage." For frontispiece there is an appropriate portrait of Acland in yachting oilskins.

A SEARCH FOR THE MASKED TAWAREKS. By W. J. Harding King.

The word "Tawarek" means "God-forsaken," and it was applied to the nomads, with whom Mr. King's book deals, on account of their impious character. These Saharan raiders are mysterious and elusive; though they inhabit a territory about the same size as Russia, and are almost as near to England, hardly any Englishmen have even heard their name. The author has collected some of his material from the writings of certain French authors, but much was gathered from the natives themselves. The volume has a number of interesting illustrations and a map.

THE controversy concerning "The Letters of Dorothy Osborne" has been followed by the reissue of Judge Parry's book. It will be remembered that this was originally published in 1888. In a new preface Judge Parry tells us that he has made no effort to print the actual text of the letters, adding that the translation here put forward "would probably not be adopted by another editor, who would naturally prefer his own phrasing and punctuation." The arrangement and dating of the Letters vary somewhat from those of the earlier editions.

THE encyclopædic spirit has reached journalism. We are to have shortly an "International Encyclopædia of Journalism," under the joint editorship of Mr. William Hill, of the "Westminster Gazette," Mr. Alfred Harmsworth, of the "Daily Mail," and Mr. Maurice Ernst, of the "Neues Wiener Tagblatt." The work will be written in English, but it is to describe the origin and development of journalism in all countries. There are to be special articles on editing, sub-editing, news-collecting, ownership, general management, and so forth, and by way of lightening the pages we are promised character-sketches of eminent journalists. This new encyclopædic venture appears to be another of the short cuts to knowledge which are becoming the vogue nowadays.

THE author of "Wee MacGreegor" has just published a little book called "Ethel." There does not appear to be any dialect in the story, which is prettily sentimental. There is a picture of Ethel on the cover.

THE New York "Lamp" prints a sympathetic article on the late Mr. R. H. Stoddard by one who knew him well. Stoddard was of the old school, both of manners and literature; he loved books and disliked the distractions of society. He had known many men of note—Bayard Taylor, Poe, Hawthorne, and a score of others—and of those he loved to talk even to the last. He was always buoyant and youthful. A few years ago he wrote to a friend:—

I go to the hospital to-morrow to have my second cataract removed, and I hope to be out in three or four weeks; at least I have the doctor's opinion to that effect. It's lucky, isn't it, that I am not Argus? Think of not seeing anything as it should be seen, and of a hundred eyes, and the calamity of having each one of them peeled at one time or another.

His old age was darkened, but still was not without serenity and hope. The writer of the article says:—

How bravely Mr. Stoddard bore himself in those closing years is known only to a few. The premature death of his brilliant son left the aged poet and his wife, "that woman of strange, impassioned genius," sitting beside a hearth where the fire had gone out forever. But there was no self-pity or despair. "Baffled, not beaten!" was his answer to a friend who came to him soon after Lorimer's death, and this was the key-note of the mood in which he waited death after the passing of his wife. The courage inherited from a race of New England sailors, and shown in his steadfast allegiance to his ideals, remained with him to the end, and he met death without question and without a trace of fear.

In the current issue of the "Magazine of Art" Mr. Spielmann continues his discussion of "Art Forgeries and Counterfeits." Siena, says Mr. Spielmann, is the headquarters of gesso duro, or plaster, counterfeits, but as a rule the trade is carried on there without any definite idea of fraud. The imitations are often admirably executed, but they are usually sold as imitations. But what of the people who buy these imitations, take them home, and exhibit them as genuine? That is where the real difficulty comes in. No doubt much of the trouble nowadays over the genuineness of art treasures springs directly from the foolish vanity of people who had not the courage to call things by their right names.

THE Secretary of the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings recently visited Stratford-on-Avon with a member of the society's committee, for the purpose of reporting on the proposed site for the free library in Henley Street. In the report just presented the authors say, concerning the old houses known as the China Shop, which are to be used for the purpose of the library:—

We consider that the old houses are well worthy of careful preservation from their intrinsic interest of age, and that undoubtedly such buildings would be more likely to be permanently preserved if regularly used and occupied, which seems to have been only partially the case for some years. It is certain, however, if the houses can no longer be retained for their original domestic use, that in adapting them to the purpose of a library the modern brick front must be so extensively altered that its present character would cease to exist.

The writers come to the conclusion that if the buildings are to be used for a library a new front must be erected, and they consider it desirable that this new front should be of timber.

THERE is now in existence a Society of Masquers. The object of the society is to give performances of plays, masques, ballets, and ceremonies, and to produce only such works as convey a sentiment of beauty. One of its chief endeavours will be to bring the stage back again to that beauty of appropriate simplicity in the presentation of a play which will liberate the attention of an audience for the words of a writer and the movements of an actor. Among the plays, &c., from which a first choice will be made, are:—

Marlowe: "The Tragical History of Dr. Faustus."
 Congreve: "The Way of the World."
 Ford: "The Broken Heart."
 Euripides: "Hippolytus," translated by Prof. Gilbert Murray.
 Sophocles: "Oedipus Tyrannus," translated by Sir Richard Jebb.
 Alfred de Musset: "Fantasio."
 Villiers de l'Isle Adam: "La Révolte."
 Ibsen: "Peer Gynt."
 Maeterlinck: "Les Aveugles."
 A Ballet by Rameau.
 Purcell's "Masque of Love."

It is also proposed to present plays and masques by d'Annunzio, Robert Bridges, W. B. Yeats, Gordon Craig, and others.

WHEREVER Canon Rawnsley may be we are sure of sonnets. We envy him the delight he must get from the writing of them. The other day, on his arrival at Lucerne, he had a sonnet ready for the local paper, which the local paper printed with joy, and on his way to Lucerne he had rendered a like service to Beatenberg.

MR. OWEN SEAMAN in this week's "Punch" lays his whip across the shoulders of the literary parasite. We all know the literary parasite; he is always with us, and always unmistakeable. Mr. Seaman touches him off thus:—

He lives within the public eye
 Immune from all investigation
 Of how he came to occupy
 That eligible habitation;
 I hear of no accomplished feat
 From which he takes the rank of writer,
 Yet almost everywhere you meet
 The name of Mr. Bertram Blighter.

His novel, "Neath a Woman's Spell,"
 His book of poems, "Past Repealing,"
 Those jeux d'esprit, "Half-hours in Hell,"
 That trifle, "Round my Study Ceiling"—
 All these are in a harmless vein
 And leave suburban bosoms lighter,
 But cannot possibly explain
 The splendid vogue of Bertram Blighter.

A moon amid refulgent orbs,
 A bee among a bed of roses,
 Their light and sweetness he absorbs
 And as his own elsewhere imposes;
 So, swarming up the rungs of fame
 With ever surer grasp and tighter,
 He bears his undisputed claim
 To be "the well-known Bertram Blighter."

But all the satire in the world will never affect the literary parasite.

THE armchairs in the French Academy left vacant by MM. Gaston Paris and Ernest Legouvé have been filled by the election of M. Frederic Masson and M. René Bazin—an historian and a novelist. At the election there were some notable absentees. M. Sardou was suffering from what is vaguely described as "inflammation," and M. Rostand was down with influenza. M. Ludovic Halévy was also absent.

A PLEASANT little booklet called "Sir Walter Scott and his Country," reaches us from Edinburgh. In the main it is a summary of what we already know, but there is one passage which has a personal interest. The writer came across an old man who had known Sir Walter :—

"Ay," he minded Sir Walter fine. "I seen him driving out in his carriage and pair, wi' Tom Purdie on the box-seat. He had on a shepherd's tartan plaid, and a glengarry cap wi' twa black ribbons hanging doon the back. I mind his dowg tae, Maida he ca'd it, and an awfu' work he made ower the beast! But he was as pleasant a man as you could speak to, though he wasna thought muckle of as a pleader, when they made him Shirra o' Selkirk. Is it his buiks you're speiring on? Ou ay, ye'll find a' his buiks ben the hoose."

LIEUTENANT SHACKLETON's narrative, "Furthest South with the 'Discovery,'" has been acquired for immediate publication by the "Illustrated London News." The pictures which Lieutenant Shackleton has brought home are of considerable interest, and include a photograph of the most southerly point ever attained by man, and many typical scenes of the explorer's hazardous life in the Antarctic regions.

THE cheap reissue of "An Englishwoman's Love-Letters" has a new preface. We cannot see that any new preface was called for, particularly one so unilluminating as this: it strikes us, though we may be wrong, as merely a sop to the curious. The author now lifts the veil to the following purpose :—

Many have sought to know the name of the lady whose character they find so vividly suggested by her own letters, and there is no reason now why a fairly legitimate curiosity should not be gratified. Esther Marion Foley is the full name—one part of which observant readers may have guessed from the reference to "Ahasuerus" at the close of Letter Fifty,—the letter containing the postscript which was no postscript.

Those who wish to know more of her nature than is shown by these letters, may find some trace of it in her kinswoman, Doris Foley, playfellow and aunt to "the Modern Anteus," who so resolutely concealed her own tragedy from the world she was destined so soon to quit. They will not then make the mistake which some have made, of thinking that Esther Foley revealed anything in her life of the feeling which her last letters expressed.

FORDHOOK, near Ealing, once the residence of Fielding, is the last of the historic houses of Ealing to fall a victim to the builder. Fordhook was once the English residence of the author of "Tom Jones," he having lived there before he started on his memorable voyage to Lisbon. When we remember the outcry that was made a year or two ago against the destruction of Hogarth's house at Chiswick, it is curious that the recent destruction of Fielding's house has passed unnoticed even by the local press.

THE indefatigable Mr. Raymond Blathwayt has been interviewing Mr. Watts-Dunton for "Great Thoughts." The talk, naturally, was of "Aylwin" and gypsies. Mr. Watts-Dunton insisted that he had not idealised the gypsy character. Sinf and Rhona, he said, were actual types of gypsy women. We find it difficult to understand why people should be so eager to be assured of the genuineness of individual characters; so long as they are vital and alive the narrow question of portraiture should not come in. Yet even so genuine an artist as the late Jean Ingelow urged Mr. Watts-Dunton to tell her whether Rhona Boswell was a real woman.

A CORRESPONDENT of "Notes and Queries," gives a version of "The Three Ravens" which he took down from a recitation in 1859. The writer's father had it from an old farmer who was quite ignorant of reading. This farmer said that when he was young it was often sung at sheep-clippings, harvest-suppers, and the like. He also asserted that the scene of the story was a grass close adjoining the river Eau, near a deep pool called the Slaughter Hole. But no doubt this Lincolnshire version of the ballad was associated with the place quite without reference to facts :—

There were three ravens in a tree,
As black as any jet could be.

A down a derry down.

Says the middlemost raven to his mate,
Where shall we go to get ought to eat?

It's down in yonder grass green field,
There lies a squire dead and kill'd,
His horse all standing by his side,
Thinking he'll get up and ride;
His hounds all standing at his feet,
Licking his wounds that run so deep.

There comes a lady full of woe,
As big wi' bairn as she can go;
She lifted up his bloody head
And kiss'd his lips that were so red.
She laid her down all by his side
And for the love of him she died.

"The Twa Corbies" version is, of course, much finer, both poetically and dramatically; but this almost first-hand record is very interesting.

It is satisfactory to hear that Mr. Arthur Evans is not to conduct his further excavations at Knossos entirely at his own cost. An anonymous donor has contributed £1,000 towards the completion of the work, and various smaller sums have been subscribed.

THE New York "Nation," reviewing Mr. George Gissing's "The Private Papers of Henry Ryecroft," takes rather a new point of view. We do not say that we agree with that point of view, but it is perfectly legitimate, and well expressed by the "Nation" critic. He says of the "Private Papers" :—

They are interesting and valuable for frank expression of unpopular truths, but still more, to some interpreting minds, for a naïve revelation of abysmal selfishness which Mr. Ryecroft (who looks like Mr. Gissing in thin disguise) seems hardly ever to have recognised as a possible constituent of his make-up. . . . Writing about his lack of friends during his very hard times, he remarks: "The truth is, I have never learnt to regard myself as a member of society. For me there have always been two entities—myself and the world—and the normal relation between these two has been hostile." But the consistency of Ryecroft's illusions is not often marred by such reflection. All his thoughts and opinions express the man who has cared only and cared profoundly for himself, relied on his own judgment, his own point of view, receiving nothing from the life around him, and giving it neither understanding nor sympathy. If that is the sort of man Mr. Gissing meant to delineate, he has done him with scrupulous fidelity. Such persons have a certain pathos, because, while they cry with truth that life has yielded nothing but stones, they cannot believe that it is because they never knew how to ask for bread.

THE second issue of "The House Beautiful" contains eight plates of various sorts, ranging from a design for a warehouse to a design for an ante-room. The plates are all printed in Stuttgart, and only one of the designs is by an Englishman. We almost scent a continental decorative invasion.

WE have this week to record two deaths, that of Mrs. E. T. Cook and that of Mr. Henry Pugh. Mrs. Cook was closely associated with journalism for many years, being the wife of Mr. E. T. Cook, sometime editor of the "Pall Mall Gazette," the "Westminster Gazette," and the "Daily News." Mrs. Cook was a regular contributor to the magazines; of her books the best known are "The Bride's Book" and "London Highways and Byways." She had a very real affection for London, and there appears only this week in "Men and Women" an article by her called "Piccadilly Memories." This, we believe, was the last article she wrote.

Mr. HENRY PUGH, whose death occurred in Paris, has been for the past seven years Paris correspondent of the "Referee" and other journals. At one time Mr. Pugh was well known in London; in the early life of "To-day" he had assisted Mr. Jerome. He knew Paris thoroughly, and made it his business to keep in touch with all that was afoot there. He had a wide knowledge of the French stage, was a good critic, and had a strong grip of politics. He died of a wasting illness which would have made many men incapable of work, but he kept bright to the end and wrote with his accustomed cheerfulness and regularity.

Bibliographical.

VERY welcome will be the little collection of George Darley's verses on which, it is understood, Mr. R. A. Streatfield is engaged for Messrs. Methuen. I presume the selection will be confined to the poet's lyrical pieces. Mr. J. H. Ingram reprinted "Sylvia, or the May Queen" (with a biographical introduction) in 1892, and Mr. Streatfield himself reproduced "Nepenthe" in 1897. The lyrics will now be very acceptable. It will be remembered that a volume of "Poems of the late George Darley" was printed for private circulation in 1891. It would be very pleasant if we could have the "Complete Works" of George Darley, including all his published verse and prose—"Ethelstan," and "A Becket," and the rest. For that, however, there would be but a small public. One thing I do hope, and that is that Mr. Streatfield may be able, in his introduction, to answer once for all the question whether Darley was the author of the play called "Plighted Troth" produced unsuccessfully by Macready in 1842. The actor, in his diary, mentions "Mr. Darley," omitting the Christian name. The point is of no great consequence, of course, but one likes these little mysteries to be cleared up.

I note that Mr. Grant Richards's reprint of Dryden's Virgil in the "World's Classics" is described as "Vol. I." of "The Works of John Dryden." Is it too much to hope that among those "Works," Mr. Richards will include at least a selection from Dryden's plays, which, so far as I know, are not at present obtainable in any form? It has always appeared singular that Dryden's plays were not represented in the otherwise interesting "Mermaid" series.

It is pleasant to know that Mr. E. V. Lucas is about to present us with a reprint of the poems for children which we owe to Ann and Jane Taylor. Nearly twenty years ago there came from Boston, U.S.A., a collection of the "Tales, Essays, and Poems" of these ladies, with a memoir of them by G. A. Oliver. But Mr. Lucas, I gather, will not attempt anything so elaborate. Messrs. Routledge reprinted the "Rhymes for the Nursery" in 1886; since then, apparently, Ann and Jane Taylor have been neglected. Between 1881 and 1883 Messrs. Nelson republished a few of their writings "for infant minds," and in 1884 the same firm brought out the "Life and Letters" of Jane. In 1883, too, Kate Greenaway illustrated the Taylors' "Little Ann and Other Poems." All this, however, is almost ancient history.

The late Mr. T. W. Allies, who was born in 1813, continued his literary labours up to 1890, when, in his seventy-seventh year, he published "Peter's Rock in Mohammed's Flood." Prior to that had come "The Holy See and the Wandering of the Nations" (1888), "The Throne of the Fisherman Built by the Carpenter's Son" (1887), and "Church and State as Seen in the Foundation of Christendom" (1882). Four of Mr. Allies' earlier works were reprinted during the 'nineties. "The See of St. Peter," originally produced in 1850, was reproduced in 1896; "St. Peter, his Name and Office" (1852) in 1895, "The Formation of Christendom" (1865-75) in 1897-98, and "A Life's Decision" (1880) in 1894. The Church to which he 'verted in 1850 can have had no more zealous or voluminous propagandist.

That Mr. Laurence Hutton should have given us a work on "The Literary Landmarks of Oxford" is not at all surprising. This fertile American writer has apparently taken under his protection the literary landmarks of the world. His "Literary Landmarks of London" came out in 1885, and was re-issued in 1888 and also in 1892. In 1891 came "The Literary Landmarks of Edinburgh," and Mr. Hutton dealt similarly with Jerusalem in 1895, and with Rome and with Florence in 1897. He takes a great interest in the drama, and his works on Edwin Booth and the "Curiosities of the American Stage" have both been published in this country.

With reference to one-volume editions of Lamb's Works, a correspondent at Carlisle reminds me of that which was edited by Mr. Charles Kent and published by the Routledges. I presume the book referred to is the "Poetical and Dramatic Tales, Essays, and Criticisms" of Lamb issued in 1889. Whether this is "in print" or not I do not know, but I imagine that it had not the completeness of the edition sent out by Messrs. Chatto in 1892 and again in 1897, for that included the "Poetry for Children" and "Prince Dorus." We shall see what Messrs. Newnes do for us in this respect in their promised edition.

The prospect of a volume of the private correspondence of the late Earl of Lytton—covering, it would appear, the years in which he was best known as "Owen Meredith"—certainly has its attractions. Even those who have least admiration for Robert Lytton would be ready, I suppose, to admit that, like old Eccles in the opinion of his daughter Polly, "He was a very clever man." There was, indeed, a day when "Owen Meredith," as a poet, was a power in the reading world, and even so lately as 1890 a publishing firm thought it worth its while to re-issue his "Poems" in a cheap and handy form. Nay, if I remember rightly, Lord Lytton's "Marah" was issued in 1892 as "by Owen Meredith." The year 1893 saw the publication of new editions both of "Lucile" and of "The Wanderer," and the former of these bids fair to carry its author's name and fame farther than such efforts as "Glenaveril" (1885), "The Ring of Amasis" (1890), "King Poppy" (1892), and so forth. And a few of the Lyrics signed "Owen Meredith" may perhaps go even further down the stream of time than "Lucile."

Those who know the forthcoming "Chiswick" edition of Landor's "Pericles and Aspasia" to be quite out of their reach may console themselves. In May 1890 Messrs. Dent issued the work in two volumes with etchings, and a few months later Messrs. Walter Scott produced a little shilling edition. No doubt both of these publications are still in the market, and the latter appeals to the least well-furnished purses.

THE BOOKWORM.

Reviews.

English Literature Illustrated.

ENGLISH LITERATURE: AN ILLUSTRATED RECORD. By Richard Garnett and Edmund Gosse. Vols. I., III. (Heinemann.)

THIS book is a disappointment, although, if the paradox may be permitted, it is a disappointment which we had fully expected. We remember how, a year or two ago, Prof. Dowden called attention to the admirable "Histoire de la Langue et de la Litterature Française," which had recently been completed by a number of French writers working under the direction of the late M. Petit de Julleville, and pressed upon English scholars the desirability of producing, by the method of collaboration, just such a delightful, erudite, authoritative work upon the history of our own tongue and our own literature. It seemed possible that the discussion upon Prof. Dowden's proposal might yield some fruition, when it was cut short by the announcement of a publisher that the important task had already been undertaken by Dr. Garnett and Dr. Gosse, and that the first instalment of their labours might be expected before many years were out. Well, the intimation was not altogether reassuring. Dr. Garnett, although a versatile writer and excellent librarian, was not known to have the knowledge of a specialist upon any branch of English literature in particular; and while Dr. Gosse might reasonably have been asked to contribute a chapter, say, upon the "metaphysical" poets or the Restoration dramatists to such a work as was hoped for, it seemed improbable that the width and accuracy of his learning would prove to be such as would adequately meet the demands that were apparently to be made upon it. In fact, no two writers, however conscientious and however well equipped, could possibly hope to do for English literature what it had taken a score or two to do for French. The whole essence of M. Petit de Julleville's enterprise lay in the fact that it was a work of collaboration, the production of a number of specialists, each writing of what he knew at first hand and more intimately than any other man. To take the first two volumes only, M. Petit de Julleville himself was the greatest living authority on the French mediæval drama, M. Jeanroy on mediæval lyric poetry, M. Leon Gautier on the chansons de gestes, M. Bédier on the fabliaux; and these and many others brought the mature results of their researches to this incomparable compilation. Did anybody seriously expect from Dr. Garnett and Dr. Gosse an equivalent to this? If they did, we fear they will be woefully disillusioned. The two volumes before us form half the contemplated work. The first, by Dr. Garnett, extends from the beginning of English literature to the reign of Henry VIII.; the second, or rather the third, by Dr. Gosse, begins with Milton and ends with Johnson. They are neither specialist nor authoritative, but merely add, so far as the text goes, to the very considerable number of popular manuals and narratives of literary history which have been poured out without stint during recent years. In saying this we do not wish to depreciate them unduly. They are good enough of their kind. Dr. Garnett's summary of the mediæval period, although obviously not depending upon first-hand research, is competent and careful. Dr. Gosse is the finer critic and the more original writer, but he is terribly handicapped by the necessity of constantly breaking off his chronicle to insert biographies of and extracts from individual writers in a smaller type. Moreover he has already gone over much of his ground at least twice, in his "Short History of Modern English Literature" of 1897, and either in his "The Jacobean Poets" of 1894, his "From Shakespeare to Pope" of 1885, or his "History of Eighteenth Century Literature" of 1889.

It will be claimed, we suppose, that the novelty and the individuality of the book lie less in the text than in the illustrations with which it is liberally provided. Says Mr. Heinemann:—

The design of the publisher of this work has been to produce a book which shall stimulate and gratify curiosity concerning the leading authors of our country and the evolution of its literary history. This curiosity is not to be confined within the limits of an acquaintance with a few dry manuals. It appeals to the eye as well as to the ear, and as the reader becomes attracted to the writings of this or that writer, and feels his enthusiasm enkindled, he desires to know, and to know instantly and without disturbance, not only who the writer was and what he wrote, but what he looked like, perhaps at various ages; where he lived, what his handwriting was, and how he appeared in caricature to his contemporaries.

No effort has been spared to satisfy the very natural and laudable curiosity to which Mr. Heinemann refers. Illustrations, many of them reproduced in colours, have been gathered together from all conceivable sources, at the rate of about one to a page. The ingenuity and industry bestowed upon this branch of the publisher's enterprise must have been enormous. We wish we could feel that it has been wholly profitable. Certainly the method of the object-lesson is by now established in almost every branch of study. It is recognised that the senses, and especially the sense of sight, are the channels through which the memory and the imagination may most vividly and permanently be stimulated. But clearly the method is not of equal importance in every study. In the natural sciences, dealing as they do with sensible and visual facts, it is of course indispensable. Its value in connection with social history, which is called upon at every moment to reconstruct the actual physical appearance of the past, is fully recognised in such books as the illustrated edition of J. R. Green's "Short History of the English People," or Mr. F. P. Barnard's more recent "Companion to English History." But it must be admitted that when one comes to literary history, which, after all, is concerned less with palpable facts than with formless and invisible ideas and emotions, it is distinctly less applicable. The authentic portrait of an author helps, no doubt, to interpret his work; perhaps also the presentment of the landscape or the buildings amongst which he lived; or such contemporary illustrations as the drawings of Canterbury pilgrims here given from some of the manuscripts of Chaucer's "Tales." But is one really taken much further by innumerable reproductions of pages of text from manuscripts which are in many cases not in the handwriting of the author at all, but in that of some scribe, or of printed title-pages which really throw little light on anything but the trade conventions of ancient and not particularly artistic printing-houses? Some of the material gathered together in these volumes is open to more specific criticism. The work is intended for the general reader, who is presumably not acquainted either with mediæval Latin or with Anglo-Saxon, or with Middle English, at least in their scribal forms. What then is he expected to make of a page of manuscript text written in one or other of these tongues, if it is offered to him without translation or even transliteration of its contents? A page from the "Vercelli Book," a page from the "Ancren Riwe," a page from Layamon's "Brut"—these are very amusing for the scholar to turn over, but we cannot persuade ourselves that the "general reader" for whom Dr. Garnett and Dr. Gosse principally cater will do very much but gape unstructedly at them. It must also be remembered that the illustrations add considerably to the cost of the book, and that the glazed paper on which they have to be printed adds considerably to its weight. We rather doubt whether the "general reader" would be inclined, or if he were inclined, would be wise, to pay £3 for a bulky work which he can hardly consult without sitting up to a table, when for a few shillings he can slip into his pocket any one of half a dozen treatises on the same subject, quite as well informed and quite as well written, only minus the illustrations. Meanwhile, of course, we do not get, and do not seem to be on the way to getting our authoritative history of literature, written by the collaboration of specialists, of which there is really a very great need. Perhaps, now that he has stood aside so long, to give Dr. Garnett and Dr. Gosse their chance, Prof. Dowden will again contemplate the possibility of getting the specialists around him.

Scots Literature, Past and Present.

A LITERARY HISTORY OF SCOTLAND. By J. H. Millar. (Fisher Unwin. 16s.)

AFTER studying this book one's chief feeling is amazement at the industry of which it is the result. Even to read the many works of which it is a survey would seem to be the work of a lifetime. The volume begins with the poetry of 1301, and closes with the prose of to-day. Here and there, it is true, Mr. Millar comes upon a man of letters with whose works, as he frankly confesses, he is only in parts acquainted; yet there cannot be much doubt as to the character of his investigations. In respect to all the very great Scotsmen who are distinguished in literature, his criticism is at first hand thorough. Also, it is a faithful fulfilment of the promise in the title of his book. Mr. Millar has not dealt with the literature of Scotland merely. He has dealt with it in relation to Scotland in its social, political, and ecclesiastical developments. Thus his work is in a very real sense the "literary history" which it professes to be. In the chapters on Early Poetry, the Golden Age of Poetry, the Prose of the Reformation, the Ballads, the Poets, Divines, and Historians of the Seventeenth Century, and the Prose of the Augustan Age, Mr. Millar, it is obvious, has not infrequently dealt with his materials as prepared for him by earlier critics and biographers; but that is not exactly to say that his work is second-hand. Among the other peculiarities which make it markedly individual among the nations, Scotland has always had the quality of being actively literary. In cottage and manor, in the tap-room and the palace, her people display, and have constantly displayed, a familiarity with the racial poetry and prose which has no equivalent in England. This is not a superficial parrot-like knowledge. It is living and critical. Not only has it oral prevalence: it is also enshrined in admirable biographies of the notable Scots writers individually. To find the explanation is very difficult. If we may judge from an idea that recurs occasionally throughout his book, Mr. Millar thinks that the literary instinct, which is so strong in the Scots nature, is an unconscious artistry. Mr. Freeman seemed to believe that, the Scots vernacular being "the purest surviving form of English," Scotland, at the general dawn of the self-conscious or literary age, started in the race at an advantage. Our own belief is that, whilst neither Mr. Millar nor Mr. Freeman is wholly wrong, there is another and larger explanation. It is that Scotland shines in literature from precisely the same causes which obliged her to shine in war and in statesmanship. For at least two centuries after England had settled down into social and political prosperity, Scotland, less favoured by nature in the matter of economic conditions, was a country of poverty and struggle for the primary necessities of life. Thus, while Englishmen have for many generations been resting content in rather lazy middle-class gentility, the Scots, in constant training, have been pressing forward in all the arts of war and peace.

But there are some signs that the Scots have reached the zenith of their greatness in literature. Mr. Millar does not say so specifically; but incidentally he lets fall certain remarks which his countrymen will interpret, sadly, as meaning much more than they say. In closing his essay on Burns he says that, "though vigorous attempts have been made to galvanise the muse into the semblance of life, it is plain to all with an eye to see or an ear to hear that she is as dead as dead can be; and it seems a tolerably safe prophecy to predict that no fruit worth the trouble of picking and preserving will now ever be yielded by the fertile and long-lived national tradition which was summed up and perfected in Robert Burns." Similarly, we read of Scott that—take him all in all, he is, perhaps, the greatest unconscious artist in literature that the world has seen since Homer. Not that he was unaware when his day's task had come "twangingly off," but that he achieved his results, both in poetry and prose, with rapidity and ease, writing "as the spirit moved him" out of the fullness of an everflowing imagination, with no pauses for the discovery of the mot propre, or for the elaboration of those refinements to which a more self-conscious artist instinctively turns. His fame, which, perhaps, suffered a slight obscuration during the middle of the Victorian Era, has once more emerged into the full blaze of noonday; and the opinion of competent judges appears to be gradually tending towards the view which regards him as the most conspicuous and important figure in the annals of European literature in the nineteenth century.

It is not difficult to perceive that, just as Sir Walter was an unconscious artist, Mr. Millar is here an unconscious critic, and that implicit in his praise of the Wizard is sorrowful condemnation of those who have sought to wear his mantle. Not even Stevenson, master of technique as he was, wholly pleases him:—

It is rash to draw a hard-and-fast line between things so intimately connected as form and matter; but it seems not unjust to say that for Stevenson the effort came to be, not to find appropriate language for a superabundance of ideas, but to find ideas to be clothed in the exquisitely appropriate language which he had ever at command. No writer in our time—not even Mr. Pater—has had an ear like his for the rhythms and cadences of English prose; and none has been so keenly alive to the virtue of a well-placed polysyllable. "The tumultuary and grey tide of life," "an endless company of attenuated clouds," "the momentous and nugatory gift of life," these three phrases selected at random are illustrations of that keen sense of the value of words and names to which almost every page of his writing bears witness.

Still, there is nearly always something lasting in the work of Stevenson.

To define the missing element is not easy; we may call it backbone, fecundity of imagination, knowledge of life, anything we please, without hitting the true shade of meaning. It seems to correspond in the mental sphere to health and spirits in the physical; and those blessings Mr. Stevenson was doomed to enjoy in very scanty measure. Not that he was morbid in the worst sense of the term. The doctrine he preaches is that of duty and courage, and it was the doctrine which he carried systematically and strenuously into practice. Yet even when he preaches it most forcibly it comes to us with the unmistakable air of the closet, not to say the hot-house.

Having such thoughts about Stevenson, Mr. Millar, it is not astonishing to find, is not at all happy about most of the still more recent novelists of Scotland. In Mr. George Douglas Brown there lay very high hope; there is promise in Mr. Meldrum and in Mr. Neil Munro; but Mr. Millar cannot find happiness in other signs of the times. For a good many years now the circulating libraries "have been charged to overflowing with a crowd of ministers, preachers, and beadles, whose dry and 'pithy' wit had plainly been recruited at the fountain-head of Dean Ramsay; while the land has been plangent with the sobs of grown men, vainly endeavouring to stifle their emotion by an elaborate affectation of 'pecking' and 'boasting.'" Mr. Millar finds the writing of Mr. Crockett crude; but that is a comparatively small fault. "What has seriously to be deplored is the perpetual substitution of gross and meaningless buffoonery for humour, and the presence of a rich vein of essential coarseness. These defects are conspicuous in the 'Lilac Sunbonnet,' a perfect triumph of succulent vulgarity; though how nauseous it is—how skilfully it makes its appeal to some of the worst traits in the national character—no one who is not a Scot can know." "Ian Maclaren" is no better, in the view of Mr. Millar. His is "the slobbering sentiment of the Sabbath, with a dash of gentility." A fairly good beginning was made by Mr. Barrie; but what a falling off was his! "Margaret Ogilvy" is "an exercise compared with which the labours of the resurrectionist are praiseworthy, and which many men (I believe) would rather lose their right hand than set themselves to attempt." In England it may not be easy to understand this violence on the part of Mr. Millar; but we have constantly noticed that his critical attitude is that of many Scotsmen, who, as Mr. Millar puts it, "resent this holding up of their countrymen to the ridicule and contempt of all sane and judicious human beings." In the pages under review the "Celtic revival" fares just as ill. By way of defending the Celt as he really is, Mr. Millar refers us to certain works apart from those that are milestones in the "movement," works in which the Celt "is presented to us as a man and a brother, and not as a moonstruck imbecile." Even as Mr. Henry Drummond, with his "Natural Law in the Spiritual World," which "is a masterpiece of intellectual quackery," was a terrible descent from such philosophers as Hume, Hamilton, and Proctor Alexander, the sentimental romanticists and the maudlin mystics of modern times are so unlike the giants of the old days as to make Mr. Millar fear that the literature of Scotland has run to seed. At any rate, that, we gather, is what he would say if he spoke straight out. Of course, it would not imply that there may not yet be a healthy revival of letters in the North. Mr. Millar's book is, in itself, a portent. He has opinions, and a frank robustious way of uttering them: his style is his own, clear-cut; and even his parenthetical forked-lightning sentences have invariably an onward movement.

A Hero-Worshipper.

THE LIFE AND LETTERS OF SIR GEORGE GROVE, C.B. By Charles L. Graves. (12s. 6d.)

THIS fine old gentleman spent eighty years on earth (1820-1900) and served his fellows and the coming race for the last sixty-five of them. He was not a genius. Prince of all musical amateurs as he was, his technical knowledge was of the smallest. First of all writers upon music, unequalled critic of Beethoven, protagonist of Schubert, he never wrote a bar himself. Heroes and the heroic he worshipped: yet to many whom we call heroes he never bent the knee. Wagner to him was immoral, noisy, insincere: yet he gave a needy student tickets for a Bayreuth festival. He never published condemnation of those whose music he could not appreciate; only in his private letters did adverse verdicts find a place. "I am no critic, bless you, and would rather love than condemn any day of the week." Dvorak's "Stabat Mater" left him untouched; "Tristan and Isolde" grossly displeased him; but he was no dogmatist. "Surely there must be something wrong in me that I cannot admire —," was his way of looking at it. He was no executant; a choral society had claimed him in his youth, and the piano occasionally. Thereafter he was only a listener. He could not read and understand the score of a new work, though he always took a copy of a Beethoven symphony with him to read on his travels. He loved poetry and was a judge of it; but does not appear ever to have written a line. He loved humour, and collected anecdotes and "Limericks" all his days, yet does not seem to have made many or good jokes. The literary faculty—in some degree—he had. Otherwise he created nothing. Yet this man served music and art and thought to such purpose as few have approached. The secret of it was that he was a serious man and a hero-worshipper. In days when the fifth commandment and reverence for age were going out of fashion, when people read Carlyle's lectures for their style and missed their spirit, Grove remained reverent towards the heroic and worshipped it with something of the same quality, so that to-day he earns our homage. For the next best thing to being a hero is assuredly to worship the heroic. Grove, who loved the Bible so intensely, and did so much, in the "Dictionary of the Bible," for its study—Grove, who started the Palestine Exploration Fund (and thereby initiated the movement which finds Dr. Arthur Evans in Crete and Prof. Fürtwangler in Boeotia to-day) was no orthodox theologian. The idea of eternal damnation was revolting to him. None the less, rather the more, had he the worshipping soul, the "attitude of wonder." Nor does everyone praise great men to such high purpose in these days when religion seems to be coming back to its primordial form—still patent in the Celestial Empire—and is resolving itself again into little more than ancestor-worship. Grove was of those who justify and ennoble such a cult—reversion though it be.

We know not whether there is something in the profession of civil engineering which attracts those who are afterwards to become writers. Certainly Mr. Herbert Spencer once owned to that profession, and so did Grove, who spent many an hour of labour over the building of the Britannia bridge across the Menai Straits. Of music in his early days one hears but little, and the reviewer of a later generation who always associates Grove, as well he may, with the Symphonies of Beethoven, reads on wondering when something about music is to appear. For the post of first Director of the Royal College of Music was the last of many occupied—and filled—by this painstaking and enthusiastic man who claimed and fought to retain the "heart of a boy," even when hardening arteries and the consequent inchoate hebetude were presaging the apoplexy which ended his laborious and honourable days. Music was not his first love. Essentially he was in love with everything lovable, a worshipper of everything worthy. But before we pass to some brief account of the results of his worship let us quote one passage which shows a moment of creative inspiration. His one gift—assuming that love and reverence and enthusiasm and discernment are not gifts—was, as we have said, literary. His work was done with the pen, and with it he wrote one passage which was not part of his work, not dealing with Beethoven or Schubert or the topography of Palestine, but which has the indefinable quality which Grove himself so much admired, in both its musical and its literary form:—

What a beautiful experience your morning watch must have been! I love those times and have had many of them. I have often watched the dawn, till I realised so strongly the motion of the earth—heaving round towards the sun, and gradually discovering his light and warmth—that I felt myself, as it were, the only human being standing on the shoulder of the great round world, as it whirled round—and almost seemed to feel my hair being blown back by the breeze caused by the motion.

Copernicus robbed us of the anthropocentric astronomy which put man at the mid-point of all things; but is not that loss just a little compensated for by the notion that mother-earth is consciously and of set purpose revolving that, each in his turn on her shoulder, she may carry her brood to new day in the reviving glance of the sun?

Panegyric alone, however, is best reserved for those whose fine qualities are stamped upon no tangible record of work done. Grove began by building a lighthouse in Jamaica in 1841, and another, three years later, in Bermuda. Then he spent something under a couple of years at Bangor, helping to build the Menai bridge. In 1852 he was appointed secretary to the Crystal Palace, a post which he held for twenty-one years, resigning it in 1873, in order to edit the "Dictionary of Music." Grove's work in relation to the music at the Crystal Palace can hardly be over-estimated for its value to the cause of music in this country, but perhaps its most signal achievement was the evolution of the analytical programme, which every concert-goer considers now-a-days at least as indispensable as his seat. Indeed it seems difficult to imagine what concerts were like before these invaluable aids to the musical intelligence were a commonplace. Thomson, Professor of Music in Edinburgh, seems to have written the first analytical programme in 1840, but to Grove, acting in the first instance on a suggestion of Dr. August Manns, we owe the development of the idea. For upwards of forty seasons Grove contributed the lion's share of the analyses to these programmes at the Crystal Palace, those of the works of Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schubert, Schumann and Brahms being with hardly an exception from his pen. The analyses of the nine Symphonies of Beethoven were later expanded into the admirable and now classic volume which appeared in 1896. It is interesting to learn that, on his first hearing of the Choral Symphony (under Berlioz in 1852), Grove candidly confessed that he "could make very little of it."

An even more signal achievement was the inception of the Palestine Exploration Fund, which was entirely due to Grove. Mr. Graves well says: "To the present generation, Grove is best known as a musical educator, but when one surveys this great work of the scientific reconstruction of the past to which he gave a fresh and electrifying impulse in 1865, one cannot help feeling that he has established a more enduring title to immortality by launching the Palestine Exploration Fund."

Grove's work on the "Dictionary of the Bible" may not count for much to-day in the eyes of those who forget the last stone but one, when the topmost is in its place; but wiser people know better. The despised astrologers and alchemists were the founders of astronomy and chemistry; and Grove's original and patient investigations, carried out in the Holy Land itself, had and have their due worth. So with his fifteen years' editorship of "Macmillan's Magazine," after which we come at last to music, and abundantly. The "Dictionary of Music" everyone knows. There is simply no other in English. Notably in the case of Beethoven, do amateurs owe a lasting debt to Grove. There are thousands of instances, but the performance of the Choral Symphony in London the other week reminds us of one. Grove concluded by inference, from his study of the autograph score, that the Adagio was meant by Beethoven to be succeeded immediately, "as suddenly as possible," by the Presto, whereas the singers generally come on at that place, utterly spoiling the intended effect. Grove pointed this out to Dr. Manns, but without effect; to Richter himself, but unavailingly. To-day, however, the thing is established, and at the last performance in London, Beethoven's intention was fulfilled.

Space fails us to record the success and worth of Grove's directorship of the Royal College of Music. It must have been a privilege to come under his influence there. Two short quotations must find place to illustrate two of this man's three outstanding qualities. His power of work needs no quotation to demonstrate. Apropos of the pleasures of literary creation, he says:—

The only try I ever had at anything of the kind was my David, and I can well recollect that when I got him on to the slope leading down into the valley where Goliath stood roaring, my heart beat so that I could not write.

That for his enthusiasm; and for his hero-worship these: "I had rather be a devotee than a critic any day"; and this tribute from an old pupil: "The qualities which irritated him most in a student were—a casual manner, a slovenly style, and want of reverence for great men."

An Imperishable Idea.

THE DESCENT OF THE SUN. Translated from the Original Manuscript. By F. W. Bain. (Oxford: Parker.)

IN 1899 Mr. F. W. Bain published "A Digit of the Moon," a tale which purported to be a translation made from an original Hindoo MS., which had come into the owner's possession in a somewhat romantic manner. The critics in general were apparently disposed to look upon the work as a genuine translation, and their attitude may be illustrated by a quotation from "Notes and Queries": "We advise, however, every lover of Sanscrit literature to read this delightful product of Oriental imagination, and we would call upon Mr. Bain to give us with the least possible delay the entire work." After a delay of three years and a half, Mr. Bain has responded by publishing another Hindoo love tale, "The Descent of the Sun," which he introduces by the simple statement: "Here is a fairy tale which I found in an old Hindoo manuscript." In spite, however, of his learned notes on its character as a solar myth, and of his philological explanations, we are disposed to think that Mr. Bain is really too modest an author, and that his spiritual assimilation of the beauties and graces of Hindoo poetry has gone so far as to lead him to look upon his own creative faculty as a negligible quantity. We, however, are not disposed to merge Mr. Bain the author absolutely in Mr. Bain the translator, and we are very sceptical as to whether any other "translator's" hand but his could have produced tales so inherently beautiful as "A Digit of the Moon" and "The Descent of the Sun." In fact, though the material, the colouring, and the texture and the pattern of the fabric he has so cunningly woven are Indian, the hand of the artist designer is the hand of a European. Let us transcribe a passage from the love tale:—

Then Anushayini said slowly: "Dear husband, thou wert angry, and therefore indiscreet, and I fear lest by doing evil we may bring on ourselves punishment. . . . There is sin and danger in this rash experiment. . . ." But as she spoke her eyes rested on Kamalamitra, and bewildered him, and destroyed the persuasion of her words. For he heard nothing that she said, but was full of the blindness of passion, and more than ever convinced of the omnipotence of her beauty. And so, seeing that she could not turn him from his will, Anushayini gave in and yielded to him as to her deity. Nay, in the interior of her heart she rejoiced to find that she could not dissuade him, for she was filled with curiosity herself, to see whether in truth her beauty would prevail over the ascetic, though she trembled for the consequences. Alas! where beauty, and curiosity, and youth, and self-will, and intoxication combine, like a mad elephant, where is the cotton thread of self-control?

Then these two lovers kissed each other passionately, like travellers who have been separated for a year. And yet they knew not that they were doing so for the last time. And then they went together to the forest to find that old ascetic. And hand-in-hand they rambled about, like a pair of Love's arrows in human form, till they penetrated to the very heart of that wood. And there on a sudden they came upon that old sage, and saw him standing, plunged in meditation, motionless as a tree. And round him the ants had built up their hills, and his beard and hair trailed from his head, like creepers, and ran down along the ground, and were covered with leaves: and over his withered limbs played a pair of lizards, like living emeralds. And he looked straight before him, with great eyes that mirrored everything, but saw nothing, clear and unfathomable and still, like mountain tarns in which all the fish are asleep. . .

So Anushayini went forward, obeying his command, and stepped over the leaves with feet lighter than themselves, till she stood in front of the sage. And when she saw that he did not move, she raised herself on tiptoe to look into his eyes, saying to herself: "Possibly he is dead." And she looked into those eyes, and saw there nothing save two incarnations of timidity, that seemed to say to her as it were: Beware! And as she stood there trembling in the swing of uncertainty, Kamalamitra watched her with ecstasy, and laughed to himself, and said: "Certainly that old muni is no longer alive, for otherwise she would have reached his soul through the door of his eyes, were it down to the lower world."

So, as they stood there, waiting, gradually that old sage came to himself; for he felt that his meditations were being disturbed by something or other. And he looked, and saw Anushayini standing before him like the new moon at the close of day, a pure form of exquisite beauty, a crystal without a flaw, tinged with the colour of heaven. And instantly by the power of his own mystical meditation, he divined the whole truth, and the exact state of the case. And he cast at that wayward beauty a glance, sorrowful as that of a deer, yet terrible as that of a thunderbolt: and immediately courage fled from her soul, and strength from her knees, and she sank to the ground with drooping head, like a lotus broken by the wind.

Now if the peculiar glowing intensity and the softness of the imagery of this passage be Oriental, there is surely a certain restraint, control, and measure in the presentation of the picture, and a certain inner appreciation of its feeling which show a European taste. The question would not be worth raising if the nicest and most delicate of critical problems were not involved, i.e., when, in certain rare cases, an author has steeped himself in and absorbed the spirit of a foreign literature, the more closely he follows after and reproduces the essential genius of his originals, the more original is the fruit of his creative contemplation. Cases of the spiritual re-birth of ancient literature through the agency of a modern's interpretation are rare. There is an enormous difference in value between the work of one man who, like Mr. Bain, has assimilated the spirit of the literature he is "reproducing," and the work of the ordinary translator or redacteur who is mechanically copying its forms. "A Digit of the Moon" may be derived in its incidents, imagery, phrases and form from the whole body of Hindoo legends Mr. Bain has studied, but it is every bit as original a creation as a woman's child is her creation, though favouring in its spirit ancestors long ago passed away.

We will spare our readers any further discussion of this subtle question, only begging them to read "The Descent of the Sun" and "A Digit of the Moon," if they wish to taste two love tales which we are convinced will become minor classics in the literature of love. The distinguishing spiritual trait which sets these Oriental love tales apart from European love tales is that the lovers only attain beatitude by "abandoning the body," and so "regain- ing their immortal natures." On this point Mr. Bain says: "Metempsychosis, transmigration, everlasting incarnation, and reincarnation of the immortal soul in body after body, birth after birth: all Hindoo literature is but the kaleid- oscopic reiteration of this one identical idea, whose beauty is such that no logic will ever destroy it or oust it in favour of another. For the Sanscrit language is a kind of shrine consecrated to the embodiment and immortalisation of this philosophical myth. The Hindoos are possessed by it; it is their hereditary heirloom, Kramagatām, the legacy from an immemorial past: it is all that they have left." And in "The Descent of the Sun" Mr. Bain has created a setting artistically beautiful enough for the enshrinement of this immortal conception of the Hindoo mind. We have not space here to dwell on the richness of imagery and the imaginative grace with which the succession of incidents in the love tale is unwound, so we will quote another passage, as a taste of what is awaiting readers of "The Descent of the Sun":—

Then Ulupi was very angry, and she stood with flashing eyes, swelling with rage. And suddenly she stooped, and gathered up her hair in her arm, and came up to Umra-Singh, and flung it round him like a noose, and whispered in his ear with lips that caressed it as they moved: "O foolish bee, I am but a lotus of the night; yet why despise me, in com- parison with the absent lotus of the day? It is hot and dusty, and I am cool and fragrant as the nectar of that moon in whose light I blow." And Umra-Singh trembled. For there came from her hair a strange wind, like a cloud of the sweets of a thousand scents, that lured his soul to listen and dream in the lulling murmur of her mouth. And as he closed his eyes for fear he, saw before him the blue scorn in the eyes of Shri: . . . And he shook himself free from her hair and said: "Beauty, I am a Rajpoot of the race of the Sun: what have I to do with a lotus of the moon?"

The Laureate's Latest.

FLODDEN FIELD, A TRAGEDY. By Alfred Austin, Poet Laureate. (Macmillan. 4s. 6d. net.)

THE practical test of stage-performance has pronounced the Laureate's tragedy undramatic—a verdict which might readily be anticipated by the mere reader of it. It has the amateurish and languid structure of the customary "poetic" drama. Nothing much happens; and what happening there may be is but a peg to hang talk on—long speeches on the Elizabethan model, so dangerous without the Elizabethan vitality and earnestness, the Elizabethan force of characterization. The Laureate's figures have no character. James is nought, Surrey the conquering hero of convention, Lady Heron (the nearest thing to a personality) is still the traditional Aspasia with a touch of nobility (to make her sympathetic). One cannot see her individually.

Nor can one feel earnestness, conviction, in the con- ception or handling of this play. It follows a worn model, in the beaten—how hard-trodden!—style. The dialogue labours along, with a conscious endeavour to be what our grandfathers called "raised"; but intermit- tently "buckles" into conventional and sometimes almost conversational dailiness of phrase:—

Some wrong
In which Sir William Heron was mixed up
And captive seized.

That is a passing instance, the offending phrase of which we italicise. Less extreme limpness is frequent. There are passages now and again which attain a garden pretti- ness, claiming praise in its kind and degree; but to beauty the Laureate never rises. That garden grace seems the Austinian note; but deep-throated tragedy asks more.

Words
Still have you at your beck; all silky soft,
That seem to come like petted doves to call,
And settle where you will, coo at your lips,
Sue you as though you were their very mate,
And they had come to make their nest with you.

That is pretty, poetical in its measure, and quite meet in its place. But the hope of beauty in its place is belied. The serious speech is on the eloquential model of Shake- speare's historical plays; but nowhere touches a high mark, is at its best but commonly good, and is not shot with poetry or kindled by inspiration. This of Lady Heron's is as good as we can find:—

A mother's or a foster-mother's love
For peevish babe; a sister's for a brother,
He all unworthy; soldiers' for some cause
Or good or bad, or right or wrong, deemed good,
Imagined right, for thinking it will serve;
Aye, even a ripening woman's for ripening man,
Who never ripens—these, an you will, deserve
The title and the dignity of Love;
But not the fawnings of ferocious men,
Quick promises, more quick forgetfulness.
One might as well deck with the name of love
Fierce forays on our border for sleek kine,
Or poise of hovering hawk before it swoop
Down on fear-fascinated dove that should
Fly when it crouches, tears its entrails out,
Casting its foolish feathers to the wind,
Then wings its satiated lust aloft
In search of further victims!

That is phrased with very accomplished terseness, skilled literary form, and a good though not inspired metrical movement. The imagery is apt but unoriginal, and the substance familiar and obvious enough; while the ideas are more suited to a modern woman than to a demi-semi-harlot of the sixteenth century. Passion, the essence of tragedy, the Laureate cannot command; but only a dim literary wraith of it. The one dramatic moment is the end of the second act, where Lady Heron fools King James into absence from the field; and, caught in his embrace by her returned husband, defies and taunts both by proclamation of the truth—with reservation of her love for Surrey. It is a real "situation," and the Laureate rises to it. His very language and dialogue start into dramatic life—albeit a rhetorical life, as situational drama (if we may coin the term) always is rhetorical, be it Hugo's or another's. Were the rest of the play in this fashion, we should hold very different views regarding it. But the single flash has no predecessor or follower; and we cannot count "Flodden Field" amongst the Laureate's effectual work.

Language.

TWO LECTURES ON THE SCIENCE OF LANGUAGE. By James Hope Moulton. (Cambridge University Press.)

THIS little book is strictly what it professes to be—merely a couple of lectures introductory to the study of comparative languages. It is rather designed to stimulate an intelligent general interest in the subject, than as a scientific treatise. It deserves to fulfil its purpose, being as clear and as much stripped of needless pedantries as was possible in so technical a subject. In a couple of lectures it is clearly impossible to cover with even the laxest treatment such a theme as the science of comparative language in general. Therefore it is not surprising to find that, practically, the book rather resolves itself into a consideration of that science so far as it affects the great Indo-Germanic family of languages, to which our own and European languages in general belong. As Mr. Moulton says, the great forward step was taken, and the starting point reached, when Sir William Jones pointed out the value of Sanskrit. Though the nearness of Greek and Latin was previously realised, no one dreamed that they were part of a great family circle of languages, scattered over Europe and part of Asia, till Sir William Jones saw the resemblances between them and Sanskrit, and drew his brilliant inference. "The Sanskrit language," he said, "whatever may be its antiquity, is of wonderful structure; more perfect than the Greek, more copious than the Latin, and more exquisitely refined than either, yet bearing to both of them a stronger affinity than could have been produced by accident; so strong that no philologist could examine all the three without believing them to have sprung from some common source which, perhaps, no longer exists. There is a similar reason for believing that both the Gothic and the Celtic, though blended with a different idiom, had the same origin as the Sanskrit." There, at the end of the eighteenth century, is the flash of insight from which all progress since has come. The extreme tendency to suppose that the ancient speech of our Hindoo brethren is a kind of Paradisaic original to which all Indo-Germanic languages may be traced back has disappeared; but the importance of this Sanskrit remains. Mr. Moulton tabulates our great Indo-Germanic family of speech into Eastern and Western; the Eastern covering Lithuanian, still spoken on the Eastern Baltic shores; Slavonic; Iranian (Persian); and Indian (Sanskrit with all its later and modern derivatives); Armenian; and Albanian. The Western covers Greek; Italic (Latin and its relatives or modern descendants); Celtic; and Germanic. Indian and Iranian are combined under the common term Aryan. From the study of this vast Indo-Germanic group of languages it is possible (with the aid of other sciences) to investigate even such matters as the original common home of the whole Indo-Germanic race before its dispersion. An English scholar was first to set up the theory that this primitive home and centre of dispersion was not in Asia (as everyone had held), but in Europe. The general reader will be astonished to learn that this view is now almost universally accepted. Some of the minor arguments are here incidentally mentioned. The names of trees, for instance, in the Indo-Germanic languages. The oak, the pine, the willow, the birch, are shown to have been known to these languages in early times; and the four are said not to exist together outside Europe. Snow and perhaps ice are also found in these tongues; the sea is known (except to the Aryans). The conclusion is that they came from a northern part of Europe bordering the sea—and the Baltic fulfils all the requisite conditions. We need not proceed; enough has been said to show how this book opens out fields of interest in the study of language quite beyond the mere word-picking which is all that most people conceive in it. Much concerning the civilisation and state of our ancestors may be derived from this source, with a wise use of external aids. And it is to stimulate such intelligent outside interest in the subject that Mr. Moulton's book is intended.

Other New Books.

THE WORKS OF SIR LEWIS MORRIS. (Kegan Paul.)

THE popularity of Sir Lewis Morris's verse is attested by the fact that this issue of his collected works completes the fourteenth thousand. Sir Lewis Morris's poetry at its best has simplicity, sympathy, a certain inspiring optimism, and an easy flow. These seven hundred odd pages represent great devotion to an ideal. In his new preface, dated this year, the author says: "It is improbable that the years that may remain to him will call for further additions to his work in verse. But whether he shall write more or not, he desires to express now to his many friends, known and unknown, both here and elsewhere, his thanks for their unfailing kindness, and to wish them, if so it must be, after more than thirty years of fellowship, a sincere and grateful Farewell."

In turning over these pages we are glad to renew acquaintance with the poet's earlier work, particularly the short lyrics or single effective stanzas, such as these, from "Songs Unsung":—

Above the abysmal undivided deep
A train of glory streaming from afar;
And in the van, to wake the world from sleep,
One on whose forehead shines the Morning Star.

A poisonous, dead, sad sea-marsh, fringed with pine,
Scarce lit by mouldering churches, old as Time;
Beyond, on high, just touched with wintry rime
The long chain of the autumnal Apennine.

SONGS OF DREAMS. By Ethel Clifford. (Lane. 3s. 6d. net.)

MISS CLIFFORD has a distinct lyrical gift, though it is a narrow one. In reading these verses it is easy to see just where her limitations begin; they begin with the concrete. At her best the author is suggestive of Mr. Yeats; in such a stanza as this, for instance:—

I am come lately through the dripping woods
And all my hair is wet with falling rain.
But I am glad of rain: I was born in the West—
Would I might know the salt sea mists again.

Perhaps the poem from which we take these lines is rightly placed first in the volume; it has suggestion, something of magic, and a subdued and appropriate music. Miss Clifford usually contrives to impart to her work, and that often in spite of verbal infelicities and commonplace lines. Too often her similes are forced and out of tone. For instance:—

On the sea the fishing-boats
Bear each one a dancing light,
High in Heav'n the dancing stars
Cross the sky like swords of might:
Zeus is lord of Heav'n to-night.

We can see no likeness between stars and "swords of might," particularly if the stars be "dancing stars."

Miss Clifford is at her best when she is absolutely simple, and in one or two cases she uses a refrain with haunting and telling effect. The dedication to the volume, which we remember to have quoted with approval when it appeared anonymously, has that simplicity; so too, have "A Song of War" and "The Gypsy Woman." But why should the author of these sensitive verses print such a poem as "Jezebel"? The concluding stanza runs thus:—

The horses broke Jezebel
Under their feet.
Jehu, the blood-stained,
Went in to meat.

Neither poetry nor drama is there. The concrete is touched and the result is failure. But Miss Clifford can write verse which has the true stuff in it.

ELIZABETH'S CHILDREN. (Lane. 6s.)

THESE are not the children of the two familiar Elizabeths—the Elizabeth of the German Garden and the Elizabeth of the Visits. They appear to be the children of quite another Elizabeth, and our initial disappointment is justified. The book purports to be written by a man, and the children who come on a visit to Latimer Hall are Anglo-French. But the sentiment of the whole business is wholly feminine; even the love-story is full of femininity, and over the entire performance there is a trail of sickness. The three boys—Renaud, Armand, and André—are not flesh and blood youngsters; they are pretty little ideas prettily played with. It may be well enough occasionally to read about such children; but no amount of cleverness will ever convince a reader who knows anything about children that these are real children. They are, in fact, children exploited for the purposes of adults. Did anyone ever hear a child say, "I fought big persons knew effrying"? It is just the kind of thing that a child does not say, though it makes a very good point for an author who is writing for effect.

If we could have got free from the impression of unreality which pervades "Elizabeth's Children" we might have enjoyed the book; but the unreality overcame us in the first chapter, and it remained with us to the end. To any reader who can accept the conventions of the narrative it may prove very engaging and pleasant. We can even imagine wet eyes and the lump in the throat. For ourselves, we were not so moved. We are, indeed, growing weary of the child as he is presented in such a book as this. The real child is so much more human, so much more brutal, so much less artistic.

A pleasant gardening book of a practical kind is "A Gloucestershire Wild Garden," by "The Curator" (Elliot Stock). The author tells us in his preface how, years ago in India, he used to think of England and an ideal garden, and how at last he found the perfect site in Gloucestershire. The book tells of the author's success in maintaining a sub-tropical garden practically in perfection, and the many illustrations seem to prove that success. The volume is interspersed with dialogues and reflections which are sometimes suggestive and interesting.

From the same publisher there reaches us "The Cloud World: Its Features and Significance," by Samuel Barber. The book is a popular account of cloud forms and phenomena, and contains many curious and interesting photographs. The author has not built up his theories on the assumptions of other writers, but has presented his own observations of nature.

NEW EDITIONS: We have received the seventh and eighth volumes of the "Poetical Works of George Barlow." Two more volumes will complete this issue.

Fiction.

QUESTIONABLE SHAPES. By W. D. Howells. (Harper. 6s.)

"POUR l'écrivain qui s'attache ainsi à peindre scientifiquement une société," writes M. Paul Bourget, "il y a évidemment deux voies toutes tracées. Ces deux sortes de romans sont par définition, très différentes. Le roman de mœurs, doit être avant tout représentatif. . . . Le roman de caractères doit être, avant tout, analytique. . . ." M. Bourget claims for Balzac supremacy in both, but mentions no other exception. Now, Mr. Howells' method of analysis is, in this volume, that of Edgar Allen Poe raised to its ultimate power; and it is the product of a self-consciousness even more minute, more sensitive than the poet's. And yet Mr. Howells cannot help trespassing in the domain of "le roman des mœurs," cannot refrain from registering minute differentiations in manners and other objective details of our external life.

This habit is particularly incongruous here, because the book consists of three acute studies of abnormal temperaments, and is essentially psychological and not descriptive of "average personalities under average conditions." Of course, it will be urged that Mr. Howells is merely playing with us in this volume, and that it is absurd to take these anomalies seriously. That may be so, and in the first of these three stories, "His Apparition," the defence is perfectly legitimate. Hewson, the man who saw the unseen, is essentially an average person around whose banality the author skips daintily through some hundred pages. There it is quite in order to lay some little stress upon the social usage which decrees that the name of the lady whom one is to "take out" to dinner should be enclosed in a minute envelope and presented by a footman. There, too, it is quite in order that attention should be called to the fact that ladies do not leave the dinner-table alone after the manner of the old discourtesy. These things are quite as important as any other trivialities in regard to Hewson and his apparition. It is an amusing farce, and it is told with an edged banter which relieves the tension of an analysis here quite unnecessary. But in the two other stories, "The Angel of the Lord" and "Though One Rose from the Dead," this constant reference to externals is a little disconcerting.

The first of these two stories is a subtle study of Ormond, a man who feared death intensely. "He might have been," says the author, "a character out of one of Turgenev's books, the idea of death was so constantly present with him." It might be urged, with the somewhat splenetic authority of Merejkowski, that it is Tolstoi rather than Turgenev who has accentuated the fear of death, but that is a side issue. Ormond is not another Hewson, and the author is not playing with us in this story, in which death itself is visualised as the Angel of the Lord welcomed at last by the man who had always feared him.

But the story in which the illusion is at once most sustained and most penetrating is that entitled "Though One Rose from the Dead." It is a study of the extraordinary development of telepathy between a husband and wife thrown constantly upon each other's exclusive society.

The volume, as a whole, is the reverse of morbid, in spite of the subjects of which it treats, and one feels always that the author is courteously willing to defer personally to Lombroso the visitations of his Questionable Shapes.

THE MANNERINGS. By Alice Brown. (Nash. 6s.)

HERE is a book more than ordinarily clever, and in certain respects more than ordinarily exasperating. The general impression left upon us is one of clamour, hurry, and strain. There is far too much emotion in it—so much, indeed, that certain quite good and dramatic situations find us exhausted before we arrive at them. People do not live at the height of nervous tension which is, apparently, the normal atmosphere of the characters in Miss Brown's story. And this over-emphasis marks the whole book; one or two characters are thrown into sudden relief and as suddenly withdrawn; it is rather like watching one of those experiments in stage lighting which we associate with the name of Mr. Gordon Craig. From time to time actors emerge from the disguising darkness, play their scene, and vanish. On the stage that may be well enough, but in a book the method is a failure.

Yet the story has many excellent qualities. All the women are good, particularly the strong, capable, childless wife yoked to a selfish, conceited dullard to whom embezzlement presents no moral difficulties. He also, with the utmost indifference, publishes anonymously and without her knowledge a story written by his wife, a story in which she tried to explain, for his eyes alone, the attitude of revolt into which circumstances had forced her. That is the main incident, but it is so propped up and wrapped about with extraneous matter that it loses half its value. The author has tried to do too much; instead of keeping herself in hand and aiming at quiet concentration, she has wasted her abounding vitality on side issues.

The manner of the book has the same faults as its matter; it has life, but it is life seen through a magnifying lens. At the same time the author has a grip of character, a sense of beauty, and an occasional very real and convincing tenderness. "The Mannerings" is by no means an ordinary novel; judged by standards which the critic usually is content to apply it would stand head and shoulders above the ruck. The fact that it calls for more careful judgment is all in its favour.

It should be added that the story deals with Old-New England folk. There are here and there phrases which make us shiver and curious locutions for which we can discover no excuse.

Notes on Novels.

[These notes on the Week's Fiction are not necessarily final. Reviews of a selection will follow.]

CONRAD IN QUEST OF HIS YOUTH. By LEONARD MERRICK.

"An Extravagance of Temperament." It opens in Paris when Conrad was thirty-seven. Once he had studied art in the Latin Quarter, but in the intervening years, while youth had receded, he had been prevented by "sordid considerations" from taking the journey that would recover the old emotions. Now a legacy enables him to do so, and the story describes how, after many vicissitudes "the immoral truth was clear to him . . . that a man is as young as often as he falls in love." (Richards. 6s.)

THE UNDERSONG. By H. C. MACILWAINE.

A volume of eight stories by the author of "Fate the Fiddler." Most of them have an Australian setting, and four are reprinted from magazines. "Billy Durbey" treats of the adventure of a journalist with an aboriginal savage, and of the subsequent trial of the latter for murder. The note of the story is a revulsion from the "cultured rabble" of civilisation, and a yearning for the primeval life. (Constable. 6s.)

ARDINA DORAN.

By SUSAN CHRISTIAN.

A clever and suggestive story by the author of "An Inland Ferry." The heroine is the daughter of a Cabinet Minister whom we first meet as she leaves school and is about to take her place in society. The man who became Viceroy of India took her to the National Gallery and interpreted her life from Ucello's "Sant' Egidio." He lacked humour, but "sense of humour is one of the thousand qualities which blend themselves into a complicated futility, and go to the making of the mediocre man." The story moves to a country house at which the problem of Ardina's destiny is solved. (Smith, Elder. 6s.)

A WAY OF HIS OWN.

By A. KNOTCUTTER.

The autobiography of an eccentric youth who owned various country estates and was the ward of the Lord Chancellor, with whom there is much correspondence. After glimpses of public school and University, the narrative reveals the hero in various surprising adventures, including episodes of the hunting field and a contested parliamentary election. There is a Latin dedication "to all the Mudies and the Smiths." (Drane. 3s. 6d.)

THE CUBAN TREASURE ISLAND.

By W. PATRICK KELLY.

The hero first heard of the buried treasure from a drunken sailor whom he rescued from a street affray in New Orleans, and who showed him the little red book with the pencilled memorandum. The sailor was murdered, and his rescuer, having been engaged as chief mate on a private vessel, found that its owner was in possession of the book and that their destination was the treasure island. The story is enveloped in mystery, and proceeds through sensational adventures. (Routledge. 3s. 6d.)

SIR JULIAN THE APOSTATE.

By MRS. CLEMENT PARSONS.

A domestic story. The first chapter describes a medical consultation in which Ella's husband is condemned to hopeless paralysis and to banishment in the country. They are accompanied to Southshire by Sir Julian, with whom Ella has long acknowledged certain spiritual affinities. The story has a country house atmosphere and is concerned with the growth of Ella's passion, and with the apostasy of Sir Julian at the call of a more genuine emotion. (Heinemann. 6s.)

THE SEEKERS.

By W. KINGSCOTE GREENLAND.

"A Romance of Modern Methodism." The opening chapters reveal a young man, the son of Methodist parents, who, while at Oxford "had been caught by the glamour of incense and vestments." The scene changes to the University, and, on the hero's taking Anglican orders, to a London parish. The story involves a good deal of social and religious criticism. It appeared originally in the "Wesleyan Methodist Magazine" under the title of "Pilgrims of the Night." (Kelly.)

THE MYSTERY OF MURRAY

By R. N. STEPHENS.

DAVENPORT.

An American story turning on a case of exchanged identity. Larcher was persuaded by his fiancée to search out an obscure and unfortunate artist concerning whom she required information for reasons which were not divulged. The search ends in his friendship with the artist and in the latter's mysterious disappearance. Interwoven with the mystery is a love story with a "happy ending." (Nash. 6s.)

We have also received the following: "The Trifler," by Archibald Eyre (Ward Lock); "Mysie," by J. B. P. Bird (Drane); "Riding to Win," by Leon Breaker (Everett); "Pots!" by Harold Bacon (Treherne); "Mrs. Pendleton's Four-in-Hand," by Gertrude Atherton (Macmillan); "The Squire's Grand-daughters," by Lady Gilbert (Burns).

THE ACADEMY.

Editorial and Publishing Offices, 43, Chancery Lane.

The ACADEMY will be sent post-free, if prepaid, to every Annual Subscriber in the United Kingdom.Price for One Issue, Threepence; postage One Halfpenny. Price for 52 issues, Thirteen Shillings; postage free.

Foreign Rates, for Yearly Subscriptions, prepaid (including postage)	17/6
Quarterly	5/0
Price for one issue	/5

Exuberance.

THERE is a generous and high-spirited quality of writing which of late has been rare in our literature. Authors, with all their many virtues of sobriety, lucidity, and truthfulness, have seemed sometimes a little thin and prim. For fifty years they have been rather pale and sad and serious, as though with thinking overmuch, or from too great care for the comfort and salvation of others, and even in their mirth there has remained something shame-faced and self-conscious, as with men who make believe to revel on toast and water. Writers on the whole are, we suppose, richer than they were, and we might look for a growing luxuriance and wealth of temperament to correspond with their fortunes. But whether it come of their high living and plain thinking, or whether the cause lie in the monotonous hurry and unsocial crowding of city life, it is certain that literature, in spite of the quantity of books, has been smitten with a kind of a chilliness, a moderation, a caution, a sensitiveness, a depression, a drooping, a melancholy, a squeamishness, a green-sickness, a mediocrity, a wasting, a sterility, and a mope from which we all suffer.

It is the quality of exuberance that has been lost. There is a kind of writing that swells with fecundity and glows with mirth. It is large and easy and unrestrained. Shake it, and it drops fatness: tap it, and it spouts wine. Of prudence it knows nothing, and it laughs at moderation as Leviathan at the shaking of a spear. It loves the gifts of the sunburnt old earth, and counts them over again and again like a child counting his birthday toys. Its voice is deep and mellow, with a laugh far down in the throat. It grows, like a gourd, with sitting in the sun, and it loves best the plentiful lands of vine and olive, calm rivers and grey poplar trees. Yet once it has been found in all its lavish abundance even under our own dis-tempered sky; for only three men in the world's history have possessed exuberance in full perfection, and one of them was Falstaff. The other two were Aristophanes and Rabelais. But there are a certain few besides whose fortune it has been to be born with some gill, runlet, tierce, puncheon, hogshead, bucketful, or butt of it in their blood, which is ever merrily asserting itself, like the "dash of the tar-brush" visible in lamb's-wool hair and the gulf of a laughing mouth. Such certainly was Dumas, who had it almost in brimming measure, as might be seen from his loose shoulders and rolling chest; such was Cyrano, as was evident from the promontory of his nose. Such might Victor Hugo have been, had he not turned portentous; and Whitman, had he but laughed; and Swift, had he not dwelt, as Coleridge said, "in a dry place"; and Jean Paul, had he not dwelt in Germany. But from England we may admit Fielding into the overflowing fellowship, and Smollett, and Sterne, and Boz, and Byron when he is not giving himself airs. And we would gladly take in Meredith, did he not think such a plaguey lot. A few more still might be counted, but many would claim entrance against whom the tavern door must be shut; for though there is no black-list in the realm of Abundantia, the corruption of exuberance is vulgarity—a thing most plentiful, but no more truly related than a Cockney pair-oared boat hired by three men bound for Eel-pie Island is related to the bulging galleon which, stuffed with Spanish merchandize, is borne by saffron sails from Cadiz to the Brazils.

Among present writers Mr. Hilaire Belloc has something of this opulence and unexhausted spirit. Perhaps it comes from some fag-end of a French sunbeam that has survived a transportation; though we must avoid the mistake he mentions of a crowd that took a fellow-citizen for a Frenchman and treated him accordingly because he had blacked his face like a negro. By whatever origin, he possesses the bubbling copiousness, the fertile resource, the rubicund speech, the passion for words, the hatred of facts, the glorious lying, the cheery assault, the honest irreverence, the carelessness, thriftlessness, and abandon that recall the three great ensamples of exuberance. His "Path to Rome" was littered with such plenty, and now again it overflows in a new production, with double titles, like giant twins: "The Aftermath, or Gleanings from a Busy Life, Called upon the Outer Cover for Purposes of Sale, Caliban's Guide to Letters," and to be bought of Messrs. Duckworth for eighteen-pence, two shillings, or as much more as an exuberant purchaser may be pleased to fling over the counter with the cry, "Mais quel geste!"

In it we see what Carlyle's German Professor identified with "Satan's Invisible World Revealed": we see the Journalist's Progress from his Review to his Pulpit-room. And the Journalist is conducted along that road by as fine a guardian-angel as ever discovered the voice of one whimpering in a back garden, or made the fortune of tender mediocrity. Dr. Caliban (indifferently, on successive pages, spoken of as James and Thomas) is a noble embodiment of the commonplace upon which commonsense is so securely founded as a home for the lords of the world and the top-hatted race. As quite a youth he had been a strenuous opponent of American slavery; "he might have been called the most prominent Abolitionist in Worcestershire, and worked indefatigably for the cause in so far as it concerned this country." A similar passion for freedom and justice inspired his later life:—

Russia he hated as the oppressor of Finland and Poland, for oppression he loathed and combatted wherever it appeared; nor had Mr. Arthur Balfour a stronger supporter than he when that statesman, armed only in the simple manliness of an English Christian and Freeman, combatted and destroyed the terrorism that stalked through Ireland.

So also, in his great speech at St. James's Hall upon the Dreyfus case, standing for truth and justice, he began his peroration with the courageous words: "England will yet weather the storm." Yet at fitting times his tact was a serviceable ally to his courage, for we read: "A young radical of sorts was declaiming at his table one evening against the concentration camps. Dr. Caliban listened patiently, and at the end of the harangue said gently, 'Shall we join the ladies?' The rebuke was not lost."

It is lamentable to hear that so worthy a representative of average intelligence is now confined in an establishment for the mentally afflicted, but we may hope that, like the epileptic mentioned in another part of the book, he may be restored to a normal, and even commonplace, state of mind. We proceed at once to the practical lessons which the author derived from Dr. Caliban's principles and example, such as the complete art of reviewing, illustrated by a series of suitable notices upon the following subject:—

The book was called "The Snail: Its Habitat, Food, Customs, Virtues, Vices, and Future." It was, as its title would imply, a monograph upon snails, and there were many fine coloured prints, showing various snails occupied in feeding on the leaves proper to each species. It also contained a large number of process blocks, showing sections, plans, elevations, and portraits of snails, as well as detailed descriptions (with diagrams) of the ears, tongues, eyes, hair, and nerves of snails. It was a comprehensive and remarkable work.

The reviewer composed his notices (eight or ten in all) in accordance with the varying information he received from his editor as to the political opinions of the author and the publisher's willingness to advertise. We can heartily recommend them as models to all dustmen, literary scavengers, beginners and past-masters in reviewing, chiffoniers, rag-and-bone men, and ghouls; just as we can recommend all the chapters of advice that follow, upon Political Appeals, Short Stories, Short Lyrics, Interviews, Personal Pars, Editing, Revelations, and Special Prose. Two extravaganzas, monstrosities, or tales are shot in besides an (Index to the Pulping Room), one of them, on the shrine of St. Loup, opening with the true Aristophanic-Rabelaisian revelry in strings and masses of words:—

My excellent good Dreyfusards, anti-Dreyfusards, Baptists, Anabaptists, Premonstratensians, antiquaries, sterling fellows, foreign correspondents, home readers, historians, Nestorians, philosophers, Deductionists, Inductionists, Prætorians (I forgot them), Cæsarists, Lazarists, Catholics, Protestants, Agnostics and militant Atheists, as also all you churchmen, Nonconformists, Particularists, very strong secularists, and even you my well-beloved little brethren called The Peculiar People, give ear attentively and listen to what is to follow, and you shall learn more of a matter that has woefully disturbed you than ever you would get from the "Daily Mail" or from Mynheer Van Damm, or even from Dr. Biggles' "Walks and Talks in France."

The other extravaganza, monstrosity, or tale is the diverting and instructive short story how Mr. Thorpe, drysalter, fell into the river near Cleopatra's Needle (the incident of a Short Story "should take place on the sea or in brackish, or at least tidal, waters")—fell into the river and was immediately hooked out, and how this epic incident ("Mr. Davidson's shorter lyrics have no better claim to be epics in their essentials than has this relation of 'The Accident to Mr. Thorpe'")—how this epic incident grew in Mr. Thorpe's mind till he told the adventure at large to every man in the street, steamboat, railway carriage, omnibus, waiting-room, bar, church porch, or chapel door, with superb amplifications of detail—"sometimes it was in the 'steep water off the Banks'; sometimes in 'the glassy steaming seas and on the feverish coast of the Bight'; sometimes it was 'a point or two norr'ard of the Öwers light,' but it was always terrible, graphic, and a lie"—and finally he left all his considerable fortune to the Lifeboat Fund, which badly needed it. All such appeals to history, scientific diversions, facts, falsehoods, and foundations for theories—together with the pleasant Ode on Mr. Chamberlain's Return and the interview with the patriotic poet who showed no jealousy at the hallucination of a red-hot brass monkey attempting song—all such satires, ironies, and overflows of milk and honey, we must now leave to the plumpy and well-conditioned hearts that love to drink the wine of exuberance in whatever ocean, river, mill-stream, gutter, or down-spout it may run.

The Ways of Criticism.

THE appearance of the "New Variorum Edition" of "Macbeth," by Horace Howard Furness (J. B. Lippincott Co.), as revised by his son, Mr. H. H. Furness, junr., affords a curious, not to say unique opportunity for surveying the results and ways of Shakespearean criticism. Quite apart from the rich collection of comments by various hands which garnish the foot of each page, in the Appendix (or one of the several appendices) we have presented a veritable bird's eye view of Shakespearean commentary, both English and German—seen as it were in a weltering and conflicting sea. The quot homines, tot sententiæ, the perplexing divergency with which individual temperament and opinion responds to the appeal even of an acknowledged masterpiece, towards which its general attitude has been settled by the consent of that formidable personage, Posterity, is opulently illustrated. As one reads; as critic A gives the lie to critic B, and critic C gives the lie three feet down in the throat to both; one is forced to the perception that in poetry there is nothing so apparent as will look of one colour to two out of any three casual people. How, you marvel, does an actor's rendering ever give general satisfaction, when there is no point so seeming-plain, but A sees it one way and B another? Or is this pestilent diversity, mayhap, a critical disease, with which the "plain man" (the "plain average man," as he loves to call himself) is uncontaminated? We know the "plain man" has always a mighty opinion of himself, that he could settle things very well if the critics would only leave him alone. We suspect there is really something in this. The critics, experience shows, often split hairs over a performance about which the public are of a mind. Their profession breeds that habit of mind. Therewithal, in the case of the myriad-debated Shakespeare, it has grown a point of honour with your critic to firk up some view which shall single him from his fellows: let us be original, were it but on the fashion of Rosalind's hose!

Allow for all this, it is yet divergent temperament and perception which is mainly at work. On such a leading case as the character—the plain character—of Macbeth and his Lady, you shall find no view under heaven unadvocated. You need not go further, nor seek into subtleties. So that presently you begin to ask yourself whether old Sam Johnson must not after all be right, who starts roundly with the assertion that there is "no nice discrimination of character" in the play at all! The critics, at any rate, are quite ready to supply the alleged omission with any amount of "nice discrimination." Macbeth is a fine and loyal nature gone wrong, say these. Not at all, say those, and Sir Henry Irving loudest. He is (says the famous actor) "one of the most bloody-minded, hypocritical villains in all his [Shakespeare's] long gallery of portraits of men instinct with the virtues and vices of their kind." He "even cultivated assiduously a keen sense of the horror of his crimes"—by way of true aesthetic enjoyment, we suppose. "Macbeth is the perfect type of the man of action," says Mr. Moulton. He is without intellect, the "inner cultivation." That is one point settled, you think; but turn the page, and Mr. Rose clearly shows you that this Macbeth is a striking example of a "double character, halfway between the mere man of thought, like Hamlet, and the ideal man of action, like Othello." So you may further gather from various commentators that he is a moral coward, quite inferior to his resolute wife; and yet a man of dauntless determination, with true masculine supremacy over her. We might ring the changes further on this "obvious" character (as Lord Acton has told us all Shakespeare's are); but place aux dames. Mrs. Siddons conceived Lady Macbeth "fair, feminine, nay, perhaps even fragile." Another critic (German, this time) is equally sure she was "royal," with "powerful features and majestic bearing," a countenance displaying "noble and energetic outlines" and presaging "demoniac forces." In like fashion you may learn that her character is murderous, remorseless, powerful, and unsexed; or that she has full share of feminine qualities, and perishes under a remorse she was not strong enough to bear. Some critics are confident there is no love lost between the Macbeth couple—one German is clear it was a mere marriage of esteem, while Mrs. Siddons is shocked by the lady's lack of tender anxiety over her husband when he returns from the wars. Another set admire the impassioned affection between the two; and plainly perceive that Lady Macbeth worshipped her spouse. On the play at large opinions are more uniform; yet even here one critic has distinguished himself by an undoubted originality of view. "Macbeth" does not satisfy him. It has the air of a draft, needing expansion. "Like the 'Tempest,' we feel that it would be better if it were longer." And this, not because you cannot have too much of a good thing, but because "we want more of the subdued and calm." "Macbeth," in fact, is too exciting for Mr. Hunter. He would like it toned down. Moreover, his chaste (we might almost use some more forcible adjective, such as "maidenly") taste finds in it a great many turgid and incomprehensible passages, or (as he puts it) passages which exceed the "just limits which part the true sublime from the inflated or the obscure." From these phrases alone you could discern that "Macbeth" was likely to be trying to Mr. Hunter, as Mr. Hunter and "the true sublime" would be trying to Shakespeare. Yet we like Mr. Hunter, in that, thinking these things, he said them. It is a document. There are so many who think these things and do not say them.

Yet for all this, Shakespearean criticism is not the mere chaos which might at first sight be thought. It merely exemplifies the universal human tendency to arrive at truth by zig-zag progression, by the passage from extreme to extreme. The need is for the correlation of ideas. If, for convenience' sake, we narrow the issue to the English critics, amidst the divergent views we can extract a large body of agreement, a large number of points in which the critics overlap. In the remaining points, by striking a mean between the diverse contentions, we can co-ordinate and bring them into harmony. The chief crux between disputants is the evident contrast between Macbeth and his wife; their apparent interchange of sex before the murder, his seeming "moral cowardice" (as one critic calls it) contrasted with her unhesitating resolve; and the counter-reversal of their relations after the murder, when he becomes desperately determined and independent of his wife's prompting, while she collapses under the terrors of conscience. All the perplexities and complexities in this matter can be reconciled, once you get the true centre from which to regard them. The fact is that Shakespeare, even in characters commonly thought "obvious," and which are obvious in the sense that they are broad and representative, not specialised and dependent on minute differentiations, nevertheless has the complexity and subtlety of Nature herself. He has always a psychological problem before him, and that problem is worked out as Nature works it, with broad general definition, but subtle subordinate detail. Hence critics who see only the bold definition miss the significance of the delicate and suggested detail. Mr. Comyns Carr has summed the present problem with a true grasp of its central key, but not quite a complete grasp. He discerns, quite truly, that all the seeming-capricious divergence between Macbeth and his wife, their apparent (temporary) interchange of sexual character, really arises from sex—it results from a marvellously subtle study of sexual nature in face of a given situation. Just so, and not otherwise, must the situation affect a man and woman like Macbeth and his wife. What he does not seem quite to grasp is that Lady Macbeth's lack of her husband's vivid imagination (a lack on which so much depends) is itself a sexual matter. Macbeth is no moral coward (he shows moral courage in abundance); he is an imaginative coward. Few seem to have noticed that here (as elsewhere) Shakespeare shows remarkable intuition of national character. As Juliet is the elementally passionate Italian girl, as his Romans are the very genius of old Rome, so Macbeth is the superstitious Celt, swayed by the imagination, by bodements and omens—the very stuff on which the witches may act. But his wife, as a woman, is sexually deficient in imagination, practical in her ideas, and unable to follow his flights of high-wrought fancy. This distinction between the sexes Shakespeare habitually marks, for good and for evil; as it is marked in the history of many an artist whose practical wife was impatient of his imaginative aims. We do not say that Celtic women are never superstitious (nothing is more superstitious than a superstitious woman); we say that the average woman is less imaginatively minded than the man. And Shakespeare has made Lady Macbeth such a woman; while her husband is imaginative to the core. Therefore, it follows that while Macbeth's vivid imagination anticipates all the consequences of his crime, and shrinks before them (as any sensible man well might do), his wife is sexually unable to share his intense pre-realisation. Woman-like, she is wholly dominated by the emotion of the moment (which in her case is ambition, less for herself than for him), and everything else grows dim before its engrossing prepossession. That is why she is so resolute, while he is shaken by hesitation. Once the deed is done (and here we wholly join hands with Mr. Comyns Carr) he proceeds unhesitatingly in his career of crime, reverting to his native boldness of action, and no longer needing his wife's counsel or prompting. For in assenting to the deed, he accepted its foreseen consequences, and they take him by no surprise. To her, on the contrary, they are a dreadful surprise. In her lack of imagination, she foresaw nothing. Now all that she unimaginatively scorned in her husband's forebodings seizes her with frightful amaze. Slave to this instant emotion of guilty remorse, as she was before slave to the immediate emotion of ambition, she cannot evade its tyranny. The male refuge of action denied her, she broods concentratedly over agonies unprovided, hiding them from her husband lest she should increase his griefs; and dies under them. It is a contrasted tragedy of sex, as inevitable as it is subtle. On the genuine and even tender affection between the murderous pair, the bulk of commentary is in substantial agreement. Altogether, by such balancing and harmonising of extreme opinions as we have indicated, it becomes patent that through Shakespearean criticism, as through the ages, "one increasing purpose runs"; while in regard to Shakespeare the "thoughts of men" have certainly "widened" since the grovelling eighteenth century. On minor points it is more difficult to evolve an agreement; such a point, for example, as whether Banquo's ghost have an external existence or be a creation solely of Macbeth's mind, and whether, therefore, it should be visible to the audience or no. We should answer, both hypotheses are true: Shakespeare, we think, pretty surely intended it to be as much a reality as the ghost in "Hamlet"; yet its evocation is responsive to the nervous tension of the murderer's mind, his obsession by the thought of his victim conjures up the spiritual presence of the victim. The poet has wedded psychical manifestation with psychology. This duality, or rather multiplicity, of Shakespeare's comprehensive mind is the cause of half the disputes about him. He never uses the supernatural without basing it in cunningest fashion on the natural: hence the unapproached lifelikeness of the supernatural in the great dramatist. In fine, this study of the ways of criticism forces on us one paramount conclusion: that the perception inclusive enough to see Shakespeare whole is a gift only less rare than Shakespeare's creative gift.

Fun and Forty.

It is always an unpleasant experience to find the capacity for enjoyment dropping away. Yet life is a process of change and decay, and the things we loved or laughed at ten years ago leave us cold and solemn to-day. Who calls for pap at his club? There was a time when chocolate unlimited seemed an unattainable heaven. When we are old enough and rich enough to pay for all the chocolate we can eat we have lost the taste for it. A few days ago a "man of letters," as some people call themselves in "Who's Who," in order to escape from letters, took train to a quiet place in Sussex. In his bag he packed three books. "Here's fun," he murmured. The books were "In Happy Hollow," by Max Adeler (Ward, Lock & Co.), "Up to To-morrow," by W. Carter Platts (John Long), and "Love and a Cottage," by Keble Howard (Grant Richards). Each of these volumes had an attractive appearance. Just the thing "to pass an idle hour," as the reviewers say of the flowers of literature that bloom in the spring and are adapted for holiday reading.

Let the man of letters tell what happened. Max Adeler! Memories of twenty years ago, and the rollick of "Out of the Hurly-Burly" and "Elbow Room." Once again he would shriek with the laughter of a boy. But there was something wrong. Was the fault with Max Adeler or with the man of letters? Max Adeler was sentimental. The wicked and repentant mother peeps through the window at her daughter. Why does that not stir him—at least to tears? Is it—surely it must be—because he has found the world of fiction full of repentant mothers outside humble windows, and has come to regard them as the common objects of the seashore of life? But there was one hint of the old laughter in Max Adeler's sketch of the editor of the "Defender":—

Nearly everybody wants me to take pay for advertising in goods instead of in cash. It's the worst system! This suit I have on cost me fifteen hundred lines on my third page. My shoes stand for a reading notice under the Dead and Married Ads. That hat represents thirty-four lines of nonpareil type e. o. d. t. f. (every other day till forbid, you know) and the man owes me sixteen more hats and is likely to owe me sixty. I haven't got a thing on me that isn't running in the "Defender" either in the shape of an agate reading notice or a display ad.

For the rest, the man of letters wondered, and neither wept nor laughed. Which was wrong? Max Adeler or the man of letters? And then came Mr. Carter Platts with the book which a cruel someone has labelled "Up To-morrow" on its cover and spoiled the initial joke. Silas K. Chumson is the hero, and he invents things. The very name is reminiscent of Max Adeler when the man of forty was at school; and the inventions—bless us—what of that canal with which Max Adeler provided every kind of ridiculous propulsion! Silas K. Chumson was walking home one morning from Tittlehampton (rather funny name, isn't it? thought the man of letters, bracing himself):—

"I'm convinced there's an opening right here if I could only find it." And the next instant he stepped with all his weight of purpose right in the middle of the nothing that covered a circular coal-hole in the pavement, and then found it—the opening for a scientific investigator, I mean.

That did not prevent Silas K. Chumson from inventing the Anti-Bunion Theatre Seat, nor Mr. Carter Platts from describing it. But for the man of letters the matter was becoming serious. He reflected that it was ridiculous to suppose that people should go on making jokes at which no one laughed. Further, he reflected that if he had heard all those jokes before there must be many to whom they were as fresh as they were to him when he was proud of his first full-grown dress-suit. And the really right course of criticism came by accident. An intelligent serving-maid, curious as to the baggage of the inn-guest, had discovered Mr. Keble Howard's "Love and a Cottage." The very title appealed to her. Might she read it? Of course. Here was the touchstone. Here was the appeal from fat and forty to sweet and twenty. Some hours later—in this case precision is necessary, and the hour was ten minutes to eleven, while the closing hour in the country is ten—the serving-maid returned the book to the man of letters. She could not go to bed until she had finished it. "It's the nicest book I ever read," she said.

Here we find a weak point in current criticism, and a suggestion for its strengthening. The weakness lies in the man of forty to whom Mr. Keble Howard's two young people on their honeymoon in a cottage, with their quarrels and their kissing again with tears, their difficulties with the donkey and the kitchen-range, are like the tales the undergraduate tells him about his college. But there is sweet and twenty to be considered. She sprouts incessantly and beautifully. She pants with the sweet want of fun and sentiment. Her criticism should make itself heard, and on the staff of every literary paper should be at least one intelligent serving-maid. On the earth there are more sweet and twenties than fat and forties, and the majority should command attention.

Impressions.

XXXVIII.—The Way Home.

THE last train left London twenty-five minutes after midnight. It was a slothful thing, stopping at every station, starting again reluctantly—having by that hour, like the passengers, lost the relish for life. On the floors of the carriages were dim, hardly revealing the tired travellers. The guard stood yawning at the face of his watch, protecting it with the palm of his hand from the thin rain that blew in icily from the sodden night. "Sixty hours of rain on end," he snapped as he slammed the carriage door.

Our track was black, feebly illuminated by the platform lamps, and we left blackness behind us. For, as we rumbled out of the stations, sometimes before we had begun to move, a porter extinguished the lamps. It was as if the end of all things was at hand, and we, lagging on the stage, were witnesses of the suppression—drowsily indifferent. The express that roared brightly by seemed so unnecessarily active, and I sighed contentedly as, alighting at my station, I witnessed, in turn, the extinction of its lamps, and felt my way out into the vast loneliness. I seemed to have wandered into a strange country; all the familiar landmarks had suffered a water change. Road and path were one, covered with a shallow sheet of flood, and as I splashed through it a white mist rose up from the meadows. At the cross roads these wreaths of vapour—clammy, chimerical—met, and enveloped me. I took to the high land, seeking the red road that would lead me circuitously home, and on that height it was eerie to hear the noise of many waters trickling and running in the night. There was no sound but that of their incessant tricklings through newly-formed courses—numbers of them—here meeting, there splashing into a depression, all hastening down into the brook, now a torrent, that I could hear roaring in the valley. The sensation was one of hearing, not of sight, for the night was moonless, and there were no stars in the sky. This upland had become articulate. It was as if a myriad company of voices had been released and were speaking in the waters that, having drenched the land, were now busily boring little pathways. There were no houses on that red road, and no vehicle had yet dared to traverse its rocky surface; but at the point where it issued into civilisation there was a house, and I was glad to know of its propinquity, although the form was hidden.

Suddenly a light flared in one of the top windows, it moved, and in that instant a tongue of fire flickered up the curtains. Not a human sound broke the silence: the noise of running water was still persistent, when in the darkness this eye of fire glared out with intolerable dazzle. The blind was now alight; then a hand shot out, pulled at the fabrics which fell in a cascade of flame, and that glowing window was blotted out as suddenly as it had flared into sight. The house shrank back into the darkness—disappeared, and the land was again wrapped in that humid gloom, with no moon to comfort the night. I splashed on towards the village green. In the horse-pond were two swans contentedly enjoying the superfluous water.

Drama.

The Promise of Mr. Davies.

I CONFESS that I am not able whole-heartedly to echo the very gratifying applause with which "Cousin Kate" has been welcomed in the highest quarters. I praise; but it is with reserves and qualifications which seem to me to touch not mere accidentals, but the root of the matter. I shall try in the course of this article to make it clear what these are. Of course, I do not wish to deny that Mr. Davies has all the makings of a dramatist in him. His command over technique is considerable. His dialogue is neatly turned and not too literary, although he is not afraid of a touch of poetry when the occasion calls for it. And he has the great gift of getting his story directly and lucidly over the footlights. It is in any case a beginning of great promise.

The talent of Miss Ellis Jeffreys is one which always fascinates me, but even when all allowance has been made for the debt which, at the Haymarket, "Cousin Kate" owes to its presentment, it still remains a fresh, high-spirited and most entertaining comedy. Fundamentally, it fails to convince me: and, though it is possible that I am applying too austere a criterion, I believe that I am right not to be convinced. The play takes its name from Miss Kate Curtis, who is the deus ex machina of the Spencer family, consisting of Mrs. Spencer, a widow, Amy Spencer, a high-principled girl with the brain, like Newman's as seen by Carlyle, of a rabbit, and Bobby Spencer, a school-boy. When the curtain rises, Amy Spencer, as the result of a little tiff as to the proper way of spending Sunday, has just been jilted by Mr. Heath Desmond. It is very tearful, but Cousin Kate is expected on a visit, and all will be well. Cousin Kate arrives, and all, for a while, is well. She outwits the curate who is attempting to catch Amy's heart on the rebound, induces Amy to admit that she has been a little goose, and to sit down and write to Mr. Heath to that effect, and goes off, still in the rôle of fairy godmother, to light a fire in the drawing-room of Owlscot, where the happy pair are to take up their abode. All this, which makes up Act I., is admirably handled by Mr. Davies, and Miss Ellis Jeffreys is inimitable. It is Act II. that gives me pause. Cousin Kate, although apt to cover her sterling qualities with a cloak of cynicism, and in fact the authoress of certain novels which shock the curate, is at heart of a sentimental and even romantic disposition. She has had, in the train, an unconventional flirtation with an Irishman of persuasive tongue and imaginative temper, who lingers in her memory. While she is engaged, in the interests of the piano, in airing the drawing-room at Owlscot, the Irishman enters by the window. The flirtation is resumed, and ends in very real love-making. There is a thunder-storm, and Amy Spencer comes to rescue Kate with an umbrella. Tableau! The Irishman is, naturally, none other than Mr. Heath Desmond himself. In Act III. the whole of the Spencer family is happy, except Cousin Kate, who is miserable. She insists on Desmond keeping his word to Amy. But she has not reckoned with the curate. Both gentlemen come to supper, and Amy, after making it up, somewhat to his perturbation, with Desmond, allows it to appear that, after all, she prefers the curate. Or as she puts it, she feels that she is better fitted to become a clergyman's wife. This is undeniably true. The curate suddenly becomes "dear James"; Amy pairs off with him; and Cousin Kate sinks into the arms of her Irishman.

I have left out most of the fun of the piece; partly because fun eludes analysis, partly because I wished to bring the sentiment or emotion, or whatever you like to call it, into relief. For this is what in "Cousin Kate" fails to convince. In comedy, one is of course prepared to take a great deal for granted. That is of the essence of comedy. So far as the incidents are concerned, in particular, the dramatist has a pretty free hand. He may select and arrange them, in moderation and with the fear of farce before his eyes, as he will. That Miss Curtis should happen to travel with her cousin's lover, or that he should come in at the window of Owlscot when she came in at the door, need not trouble one at all. Even with regard to psychology, one is not exigent. The dramatist may, with one proviso, pitch his characters and their motives at whatever degree from real human life and real human ideals he will. He may exaggerate in the direction of cynicism for the purposes of humour, or in the direction of sentimentalism for the purposes of romance. The proviso is merely that, within the plane of reality which he has chosen for himself, he should preserve a consistency. If "Cousin Kate" had been written throughout in the plane, say, of "Les Deux Écoles," there would have been no objection to raise to its issue. But it is not. Kate Curtis is made a real human being, with emotions, affections, self-respect and the rest. Therefore she must behave accordingly. Mr. Davies was not bound to introduce the element of serious sentiment, but he did so, and therefore he must abide by its laws. And I venture to submit that the woman of the world and practical novelist whom he depicts was not particularly likely to fall in love with the first man she met in the train; and that, even if this be waived, she would not have given herself light-heartedly to the man whom she had just discovered to have been making fierce love to her while he was as yet barely free from an engagement to her cousin. I am not speaking of the claim which the other woman had upon him, but only of the obvious insight into his nature which the whole proceeding must necessarily have given her. It is incredible. The whole atmosphere and tone of the last half of the second act is out of plane with the rest of the piece.

How should it have ended? Well, there was no need to end with marriage bells at all. I imagine it somewhat in this fashion. The lovemaking in Act II. is not allowed to go quite so far. Kate Curtis is only half won over, and the entry of Amy Spencer shows her the sort of man with whom she has to deal. The blow to her pride and her romantic instincts is only momentary, and she quickly resolves on Mr. Desmond's discomfiture. In the third act, having discovered Amy's real leanings towards the curate, she leads Desmond on to give his fiancée her freedom, with the hope of herself for his reward. Then she snaps her fingers in his face. I believe that this would have been much truer to nature than Mr. Davies' own resolution, would not have entailed the sacrifice of any of his amusing detail, and would have been a good deal better suited to the histrionic methods of Miss Jeffreys. I am quite willing to admit that this is the captious criticism of one whose attitude towards the contemporary drama is warped by an unfortunate literary bias, and that it is highly improbable that the average playgoer will stop to enquire so nicely into the casuistry of Cousin Kate's soul. But, as I said, there is great promise in Mr. Davies, and where a writer shows promise, it is always tempting to try and reclaim him for the literary drama.

E. K. CHAMBERS.

Art.

A Book and Some Pictures.

By chance I overheard a remark. The talk had been eddying around the recent performances of an eminent portrait painter, and one of the group, a lady, said with an air of finality: "I don't like his portraits. They're so selfish." In the pause that followed I reflected (knowing her) that she did not object to personality indwelling in a work of art; for Botticelli, of all painters the most subjective, is her idol; what she disliked was the personality of this particular painter. He, like most craftsmen, being inarticulate outside his chosen art, has never attempted to explain why he paints in this arrogant, take-me-or-leave-me manner. He does it, and that suffices for him. Rarely does the creative artist attempt to analyse his methods: he cannot, any more than an orator can explain how he can bend a multitude temporarily to his will, or an essayist how he gingerly approaches his point, stays there a moment, and then lingeringly withdraws from it. When a painter does attempt this forlorn hope it is the method he has evolved for himself that he strives to explain, not the general laws. We all know Mr. W. L. Wyllie's wide sea and shore pieces, with his high horizon line, and the suggestion of infinite space that he can give on a little canvas by means of his figures and boats, arranged on his theory of perspective, which is so essentially mathematical that it looks as if he made his artistic vision subservient to his compasses. He has now written a book, a delightful picture-book with elucidatory text, explaining the significance of the "one-eyed science" which is perspective, as it appears to him. The volume is called "Nature's Laws and the Making of Pictures" (Arnold), and I gather that it is written, not for the student, but for the edification of Mr. Wyllie's professional brethren. But how can it serve them? His personality, in the shape of drawings made to illustrate the text, abounds in the pages, and the painter who follows his method of designing a picture on the supposition that the horizon line passes through the top button of his sitter's waistcoat, or his chin, would produce an imitation Wyllie, not an original work. Perspective, like grammar, must be acquired by some, but with most the eye and the ear, constantly used, are apt substitutes for the lack of profound knowledge of these subjects. The book is welcome for the sake of the drawings, and a curious adult like myself, or an ambitious student struggling with a Newlyn beach, or a departure of a fishing fleet, may gain precise knowledge from the text; but I fear it would not be of much service to the artists whose productions I have seen this week. They were Mr. Lewis Baumer, M. Simon Bussy, M. Roux Champion, and Matthew Maris.

Mr. Baumer is an illustrator, whose work, graceful with a faint ripple of humour, has been seen in the weekly papers during the past ten years. His delicate, broken line does not lend itself well to reproduction, and so I was glad to see some of his pencil and chalk drawings at the Montagu Fordham Gallery in Maddox Street. His subjects are nearly all girls, slight and pretty, not in the least like the ideal types of girls, so unattractive, that some of his contemporaries contribute to the summer number of "The Sketch"; but studies in daintiness and charm, touched in so lightly that they seem to be almost blown upon the paper. Colour, to Mr. Baumer, is a luxury. A black ribbon round a neck with a pendant gold locket, a touch of blue or red in a sash, a few bright strands of hair—are all he allows himself. Not for him the splash of red that sets the canvas in a flame, or the bold line assertive as the outline of hills against an empty sky: rather the tentative pencil marks that gently suggest a smile, or the folds that a petticoat takes when the hand cajoles it away from the feet. It would be easy to say what these drawings are not. Such epithets as bold, vigorous, clamant do not describe them, but they are very pretty and attractive, and the observer is at home with them at once. I do not say this is an advantage or a disadvantage. I state a fact, remembering a story told by Mrs. Humphry Ward the other day about Degas. That great draughtsman stimulates, provokes argument, set the wits working, declines to let you fathom him. Mr. Baumer pleases at once, like the sight of an English park with deer beneath the trees. But to the Degas story. It was told to Mrs. Ward by Monsieur Halévy: "Degas, in my youth, gave me one of his famous sketches of a dancer. I brought it home to my wife, and we quarrelled for days as to which was the head and which were the feet. Each friend that came in took sides, and blew up the strife. We hung it up differently, three times a week. At last—suddenly—we saw! We rushed to it. Tiens, mon ami!—there is the head—there are the arms—the toes! So the husband and wife 'kissed again with tears.' Then the friends began to see. And now it has become the jewel and glory of the house; the instructed and the uninstructed alike know the correct thing to say about it: and nobody of course will ever believe that he saw anything wrong with it from the beginning."

M. Simon Bussy at the Pastel Society, of which I wrote last week, was startling, and I defy anybody ever to believe that his portrait of Mr. Henley is right; but M. Bussy at the Carfax Gallery, where he is showing twenty-one pastels, is persuasive, sane, and attractive. He has wandered over the lovely parts of the continent, he has absorbed lyrical effects of colour and atmosphere, and he has used his pastel sticks like a master. Three times has he evoked the fir-trees of Jura—at dawn, at twilight and in the greyest hour of a grey day. These are decorative pictures, unworried by human things, dim, bare and blank save for the masses of trees crowning the hills. In no such solitary hour did M. Bussy see Monte Carlo: not the sophisticated plateau where the Casino stands, but below, a little round the coast where the sea ripples against the shore. This is a picture of sheer sunshine, shining on the waves, on the sails of the boats, and on the red-roofed houses that climb up from the sea. In Martigues, another view of blue vibrating waves, the line of houses caresses the waters as if, through agelong association, akin to them, and above hangs a gust cloud in a still sky. This is the way to use pastel; swiftly, without premeditation, to chronicle some passing glory of the sun-coloured earth, the lively movements of summer waves, or groups of trees at morning twilight partaking of the silent movement of dawn. Or, to follow another mood, there was a day that found M. Bussy at Bruges. It was raining; and the water splattered on the forlorn gabled houses and into the canals whipped by the wind. He made a little picture of the place and the hour. "Bruges par un temps de pluie" is a small pastel, as expressive of personal vision as the Monte Carlo piece, or the firs on the Jura. How, I ask, could Mr. Wyllie's book assist the creator of these impressions?

The volume might perhaps be of service to M. Roux Champion, another French artist who is holding an exhibition at the Goupil Gallery. M. Roux Champion is, I imagine, young: he is, I know, a friend and an admirer of M. L'hermitte's, that master of right tones, and grave harmonies; but M. Roux Champion has not benefited, as an artist, by the friendship. Hardly a drawing of these views in and around Paris but has its strident colour scheme—harsh tints unrelated to each other, with no veil of atmosphere to soften their tartness. It is a far cry from this restless pastelist, catching at a transient effect, to a master like Matthew Maris, whose method is to brood over a subject till his vision comes full circle, and he can contrive a picture of Nature, not as she is at a particular instant, but as she looks to eyes that have codified her glints of gladness, her greyness and gloom into one scene that is herself not only at this moment, but also yesterday and to-morrow. Such a picture is Matthew Maris's "Souvenir of Amsterdam," a section of the city seen through a temperament, vociferous with life, running into many details, but unified into one restful impression, and in colour like a well-thumbed parchment.

C. L. H.

Science.

Racial Decay.

THAT Froude was not accurate when he said that political economy had been "banished to the exterior planets," everyone will fain admit. Such a science there must be; but I am here concerned to impugn neither Free Trade nor Protection, but Ignorance as the underlying cause of the present degeneration of the physique of our people. This ignorance resides, generally speaking, in our lowest and our ruling classes.

First, then, to demonstrate the fact of racial decay. If we take the Registrar-General's report for last year it is found that the birth-rate of London, to take an example, was 30 per 1,000, the lowest ever recorded, and 0.5 below the figure for the preceding year. To be brief and general, the birth-rate and the death-rate are falling in all civilised countries. Obviously there must be volumes to be written on this last sentence as a thesis, but here and now I want merely to observe that the birth-rate is falling; and I would further ask the reader to take my word for it that though this may follow in part the deliberate and purposive intention of the race, it is also attributable in part to the physical decay which is only too amply demonstrated by other means.

Seeing then that proportionately fewer children are born, what of their destiny? They are heirs of the legacy bequeathed to the Mammalia by "æonian evolution." The Mammalian mother suckles her young. There is no space here to discuss the significance of this sublime method, nor to vindicate the use of that adjective. Suffice it that there, assuredly there, is the germ of ethics, of altruism, and of that charity which never faileth. There, also, is the only safe method by which the nurseling shall become a man. Daily, in the more "advanced" nations of the earth, that method is obsolescent. Many reasons there are; amongst others the fact that the mother of the poorest classes is herself—poor creature—unfit for so high an exercise of the maternal function. But what is the consequence? Observe the vital statistics of the next few weeks. Observe how the infants die like flies in our great towns. Last year about one child in seven of this imperial race died in the first year of life, and the records of Berlin corroborate what is common experience in this country, and what Paris is now making desperate efforts to rectify; that the death-rate amongst artificially-fed children—children, that is, fed on septic milk, in which microbes are multiplying under the grateful warmth of a summer sun—is thirty times as high as amongst naturally fed children. The infantile mortality in this country was higher last year than in 1833, whilst the general mortality was 21 per cent. lower. "Acute milk poisoning" is a common phrase in American advertisements. I wonder how many readers ever heard of it, and how many more are inclined to question its accuracy.

But what of the survivors. Many die in the second and third years from various maladies to which the great tribulation of their earlier months has made them susceptible. Let us consider the comparatively small fraction of all the children born who reach the school-going age. By this I do not mean, of course, the age at which children are sent to school, but the age at which they should be. There is a difference of a lustrum. Now it has recently been shown that the children in the board schools of our great towns are very far from physical perfection. In Scotland a commission has been sitting on physical training, and has recommended the need for it; pity 'tis that the cure is not so easy as athleticism thinks. Meanwhile the fact has been discovered that seventy per cent. of Edinburgh school children suffer from more or less physical deficiency. Let me correlate with this a fact which I believe to be closely connected therewith. In Aberdeen the school children are bad enough, but much superior to those of Edinburgh. Now the use of oatmeal porridge—that admirable and uninteresting food—is declining far more rapidly in Edinburgh than in Aberdeen, so far as may be judged from the inquiry carried on in the poorer quarters of Edinburgh by some of the feminine medical students in that city. To save space, let me say at once that the general record of the schools of our great towns is similar, notably in the case of London.

Finally, let us take the records of the Army. These tally with those from other sources. More recruits are rejected, proportionately, each year, so that an absurdly-worded regulation has recently been issued whereby all fixed standards of height and weight and chest measurement are practically abolished, and the examining medical officer may pass the applicant if he is satisfied that his defects are due to "imperfect nutrition" rather than to "constitutional taint." "Taint" began its exodus from medical literature thirty years ago, and is now obsolete. I suppose it conveys some substitute for an idea. Why was this change necessary, and why is its wording so vague and amorphous? Simply to meet the exigencies of the case. The men were yearly being turned away in larger proportions. They show worse teeth to the examiner almost daily: the ratio between 1901 and 1900 is simply appalling. It is perhaps not universally known that the embryonic cells which will form the adult teeth are present in the baby, and that their health is at the mercy of the educational methods which insist on a girl's familiarity with our absurd coinage system or the birth-date of some illiterate king, but omit to tell her that it is criminal to feed a baby on "anything that's going."

And so we come to causation. We may call it toxæmia or blood-poisoning. And what are the poisons that are daily in greater quantity introduced into the blood of our race? They are bad air, septic milk, alcohol (consumed by the women—the mothers—of this country in threefold the quantity of twenty-five years ago), tobacco, and many more. Obviously each of these needs an article to itself. These are positive evils. There are many negative. Our statesmen talk about corn. I wonder how many of them know and teach that white bread is embodied ignorance, and that its nutritive qualities are far inferior to those of brown bread; that only a few invalids are even economically justified in eating it; and that the taste for it, as compared with brown bread, is acquired and artificial. But study of the simple structure of a wheat-grain, with its valuable salt-containing husk, its outer brown and its inner white components—each with its own value as a food—is not compulsory, methinks, in the Etonian curriculum. I have been hammering in other places for months at this national question, which reached the Lower House last week and the Upper House this week; but why, under the heading of Science, which looks forward to a universal Society of Friends, do I here concern myself with the people merely of what Carlyle called "this remarkable island"? Certainly not that the national feeling, as such, is not an ancestral relic which, with its hideous consequences, is utterly abominable at this hour alike to science and to religion. But rather that the most earnest and searching desire to extirpate one's prejudices cannot disturb the belief that Britain is the first factor at this hour in that evolutionary process which is to make less sorrowful what Wordsworth called "the unintelligible world"; nor the assurance that Mr. William Watson was right when he said—

"And God the poorer for her overthrow."

C. W. SALEEBY.

Correspondence.

"On the Best Prose Style."

SIR,—Your readers will, I think, have found much to interest them in the suggestive article with the above title.

There is considerable divergence between the views of different critics on the subject of the cultivation of style. Mr. Frederic Harrison, in an address to Oxford undergraduates, said: "Be natural, be simple, be yourself; shun artifices, tricks, fashions. Gain the tone of ease, plainness, self-respect. To thine own self be true. Speak out frankly that which you have thought out in your own brain and have felt within your own soul. This, and this alone, creates a perfect style." These words are worthy of attention, especially from those who are disposed to think more of the manner than of the matter of their writings. But style is important. Therefore, Matthew Arnold's remarks about Attic and Asiatic prose, and Walter Pater's Essay on Style, deserve careful reading.

Pater enforces the necessity of a scholarly choice of fitting words, and the need of literary architecture which he says is "the special function of the mind in style," and he asserts that "one of the greatest pleasures of really good prose literature is in the critical tracing out of that conscious artistic structure and the pervading sense of it as we read." When Pater goes on to speak of the function of soul in style, we feel out of our depth. His views are vague and elusive, or at any rate they are more difficult to grasp. He seems, however, to refer to the personal note, the influence of the individual, welding thought and expression into a perfect whole. Near the close of the essay are the following striking words:—

If music be the ideal of all art whatever, precisely because in music it is impossible to distinguish the form from the substance or matter, the subject from the expression, then, literature, by finding its specific excellence in the absolute correspondence of the term to its import, will be but fulfilling the condition of all artistic quality in things everywhere, of all good art.

Good art but not necessarily great art; the distinction between great art and good art depending immediately, as regards literature at all events, not on its form, but on the matter.

The last sentence is especially noteworthy. The critics are unanimous on one point. In great literary art it is the substance, not the form, that chiefly matters.—Yours, &c.,
Otterburn, Northumberland. H. P. WRIGHT.

"The Last of It?"

SIR,—What would Carlyle himself say of this controversy about which all but the blindest partisans hope with you that the publication of Mr. Froude's notes may be set down as "The Last of It"? An excerpt from "Heroes" may be taken as an answer. After a description of the Giotto portrait of Dante, in which he might have had his own mournful features in view, he writes of Dante's marriage in such a way as to suggest that he was conscious of more than an outward resemblance to the Hero poet:—

Dante was wedded; but it seems not happily, far from happily. I fancy the rigorous earnest man, with his keen excitabilities, was not altogether easy to make happy. We will not complain of Dante's miseries; had all gone aright with him, as he wished it, he might have been Prior, Podestà, or whatsoever they call it, of Florence, well accepted among neighbours—and the world had wanted one of the most notable words ever spoken or sung. . . . We will complain of nothing. A nobler destiny was appointed for this Dante; and he, struggling like a man led towards death and crucifixion, could not help fulfilling it. Give him the choice of his happiness! He knew not, more than we do, what was really happy, what was really miserable.

—Yours, &c.,
Chateau de Meyracq, Arudy.

C. H. MINCHIN.

Our Weekly Competition.

Result of No. 196 (New Series).

Last week we offered a prize of One Guinea for a brief essay which best succeeded in getting away from its subject. Twenty-eight replies have been received. We award the prize to Mrs. Calvert Spensley, 3, Provost Road, Hampstead, N.W., for the following:—

A BIT OF OLD SILVER.

There is a certain subtle charm in a quaint piece of old silver, even though it may not bear the compelling fascination of a great master's workmanship. My thoughts turn to things humbler than those fantastic marvels that find a fitting home in kings' treasuries: to such things, for example, as this old Dutch spoon of mine, which might be a fairy gift for the joy it has given me, the dreams it has created for me.

I saw it first behind the dusty panes of a little shop in Bruges. Strange little shop! Its recesses were full of the same delightful confusion as its window, full of the carved and wrought metals that Van Eyck and Memling had painted so glowingly long years before, lying side by side with trumpery tiles and cheap pottery designed—contemptuously, one wondered?—to appeal to the bargain-loving tourist. For the old master of the shop knew the true worth and history of his wares, and was quite conscious, as a twinkle and a shrug acknowledged, that these were but Needy Knife-grinders amongst their richer kin, and story, Lord bless you, they had none to tell! He was, indeed, one of those people whose personality makes an immediate and distinct impression: behind his air of gay and gentle courtesy even the passing stranger must needs perceive the individual—so rare a creature nowadays! Try to describe an acquaintance, and see how painfully well the careful catalogue fits some dozen others: "item, two lips indifferent red; item, a grey eye or so"!

But even yet there are men here and there to whom life is a thing most vivid and vital, perhaps passionately glad, perhaps—alas, probably!—profoundly tragic, but never the dull, level plain over which the vast majority plod from first to last . . . and the secret is hid in their hearts.

Other replies follow:—

TRUTH.

There is no subject so absorbing as Truth. I hardly know which is most to be pitied, the man who expects to find Truth, or the man who attempts to provide it. The habit of expecting things, which came into the country with party Government, is a serious inconvenience. It excites a Stoicism entirely unwarranted by the nature of the event, and leads to a desperate acquiescence in anything that turns up. Plover's eggs in April, and the sun in June, are foregone conclusions. I have seen a man expecting his plover's eggs swallow complacently the eggs of a black-bird. I have seen another stretched upon his lawn in June, the thermometer one degree below freezing point, fanning himself with his straw hat. Again, I have heard a child cry out, "Oh, beautiful daisy"; a gale of wind sweeps over the garden and the child, turning its shuddering glance upon the twisted bloom, exclaims "What, oh, what is this horrible beetle?"

These are commonplaces, but there is a method in illustration, as in madness, though facts to prove my point will carry no weight. Events stultify and fructify, and when all is said and done we are no nearer the end than we are to the beginning. Still in our frantic efforts to arrive, pursuing Pontius Pilate, we supply copy for the journalist and offer our crystal clear gaze and friendly agreement to the world in which we live.

[L. J., Newport.]

ON THE SUBJECT OF THIS ESSAY.

I am reminded of a game I have sometimes played, when geography and telegrams moved satiety. We called it "Trains of Thought," and it worked thus: Taking a random word from any book, each player in a given time wrote down the heads of such ideas as were honestly and in strict sequence suggested to him. In no manner could individual character display itself more simply, since, say "Brandy" were your starting-point, three brains might proceed thus:—

Brandy.	Brandy.	Brandy.
Snappedragon.	Channel Crossinga.	Faints.
Christmas.	Going Abroad.	Doctors.
Snow.	Cathedrals.	Hospitals.
North Pole.	Church Music.	Knights Hospitaliers.
Polar Bear.	Concerts.	Middle Ages.
Zoo.	Padereswaki.	Crusades.
Buns.	Hair.	Jerusalem.

The results arrived at being in almost every case surprisingly diverse. The society that affirms telepathic communication between souls might find dissatisfaction in the wide gap so rapidly achieved between Jerusalem and buns; but since each theory fathers its evidence and proves its wish, the wide field of coincidence is marked for the marvellous own, and there is little need for him to peep above the wall. It has been said that the occult, seriously believed in, can lead only to despair; and some, themselves knowing the glamour, are disposed upon the whole to agree. No sense more illusory than human vision, no proof more fallible than human evidence. Do not our courts of law attest it? Three honest men witness the same deed, and each will differ in details, stiff in his certainty. How then of history? Litera Scripta Manet, perhaps alone. Negatively, anything in the world may be proved; the non-existence of Napoleon, for instance . . . a powerful personality to annihilate.

But it comes in the end to this: much is held secret from us, and many hunger as of old for the tree of knowledge. Cui bono? Ashes in the grasp. Poor and content is best.

[B. C. H., London.]

ON HATS AND HEADGEAR.

As the human head is the seat of the brain and its eccentricities, it is perhaps not wonderful that in the adornment of it the essential insanity of mankind should be most manifest. From the Indian, whose leggings, sandals, and so forth have each some practical use, while his head alone bristles incongruously with the plumage of the fowl, you may travel to the theatre-goer, female of sex, who interposes between your eye and the stage one circle of straw, one sea-gull, strangely winged with green, one spray of violets in unnatural union with the foliage of the rose, and a discarded portion of the tail of the African ostrich. Her offence is from no want of heart, but from a plentiful lack of imagination. Is it not true that while most of us can trace all the disasters of our lives to the fact that our hearts were "in the right place"—a place accessible to our neighbours—the truly imaginative are as rare as a sunbeam in an English June? We not only lack imagination, but we dislike it actively. We will not have it in our literature. A man who has painted for us the shore of the Lake of Dreams is reproached because he has not held the mirror up to Tottenham Court Road. We will not have it in our young. The child who meets a yellow fairy in green stockings risks a beating from the parent who sees no more than a very ordinary buttercup. Imagination is a wanderer "known to the police"—a Peri that will hardly pass the barrier of our customs. But there are some that have heard a strange, low voice in the pause of the strident voices; and have listened for it until death has caught them listening.

[A. L. G. H., London.]

ON THE IMPORTANCE OF THE BACKGROUND.

Most people can understand the drawing, colour and composition of a picture, but the subtle relation of every object to its background remains a mystery, which painters themselves often ignore. The novelist's art appeals more intimately to the public; wherefore he is more often thorough in designing his work.

To the average man, a lady on her way to a Drawing-room is absurd, but inside the palace he would find her no longer ridiculous. A jewel owes everything to its setting, and the fairest opal loses its attraction on an ugly hand. I have heard a singularly beautiful woman described as "nice-looking" by a friend who was neither stupid nor indifferent, but who had seen her only in London, leading the harassed life of a professional woman. But set her in the woods and they seem to have waited her coming to complete their spell; or on the uplands and they are the more breezy by reason of her fleetness. She shares the shy, alluring charm of the wild creatures that she loves, and regards you with an eye as soft, and dark, and defiant as theirs.

The manners and moral code of an Englishman suit his temperate climate and grey heavens, but he is apt to forget that they may seem less admirable against the crumbling monuments of a majestic past, or the breadth of more radiant skies.

But, indeed, to see anyone with the sky for their background is a severe test, and perhaps the venerable compilers of our Church catechism were persuaded that most of us would look very unlovely in a higher sphere than that whereto we were born.

["Lee," London.]

ON SMOKING BY LADIES.

I believe nothing but good would result were all women to adopt the soothing and sociable habit of smoking. That trying time, the honeymoon, would be endurable if, when terms of endearment were exhausted, the bridegroom could, as a matter of course, bring out his cigarette case, proffer it to the bride, and ask whether she preferred a Turkish or a Virginian. No longer would they be mere husband and wife, but comrades, and the foundations of a lifelong amity would be raised. After a few years of matrimony many ladies seldom open their lips to their husbands except to utter a querulous complaint or a dreary commonplace. I am persuaded that if their lips were sometimes opened to receive a cigarette their conversation would be more cheering and heartsome, since I have observed that smokers, though often inclined to gravity of demeanour, are yet cheerful and companionable. If you are ever so unfortunate as to make the acquaintance of a "clown in private life" ten chances to one you will find him to be a non-smoker. The kindly soul who laughs with you and not at you looks at life through a mellowing haze of tobacco smoke, and his jests are "seasoned" and ripe like the polished "briar" he cherishes so carefully. No gift of the gods can be compared to the friendship of such a comrade. He is not as the clown aforesaid, the "pass the salt" humorist, the empty idol of a brainless circle, whose wit is impertinence, and his humour vulgarity. No; this comrade, this true humorist, listens to your words with gravity, smiles at your follies with a tremble on his lip, joins in your honest laughter, and grasps your hand in sympathetic silence when the inevitable hour of sorrow comes at last.

[T. McE., Belfast.]

Competition No. 197 (New Series).

This week we offer a prize of One Guinea for the best comment, not exceeding 150 words, on any article, review, or paragraph appearing in this number of the ACADEMY.

RULES.

Answers addressed, "Literary Competition, THE ACADEMY, 43, Chancery Lane, W.C.," must reach us not later than the first post of Wednesday, 1 July, 1903. Each answer must be accompanied by the coupon to be found on the second page of Wrapper, or it cannot enter into competition. Competitors sending more than one attempt at solution must accompany each attempt with a separate coupon; otherwise the first only will be considered. Contributions to be written on one side of the paper only.

New Books Received.

THEOLOGICAL AND BIBLICAL.

- Robertson (John M.), Pagan Christs.....(Watts) net 8/6
 Gray (George Buchanan), A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on Numbers.....(T. and T. Clark) 12/0
 Longides (Artemus), Higher Criticism as Applied to Itself.....(Authors and Booksellers Co-operative Alliance) 1/0
 Foakes-Jackson (F. J.), The Biblical History of the Hebrews.....(Arnold) 6/0
 Griffinhoofe (O. G.), The Unwritten Sayings of Jesus.....(") 3/0

POETRY, ORITICISM, AND BELLES LETTRES.

- Wilmshurst (Walter Leslie), Nature Poems and Other Verses.....(Brimley Johnson) net 3/6
 Indicus, The Olympiad.....(Mathews) net 5/0
 Moulton (Richard G.), The Moral System of Shakespeare.....(Macmillan) net 6/0
 Moon (George Washington), The Bishop's English.....(Sonnenschein) 3/6
 Whitethorn (Marcus), Jenny Wren Up to Date.....(") 1/0

HISTORY AND BIOGRAPHY.

- Holborn (J. B. Stoughton), Great Masters in Painting and Sculpture: Jacopo Robusti, called Tintoretto.....(Bell) net 5/0
 Staley (Edgcombe), Jean Francois Millet.....(") net 1/0
 Scott (McDougal), Sir Edward Landseer, R.A......(") net 1/0
 Atlay (J. B.), Sir Henry Wentworth Acland, Bart: A Memoir.....(Smith, Elder) net 14/0
 Disbrowe (O. A. A.), Old Days in Diplomacy.....(Jarrold) net 10/6
 Conybeare (Edward), Early Roman Britain.....(S.P.O.K.) 3/6
 Webster (Rev. Wentworth), Gleanings in Church History.....(") 4/0
 Archaeologia Aeliana. Part 60.....(Reid)
 Albee (John), Remembrances of Emerson.....(Gay and Bird) net 4/6
 Rossetti (William Michael), Compiled by, Rossetti Papers, 1862 to 1870.....(Sands) net 10/6
 Acton (The late Lord), Planned by, The Cambridge Modern History. Vol. VII. The United States.....(Cambridge University Press) net 16/0
 Wadmore (James Foster), Some Account of the Worshipful Company of Skinners of London.....(Blades) 21/0

SCIENCE AND PHILOSOPHY.

- Royce (Josiah), Outlines of Psychology.....(Macmillan) net 4/6

TRAVEL AND TOPOGRAPHY.

- King (W. J. Harding), A Search for the Masked Tawareks.....(Smith, Elder) 12/6
 Christopolis. Life and its Amenities in a Land of Garden Cities. (Partridge) net 2/0

EDUCATIONAL.

- Lloyd (E. J.), Entrance Scholarship Questions.....(Sonnenschein) net 5/0

MISCELLANEOUS.

- Baltico, Life on "The Baltic," and Shipping Idylls for Shipping Idlers.....(Ward, Lock) 3/6
 Upward (Allen), The Log of the "Folly".....(Isbister) net 1/0
 Sister Medicatrix, Nurses and Nursing.....(Authors and Booksellers Co-operative Alliance) 0/8
 Sandlands (J. P.), Water and Air.....(") 0/4
 Quacks and what they do(") 0/6

MISCELLANEOUS—continued.

Meccredy (R. J.), The Motor Book.....(Lane)	3/0
Church Bells : Their Uses, their Romance, and their History ("Sheffield Telegraph")
The Zoo, and what to see there.....("Pall Mall")	0/6
King (Joseph), The School Manager.....(Arnold)	1/0
Monjés (Mortimer and Dorothy), World's Children.....(Black) net	2/0

NEW EDITIONS.

Fitzgerald (Percy), Selected by, Pickwickian Wit and Humour (Gay and Bird) net	2/6
Morris (William), The Defence of Guenevere and Other Poems (Longmans) net	1/6
Holland (Clive), My Japanese Wife.....(Everett)	3/6
Pope (Alexander), The Odyssey of Homer.....(Richards) net	1/0
Dryden (John), The Works of Virgil.....(") net	1/0
Shakespeare (Wm.), The Edinburgh Folio : Troilus and Cressida(") net	5/0
The Temple Bible : New Testament Apocryphal Writings.....(Dent)	1/0
An Englishwoman's Love Letters.....(Murray) net	1/0
Lorraine (Nevison), The Battle of Belief.....(S.P.C.K.)	2/6
Gaborian (Emile), In Deadly Peril.....(Ward, Lock)	1/6
Magnay (Sir William), The Red Chancellor.....(")	0/6
Ford (Harold), The Art of Extempore Speaking.....(Stock) net	2/6
Marston (R. B.), Walton and Some Earlier Writers on Fish and Fishing (Stock) net	1/6
Parry (Edward Abbott), Letters from Dorothy Osborne to Sir William Temple (Sherratt)	6/0
Meade (L. T.), and Eustace (Robert), The Sanctuary Club.....(Ward, Lock)	0/6

PERIODICALS.

Royal, Photo-Miniature, Pall Mall Magazine, Ainslee's, Leisure Hour, Sunday at Home, Boy's Own, Girl's Own, Woman at Home, Pictorial Comedy, Longman's House Beautiful, Magazine of Art, Art Journal, Art, Cassell's, Chambers's.

NEW BOOKS NEARLY READY.

The first four volumes of the Clarendon Press edition of the "Letters of Horace Walpole," edited by Mrs. Paget Toynbee, will be ready in November. There will be sixteen volumes in all. Mrs. Toynbee has obtained the use of over 400 letters not included in the latest edition of the collected letters, and upwards of a hundred of these have never before been printed. A careful collation of the text with the original MSS. has revealed many curious and interesting passages hitherto suppressed, and also many serious errors in transcription. The notes, except those written by Horace Walpole himself, have been compiled anew by Mrs. Toynbee, who has also prepared a very full analytical index. This new edition will be illustrated with fifty photogravure portraits of Walpole and his circle and with facsimiles.

Volume II. of the Cambridge Modern History, being the third in the order of publication, is now in the press. It relates to the Reformation. There are eighteen chapters, and among the contributors are Mr. A. F. Pollard, who deals with the conflict of creeds and parties in Germany; the Rev. T. M. Lindsay, of the Free Church College, Glasgow, who contributes a critical biography of Luther; Dr. James Gairdner, who writes on Henry VIII.; and the Rev. A. M. Fairbairn, who writes on "European Thought in the Theological Age."

Mr. Edward Wilberforce, a Master of the Supreme Court, will publish with Messrs. Macmillan a translation of "Dante's Inferno" into the English ottava rimà. In the same volume are included versions of several passages from Goethe's "Faust," from Schiller, Heine, and other Continental poets.

Messrs. Harper and Brothers will publish next week Mr. Carl Snyder's "New Conceptions in Science." The volume contains fourteen papers, some of which have appeared in Harper's magazine. It is prefaced by this quotation from Sir Oliver Lodge: "The ordinary run of men live among phenomena of which they care nothing, and know less. They see bodies fall to the earth, they hear sounds, they kindle fires, they see the heavens roll above them, but of the causes and inner workings of the whole they are ignorant, and with their ignorance they are content."

THE PLAY- 6^d. Net. PICTORIAL

An Illustrated Monthly Journal.

EACH NUMBER DEALING WITH A SINGLE PLAY.

- No. 1. "MICE AND MEN" (Sixth Edn.)
 „ 2. "A COUNTRY MOUSE" (Fourth Edition).
 „ 3. "THE TOREADOR" (Fifth Edn.)
 „ 4. "QUALITY STREET" (Second Edition).
 „ 5. "THREE LITTLE MAIDS."
 „ 6. "MONSIEUR BEAUCAIRE" (Third Edition).
 „ 7. "IF I WERE KING."
 „ 8. "A COUNTRY GIRL."
 „ 9. "THE LIGHT THAT FAILED."
 „ 10. "A PRINCESS OF KENSINGTON."
 „ 11. Special Summer No. "THE ADMIRABLE CRICHTON."
 „ 12. "THE CLANDESTINE MARRIAGE" (July 1st).

And on the first of each succeeding month.

The Play-Pictorial stands alone amongst illustrated journalism on the following points:—

1. Originality of Design.
2. Novelty of Purpose.
3. Number of Illustrations (80 and over in each issue).
4. The freshness of its Pictures.
(Each one being the sole Copyright of the Play-Pictorial, and taken specially for that Journal.)
5. The perfection of its Printing.
6. Unprecedented Success.

IT IS A SHILLING JOURNAL FOR SIXPENCE.
Post Free Eightpence.

PLAY-PICTORIAL POST CARDS

of each of the above Plays (in separate packets),
12 in a packet, beautifully engraved.

ONE SHILLING. (Postage id.)

The PLAY-PICTORIAL, 35, Wellington St., Strand, W.C.

JANUARY 3, 1903.

The Academy and Literature

WEEKLY: THREEPENCE

W. H. NARD & CO.

Digitized by Google

TO BOOKBUYERS and LIBRARIANS of FREE LIBRARIES.—The JANUARY CATALOGUE of Valuable SECOND-HAND WORKS and NEW REMAINDERS, offered at prices greatly reduced, is Now Ready, and will be sent post free upon application to W. H. SMITH & SON, Library Department, 186, Strand, London, W.C.

CHANGE OF ADDRESS.

TRUSLOVE, HANSON & COMBA, Book-sellers, announce that they have removed from 143, Oxford Street, to much larger premises at 153, Oxford Street (five doors nearer to Oxford Circus, on the same side of the street), and the greatly increased space at their command will enable them to keep the largest stock of current literature in London.

JUST PUBLISHED, a CATALOGUE of the BEST NEW BOOKS, offered at a discount of 25 per Cent., except on those published at net prices. A copy sent post free on application. Orders for Books received by the morning post are executed the same day.

TRUSLOVE, HANSON & COMBA, Ltd.,
153, OXFORD STREET, and 611, SLOANE STREET,
LONDON.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
Importers of Foreign Books,
14, Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7,
Broad Street, Oxford.
CATALOGUES post free on application.

FOREIGN BOOKS AND PERIODICALS promptly supplied on moderate terms.
CATALOGUES on application.
DULAU & Co., 37, Soho Square.

BOOKS AT GREATLY REDUCED PRICES.
PUBLISHERS' REMAINDERS.
Supplementary List, DECEMBER (No. 331), just Ready. MANY NEW PURCHASES.

WILLIAM GLAISHER,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

FIRST EDITIONS of MODERN AUTHORS, including Dickens, Thackeray, Lever, Ainsworth; Books illustrated by G. and R. Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson, Leech, &c. The largest and choicest Collection offered for Sale in the World. Catalogues issued and sent post free on application. Books Bought.—WALTER T. SPENCER, 27, New Oxford Street, London, W.C.

BOOKS WANTED.—"In Memoriam," 1851; Gamonia, 1837; Laing's Ballads, 1872; Queen Mab, 1813; Catalogues free. Please state wants. 100,000 for sale and wanted.—HOLLAND BOOK Co., 35, John Bright Street, Birmingham.

BOOKSELLERS IN BIRMINGHAM.—"EDWARD BAKER, John Bright Street, is the best second-hand bookseller in that town."—Editor, Bazaar.

BOOKS WANTED, £5 each work offered.—All have Coloured Illustrations—Ackermann's Microscopium, 3 vols., 1808; Alken's National Sports, 1825; Roadster's Album, 1845; Life of a Race Horse, 1848; Analysis Hunting Field, 1846; Life of John Mytton, 1835; Life of a Sportsman, 1842; Excursion to Brightelmstone, 1790; Confessions of an Oxonian, 3 vols., 1826; Ireland's Life of Napoleon, 4 vols., 1823-28; Annals of Gallantry, 3 vols., 1814; Comforts of Bath, 1798.—BAKER'S Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

AMSTERDAM, 26-29 JANUARY, 1903.

SALE BY AUCTION OF

The very important LIBRARIES of the CASTLES of HEESWIJK and HAAREN.

MESSRS. FREDERIK MULLER & Co. will Sell by Auction at their Rooms, Doelenstraat 10, Amsterdam, on Monday, 26th January, 1903, and following days, the LIBRARIES of the CASTLES of HEESWIJK and HAAREN, including MANUSCRIPTS, EARLY PRINTING, REMARKABLE IMPRESSIONS of the XVth-XIXth CENTURIES, MICROSCOPICAL EDITIONS; GEOGRAPHY: AMERICA, ASIA, AUSTRALIA; FINE ARTS, ILLUSTRATED BOOKS, COSTUMES, INDUSTRIAL ARTS, SPORTS, MANNERS and CUSTOMS, HISTORY, TOPOGRAPHY, LITERATURE, LARGE SCIENTIFIC SETS, &c.

The Illustrated Catalogue with Five Plates will be sent on application to Amsterdam.

Doelenstraat 10.

FREDERIK MULLEE & Co.

JOHN BAILLIE and A. E. BONNER,
THE GALLERY,
1, Prince's Terrace, Hereford Road, W.

EXHIBITION of Modern Work, Jewellery, Enamels, Embroideries, &c., &c. Hours, 10.30 to 6. Admission free.

LOCAL HISTORY, GENEALOGY, &c.—Record Office, British Museum, &c.—OXONIENSIS, 14, Lexham Gardens, W.

LADY, with experience of Secretarial Work, experience of Book Trade, Shorthand, Typewriting, with French, Italian, and German, and Cataloguer's knowledge of Latin and Greek, requires SECRETARIAL or LIBRARY, &c. POST. Address Miss H. VIRTUE TEBBS, 56, Kensington Park Road, W.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN SCHOOL SOCIETY,
Temple Chambers, Temple Avenue, London, E.C.

THE Committee deeply regrets that another opportunity of promoting popular education for its own sake, and without regard to ecclesiastical and sectarian interests, has been sacrificed by Parliament. If there must be rivalry and strife, it behoves the friends of British Schools to see that their buildings, trust deeds, &c. are in order, and to ascertain how far their neighbours will work with them in securing the best type of school on common ground and by united action.

Special arrangements are being made in this office for consultation on points of local educational interest and difficulties that may arise in reference to trust deeds, &c.

Enquiries and communications are cordially invited.

ALFRED BOURNE,
Secretary.

LONDON LIBRARY, ST. JAMES'S SQUARE, S.W.

Patron—HIS MAJESTY THE KING. President—SIR LESLIE STEPHEN, K.C.B.

Vice-Presidents—The Right Hon. A. J. BALFOUR, M.P.;

The Right Hon. W. E. H. LECKY, M.P., D.C.L.; HERBERT SPENCER, Esq.

Trustees—Right Hon. LORD AYBURY, F.R.S.; Right Hon. EARL OF ROSEBURY, K.G.;

Right Hon. Sir M. GRANT DUFF, G.C.S.I.

Committee:

Rev. Canon Ainger.
Dr. J. H. Bridges.
Professor Lewis Campbell.
Austin Dobson, Esq.
Sydney Gedge, Esq.
Sir A. Geikie, F.R.S.
Sir R. Giffen, K.C.B., F.R.S.
Edmund Gosse, Esq., LL.D.
Mrs. J. R. Green.

Frederic Harrison, Esq.
Rev. W. Hunt, M.A.
Sir C. P. Ilbert, K.C.S.I.
Sir C. M. Kennedy, C.B.,
K.C.M.G.
Sidney Lee, Esq.
W. S. Lilly, Esq.
Sidney J. Low, Esq.

Frank T. Marzials, Esq., C.B.
Sir F. Pollock, Bart.
Rev. J. Rigg, D.D.
S. Arthur Strong, Esq.
H. R. Tedder, Esq.
Rev. H. Wace, D.D.
Sir Spencer Walpole, K.C.B.
A. W. Ward, Esq., Litt.D.

The Library contains about 20,000 Volumes of Ancient and Modern Literature, in various Languages. Subscription, £3 a year: Life Membership according to age. Fifteen volumes are allowed to Country and Ten to Town Members. Reading-room open from Ten to Half-past Six. CATALOGUE, FIFTH EDITION, 2 vols., 1888, royal 8vo. may still be had.

C. T. HAGBERG WRIGHT, LL.D., Secretary and Librarian.

"THE ACADEMY" LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

New Series.—No. 172.

All readers attempting this week's Competition (described fully on page 20) must cut out this Coupon and enclose it with their reply.

JOHN HEATH'S PENS
No better possible.
24 Samples Post Free for 7d. stamps.
JOHN HEATH & CO. BIRMINGHAM.

ROBINSON & CLEAVER LD., BELFASTAnd 164, 166 & 170, REGENT STREET, LONDON, W.Special Appointments to His Most Gracious Majesty the King and Her Royal Highness the Princess of Wales.IRISH CAMBRIC POCKET-HANDKERCHIEFS.

Bordered—	per doz.	Hemstitched—	per doz.
Children's	1s. 3d.	Ladies'	2s. 9d.
Ladies'	2s. 3d.	Gents'	3s. 11d.
Gents'	3s. 3d.

LINEN COLLARS, CUFFS AND SHIRTS.

Collars, Ladies' 3-fold, from 3s. 6d. per doz. Gents' 4-fold, 4s. 11d. per doz. Cuffs, for Ladies or Gentlemen, from 5s. 11d. per doz.
Shirts, Fine quality longcloth, with 4-fold pure Linen Fronts, 35s. 6d. per half-dozen (to measure, 2s. extra).

OLD SHIRTS made good as new with good Materials in Neck-bands, Cuffs & Fronts for 14s. the half-dozen.

IRISH DAMASK TABLE AND HOUSE LINEN.

Fish Napkins, 2s. 11d. per doz. Dinner Napkins, 5s. 6d. per doz. Table Cloths, 2 yds. square, 2s. 6d.; 2½ yds. by 3 yds., 5s. 6d. each. Kitchen Table Cloths, 11d. each. Strong Huckaback Towels, 4s. 6d. per doz. Frilled Linen Pillow Cases, from 1s. 4½d. each. Monograms, Crests, Coats of Arms, Initials, &c., woven and embroidered.

SAMPLES AND PRICE LISTS POST FREE.

N.B.—To prevent delay, all Letter Orders and inquiries for samples should be sent direct to Belfast.

ABSOLUTE SECURITY.

GENUINE

CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS

Must Bear

Signature of

CARTER'S LITTLE LIVER PILLS

Cure

BILIOUSNESS.
SICK HEADACHE.
TORPID LIVER.
FURRED TONGUE.

INDIGESTION.
CONSTIPATION.
DIZZINESS.
SALLOW SKIN.

SMALL PILL. SMALL DOSE. SMALL PRICE.

Genuine Wrapper Printed on WHITE PAPER, BLUE LETTERS.

Look for the Signature

JANUARY

THE SMART SET

A MAGAZINE OF CLEVERNESS

CHRISTMAS NUMBERCONTENTS

The Lieutenant-Governor	Guy Wetmore Carryl
Sappho to Phaon	John Ernest McCann
The Young Person Next Door	Justus Miles Forman
Through Slumber Gate	John Winwood
The Shadowy Past	James Branch Cabell
Couronne Marine	Carmen Sylva
An Auto's Speed for an Hour	Harold Janssmall
The Rebuff	J. T. Trowbridge
The White Carnation	Francis Livingston
The Jewels	Lucile Watson
A Winter's Tale	Felix Carmen
Alma Adorata	Edgar Saltus
The Magic Call	Venita Seibert
Social Life in Washington	Waldon Finewett
A Portrait	J. A. Reed
Nature Study	Frank Roe Batchelder
The Exiled Star	Maurice Francis Egan
Love Song of Arcady	Augustus Wight Bomberger
Providence, and Miss Green	Rosamond Napier
Nirvana of the Suburbs	Charles Edward Barnes
Sonnets to the Sea	Marrin Dana
An Every-Day Affair	H. G.
Vigilia	Thomas Walsh
Atchoum!	Michael Triceley
A Ghost of a Chance	O. Henry
Will She Remember?	Tom Hall
Aftermath	Myrtle Reed
Among the Hills	Albert Bigelow Paine
The Branding of Circe	Helen Frances Huntington
The Pool	Emery Pottle
"How Could He?"	A. R. M.
A Vagrant	Theodosia Garrison
At Dawn	Nannie Byrd Turner
Overheard at a Studio Tea	Grace Florence Reed
The Change	Tom P. Morgan
The Merchant	Clinton Scollard
The D�butante	Madeline Bridges
Bear and Forbear	Albert Lee
Miss Darcy in Danville	Ethel Sigbee Small
Making Light of Love	Harvey M. Miller
The Bargain	Maud Stepmey Rawson
Travesty	McCrea Pickering
A Romance in Ruffles	Minna Irving
Sun in the Valley	Arthur Stringer
The Magic	Josephine Preston Peabody
Vassals of Fate	Edward Clark Marsh
The Moths Whirl Round	Ernest McGaffey
Human Mathematics	William Hurd Hillier
His Suit	Paul Laurence Dunbar
The Bath Chair	Beatriz Buchanan

ONE SHILLING AS USUAL

ASK YOUR BOOKSELLER FOR

THE SMART SET CALENDARGRATIS TO SUBSCRIBERS*ESS ESS PUBLISHING COMPANY

90-93 Fleet Street, London, E.C.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER,
A.D. 1720.

ROYAL EXCHANGE, LONDON (Head Office).

INCORPORATED BY ROYAL CHARTER,
A.D. 1720.

Fire, Life, Marine, Accidents, Burglary & Employers' Liability.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Claims Paid exceed £41,000,000.

Funds in hand exceed £4,850,000.

FIRE.

Insurances granted Covering Loss or Damage
by Fire at Moderate Rates.

LIFE.

Large Bonuses.
Low Premiums. Unimpeachable Security.

GENERAL ACCIDENTS.

Personal, Accident, and Employers' Liability Insurances are now Granted at Moderate Rates.

Apply for full information to THE SECRETARY: HEAD OFFICE, ROYAL EXCHANGE, LONDON, E.C.

Something New!

A Revelation in Price as well as Quantity.

Sozodont Tooth Powder at 1/-

Introduced 52 years ago. Now offered in an enlarged and improved Box (adopted 1902) with New Patent Can, which keeps the dirt out and the flavour in, while economizing the Powder as used. No waste. No spilling. Handy for travellers. Easy to use. Cleaner and more hygienic than others, and bigger, too.

Many powders contain charcoal, pumice, grit or other things harmful to the Teeth. SOZODONT has none of these. Scientifically made and absolutely pure, it is free from any injurious substances, being prepared from a collection of the purest and choicest ingredients. Too many makers of so-called dentifrices lack the experience and facilities gained by SOZODONT. Now that all Britain and the Colonies may have SOZODONT TOOTH POWDER in a BIG BOX for One Shilling at any Chemist's Shop the already large demand for SOZODONT is increasing and its use becoming still more general. Those who like to use the SOZODONT TOOTH WASH, also, will continue to buy the larger and long-time familiar box containing the Liquid, with the Powder included, price 2/6, or the small size of the Wash alone at 1/-.

HALL & RUCKEL, 46, Holborn Viaduct, London, E.C., and New York, U.S.A.

The Can, with Patent Top.

(Reduced from Full-Size.)

JUNE 27, 1903.

The Academy and Literature

WEEKLY: THREEPENCE

THE GALLERY,

1, Princes Terrace, Hereford Road, W.

EXHIBITION of Drawings and Sketches by LAURENCE HOUSMAN, and Water
Colours by JOHN BAILLIE.

Hours, 10.30 to 6.

JUNE SUPPLEMENT

to Glaisher's Remainder Book Catalogue is
Now Ready.

Extensive Purchases of Publishers' Remainders at Greatly Reduced Prices.

WILLIAM GLAISHER,
Remainder and Discount Bookseller,
265, HIGH HOLBORN, LONDON.

Also Catalogue of Popular Current Literature, and List of French Novels, Classics, &c.

WILLIAMS & NORGATE,
Importers of Foreign Books,
Henrietta Street, Covent Garden; and 7,
Broad Street, Oxford.

CATALOGUES post free on application.

BOOKS.—For any Book on Earth write to
THE HOLLAND HOUSE BOOK STORES,
Birmingham. Entire Libraries purchased. High price paid for First Editions, Presentation
Copies, Books illustrated by Alker, Cruikshank, Phiz, Rowlandson. Catalogues free.

BOOKS WANTED.—25s. each offered.
Handley Cross, 1854; Phillips' Eremus,
1894; Hewlett's Earthwork out of Tuscany,
1895; 100,000 books for sale and wanted. Catalogues free.—JUCKES, Book Merchants, Birmingham.

BOOKSELLERS IN BIRMINGHAM.—
"EDWARD BAKER, John Bright Street, is the best second-hand bookseller in that town."
—Editor, Bazaar.

BOOKS WANTED. 25s. each offered.—Freeman's Historical Geography, 2 vols.; Burke's Armoury and Extinct Peerage, 1883; Earthwork out of Tuscany, 1895; Curzon's Persia, 2 vols.,
1892; George Meredith's Poems, 1851; Keat's
Poems, 1817, 1818 or 1820; Symond's Italian
Literature, 2 vols., 1881; Symond's Essays, 2 vols., 1890; Shirley's Deer Parks, 1867; Desperate Remedies, 3 vols., 1871; Jesse's Richard III.,
1862; Shelley's Poetical Pieces, 1823; Singer's
Shakespeare, 10 vols., 1826; Lorna Doone,
3 vols., 1869; Jane Eyre, 3 vols., 1847. 100,000
Books for SALE and WANTED. State wants.
—BAKER'S Great Bookshop, Birmingham.

"THE ACADEMY" LITERARY COMPETITIONS.

New Series.—No. 197.

All readers attempting this week's Competition (described fully on page 643) must cut out this Coupon and enclose it with their reply.

LONDON COUNTY COUNCIL.

THE Technical Education Board of London County Council is prepared to receive applications for the appointment of Assistant Master in the Camberwell School of Arts and Crafts, to teach subjects preparatory to and including elementary design, to teach elementary figure drawing, and generally to assist in the work of the school. Commencing salary £100 per annum.

Applications must be made on or before
MONDAY, JULY 6th, 1903, on forms to be obtained of the Secretary of the Board, 116,
St. Martin's Lane, W.C.

G. L. GOMME,
Clerk of the Council.

County Hall, S.W.,
June 22nd, 1903.

THE WELSH INTERMEDIATE EDUCATION ACT, CARDIFF SCHEME.

THE Governors are prepared to receive applications for the post of HEAD MASTER for the Cardiff Intermediate School for Boys, rendered vacant by the appointment of the present Head Master, Dr. J. J. Findlay, M.A., to the Chair of Education at The Owens College, Manchester.

The Stipend and Capitation Grant, together, at present amount to £640 per annum, on an attendance of 220 boys, and the remuneration is steadily increasing.

Intending Applicants may obtain particulars of the appointment from the Clerk to the Governors, who will also supply copies of the Scheme.

Applications, accompanied by not more than six testimonials and marked on cover "Head Master," must be in the hands of the undersigned not later than MONDAY, 13TH JULY NEXT.

By Order of the Governors,

DAVID SHEPHERD,
Clerk.

No. 1, Frederick Street, Cardiff,
23rd June, 1903.

TYPEWRITING.—Reviews, Essays, Novels,
Plays, Poetry and Scholastic Work, Correspondence, &c., Typed; or from Dictation (Shorthand if desired). Foreign, Scientific, and difficult MSS. a speciality. Seven years' experience. Duplicating. Specimens, Terms and Authors' References sent.—GRAHAM, 34,
Strand, W.C. (near Charing Cross Station).

TYPEWRITING.—Authors' MSS., Legal,
Dramatic, and Scientific, carefully copied, from 10d. per 1,000 words. Excellent references and testimonials.—TYPIST, 23B, Royal Parade, Croydon.

TYPEWRITING.—Neat, prompt, accurate.
From 10d. per 1,000. Highest references.
Legal, dramatic, scientific. Pedigrees a speciality.
French, all branches.—Mrs. MICHEL, 48, Rothschild Street, West Norwood, S.E.

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH.

CHAIR OF GREEK.

THE Curators of Patronage of the University of Edinburgh will, on a date to be afterwards fixed, proceed to the Election of a Professor of Greek in room of Professor Butcher, whose resignation of the Chair has been accepted as from 3rd October next.

Each Candidate for the Chair is requested to lodge with the undersigned, not later than Wednesday, 15th July next, eight copies of his application and eight copies of any testimonials which he may desire to submit.

One copy of the application should be signed.

R. HERBERT JOHNSTON, W.S.,
4, Albyn Place, Edinburgh. Secretary.
June 22nd, 1903.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE.

(A Constituent College of the University of Wales.)

The Council invites applications for the Post of Professor of Latin. Further particulars may be obtained on application to—

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,
Registrar.

University College, Cardiff,
June 18th, 1903.

UNIVERSITY COLLEGE OF SOUTH WALES AND MONMOUTHSHIRE.

(A Constituent College of the University of Wales.)

The Council invites applications for the Post of Professor of Anatomy. Further particulars may be obtained on application to

J. AUSTIN JENKINS, B.A.,
Registrar.

University College, Cardiff,
June 22nd, 1903.

NOTICE. THE MS. IN A RED BOX.

Unless the writer of a historical novel without title, author's name or address, sent to the Bodley Head some weeks ago in a Red Box, communicates with John Lane, Vigo Street, on or before June 30th, the MS. will be placed in the printers' hands and published forthwith under the title

"THE MS. IN A RED BOX."

Should any dispute arise as to terms, the Publisher will appeal to the President of the Publishers' Association and the President of the Authors' Society to decide.

Special cloth cases for binding the half-yearly volume of the ACADEMY can be supplied for 1s. each. The price of the bound half-yearly volume is 8s. 9d. Communications should be addressed to the Publisher, 43, Chancery Lane.

ESTABLISHED 1851.

BIRKBECK BANK.

SOUTHAMPTON BUILDINGS, CHANCERY LANE, LONDON, W.C.

2 %.

CURRENT ACCOUNTS on the minimum monthly balances, when not drawn below £100.

2 %.

2½ %.

DEPOSIT ACCOUNTS
on Deposits repayable on demand.

2½ %.

STOCKS AND SHARES.

Stocks and Shares Purchased and Sold for Customers.

The BIRKBECK ALMANAC, with full particulars, post free.

C. A. RAVESCROFT, Managing Director.

Telephone, No. 5, Holborn.
Telegraphic Address, "BIRKBECK, LONDON."

DIAMONDS

PEARLS, EMERALDS,
GOLD JEWELLERY & ANTIQUE SILVER, &c.,
Valued or Purchased from £1 to £10,000.

SPINK & SON,

DIAMOND MERCHANTS,
1 & 2, Gracechurch Street, Cornhill, E.C., and
17 & 18, Piccadilly, London, W. ESTABLISHED 1772.

THE PIANOLA masters any Piano—anyone can master the Pianola.

EVERY musical composition contains an idea just as every story embodies a plot. Reading is practically a universal accomplishment, and to understand and appreciate the plot of a story is therefore a simple matter. It would be equally easy to grasp the idea in a musical composition were one able to play, but unfortunately comparatively few can play the piano by hand. The difficulty lies in the acquisition of technique or key-striking. By the purchase of a Pianola this difficulty is eliminated; the Pianola possesses unlimited technique—the technique of the world's music. Further, the Pianola provides in a simple manner for playing with expression. Three little levers control the whole keyboard of the piano, and with them the person playing exercises full command over tempo, accent, and all effects of light and shade.

A Pianola makes for brightness in the home. At dances, parties, and other social functions its value can scarcely be estimated.

The Pianola may be had on the Hire System. It costs £65.

The ORCHESTRELLE COMPANY,
225, Regent Street, London, W.

On or about September 1st, our business will be transferred to ÆOLIAN HALL, 135-6-7, NEW BOND STREET, formerly known as the Grosvenor Galleries.

THE METEMPSYCHOSIS OF THE OGDENS

By EDWARD S. VAN ZILE APPEARS IN SUMMER

HOLIDAY
NUMBER

THE SMART SET A MAGAZINE OF CLEVERNESS
DATED JULY

SUMMER
HOLIDAY
NUMBER

Together with Thirty-nine other striking Contributions

THE EXTRA LARGE EDITION IS NEARLY EXHAUSTED
THEREFORE GET YOUR COPY NOW
ONE SHILLING EVERYWHERE

THE SMART SET PUBLISHING COMPANY LIMITED
90-93 Fleet Street London E.C.

ROYAL EXCHANGE ASSURANCE

INCORPORATED A.D. 1720.

Governor—

HENRY F. TIARKS, Esq.

Sub-Governor—

SIR NEVILLE LUBBOCK, K.C.M.G.

Deputy Governor—

C. SEYMOUR GRENFELL, Esq.

Directors—

Rt. Hon. Lord Addington.
R. Barclay, Esq.
Edward Clifton Brown, Esq.
Walter Spencer Morgan Burns, Esq.
R. F. Cavendish, Esq., M.P.
E. H. Cunard, Esq.
E. J. Daniell, Esq.
Sir A. Dent, K.C.M.G.
Sir W. Dunn, Bart., M.P.
C. E. Green, Esq.
Capt. Philip Green.
C. E. Hambro, Esq., M.P.

Directors—

T. F. Knowles, Esq.
G. F. Malcolmson, Esq.
M. G. Megaw, Esq.
D. Meinertzhagen, Esq.
W. R. Moberly, Esq.
H. Morley, Esq.
Spencer J. Portal, Esq.
W. G. Rathbone, Esq.
Rt. Hon. C. T. Ritchie, M.P.
J. Roberts, Esq.
V. H. Smith, Esq.
Capt. Sir G. R. Vyvyan, K.C.M.G.

W. N. WHYMPER, Secretary.

Fire, Life, Marine, Accidents, Burglary & Employers' Liability.

SPECIAL TERMS TO ANNUITANTS WHEN HEALTH IS IMPAIRED.

Claims Paid exceed £41,000,000.

Funds in hand exceed £4,850,000.

FIRE.

Insurances granted Covering Loss or Damage
by Fire at Moderate Rates.

LIFE.

Large Bonuses.
Low Premiums. Unimpeachable Security.

GENERAL ACCIDENTS.

Personal, Accident, and Employers' Liability Insurances are now Granted at Moderate Rates.

Apply for full information to THE SECRETARY: HEAD OFFICE, ROYAL EXCHANGE, LONDON, E.C.

LONDON AND LANCASHIRE LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY.

HEAD OFFICE—66 and 67, CORNHILL, LONDON, E.C.

BOARD OF DIRECTION.

*Chairman—*COLONEL SIR NIGEL KINGSCOTE, G.C.V.O., K.C.B.

*Deputy Chairman—*SAMUEL GURNEY SHEPPARD, Esq.

THE RIGHT HON. EVELYN ASHLEY.
GENERAL SIR REGINALD GIPPS, G.C.B.
VESEY G. M. HOLT, Esq.

LIEUT.-COLONEL GEORGE KEMP, M.P.
SIR THOMAS PAINE.
R. BARCLAY REYNOLDS, Esq.

Branch Offices at

BIRMINGHAM, BRISTOL, LEEDS, LIVERPOOL, MANCHESTER, MERTHYR, GLASGOW and DUBLIN, as well as at MONTREAL, CALCUTTA, BOMBAY and CAPE TOWN.

Extracts from the Fortieth Annual Report.

	£
New Assurances (1902), £684,804, producing a New Premium Income of	30,757
The Premium Income amounted to	274,786
Increase over previous year	£10,304
Death Claims paid with Bonus additions	105,050
The total Funds were increased by £133,566, and now amount to	1,763,068

Results of Quinquennial Valuation as at 31st December, 1902 :—

Strengthened Reserves.—Surplus of £103,127, of which £85,000 was divided.

SPECIAL FEATURES :—Low Rates of Premium.

Policies :—Non-Forfeitable and World-Wide.

NEW ENDOWMENT SCHEME, combining a Family Provision with a Good Investment or a Pension for Life.
Particulars on application.

W. P. CLIREHUGH,
General Manager and Actuary.

